I think the retirement savings program, which is relatively new in this country, could be introduced in a bill and those who are interested in that subject might pass it in a couple of days. Remember that this is not fair: it gives a lot more money to those who are making $20,000 and over than it does not those who are making $6,000 or $7,000; and also remember that those who are making $6,000 or $7,000 are paying for the gain of those who are making over $20,000. If you do not pay it one way, you pay it another. You are talking about money that is being raised to pay the taxes of this country. If you give more money to those earning a higher income than to those earning a lower income, then the latter pay for the benefits that the former get.

I think it would be reasonable to allow two to three days for a debate on the retirement savings plan. It can be said that we have had a pension plan for a long time and everybody understands it, and since there is no change in the pension structure perhaps the bill could be passed in a day and a half. As to the child care provision, there is considerable controversy about whether it provides any kind of equality at all to the people in this country. I think the Minister of National Revenue would probably agree, because she is a woman, that at the low end of the income structure women are in more desperate need of work than they are at the high end, and for that reason there is probably a greater need for child care for people with low incomes than for those with high incomes and much of the assistance will have to flow from the publicly-developed child care structures.

Miss Bégin: This is provincial. The $108 million is the amount people are waiting for in deductions.

Mr. Peters: That amount of money is the money that all taxpayers are paying to a few taxpayers who are able to get benefit from it. I suggest that if that were in a separate bill it could be passed in two or three days. All of that, and a lot of junk, is in the income tax bill. There are a lot of provisions in it and we have already allowed five days for it. The minister is saying we will get eight more hours. I think it is this type of conglomerate bill that is unreasonable; and if it is not unreasonable, then the official opposition in the House is to blame because they agreed to Standing Order 75C. If the other opposition parties were in agreement, the government could do it under 75A. Some of us are opposed to having that conglomeration thrown together without the opportunity to speak on various issues that are not related to the income tax except in a general way and that can only be debated in the budget debate. That is the only cement which holds this whole hodgepodge of bills together.

I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who has a lot of experience in this field, a question. Something said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) impressed me. It was that we give away a lot in trying to get the House to function properly. We have given away almost all our control of economic matters in the House. But would it not serve the members of parliament, and serve the process of law, much better if we were not to put bills before the House with some provisions which some members accept and others do not so that we get to the point where nobody knows what is acceptable and what is not.

I listened to the speech of one member from the official opposition and I do not know whether that party is for, or against, this bill. I am not sure that they know, either. They are prepared to speak against rule 75C because they are opposed to it, but I am not sure whether or not they will support the bill, regardless of whether they are prepared to debate it for the rest of the afternoon or even for several days. Frankly, I think some of my colleagues might have difficulty with the time allocation on this bill, with its provisions of varying degrees of importance. I think the government should be more fair to the opposition. We have had several such bills, such as the bill on justice, this bill on income tax—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments to protest the move by the government to bring down the guillotine on the tax bill now before the House. I would not have spoken were it not for some of the unrealistic arguments that have been put forward on the other side. For example, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) said that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) should sit down and shut up because by speaking he was delaying the refunding of some $108 million to the taxpayers of this country. That is pure balderdash.

The same minister said that only 41 income tax forms had been filed to date, out of the millions of forms that have to be filed in this country. May I remind the House that the deadline on filing income tax forms is April 30, so we have a lot of time: we have three months to go. I know that many taxpayers in this country will not be getting refunds before some time in March, April or, indeed, May or June. It is a phony argument to say we have to impose closure on the House because we would be delaying refunds for thousands of taxpayers. If the government wants to present arguments, the arguments should be credible. If it was serious about this bill and about the time factor, it would have made sure that the bill was brought to the House before this.

This bill is the result of the budget of last May 25, and the government delayed several weeks after the budget before the bill was brought before the House. Then, when parliament reconvened in the fall, the government delayed several weeks before bringing the bill back before parliament. When we came back a few days ago, the government had some other bills of a minor nature that they put on the order paper.

The bill before us today is one that we, as parliamentarians, should be discussing, studying and scrutinizing very carefully. It is a bill dealing with the taxation system. It is a system which is one of the more unfair systems of any of the industrialized countries in the world. Carter told us so many years ago, and many other people have documented the fact. We have just had a report from the National Council of Welfare, called the hidden welfare report, which says that literally millions and millions of dollars each year go out to people in this country in the form of tax write-offs, and so on. This bill will add to that. We know it will raise the limits for private pension plans. This bill would add to that: we all know that. It would raise the limits for private pension plans. It would end the surtax which was imposed on high income people to try to make them fight inflation along with the ordinary Joe.

As parliamentarians, these are the things we should be concerned about if we want to create a just society and a more egalitarian society. Instead, the government brings down the guillotine on this bill. That would not have had to be done if the bill had been introduced sooner. We could have had a good discussion. There did not have to be any acrimony. The government could have listened to the logical arguments of members of the opposition and of members in the progressive wing of the Liberal party. More equitable changes could have been made. For reasons like these, I cannot remain seated and not protest when the government brings in a motion to bring down the guillotine.

In a democratic parliamentary system—and the government House leader should be interested in this point—closure should not be invoked lightly or in a frivolous way. That should only be done with regard to a really serious piece of legislation which is considered an absolute must and which has to get through. It has to be a life and death type of situation—and surely this bill does not fit into that category. If the government is going to start using Standing Order 75C, closure, on small bills like this, I think the work of parliament will be slowed down and this place will become an even slower, more monotonous and more outdated institution than it already is.

One way to speed legislation through the House is by working with opposition parties and by making sure the opposition parties have a chance to air their points of view on things they feel are important. If the government would co-operate like that, I am sure it could expedite legislation through the House. However, when the government brings in closure, it poisons the air of the House. A number of hon. members become angry, and angry members can hold up a lot of legislation for a long time. I know backbenchers will agree with me. It is in the government's own interest not to do things like this and not to antagonize hon. members over what is a relatively small piece of legislation, albeit a very important piece of legislation for many people in this country.

The government tried to put this bill through just before Christmas to give a large Christmas bonus to the wealthy people by increasing the limits for private pension plans, by increasing the limits for registered retirement savings plans and by ending the special surtax on high incomes. That is what the Liberal party tried to do. It tried to rush it through when people were not watching. It wanted to play Santa Claus to the wealthy people of this country.

An hon. Member: Grow up.

Mr. Nystrom: The members of this party made up their minds not to go along with that, and before Chirstmas we stopped the bill. Now the government is trying to invoke closure and bring down the guillotine to protect its wealthy friends. The Minister of National Revenue has the audacity to suggest that if we keep debating this bill we will delay the sending out of refunds to hundreds of thousands of taxpayers. I do not buy that argument. The overwhelming majority of income tax returns have not even been processed.

Mr. Benjamin: They haven't even come in yet.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): They have come in, but they can't be processed because you are delaying.

Mr. Nystrom: I suspect that many people have not yet even received their T4 slips, knowing the speed at which this government operates and knowing the Post Office of this country. If things are that far behind, why does the government want us to rush this bill through?

Mr. Benjamin: The taxpayers are behind.

Mr. Nystrom: The taxpayers are behind, partly because of the unfairness of the government. Little wonder the government is doing so poorly in the public opinion polls when it treats parliament, and opposition members who are here doing their work as well and as studiously as they can, with such arrogance, and when it tramples on all the good ideas which come from this side of the House. I am really glad I am not a Liberal backbencher, because I know they are expressing these ideas to their ministers, and they are being trampled upon. That is why so many of them are considering not running in the next election: they are disillusioned with the government.

I am glad the government brought in closure today, because that brings into the open the way it operates, the way it perceives people and the way it treats people. It brings it all out into the open and indicates to the Canadian people that this is a big, arrogant government—a Big Brother. By this action, the government is indicating that it wants to push things through and trample on the rights of people just because it has to have its way. I see that my time is pretty well up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: However, I had to rise and say those words, not just on my own behalf but on behalf of many hon. members in the back benches of the Liberal party who sit there like muffled puppets on the end of a string and feel frustrated because of the actions of the powerful ministers who sit on the front benches. Liberal backbenchers know very well that they cannot speak their minds because they would be denying themselves promotion to parliamentary secretary positions or eventually to the cabinet or to the Senate. I know most of them want to follow the lead of hon. Jean Marchand and eventually end up in the Senate, because that is where all good Liberals want to end up. It is really on behalf of all those good Liberal friends of mine that I have made these few very relevant remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also want to say a few words about this motion under Standing Order 75C. I also want to speak on behalf of alienated Liberals from the three prairie provinces.

Mr. Broadbent: There are only three of them.

Mr. Benjamin: Liberal backbenchers cannot get the message through to those in the two front rows and those in the middle. They do not seem to have the courage or the guts to do so. If they do have the courage or the guts, they do not have the muscle to get messages through to the cabinet. If what they hear back home is meaningless to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the government House leader and the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Begin), then I would be only too glad to assist those Liberals, because what the government is trying to do in this legislation is not meant to help most of the people of Canada.

The government has invoked Standing Order 75C, which it has the right to do under the rules, but it is doing so in the case of legislation which will help only about 30 per cent of the taxpayers of the country and the overwhelming majority—about 70 per cent—will reap little or no benefit. Those who have the lowest incomes will reap the least benefit from this legislation.

Much has been said about alienation in this country—not just in Quebec—and one wonders why there is alienation. People feel alienated when they find out, sometimes weeks, months or even years after the fact, that if they have an income of only $10,000 a year, a wife, two or three children and mortgages up to their eyeballs, they will reap benefits under this bill totalling close to $500 in 1977, but that the fellow who is in the $25,000 bracket will reap benefits of, would you believe, $1,156, give or take a few dollars here or there.

Under this bill, people in the $50,000 bracket—and that includes civil servants, cabinet ministers, union leaders and corporate executives; a lot of people—will benefit by a little over $2,000. In the fight against inflation which the government has been waging, one would have thought that it would at least have had the decency to continue the idea that those who have can pay a little bit more for a little while longer should do so. But no, the government wants to relieve those on high incomes. For the government this is just another step on its way to the cemetery.

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker, no wonder there is alienation. This bill is one of the reasons—this unfair tax system which requires people at the lowest end of the income scale to pay a disproportionate share of the cost of running the country. Of course, there is nothing new about that: it has been chronic with old-line party governments in this country since year one.

The alienation is compounded almost weekly. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is liable to ask for a motion under rule 75C before this part of the session is much older. He got kicked in the head for wanting to hurt places like Halifax and St. John's, Baie Comeau and Quebec City, the Georgian Bay ports, the western grain producers and the flour milling industry of Canada. He got kicked in the head all last fall, and I am convinced that finally his colleagues persuaded the government to withdraw that clause from an earlier bill proposing government restraint. But I will be damned if the same minister did not bring the same provision back to the House in another bill.

Alienation is not peculiar to Quebec, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how many times the Minister of Transport has to be kicked in the head or how many times a brick wall has to fall on him. The trained seals and pacified sheep over there sit silent, but I hope they make some noise in their caucus. They certainly do not make it here. They drive people to wanting separation. There are a few in every part of the country who feel that way, and with the government's total lack of priorities they will continue to try to pass legislation that helps the wealthy and forgets about unemployment. They did not really implement their own anti-inflation program. They said the minimum increase in income should be $600 per year, but I do not see the old age pensioners getting that. That was not a priority; the priority was bulldozing various and sundry items through this House. This reminds me of a late, unlamented premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker, who proposed legislation about branding irons, chicken debeakers and turkey saddles at a time the province had the highest unemployment for years. The same thing is happening here.

While the official opposition may vote with this party in opposing the motion, I would have thought they would be stridently opposing the legislation as well. But I hear a strange silence from them. I can recall no objection from any member of the official opposition about a taxpayer with an income of $50,000 a year saving $2,000 under this bill, while somebody with a $5,000 income saves only $500 or less. I would have thought the official opposition would have wanted to reverse that table. Certainly, we New Democrats would like to reverse the child care provision. A family with an income of $10,000 or less will save up to $200, but families with an income of around $50,000 will save up to $400. It should be the low income family that benefits twice as much as the high income family. There is not too much noise about this from the official opposition, however. I sense a strange reluctance on their part to impose a tax on high wage earners that would be in proportion to that paid by people on low incomes.

The alienation continues, Mr. Speaker. It is not only because of the bill I mentioned earlier, stupidly introduced by the Minister of Transport with the consent of the government House leader. I can tell the government House leader that the bill will not go through even if we are kept here in July and August. Some government backbenchers from the maritime provinces, the St. Lawrence ports, the Georgian Bay ports, and even from western Canada, will confirm that they do not want to see it go through either. I think this pattern of alienation has to stop.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan).

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate this motion on the legislation that we considered at another time, not that I have anything new to say, but to tell this government that my constituents and many people in the Atlantic region are not worried about it. What they are concerned about is the extremely high unemployment in their areas.

ti2 This past weekend I spoke in the riding of a Liberal member. I was informed both by the press and other people that there is 35 per cent unemployment in the Chatham-Newcastle area of northern New Brunswick at the present time. I know what it is in the Cape Breton highlands and the Canso area. The unemployment is unbelievable and is as high now as at any time in the last 20 years. In fact, in some cases it is almost as high as during the depression. Myself and three fellow members were in Newfoundland and saw what it is like there. I do not have to tell hon. members from Newfoundland about this, but maybe some backbench Liberals have not been there to see the conditions in the outports. If they knew about unemployment there, they might have a different attitude to the distribution of income.

It bothers me that this bill proposes to remove the surtax from incomes of $30,000 and over, while wage and price controls are to remain. There is something wrong with a government that considers as progressive removal of a surtax from the rich at a time when people on low income are not even not holding their own but are unemployed. There is no record of under-employment in the country; no record of people so discouraged that they do not look for work. That is because in areas of Newfoundland, in areas of northern New Brunswick, in areas of the Gaspé, in areas of northern Ontario, and in Cape Breton there just are no jobs.

When I apply for a disability pension on behalf of a constituent, I am astounded to get a letter saying the disability allowance is not available because the applicant can do light work. Where is anyone to get light work in Cape Breton, northern New Brunswick, Newfoundland or the Gaspé, Mr. Speaker? Not only does the constituent not get the disability pension but he does not get his rightful share of unemployment insurance because of the definition of "region". The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) promised me, when he was minister of manpower and immigration, that the definition of "region" would be changed so that a small sub-region like mine, and other parts of Cape Breton, would not be included in the provincial average. The higher employment in the Halifax-Dartmouth area pulls down the amount available to areas that need it.

● (1650)

If I sound angry, let me say that my anger is called for by what I see happening across the Atlantic provinces. Every member from the Atlantic provinces should be angry. I oppose separatism, as does everbody in this House, but I can understand why the people of Quebec would want separatism. Under this government they have suffered from great unemployment in certain parts of that province. One sees unemployment in much of the Atlantic region.

My party supports a more favourable distribution of income to lower income groups in Canada and apologizes to no one for that position. There is no evidence showing that the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) are correct when they say that the present measure is needed as an inducement for saving in this country. The fact is that personal savings in Canada in the last three years have gone up. We do not need incentives for our people to save. Such arguments are false. There is no evidence to show that without passage of this measure there would be a disincentive to invest in the private sector of this country. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you give the rich a tax break, they will invest part of their wealth in New York in the United States where they will get a higher return. According to their logic, that is fine. But we as members of parliament should not encourage that. We have the right and the serious obligation to oppose this measure.

My long-time friend, the deputy prime minister, recently made a speech after being awarded an honourary degree for his work concerning the reform of parliament. I was impressed by his speech. I do not know much about procedure, Mr. Speaker, but recall his saying that debates today are not the same as debates in the good old days in the 1950s. The minister said that certain unimportant bills which should not take long to pass are debated for too long, whereas important bills which ought to be debated at length are not debated enough.

The present bill falls into the latter category. Four and a half days of debate is not enough. I can tell Liberal members, some of whom are personal friends, that people in the Atlantic region are mad at them for considering at the resumption of this session the televising of House debates, when so many of our people are desperately suffering from under-employment and unemployment. Be more concerned about the equality of income distribution in this country, and less concerned about forcing through the House this legislation which will benefit the rich. Surely, backbenchers opposite and progressive elements of the Liberal party oppose the incestuous relationship which has developed beween the rich and their party, a relationship which is evident in this legislation. When are the progressive elements of the Liberal party going to make the party truly liberal, instead of listening to its right wing?

Mr. Benjamin: The Conservatives.

Mr. Hogan: Your present income distribution policies are hurting the people of Canada, and it should be obvious that they are hurting you, too. No wonder you will be thrown out in the next election, when you introduce bills like this.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand why the government would bring in closure on this measure. I speak as one who has supported closure in the past when I felt the issue was of such urgency that closure was called for.

I shall now mention a significant set of figures on which I hope to elaborate later. The Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) suggested that 41 of between eight million and nine million taxpayers may be hurt by this measure. I suppose when you compare that number with the number awaiting changes to the Old Age Security Act and to workmen's compensation legislation and the like under the jurisdiction of other legislatures, the figure is not particularly significant. But we should look at it in its correct perspective. By the end of March, in a normal year, not more than 3 per cent of all filings have been completed. By the end of April, in any average year, not more than 20 per cent of all tax forms have been handled.

I suggest that this debate would have finished well before the end of April, and fail to comprehend why the government feels it necessary to impose closure on this measure. The government argues that taxpayers are waiting for rebates and to having forms processed. Even if one could say that this measure will affect a few poor people who sort of got lost in the shuffle, as it were—I give the government the benefit of the doubt—I cannot see any urgency for the passage of this measure because the people will not get their tax forms back more quickly than in any other year.

Unfortunately, my party does not have enough members in this House to prolong this debate beyond a certain point; otherwise we would have fought this measure to the end.

After studying the bill, you can only come to one conclusion. Nothing focuses attention more on the inequalities in this country and on the welfare system which favours the rich than this sort of debate. In other words, the government does not want to debate the bill.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Agriculture—Cow-calf support program—Reason for reduced payment to provinces which have programs; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Labour conditions—Composition of proposed group to discuss economic issues—Position of Canadian Labour Congress; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—Request for action to protect public from effects of excavation in Quaker Crescent area of Lower Sackville.

It being five o'clock, this House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper,—

[English]

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the private members' business it was intended to discuss today. There were the normal discussions about the item which the House was supposed to consider during private members' hour, the item standing in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). Unfortunately, weather conditions in that hon. member's home province have prevented his attendance in the House today. We received that news late this morning and have been going through the regular list of items on the private members' business agenda without being able to find an item ready for consideration at this time.

I regret to inform the House that unfortunately, despite our best efforts, we have not been able to bring forward an item for consideration during today's private members' hour. In view of that circumstance, and since we have made every effort to bring forward an item for consideration, I suggest that the House might consider continuing with and concluding its discussion relating to the motion proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Benjamin: No way. Call it six o'clock.

Mr. Goodale: Only ten minutes remain in that debate. In view of our physical disability in going ahead with private members' business, I suggest that we would most expeditiously and efficiently use our time if we could continue and conclude discussion of the motion.

● (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The House has been informed that we cannot proceed with private members' business. Does the House consent to the request of the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I would be ready, if need be, to proceed with motion No. 28, if you can put it to the House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what we understood.

Mr. MacFarlane: No, that is not what you understood. You cannot expect something for nothing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent that we do not proceed with private members' business, so we shall have to call the motions in order beginning with the motion in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there has been an indication by the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) that he would be ready to proceed with motion No. 28. While the House did not give consent to call it six o'clock, it surely did not refuse its consent to proceed with motion 28.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps I can help the Chair. The hon. member having indicated that he is ready to proceed, I do not think we should put any obstacles in the way of bringing his motion forward. I suggest we do not waste parliamentary time, but that we proceed as we have suggested.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Frankly, that is what I thought was going to happen. I am surprised the parliamentary secretary said nobody was ready, because we were told that the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) was. We shall be glad to proceed with motion 28.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the House agree to proceed with motion 28?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but in view of the remarks which have just been made, I want to make it abundantly clear that the information which has been given to the House in the last two or three minutes by the last two or three speakers is definitely contrary to the information given to me earlier. If the hon. member is prepared to proceed now, that is desirable, but it is not in conformity with the information I obtained earlier.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I did understand that the hon. member was prepared to proceed with item 28, but I was subsequently informed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) that this was not the case. I had contacted spokesmen for the party to take part in the debate; I went to the trouble of doing that. But after hearing from the parliamentary secretary I informed them they would not be required to attend at this time. I wish these circumstances to be on record.

Mr. Reid: Since there is some dispute as to whether the House is prepared to proceed along certain lines, I wonder whether hon. members are prepared to take up my private member's bill C-1001. I think this is an ideal bill for us to debate since apparently all the members who wish to speak on it are in the House at the present time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On with Lachance!

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, if there cannot be agreement to take item 28, I suggest you follow the proper procedure and call the first and subsequent orders until you come to item 28.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we stand all motions prior to motion 28?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Wonderful.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

TRANSPORT

FINANCIAL STRUCTURE OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider a revision of the financial structure of the St. Lawrence Seaway, by remitting the interest carried over to date, by converting the loans which were made into holdings owned by Canada, and at the same time make provision for an increase in Seaway toll rates sufficient to cover annual operation costs and current capital expenditures, and also to provide the government with a return on its investment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must confess that after all this confusion, it is somewhat difficult to gather one's thoughts and get into an argumentation on the subjet. Since I thought that the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) would be called, I have had relatively little time to gather my thoughts. However, this subject has concerned me for some time. I remember, in particular, that last year the officials of the St. Lawrence Seaway Administration appeared before the Committee on Public Accounts and told something about their financial difficulties, especially in view of the somewhat peculiar financial structure of the St. Lawrence Seaway Administration and in particular in view of the decision made in 1970 by the American counterpart to our administration, that is the St. Lawrence Seaway Administration, American Section, to remit interest outstanding up to 1970 and also to transform into assets capital expenditures on the American side.

In fact, I think it might be appropriate to give the background of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the reasons which brought both government levels to sign an agreement in 1954-55 to build this seaway which, as everyone knows, joins the Atlantic ocean to the Great Lakes by way of the St. Lawrence itself. Indeed, before the inauguration of the seaway, it was extremely difficult to move goods by ship since the St. Lawrence River did not lend itself to it. Anyway, the Welland Canal had been in operation for many years, which allowed small boats and shallow draught steamships to navigate on the Niagara River.

But it was decided that it might be preferable to dig a canal so that larger freighters could go directly from the Atlantic ocean to the Great Lakes and particularly to Lake Michigan and Lake Superior to avoid the transfer of cargo at Montreal or Quebec City harbours into smaller vessels that could negotiate the St. Lawrence above Montreal where there is not much water.

This agreement was reached at the two levels of government—American and Canadian—and it was decided then that a first amount of $350 million would be lent to the Canadian St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to begin work. This first loan of $350 million was spent between 1953 and 1959 to dig and build locks and all the necessary facilities.

Yet, the interests were obviously capitalized when the seaway became operational and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority was supposed to start paying those interests which amounted to some $65 million.

We should not forget that when traffic projections and toll schedules were established initially the seaway was to be largely profitable and it was expected that it would repay the interest on the original loan and also the invested capital. Anyway, the Canadian government has always considered that this capital which has been, in the last seven years, invested in capital expenditures or real estate, was a liability, therefore an account receivable which has been left, in spite of several recommendations from several committees and directors of the seaway, in the liabilities of the seaway and therefore as an account receivable for the Canadian government.

Unfortunately we should recall that the initial forecasts as concerns the increase in seaway traffic, inflation, inflationary pressures which have, of course, affected the operations of the seaway, wages, and so on, have prevented the initial forecasts from becoming reality and we realized later that in spite of surpluses in its every day operations and the fact that it repaid regularly the interest, the seaway would never be able to refund the initial loan which was of $350 million as I said.

We must also remember that to accommodate larger freighters we had to invest up to $185 million to renovate the old Welland Canal, dredge it and develop existing facilities. Consequently, out of the total present debt of the St. Lawrence Seaway, $817 million, we must realize that about $500 million are investments, holdings, real estate—locks, wharves, buildings, all the equipment necessary to the daily operations of the seaway—and the rest, about $318 million, are the accruing interests up to this day.

We must also remember that, as a joint American-Canadian commission is seeing to the enforcement of toll rates, the tolls can be increased only if there is a consensus between the two levels of government. Twice between 1960 and 1970, in 1964 and in 1967, studies showed that, because of inflation, the toll rates had to be re-examined and that an increase should be considered.

Unfortunately, both times the two levels of government could not reach a consensus and the rates stayed at their former level. On the other hand, in 1971 the Carr report made two main recommendations aiming first at a 10 per cent increase in the toll rates and the prescribed rates and at a reorganization of the financial and accounting systems of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

We must also remember that in 1970, as a result of similar problems faced by the American authority of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the American government had taken a momentous decision concerning the financial structure of their seaway authority. They had decided more particularly to capitalize capital expenditures already made. Evidently those expenditures were lower on the American side since they have only two locks. Nevertheless they decided to put what was considered as accounts receivable among the fixed assets of the American government.

On one hand, since interests were regularly accruing, they decided to pay off the entire debt and on the other hand, to provide that the American authority of the St. Lawrence Seaway should pay each year a fixed amount to reimburse the floating debt. Consequently the American sector now enjoys an extremely healthful financial condition and each year with its operating surplus it pays off the interests. On the other hand, its decision was not taken in spite of the urgent and pressing requests of various directors. I am thinking in particular of Messrs. Camu and Laurendeau. I could not speak for Mr. Chevrier, but in the annual report of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for 1975, it was clearly indicated that he suggested precisely what is provided for in my motion, namely, and I quote from memory: "... to remit the interest carried over and convert the loans which were made into holdings owned by Canada, and at the same time, make provision for an increase in Seaway toll rates sufficient to cover annual operation costs and current capital expenditures, and also to provide the government with a return on its investment."

As a matter of fact, the Canadian government did not follow up this matter for a very simple reason: because it is in the process of restructuring the main public corporations involved in transportation. I am thinking in particular of a bill which is now before the House concerning Air Canada and the CNR. The situations are somewhat similar in that the capital expenditures of those two corporations will eventually be converted into holdings owned by Canada and will no longer be accounts receivable. As a matter of fact, it is merely an accounting fiction. It is now obvious that the St. Lawrence Seaway will not be able to meet its initial commitments, that it will not be in a position to repay the outstanding debt which now amounts to the astronomical amount of $819 million, that it will not even be able to repay the interests due, because it has not even been in position for three years now to cover its operation costs.

I have here the estimates for 1976-77, and the estimated revenues are $26.5 million while the estimated expenditures amount to about $36.5 million, for a $10 million deficit. This does not include the interest due for 1976-77 which amounts to $45 million. There is no question whatever of reimbursing one penny of the interests due, which means that the government will have to continue the fictional financing of the St. Lawrence Seaway since it is the creditor and loans and interests due are not recoverable through the seaway operations.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, my explanation might give the impression that the St. Lawrence Seaway is in a very unsound financial position and is not viable. In my opinion, it is a misleading conception of the situation. In fact, it is not possible to simply assess the St. Lawrence Seaway strictly in relation to its operation costs or its capital costs since it represents an asset, a tremendous economic advantage for Canada, providing a very convenient means of transportation for freight traffic between the Atlantic Ocean and the Great Lakes.

In any event, the tonnage keeps increasing ever since 1959, that is since the opening of the seaway and it is expected that this tonnage increase will continue during the next 15 years, at an average rate of about 2.5 per cent. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this tonnage passed from an average of 12 million tons during the years just before the opening of the seaway in 1959 to 57.6 million tons in 1973, a record year so far. In fact the increase in the Welland Canal itself is still more significant because similar increases pushed traffic up to 67.2 million tons in 1973.

Since then the Seaway Authority had all sorts of problems beyond its control: strikes, bad weather, problems in grain transportation; in short, things have improved gradually, the situation now seems better and the administrators are extremely confident that the increase will continue during the next 15 years.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is good to underline the great economic value of the St. Lawrence Seaway. It is worth just mentioning that the overall value of products carried through the seaway system was estimated at approximately $6 billion. Of course, this amount does not include the indirect benefits accruing to the shippers, the cost of commodities to the consumer and, of course, the expansion of international trade for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be brief but I simply want to explain to what extent it would be possible for the government of Canada to give back to the St. Lawrence Seaway a sound financial structure, which can be done without spending a single cent. It is strictly a bookkeeping operation similar to what the U.S. government did in 1970. As the directors of the St. Lawrence Seaway said themselves before the Committee on Public Accounts, and this is the wording of my motion, Mr. Speaker, we would simply have to remit the interest carried over to date, namely about $318 million, and to convert the loans which were made originally, namely $500 million—$350 million for the St. Lawrence Seaway itself and about $200 million for the administration of the Welland Canal—into holdings owned by Canada, and at the same time—and this is for the past—put an end, once and for all, to the difficult situation in which they find themselves and provide for the future an increase in the seaway tolls sufficient to meet operating costs, for, as I said a while ago, this year the operating deficit will amount to some $10 million while, naturally, enabling the government, if the administration becomes sound, to make a return on its investments.

Mr. Speaker, I know this matter has been of concern to the government for some time now, and that it has been the subject of many a study. It must be understood that, though this is an accounting operation, it also fits within the wider context of the financial restructuration of the big state-owned transport companies. As I said before, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) tabled a bill in the House whose aim is precisely the organization of the financial activities of the CN and Air Canada. I feel it would be indicated to integrate the St. Lawrence Seaway into that policy; that would enable the seaway to have firm objectives in the future, and of course, it would reassure its users who really do not know what to expect, and I don't blame them. In fact, that may be one of the main problems of the St. Lawrence Seaway in view of its precarious financial situation; and there again, this in a fictitious way, since the Canadian government, in the final analysis, must finance it and cover its expenses, while the users, who do not know where they stand cannot really plan their future activities.

I therefore advocate, strictly, in my motion, a reorganization that is long past due, a reorganization that has proved itself in the American equivalent of the St. Lawrence Seaway, through namely, the remission of interest and capitalization of fixed assets; to allow the administrators in the future to make better plans for their financial activities, investments and capital expenditures, so that they can really do the job they are paid for, that is administrate a business which is highly vital, economically fundamental for the prosperity of eastern Canada, particularly for Ontario and Quebec, and also of course for the Maritimes. This business is also highly vital for western Canada since it allows grain from this region to be transported directly without having to pass through costly intermediaries en route to foreign markets. In short, Mr. Speaker, this is an operation which is needed and I strongly urge the House to accept this motion and recommend this restructuration.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on this very important resolution. It is very current to our problems. This nation stretches some 4,500 miles across the breadth of the North American continent. We are in keen competition with our trading partner to the south and the rest of the industrial free world. We are in keen competition in the movement of raw materials and minerals to the third world countries. As far as our competitive position is concerned, more and more people are concluding that we are not able to compete with our major competitors in many ways. In analysing our own economy we can readily see that we have built up our costs. This has placed us in a very difficult non-competitive position with much of the free world, including our major competitor the United States. Transportation is a key factor. Transportation of goods for export and within Canada for consumption plays a part in the total cost, whether we are buying or selling a commodity, of our efforts to provide jobs and a standard of living comparable to what is expected.

The development of the United States was handled somewhat differently than our own. Their core of government engineers designed and built much of their transportation system. I think of their waterways in particular. The Mississippi is a tremendous waterway, providing cheap transportation for much of their export goods as well as those consumed in the United States. Their core of engineers deepened, broadened and extended the Columbia River to the point where tugboats and barges can move coal, grain and lumber a long way inland. There is no question about the cost of developing their waterways. They felt that by developing the Mississippi, Columbia and Ohio rivers, as well as many other river systems, they were building their country. There was no question of charging it all back and paying for it. This is one of our faults in Canada.

I can readily accept the first part of this resolution. However, I absolutely oppose the second part. It is time for the federal government to play a role in building this country, making the facilities available to all Canadians no matter whether they live in central Canada, western Canada or eastern Canada. In other countries the waterways have proven to be a major competitive vehicle in getting their products to the export market as well as distributing them within the country. This resolution suggests that everything should be paid back to the federal government. We have been obsessed with the idea of paying back to the federal government. It is the duty of the federal government to build this country so that Canadians can find jobs competitive with those around the world.

This is a great country, with a great potential. The shipping industry is one of those great potentials. We have talked about an industrial policy for years. What has this country launched upon? It launched its industrial policy upon an air industry. We do not have a large enough market to sustain the air industry in which this government has invested. It may be terrible to say that, but it is true.

We cannot compete with the air policy of the United States. France and Great Britain had great difficulty maintaining their air industries. However, there are some industries that lend themselves well to industrial policy. The shipping industry is one of those. We have, if not the longest coastline in the world, certainly the second longest. There is great potential in our inland waterways. However, what do we see? There is discouragement with regard to our waterways. There is hesitancy and reluctance to make use of our natural shipping lanes and coastal lines. One aspect of our industrial policy should be the shipping industry. It should be encouraged, not discouraged. The railway industry is another. It, too, lends itself to this philosophy because of the great breadth of this country. It would complement an industrial policy.

● (1730)

What does this resolution suggest, particularly in its last part? It states the following:

... by converting the loans which were made into holdings owned by Canada, and at the same time make provision for an increase in Seaway toll rates sufficient to cover annual operation costs—

I think they should be sufficient to cover annual operating costs, and I do not object to that. It goes on:

—and current capital expenditures, and also to provide the government with a return on its investment.

This is the point I wonder about: are we as a government investing in Canada to have a return on our investment in so many dollars and cents, or will that return come to Canada indirectly? That is the question which we, as legislators, have to ask ourselves. Will we be satisfied to have that return come back to us indirectly, not directly as this motion suggests? I say that in the long run we, as Canadians, must be prepared to say we are satisfied with that return coming back to us indirectly, and we are confident that it will if we provide the vehicle or the avenue, whatever you want to call the St. Lawrence Seaway, for Canadian products to enter world markets.

What will the doubling of the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls do, and what will the doubling of the fees on the Welland canal do to the shipping industry on the St. Lawrence Seaway? I have here an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on June 24, 1976, which reads as follows:

Federal proposals to increase tolls on the Welland canal would double the fees for many vessels moving through the Seaway system—

I want to stop here and make the point that everybody in the House and in Canada knows that vessels using the St. Lawrence Seaway are mainly Canadian vessels manned by Canadian sailors. By doubling the tolls we will be making those Canadians ships less competitive with their counterparts on the ocean lanes. The article goes on to read:

—the twenty-eighth annual Conference of the Canadian Water Resources Association in Toronto has been told.

John MacDonald, chairman of the Great Lakes Waterways Development Association, said in a speech prepared for delivery to the conference that the proposals would decrease the use of the Seaway and seriously affect the interests of western Canada.

"We are told that Ottawa intends to charge for use of the Welland the same tolls on bulk cargo as those now prevailing on the international Seaway," he said.

A group of people who have studied the St. Lawrence Seaway want to see it used to a greater extent than it is today. What would that do to Canadian ships? It would mean more jobs for Canadians. If we did not increase the tolls, it would make Canadian goods more competitive with other goods in world trade, and it should make foreign goods in Canada cheaper for the Canadian consumer.

In my view it would be logical and it would make good sense for the government to say to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, "We believe that you should charge tolls which would allow you to cover your costs of operation, but we do not expect you to pay an increase on the money we, as the Canadian government, have paid in the building of the St. Lawrence Seaway". I think that is a fundamental point.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) once said in the House of Commons that this would allow Americans to use the Seaway free of charge. I want to make the point that the Americans use the Mississippi and they use the Columbia. They have a tremendous network of inland waterways which assist that nation in moving its products to export, and around its own country for internal trade. These waterways are the cheapest form of transportation that a country has. They are our cheapest form of transportation.

Some 50 per cent or 60 per cent of tonnage on the St. Lawrence Seaway is made up of western grain, but the major portion of the remaining cargo is made up of iron ore which is made into steel, and steel means good jobs. Today steel in world trade is a very competitive commodity. Steel mills in central Canada are in keen competition with Japanese and American steel mills. The steel mill and plant operating on the east coast is in keen competition with steel mills in the United States and in central Canada. Yet we have before us a resolution which will increase the cost of doing business in this country.

There may come a day when we will say that we should pool a little money to build an additional waterway, and that perhaps the Seaway could pay a little bit back so that we will build an extension of the Seaway and deepen and lengthen the locks. Perhaps some time in the future when we place ourselves in a competitive position in world trade we will be able to do that, but I say to the House that now is not the time. We are in severe competition with other countries; there is a tremendous growth in unemployment in Canada and economists say that 1977 will be a difficult year. Also, cargo on the Seaway is carried solely on Canadian ships. The men who man the ships on the Seaway are Canadians.

The doubling of the tolls, even on the Welland canal, as the Canadian Water Resources Association stated in Toronto last year, may well double the costs of many vessels moving on the St. Lawrence Seaway. This would place us in a more difficult position than the one in which we find ourselves. In the remaining portion of the 1970's Canada will remain in keen competition with other nations, so now is not the time to adopt this resolution, particularly its latter half.

There is only one other point that I wish to make, and I think I would be remiss if I did not make it. If we double the tolls on the Welland canal unilaterally, we can expect some retaliation from the United States which might come in many different ways. For example, they could double their tolls on the Sault Ste. Marie locks. This would be detrimental to Canadian shipping and would add to the cost of moving grain and other products through the St. Lawrence Seaway.

In 1976 we took action with regard to the beef industry which we in this party said would bring retaliation, but we were scoffed at. However, retaliation did come in one form or another. One only had to listen to the former U.S. secretary of agriculture, Mr. Butz, speak in Saskatoon a month ago to realize that retaliation was thought about and talked about by the United States government. Retaliation does take place, but whether it is visible and clearly seen by all is another thing. If we unilaterally double the tolls on the locks of the Welland canal we will be asking for retaliation. If we increase the tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway, we will only hurt ourselves in the long run.

We are making Canada less competitive and creating more unemployment, not just in the shipping industry, as I mentioned before, but also in the manufacturing industry, which wants to get its products out into that shipping lane. To put it bluntly, we are creating less revenue for the farmers of western Canada, and anyone who knows anything about western Canadian farmers knows that when they have a dollar they spend two to buy equipment which is manufactured in central Canada.

We turn off the whole economy with what I call this search for additional revenue, which is a method of taxation. That is really what the resolution means to me. It is a search for additional revenue by a money hungry government which already spent far more than it should have spent in 1974, 1975 and 1976. I would like to see the government reduce its demands for additional revenue for 1977, not search for more ways to raise revenues. I would like to see the government reduce the rabid expenditures which have taken place in recent years which have harmed the Canadian economy and which have helped to put us all into a very difficult competitive position. By adopting this resolution we would only find ourselves in a worse competitive position.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member who moved this resolution and to the most recent speaker, I have a few things to say about the general effects of the resolution, but I want to speak mainly about the Welland Canal. My constituency covers a good half of it, the important southern end. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) was expounding on government expenditures. He should remember that we have cut down expenditures in every government department. That has been going on for well over a year, so I think his remarks can be overlooked because they are not very accurate.

As far as the Welland Canal is concerned, I do not think the remarks of the hon. member were correct on that either. For the last four years I have been talking about this with my constituents, and also with the members of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. We cannot by any means say that all the ships and sailors on the St. Lawrence Seaway going through the Welland Canal are Canadians. There is a huge number of salties. There is a fair number of American ships, and many Canadian ones.

What is carried through the Welland Canal which mainly affects Canada? It is mainly coal from the Lake Erie ports on the United States side, and iron, both from Thunder Bay and from Pennsylvania, but mainly from Thunder Bay and the north shore. Where do they go? They go to Hamilton. They supply the steel companies there, Dofasco and Stelco. A considerable amount of grain is shipped several times a year in large quantities, but a great amount of grain is shipped past us to Toronto, to Montreal and to Maritime ports by rail. When we talk about increasing the tolls and about the cost of shipments through the Welland Canal, we are really talking about so many cents per ton of coal. According to the Seaway Authority, it decided to apply four cents to the cost of shipping each ton of coal. I think some people do not remember how much the price of coal has gone up. It costs about $52 or more per ton, and four cents on $52 is very little.

With regard to steel, the same logic applies. A few cents on a ton of iron ore do not affect the competitiveness of our Canadian manufacturing firms at all. Similarly, the very few cents added to the cost per bushel of transporting wheat is almost negligible, and we have no trouble disposing of our wheat. In fact recently we sold another huge order to China.

Mr. Kempling: It won't go through the Seaway.

Mr. Railton: Hon. members must realize that increasing the tolls at the Welland Canal to cover annual operating costs will not affect our economy. I think the hon. member for Crowfoot is right: we will have to absorb the capital costs and the interest debt. That is only sensible; but on the other hand I do not think we should go on crying about the raising of tolls. It is the only sensible thing to do. Naturally we would limit the increase to the amount required to cover the annual cost of operation.

There are many other people who would like to say a few words in this debate. I would like to go on and talk about the rest of the Seaway, the fact that it is an international waterway and that sort of thing, but I cannot cover all that. I think we have to give other hon. members a chance to speak too.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my party has long taken the position that something like the St. Lawrence Seaway is a public work for the national good. It is a part of a national transportation system which benefits the nation as a whole. In fact it is an instrument of national policy. I want to tell the hon. member who moved this resolution that at least one part of his resolution would discriminate further against producers, shippers and exporters in different parts of the country because of where they happen to live, our geography and our climate.

I think there is no disagreement that the debt, and the interest thereon of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority should be taken over by the government of Canada. That would signify the total public ownership of the St. Lawrence Seaway, and the cost of that debt should be born by the nation as a whole and not just by the users. I hope there is little or no argument about that concept anywhere in this House, and I hope my good friends on the government side will remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that this is one area where his idea of user pay should not be allowed to take effect.

I want to remind the hon. member who moved this resolution that making provision for an increase in Seaway toll rates sufficient to cover annual operation costs and current capital expenditures is just not acceptable. Current and future capital cost expenditures should be borne by the government.

I see some inconsistency in this resolution. Current and future capital cost expenditures should be borne by the nation as a whole, just as the hon. member proposes in the earlier part of his resolution, but original capital costs and interest debts should also be assumed by the country as a whole. I do not know how the hon. member can have it both ways. Providing the government with a return on its investment is just nonsense. Something which is a public utility and a requirement is an asset to the nation as a whole. I do not know of any town, village or city looking for returns on their investments in sewer systems, water systems and highways. The St. Lawrence Seaway falls into the same category.

The last point in the resolution is totally unacceptable to most people in this country. The St. Lawrence Seaway is one of the main transportation routes in our nation. It is a benefit. The nation as a whole shares the cost. The nation as a whole can and should carry the cost of transportation in every part of the nation and in whatever form, whether ferries and causeways in the Atlantic provinces, a waterway like the St. Lawrence Seaway, or ports like Churchill and Prince Rupert. If these are to be operated not only on the basis of paying the costs of operation but recovering the cost of all capital, interest, and a return on investment, only the rich could travel. We would export little and we would have trouble importing because people would not be able to pay the price of goods.

Surely the fact that ships are energy efficient means that we should promote greater use of them in this country. Grain producers must have low cost water transportation if we are to remain in competitition with other grain exporting nations.

In his remarks the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) spoke of doubling the tolls. An article which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle Herald on June 4 last reported Mr. Paul Normandeau, president of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, as telling the Public Accounts Committee that tolls would have to be five times higher than their existing levels in order to put the St. Lawrence Seaway on a paying basis. Now my hon. friend would have us accept a resolution that would not only put it on a paying basis but would give the government a return on its investment. There is no way we can accept that, Mr. Speaker.

I would remind hon. members that Canadian cargoes move toll free through the United States locks at Sault Ste. Marie. I agree with the hon. member for Crowfoot that if we were to increase our tolls there would of course be retaliatory action. This would be bound to have an effect on Alberta coal moving to Ontario. I suggest that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) check with Ontario Hydro and Ontario consumers to see how they would like that. It also means that grain shipments, about ten million tons a year, could be diverted to United States ports.

This is a public utility and it could operate at cost to the user. The capital cost and interest cost should be assumed by the nation as a whole. Those who advocate it should operate with a return on investment to the government should remember that the government is the people of Canada. This facility is meant to function for the welfare of the people of Canada, as are a lot of other facilities.

My hon. friend across the way speaks of international shipping. How many international ships would use the St. Lawrence Seaway if these tolls were imposed? They would use United States ports.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture represents agriculture from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In a brief submitted to the government last September, the federation opposed any increase in the tolls although they supported that part of the hon. member's resolution which proposes the government should take over interest charges. Their brief reminds us that the United States government absolved those responsible for their portion of the St. Lawrence Seaway of all past, present and future capital and interest costs. It would seem to me we can do no less.

The brief also had this to say:

> The Canadian Federation of Agriculture opposes any increase in tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway, and further recommends that the capital debt and interest accumulated thereon be assumed by the Government of Canada.

The interest and debt amounts to something over $800 million, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Do you subscribe to that?

Mr. Benjamin: The same thing should be applied to the CNR debt.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Benjamin: Because it is a public utility. The government of Canada should pick up all those bonds, pay out the bond lenders, and stop the taxpayers being pressured by those who collect the interest. Hon. members should look at the CNR financial statements as well as at those of the St. Lawrence Seaway. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief claims that a toll charge high enough to cover annual operating costs, the future recovery of capital costs and accumulated debts, even amortized over 50 years, would be intolerably high.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker. The problem is not only the effect this would have on our competitive position in the export of grain but on the hauling of iron ore. If the hon. member for Welland thinks that a lot of that would not be diverted by using other means and other routes, he is kidding himself. An increase in tolls would encourage that to happen.

Mr. Railton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have been misquoted by the hon. member in two statements—one about the recent statement and the other about costs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have difficulty recognizing that as a point of order. It is mostly a point of debate and argumentative.

It being six o'clock, and the hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That in relation to Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, eight hours shall be allotted to the further consideration in committee of the whole stage of the said bill;

That, at the end of the eighth such hour, any proceeding before the committee shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of the said bill, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the government moves anything as horrendous—that is the correct word—as a closure motion, it ought to have some justification for it, and the justification which has been put forward by spokesmen for the government is that until Bill C-22 passes income tax rebates in 1976 cannot be processed.

It is important to consider statistics. They show that the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue normally processes 3 per cent of all tax returns by the end of March, and we say that this bill would pass by then in any event. More significantly, we argue that certain rebates can be made within the authority of legislation passed so far. After all, Bill C-21 to do with the excise tax deals with sales tax exemptions which relate to the same May, 1976, budget.

As I said when speaking about tax returns, on average only 3 per cent of all such returns are processed by mid-March, only 20.2 per cent of the total are processed by mid-April, and 36 per cent by mid-June. Not until mid-August will, say, 92.3 per cent of all tax returns have been processed.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

My party has shown strong determination in opposing passage of this measure; unfortunately, since there are only 16 of us in the House of Commons it is most unlikely that we could hold up this legislation, much as we are determined to try, long enough to interfere significantly with the processing of tax returns. I therefore suggest that the government is being less than honest with Canadians when it says that it must impose closure in order to help the taxpayer, particularly the little taxpayer.

I have had a number of letters from irate citizens who have at least $11,000 tucked away in savings. They are angry with me for opposing this bill. They want to add to their savings and they do not want to pay taxes.

I say that the government is not justified in bringing in closure. Its two grounds for the motion, namely, that passage of the bill is necessary because it will help certain people and that it cannot pay rebates unless the bill passes, are without foundation. Therefore, it is scarcely justified in moving the closure motion. I think the government should be thoroughly ashamed of itself for the less than honest manner in which it has placed this matter before the country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we oppose this motion. We believe firmly that the use of closure is the wrong way to run a democratic parliament. I agree with the remarks made by one or two members this afternoon on the government side of the House, that we must find ways to apportion our time and use it sensibly as among various kinds of legislation. Some pieces of legislation are important and deserve considerable debating time; some are unimportant and ought to be dealt with quickly.

What bothers me about the present method of using closure is that it is a case of giving in to the idea that there is no way to work out our timing arrangements on a sensible basis. Therefore every time we use closure we put off the day when we shall find a better way. So, Mr. Speaker, because we think it is wrong to apply closure to a bill as contentious as this one, and because we think that the use of the closure rule delays the finding of a better and more co-operative way to run the House of Commons, we strongly oppose this motion. I say this as one who has often advocated a sensible apportionment and allocation of our time. I think it can be done. I think we can start a session with a clear indication of what is to come before the House, and with an agreement as to which measures are important and deserve debating time, and which measures can be dealt with quickly. But so long as we have a government which refuses to give us the session's program in advance and relies on the present ad hoc, helter-skelter way of doing things, we shall have a parliament which does not deal with its business in a business-like and appropriate way.

As a member of this House I have seen a good many applications of the closure rule—the old one as well as the new one—and I can say that every time it is used it creates feelings of ill will; and, worse, this procedure prevents us from working out a sensible way to deal with the business of the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 8.11 o'clock p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of that standing order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, (Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)) which was agreed to on the following division.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, December 20, 1976, consideration in committee of Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

[Translation]

When the committee rose on Monday, December 20, 1976, we were on clause 16 of the bill.

[English]

Shall Clause 16 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 agreed to.

On Clause 18.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, before going on with this clause, I would like an explanation from the minister.

An hon. Member: His officials are not here yet.

Mr. Saltsman: We have lots of time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the Judges Act, when all individuals to whom an annuity could be granted upon the death of a federal judge have themselves died or ceased to be eligible for annuity, the judge himself becomes eligible to receive a lump sum payment which represents a return of pension contribution which has been made to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

At present a taxpayer may purchase an income averaging annuity in respect of any lump sum pension payment which he receives upon his withdrawal or retirement from employment. This amendment extends the privilege of forward averaging to federal judges who receive a lump sum pension payment as described above. Because such a payment is made at a time other than the time the judge withdraws or retires from his judgeship, this amendment is necessary.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 21.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the clauses to which we take exception in terms of the disproportionate benefits it provides to some people in comparison with others. I have a table which I would like to read in connection with how the benefits occur with regard to child care expenses. In considering child care expenses we find that there are many tables here dealing with who benefits and who does not. There is a table in conjunction with registered retirement savings plans and child care for two children. If income is $10,000, the saving is $210. The disability deduction, which is one of the highly touted aspects of this bill, is $275. We are not complaining that these savings at that income level should not take place, but if we go on to higher incomes, for example, $50,000, the saving is doubled. In the case of a registered pension plan the saving is $430. In the case of an RRSP the saving is $645.

Using that income, in the case of child care where two children are involved the saving is doubled. The saving is $430. It seems to me that these things should be organized in such a way that the saving is equal. If in fact the saving is to be $210 at the $10,000 level for the registered pension plan, or $210 in the case of the child care plan, it should be the same for everyone right across the board, and we object to the fact that the saving is larger with higher incomes. That is the feature all the way through the various aspects of the bill which we find so offensive.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is a point about which the hon. member's colleagues have been making a great deal. The response is that on the other hand the tax payable at the various levels indicated is upped as income is progressively greater. It is true that there is a larger reduction in tax as you go up the income scale. On the other hand, there is a very much greater absolute tax payable.

Mr. Saltsman: This is the kind of thing we hear when we talk about progressive income tax in this country. They say lower the rates because they are too onerous. Then the minister comes along and says that we have a progressive income tax, and look what the rates are. What we are saying is that this is only one example. There are many more examples which we have put forward. Every time a deduction is introduced which makes it possible for people with higher incomes to get greater benefits from registered retirement savings plans, child care deductions and even disability deductions, the progressiveness of the income tax system is reduced. This is what is being done all along in our income tax system as a result of these various deductions. In fact the system is not nearly as progressive as the minister makes it out to be.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I just have to point out to the hon. gentleman that the percentage change remains the same all the way up.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, what is the argument of the government against a tax credit arrangement? The minister says that the percentage remains the same all the way up. That is true, but the amount does not remain the same all the way up. In some cases the amount is considerably more than in others. If we were to use a tax credit out of tax payable and if we set a fixed sum, that would be the amount of a child care deduction. It would be an actual amount. It would apply to the rich the same as it would to the poor. It seems to me that when we do things on a sliding basis, that means that at the high end those who need it least get the greatest advantage, and this has to be paid by everyone. That is the amount the government does not get in taxes. Therefore everyone pays it, and those who need it most do not get the most advantage out of it. If this were calculated on the basis of a delayed tax, a deferred tax, or a tax which would be set at a fixed amount and the amount payable from the income tax were taken off, then this would be fair and it would also be in proportion to need.

Using the amount of $300 as an example, this sum would represent a higher proportionate amount to the poor than it would to the rich. It would be a very small proportion of the taxable income of those earning $20,000. In fact, it might cost them money because it would become income. On the other hand, at the lower end it would have quite an influence because it would be deducted directly from tax.

I would be interested to know why the Minister of Finance has not given some consideration to this more equitable proposal. It is being used now in Ontario with regard to the Ontario proportion of income tax both for the elderly and for farm properties. Both of them are in the form of a deferred tax. I see no reason why we should not at least consider this, because the minister must agree that what we are doing in each of these instances is providing a great deal more benefit at the top end of the tax structure than we are at the bottom. Every dollar deducted at the top end is considerably more—four or five, depending on the degree—than it is at the low end, and if we want to provide child care where it is needed so desperately, we should provide it to people with lower incomes.

Under this scheme the advantages seem to flow unequally to the top end. The rich get richer and the poor get poorer, and this will continue to happen. While it is true that it is equal on a percentage basis, it is not truly equal. It is like saying we all have an equal opportunity, but some of us were born in more favourable circumstances than others.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member who is speaking from his seat is not necessarily equal. He may have less intelligence than most but we give him equal opportunity in this tax structure. I think it is not equal, however, and we should be starting to provide opportunity on an equal basis.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, in percentage terms it is equal. There is an inequality in the income tax structure but it is in the upper bracket, not the lower bracket. In percentage and absolute terms, the more you get the more you pay. This is done by way of deduction rather than giving a tax credit. It is regarded as a deduction available for certain people in the work force—primarily women, but also a single parent man. In order to earn income, if these people have dependent children they have to make arrangements for day care facilities. In that sense it is regarded as a sum expended for family purposes so that the taxpayer may be free to earn income.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister not agree that where we are setting up day care centres as are other segments of government, which are usually operated in a community structure where it is absolutely necessary to have this kind of care so that family may have enough money to get by on, that the need becomes greater at the low end of the income scale rather than the top end? The minister is correct in saying it is a progressive tax structure and that the rich pay more than the poor on a percentage basis, but would he not agree that there is more left over at the top end than at the bottom end?

In the example given to us, suppose the child care deduction were eliminated and replaced by a tax credit of $350 per child, for the woman whose earned income was $6,000 this would mean a $93 reduction in her tax bill. Instead of the $257 tax saving she now receives from the deduction, she would have her taxes reduced by $350, a difference of $93. The $20,000 a year woman would have her tax bill increase by $30 since the present tax deduction gives her a saving of $380, but the credit would only give her a saving of $350.

It seems to me we are interested in the low end of the scale particularly in those subsidized communities where a large percentage of people depend on two incomes and even the combined income is not very high. The tax credit would bring more relief on a percentage basis than it would the person at the top end of the scale, no matter what the physical amounts were. I think everyone will agree that if we keep on with the structure we now have, the difference in the standards of living between those at the low end of the scale and those at the top will become greater. It may still be true to say that the percentage the government gets back from the tax structure is much higher at the top end than at the bottom, but the actual amount of money is not higher at the top than the bottom. It is much lower.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, as indicated by my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, the minister seems to be arguing the case that income tax is set up in a progressive way so that the higher the income, the higher the percentage of tax. That is theoretically true, but every special provision we put into the act, such as this one, is another step toward destroying the very progressivity about which the minister spoke so favourably.

What do we see when we look at the child care provision? A large number of married women in Ottawa work, and I am sure every member knows some of them who have quite high qualifications. According to the income tax tables for this year, those who make between $20,000 and $25,000 per year will be taxed at 31 per cent on their taxable income. The minister is now proposing that $1,000 spent on child care should be exempt from income tax, which means that such a woman will save between $300 and $350. But her secretary, who is probably earning $8,000 or $9,000 per year, will pay 20 per cent tax on her taxable income and not save even half of what her boss does.

This provision does what the Carter commission pointed out years ago—it takes one more step toward destroying the progressivity about which the minister spoke. I see the minister shakes his head. I would be glad if he could explain how our argument is in error.

It seems to me that we should not be moving toward provisions which give people a legal method of avoiding income tax, but that we should be moving to eliminate these loopholes and special provisions. To a great extent they are used on behalf of people in the upper income bracket, or self-employed people, and are of little or no use to the ordinary working person on a low wage.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would make the point again that, of course, as the progressivity of the tax goes up you have the same relative percentage all the way up. It does not alter that, except as you top out, at that point some of the higher income does not get the same benefit it otherwise would if the expenditure goes above $1,000 per year. There is progressivity in percentage terms. Of course this is of more value in the higher of the two categories, but in percentage terms the relativity is the same.

The hon. member for Timiskaming says we should reverse the order and have declining benefits the more tax you pay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We do not usually follow that policy, and I am not sure that in terms of equity it would be reasonable.

Mr. Orlikow: The point I am trying to make, which has been made by many others, including the National Council of Welfare, is that we ought to be directing our attention either toward remodelling income tax along the present lines, or to some form of negative income tax. The aim would be to put money into the hands of people at the bottom end of the income scale rather than people at the top.

We have said many times that everything we have done over the last 25 years has led to the position we are in today where the bottom one fifth of income earners are getting a smaller percentage of the gross national product than they were 25 years ago. They are getting less than 4 per cent of the gross national product, whereas the people in the top group are now getting about 42.5 per cent of the gross national product. The kind of proposals the minister has put forward in this bill, along with other government proposals, have led to the present situation with which my party disagrees completely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: I invite the backbencher of the Liberal party to stand up and express his own point of view.

Mr. Pearsall: What about the mill workers in B.C.? They are getting $10 an hour.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I reinforce the invitation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, particularly since we are debating this bill under a time allocation order. Backbenchers opposite should not be reluctant to stand up and present their ideas. Normally they are kept in line by their Whip who says they can yell from their seats but that they should not take up the time of the House.

It is clear, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North pointed out, that the efforts of the federal government and other levels of government to redistribute wealth have failed. While governments transfer money to lower income people through programs like the old age pension, guaranteed income supplement, family allowances and other government programs on the one hand, they give benefits and allowances of the kinds contained in the present bill to the better off, on the other. What the left hand gives the right hand takes away, and to that we object.

Let me give some examples. Most of us favour women's liberation. We think it is long overdue that women should be given equality in the eyes of the law. Unfortunately most of the benefits of the women's liberation movement are enjoyed by women of the middle and upper income brackets; poor women get few of the benefits, despite all the pitches you hear about women's liberation. How does that relate to the present legislation? This bill would allow women who do not want to stay home to work and deduct up to two thirds of child care expenses from income. In raising my argument I am not saying that the law discriminates as between women. Circumstances in life can militate against certain women and the law is not taking those into account.

How do women at low income levels who go to work arrange for the care of their children? They do not send their children to child care centres or fancy nursery schools. They cannot afford those expensive luxuries. Generally a neighour or relative looks after the children. That is how women at lower income levels arrange for the care of their children during the working day. The fact is, at that level, you are not going to get receipts which you can present to the government for claiming a deduction. That is a fact of life, as anyone will attest who knows how people at the lower income level live.

But the people who will avail themselves of the deductions in this bill can avail themselves of all sorts of fancy schools, be they language schools or nursery schools. Those women will get the real benefit of the bill. I am talking of women who start bringing up their children from the age of three or four to be part of this society's élite; those women make sure that our present class distinctions continue. And that is what this bill is all about.

I know the minister is not inexperienced in dealing with constituents. His constituency contains more than one class of constituent, and he deals with all sorts of people in his constituency. He knows that the child care of the better off is different from the child care of the poor. This legislation, by its very nature, is designed to help the better off.

Let me touch on arguments regarding the progressive nature of our income tax system. I do not quarrel with the minister when he says that he is trying to maintain equity under the income tax system. I would not quarrel with the minister if the present income tax system were equitable and the programs associated with it were closing the gap between the rich and the poor. But how can he argue that inequality breeds equity? Really, that is what the minister is arguing. He is saying that he wants to maintain the present system of equity. We say that existing so-called equity is not worth a darn. It is widening the gap between the rich and the poor.

We do not favour the present sort of proposals which do nothing to make the income tax system more equitable. We say that the income tax system can be made more equitable if the government pays a tax credit, that is to say, if it pays the same amount to those at the lower end of the income scale that it makes available to those at the upper end. In that way it could make the income tax system somewhat more fair. That is the kind of equity for which we stand, in contrast to the kind of equity which the minister has put forward.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I will not add to what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge just said, but I should like to raise the matters he raised in the form of a question to the minister. I suppose one could argue that the present income tax system would be equitable if you were to treat everything in the market system in the same way, as being of equal value. Under such a system the government, through its progesssive income tax—I will not argue how progressive our present income tax system really is, because I do not think it is progressive at all—would not say to Canadians that it prefers spending on automobiles as opposed to spending say, on bibles or other consumer goods. Under such a system one could argue that the government is taking a neutral position. But when the government provides incentives through its tax system and says, "We want you to spend money on child care or registered retirement savings plans," and so on, it is, by definition, making a value judgment. In other words, the state wants to encourage that kind of spending. On the other hand, if we are concerned about equality in society, should we not proceed on a direct grant basis, as my colleagues argued, to ensure that the tax system treats all people with equality? Would that not be better than the present income tax structure of this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, perhaps our viewpoint is somewhat different. We are recognizing under the tax system that people in the community, make financial contributions with regard to pensions for retirement, RRSPs, and child care expenses, contributions for which they are out of pocket and for which, reasonably, there should be some recognition in the tax they pay. I do not pretend for a moment that there is equality between all taxpayers. There is a fundamental assumption which is not obviated by the tax system, or by the income system within the community, namely, that some people are making more than others. We are saying, indeed, that there is not equality between taxpayers, because the higher you go up the income scale the more tax you pay, and you pay a greater percentage of your income in taxes. The hon. member is right in one respect. Even having applied those factors you still have more left in hand. But the money left in hand does not initially come from the tax system but from a whole variety of different circumstances in which people find themselves in the community.

I suppose, not intending to carry the hon. gentleman's argument to the extreme, I can refer to the United Kingdom taxation system where, in Canadian terms, at a relatively low level in the taxation system taxation takes away any additional earned income. In terms of incentive I would think on the whole it is in our interest to continue to leave substantial incentive out there for some people whom the hon. member might not regard as great contributors to the community, but also for a great many people with respect to whom he would concede are making contributions by their talent and otherwise and who are rewarded by a greater return on income. So there is a basic equality there. I suppose the hon. member would take more away in tax from those further up the income scale, but we would still leave them with more in the end.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has replied to one aspect of the question, one upon which I really did not want to concentrate, namely, whether the income tax structure is sufficiently progressive—is there a certain point at which one should increase the amount one must pay. I should like him to deal with the question.

Let us assume there is a particular schedule of progressivity in the income tax structure and the democratic government of the day decides that certain goods and services, for example, the provision of day care facilities, are important and therefore should be encouraged by the state. If the government makes such a decision, does it not make a lot more sense to provide for these things directly as opposed to providing for them through the tax structure?

Consider, for example, the present measure providing for child care allowance. In terms of tax benefit the average person earning $10,000 a year, with two children, receives a benefit of $200, but a person earning $100,000 with two children, receives a benefit amounting to $470. What I am asking the minister is this: instead of attaching benefit for day care to the income tax structure as such, would it not be a lot better to leave it alone in this respect and to take a figure somewhere in between, say, $310, and make sure it goes as a direct payment to all taxpayers, or, indeed, to people who do not pay taxes because their income is not sufficiently high, but have a need of day care facilities? Is it not better for the state to involve itself in actions it believes to be desirable and pay for them directly, rather than using the tax system to pay for the service in such a way that the rich inevitably benefit more than the poor?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman seems to be suggesting that instead of tax deductions we should make a transfer payment to individuals from the public treasury. I think there could be some debate about the wisdom of doing this. One thing is clear. Very likely the apparatus at government level for operating the transfer system and deciding who was to get payments and who was not, would be more expensive than the operation of the present tax system.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, as an innocent country boy I have a lot of questions I should like to ask the minister. I do not want to go off half-cocked on this, you know, when I get back home, especially if I am in the constituencies of some of the minister's colleagues.

The way the bill is now, the child allowance is raised to $1,000 from $500 and the family maximum from $2,000 to $4,000 which, if I understand it correctly, means that a person with income at the $10,000 level would qualify for a deduction worth about $210 while someone in the $50,000 category would qualify for $430. I should like to ask the minister whether someone in the $50,000 a year category—I imagine there are few working wives or mothers in that category—would need some $190 more than a working mother earning $10,000? What is the logic here?

What would be wrong with reversing the situation? I appreciate the minister trying to give extra benefits for child care, but what would be wrong with reversing the entire clause? If the figures I have are reasonably accurate they suggest it might be a good thing to reverse the clause so that the person earning $10,000 or thereabouts might get the maximum benefit allowable in that category, and the person at the $100,000 level would get the minimum tax savings.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am afraid I shall merely be repeating myself for the fourth time when I suggest to the hon. member that in percentage terms the position of the two parties would remain the same. In absolute terms, it is true that the person at the upper end of the income scale will get more. On the other hand, the person at the upper end is going to pay way more in tax and in percentage terms. So there is not equality in the tax system but a position in which there is a progressive income tax—the higher you go, the more you pay both in absolute and percentage terms. We are applying a scale which is related to income. The amount of the tax benefit does move up, I would concede, but on the other hand the tax liability is very much greater at the upper end than at the lower end.

Mr. Benjamin: I suppose what I was getting at was dollars. The sum of $390 means damn little to a person with $50,000 a year compared with a benefit of $200 for someone earning $10,000. Another thing I wanted to ask the minister about was this—I hope I am not misquoting him; it sounded very elitist to me—he seemed to be saying that the one who contributes the most should get the most out of the tax system. Is the minister suggesting that the working mother who is a waitress or a stenographer earning $8,000 or $10,000 a year does not make as good a contribution to society as a lady executive earning $30,000 or $50,000 a year? Is he suggesting that the working mother at the higher income makes a greater contribution automatically, or was he just thinking about tax dollars?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I did not say that at all. I hope the hon. member will not put those words in my mouth.

Mr. Benjamin: I did not want to do so. I am glad the minister has cleared that up. Another question I have in mind concerns a working woman who, though she is working, does not earn any income. I am not referring to a woman working in the home. I am referring to work outside the home—she is not paid for this work but she is still a working woman and she pays for child care. Would her spouse be able to claim a tax saving on his tax return?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not know whether I am happy with that answer or not, because it means that in the case of the Minister of Transport, who has a wife who is a working mother, and who works without pay, I am glad to know the hon. gentleman would not be able to get this benefit when he sends in his tax return. But what about the mother who works for a charitable institution for nothing, and pays for child care? Would her husband be eligible for a tax benefit in that respect?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Chairman. As I have indicated, this is a deduction with respect to expenses incurred for the purpose of earning an income.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, under the present law certain taxpayers, working mothers, are allowed to deduct the actual cost of child care up to an annual maximum of $1,000 a year—as my colleague points out, the family maximum is $4,000 a year—provided the amount claimed does not exceed two thirds of a taxpayer's earned income for the year. According to the report issued by the National Council of Welfare, in 1974 child care deductions, which at that time had a maximum set at only half the present rate, cost the government of Canada over $29 million, so it is obvious that if we increase the amount to $1,000 per person as is now proposed, we are talking of an amount of money in the neighbourhood of $60 million.

I attended the annual convention of the Manitoba New Democratic Party this past weekend where there was a long and pretty acrimonious debate because many delegates felt that the provincial government was not putting enough money into day care centres. In explaining the position of the government, the premier agreed that the government was not putting in enough money, but argued that the amount spent by the government had gone up from almost zero three or four years ago to something in the neighbourhood of $3 million to $4 million for this coming year.

Since most of the $60 million goes to women in the middle and upper income brackets, it seems to me that we would accomplish a great deal more if, instead of giving these tax credits which the National Council of Welfare has indicated will probably cost the treasury $60 million, that amount were better spent in larger contributions to provinces which have already set up day care centres and want to expand them, or to provinces which want to set up day care centres. I wish the minister would give some thought to this.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a few words about an interjection which the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin made while my colleague was speaking, and which I think ought not to go unnoticed.

Mr. Peters: Ought not to go unanswered; it should go unnoticed.

Mr. Orlikow: That is right. The hon. member interjected words to the effect that we should go out to British Columbia where mill workers were making $10 an hour. I hope he will get to his feet when I have finished, but from the tone of his voice one would assume that somehow $10 an hour was an outrageous figure and was too much. I did some fairly quick arithmetic, and assuming that the mill workers worked a full year, which I think very few do, at 40 hours a week they would make $20,000 a year. That sounds like a lot of money, but with the cost of housing today I do not think mill workers are living in the lap of luxury if they make $20,000.

Instead of worrying about the mill workers making $10 an hour, the hon. member should give some thought to the kind of society where in the province of Ontario, according to reports, more that 800 doctors earned over $100,000 each last year. If the hon. member would start worrying about that situation perhaps we would get some equity.

With regard to who benefits from this, I want to tell the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin that I do not represent many workers who make $10 an hour. My colleague from Winnipeg North Centre and I represent several thousand women workers, many of whom are relative newcomers to Canada. They came to Winnipeg from Portugual, Spain or The Philippines and they work in the garment industry and make something in the neighbourhood of $3.50 an hour which, if they work a full year, which is unlikely, would give them an income of about $7,000 a year. The same is true of the garment industry whether it is in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Sherbrooke or even Vancouver. That is the nature of the industry, it being faced with competition from countries like Taiwan, Hong Kong and so on, countries where, if the workers get $1 a day, they are doing well.

The garment industry workers are not going to get much by way of a tax benefit from this provision. In fact as my colleague from Waterloo-Cambridge said, if they can make arrangements to have their children looked after they will probably use neighbours who will get a few dollars a week and not report the income, or have so little income that they have no income tax to pay anyway. These are the realities of the situation and it is for this kind of reason that we oppose this proposal. I urge the minister to rethink his position and to come up with a plan whereby the federal government would begin to pay a much larger sum of money toward the provision of adequate day care centres across this country than is the case at the present time.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether his department has done a study in order to find out who benefits and who does not benefit from this provision. Perhaps the minister could shoot down all the arguments we have made simply by providing us with some information that might be readily available to his department. Has his department conducted a study of what families, by family income, have received the benefit of this particular provision? Without talking about the improvements in this section, what is the distribution of this benefit to families by family income? There is no point our talking about taxpayers' income because many of these middle and upper income people who claim this deduction only work part time. They are making substantial incomes but are doing so in a relatively short time. It is therefore important to know to what families this benefit is going according to size of family income. Does the minister have this kind of information for us?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, we do not have it by family income; we have it by individual taxpayers' income, because that is, of course, the manner in which it is filed. I can refer the hon. gentleman to the volume on taxation statistics, the 1976 edition, which because of the compilation rate relates to 1974. Table 2 in that volume will indicate the manner in which it is distributed.

Mr. Saltsman: I should like to pursue the argument that has been put forward by my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, regarding what we think would be a far more appropriate and intelligent approach to this matter of child care services than is proposed in this clause. I was not too sure from the minister's reply whether he had some sympathy with the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I do not know whether it was simply an administrative problem or because of some administrative difficulty. In fact I do not know whether he thought it was a good idea from an administrative point of view if we are talking about tax credits as one way of being more equitable in terms of how this money is being redistributed.

Surely it is not nearly as complicated as the plan put forward by the government some time ago with regard to relating family allowances to family income. It certainly cannot be any more complicated that the present system of guaranteed income supplements for old age pensioners. These things are done by computers. You look at a person's income tax form, analyze it, and see what they are claiming. Surely it would not be that complicated. I would appreciate if the minister would clear up the point.

Is the minister saying that he is not sympathetic to the basic idea of (a) a system of tax credits, whichever one we get, with sort of an equal amount of money for child care, (b) the transfer of this amount of money into a pool for child care centres rather than doing it through the income tax system, or is he simply saying that the difficulty is an administrative one and he cannot figure it out?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member referred to the family income security program. As I said to the hon. member for Timiskaming, it is a deduction of actual expenditure. In the family income security program there is no requirement of proof of expenditure. The hon. member is suggesting that this be given to every family irrespective of actual expenditure or child care services. That would indeed very much simplify the matter, but I wonder if that is what is really the objective. What we are trying to do is give some recognition for expenditures actually laid out. To the extent his leader was saying that in effect we should increase the taxation, particularly at the upper end of the scale and make it in transfer payments, that does not happen to represent the position of the government at this point.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, the minister is having some difficulty, which I can understand, with what I am asking him. In fact there are two ways of doing it. You can relate it to the claim. On the other hand, you can relate it on a broad universal basis. I had really not thought about it until the minister made it as a suggestion. Actually if there is a second earner in the family and there are small children involved, you can count on one fact. Somebody will have to look after the children if the second earner goes to work. If nobody looks after the children and it becomes the responsibility of the husband and the wife, after working for a full day, to stay up and look after the children, surely making some payment to that family would not be out of line. You can be reasonably sure that if a transfer payment is made on the basis of a second worker in a family, it could be done on a universal basis.

Almost anything would be an improvement over what has been suggested at this point. The preferred way is what is being suggested by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. That is that the amount of money involved here might be better used in terms of providing day care facilities for people at the lower income level who want to go to work.

If you ask yourself who benefits from this, who needs the help the most, you quickly would have to come to the conclusion that the people who need help the most are that group of people which is probably the largest group on welfare, the single parents. Very often there are complaints that they are on welfare, but this is often because they have a child. It is the largest single group on welfare. The greatest thing we can do in terms of getting these people off welfare and giving them a chance to go to work and realize an opportunity is to provide some service for them.

These are not the kind of people with the skills of those who earn a great deal of money. Anything we can give them through the income tax system in the way of a tax deduction or tax benefit is a waste of time. Chances are they will not earn enough money to be able to take advantage of it. Even if they get some money that puts them into a taxable bracket, the very regressive nature of this system tends to be less favourable for them than for people with higher skills and in a better position to get the money for the work they do.

The minister is responding in a way that often happens with these income tax systems. In other words, you start off with a system and you add a little bit of this and a little bit of that. You get pressure from one group or another. You say that in the next budget you will tack on a little piece for them, "do not get too upset with us." The party with which the minister is associated tends to be more inclined to look for the swingers, the middle and upper-income groups. He obviously has to be in some struggle to keep them happy.

A few years after the great Carter report when we tried to simplify the tax system, we keep having these things added. They not only complicate the tax system but increase its regressive nature. It gives little bits and pieces. We wonder why the distribution of income over all these years has really not been effective in any significant way. It is because of this kind of patchwork approach.

Getting back to the question of what should be done about the problem of child care, obviously something should be done. It reflects an absence of really looking at the problem and saying there is a child care problem.

There are a lot of people who should be helped if they want to go to work. They should be helped with child care expenses. What is the best way of doing it? Rather than coming up with this bitty thing that in fact keeps the middle-income people somewhat happy and sort of responds to the clubwoman type of request, the minister should reconsider the government's attitude toward child care centres.

If the government is prepared to forgo this kind of revenue in the tax system, it should be prepared to use this amount of revenue which is significantly fairer and more effective than the measure before us today.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I listened carefully to the minister's response. I appreciate the reasons he gave. They reflect government policy and also the reasoning of his officials. I consider the minister to be a pretty decent guy who thinks about and considers ordinary people. Why would he countenance this kind of program rather than fight for a program that would give a $470 tax saving to someone at the low end of the tax scale with a $10,000 income and only a $200 tax saving to the one at the $100,000 end of the income scale? Why, in the name of decency if nothing else, will he not do that?

Don't tell me the clause cannot be reworded to do that very thing. His officials, two of them here now, could work out a scale or formula that would reverse the position for the working mother who earns $7,000 or $8,000 a year as a waitress or stenographer so that she would get the maximum tax saving. Probably her whole income tax of $500 would be returned. The working mother in the $20,000 or $30,000 bracket would get less of a tax saving. If there is such a thing as a working mother in the $100,000 bracket, which I doubt, she would only get a $200 tax saving. Surely to God that is the decent thing to do.

I was hoping that some of my colleagues in the official opposition would have something to say about that tonight, because they have been the greatest motherhood party since last February. I was hoping someone would get up, but do you know what they think of child care? They are watching Evel Knievel on TV.

Mr. Pearsall: I did not know he was on now.

Mr. Benjamin: What is the stand of the official opposition on decent child care facilities? I had hoped the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, who has done some pretty good things about day care centres and child care, would have something to say, but he has been bloody silent tonight. The Tories would not even help force the vote so the Liberals would have to bring in closure.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why watch TV; we have you here?

Mr. Benjamin: I ask not only the minister but the official opposition if they would not prefer to see the low income working mother get the maximum tax saving and the high income working mother get the minimum tax saving? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I wish the Minister of Finance would answer the questions posed by my colleague who just sat down. I would like to join my colleague in asking where the official opposition is on this measure. I find it extraordinary that on one of the most significant parts of a tax bill that affects in particular average and low income people in Canada, the Conservative party in the House of Commons has had not one word to say. When they get around to policy development, their leader asks a man by the name Reuben Baetz, who is head of the Canadian Council of Social Development, but I understand he has been reluctant to give them advice. Perhaps he sees how cynical they are. I hope he reads the record of today's debate and finds out that the official opposition had not one word to say on this important measure.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was interested to hear the argument used by the National Council of Welfare on income tax systems, and I was particularly interested in their statement on the unfairness of some of the sections of the income tax law. I am sure that many Canadians will be very interested in this.

It may well be that the reason why more Canadians are not interested in day care centres and the ancillary facilities of day care work stems from the fact that this government does not want extra women in the labour market.

I went to a Manpower Centre in my own area a couple of weeks ago because I was obsessed with the idea that the figures which are available for employment do not meet the criteria that I would set, and in fact they are considerably below them. I asked whether there would be enough women in the area to fill the 300 vacancies available at a factory close by. An official said there were about 300 women listed at that Manpower Centre. I asked whether all those women would be able to work in that plant making jeans. He said that no, of course they would not, that there would be no trouble getting 300 women to work in that plant, but only 100 would be from his list. This means that in any particular field there might be four or five times as many women available for work as are registered. One of the reasons for that is the fact that if you have a very low income you have to get your neighbour or your mother-in-law to look after your baby when you go out to work. So these women agree to do the work of baby sitting for reasonable wages so long as they do not have to give receipts. They are not interested in the work if they have to give receipts because they do not want to get their husbands in trouble with their income tax forms. They are not interested in making that income otherwise. If they can get that income under the table without receipts, they will take the work.

Let me say for the edification of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin that I had the opportunity to visit a country not long ago, a country to which Canada is giving considerable aid for development. One of the things on which they are spending a large amount of money is the development of day care centres in conjunction with their industrial projects. In fact every housing unit they build is connected to a day care centre. They believe it is absolutely essential for low income people to have two incomes per family, and to make that possible day care centres are necessary.

Surely the Minister of Finance, who comes from an area where many residents are in desperate need of day care centres and who leave their children in less than satisfactory conditions when they go out to work, must be sympathetic to the argument put forward by my colleague who said that this measure will mean a reduction of tax revenue for the federal government of about $60 million which could be invested in day care centres in conjunction with the municipalities and provinces. This would be of much greater benefit to the people in need of day care assistance than this kind of exemption which we believe, perhaps wrongly, is of greater benefit to the tax structure itself than to people at the lower end of the income scale.

I hope the minister will give some consideration to transferring to his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, this money in lieu of the tax exemption so that we can build day care centres, and so that we do not find that a country which is much less progressive and developed than ours, and certainly much poorer than we are, does more in the area of social assistance than we do by building day care centres for those who need to work.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—COW-CALF SUPPORT PROGRAM—REASON FOR REDUCED PAYMENT TO PROVINCES WHICH HAVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the topic I want to pursue tonight is the cow-calf program, and I see the parliamentary secretary is here. One could describe the federal cow-calf program in the language of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) himself as being a load of bull. It is too little, too late; it discriminates against small producers, and it discriminates against provinces that set up continuing stabilization programs when the federal government refused to do its job.

The program allocates less to cover the whole country, $70 million, than Alberta and Saskatchewan budgeted for their 1976 programs, $72 million. The pay-outs are expected to be about $30 per cow less than the $50 Alberta and Saskatchewan were paying under the 1976 program, and will cover fewer cows.

At a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture in December the provincial ministers were led to hope that the federal plan would cover 1976 as well as 1977. That has not materialized. As with all other federal stabilization programs, the plan is not indexed to cover all costs of production. Ninety per cent of the five year average stabilization level will not come near to covering the producers' losses.

The payment set-up works against small producers by deducting the first five cows and then paying on 70 per cent of the remaining herd. Naturally this means that the small producer gets paid on a smaller percentage of his herd than a producer at the maximum 100 head. All this does is save the federal government a bit of money. If the federal government really wanted to exclude hobby farmers, it could have set a minimum cow herd and paid on the whole thing.

The government is only paying 70 per cent because it is assuming an 85 per cent calf drop. That means the producer gets no support at all for the cows that he breeds and feeds and on which he comes up a loser. However, the really foolish feature of this program is the additional 15 per cent exemption for herd replacement. If the government wants to end the depletion of the cow herd, which is going on very rapidly and which by mid-1977 may see us back to 1971 beef crisis levels, the way to encourage producers to build herds is not to reduce payments that may keep some of them operating until the market picks up as predicted.

In Saskatchewan, for example, there was a record cow slaughter in 1976 as 202,000 cows went to the slaughter yards—that is double the normal rate—and at that time the same pattern held true for heifer slaughter as well. A further 10 per cent to 12 per cent deletion in Saskatchewan's cow herd is expected this year. That will bring herd levels in that province back to 1970-71 levels, wiping out five years of gains toward a more diversified agricultural economy.

Consumers will see a return to the high prices of the early 1970's when the beef cycle hits its high point in 1978-79, as the government's so-called stabilization does nothing to stabilize the production of cattle at the farm level.

To pay $20 or so when some producers have had losses of up to $100 a head is no more than a political ploy. The cynicism of the federal plan is further demonstrated in the provision that producers enrolled in provincial programs will receive only half of the federal deficiency payment. While the government has consistently opposed toploading of federal stabilization plans, the minister can hardly claim that Manitoba, B.C., Ontario and Quebec are toploading his plan. They were instituted because the federal minister failed to bring in a plan of his own.

Returns to producers are higher in all the provincial plans than they will be under the federal scheme. Manitoba, which sends more than half its beef to central Canada, would have lost $4 million in federal payments in 1976 had the plan been in effect then. It makes no sense to penalize a province which brought in an imaginative and progressive plan to protect its beef industry in the absence of federal action. If medicare had been introduced on the same basis as this stabilization program, Saskatchewan would only be getting half the payments it now gets.

The time when federal-provincial relations are at their shakiest since Confederation is scarcely the time to add new injury to inaction. I can assure hon. members that representatives from all the provinces we talked to are very upset about this point. Manitoba taxpayers, for example, will continue to subsidize central Canadian consumers, as Alberta and Saskatchewan taxpayers did in 1976, to the tune of some $72 million.

The federal government cynically exploited the drop in beef prices as it moved the food index lower and gave the impression that the anti-inflation program was working. The beef index is just under three points in the consumer price index.

Meanwhile, back at the ranch, the minister's real heroes in the fight against inflation are taking a beating. Farmers all across the country have suffered income cuts, but beef producers are in especially desperate straits at this time. The 15,000 producers who have applied for payments under Saskatchewan's emergency plan had average taxable incomes of $1,600 in 1975. That is the kind of "powerful group" in society which has had to suffer the rough justice of restraint. The federal government must take the blame. It could have controlled imports, but it did not. It could have rationalized the country's beef marketing system, but it did not. Thousands of cow-calf operators are paying for this inaction now as they mortgage their family farms or go under in bankruptcy and, in a year or two, millions of Canadians will pay in higher prices at the supermarket. But between now and then is an election and maybe the Minister of Agriculture's $70 million sop will buy him some friends. I doubt it.

The second point I want to raise is the increase in community pasture rates by over 30 per cent in a year when beef prices are low and when we have an anti-inflation program. Farmers have just received notice that the PFRA community pasture rates administered by DREE will increase for cattle from nine cents per head per day to 12 cents per head per day, an increase of some 33 per cent. Breeding charges are going from $10 to $13 per day, an increase of 30 per cent. Delegations of farmers have protested to me the increase of over 30 per cent in a year when people are being told to tighten their belts, yet here is a federal government agency increasing the rate to farmers by over 30 per cent. That does not seem to be fair, especially when farmers are getting depressed prices for the beef they are forced to sell and the federal government says they must recover their costs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier).

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to a sentence the hon. member has just spoken and which I did not expect at all, as I am not following the text prepared by the department. The hon. member raised this point at a time when the problems of the Confederation are being discussed at the provincial and federal levels. The hon. member said all this was the fault of the federal government and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). On several occasions the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) asked the provinces to come to an agreement. He urged them to discuss the national program. He did not want a program unsatisfactory for most of the provinces. Therefore he asked them to come to an understanding first, after which it would be possible to develop a national program. So I think that the allegations of the hon. member are absolutely unfounded, as it is much too easy to cast all the blame for this on the minister.

[English]

I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond to the incorrect allegations which the hon. member made about the federal cow-calf stabilization program in his question of January 27, 1977. This is an important program for the Canadian beef industry and it is essential that such misrepresentations are not given to Canadian farmers.

I wish, first, to emphasize that the program announced by the Minister of Agriculture on January 4, 1977, does not discriminate against farmers or provinces. From the farmer's point of view this program will ensure that producers in all provinces will receive stabilization benefits whether a program is, or is not, already in effect in his province. In this respect I am sure the hon. gentleman opposite will agree with me that the federal initiative in the cow-calf sector is a very positive step toward correcting discrimination and inequities which have existed among provinces in the past.

A producer who is enrolled in a provincial cow-calf program will receive the maximum net support possible under either the federal or the provincial program—whichever is greater. He will receive 50 per cent of the federal stabilization payment, with the remainder coming from the provincial government.

The federal program, which will cost an estimated $70 million, will relieve provincial treasuries of a significant portion of their commitment to producers. Producers will not only receive the full amounts guaranteed in their provincial plans but in those cases where the federal stabilization level is higher than that of the province, will receive larger payments than originally anticipated.

It would not have been fair to implement a federal program which had no benefits for producers already registered under provincial plans.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PROTECT PUBLIC FROM EFFECTS OF EXCAVATION IN QUAKER CRESCENT AREA OF LOWER SACKVILLE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, late last November and last month I mentioned the melancholy and sad events touching housing development in the community of lower Sackville in the constituency of Halifax-East Hants.

I pointed out that through the Nova Scotia Housing Commission people had been sold lots and promised land for a church, a 15 acre shopping centre, high rise and single family dwellings, a school, and amenities such as parkland. Subsequently the Nova Scotia Housing Commission entered into a deal. The 15 acre shopping centre swallowed up all the land and removed the school and apartment buildings and the place for other single homes, as well as the parkland. I suggest that was a gross breach of promise to the people who had bought in all good faith and depended on the plans presented by the housing commission. I thought that was dishonest. I also said that the company entering into this deal had done so without taking part in any tendering proceedings. The company was actually formed after the original deal was made. Two friends of the minister of housing for Nova Scotia formed the company, to acquire the land. I said this was corrupt.

The Nova Scotia Housing Commission was good enough to let me see its files. I found, that the very first document which ought to have been on record is missing. That has not caused me to withdraw or soften the complaints I made.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had poured millions of dollars into that development through grants that it made to the Nova Scotia Housing Commission, to enable land to be assembled in the first place, and with mortgages made available to homeowners when they began to build. A great deal of federal money is therefore at stake, which is why I have been raising this question in the House of Commons.

When the concept of the shopping centre expanded from one involving 15 acres to one involving 21 acres, bulldozers moved in; along the rear lines of the lots on two streets, Quaker Crescent and Polara Drive, a wall has been created, some of it is up to 30 feet high. The wall is holding back a sort of clay soil. The contractor has attempted to shore up this wall. Indeed, I gather that he plans to put a wire fence along the top of it. But the people who bought on Quaker Crescent and Polara Drive expected to be able to look down a gentle slope, through birch trees, walkways and other single family dwellings looking onto a lake. It was to be a pleasant neighbourhood prospect. Instead, they will face one of the largest Dominion stores in eastern Canada. It will be smack up against their properties, as will the other buildings of the shopping centre nearby.

The Nova Scota Housing Comission said, in its defence, that it was only making proposals when it presented plans to the homeowners. The plan, signed by the Nova Scotia Housing Commission was, they say, only a proposal. This brought forth what I consider the best line in the public dialogue which has been created since I raised this issue in mid-November, when Councillor Francene Cosman of Bedford, which is nearby, said that if that was the proposal well, she, herself had once been proposed to and she took that proposal seriously.

I said that great hurt has been done to property values by reason of this desecration of what was originally a fine neighbourhood concept. This must also hurt the investment in that area of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I can suggest three remedies; two, not being germane to this House, I shall mention only briefly. In order to protect the public there must be some change in the law in the province of Nova Scotia. That province cannot depend on a minister of housing whose association with the developers makes Damon and Pythias seem like mortal enemies. Second, provincial and municipal laws must be changed so that the public is protected.

We come into the picture in relation to the third point and I hope the parliamentary secretary will raise this question with CMHC. I do not disagree with the role CMHC has played in this matter. As a matter of fact, any opinion I have had from the minister or the parliamentary secretary has been sympathetic to the homeowners because of the nature of the promises made to them. But I think that if federal moneys go through CMHC to provincial housing corporations or commissions we should insist that very strong agreements are made so that we may know exactly what that federal money would be used for. It simply cannot be left to be administered by a provincial housing minister as though he were running an old pals' act.

All this has led to a lot of frustration among the people concerned. They feel alienated. They say, "The developer is too big for us to deal with." They say the minister of housing is too important for them to be able to deal with. Some of that frustration has boiled over on myself. I know the developer has attacked me in a long front page letter published in the Halifax Mail-Star. My reply has not yet seen the light of day in that same newspaper, so the newspaper will obviously not be very helpful in this fight. Nonetheless, by boiling over here, and perhaps in other places, we may yet civilize developers and get a better deal for those who put their life savings into housing. At least that will be my endeavour.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my response in the House on November 30 on the subject the hon. member has raised, I replied in some detail setting out the position of CMHC with respect to this project. I am sure he does not want me to repeat my words. I might add that after making my response I spoke to the hon. member and suggested that the matter of the residents' rights in this controversy might be taken up with the ombudsman in Nova Scotia. It goes without saying that if the Nova Scotia Housing Commission has disregarded any legal obligation to the residents, they should consider seeking an injunction, or other appropriate legal action. Not being a lawyer, I hesitate to go any further in giving advice to the hon. member.

I take note of his remarks concerning the need for a strengthening of the agreements with regard to development projects and I will bring the hon. member's comments to the attention of my minister. I should like to tell the hon. member's comments to the attention of my minister. I should like to tell the hon. member that CMHC is not in the business of running municipal councils and that zoning is not our business, but I repeat that if there are legal problems here which demand further action, the proper course, I suspect, would be for him to take the matter up with the people concerned and advise them as to the possibility of going to the ombudsman.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR PENSION RIGHTS FOR HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because this matter is one of urgency which grows every month, I ask leave to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House urges the government to bring in without further delay legislation that will establish pension rights for all homemaker spouses equivalent to the rights of those employed outside the home, and that the government commit itself to the taking of this action during the present session of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS FOR YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM AND AMENDMENTS TO STUDENT LOAN ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in view of the continuing serious national unemployment problem that has been so detrimental to the morale of young male and female adults and many of their parents, and in view of the fact that high unemployment and low income areas of Canada's Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec are so adversely affected, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call upon the government to make more money available for the Program Young Canada Works in these areas of very high unemployment, and at the same time that we ask the Secretary of State to review the Student Loan Act with a view to, first, making repayments dependent on the students' ability to pay and, second, to change the minimum study time for a student to receive loans from the present 26 weeks minimum to 12 weeks so that students from low income families can more easily pursue summer school courses as well as one semester courses.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED COMMENDATION OF ROYAL CANADIAN REGIMENT, LONDON, ONTARIO, FOR AIDING SNOWBOUND AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In recognition of the extraordinary help and assistance rendered snowbound citizens of southwestern Ontario and the saving of countless lives during the recent snowstorm as a result of the quick and effective response of the Royal Canadian Regiment stationed at Canadian Forces Base, London, Ontario, a base which only recently was acquitted by the Minister of National Defence of charges of obsolescence and spared for the greater protection and benefit of Canadians in times of such civil disasters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner):

That this House go on record as commending the men of the Royal Canadian Regiment of Canadian Forces Base, London, Ontario, and urge the Minister of National Defence to give a unit commendation for voluntary excellent citizenship to this regiment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS UNITED STATES INTERFERENCE WITH CANADA'S TRADE RELATIONS WITH CUBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have another perfectly reasonable motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of reports of continuing affronts to Canadian sovereignty I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

● (1410)

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO SNOWBOUND AREAS OF SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the disastrous snowstorm which struck southern Ontario this past weekend isolating hundreds of small communities and bringing normal daily life to a standstill; in view of the fact that much of this region has been declared a disaster area and that many municipalities are still on an emergency alert basis; in view of the fact that a second storm appears to be on its way and that many roads are still impassable; and considering that most municipal budgets, particularly those in the Niagara Peninsula, are heavily overspent, that costs so far have already run about twice that of a normal year and that storms such as that of last weekend are costing a single municipality about $6,000 to $7,000 per hour to clear, and while thankful for the excellent relief assistance already provided by the local militia, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton):

That this House urges the federal government to consult immediately with the responsible provincial and municipal officials with a view to providing necessary disaster relief whether through financial means or physical assistance and that it give consideration to absorbing or defraying the cost of relief provided by the militia and the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PATRIATION AND AMENDING FORMULA—FEDERAL PLAN FOR DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the continued absence of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Where is Pierre?

Mr. Clark: —I want to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister, which may allow him to add some precision to the government's position on constitutional reform. In his recent letter to the various provincial premiers the Prime Minister clearly indicated a preference to start with an agreement on patriation and an amending formula and then proceed to a distribution of powers. In his speech in Quebec city on Friday the Prime Minister indicated that the only conditions he would apply to constitutional reform would relate to certain civil, regional and language rights. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Friday speech of the Prime Minister means that the government has set aside its preference to start with an agreement on patriation and an amending formula.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is wise to conclude that the speech on Friday set aside the desire of the government to patriate the constitution. I do not think these propositions are mutually exclusive.

Mr. Clark: If the Acting Prime Minister is going to continue to be called upon to answer for the Prime Minister, he might want to read the correspondence which was sent to the various premiers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It would be very helpful for the House of Commons, the country and the premiers to know whether it remains the preference of the government of Canada to proceed to give priority to what was called stage one, agreement upon an amending formula and patriation. We can wait until the Prime Minister comes back to the House, if he does—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —to provide information. In the letter of the Prime Minister to the premiers the Prime Minister said that it would be, and I quote, "a serious mistake" to proceed with a discussion of constitutional amendment "without a coherent total plan", and I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister can tell the House whether federal officials are now preparing a coherent total plan regarding a distribution of constitutional powers which the federal government will carry into discussions with the provinces.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the context in which the letter ought to be interpreted is one that might involve selection of particular items for constitutional change in connection with the patriation of the constitution. I believe what the Prime Minister was indicating was that if there were to be a general review or discussion of the constitution it would have to be set in quite a broad context. To my knowledge we have not had any response from the premiers on this matter. I believe it is well known to the hon. Leader of the Opposition, however, that the federal government has been equipped for some time now to engage in that kind of constitutional discussion dating back to preparations that were in place well before the Victoria conference. I believe there is a good deal of material available and the process of preparation is continuing.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What we are trying to determine and what the country is interested in is whether the speech made by the Prime Minister in Quebec City the other day in which he appeared to abandon the constitutional rigidity which has been the mark of this government through its years in office, indicates that there has been a fundamental change in their attitude toward constitutional reform. If that is so, is the government proceeding now with preparations on a new basis that would involve the breadth of reform implied in the speech on Friday? We want to know whether those were empty words in that speech or whether there is some concrete follow-up. In effect, we would like to have some guarantee from the government that the Prime Minister's conversion to constitutional flexibility will prove more reliable than his previous opposition to controls.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman wants information or whether he wants to score a few political points in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We will take both.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We want to know where you stand.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to tell the hon. gentleman that probably the speech of the Prime Minister pulled from under him the only rug he has had since he became Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Cheap politics!

Oral Questions

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY— POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister concerns the suggestion made the other day by the Prime Minister of a constituent assembly to deal with constitutional matters. Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether this suggestion has been discussed with the provincial premiers and does the government see it as a replacement for federal-provincial constitutional conferences? Perhaps the most important question is what the status of a report or findings produced by any such constituent assembly would be.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I tell the hon. member that this idea that was put out by the Prime Minister is not intended in any way to be a replacement for the normal processes of consultation with the provinces. To my knowledge the idea has not been considered with the provincial premiers.

Miss MacDonald: Since the suggestion was put forward by the Prime Minister, can the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether or not the government has determined what the preferred structure would be for the membership of any such constituent assembly and has any thought been given to a timetable? In other words, I am trying to determine whether the suggestion was put forward after serious consideration on the part of the government or whether it was merely thrown out on the spur of the moment.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe both the hon. lady and myself would benefit from reading the transcript of the press conference.

Miss MacDonald: I have.

Mr. MacEachen: I understand the question was raised by a journalist and that in reply the Prime Minister made a number of comments with respect to problems which might arise with regard to any such proposal. But I want to assure the hon. lady, in case she has some doubt, that at the present time there has been no formulation of proposals with respect to a constituent assembly.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY WHETHER PEOPLE ON BLACKLIST INFORMED OF CHARGES AGAINST THEM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister? In effect, I am putting to him a question, or questions, I asked yesterday but I do so on the basis of his assurance yesterday that he would give me a further reply today. In view of the mandatory guidelines established by Prime Minister Pearson in 1963 and confirmed by the present Prime Minister in 1969, may I now ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the persons named on the list attached to the letter of the former Solicitor General of June 15, 1971, have been informed of that letter and of its references to them so that they might have an opportunity under the guidelines to clear their names?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): I find, having read the answer I gave to the hon. gentleman yesterday, that that answer is in accordance with the proper understanding of the guidelines. The hon. member used the expression "clear their names" when no charge has been laid with respect to any of those persons. The guidelines to which he refers were those which were announced in the House of Commons by the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, I believe in 1966.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In 1963.

Mr. MacEachen: In 1963. At that time he outlined the requirements involved in a new system of security which would protect both the interests of the state and the civil liberties of public servants. In dealing with the first of the new requirements of the system, the former Prime Minister stated:

> The first of the new requirements is to inform the person involved when his security or reliability is in doubt and may have to involve his dismissal.

Yesterday, the hon. gentleman, by inadvertence, I am sure, left out a very important and controlling phrase—"may have to involve his dismissal". In no case was the question of the dismissal of any of those persons raised, and therefore the notion of putting this particular procedure into operation is quite inapplicable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suggest the interpretation the minister has just given us is begging the question since, in effect, the word "may" is there. If the reliability of these civil servants has been questioned I suggest that the guidelines apply. In any case, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he is aware that at a press conference on January 26 of this year the Prime Minister, in dealing with this matter, said that he presumed the ministers had taken this step. Does that not confirm the belief of the Prime Minister, that that should have been done? Therefore, would he check further with respect to the rights of these civil servants to be informed of what was said against them?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not read what is contained in the press conference comment of the Prime Minister, but I believe that it is important to understand that in this particular case any action which might be taken would be taken by the employing department or agency responsible for the employment of any particular person.

Mr. Fairweather: Words, words.

Mr. MacEachen: There is no question at all that the governing point is the reliability or security question which may lead to the dismissal of an individual. If such occurs, the individual must be told about it and given the opportunity to explain or defend himself. If the hon. member looks into this matter further he will find that there is an opportunity to have a hearing or review, if the dismissal is to be undertaken. I suggest that these guidelines are not applicable in this particular case because at no time was dismissal involved. Actually, subsequent events prove that some of these individuals advanced rather rapidly in the public service, or so I am told.

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF BLACKLIST NOTATION FROM PERSONAL FILES OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question? Since the Prime Minister's statement on the date I indicated, January 26, 1977, refers to the informing of those civil servants by their ministers so that they could play the game according to the new rules, and since the Prime Minister then said, "which I presume the ministers did and that ended the matter as far as we were concerned," are we not left with an incomplete story, in that the Prime Minister presumed that the employees were notified, but now the minister tells us they were not. Will the Acting Prime Minister comment on that and will he indicate to the House now whether the government is prepared to see to it that any reference to this matter is completely removed from the files of those particular public servants?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member will have to reconstruct the operation of this particular procedure, to understand that it is the responsibility of the employing department.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have reconstructed it.

Mr. MacEachen: It is important to reconstruct the operation of this procedure, to understand that it is the responsibility of the department or the operating agency to put into question the reliability or security of any particular employee. In this particular case what happened, as I stated yesterday, is this: The then solicitor general wrote to a number of ministers indicating that it was important that particular individuals should live up to their responsibilities. At that time the decision whether or not to carry the matter further, was a departmental decision, but at no time was the matter carried further, to my knowledge, because at no time was it concluded that action was to be taken or contemplated which would result in the dismissal of any such individual. Only at that time were individuals to be given the opportunity to explain themselves or have a review. I have not seen that particular press statement made by the Prime Minister, and I think the hon. member will have to ask the Prime Minister directly, but there is no contradiction between what I said and the contents of the Prime Minister's press conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Scattered applause.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT WORKERS IN CERTAIN SMALL BUSINESSES BE ELIGIBLE FOR BENEFITS

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can the minister advise the House whether he has considered amending the Unemployment Insurance Act so that the sons of farmers who find themselves out of a job during the off-winter season, after having been employed by their fathers over an eight-month period, may too become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, not yet.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTIONS IN "AT HOME WITH TRANSPORT" FOR CONDUCT OF EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the very unique publication published by his department entitled "At Home with Transport". While I realize the minister's desire to improve efficiency and to establish greater awareness for the care of government property and government buildings, I wish to ask him about statements contained in the publication to the effect that employees should not stand, walk or crawl on their air conditioners, that they should leave pencils at their desk when they go to the washroom because, as the publication indicates, those walls are for privacy and not for poetry and further suggests that employees should face the front of an elevator at all times lest they be standing backwards and miss their floor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: I wish to ask the minister whether these kindergarten instructions do not cast a rather sad impression on the public servants who work for the Department of Transport. In fact, does the minister not find them somewhat insulting? Perhaps he might also inform the House whether he is planning a similar booklet of helpful hints on the use of government aircraft.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after seeing that volume I found on checking that it was a reprint of a popular earlier edition which was designed to avoid certain caustic practices in transport facilities. I am happy to ensure hon. members that most readers of it found the practices involved a little surprising. On checking, I found that the vast majority of Transport employees do not walk on their air conditioning units and never engage in many of the other activities involved. However, the volume is a serious effort to warn about some things which cause damage to property.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it may be serious but it is done in a rather kindergarten-like fashion. Can the minister advise whether this publication is exclusive to the Ministry of Transport or can we expect similar other publications affecting other government departments?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will try to determine whether the idea is catching on.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF GRANTS TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE TO DEVELOP MEANS OF PRODUCING ELECTRICITY FROM RENEWABLE RESOURCES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the government's commitment to a study of renewable energy resources, is it the intention of the minister to provide grants or other appropriate incentives to challenge the private sector of the economy to devise more efficient means of producing electric power from renewable resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be making an announcement with regard to a new and expanded top-priority budget with respect to renewable energy resources in the very near future. I think the hon. member will find in that announcement a great deal of emphasis given to stimulating the entrepreneurship of the private sector.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

ALLEGED REVERSAL OF DECISION ON DUMPING RADIOACTIVE WASTE WITHOUT PUBLIC HEARING

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is it government policy or for that matter the minister's policy to permit an important regulatory body under his jurisdiction, namely the Atomic Energy Control Board, to completely reverse a very important decision to stop nuclear waste dumping in an area, after it has received continued representations from the local member in this House, the local provincial member and the local municipality reinforcing their original decision? Is it government policy to permit them to reverse that decision without any type of a public hearing or opportunity for input from those local groups?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were to consider his question, I think he would realize that he rather over-stated the premise. He would find that rather than reversing its decision, the Atomic Energy Control Board in fact reaffirmed its intention to ensure there would be the kind of clean-up which he, as the representative of the area, and those on the government side are concerned about, that is to say the permanent management of a waste disposal site which will look after the continuing wastes from the important Port Hope refinery. The Atomic Energy Control Board has extended by six months the deadline which they had earlier placed on January 31.

Mr. Lawrence: Why is a decision of that importance made by an agency under the minister's jurisdiction without the opportunity of public hearings?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were to review the Atomic Energy Control Act he would find there is no provision for public hearings by the Atomic Energy Control Board. He raises an important point. Perhaps I can take this opportunity to assure him that work is going on now with respect to amendments to the Atomic Energy Control Act which will in fact provide that kind of authority to the Atomic Energy Control Board so that it can hold public hearings in the future. There are many other reforms I hope to be able to present to this House in the very near future.

Mr. Lawrence: Why then would the Atomic Energy Control Board have a public hearing to which it invited public groups to make their representations one week after the decisions was made?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the Atomic Energy Control Board was explaining, and I applaud them for having taken that step, to the people concerned their approval with respect to a six month extension and that the whole question of the possibility of a refinery was dependent upon just not one decision, but a series of approvals by provincial government agencies and federal government agencies, including their own.

CLOSURE OF ENGLISH-WABIGOON RIVER SYSTEM TO SPORT FISHING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment to whom I have given notice. Is it the intention of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries to close down unilaterally, without the formal request of the government of Ontario, sports fishing in the English-Wabigoon river system in northwestern Ontario?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The minister met late last week with the minister of the environment for Ontario to discuss this matter and other serious problems we have in common with that government. The minister has not yet made a decision on this serious situation. He has, however, asked me to assure the House and the hon. member that he will not do so on a unilateral basis.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—FINANCIAL COMMITMENT TO CANADIAN ARCTIC GAS PIPELINE COMPANY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises from the news this morning that the Federal Power Commission in the United States has approved the Mackenzie Valley pipeline as the best means of transporting natural gas from Prudhoe Bay to the United States. In view of the fact the Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Company have asserted that they must have financial guarantees from the Canadian government before they can proceed, I ask the minister if the government has made a final decision with regard to the granting of financial guarantees to this company? If so, what is the nature of that decision?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has not made any decision, financial or otherwise, with regard to financial guarantees for any of the applicants before the NEB. Clearly, it would be premature for us to have done so. It is important as well to correct the impression that the hon. member has inadvertently created, that the Federal Power Commission has decided in favour of one of the applicants before them. Judge Litt has been acting on behalf of the board. His staff made a representation, he made a report and his report will now be considered by the Federal Power Commission which, in turn, will make a recommendation to the President. Quite clearly, a series of decisions have still to be taken by the United States agencies.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is apparent that the present hearings before the National Energy Board are a farce and a waste of time unless the company which so far seems to have the inside track knows whether or not it is going to get financial guarantees. I ask the minister how soon a decision will be made so that Arctic Gas can either withdraw its application or proceed with the knowledge that it will not get financial guarantees from the Canadian government.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is important to point out to the hon. member that before any decision could be taken by the federal government on an important matter of this kind, the Canadian government would want to have received a formal application from one of the applicants seeking a guarantee of financial assistance. To my knowledge, no request has been forwarded to us, nor have we received one.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister saying, then, that no financial guarantees have been given and that no financial guarantees will be given prior to the National Energy Board bringing down its recommendation with respect to the application by Arctic Gas for the construction of a pipeline from the Mackenzie River delta?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I said that we have not yet received a formal request from the CAGPL consortium for financial guarantees.

CRIMINAL CODE

PUBLICATION CONTAINING PROVISIONS WHICH HAVE NOT BECOME LAW

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. A Toronto legal publisher has distributed a pocket version of the Criminal Code, still in circulation, that includes the gun control provisions of the former Bill C-83 and other provisions. I have been advised that certain police in the Toronto area and other areas have been showing this book to citizens. In light of the foregoing, is the minister, therefore, aware of this unusual practice and, if so, will he make it clear that his department does not approve of the practice of publishing a book containing provisions, which appear to be law, of a bill that died on the order paper when parliament was prorogued?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I presume that while the hon. member has not given names he is referring to a private publisher. I think he will appreciate that neither I nor the government control what private publishers may publish. If they have in fact published a book that purports to be the Criminal Code, and which is not the Criminal Code as passed by this parliament and given royal assent, then it is very unfortunate and I would ask them to withdraw it.

Mr. Woolliams: Then, may I put this to the Minister of Justice. As the top legal administrative officer of Canada he will appreciate that if a book is published as the Criminal Code which sets out provisions that died on the order paper and never got the approval of this institution or the royal proclamation, that in itself would be misrepresentation to the citizens of Canada, and of course we know that ignorance of the law is no defence.

ACTION TO CONTROL IMPORTATION OF PORNOGRAPHIC MATERIAL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister met with church leaders from Toronto with respect to the importation of material which the Minister of Justice confirmed yesterday is in contravention of section 159 of the Criminal Code, and, as a result of such meeting, what action is the minister taking to stop this illegal activity?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I did in fact have a meeting of slightly over an hour this morning with the representatives of an interdenominational group from Toronto at which they expressed the concerns of many Canadians. The hon. member wants to know whether we have taken steps in this regard. I explained to my visitors what we had done and took them to the departmental unit where those censorship measures are taken under the Customs Act. We then explained the purpose of our censorship which differs from that of the Department of Justice. I also explained how much I needed the full cooperation of the provincial solicitors general. The latter assured me of their cooperation but they will surely, if I am not mistaken, assume their share of the responsibility.

On the other hand, the committee made a very useful suggestion to me, namely that the ports of entry into Canada for trucks bringing in that literature be reduced to two or three and be located in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia where, if I may express myself in those terms, we could specialize in the matter.

DELIVERY OF BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES TO MINISTER—DISCUSSION WITH FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which follows upon the questions asked earlier by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It having been reliably reported that the former solicitor general, now Minister of Supply and Services, personally hand-delivered the EPO list and the letter accompanying it to his colleagues whose names are mentioned, has the hon. gentleman now refreshed his memory and can he recall receiving that list personally from the former solicitor general; and at the time of this personal delivery was there a discussion between the two ministers as to the list and its contents?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously I would not generally comment upon discussions between privy councillors, but I can repeat what I said in the House the other day, that I have no recollection of having seen the proposed letter that was read into the record by the hon. member's colleague, if that is still the letter to which he refers.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister to come to the point. If he cannot recall directly, then can he recall the Minister of Supply and Services, the then Solicitor General, hand-delivering to him the letter dealing with this issue, and was there any discussion between the two ministers at that time? I am not asking what the discussion was, but was there a discussion between the two hon. gentlemen at the time?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will see, if he looks at my answer, that the first part of the answer dealt with that matter. I would not ordinarily comment on discussions held between privy councillors.

INTERPRETATION OF RULE CONCERNING INFORMING PEOPLE CONSIDERED SECURITY RISK

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister, when he returns from Cape Breton, or wherever he is now.

Mr. MacFarlane: He is delivering something to Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Fairweather: I think he is delivering that list. This is a pretty serious matter.

Mr. MacFarlane: Be serious, then, if it is serious.

Mr. Fairweather: You have just had a substantial increase in pay; I hope you will live up to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain would never be that rude and the hon. member knows it. Apologize.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister, is it the position of the government that dismissal is a condition precedent to the operation of what surely we would all classify as the very humane and wise decisions of the former prime minister. Is the condition that a public servant has to be dismissed? If that is the condition, I must say that the civil liberties of many public servants have been seriously jeopardized and it is an unacceptably narrow view of the former prime minister's guidelines.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point at all.

Mr. Fairweather: What were you saying earlier, then?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member ought once again to read what the former Prime Minister said when he referred to the new requirements. The first of the new requirements is to inform the person involved when his security or his reliability is in doubt, and it may have to involve his dismissal.

Mr. Fairweather: That is the point; answer that.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. MacEachen: I said "and may have to involve his dismissal". Obviously, in this particular case the information that was drawn to the attention of the ministers was not of such a character that it would raise in anyone's mind the possibility of dismissal.

Mr. Stanfield: Just destroy their careers.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Halifax says "just destroy their careers". That is an irresponsible statement because the letter was circulated within the government as a secret, confidential letter among ministers. If there is any destruction of career involved, it must be attributable to those who divulged this sensitive document.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INFORMING PEOPLE WHOSE NAMES ON BLACKLIST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether a communication placed in the hands of a minister of the government and, when you add it up, involving several ministers and people does not constitute a threat to the future career of a public servant, whether in fact it turned out that way or not; and is it not consistent with the civil libertarian attitudes that this government and other governments have professed in this country to give such a person notice that such a charge has been made against them, whether it involves his dismissal or not?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Leader of the Opposition has raised the question of the effect of any information on the career of an individual. I believe that is the very serious question to which the former Prime Minister addressed himself very thoroughly in the guidelines which we have had under discussion. What I have said is a very faithful interpretation of these guidelines. It is not intended—at least, in my opinion it is not intended—that if there is adverse information about any public employee of any kind, it would necessitate either the responsible department having an interview with him or the security service having an interview with him. It is the type of information that would constitute in the mind of the person responsible for a judgment the opinion that it would so prejudice that person's reliability or his security standing that his continued service with the government would be put in jeopardy. It is in that context that Mr. Pearson's guidelines must be understood.

MEASURES TO ENSURE SAFE OPERATION OF OIL TANKERS IN CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the large number of oil spills it is now evident that tighter control of marine shipping and the offloading of petroleum products is required in order drastically to decrease the now large numbers of tanker accidents which interfere, on a long range basis, with the reproductive capacity of fish and cause their immediate, direct mortality. Since killing one or more species of sea life can affect other links in the oceanic food chain, and kill seals, whales, wild geese, ducks, gulls, etc., is the minister giving any consideration to the need for requiring substantial improvements in the vessel piloting system of ships entering our waters; is he giving consideration to requiring new ships to be double hulled for the protection of the environment, plus ensuring that the quality and number of licensed ships officers are maintained at a high level, which is not always the case when they are serving on ships that fly flags of convenience; and finally, will he ensure that comprehensive liability insurance be made mandatory to discourage carelessness and to cover those suffering damage from accidents?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, these matters are constantly being reviewed. As I have indicated to the House earlier, we have in Canada some of the firmest regulations regarding standards for equipment, construction of vessels and the certification of masters and others in charge of vessels entering Canadian waters.

We have also put into place the ECAREG system on the east coast whereby as ships approach our waters they are required to report and the whole system of computer information is available to determine the past history of the vessel and whether there are any risks concerning it. This is followed up by inspections when the ships are in Canadian ports to make sure these regulations are very effective. I can assure the hon. member that we have these concerns very much in mind and that Canada stands in the forefront in attempting to do what it can on its own in relation to the quality of ships entering our waters. It will take international action to ensure that similar action is taken on a broader scale throughout the world.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

ALLEGED EXISTENCE OF LIST OF COUNTRIES TO WHICH REACTORS MAY BE SOLD

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of testimony before the Public Accounts Committee by the former president of the Atomic Energy Commission. Has the government prepared, and the cabinet approved, a list of countries with which it is proper for the Atomic Energy Commission to deal in terms of selling nuclear reactors abroad?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know of any such list, but I know that there are criteria which normally apply with respect to sales of reactors abroad. We have frequently discussed in the House criteria arising from the possibility of nuclear proliferation. These are among the tests which would be applied in all circumstances. But I am not aware of any such list as the hon. member has mentioned, though one may exist.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that a clear indication was provided this morning that such a list is available, would the Acting Prime Minister check and report back whether there is, indeed, such a list, and make it public so that the people may know with what countries AECL can deal?

Mr. MacEachen: Yesterday, I believe I intimated that I took a pretty dim view of the notion of pursuing the same inquiry in two places. One of the purposes of the standing committees is to pursue such inquiries apart from the House of Commons. If we rehash in the House of Commons what we do in committees, we might as well drop the idea of having committees.

Mr. Speaker: I have paid careful attention to the questions asked. Questions can be asked which are in conflict with the proceedings before the committee. However, it is also possible to ask questions which are, really, only incidental to proceedings before a committee and which ought to stand on their own two feet. I thought the two questions asked by the hon. member were in that category.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF UNITED STATES LAW TO CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the evidence by a senior U.S. official before a sub-committee of the United States Congress, which I have here, that the United States government continues to require subsidiaries of American firms to hold licences from that government to trade with Cuba, even in agricultural and other products completely of Canadian origin, will the minister ensure without further delay that the director of the combines branch take immediate steps to apply the new provisions in the Combines Act designed to block this unacceptable, extraterritorial application of foreign law to Canadian business activity?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am unfamiliar with this report and would like to take the question as notice.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF DELAYING DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS FOR PROJECTS

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As there have been delays in the distribution of forms and literature concerning the Canada Works Program, can the minister tell the House whether he is willing to extend the date of eligibility for those projects and so allow a larger number of groups to present projects under that employment program?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a result of representations from the hon. member for Algoma, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for St. John's East and, now, from the hon. member across the way, I have indicated I am prepared to look at it, given the adverse weather conditions at the present time. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I should have mentioned, also, the hon. member for Saint-Denis. We have something in excess of $30 million in applications but I would prefer to wait until Friday before making a final determination.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DEMOGRAPHIC STUDIES ON WHICH NATIONAL POPULATION POLICY BASED

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. The special joint committee on immigration policy stated, and I quote:

The committee recommends that immigration in future be treated as a central variable in a national population policy.

Will the minister table the government's demographic studies on which its well hidden national population policy is based in order that this information might be at the disposal of the House during second reading debate on Bill C-74?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will consider it.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF MEAT BROKERAGE BUSINESS AND REFERRAL OF QUEBEC MEAT INQUIRY REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It arises from a report that a former Montreal meat magnate is being detained by the Quebec Police Commission Inquiry into organized crime. Will the minister request the Solicitor General to investigate the entire meat brokerage business which has created uncertainty and dissatisfaction within the meat industry?

• (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, according to what I have read about the Quebec meat inquiry, the courts are handling it and seem to be doing a fairly good job. I am sure the Solicitor General is aware of the trial and any possible federal involvement.

Mr. Towers: In the interim, would the minister consider having the report of the Quebec meat inquiry presented to the Standing Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have made my feelings known. That report is not mine.

LEVELS OF PBB FOUND IN BEEF IMPORTED FROM MICHIGAN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It is my understanding that the tests on the Michigan beef that has been imported to this country done by scientists in the last few days have shown that traces of the chemical PBB have been found. I should like to know from the minister whether he can tell the House what levels of PBB have been found in that beef and what will the government do about it.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We have received the results of the tests on the 77 carcasses that were in retention and only one of the carcasses has shown a significant level of PBB. It has been condemned and the rest have been released. We will still be running tests on beef from Michigan. All the carcasses will be tested. We are also running random tests on cattle from southwestern Ontario and western Canada. The tests on this cattle have shown no traces of PBB at all, but we will continue to monitor beef and make sure that it is safe for human consumption, in co-operation with other departments concerned.

4. Since January 1, 1975, CMHC has not placed advertisements in the news media to advertise its senior citizens' housing programmes.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS TO PROFESSOR JACQUES BROSSARD

Question No. 1,018—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Did the Canada Council provide funds to Professor Jacques Brossard of the University of Montreal to study the legal steps by which a province could separate from Canada and, if so (a) in what amount (b) under what programme or policy (c) on whose recommendation?

2. Have any similar studies been carried out under the auspices of the Canada Council by academics who were not committed separatists?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: 1. See answer to Question 893 answered November 29, 1976.

2. Several studies relating to federalism or Quebec nationalism have been carried out under the auspices of the Canada Council but none of these are directed specifically to the question studied by Professor Brossard. The authors of those studies were not required, any more than Canada Council grantees in other fields, to state their political affiliations.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS—YORK AND SUNBURY COUNTIES, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,045—Mr. Howie:

How many home improvement loans were made to residents in the Counties of York and Sunbury, New Brunswick including all municipalities in the Counties and what was the total amount loaned in each fiscal year ending March 31 (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

Home Improvement Loans approved, NHA section 28
Sunbury and York Counties, New Brunswick, 1973-75

County		No of Loans	Amount $000

AIR CANADA—FEMALE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,090—Mr. Howie:

1. For each fiscal year ending March 31 (a) 1970 (b) 1974 (c) 1976, how many female persons were employed as new personnel by Air Canada to serve as stewardesses or flight attendants and how many were residents of New Brunswick?

2. How many New Brunswick residents applied for employment in each category?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. (a) Not available. (b) Records for the years prior to 1974 are not available. However, between January 1 and December 31, 1974, a total of 146 were employed, of which five were residents of New Brunswick. In addition, 115 were employed for the summer period only. The company hires this latter group only from cities in which there is an in-flight base, allowing these short term employees to reside at home. Therefore, none were residents of New Brunswick. (c) Between January 1 and December 1, 1976, a total of 178 were employed, of which three were residents of New Brunswick. In addition, 60 were employed for the summer period only, none were residents of New Brunswick.

2. The term "flight attendant" is synonymous with stewardess, but also includes males because Air Canada has no employment restrictions for this category with respect to age, sex or marital status. Also, statistics are kept only on those candidates who were actually interviewed or who were hired. Further, flight attendant applications expire after six months and the application must then be renewed. No records of expired applications are retained. Total flight attendant interviews, New Brunswick—1970, not available; 1974, 60; 1976, 58.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Question No. 1,268—Mr. Towers:

1. Did the Combines Investigation Branch initiate an inquiry into the grain industry and, if so, on what basis or at whose instigation?

2. Was there evidence of wrongdoing on the part of grain co-operatives and, if so, what are the details?

3. Did an infraction occur due to an inadequacy or deficiency in the control of grain sales under the Canada Grains Act?

4. (a) Are the salaries of officials of co-operatives tied to profit (b) is there evidence of fraud on the part of any individual (c) have producers paid all profits?

5. On what grounds was the investigation authorized?

6. Did the Canada Grains Commission fail to fulfill its duties and responsibilities?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): In August, 1976, the General Manager of Manitoba Pool Elevators issued a press release and made public the fact that an inquiry into the affairs of a number of grain companies had been commenced. In the circumstances the Director of Investigation and Research (Combines Investigation Act) acknowledges this. However, the privacy provisions of the Act preclude him from making any further comments on the matter apart from saying that the inquiry was commenced pursuant to section 8 of the Combines Investigation Act.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-27, to establish the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I intend to concentrate my remarks today on the two main objectives of Bill C-27, the employment and immigration reorganization act, and to outline the basic reasons underlying the changes proposed in the bill. The first objective is to bring about the integration of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The second is to introduce certain changes into the unemployment insurance program.

On the subject of integration, Mr. Speaker, the main question I have had in my mind as the new minister of this complex portfolio is why integration is now appropriate, bearing in mind the decision taken about ten years ago to separate the employment service from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. A central factor is that conditions in the Canadian society—economy and the labour market of the late 1970s—are significantly different than they were in the late 1960s.

During the last decade there has also been an important evolution in our manpower programs and in unemployment insurance. Manpower services generally, and in particular the counselling, placement, training and mobility programs, as well as the newer job-creation programs, have greatly strengthened and matured. At the same time, the unemployment insurance program has been extended to cover almost the entire labour force and has come to play a much more significant role in the operation of the Canadian labour market and the Canadian economy. Indeed, we now have some of the most advanced employment and insurance programs in the world.

As a result of these changes, Mr. Speaker, the destinies of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission have become ever more closely linked. Indeed, the complementary nature of the work of the two organizations is illustrated by the fact that half of the claimants for unemployment insurance benefits now register with Canada manpower centres. Such claimants constitute 70 per cent of the total clientele of CMCs.

As a result of these developments, the two organizations have come to co-operate more and more closely, and ways have been developed to harmonize their programs and activities. This has been reflected, for example, in increased efforts to expose UI claimants to the counselling and job placement facilities of CMCs. While this harmonization and co-operation have yielded significant and positive results, it has become clear that a unified management is required to provide the best services to the Canadian public.

Specifically, we believe that integration will lead to substantial improvements to services through, first, a rationalization of the present network of local offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration; second, the conversion of most service points into one-stop centres where the complete range of services of the two organizations would be available to the public; third, the faster and more systematic exposure of clientele to employment services; and lastly, a simplification of the documentation required of clients and a streamlining of the procedures to be followed by them in using the services provided under the employment and insurance program.

It is also important to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the immigration program has had, and will continue to have, a far-reaching impact on the Canadian labour market. Thus, the inclusion of immigration in the mandate of the new organization will be essential to the achievement of an integrated approach to the development of employment programs. I say this recognizing, of course, the important social objectives and consequences of our immigration program.

The new integrated organization will consist of both a commission and a small support department. The new Canadian employment and immigration commission will be responsible for the administration of labour market programs and the policies underlying those programs. These will include the payment of benefits under the unemployment insurance program, immigration, recruitment, selection, settlement, enforcement and control, placement, counselling and training, and the administration of other employment programs such as direct job-creation. It will also provide the administrative support functions for both the commission and the department. The support department of employment and immigration will be responsible for strategic policy development, program evaluation, labour market research and information services. It will help to ensure the closest possible linkages between labour market policies and program and the government's over-all economic and social strategies.

The effective fulfillment of the mandate of the commission will continue to require close co-operation and consultation between government, labour and business. Thus, the well-established policy of tripartite consultation and co-operation will be continued through the representation of workers and employers in the new commission. Indeed, the potential for effective co-operation will be enhanced, since the authority of the new commission will extend not only to the unemployment insurance program but also to labour market programs generally as well as immigration matters.

In this connection, Bill C-27 also makes provision for the establishment of a new Canada employment and immigration advisory council. Personally, I attach the highest importance to the role to be played by the new advisory council in terms of the government's approach to co-operation with the private sector in general and labour and management in particular. That is why I intend to recommend that high-level representatives of labour and management be appointed to the council, people with full authority to speak in the name of those whom they represent. In addition, there are many individuals in the community who are not directly representative of labour or management and who have significant contributions to make to the discussions on issues related to the Canadian labour market. They will also be given an opportunity to participate in the work of the council.

I should like to turn now to the second main purpose of Bill C-27, which is to introduce certain changes to the unemployment insurance program. There are three major changes proposed: first, an increase in the number of weeks required to qualify for UI benefits, so-called entrance requirement, from eight weeks to twelve; second, a change in the benefit structure which is the framework used to determine the duration of a claimant's entitlement to benefit; third, the authorization of more productive or developmental uses of unemployment insurance funds, including the use of such funds as income maintenance for claimant's participating in approved training courses, job-creation projects and work-sharing programs.

The eight-week entrance requirement to our unemployment insurance program has certainly been one of its more contentious issues on which there has been extensive discussion. For example, I have received briefs and letters strongly recommending that the requirement be increased to as many as 20 weeks. I have received equally strong recommendations that there should be no change. Those who have argued for an increase in the entrance requirement have done so mainly on the basis of concern about the incentive to work. An examination of the characteristics and behaviour of claimants with eight to eleven weeks of insured employment—the so-called "eight to eleven weekers"—strongly suggests that an increase in the entrance requirement would constitute for many of them an incentive to work longer. In general, eight to eleven weekers are younger than average, without dependants, and many are secondary earners in families. Basically, they have what might best be described as an intermittent or unstable attachment to the active work force.

The current entrance requirement, which is one of the most generous of any country in the world, provides an all too readily available financial inducement reinforcing unstable work patterns. In light of these characteristics and behaviour of eight to eleven weekers, it is not unreasonable to expect that a substantial proportion of them will work an additional one to four weeks required to qualify for the new twelve-week entrance requirement. For those who do not, we consider that there are other programs which are preferable alternatives to meeting their needs. These are the kinds of programs I announced in the employment strategy, ranging from the rehabilitative measures of training to actual employment in job-creation projects.

Another question which has been asked is: Why choose 12 weeks rather than, say, 15 or 20 weeks?

An hon. Member: Or 30.

Mr. Cullen: Our investigations have indicated that the eight to eleven weekers receive a significantly higher degree of subsidization from the unemployment insurance account and have a much more unstable attachment to the labour force than any other category of insured worker. In light of these factors, our judgment is that the twelve-week entrance requirement is, on balance, the most appropriate.

The second proposed change is the introduction of a new benefit structure. This will have several advantages. It will be simpler than current arrangements. It will be based on three phases, two of which are related to the number of weeks of insured employment and the third of which is related to local unemployment conditions. This will facilitate an easier comprehension of benefit entitlement and will simplify administration of the act. The new arrangements for benefit entitlement will also be more equitable. In particular, there will be a better balance between the number of insured weeks that a claimant has, and the number of weeks of benefit to which he is entitled in the initial phase of his claim. Provision will continue to be made for additional benefits for those with a longer labour force attachment. Finally, entitlement to regionally extended benefits will be much more sensitive to local unemployment conditions because it will be based directly on regional unemployment rates.

Thus, the new benefit structure is designed to curtail benefit entitlement to those with a relatively short labour force attachment living in regions of low unemployment. At the same time, it is designed to maintain appropriate insurance protection to those with longer labour force attachment as well as to those claimants who reside in regions of high unemployment.

Other changes will also be introduced into the benefit structure to enhance the motivation for work. For example, we propose to eliminate the four-week rule which now results in a claim being terminated if a claimant returns to work for four weeks in the extended benefit phase. This rule has proved to be a disincentive for claimants to return to employment, particularly when there is some uncertainty about the duration of that employment.

The changes in the entrance requirement and the benefit structure must be considered in the context of our over-all employment strategy. The savings arising out of these changes in the UI program will be redirected to programs designed to create new employment opportunities as well as to help prevent unemployment. In this way we will achieve a more effective allocation of resources in support of a range of employment programs tailored to meet the needs of those individuals, groups and areas of the country most seriously affected by unemployment.

There are a number of other specific amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which are proposed. For example, the right to appeal decisions of boards of referees will be broadened to give all claimants and employers the right to request an appeal to the umpire against the unanimous decision of the board of referees. At present, only claimants and employers represented by associations can appeal such decisions as a right. This amendment will be implemented after changes have been introduced in the appeal system in light of the findings and recommendations of the Law Reform Commission. I should also explain that Bill C-27 makes provision for an increase in the number of Federal Court justices who can hear appeal cases, in order to reduce the number of outstanding appeals.

The final area of proposed change in the unemployment insurance program is the introduction of authority to use unemployment insurance benefits in more directly productive or developmental ways. In this connection I should stress that unemployment insurance will continue to provide a vital measure of income protection to unemployed workers while they conduct an active job search to locate the most suitable and satisfying employment available to them. In this way the program plays a very productive role in Canadian society in maintaining skills, preserving dignity and preventing economic hardship.

There are instances, however, when the productive impact of the program is inhibited by factors such as obsolete or inappropriate skills, or the absence or shortage of employment opportunities in a particular area. In these circumstances the role of the UI program to facilitate job searches has, inevitably, a diminished applicability. I believe, therefore, that there is a need to work out program alternatives that would permit a more productive use of time while on claim. To this end I am proposing three developmental uses of unemployment insurance funds, two of which would be launched on a limited pilot basis.

First, the developmental use of unemployment insurance funds would provide for a streamlining of income maintenance arrangements for claimants on manpower training courses. We know that many individuals are unemployed because they lack appropriate skills, and that many of these individuals can benefit from occupational training or retraining. Under this proposal, trainees eligible for unemployment insurance on federally-sponsored training courses would normally receive their full unemployment insurance benefit as their main source of income maintenance.

This contrasts with the current arrangement under which claimant-trainees receive manpower training allowances, topped up with unemployment insurance benefits, when their level of unemployment insurance benefit entitlement is higher than their allowances. From the standpoint of developmental impact, this rationalization of financial arrangements should lead to a more effective allocation of resources and could, potentially, free-up resources for additional training.

Mr. Speaker, the second proposed developmental approach is the use of unemployment insurance funds as income maintenance for claimants on special job-creation projects. There are large numbers of unemployed workers receiving unemployment insurance benefits who cannot find employment, while at the same time many community-oriented projects cannot be carried out because of lack of funds to pay for such work. Under the proposed arrangements, unemployment insurance claimants would be given the opportunity of participating in job-creation projects on a purely voluntary basis while they receive unemployment insurance benefits.

This approach would enchance the scope of job-creation projects and increase the number of individuals who could participate in them. I am very much aware that this is a new area which would require careful experimentation and evaluation. We would, therefore, propose to launch it on a pilot project basis to assess its proposed impact on unemployment and the labour market.

The third proposed developmental use of unemployment insurance funds would be in work-sharing arrangements. At present, when a firm faces a temporary emergency it normally cuts back on production and reduces the size of its work force. Many of the workers who are laid off will search for other work, move, seek training for a new occupation or remain unemployed. Typically, there are major losses involved in this process. Workers' skills may erode when they are idle and some of them may lose the habits and patterns of work that are important to their personal and economic well-being. When the firm is ready to rehire, it may find some of its former work force with weakened skills and some no longer available.

Work-sharing could reduce these problems. For instance, instead of one-quarter of a work force in a particular establishment being laid off, employers and workers could agree that it would be preferable for all of the work force to work a 30-hour week instead of a 40-hour week on a temporary basis. During the period of the arrangement, unemployment insurance benefits would be paid for one-quarter of a week to all of the workers instead of for all the week to one-quarter of the workers. We also propose to launch this program on a pilot project basis to permit a careful evaluation of its results and potential impact and to ensure the support of workers and employers.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has had a very favourable reputation as an innovator in the field of labour programs and policies, and I think we have, in the proposed developmental use of unemployment insurance funds, another opportunity to demonstrate that spirit of innovation. It is a spirit conditioned by a sensitivity to the practical difficulties which could be involved. This is why we would propose to proceed with the job-creation and work-sharing projects on an experimental basis. Such experimentation is not necessary in the case of training, where we have had substantial experience with the training of unemployment insurance claimants and where our proposals involve mainly a rationalization of financial arrangements.

The annual funding level for all of the developmental projects will be set by the governor in council.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the main changes proposed in Bill C-27 and a brief explanation of their underlying rationale and objectives. We will, of course, have an opportunity of examining all of the areas in greater detail during the committee stage, at which time I will be presenting additional information on the proposed changes.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, once again we are involved in what I call a very significant debate. This is the third time we have had an opportunity to become involved with a bill which in its original form was brought forward in 1971, when it certainly brought about a lot of problems. The government has been playing around with it since then, hoping that eventually they could come up with an unemployment insurance scheme that the people would accept.

Today we are debating amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I want to repeat what the minister has indicated as the highlights. It provides for the establishment of a department of employment and immigration, the establishment of a Canada employment and immigration commission, the establishment of an employment and immigration advisory council, and the establishment of a three-phase benefit structure. The latter is actually an overhaul and simplification of the method used to determine a claimant's entitlement to benefit; that is, the benefit structure as proposed. The existing structure, based on five benefit periods, would be replaced with a simplified three-phase structure. In other words, the minister has found out that the five-phase structure was unworkable, cumbersome and inefficient. The three-phase structure will be made up of an initial benefit period, the labour force extended phase and a regional extended phase.

The initial phase is structured on the basis of strict insurance principles which would require that the number of weeks of benefit to which a claimant is entitled is closely related to the number of weeks a claimant has worked. One week of benefit would be allowed, therefore, for each insurance week of employment from a minimum of 12 to a maximum of 25 weeks. This move is long overdue. In the labour force extended phase, one week of benefit would be allowed for every two insurance weeks of employment over 25 insurance weeks. A maximum of 13 weeks benefit would be payable in this phase. The regional extended phase recognizes the need of high unemployment for additional income protection. From two to 20 weeks of benefits would thus be payable in this phase, reaching the maximum when the regional unemployment rate exceeds 8.5 per cent.

It is interesting to note that the government understands there is a problem with the regional differences that are maintained through its own ineptness and its mismanagement of the economy. It has now recognized the severe economic problems faced by people, say, in the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec as related to other regions of the country. The minister has admitted something further. The over-all maximum entitlement under the new benefits structure would be 50 benefit weeks to be drawn within a 52-week period. There is not much change there, Mr. Speaker: it was previously 51 weeks; now it is 50.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is too generous.

Mr. Alexander: It is also proposed to do away with the present four-week rule which now results in a claim being terminated if benefits are not paid during four consecutive weeks in an extended benefit period. This rule is considered a serious disincentive to claimants who might otherwise take short-term jobs. All members have had many letters pointing out the inequality of this provision. It actually prevented people from taking that further step to try to become part of the labour force.

Another matter upon which I shall dwell at some length later, and which the minister tried to justify, is the increased pension requirement from eight weeks to twelve weeks. The government stole that policy without giving us notice.

● (1530)

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: The minister is blushing.

Mr. Alexander: Back in 1971, when fewer were unemployed and the economy was healthier, I remember telling the minister who was responsible for bringing in this monstrosity of a law to include in the program incentives for work. I suggested that 12 weeks of employment should be a minimum qualifying requirement, but the minister said no. Mr. Speaker, I made that point six years ago.

It is apparent the government is not aware that national policies can effect detrimentally certain regions of the country. It is about time it began considering the realities of the new federalism. I understand that the thinking of the government has changed in that national unemployment insurance funds are to be used for training purposes. The minister elaborated on the point at some length. In other words, those on federally-sponsored courses are to receive full UI benefits. These, not manpower training allowances, apparently would be their main source of income. We must explore this proposal. The minister suggested that he is not sure how it will work, and that is why this will be a pilot project. The next pilot project mentioned involved job-creation. The next involved work-sharing. One can only conclude that after six years of thinking about them the government has come forward with pilot projects because it is not sure how they will work. Since they are to be pilot projects, we will need to examine them thoroughly.

There is another point which I am not sure the minister mentioned in his speech. We all heard what he said today—and he did not say a heck of a lot. I do not think he said that the right to appeal, which is now so restricted, discriminatory and harmful to claimants, will now be granted both to claimants and employers. I think such a move would be a step in the right direction because the provisions of the existing legislation are disastrous.

I understand that the National Employment Service Commission is to continue to function; it will continue to collect information, to ensure that discriminatory acts do not take place, and it will define and obtain information for the use of the commission. The minister neglected to say—not deliberately, I think—that the experience rating provision introduced by the former minister has now been judged to be disastrous. No regulations thereunder have ever been passed. I think the minister nods his head in approval of that statement. We brought the situation to the attention of the previous minister, but no, he disagreed with us—the experience rating provision was the greatest thing since sliced bread. Now, seven years later, once more the government says that the opposition was right. I do not mind taking a little credit on behalf of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I say that particularly since some people in this country do not think that we on this side of the House have proposed good policies for Canadians.

Mr. Gilbert: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I suggest that hon. members should read the speeches members of my party have made and read what has been said in committee. If they do that, they will find that it has been our position that the experience rating provision is cumbersome, discriminatory and of limited effect. We said that in 1971. How the government opposite has survived in power is beyond me. It has stayed in power by procrastinating, playing hanky-panky with the people and giving away the taxpayers' dollars. It has not developed policies, as we showed some time ago.

I have dealt with some of the matters with which the bill deals. My colleagues in this party and other parties will explore various aspects of the bill, the introduction of which gives us all the opportunity to discuss the dismally unsatisfactory record of this government in developing the country for the benefit of Canadians and creating jobs and growth, the potential for which could make us the envy of the free world.

When we discuss the economy of this country, we are discussing a sad state of affairs. The minister has brought in this bill in these sad times. As the Conference Board of Canada, the University of Toronto Institute of Policy Analysis, and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development have made clear, in 1977 and 1978 we shall face high unemployment, slow growth and some continuation of inflation. Those respected organizations have painted a picture of doom and depression facing this country, a situation which warrants a statement by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to the state of our economy so that the people of Canada may know what prospects they face. Unfortunately, the statements of those respected organizations, and our demands for a statement to show the people the kind of mess we are in, have fallen on deaf ears. The respected organizations mentioned have indicated that we shall have more jobless in this country unless Ottawa acts swiftly.

Mr. Speaker, many figures have been bandied about, but it is accepted generally, I think, that in 1978 about 875,000 of our people will be unemployed. In short, we must stimulate new business activity and increase consumer spending. Surely, the gloomy picture which has been painted is a powerful argument for the introduction of a budget, the highest priority of which ought to be job-creation. I say this because at present some 780,000 people, making up about 7.5 per cent of the labour force of Canada, are unemployed.

Unfortunately, the government has merely paid lip service to the solution of the unemployment problem. At present, the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is about 13.6 per cent; in New Brunswick, 11.1 per cent; in Prince Edward Island, 9 per cent plus; and in Nova Scotia, 9 per cent plus. We have learned lately of the unsatisfactory employment picture in Quebec where unemployment is running at about 10 per cent. The indications are that conditions will get still tougher in this country.

For all these reasons it is clear that the government has no idea of the extent of this country's unemployment or how to correct it. Surely, therefore, we ought to address ourselves to providing further business investment tax credits, cutting personal income taxes for those in low and middle income groups and bringing about the early removal of controls in order to restore the confidence of the business community and encourage needed investment.

When the government introduced its control program, it stole the idea from us. Unfortunately, it did not steal the right policy, which is why we are in our present mess. The government should have been wise enough to impose the freeze we advocated: it ought to have introduced a consultative process involving labour, management, concerned groups and provincial governments prior to the imposition of controls. In that way we could have known in which direction we ought to go. But the government did not do that. Instead, it chose to bring in its own version of that policy, with the result that the entire country is exercised about it.

Mr. Rodriguez: But you wanted it.

Mr. Alexander: The government stole the wrong version of our idea. After it had said for several months that it would not introduce anything like it because it had not worked in Great Britain and the United States, and would not work in this country, it said, in effect, "Therefore, in all honesty, we will not bring it in."

● (1540)

An hon. Member: The minister changed his mind.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, he changed his mind. This is why his credibility is slowly going down the drain.

Mr. Epp: "Slowly"?

Mr. Alexander: Excuse me: "rapidly" going down the drain. In my view, this government still believes that its highest priority is the fight against inflation, something which according to the Prime Minister the government licked some time ago.

Mr. Epp: Wrestled to the ground.

Mr. Alexander: They are still maintaining that position in terms of fighting inflation, when there are 800,000 people begging for some initiative from this government. There is no problem in terms of stopping inflation. Let me quote Milton Friedman, the noted economist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I hear hon. friends to my left. With that sort of calibre, is it any wonder that they cannot get any more than 15 or 16 seats. Milton Friedman stated:

> We know how to do it. Every economist knows how to do it. I can specify it very simply. The only way to cure inflation is for the government to spend less and to print less. The only way to cure inflation is to hold down the growth in the quantity of money. There is no other way to do it. There is no device which will allow us to slow down inflation. The problem, however, is not how to stop inflation. The problem is to have the political will to do so.

In other words, Milton Friedman was talking about having the guts to move in the direction of stopping printing money and spending money. It has to stop. Failing that, we will end up as some other countries the names of which I will not mention for the moment. What concerns me is that this government does not have the intestinal fortitude to proceed accordingly and to give top priority to the problem of unemployment. The only thing it can think about now is bringing in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and we do not know whether they will be effective or not. The human cost of the neglect of this government, in terms of job-creation, is staggering. We pay about $4 billion in unemployment insurance between the government and the employer-employee premium. We lose billions of dollars in lost productivity, and we lose taxes in the millions, goodness knows how much, just as the result of this government not having as its top priority the creation of jobs.

That is the climate in which this government introduces amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, woefully ignoring the fact that tinkering now and again with the act is not the answer. The answer is the creation of jobs, if you want to reduce large expenditures on unemployment and reduce, if not eliminate, abuses and suspicions about unemployment insurance.

With regard to this act, I had the opportunity to obtain advice from some of the provincial governments throughout this country. I would like to place on record a precis of some of the concerns that have been exhibited. One, the social assistance payments to the provinces may go up due to the eight to twelve-week change. Another, that the provinces be compensated for the loss of moneys from the UI payment by the use of funds for manpower training and job creation. Next, that genuine and close consultation occur between the provinces and the federal government prior to the implementation of the manpower program so that provincial priority needs will be met and the funds will be allocated in a way tailored to the provinces. Another point is that inadequate time was given for the provinces to make budgetary arrangements to offset the loss of revenue from the UIC changes or the planned programs to offset their negative effects. Another point made was that co-operation, co-ordination and consultation between the provinces and the federal government appeared in almost every letter as a key concern.

Let me talk about the province of Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan, as I understand it, is committed to the use of direct employment programs in an attempt to meet the objectives of the Saskatchewan manpower policy. Year-round job creation aimed at high unemployment areas is not one of its highest priorities, since its economy is strong. More important to them is the maintenance of current volumes of employment, should an economic downturn occur in the future, in order to avoid out-migration of labour. The new policy should co-ordinate programs in a way designed to permit individuals to gain access to permanent employment with career promotional opportunities. They do not want more fragmented, short-term federal employment schemes. They feel that the eligibility for training with UI funds should not be restricted to UI recipients. They want assurances that federal funding under manpower training programs now in existence will not be curtailed. I do not know whether the minister knows all this. I will send him the letters, if he wants to see them.

I want to get into work-sharing in some detail. I do not know whether the minister is aware of the problems in Germany and other places in that regard. Saskatchewan feels it is a good idea, that it is consistent with their provincial manpower policies, but employers and employees should be consulted to ensure that the proposal does not interfere with the collective bargaining process. The low rate of unemployment in Saskatchewan, about 3 per cent, means that workers are subsidizing the unemployed in other provinces through their unemployment insurance payments.

What about Ontario? They agree generally with the conclusion of the federal analysis of the legislation and the changes indicated that are needed. They especially agree with the recommendation that efforts are needed to remove work disincentives and unnecessary costs from the program. However, they have some concern about the heavy reliance of the proposal on unemployment insurance as a means for income redistribution. That is the policy this government has been following for some time. Rather than have an insurance scheme, they have used it as income redistribution. Not only is the province of Ontario concerned about that but other provinces are also.

Another point the province of Ontario raised is that major unemployment insurance costs come from persons with weak labour force attachments, that is, the eight to eleven-weekers. Evidence suggests that raising the eligibility period from eight to twelve weeks will not result in a substantial increase in welfare costs. Evidence gathered by the Unemployment Insurance Commission review indicates that many people after eight to eleven weeks of work do not need to resort to welfare for income. The review doubts that alternate compensation schemes will be necessary. On the whole, it feels changes will be advantageous to Ontario and will put government funds to more productive use.

How about New Brunswick? They indicated that Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits will be reduced by $30 million in 1977; that is, a combination of Bill C-69 and the new changes. This will increase the social assistance burden of the province. They felt there was insufficient consultation; there was not enough lead time for them to express their concerns to the degree that they would have liked; that there was not enough time given for them to prepare, provincially, their budget to accommodate the increased social assistance burden or to develop alternate programs to offset some negative implications of the changes. They too, want discussion and consultation on the employment strategy; in other words, the Young Canada Works program envisaged by the minister as job-creation and work-sharing. They want to have input into their development because it should reflect the manpower, economic and social policies of New Brunswick. They also state they must have provincial consultation during the development of the program if the program is within provincial jurisdiction. With regard to work-sharing, this province is concerned that a doubling of staff may be needed to administer it, and that co-operation exist between labour and management and both levels of government. They, too, say that savings from the UIC should return to the provinces in such a manner that positive, continuing—I repeat, positive, continuing—results occur.

What about Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker? We have ignored that province. We have shamefully neglected it, not only in regard to this aspect but in regard to all other aspects. This province has calculated that the UIC changes will cost the province $12 million to $15 million, assuming that 50 per cent of the eight to eleven-week workers find they work for the additional required weeks, as the various studies show. It has also been calculated that the federal government will spend at least that much on job-creation and manpower training programs. It is anticipated that included in the target group for new or expanded manpower programs would be welfare recipients who otherwise would have continued on unemployment insurance if the changes had not been made. The province would control escalation of welfare costs because of the changes.

[Mr. Alexander.]

As for Alberta, Mr. Speaker, they intend to support the proposed amendments because the benefit duration is more closely related to the previous labour force attachment. Alberta also states that the benefits will be more insurance-oriented than the current ones, and the over-all effect will be a minor tightening of unemployment insurance in Alberta. They also state that the federal government and the provinces together should provide income support; that therefore changes at either level can have an impact magnified by lack of deliberate consultation and co-operation between the jurisdictions. Notice, Mr. Speaker, how there is continual reference to co-operation, consultation and co-ordination. This seems to be the big thing with that province. They also state that costs added to provincial programs and services as a result of UIC changes should be compensated; that consultation take place immediately because of differences in the requirements of federal and provincial budgetary cycles.

With regard to the three-phase benefit structure, as far as Alberta is concerned they view phase 7 as the insurance phase, with benefits related to length of employment and paid from premiums. The extended phase 2 and phase 3 appear to be primarily income maintenance. Since Alberta believes that UI should be primarily an insurance scheme, phases 2 and 3 are viewed as part of the program only in the absence of a support-supplementation program.

I propose to deal now, Mr. Speaker, with some of the provisions of the act. Having brought to the attention of the minister the concerns of the provinces, I should like to talk about the integration of manpower and unemployment insurance. I have already stated that this has been our policy. We have always called for this. This is what we now call the one-step approach which was brought forth and, let us say, magnified by the Economic Council of Canada. The one-step approach envisages counselling, payment of benefits and the placement of jobs all under one roof. What we have had in the past is frustration in the area of payments, duplication of documentation, one bureaucracy paying out money and the other trying to find jobs, neither knowing what the other was doing. In my view this has cost us millions of dollars.

I have some concerns about this policy. It has not been spelled out by the minister sufficiently for us to be aware of some of the answers. What will be the function of a counsellor, as opposed to that of a benefit control officer? Will they have the same job? If so, a lot of hardship can arise, with one guy supposedly counselling a claimant and the other guy trying to kick him off unemployment insurance. We will have to watch very carefully whether they are one and the same.

Will there be greater bureaucracy as a result of this? I thought perhaps there would not be, but I have some misgivings about it now. I thought that as a result of the shifting and integrating of staff, we were talking about one group policy rather than creating a whole new bureaucracy. We will have to watch the minister in this respect, too. How long will it take, Mr. Speaker, to bring about this one-group concept? Are we close to it? I get press releases from the minister's office and his departmental officials saying that someone else has a job and that the minister is responsible for this and that, but it does not make any sense in terms of how simple will this integration, or marriage, be so far as meeting the needs of claimants is concerned.

I have a few other points I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the proposed new department of employment and immigration which now will have an associate deputy minister. The duties of the commission advisory council are less clearly defined. For instance, the new commission will perform duties as required in relation to any matters for which the minister is responsible. That is really a sweeping generalization, and I hope it is not true. Previously, the commission's duties related specifically to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Similarly, the advisory council will advise the minister on all matters to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend and is no longer assigned any particular responsibilities.

What is going on here? Is the minister not going to have anything to do? Is he going to abdicate his responsibilities? I will not tell Your Honour what I think he said; I will just continue with my speech. Nevertheless, we will want to know whether his responsibilities are staying with him, or are they going to be channelled to some nameless bureaucracy? If so, we take a dim view of that, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, the chairman of the commission will be the deputy minister of the department; the vice-chairman will be the associate deputy minister. The chairman of the advisory council may be appointed for an indefinite term, whereas the term previously was for three years. Why this change?

Members of the advisory council may now receive remuneration as well as expenses and allowances as authorized by the governor in council. Previously, members, other than the chairman, could only receive travel and living expenses and a per diem allowance if approved by the minister—not remuneration. I would remind the minister that we are in a period of restraint, and I suggest he will have to answer for this. What is a little more disturbing is that there is no requirement that the advisory council must meet. Previously, they had to meet at least once a year.

Annual reports should be prepared by the council, and the minister should table the same in order that the public might be aware of the areas of disagreement and the consensus which exist within the membership of the council. All this has been secret so far. The minister does with it what he pleases, and we are left in the dark.

I should like to bring some other matters to the attention of the House. In the new bill there is no mention of the continued existence of the various advisory boards which are presently provided for in legislation. Where is the advisory board on adult occupation training? Where is the advisory committee on the co-ordination of rehabilitation services for disabled persons? Where is the advisory committee on the adjustment of immigrants? Where is the advisory board on manpower and immigration research? These are some of the questions I have to ask with respect to the merger.

Now let us turn to the 12-week amendment. The Gill report of 1962 stated that unemployment insurance should basically be a plan to deal with short-term, fractional and cyclical unemployment and that it is not an appropriate program to provide for structural unemployment or for the seasonally unemployed. In this light it recommended that a test of at least 20 full weeks of employment in the preceding year be established as the eligibility requirement, except for new entrants and those who moved in and out of the labour force frequently. The recommendations of this commission reflected the view that the minimum qualifying period should be long enough to establish that insured employment had an important, if not a principal, place in the claimant's manner of earning a living, and enough to establish that he has not entered insured employment solely for the purpose of qualifying for benefit. The objective of greater regional equalization should be met by other than an insurance scheme.

Nevertheless, eight years later the white paper on unemployment insurance, upon which the 1971 unemployment insurance amendments were based, noted that under the scheme envisaged benefits would be paid more on the basis of need than length of time in the work force, and the program in some respects calls upon the good will and responsibility of more fortunate, better placed Canadians toward those who, through lack of education and opportunity, are in less secure occupations.

Criticism came from left, right and centre—from all quarters of the country—with respect to the program brought forward in 1971. People were concerned about the work disincentives implicit in generous benefits. They were concerned about the increased importance of the welfare aspect rather than the insurance objective of the program. They were worried because they felt it was not actuarially sound.

Now, in 1977, the government is tightening up the program in an attempt to bring unemployment insurance more into line with the realistic principles of an insurance program and with the realities of the labour market by extending the qualifying period of eight weeks to twelve weeks. Coupled with the new three-phase benefit structure proposed, the twelve-week amendment will increase the correlation between real labour force attachment and access to protection through the unemployment insurance program. But Canada still enjoys, and will continue to enjoy, the most generous unemployment insurance benefits in the world. Sometimes I wonder if that is a proper position for us.

I am very much aware of the findings of studies regarding the minor employment group. I am aware that 80 per cent have no dependants; that approximately 50 per cent are under the age of 25; that many are secondary workers, working wives and youths living at home who belong to families with incomes in the middle to upper income range. There is a great tendency for these people to exhaust their benefits. Seventy per cent of all eight to eleven weekers find work within six weeks of exhausting their benefits.

I am also very much concerned about the attitude of some provinces with respect to the possible enlargement of their welfare rolls as a result of the amendments we are considering. I am also conscious of the fact that to be unemployed in Ontario, Alberta and Saskatchewan is very different from being unemployed in the Atlantic provinces, since it is much easier to find a job in the former areas than in the latter. Economically developed areas offer greater opportunities to get jobs. In the Atlantic provinces, or the economically depressed areas of the country, opportunities are significantly less. The existence of regional disparity in all its forms calls for flexibility in our approach to this amendment.

Notwithstanding the fact that we accept the 12 weeks, what we seem to have forgotten is that in this day and age, in the new federation, national policies must sooner or later reflect the needs of the several regions of the country. That is what federal-provincial confrontation is all about. The provinces want a new federalism. They want a sensitive government, one which is aware of and concerned about their needs. As I said a moment ago, the existence of regional disparity calls for flexibility, especially at this time, in relation to the amendment before us.

We do not know how successful Canada Works will be. We do not know how successful Young Canada Works will be. The minister said he hoped some 60,000 jobs would be created. At the moment he seems to have made a boo-boo. Right now, as I understand it, the position is this: the forms were not distributed equally throughout the nation—some had them, and others did not. The time allowed for the completion and filing of these forms is unrealistic. The date is February 4. Yet the minister tells us today he is still considering whether the program should be extended. He says some $30 million has been taken up. Has he forgotten we are talking about a $200 million program?

The minister told us two or three days ago that he is still looking at this matter. Perhaps he is looking for a miracle. Something is wrong. Industrial leaders and others fear there will not be sufficient time in which to take advantage of the program. The minister can take this as notice for action.

We do not know how successful this pilot job-creation program will be, so we cannot estimate its impact upon the UIC in terms of savings. We have no idea whether the government is prepared to make job-creation a serious priority. Questions are asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Questions are put to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). He said he does not like to reveal his plans because the opposition will make hay in terms of the unemployment rate—I am paraphrasing what the minister told me. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how seriously that gang is treating this fundamental human problem of unemployment.

I was talking a few minutes ago about regional disparity. We can see no improvement in terms of regional economic expansion. As I understand it from my hon. friend from Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the policy is not getting the results it should be getting in terms of job-creation. To date, we do not know whether there will be an April budget designed to stimulate the economy. The minister likes to play games. He says "before June", or "after March", or "bientôt"—the minister smiles because I use that word. I am expressing a concern which is extremely important to Canadians, particularly to the 700,000 or so who are unemployed, and this number is envisaged as likely to be around 100,000 more in the future. We do not know what is happening to the Anti-Inflation Board. All I know is that the Minister of Finance believes it is harming economic development, and that officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce holds the same view, as does the chairman of the AIB.

So as it stands now, because of this government's insensitive and ineffective performance we feel that regional differences must be recognized not in words but in deeds. Accordingly, because of our concern and because of the lack of response by the government, I now advise the House that my party will move an amendment to clause 17. This is in general what we intend to do. We propose the following amendment:

In high unemployment regions, the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations —lowering from 12 weeks down to a minimum of 8 weeks the number of weeks referred to in subsection 16(1) and 17(2)(a); —defining high unemployment regions, delineating the boundaries thereof and determining residence and eligibility within such region;

—setting a date of termination for any such regulations—

Notwithstanding the fact that we abide by and stick to the 12-week eligibility period, we find that it is time now to consider national policies to meet regional needs. That is what federalism is all about. The present uniformity of policy has created tension and frustration within confederation.

Let me now proceed to another matter which the minister has touched upon, namely, work-sharing. I know that the minister has much expertise with respect to this innovation, but I would like to make a few comments on this matter. For many years statutory unemployment insurance or assistance schemes in France, Germany, Great Britain and Sweden have contained provisions covering payments for partial unemployment. In most countries there is a limit to the time for which partial unemployment benefits are paid.

The average French manufacturing worker now receives roughly half of the regular hourly wage as short-time compensation. Short-time payments are financed partly by the company concerned and partly by the public assistance scheme. The number of workers on short time in France rose from 19,000 in July, 1974, to more than 200,000 a year later.

In Italy, short-time benefits for workers with a permanent job in either industry or construction are paid by an employer financed fund set up originally by collective agreement and subsequently covered by legislative decrees. That is an extremely important point. The benefits now replace approximately 80 per cent of gross earnings for up to 40 hours a week. Short-time benefits in this case replace a greater proportion of earnings than do regular unemployment benefits for industrial workers. A very steep rise in the number of hours compensated followed the widespread use of short-time work in Italy. In the first half of 1975, hours compensated increased fourfold in industry and represented 3 per cent to 4 per cent of total hours worked.

In 1975 Germany increased the maximum duration of short-time benefits from six to twelve months, and to twenty-four months under certain conditions. The scheme is primarily financed through the unemployment insurance system. Short-time payments have played an important role in protecting many workers threatened by dismissal. The number of workers on short-time rose from 292,000 in 1974 to more than 900,000 in May, 1975. In October, more than 700,000 workers were still on short-time work schedules. The practice of work-sharing in these countries has helped to keep unemployment rates lower. However, in the three countries mentioned above the numbers of workers that were on short time went up tremendously after the institution of work-sharing, meaning the cost of unemployment insurance could have been higher than if lay-offs were used.

Is work-sharing an artificial means of lowering the unemployment rate? For example, does it mask the true magnitude of the problem? The minister will have to ask his officials to answer that question in order that we get to the truth of the matter. I am not saying the minister has misled us, but we put the minister on notice that there are significant problems with respect to this work-sharing program. If there is a question of prolonged periods of work-sharing, would some of these workers be better off retrained in a skill in demand?

The major social value to this is that the employees do not lose contact with the work world and are not completely idle. That is of major social value to the employees. According to the Department of Manpower and Immigration, their work-sharing proposals will be designed to help employers retain a full force on a reduced work week, rather than laying off part of their work force. Employees who would otherwise be laid off will receive wage supplements so that their income will be higher than possible UIC benefits, but lower than their normal earnings. This will allow the employee to retain employment and save his or her possible turnover costs such as training new employees or finding new employees. Work-sharing should be implemented on a pilot project basis starting October, 1977.

There are some areas to which we should give further thought. From their description, work-sharing may not be applicable to service industries or continuous process operations. Work-sharing in these areas is better implemented through rotation of employment rather than reduction in the work day, since in industries certain hours must be kept for customer service. Let me spell out some of the advantages of this plan for work-sharing that will accrue to the employer. First, overhead costs may be lowered because of reduced operation of the plant, and so on. Second, work-related costs will fall since for all workers on work-sharing the employer will not have to make UIC contributions. Third, it will save the employer possible turnover costs when production resumes at a normal level.

However, there are disadvantages for the employee, and I want to put these on the record because it is upon these concerns and the answers we get that we will be able to determine whether the type of program the minister envisages will be of maximum benefit to the employee. Much union opposition stems from internal politics—the senior members generally outnumber the junior members—so that in lay-offs based upon seniority they will not be laid off. Why should they sacrifice their full salaries? Second, it may not give them enough useful time to take another part-time job or to make an effective job search. However, they have the advantage of not being completely unemployed and are receiving incomes higher than possible UIC benefits. Third, theoretically, work-sharing can be a substitute for lay-offs, regardless of the extent. However, too large a reduction may result in increased UIC costs or in an income for the worker equal to UIC benefits. There must be some limit set out regarding the use of work-sharing: in some countries, and in some collective agreements, reductions beyond one-third of the work week are considered better dealt with by more appropriate methods.

Beyond a certain level, work-sharing may not be practical for the employer or tolerable for the employee, particularly for extended periods. There may be the possibility of abuse by employers wishing to take advantages of the benefits of work-sharing, even though the program is to be governed by stringent eligibility criteria. One provincial premier has claimed that work-sharing will cost a tremendous amount administratively, as much as double the present cost. We will have to look into that. But the key is flexibility in designing and administering work-sharing so that it can best accommodate the needs of the employer and employee in each case.

I notice that under the bill the governor in council may make regulations. We will have to be advised of the regulations from time to time when this pilot project is brought in, so that we are aware of the problems and of the progress which we hope will be made if the program is acceptable. This may present problems in terms of the extent of the commission's power to impose an agreement on management and labour; that is, it could interfere in the collective bargaining process. The International Union of Electrical Workers has stated that although it is not against work-sharing per se, it is against government-mandated work-sharing. There may be difficulties in enforcing the program. I know, from having discussed this matter with both labour and management, that they oppose work-sharing based in part on a study of the problems encountered in other countries.

Those are my few remarks at this time. Other hon. members on this side of the House will be involved in this debate. In terms of job creation, we now throw the ball back to the minister, because if the things about which I have talked in terms of Young Canada Works, Canada Works, budgets, job-creation, the Anti-Inflation Board, and regional economic expansion programs, do not take place, then what I have done is indicate to the minister that the amendment we will be proposing shows that there is a need for us to be very much concerned about and aware of the problems caused by federal policies across this country.

The minister may not have to accept this amendment, but in the long run the onus of proof is on him. So, subject to the several reservations I have mentioned, we will support the bill at second reading in order to get it into committee where many questions can be asked and answers given, hopefully to make this bill a much better one than it is at present.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and to the spokesman on manpower, immigration and unemployment insurance from the official opposition, I do not think this bill should be discussed in the House of Commons. I think it should be discussed in the criminal courts of Canada, because it is an assault by the government on the unemployed people of this country and the Tory party should be charged under the Criminal Code as an accessory before, during, and after the fact. What I have heard is an absolute travesty of what is right.

It is significant to note that there are no Newfoundland Tories in the House. Newfoundland is an area of very high unemployment. I do not see any Tories from Nova Scotia in the House. I do not see any Liberal members from Newfoundland or from Nova Scotia, and both those areas have very high unemployment levels.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) that there is a member here from Nova Scotia, the member of parliament for South Western Nova.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I apologize to the hon. member. I suppose she must have slipped in from behind the curtains.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Speaker, again on a question of privilege, I think most hon. members know that I have been in the House most of the afternoon, particularly when the minister and the hon. member for the official opposition were speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) that he get back to the provisions of Bill C-27.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I think it is wrong to name any hon. member who is not in the chamber at this time when there are committee meetings and subcommittee meetings. I think the members of the NDP should just stick to the legislation which is before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, it is fairly obvious that there is quite a coalition here this afternoon. It is fine for the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to talk about unemployment, cheaters and people unemployed for a period of between eight and twelve weeks. I suspect that the unemployment rate in Hamilton is very low indeed; it is an area of high employment. I have been with the hon. member in committee when we have discussed bills dealing with changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, in particular Bill C-69, and I have heard the hon. member prod the government for changes to the act along the lines which the minister has brought forward this afternoon. It is all right for those who come from areas of high employment to take a very scathing look at people who are on unemployment insurance, but those people are always in deprived regions of our country. It is easy to be moralistic about those who are collecting and those who have a minor attachment to the work force.

[Mr. Alexander.]

However, for the purpose of my remarks regarding Bill C-27, I think it is convenient for us to look at its proposals in three major parts. The first deals with the so-called reorganization of unemployment and immigration. The second part deals with the substantive changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, and they are those which change the minor attachment period from eight weeks to twelve weeks and deal with the length of time during which benefits are paid to claimants. The third part deals with housekeeping amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

With regard to the first major change proposed in Bill C-27, namely, the unification of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the UIC to form the Canada employment and immigration commission with what the minister calls "a small, supporting department," hon. members will instantly recognize that this attempt is similar to what happened in the past with all the king's horses and all the king's men. However, there is one significant difference. In this case the people who took Humpty-Dumpty apart are exactly the same people who now are going to put him together again.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And he will be scrambled in the process.

Mr. Rodriguez: He will be scrambled in the process. But what was being said in 1965 and 1966, when the government and all its agencies were calling for separation of the national employment service from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, as recommended in the Gill report after an inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Act? As a result of that report, the national employment service was transferred to the Department of Labour in 1965 and to the Department of Manpower and Immigration in 1966.

The separation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission from the national employment service and its corresponding department was called for on the ground that the national employment service was for too long considered and adjunct and rather subordinate to the insurance plan. The effectiveness of the national employment service in terms of a national manpower policy was being hampered by its ties to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The two had to be separated so that the national employment service could occupy a leading position in the efforts to solve unemployment problems.

Without such a separation there would continue to be an overlapping of efforts and an inadequate provision of staff, facilities and services for the national employment service. We know what resulted from the time of separation to the present. We in this party argued against that dismemberment. We opposed the split of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

We said at that time that no government could look at unemployment without looking at employment in tandem: they could not be looked at separately. But it took this government 11 years to discover that. The government proceeded with the split and began building two empires, with two commissions, two advisory councils, two parallel staffs operating in total isolation in Sudbury, for example, as in many cities. The Canada Manpower offices in Sudbury are hidden in downtown Sudbury, while the offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission are isolated in suburbia and are inacessible by public transportation. The results are Towers of Babel, built at exorbitant cost to the taxpayer, that are just a holding action against rising unemployment—and in some cases not even that.

What does the Minister of Manpower and Immigration say now? In the document entitled "Highlights and Information Papers on the Employment and Immigration Reorganization Act" he says:

> This proposal would produce a new organization capable of providing a one stop service to clients and would facilitate a more integrated approach to the planning and administration of employment, unemployment and immigration programs in Canada.

How wonderful, Mr. Speaker! How much is this reorganization to cost taxpayers, and what about all the back-scratching and in-fighting that has already started as these two units are put together again? What effect will that have on the morale of the departments and, ultimately, on the quality of service to the unemployed? We ask these questions because it is very important to consider what is taking place in putting these monoliths together. We can see the problems. Look at what they have put before us. We can see this minister and his bureaucrats wrapping themselves around organizational charts, beautiful flow charts, an experimental unit and pilot projects, to the exclusion of our most pressing problem—unemployment. They have their little plots and charts in the boardrooms, while the unemployed lines grow.

The second aspect of Bill C-27 which I should like to discuss is the substantive changes which affect minor attachments to the work force, a new benefit structure, and something called "developmental use of unemployment insurance funds." There are times, Mr. Speaker, when one wonders if this House is not a cuckoo's nest. This is one such occasion. The minister proposes a change in the minor attachment period from eight to twelve weeks. Since the May, 1976, budget the minister has run around the country throwing out figures here and there to show that people affected by this change are what he calls kids and housewives.

An hon. Member: An insult to the adults of this country.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. His most recent argument is that the eight to eleven week people are cheaters: they take their benefits until they run out, then take a job for another eight weeks and collect again. I am not surprised at the position taken by the hon. member for Hamilton West. He wants to suck and blow at the same time, and represent to the Atlantic provinces and such places that the Tories are concerned about their unemployment plight; but at the same time he has to satisfy the other parts of Canada which think the unemployment insurance scheme is a disincentive to work.

As far back as May 28, 1975, when the hon. member was in committee with me and we were discussing Bill C-69, he raised the question of going from eight weeks to twelve weeks with the then minister of manpower and immigration, who is now President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). The minister replied:

> I think it is a bit of a red herring myself. I think there are other areas that have to be tidied up in the act that are far more significant than that favourite whipping boy the short term work claimant.

I think it is appropriate for the present minister to know that, so that there can be some continuity. In response to the whole question of laziness of minor attachment claimants which the hon. member for Hamilton West raised in committee, here is what the former minister said:

> If you examine where those short term attachment people are, you will find that they coincide with areas of this country that have the more chronic conditions of high unemployment . . . they occur in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to a higher degree because the conditions of disparity there are such, that people get marginal jobs, which are almost coincidental with short term attachment jobs . . . so I think we have to be extremely careful before we tamper with this.

He was referring to the qualifying period. Later in that meeting, in response to the hon. member and his Tory colleagues on the question of the minor attachment claimants being cheaters, the former minister said:

> The incidence of disentitlement or disqualification, as an effect of failure to meet one's obligations under the act, is lower amongst the group with a minor attachment to the work force as their proportion of the total claims load than those with a long term attachment to the work force.

When we consider this particular amendment, we must ask: Who are these minor attachment claimants? Are they the kids and the housewives that the minister has alluded to? Where are they located? Is it Hamilton West, Lambton, or where? The figures for the first three months of 1976, which are the only figures available at this time from the department, show that 62 per cent of all unemployment insurance recipients who had worked eight to eleven weeks are located in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec. To show the importance of short-term work in the Atlantic region, the figures reveal that of all recipients in the first three months of 1976, 21 per cent had been able to get work for only eight to eleven weeks. In contrast, the figure was 11 per cent in Ontario, 10 per cent in the prairies, 14 per cent in British Columbia and 15.6 per cent in Quebec.

To reinforce that even further, on a recent visit to Newfoundland, members of this party learned from the United Allied Fishermen's Union of Newfoundland that last year, of 1,000 fish plant members in three or four communities from St. Anthony to Twillingate, 400 got less than 12 weeks employment, 200 got less than 16 weeks, and the rest less than 20 weeks. Unemployment Insurance Commission officials in St. John's told us that 48 per cent of all claimants in Newfoundland had between eight and nineteen weeks of contributions.

Mr. Speaker, we know where the minor attachment claimants are, and we should now look at who they are. The government estimates that with an unemployment rate of 7 per cent, 330,000 people will be eliminated from receiving the benefits with the increases in the qualifying period to 12 weeks. According to the government's own estimates, the 330,000 will break down as follows: under 20 years of age, 64,000 people; 20 to 24, 96,000; 25 to 34, 74,500; 35 to 44, 41,000; 45 to 54, 35,000; 55 to 64, 19,000; male, 214,000, and female 116,000. To listen to the minister and his advisers— his lackeys—in the department, the minor attachment claimants are kids and housewives. The facts show that it "ain't so", Mr. Speaker. I wish the minister would stop making these allusions across the country, because they are nothing but false rhetoric.

Let me make another interesting point. In June, 1976, a month when many students were on the job market and unemployed in large numbers, only 12.5 per cent of unemployment insurance recipients, according to the minister, were kids under 20 years of age. Adult women made up 41.7 per cent of all recipients, and adult men 45.8 per cent. Also, what about the myth that unemployed women receiving UIC payments really do not need them? That myth has been bandied about by both major parties in this House. They say that so many of these housewives are working for pin-money.

Mr. Orlikow: They are married either to economists or civil servants, if one believes the major parties.

Mr. Rodriguez: Let me deal with the myth which says that unemployed women receiving UIC benefits do not need those benefits. Consider the facts which are supplied by the minister's own department. In August, 1976, Statistics Canada published a study of unemployment in 1973 and 1971. It was found that in both years unemployed wives tended to come from families with low incomes. For example, in 1973 the unemployment rate for all wives was 13.5 per cent; for those from families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,999 the rate was 21.4 per cent, and for those from families with incomes over $15,000 it was 8.6 per cent. As we might suspect, unemployment among low-income women was a real problem. The women in $4,000 to $6,999 group contributed 22 per cent of the family's income when they were working. The women in the $15,000 and up category contributed only 17 per cent. To add salt to the wound, so to speak, Bill C-27, in simplifying the benefit structure to a three-stage arrangement, will cut back the amount of benefits to most recipients. Again, this change will have dire effects on areas of high unemployment.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Hamilton West delineating the amendment his party wishes the House to consider. Unfortunately, either he did not read it or did not take advice on that part of the bill the amendment seeks to change, because his party's proposal is discriminatory as well. Let me give some examples. In Nova Scotia, a person who has worked 20 weeks would get 51 weeks of benefit under the present system; that is to say, he would have contributed for 20 weeks and would collect unemployment benefits for 51 weeks. If Bill C-27 in its present form were to pass, the person who has worked 20 weeks would get one week of benefit for every week of contribution. He would not get extended benefits because he had not worked for 25 weeks or more.

As well, he could get the regional unemployment benefit, which is paid for a maximum of another 20 weeks. That person will get 40 weeks of benefits, not the 50 weeks which the minister indicated. The minister suggested that such a person would lose a maximum of one week's benefit, his benefit time being reduced from 51 weeks to 50 weeks. I suggest it is not so. That would not be an isolated case, since in many areas of this country it is difficult to secure eight weeks of employment, let alone 20 weeks.

Surely the government ought to consider these things with some heart. Do not tell me that you are going to put all these people to work under the Canada Works program. Surely you are not going to put them all on training programs. It is apparent, from the government's mentality, that it prefers to have large numbers of trained or retrained unemployed to large numbers of untrained unemployed. I suspect that it has bastardized the manpower retraining program in order to keep people off the unemployment rolls. Mr. Speaker, these programs will never work unless the government is committed to a philosophy of full employment. Otherwise, you will be training people for non-existent jobs, and by the time you have trained them, what few jobs existed will have disappeared.

If it were not so sad, I would laugh when I tell hon. members that every second person in Sudbury on manpower retraining is retraining to become a stationary engineer. We shall have so many stationary engineers in the Sudbury basin that we shall be able to man every furnace and boiler from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland with a stationary engineer. I suspect that we have trained too many hairdressers in Newfoundland to fill hairdressing jobs. Consequently, they are again retraining all the hairdressers they trained in Newfoundland, only this time they will turn them into heavy machine operators. Once that process has been finished and there are no jobs for the retrained people, the department will put them through the mill again.

The C. D. Howe Institute has had much to say about manpower retraining programs. They say such programs will not be effective unless there are jobs for the retrained. In the absence of jobs, the program becomes another income support program. Surely that is a very expensive and dehumanizing way to provide income for people.

We ought to consider the impact on the economy of this country of this bill. Surely we cannot cut off those 330,000 people who are considered "a minor attachment". Let us remember that the money paid out as unemployment insurance benefits by and large flows into disadvantaged areas of the country. Surely the minister recognizes that the effect of this bill will be to cut off income for certain areas of the country. Let us consider that for a moment. The minister has talked about a saving next year of $110 million in UIC benefits. I notice that certain hon. members have talked about a saving of $110 million. That is a nice, round figure. I suppose people say, "Just look at that tough minister; he is really cracking down on unemployment insurance." But the minister never talks about people's lives which will be affected by this measure. Unfortunately, the unemployed become statistics in the minister's mind because he only talks about the $110 million in savings.

The minister also forgets that that is the government's share. That figure does not take into account the employer and employee contributions which amount to between $275 million and $325 million. That much less will be contributed when the amendments before the House come into effect. We learned last Friday, from the reply to an order paper question set down by the hon. member for Hamilton West, what effect these proposed amendments would have had, in 1976, on the economy of Newfoundland, for example. The loss to the economy of Newfoundland would have been between $24 million and $28 million. Is the minister saying that he will pump as much as $28 million into the economy of Newfoundland through Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs? The loss to Nova Scotia would have been between $9 million and $11 million. Those are the government's own figures. New Brunswick would have lost between $19 million and $22 million, and Quebec between $93 million and $109 million. Mr. Speaker, the economies of those provinces are fragile and taking that much money out of them will have disastrous effects. That is why I suggested earlier in my remarks that the government should be charged with aggravated assault. One has only to note the effect of this measure on the lives of the people.

A recently published study in the United States showed what unemployment did to the unemployed. Among the unemployed the suicide rate was higher than the national average, as was the incidence of crimes of violence. That ought to concern the minister, but obviously it does not. The government's philosophy is this: if you cannot introduce policies which will stimulate the economy, you do the next best thing, cut some people off unemployment insurance. He is a pretty tough minister. With Bill C-69 we saw how tough the government was with the elderly. Now the minister is getting tough with children and housewives, to use his words. It is a pretty brave government that gets tough with old people, children and housewives.

I listened to the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton West. One of the Tory spokesmen on manpower and immigration, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), is reported in an interview in the Montreal Star of January 13, 1977, as having said as follows:

Employment and Immigration

As a result of questions raised in his constituency, Mr. Epp said, he issued a statement that the party will support the increase from eight to 12 weeks before an applicant can qualify for UIC benefits.

"It is my personal view that the 12 weeks should be increased to levels in the former UIC program of 20 weeks. It is evident the changes are necessary and the government should be commended for introducing these changes, which will result in a saving of $110 million per year," he said.

The hon. member is from Manitoba, which has low unemployment because it is run by an NDP government. Here we have a coalition. Suddenly, 12 weeks is not enough; it should be increased to 20. That is the approach taken in this House. If the government were to be replaced by the official opposition there is nothing to indicate there would be any change. All they would do would be to get tougher and increase it to more than 12 weeks.

There is another myth which this government and the Tories propagate, namely, that the government is going broke because it has to support the unemployment insurance fund. What are the facts? In 1975, when unemployment stood at 7.1 per cent, the unemployment insurance account produced a surplus of $321 million after pay-outs of $3.1 billion in benefits. This year, the government has reduced its share of the cost of UIC from 54 per cent to 38 per cent, thanks to Bill C-69. This year, the UIC fund has done so well that the government is suspending an anticipated increase in employer-employee contributions or premiums scheduled for January 1, 1977—a saving of $250 million to contributors.

Mr. Schumacher: Not bad.

Mr. Rodriguez: The reason is that the money is not needed.

Mr. Schumacher: What is bad about that?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member's party and the government ran around this country saying that the unemployment insurance fund was causing the government and the taxpayers to go broke. However, the contributions of those who work and the employers who employ them have paid for the program.

Mr. Friesen: It pays for itself?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. What about the developmental use of UIC fund? Here are some really dynamic programs. Work-sharing, that is innovative. I bet some high-paid economic or sociologist in Manpower came up with that. I wonder if the commission discussed this program. I am sure at some point the minister will respond. I would like him to tell us whether the commission discussed this work-sharing proposal.

Mr. Orlikow: Or the advisory committee.

Mr. Rodriguez: It seems to be a half-baked idea that was thrown together. Underemployment is not the solution to long-term, aggravated unemployment. It is fairly obvious that the government's thrust for an employment policy is work-sharing. That will not handle all the problems. Incidentally, it smacks of what used to be called "on the job training". We all know how Manpower and the taxpayers of this country were ripped off by unscrupulous employers in that program. This program is open to abuse.

The job-creation program is something else. That is really creative! Voluntary work on federal government work projects will be available to UIC recipients. They do not have to take that work. It will be on a voluntary basis. Can you imagine any worth-while project being completed? If a person does not want to work on a certain day, he does not have to do so. He may not want to work for two or three days. This is absolutely crazy. Policing will be required. If a recipient of unemployment insurance goes on a job, he is not available to look for work. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, he has to be available, capable of working and looking for work. If a person is on a voluntary job, somebody will have to say that he is looking for work. But is he? A whole bureaucracy will be required to police these people. The minister knows it will not work. He has just thrown this together to give the impression that the bureaucrats in the Manpower offices are doing some creative thinking.

What about training? From 1970-71 to 1974-75 the manpower department spent up to 75 per cent of its annual budget on manpower training. How much more can they spend on manpower training—100 per cent? Where has this gotten us? As I said before, we are recycling hairdressers in Newfoundland into heavy machine operators. If this government takes a hard, close look at the regions of this country, it will see there are programs that can be carried on effectively.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HEIGHT OF RIGHT-OF-WAY FENCING

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser) moved that Bill C-217, to amend the Railway Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this bill which has certainly been a long time coming. I think I first introduced it some four years ago and I am happy that finally it has percolated through the parliamentary process to this stage, and I hope it will make some further progress. I should like to point out to the House its importance to the safety of life and limb along the roughly 50,000 miles of railroad rights-of-way that criss-cross this country, often bisecting or otherwise cutting through communities. I also want to say at the outset that I firmly believe such a piece of legislation is long overdue.

First of all, the sole purpose of this bill is to amend the Railway Act to provide a better standard, a modern standard, shall we say, of fencing for railroad rights-of-way in the residential areas of Canada's urban municipalities. At present the Railway Act calls for fences of a minimum height of four feet six inches on each side of the railway. Today, as it has been practically since day one of railroading in Canada, that is the only requirement of railway fencing along the right of way. This may have been appropriate as a fencing standard in 1891, or even 50 years ago when railway fences were designed to keep cattle from straying on to the tracks. But it is far from adequate in the 1970s for the proper protection of human life and limb in built-up residential areas across the nation. I am thinking particularly of children. In one location that I know of, two children have been killed by trains in recent years, one in 1967 and another in 1972, because fences were easily climbed, broken down or cut through on railway properties.

We all know as parents and, in some cases, as grandparents, that kids will be kids. They wander. They take short-cuts. They explore. They climb fences and cross barriers simply because they are there, because such obstacles stand between the explorer and the explorable, between the fascinated and the forbidden. From the child's point of view, a fence hinders adventure. But adventures in railway properties too often become shocking misadventures, if not tragedies, for the curious or thrill-seeking child, or even for the youngster trying to find a short-cut to and from school.

Some of us in this House may recall what fun it was leaping from boxcar to boxcar, running across the roof-walks, hanging from the grab-irons, fiddling with immovable couplings or rummaging in and among empty, open cars. But those of us who may be able to remember the fun of fooling around in a freight yard may also have some bad memories of injuries to ourselves or to our playmates.

There is danger enough among rolling-stock that is not rolling, amidst monstrous steel cars that stand stock still, rusting in the rain, roasting in summer sunshine. But the real danger is in poorly fenced track, in places where the rolling-stock is rolling, where diesels and switchers move suddenly and without warning, dangers that only the trained, experienced railroad worker can recognize and react to in safety. Where the trains move near homes and schools, parks or playgrounds, there is sudden and swift tragedy lurking for the unwary, for the innocent child who may not even realize he is trespassing, let alone flirting with death or dismemberment.

Today there are so many more built-up areas near long-standing railroad tracks than there were when the section of the Railway Act which my bill would amend was drafted and legislated. The concern then, 85 years ago, was for the safety of cattle. Today we are, hopefully, more concerned about the safety of people and, most of all, I would hope, the safety of children. Today there are so many more children and others apt to stray on to railroad property because it is so easy to do, with only 4½ feet of fencing standing in their way—if in fact it is standing there at all and not falling down, or simply non-existent.

A mere 54 inches stands between safety and danger, at best. Fifty-four inches of wire fencing is nothing to any individual who is curious enough, determined enough, or even stupid enough to climb on to a railway right-of-way, for whatever purpose. But you put up a chain-link fence at least six feet in height, and there you have a formidable obstacle, a solid safety factor, one which could well save many an adventurous child the pain and the agony of being crushed between the steel wheels of trains on the move—and some trains move at a pretty fair clip, even through residential areas.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the Railway Act which Bill C-217 proposes is this:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

"1. Paragraph 214(1)(a) of the Railway Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(a) fences of a minimum height of four feet six inches on each side of the railway and in residential areas of incorporated municipalities having a population in excess of 3,000, such fences shall be of a chain link construction with a minimum height of six feet, the maintenance and quarterly inspection of which is the sole responsibility of the company."

Let me repeat what I said in the beginning, what I have said time and time again since I began trying to get action on this matter four years ago. We are concerned here with saving lives, young lives, not of cattle but of human beings. We should be concerned also that this matter has gone virtually without major public support for far too long and lives have been lost in the meantime. Lives have been lost that need not have been in jeopardy at all. I believe this is a worth-while amendment, otherwise I would not have brought it to the attention of the House and imposed upon this chamber's time. I believe this amendment to the Railway Act is a good move, a most sensible move in terms of public safety.

While it is always nice to have support for one's proposal, I hope I do not get too much support that will cause the hour to expire before some action is taken on what I consider to be a very reasonable suggestion, one that should receive the serious consideration of the legislative process and not just fall to the bottom of the list when the hour today expires.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to have the question put, and I certainly will not speak for very long. I was impressed with the hon. member's remarks in introducing this amendment; it is one with which I heartily agree. I have been very concerned, as I am sure have other members, about areas where there are railway crossings. I think particularly of one area in Ottawa, not far from here, where the railway passes through a very heavily built-up part of town, and they are still using the old type of fence, actually the same old fence. The fence was probably put up 30 to 40 years ago and there does not seem to be any desire to maintain or to meet changing requirements.

Originally, the law requiring railways to provide fencing on both sides of the railway track stemmed from a very simple necessity: animals such as cows, wild animals and domestic, would run on the track, and I presume fencing was originally put up by the railway as a protection against liability. I should like to add that in my opinion, in addition to proper fencing, particularly in built-up areas, an immediate attempt should be made to provide barriers, lights or other kinds of marking, rather than a signpost back 15 to 20 feet from the railway track, especially where a railway track crosses a major highway. This is true in my area where there have been a number of fatalities at a crossing which was unmarked or was very poorly marked and there was a very heavy amount of traffic crossing the track. Your Honour had the opportunity at being at the other end of the problem, as it were, behind the throttle, and I am sure you will agree with me that the locomotive cannot compete with an automobile when it comes to yielding the right of way.

The automobile can stop in a short distance. Trains, especially heavily laden trains, cannot do so in most cases. Many fatalities at railway crossings might have been prevented had the necessary action been taken. We pass legislation making the construction of overpasses the subject of negotiations in communities over years and years. I do not think there has ever been an overpass or an underpass built except in cases where a number of fatalities had already taken place at that point.

The CN and the CP run through my area for 200 or 300 miles, but the railway which I am most familiar with is the Ontario Northland which travels the full length of my constituency. Its solution has been to close off the crossings. However, in consideration of this proposal it is interesting to note that when they close off these crossings all they do is put up a couple of posts in the middle of the road: they put up a couple of planks and leave the road there. Usually the young people drive through before they are convinced the road is closed. Never does the railway put up a fence which really prevents youths from using the road as a crossing point.

It has been the practice of Ontario Northland to close crossings when there is difficulty. If an accident occurs, the result will likely be that they close the road, with the result that the neighbouring township has to build considerably more road to provide a crossing somewhere else. But the railway does not put up an installation of the type the hon. member suggests. Had this been done, at least 15 lives would have been saved in my area alone in the last four or five years. If this is representative of the situation in other ridings across the country, I strongly urge that an amendment of the type suggested be passed.

There must be a major rethinking of our legislation if we are to see the type of link fence comparable to the fencing we find in cities, for example, around hydro facilities or anything else which presents a major danger to young adults. The railway companies should be pressed to consider the installation of such fencing in all areas. It would not be the kind of fencing railroads are now required to provide. It would be a new type which would be child proof, which could not be scaled and which would largely eliminate the danger to which the hon. member has called attention.

I have in mind the safety of children whose parents live in suburbs close to a railway where trains often pass at considerable speed. Perhaps the danger is greatest in those areas where not many trains pass during the day and where, as a result, parents are often not as diligent as they otherwise might be in supervising their children.

It is possible that the provision of adequate restraining fences would call for municipal money as well as for railway money. Nevertheless, I think the idea is well worth considering. I hope the House approves this amendment so that the railways will begin taking this problem seriously and do something about it.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must congratulate the mover of this bill concerning railway fencing. I think this question has not been dealt with for a long time because, according to the law, only 4 foot 6 inch fences are needed. That would be all right in rural areas because, along the tracks in my region which is 90 per cent rural, fences are generally well maintained, even though it is especially difficult for the CN during winter to keep those fences in top shape as snowdrifts have knocked them down over many miles. In springtime the railways companies have to spend much money to put up again their fences. But I do not believe it would be necessary to require that those fences be 6 or 7 feet out in the country.

This bill deals with fencing in urban areas. Here again, I would favour 4 foot fences even though the bill specifies 8 feet 6 inches but that depends on the type of fences, Mr. Speaker. If the bill refers to existing fences, those which are put up according to the law, they will be proposed in the cities, but they will not represent an obstacle for children. So we must discuss the type of fences and I think that should be done by the Committee on Transport and Communications.

I think that what is needed is at least an 8 foot barbed-wire topped steel fence because the usual small fence with large squares would not prevent children from going through and playing on the railroads.

I think that we must inform the people. The best fence is child education. We must teach the children that the railway is a public road, just like the highway. We very rarely see children playing on a regional road. The previous speaker, the spokesman for the Progressive Conservatives, said earlier that the lack of fences causes fatalities, but let us not forget that fatalities can also be caused by cars when children are not careful enough and play on the roadway. But this is no excuse for the railroads.

If we want to talk about the quality of fences to be put in cities, let us talk about fences that will not completely disfigure a city.

Railway crossings ouside and even within city limits where there are no signals are another problem which should be submitted to the Committee on Transport and Communications. I have already talked in the House about these railway crossings where there are no signals. It is a fact that the signals exist on interprovincial roads, but in rural centres, there are many secondary roads with little or no signals.

In my opinion, this is a bill aimed at protecting everyone. This matter should be submitted to the committee. But to come back to the bill, as concerns fences to be put up in cities along railways tracks, I believe this is a very important matter since we cannot take too many precautions to protect the life of children, and even if the only result of the bill was to draw the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to the matter for it to be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications where it can at least be studied so that something can finally be done about a type of fence which would be appropriate for the cities, the hon. member will not have lost his time and we could give the population of our regions a much better safety device to protect the children.

[English]

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to join in this debate this afternoon on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) in which he points out another area of the social responsibility of the railways to the Canadian public. In effect, he is touching on an over-all area which is of interest to me, not by design but more by accident owing to circumstances in the area I represent in metropolitan Toronto.

Here we are talking about a question of the adequacy of safety factors that are designed to prevent people from having access to the railroad tracks, which is quite desirable. In another instance, when we talk grade level separations, as referred to by one of the other speakers this afternoon, we are referring to the need for adequate safety factors in order to prevent collisions between trains and vehicular traffic. In both cases I am personally not at all convinced that the railroads, the municipalities or even the provincial or federal government have given sufficient attention over the years to the hazards that exist.

I was most impressed this summer in England, on an automobile trip that took us perhaps not more than 250 or 300 miles from north of London down to the south coast, to notice that in not one case did we traverse a railroad track at a level crossing. In other words, every single crossing was graded. I mentioned this in the course of a conversation with my companion who has lived in England all his life and I asked him how this came to be. He said it was really simple, because in that country when the railway came into existence many of the towns and the people populating them were there, so the railways had to conform to their wishes. In other words, they were bringing something new to the country and they had to conform with regard to safety factors such as those relating to fencing, level crossings, etc.

We see the exact opposite on this continent and certainly in this country where the railways in many cases constituted the first signs of any major spurt of civilization to appear in many areas. So the railways tended to have things going their own way. Unfortunately, this may have been satisfactory in the latter part of the nineteenth century and in the first part of the twentieth century, but is not satisfactory today and I do not think the Canadian public are prepared to accept this situation in the future.

I noted, in the few minutes that were available to me prior to speaking this afternoon, that the municipality of metropolitan Toronto has appealed to the federal government regarding the matter of adequacy or inadequacy of fencing. I believe that resolutions came forward as recently as 1974 in which metro Toronto was asking for a review of the situation.

I understand that the costs involved in what the hon. member for Palliser has suggested would be exorbitant. Nevertheless, it seems to me that the problem is there and that it must be addressed. I would like to think it will be addressed in conjunction with this over-all question of the adequacy of safety factors in urban areas. At present I am working with the CTC on this very problem. We cannot build quickly grade separations in Scarborough. This is, incidentally the responsibility of municipalities with substantial federal financial backing. We cannot quickly build the 35 grade separations that are needed over the foreseeable future, because 16 of the most urgent alone will cost $69 million. Therefore, we are forced to look immediately at the whole question of the adequacy of existing safety factors. I suggest that this safety factor at level crossings is just another extension, or vice versa, of safety factors that the hon. member is talking about in relation to people having undesirable access to the tracks.

There is another matter in relation to the responsibility of the railways in this country which should be mentioned, and that is the basic need for the railway companies—which, after all, are nothing more or less than a form of public utility—to respond more adequately to the concerns of people. Particularly in our modern urban situation the kind of responses they might have given even 20 years ago are not acceptable today.

When I was speaking in the debate on my own bill, C-20, on the need to have the railways go before the CTC for approval of additional marshalling yards, I used the example of an individual in an urban area who must go to his municipality for approval to build even the most minor structure in his backyard. I think I can bring out the hon. member's point today with the analogy of the home owner who wishes to build a swimming pool. He has an obligation, in most urban areas today, to fence that swimming pool adequately. In fact, in some urban areas the requirements are much greater than in others. This is done for one reason only, simply to ensure that access to that swimming pool will not be obtained by children or others who may be wandering around.

I do not know what the size of the fence should be, nor what its quality should be in order to preclude undesirable access to railway tracks, but I have a great deal of sympathy for the suggestion that we at least re-examine the responsibility of the railroads in this entire area.

I receive submissions from my municipality about the manner in which rights-of-way are maintained; about the fact that weeds are allowed to grow and in many cases the area in general is kept in an undesirable state. So I certainly support the proposal put forward by the hon. member. I presume it would ultimately require the Canadian Transport Commission to at least assess the adequacy of fencing in urban areas. I do not personally know whether it is now adequate or inadequate but I am prepared to believe the review made by the hon. member.

Another area of safety that should be considered is that involved in bridges. There have been examples of children being caught on these bridges. In our own area last year two youngsters were so caught and had no chance to escape and were killed. I believe that one fell off and was drowned in the river beneath. Concerns in this area are extremely important.

• (1730)

I wonder if the government should not insist that the Canadian Transport Commission, which, after all, is the regulatory body charged by the government with the responsibility of overseeing railroad operations, take very seriously the submissions which are made to it by members of the public and by members of parliament who are after all acting on behalf of members of the public. In my view, the CTC should consider these areas of major concern. The commission should consider the adequacy of safety at level crossings which remain unprotected, and probably will continue to remain unprotected well into the future. It should also consider the question of speeds of trains through urban areas. That is another important factor. The manual may indicate that a train can proceed at 50 miles an hour through an urban area; that may have been fine 30 years ago, but it might not be fine today. Today there may be tens of thousands of people living in this same area and 50 miles an hour may simply be too fast a speed.

Warning devices in train cabs may be needed to help detect any vehicles that may be caught at level crossings. Perhaps more adequate fencing is needed to prevent undesirable access to tracks. It seems to me that there must be an over-all change in the attitude of the railroads toward their social responsibility. I quite agree that the railroads must perform specific services. They must transport people and goods efficiently and quickly. There is no question about that, but I think they also have social and community responsibilities just as hydro companies do with their electricity distribution; just as natural gas companies do with their natural gas pipelines; and oil companies with their related pipelines. The railroads have a responsibility to ensure that in the course of providing their services they indeed bear in mind concerns about noise pollution and these other very real concerns, whether they be with regard to urban areas or other areas, but particularly in the case of heavily populated urban areas where so many of the current problems prevail.

I have not had an opportunity in the very short time available to me to examine all the ramifications of what the hon. member has in mind, but I can easily and wholeheartedly support the concept of the need for a review by the Canadian Transport Commission at this time of the adequacy of the fencing situation, together with the adequacy of other safety factors relating to the over-all operation of railroads in our urban areas.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my colleagues who have already taken part in this debate in commending my good friend, the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) for introducing Bill C-217. I know that the aim of the hon. member in introducing this bill is the security of people—and animals, probably—and, of course, the security of travellers. The bill calls for a fence of eight feet in municipalities—

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been a mistake in translation. The bill calls for six feet, but the French version of the bill reads eight feet six inches. I do not know how that happened. I am sorry that I did not notice it earlier, but my intention was to have fencing of six feet in built-up areas.

Mr. Dupras: I am glad that the distinguished hon. member for Palliser corrected me. I have, of course, the French version, and it in fact says eight feet six inches. I suppose the hon. member means a fence with a minimum height of six feet. I read somewhere that fences are to be climbed, and starting from this point of view—

Fences are there to be climbed. I wonder what would be the reaction of the public in general, youngsters who are tempted to jump the current 4 foot six inch high fence provided for by the agreement between the Department of Transport and the municipalities. Section 214 which has been quoted reflects the existing agreement with municipalities wherein there is provision for joint programs with municipalities for the construction of fences.

The security of passengers as well as that of children is of the utmost importance, Mr. Speaker. I believe that my hon. colleague is indeed endeavouring to bring about such a protection. However, as my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) has indicated, I hesitate to think of the cost of replacing the 4 foot six inch fence by a security system providing for a maximum height of six feet since there are indeed places where it would be necessary to raise the height of the fences. On the other hand, in certain other places, it would not perhaps be as necessary for railway companies to build fences if we consider the terrain, whether it is hilly, very isolated, without any houses in a ten mile radius, so perhaps it is less urgent for railway companies to build fences.

What we may have neglected in this matter is instructing our children on the respect of other people's property. They must learn that by trespassing on other people's property, it is as if they were in fact robbing their neighbour and it would perhaps not be necessary to introduce such restrictive measures if schools or families imposed a stricter discipline to prevent youngsters from jumping fences and trespassing on private property.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one railway line, Canadian Pacific, linking Montréal to the higher Laurentians, at Mont Laurier, cutting through my region and there exists already, as I have already indicated, an agreement with the municipalities it crosses, therefore I do not think it necessary to build a six foot fence along that line all the way from Montreal to Mont Laurier.

Perhaps when we give a new structure to our public transport system, it might be necessary to find a new design for our railway tracks, especially on the section between Montreal and Mont-Laurier, and to use lighter and faster equipment, with new faster acceleration and deceleration devices. This would reduce the risk of accidents and in case of an animal, an adult or a child crossing the railway track, lighter equipment and a safer deceleration system would allow a far better control of the engine.

But I think it might not be worth investing in equipment which is not that necessary. A few years ago someone introduced a bill to relocate railway tracks within municipal jurisdictions. This relocation program might then give railway companies the opportunity to build new, safer and stronger fences which would make any trespassing much more difficult.

But outside this program, I do not see the interest for railways companies to assume an additional expense which as someone put it earlier with the number of railway tracks existing in our country could represent several million dollars. This would be an excessively expensive item and I wonder if we should not wait until this relocation program is applied and take the opportunity then to repair or rebuild new fences.

These are the arguments I wanted to put forward, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) raised a question relating to Bill C-217, namely whether the improvement of fences along railroad tracks would reduce the number of accidents recorded each year. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for his excellent initiative and I also want to take this opportunity to thank and congratulate all hon. members who participated in this important debate relating to the bill that the hon. member introduced.

All hon. members have very commendable intentions, and once again let me say that this is especially the case of the hon. member for Palliser. They show that the members are deeply concerned with the matter protecting not only adults but also and especially children. On the other hand, many of the municipalities that the members who took part in the debate mentioned have built miles of fences, especially at trouble spots, in collaboration with railway companies. In some cases however, the railway companies only paid for the usual fences necessary for the protection of the public and the municipalities concerned paid for the difference. In other words, this means that the companies are willing to go along with the municipalities if they want to build such fences.

It is difficult however for the railway companies to pay the total cost of such fences, especially when you know the huge amount of money necessary for such a measure. On the other hand, this situation could create a dangerous precedent if it were applied in various areas of the country.

I think that the systematic building of fences along the railroad tracks is not possible at the present time for the following reasons.

• (1740)

[English]

The basic question on the proposed Bill C-217 is whether improved fencing would in fact provide a higher level of protection against pedestrian accidents on railway property. At a number of urban locations throughout Canada arrangements between railway companies and municipalities have led to the installation of chain link fencing of the type suggested. The experience in these locations has indicated that while the fences serve the purpose of warning that danger exists, fences alone have not prevented trespassing. Fencing is open at each level crossing and trespassers have ample access at these points to railway rights of way. To some degree, high chain link fencing tends to deflect trespassers along rights of way, as opposed to the direct crossing pattern which exists under the less restrictive type of fencing.

It is not clear that fences, whatever their height, will successfully prevent trespassing on railway rights of way or significantly reduce the potential for injury to pedestrians. Most of the pedestrians killed on railway rights of way by trains are adults who are, of course, fully aware of the dangers of trespassing on railway property. For example, in 1972, 66 pedestrians were killed by trains, and 56 of these were over 16 years of age.

Let me question the very principle of fences along railway lines, as opposed to other modes. Nobody ever thought of installing fences along highways. The danger however is so much greater for a pedestrian to be hit by an automobile than a train. Apparently the public are more aware of the inherent dangers in highway traffic.

The main concern of citizen groups urging for the installation of higher fences along railways is for the safety of children, who do not always realize the danger in crossing tracks. The railroad industry already suggested that children in primary schools should be provided with basic instruction to make them aware of that kind of danger. I believe the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) already indicated this in his speech. Certainly such a policy would be much more effective than this proposal.

It must be noted Canada's two main railroads have already launched school programs to that effect. The federal government are perfectly aware of this problem, and the Canadian Transport Commission conducts regular reviews in areas where it feels there is room for improvement. We have seen a number of cases where the CTC indicated to the railroad companies that extra protection should be provided. Generally speaking the latter have implemented the commission's recommendations.

In Canada's metropolitan areas we have a very high density and length of trackage, and the cost of installing fences along the roadway would be tremendous. Referring to studies that were conducted in 1972, the installation of six-foot high chain link fences in every municipality over 30,000 population would cost upwards of $100 million. Moreover, the annual maintenance cost of such fences would be so much higher than the current cost of maintaining existing fences. In 1970, the capital outlay required for the installation of metal fences in the city of Toronto alone was estimated at $1,600,000 for a total length of 270,000 feet, and this involved the most dangerous areas only. Assuming this would have to be done in the metropolitan area, the cost would rise tenfold. These studies go back to 1970.

At present the cost would be much higher. It would be extremely difficult to justify this kind of expenditure particularly when we know that safety would not be improved much as a result. And even then in terms of figures let me continue to illustrate the ineffectiveness of a metal fence along a railway track.

Let us now take an example in the city of Ottawa. The Canadian National owns about five miles of fencing starting at the grade separation on Riverside Drive and extending to a level crossing also located on Riverside Drive. That fence was installed by the National Capital Commission and is being maintained now by the Canadian National. There are at present some twenty holes in the fence that were made not by planners but by people wishing to cross the tracks at a place convenient to them.

The job of repairing holes in that fence is given to specialists and is not being done by the maintenance crews of the CN. Repairs to that fence alone cost more than $100 a week, that is about $5,000 a year. The Canadian National also noticed that as soon as a fence is repaired it is nearly automatically reopened the day after.

In addition to the points I already mentioned applications are made from time to time to improve or put up fencing along railway tracks but there is still little evidence that a fence would improve safety or reduce accidents. Finally, the public always manages to get around the difficulties and rather than using the free crossings designed for that purpose it prefers to go over or through fences normally put up to protect them.

The federal government favours improvements in this area. It is doing everything it can to protect the lives of citizens. Hence it is very sympathetic to the ideas and the philosophy expressed in Bill C-217. Unfortunately it does not seem obvious that this bill would actually help improve safety or represent the best investment of public funds to ensure public safety. The government is currently reviewing in its entirety this matter of safety in railway operations. Hopefully that in-depth work will lead to very specific recommendations, as was mentioned by those hon. members who participated in this debate and made specific recommendations concerning the steps to be taken by the government in cooperation with municipalities and the railway industry which, as hon. members mentioned, also has responsibilities in this respect. Following those few remarks concerning the proven financial impracticability and ineffectiveness of such a broad bill the government must regretfully reject it. However, as I mentioned the federal government is now reviewing the whole matter of public safety along railway tracks both in urban areas as well as in certain other places in this country. I think the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) also touched on this point. We hope then to be in a position to propose a legislation along those lines in the months to come.

Hon. members have also emphasized the necessity for all municipalities to co-operate with the railway industry, and I feel they are now ready to work hand in hand with the government on this matter.

I should like to mention, however—

• (1750)

[English]

In these cases the railway restricted its expenditure to the amount it would expend in the case of normal fencing, and the balance of the cost has been assumed by the city or town in question. In other words the railways are willing to co-operate with the municipalities if it is their wish to install chain link fencing. The railways do not, however, wish to absorb the total cost of chain link fencing, particularly in the face of the large expenditures which could be involved if a precedent were to be set.

All hon. members will doubtless agree that if the federal government were to support such a project, in view of the ineffectiveness of security measures, we could have much more profitable investments.

On behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) I want to thank all those who have taken part in this debate for their positive suggestions. I wish especially to commend the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) who has brought up this important issue and who wishes to amend the Railway Act by adding, and I quote:

"(a) fences of a minimum height of four feet six inches on each side of the railway and in residential areas of incorporated municipalities having a population in excess of 3,000, such fences shall be of a chain-link construction with a minimum height of six feet, the maintenance and quarterly inspection of which is the sole responsibility of the company".

May I assure the hon. member that this bill is highly considered by the authorities of the Department of Transport and particularly by the minister. We can assure him that the government is extremely favourable to this concern with protecting public life adequately, and we suggest to the hon. member, as well as to those who took part in the debate this afternoon, that they continue being concerned about the importance of protecting public interest by ensuring public safety through various means.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the views expressed here by all hon. members and by the Department of Transport reflect the wishes of the whole population. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is six o'clock. Should I continue my remarks?

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: Surely you are not going to talk this measure out, Stollery, are you?

Mr. Stollery: —this is a most important bill. I was looking through some references concerning the height of fences which ought to be erected in municipalities. I think it is an interesting proposal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is no way to mend fences.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, my friends opposite think I am taking this opportunity to talk this bill out.

An hon. Member: Ho hum!

Mr. Stollery: That is not true.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is trying to mend his fences.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, when we broke off at five o'clock this afternoon I was commenting on the so-called development use of unemployment insurance funds as proposed in Bill C-27.

One of the so-called uses of unemployment insurance funds is for training programs. The Conference Board in a recent report noted that we had enough training programs and what we lacked was jobs. This is echoed by Ms. Barbara Goldman of the C. D. Howe Research Institute in a recent study entitled "New Directions for Manpower Policy". Canada gets a real payoff from training only if the trainees can find steady employment. Otherwise training is simply another form of providing income support.

In the same article, Ms. Goldman quotes Seymour Brandwein, the Director of the Office of Manpower Program Evaluation, Employment and Training Administration of the United States Department of Labour, as saying in 1976, and I quote:

> To the extent that economic growth generates new jobs, training programs should be a tool for developing the skills and performance needed to sustain such growth and for equipping workers of limited skills or other background to fulfil the opportunities offered by such new jobs.

Obviously putting more money into training programs will not eliminate unemployment. The economics of those regions I mentioned earlier will not even keep up with those coming into the work market. When in St. John's, Newfoundland, we learned from the Canada Manpower Centre and UIC officials that, just to keep the Newfoundland unemployment at 13 per cent, the economy of Newfoundland would have to produce 10,000 jobs, yet last year only 5,200 jobs were created.

We learned on that trip to Newfoundland and Cape Breton that there are many specific proposals regarding development of long-term economic opportunities, but they offer no far-sighted decision making by the federal government in collaboration with the provinces concerned. Such things as secondary harbours, establishment of marine bases for air and sea rescue, improvement and initiation of transport facilities, primary resource development to final stage, and shipbuilding with specific attention to fishing trawlers and a Canadian commercial fleet, require planning and a commitment to full employment as a basic right of each and every Canadian.

One other housekeeping amendment in Bill C-27 which ought to interest us is the pregnancy benefits amendment. Since clauses 34 and 38 open up this question, an amendment ought to be made which would provide adoptive mothers with the same right to unemployment insurance benefits as is allowed to one who has given birth naturally. This is a discriminatory clause which presently exists and ought to be changed now.

One other matter I would like to deal with is the question of appeals. At the present time there is an automatic right to appeal to an umpire by any worker covered by an organization of workers, a trade union. But a non-represented worker must seek the approval of the chairman of the board of referees. If he has a unanimous decision against him, he may get special approval to go to the umpire. I suspect this is watering down the right of organized workers. Now they all have to get approval of the umpire under certain conditions to have the appeal heard before the umpire. It would be much better if we gave all those who have appealed to the board of referees and who have had a unanimous decision against them an automatic right of appeal to the umpire.

In conclusion, we as a party cannot support those clauses in Bill C-27 that so obviously discriminate against the helpless of our country who have absolutely no influence with regard to public and private economic decision making. We will introduce amendments to this bill in committee and at report stage which we consider to be fair, and which we feel will help to alleviate financial hardship for those who are unemployed at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that Bill C-27 has been introduced. I have long had contact with the unemployed in my area, on an average of 50 to 60 cases a week. All the problems arise from the fact that the act is worded in a style which the unemployed workers have much trouble understanding because it is too complex. Unfortunately, I note that the bill under consideration does not contain any clarification. There is nothing in this piece of legislation which can contribute to lessen or prevent complications and difficulties caused by an unemployment situation where the workers find it much too difficult to get what they are entitled to. Was the Unemployment Insurance Act established in 1940 to help the unemployed or to make them suffer?

I can very easily remember our Liberal friends when they seemed very happy that the leader of the government had solved the unemployment problems by introducing a piece of legislation. But since then, the technocrats, the public servants, the people who are responsible for the administration of the act have tried to make it more complex instead of simplifying it, with the results that we all know. And you need have no fear, Mr. Speaker, I shall provide proof of what I say.

Yesterday, I asked a question and the minister did not accept its premise, but tonight, the minister is giving me the opportunity to provide him with all the proof that he may want. Moreover, I could show him at any time in my office hundreds of files which show that because of bad legislation some public servants—I am not saying all public servants because some of them mean well—have to rack their brains to provide the unemployed with answers that make no sense and which are illogical. So, we are going to discuss this legislation. I hope that all hon. members will truly examine this act to make the required changes or else the unemployed will continue to live in poverty since they have no rights. We have established their rights but at the same time we shall write some restrictions in the law that will prevent them from taking advantage of these rights. We must consider unemployment as a social problem arising from an economic and financial system which is all too often at odds with the aspirations of an ever increasing number of Canadians who get discouraged after many unsuccessful months of job hunting. Try to get a job! Orders were given by Unemployment Insurance Commission officials to the effect that applicants must go out and look for a job in an area where there is none or almost none available.

Here is a letter from an unemployed worker in my riding which says that an official whom he had asked for information gave him the following answer: "We must cut down the number of unemployed by about 33 per cent. I could not care less whether it is you or someone else". Something is definitely wrong. I am aware that the government, realizing that the unemployment rate is rising, is using all the means at its disposal. Then, as a jobless applicant is disqualified for a variety of reasons which are all equally groundless, from receiving the benefits to which he should be entitled, he has no other choice than become a welfare recipient because no job is available. Why not try to enforce the law and help those who are in trouble with this topsy-turvy system.

It is true that work is not the final purpose in life but it is a means that a very high percentage of Canadians, young and not so young, would like to use to plan for their future and earn a living honourably. This is an era of contrasts. Thousands of persons are trying to make money by working; on the other hand, thousands of workers who have or had a job are picketting the streets to show that they are on strike. Man's creative genius has succeeded in improving communications but there are still many divisions. This is an age of technology and famine in the world. Unemployment Insurance payments are computerized while the unemployed go on waiting indefinitely. We rely on electronics but people live in relentless anxiety. How many times do we hear these questions: Where will this system lead us? Must one conclude that man is unable to control its development? Everybody will admit that it is not due to a lack of production. Agricultural producers are penalized because they overproduced. Thousands of unemployed would be happy to work so that production may become useful and be greatly increased. It seems that economic theories that had some value in heroic times when frontiers were opened prove obsolete in an urbanized society. We must now decide on the basis of the changes that are taking place.

Our two governments, that of the just society and that of the 100,000 jobs, have failed to solve the unemployment problem. It is easy to prove since we have tried at various stages to improve an overly sophisticated Unemployment Insurance Act which brings about many problems to the thousands who are constantly anxious about the future. Future evidence of the inconsistency: the unemployed are compelled to apply for many jobs in order to comply with the act and regulations, even though it is or should be common knowledge that it is impossible to find something which does not exist. There is no need to have gone to university in order to understand that. Hundreds of officials in manpower centres, who are well paid besides, are looking for jobs all year long. In spite of all the means they have to communicate, addresses of employers, telephone numbers, there is an important number of unemployed in their files. Generally, these people are well inclined but I do not think I am wrong if I add that nine times out of ten they have to tell the unemployed who want to get a job: "Sorry, but we do not have anything to offer you at this time".

When an unemployed person manages to get a job somewhere, quite often several miles away from home, and that, after making sure that this will be a permanent job, he files an application to get the benefits which could arise from a more flexible and better adapted manpower mobility plan, he is told that he has not complied with all the formalities. Oh yes, it seems his job should have been found by the employees of the manpower centre. But they simply cannot get him a job so the man himself, because he has connections—a friend on a working site, a parent—manages to land a job and after making sure—he has got to work for a few weeks at least—after making sure that his job will be permanent he gets in touch with the manpower centre. No, sir, that doesn't work, you did not submit that at the beginning—he did not even know he would find a job at this place.

If a citizen from Sainte-Hélène in Kamouraska gets a job in Fort-Captif, 400 miles away from his home on the north shore, or if another one from the same place in Kamouraska wants to get a job in Montreal, 300 miles away from his home, when he leaves home he does not know if he will succeed in finding a job. But he has got to tell the employees of the manpower centre where he goes and, if he finds a job, he will have to leave it temporarily to tell them that he might probably get a job. This system can hardly be applied. In the construction field, how many workers had to suffer from the rules of the construction bureau which wants them to get working permits? Several workers from my area had to pay $200 and $225 fines for the simple reason that they had worked without a permit and that they could not get one for particularly stupid reasons.

I already took action to shorten the sentence of a young man, an 18-year-old student who had been found guilty of nothing more than working with his father on a construction site during his holidays without a working permit. We should not be surprised by the violent reactions that sometimes happen. Patience grows thinner with rigid laws and regulations too often creating more problems that the incentives that would be needed at certain times in life when things get difficult. The end result is that revolt gets the better of people who used to be moderates, and no amount of promises will quiet them down.

When the unemployed lose patience with the finicky administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act which is too complex already, should they be admonished or should they be said the benefits they are entitled to? The time is ill chosen to tell them there was a computation error or their file is dormant. In my view, many civil servants are dormant themselves. Not all of them, but a good number. The unemployed derives no comfort from being told his file will be converted providing there is no problem in the complex computer techniques. That is the kind of answer we get from the Unemployment Insurrance Commission offices.

It is easily seen that the well paid bureaucrats—some are too well paid—who draft the legislation know nothing of the unemployed's position. I looked up the definition of the term "Technocrat" in the dictionary, and this is what I found: "A supporter of technocracy; a politician or high-ranking civil servant exercising authority on the basis of thorough theorical studies of economic mechanisms, without taking sufficient account of human factors." No wonder our Unemployment Insurance Act is not understandable to most unemployed workers. Add to that a deluge of regulations prepared in such a way as to allow the most inventive civil servants to get at the unemployed at every stage of the application processing. Everyone knows this, we easily realize that everything is aimed at protecting the fund. Rather than helping the unemployed obtain a lucrative job, they are given generous benefits to assure their subsistence and that of their family. Another indication that the protection of the fund is the determining factor is the authority given to income tax officials—those are two teams which do seem to get along rather well—to determine whether a job is insurable.

The legislation is so complex that a team of officials is necessary to establish whether such or such a job is insurable. This transfer of powers proceeds from Bill C-259 passed at the end of 1971 after closure was invoked, one of the most bulky bills to be introduced in the House, having more than 700 pages. It was the result of a ten-year study of so-called improved taxation procedures and that famous bill had to come into effect at the beginning of January 1972.

The taxing authorities had been ordered to be on the alert and put an end to the rip-off and the first to experience the modified system were the unemployed. It is unthinkable but true. Some unemployed who had been waiting for their benefits for months were paid retroactive to January 1972 amounts due in November and December 1971. The computer with all its electronic circuits working deducted from unemployed workers $4, $5, and $6 a week for federal and provincial income tax. What a fine example of cooperative, separatist, leftist and provincialist federalism. All unemployed were taxed as of January 1972.

Of course, UIC officials received numerous phone calls about this method of taxation. Since they already had transitional problems to cope with as a result the new act, I saw fit to point out this fine example of fund protection. There are many others, namely the decision to disentitle people of 65, when most of them had contributed to the fund ever since the act came into force. You must agree with me that the fund was far better protected than the unemployed.

A further example: do we know what happens when a benefit period must be established? Officials must take into account all severance allowances which may have been paid to the worker when he was laid off, as well as special holiday allowances in addition to normal vacation pay to which he is entitled under the act and all bonues or premiums owed to him, since those fringe benefits are considered as income. Consequently the officials shorten the period during which the claimant is eligible for benefits. There again, they are protecting the fund. There are even examples of the UIC reducing the rate of benefit of farmers who had been getting subsidies for "wintering" cattle when the beef market was paralyzed. They are sort of subsidized by the government. The UIC considers this as an income. They have to report it and then their rate of benefit is reduced.

I could go on giving many other examples where the main intention is to save the fund. When we read the sections of the law and the regulations, we find out that those in charge of the administration of the plan have managed to attain their aim, through the technocrats who write the law; regulations are added when the increased number of unemployed people makes it necessary. One time they decided to summon claimants to the UIC office and prepared non-eligibility notices for those who did not show up on time or on the date they had been called. I often had the opportunity of seeing that both notices were mailed on the same day. This has already happenned: anyone who does not report on the day he has been called does not have time to explain why he could not come, the notices are ready, the forms prepared in advance. Then, if your are not there at 11 o'clock, you will receive a notice of disentitlement of six weeks. I intervened with the board of referees a number of times to try and help out unemployed who were held through the system's faults.

Let us take a look now at what is happening when the employee leaves his job. The officials pay attention mostly to reasons given by the employer and the claimant receives a notice of disqualification for six weeks. They do not bother to ask him what are his reasons for leaving, no way. They call the employer on the telephone for additional details. The employee is disqualified for six weeks, he is not entitled to benefits. One would believe that a great number of civil servants are there because there is unemployment, because workers have contributed to the unemployment insurance funds for months and years. These civil servants owe their own job to this very fact.

Unfortunately, with such a bad law, these people have reached a point where they say: This is our fund, we are the ones who should protect it. How many times have I helped out poor workers to clarify this type of decision. It has been established beyond all doubt that the employee had good reasons to leave his job. I do not approve this attitude when reasons are not adequate, but one must not penalize a worker who has good reasons to change jobs.

Since statements of employment are often given too late to the employee, the ensuing loss of income should be charged to the employer. No, nothing in the act provides for that. Naturally, employers issue the statement of employment when the employee leaves, but some employers take weeks and months to do so. Then the commission says: You may file your claim anyway, but you will not be paid until the commission receives the statement of employment. But nothing in the act requires the employer to issue it or to support the unemployed person who has to wait because of his failure to provide the statement of employment.

I shall summarize this part of my speech by quoting a statement made by the former governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, which was published in the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil on March 20, 1971, and I quote:

Unemployment, a necessary evil—Rasminsky

Last Thursday, the Governor of the Bank of Canada warned that Canada should not wage an all-out war against unemployment at the risk of creating further inflation.

He is safe, he has nothing to fear, for he is handsomely paid.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

"A margin of security must be maintained in the rate of unemployment", stated Mr. Rasminsky in his annual report to the government. Keeping a large number of unemployed on the labour force is a necessary evil to prevent greater evils, such as an excess demand and the depletion of supplies which would automatically result in price increases.

In a recently published book entitled L'économie du diable, by a French author, I read in a paragraph of Chapter I a short comment on the mirage of unemployment and employmnet, and I quote:

The extreme sensitivity of public opinion to the unemployment curse creates ideal conditions as it were, a sprouting of illusions. Myths, simplistic reasoning, beliefs, mischievous dogmas are second nature to man. Indeed, no other area of investigation succeeds any better in separating the researcher from the rest of mankind. Reality is not only far from, but often contrary to appearances.

Because of a so badly worded Unemployment Insurance Act and the confusion it creates and entertains, a number of civil servants confuse reality with probability. Some appear to have lost all sense of proportions. They know or ought to know that unemployment has reached very high levels in certain areas, but they force victims of unemployment to take useless and sometimes costly steps in search of undiscoverable work, particularly at certain times, of the year. If they were serious, they could consult manpower centres officials: they would be told that they have hundreds of applications in their files and no jobs to offer. Their regulations seem to get their inspiration from a Birman proverb which says: There may not be gold in every stone but there is no harm in looking.

Unemployed people are accused of living at the expenses of workers. Basically, if someone is living at the expenses of workers in our society, is it not rather those who exploit them? Unemployed people are entitled to social benefits. This is not a gift from the government. Unemployed people are entitled to some objective, undisguised information on their situation, on their due. They should not be penalized for the slightest omission. This is not a right, this is something of an attitude taken by civil servants, and I do not know what temper they can have, but there are some among them who are not easy to deal with. The worker is penalized if he deliberately quits his job, even if he is exploited and works under inhuman conditions; the unemployed is penalized if he does not look actively for a job, even if there are no jobs available and if the unemployment rate reaches 30 per cent; the unemployed is penalized if he is not available; he ought to stay at home near the telephone, watching television, listening to the radio, reading the newspaper, always on the look-out for a job. He is penalized if he moves, and moreover, he has to pay his moving expenses. The unemployed pay out of their own money for the operation of the UIC. And if, in spite of all this, mistakes and delays occur, they only have to pay twice. These are more or less the conclusions to be drawn.

Mr. Speaker, I will give the minister an idea of the reaction and I may add that it is fairly general. I used to know a responsible senior citizen who had been out of work and became quite familiar with the act and regulations. So, I asked him: I will give you Bill C-27 and I would like you to tell me what you think of its content. So he told me: I'll try. I shall read you what he has to say which I feel is worth reading. I quote:

The person who shares his impressions here is a man of some years, with average schooling—equivalent to fourth year high school—who once in his life collected unemployment insurance benefits and to whom was handed the statute book on unemployment insurance in Canada, 1976 edition, as well as a copy of Bill C-27, as passed on first reading concerning unemployment insurance.

After over twenty hours of arduous reading, one reaches the conclusion that those documents are so ambiguous as to represent aberrations on initial reading, which aberrations then go beyond the limits of logic.

One gets the feeling that an attempt is being made at assembling a puzzle that would leave the most able creators in the field—some of whom are famous—flabbergasted and speechless with astonishment.

It seems someone was intent upon creating a maze the like of which schizophrenes or paranoiacs alone have the secret, or so it seems to me. I have had the same feeling before on hearing music composed solely of perfectly rhythmic discords. I take my hat off to those creators who deserve palms come from the most remote of equitorial jungles.

That gives you an idea of the reaction of one fellow who read Bill C-27 and the act of 1976.

Yet, I am no more stupid that the average guy. Until now, I thought I was of average intelligence. But now, I must confess that I suffer from serious complexes for, to my great shame, I must admit I learned very little except that some people can get unemployment insurance according to hypothetical conditions lost in a maze of nebulous considerations reaching from the stratosphere to the depths of Jules Verne's earth.

Yet, I must gather my wits about me and find out who can get, and how, those benefits that seem to come from another planet. Which benefits are measured by a yard stick that has nothing to do with British measures and even less with the metric system.

Now, the dismissed worker will be able to draw UI benefits if he manages to create opportunities for employment through his non initiative by convincing the employers that they will need him in the near future. The pregnant woman will only draw benefits if she has already been on unemployment insurance; if not, implicitly she will have to resort to abortion, secretly of course, be dismissed by her employer, pretend that she is unemployed and draw benefit—I can prove this—and get pregnant again.

This is the only way I know to become entitled to maternity benefits. This is right, is it not? Once again, implicitly; I did read between the lines. If I bore someone a grudge for something unforgivable, to be utterly sadistic, I would implacably condemn him to read these documents and to give a coherent report on unemployment insurance in Canada. But whether or not he succeeds in the long run, he would have the merits that only saints can deserve. Mind you, this man has drawn conclusions from the text of the Unemployment Insurance Act and from the contents of Bill C-27. I have plenty of examples in hand. I will cite a few, I have lots of time. We can say what we think about that legislation. It seems to me that we have got the time today, and there are many workers wishing to take part in this debate, I am sure. I hope there will be as many speakers as possible and that practical suggestions will be made to the minister so that he may improve that piece of legislation. I was told that the premises of the question I raised yesterday were rejected. If you want an idea of how it is working over there, hear what I have to say. Last summer the construction workers were on strike. Apparently 15,000 workers were affected. I am not a striker, I am a unionist, and I am glad to say it, but I am not a striker.

I find it unfortunate that a large number of unemployed workers underwent some hardship as a result of a strike. However, what is even more unfortunate is that the commission officials took so long before making their investigation. After that, I do not know how they worked. As far as I am concerned, there are some people who dragged their feet in that investigation, since the results took a long time before appearing. I have evidence of it here. Here is an individual who applied for benefits and was told the following: After considering your claim—he had submitted his claim on November 18, and he gets his reply on January 14 and is told: After investigation you were not party to the collective conflict, so you are entitled to benefits. But it took a month and a half to settle that. During that time the unemployed was not getting anything and he had no income. After that try and make me believe that the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials are doing their work properly. They certainly do not work rapidly. You have very clear evidence of that here.

Here we have another worker faced with technical difficulties. It is generally believed that computers costing thousands of dollars and installed in the offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission should improve the situation. I heard it said once that in some cases people could be paid within two days. It was even suggested on the very same day. It was even suggested that a guy could get a cheque within four hours, a manual payment if it were in particular circumstances. I have personally never seen any. If the minister knows people who were paid within four hours or two days I would be quite happy to know their names because I would be pleased to meet them. Generally it takes a month to five weeks. Why so much with big machines that cost millions and hundreds of public servants who serve or do not serve. So does it take a month, a month and a half to pay an unemployed who needs his money?

Here is another case. The commission tells the guy who submitted his application: We took action on December 16 to allow the processing of weekly reports as of November 21 but we are unfortunately encountering technical difficulties in the settlement of your case. The transactions sent to our regional computer service were returned to us on January 13. So we are taking other means to accelerate the payment of benefits due for the weeks beginning December 5 and 12. We are following this case. That was on January 17. They had technical difficulties.

There are other examples. Another chap from Saint-Gabriel-de-Kamouraska was a construction worker and became involved in the famous inquiry. I point out to the minister that he should pay closer attention to my comments this evening because what I say relates to hardships encountered by workers in my area. There will be less of a surprise for him if he will pay attention and undertake to introduce amendments to help people in need. Indeed, the minister may be in for some surprises as was the case with some of his Quebec colleagues who failed for too long to cater to the poor in their province. It would be better for him to pay close attention. It is a casual advice that I give him.

On August 16, the Commission said: "We received your claim for benefits. In the statement of employment received in September from Aluminium Bridge it says that the work stoppage may be due to a labour conflict; this is not sure, but it could be so. Then, as soon as the decision is known, we will follow-up, and that is all. We are sorry but such is the law." They are always sorry, but it remains that the man gets no benefits. There is another case where due to a complex wording, this inadequate legislation requires the officials to find something to tell the claimants. They have to check the third paragraph of the disqualification notice to the claimant. The legislation and the rules governing the unemployment commission are so complicated that employees, civil servants and others have to resort to incomprehensible phraseology. For those who are listening, try and make something out of this language. Civil servants say to the unemployed: You did not find that if you had not been unable to work as you state, you would have been available to work indeed? This is the text of a letter from the commission. Do you understand anything in that? What do you think a claimant can make out of that?

Here is the case of another worker in the construction industry. The head of special information at the central office in Montreal, 1441 Saint-Urbain Street, mentions in a letter dated November 24 that the renewed application by Mr. Bourgoin has been granted from September 12, 1976 and that steps will be taken on November 24 to expedite the payment of benefits. On the other hand, from the office in Rivière-du-Loup, on December 6 I am informed that payments are stopped after four completed weeks, four consecutive weeks. In the new measure, this has been changed, fortunately! But it took two years of hard work on the part of the commission officials and ministers—two of them—to finally be convinced that there is in the law a provision that prevents people from working. That's true, if they went to work for four weeks in a row during a period when they were unemployed, then they were absolutely disqualified.

More than 100 workers at the Bombardier plant in Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière were called back two years ago, when Bombardier renovated its Moto-Ski plant, people who were unemployed because the plant was half closed. The company had called back more than 100 workers to work in the plant, so all those people who worked for four or five weeks completely lost their benefits. They were told their claim year was ended. Imagine! It took two ministers and their officials two years and a half to grasp that. Now it is changed. I owe congratulations to those who made that change, it does not happen often that we have the opportunity to congratulate them, so you can applaud them, gentlemen. I would like to applaud everything they do, but there are so many things in there which have to be changed.

I have here another case of job searching, and the difficulty to find a job. It is about a man whose leg was amputated at the knee. I know him well, he is a friend of mine. He even mananged to drive a tractor during 29 weeks. The commission starts annoying him concerning a visit to an independent doctor. He must go see an independent doctor to check if his leg was really amputated there. Imagine! We see stupid things like that every week. It is really stunning and absolutely ridiculous!

Another one had worked at the Desjardins plant until he had reached age 67. Naturally, he had not applied for Unemployment Insurance benefits; he had been receiving his Old Age Security Pension cheques since he had reached age 65. When he stopped working, he applied for his benefits. This occurred before the implementation of the provisions excluding people 65 years of age. These benefits were paid to him for a few weeks. Then, one day, he was asked to call at the Unemployment Insurance Commission office and offered various jobs. He was even invited to go and work in the Port Cartier as well as Bay James areas. This was a 67 year old man with only one finger in his left hand. How could the Unemployment Insurance Commission civil servants do this to him! They were relying on an Act which does not make sense, which requires complete reviewing and thorough amending.

Suddenly, they realized that they had made a mistake—they come up often enough with wrong figures—and claimed that there was an overpayment of $134 to his credit, as they had disqualified him for refusing to accept employment in the Bay James area. They had disqualified him and paid him $134 in excess. Later, they asked him to reimburse this amount. So I intervened and discussed the matter with the director who was probably the most understanding man in the world but who was under the obligation to apply the most stupid legislation in the world. So, this man was not yet entitled to his guaranteed income supplement since he had worked during the year. So they told me: He must get income from somewhere, he should be able to pay back those $134 since he does not get any supplement! If you can prove that he is eligible for income supplement, may we drop the case. This was pursuant to Section 175(1)(e)ii. By the way, I would really like to hear from the minister, at the first opportunity, how many unemployed people have received $100, $150 or whatever from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, due to an error and how many have been able to avail themselves of Section 175(1)(e)ii. I would really like to know that. So, I have contacted the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and I have not yet been paid, and then—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has now expired. He may continue his remarks with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank all my colleagues for being so tolerant. I suppose they would like to know how this legislation works. I thank them very much. I will try to be as brief as possible, but I want to mention those cases. The Unemployment Insurance Commission keeps asking this 67 year old senior citizen—who is now 68 for $134. I felt inclined to pay it myself. Really, I was ashamed to see such a team of civil servants. This case became known as far as Montreal. Some of them even told me that they were considering garnisheeing the savings he had in his bank account. Of course, I insisted that he get his supplement and he got it. I think that he and his wife each got $1,000 in arrears because his case had been pending for a long time. When the Unemployment Insurance Commission learned that they each got $1,000, they wanted the $134 paid back. They did not take into account the debts he had incurred. He had to pay the rent and still had to reimburs this amount. So, the case is still pending. This is why I am asking who can avail himself of this section?

I was talking a while ago about a friend of mine whose views I had sought about the bill dealing with pregnancy benefits—I know that many women get them as I dealt with many cases—but there are also endless complications in some cases. I have in hand a letter by a lady—who, like many other ladies—is not afraid to raise her children and who had been working for 24 weeks. Two months prior to her confinement, she applied for unemployment benefits. She had phoned me before hand to ask me what the procedure was. I told her that it was quite easy. But then, troubles started. She did not receive 10 week benefits. Between the 30th week and the 50th week prior to her confinement: Can you imagine? How foolish can you be?

I am still in contact with the Commission. I received an answer recently. They tried to convince me that she was not eligible for benefits while I knew she was; in spite of all the intricacies in the act, she should be entitled to benefits, it is a matter of common sense. She could not have drawn benefits between the thirtieth and fiftieth week before delivery since she never claimed them. She worked during the qualifying period, namely 24 weeks; why then would the Commission not pay? There are many similar cases. Mr. Speaker; if the minister wants to check, all he has to do is come with his team of civil servants and I shall show him files in my office; he will see by himself what is going on.

It seems that civil servants have been ordered to reduce the number of registered unemployed by 33 percent and the letter I received from this man gives me some reason to believe this. They say: I do not care whether it is you or another. We have received instructions from somewhere. I have been eight years on the board of referees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Quebec City. I was representing labour. From time to time we would meet senior officials of the commission and they would give us specific instructions. Of course it was confidential material but I never saw one in favour of the unemployed. They were always at the advantage of the fund. Only I was a worker representative and I did not fear to raise objections whenever valid reasons called for it.

For some time now I have had many occasions to appear before the board of referees to defend unemployed people in a bad position and I have never seen, or very rarely, unless he is more open than average, a union representative who would accept a dissidence on a doubtful case. Most of the time it is a unanimous decision and when there is unanimity, it is written in the law and permission must be requested from the chairman of the board to refer the case to an umpire. Imagine a chairman who has made a decision three days or a week earlier and finds himself confronted with a request in the following terms: your decision was not correct, could we have the authorization to refer the case to an umpire? What simpleton dare write such ineptitudes in the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act? It seems that with this new legislation, there will be no further need to ask for an authorization from the chairman of the board of referees. That is fine, for I know many lawyers from the legal assistance clinics who are having problems in that respect. It often happens that the board of referees maintain the decisions: they want to keep in good terms with the official. There is nothing so odd in my opinion, when I come before the board of referees, seeing that all of them are nice people. I do not want to over-criticize them, but sometimes the situation seems so strange. The unemployed I represent are asked: Are you aware of our responsibility? They say: No, not exactly. The board says: We are not officers of the commission. We will look over the legislation, and, your case considered in respect to the act and the regulations. If there is any chance of getting benefits paid to you, we will do it. That is what they say to cheer up the claimant. But decisions are delayed until three or four days. They are not taken right away, because too often the office would be upset if decisions were given immediately to some people I know. I told a chap who was not too shy to ask them by whom they were getting paid.

I have been on a board of referees and I know that they are paid by the UIC. Usually, I work for whoever is paying me. They are trying to make people believe that they are totally independent in spite of the fact that they are being paid by the UIC. The setting up of boards of referees was requested by workers' unions, especially by workers' organizations, to help people who were faced with unfair decisions made by UIC officials. This system has solved some of the problems, but it also has to be improved. Thanks to the amendments contained in this bill, no authorization will be necessary. Cases will go to the board of referees but all this process will take time. There are insurability cases pending since 1974. Even today, I have two phone calls related to cases that are pending, because the income tax people say that the employment is not insurable.

Here is the case of a worker who builds homes. He owns a cab in Saint-Gabriel, Kamouraska, but he did some construction work for five weeks. That job was recognized for insurance purposes. Fifteen days later he worked on another house. The work was the same but that job could not be insured because the man was not there often enough to supervise the present worker. Can one imagine such stupid decisions!

Now let us talk about trying to find a job. I have here a fellow from Rivière-Bleue. The man is quite active and once wrote to me to find out if I was in a position to find him work or make suggestions. At first I suggested he get in touch with the manpower people: he could at least visit them. They seldom find you work but in any event it gave him a chance to talk to them. He went to see them. Later on I suggested he write to the Departments of Labour, both in Quebec and in Ottawa, and to everyone who might be able to find him work. I have that correspondence here. The fellow always got a nice reply, but he was told to get in touch with the local manpower people. He received the following answer: We have received your letter of May 4. But I was the one who sent that letter. I wrote to a manpower centre to see what would be their answer in Mr. Bouchard's case. The letter said: This is to inform you that we are sending your letter to our office in Cabano, 14 Commercial Street, as Mr. Bouchard is registered in that centre . . . From Rivière-du-Loup, this is not very far. There are labour ministers, all kinds of civil servants, all kinds of officers, but he cannot find a job.

How can this be? The minister is responsible for all this, no one can deny it. How is it that the employees of the commission disqualify people because they cannot find a job during a period when there is no work? Look here, I was told that the premises of my question were not acceptable but I can assure you that this is not a way to apply the law either. Somebody will have to change it.

I have here more examples of people looking for jobs, for example this young girl. I communicated with the manpower centre. She has been looking for jobs in 52 different places and she gives all their names. She is a shorthand typist and received a diploma from the school she attended, last June. She has not found a job yet. Today I am told that she will have to make a new application. The unemployed are penalized because they do not find jobs, because they have not searched long enough. But all this monkey business of our administration is madness and this should be changed, the sooner the better.

Recently I received this letter and the minister must have received the same one; it was written by a union leader who I think represents employees of the Public Service Commission and who asked me to retract my words after I said they did not know their job. That is funny. He sent this letter to the minister, who must have received it, to the leader of the Social Credit Party and to myself and he assures me that his people have exceptional qualities. I recognize that many of them are acceptable. But there are four categories of civil servants performing government functions: those who perform, those who perform slowly, those who don't perform at all, and those who perform in the wrong direction. We must be careful with those categories.

I wrote to him, I am not ashamed to say what I wrote. Here is my letter. He sent me back a copy, but I have extra ones in my files. This is a fellow who was ill, he had been hurt in an accident, he had a broken leg. Indeed he has not recovered yet. He may be fit for work again next month. He is still under medical attention. He was visiting with his father-in-law in Saint-Pamphile, in the constituency of Kamouraska-L'Islet.

He went back to Montreal where he had worked before. He went to see his employers to find out if he could resume working, even at a light job. And of course he applied for UIC illness benefits. He was entitled to it, he had contributed enough. The case is before a high-ranking UIC civil servant in Ottawa. I phoned him yesterday morning. So he sends a medical certificate, he sends a cheque. The fellow had received a small amount of insurance, a first cheque is deducted, so he is due $12, and on the other one they send him a cheque. Then he gets a notice: Final payment if work is not resumed. The fellow has a broken leg, this is plainly stated in his medical certificate, but final payment if work is not resumed.

So I wrote them because I was getting fed up to hear all sorts of remarks like that. The guy is going to send me the card which reads: final payment if work not resumed. So what did I tell them that crossed them so much? I thought it was very funny, though. That enabled me to know who was sick. Before that I was not too sure but now I know. He asked me to retract. Does it mean I should say; "maybe I should not have written that because you should not always tell the whole truth".

I told the commission guy the man had problems and had sent in two medical reports. The last one was dated December 10. It is obvious that Mr. Bernier was unable to resume work, he has a broken leg, and had to go back to his doctor. I was surprised to hear that the commission had sent him a cheque, the only one ever paid to him since he made his application. And that cheque, said: final payment if work not resumed. I think there are a lot of sick people on the staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission who should be under appropriate care. In this case it is easy enough to understand that Mr. Bernier will not be able to resume work for several weeks. He has made the required number of payments, he is entitled to sick benefits. Why should the commission civil servants prove so mean? What they want me to retract are those two words—sick and mean. I think this is very funny. It is mean to deny payments and to make no effort to try to find out whether an applicant is eligible for benefits or not. That is being mean. I have nothing to retract on that. As for being sick, well, yes, there are sick people, perhaps sicker than that man who needed benefits. But they are sick in the head, and that is the trouble. There are all sorts of incurable illnesses.

In concluding, I would not want to take excessive advantage of the fact that my colleagues have allowed me to continue. I would like to make a few suggestions, not directly related to the clauses of the bill—I will have an opportunity to come back to them, as I have gone into them very thoroughly—and I think I am in a position to make practical suggestions, concerning phrasing and the legislation such as it was submitted to us. But tonight I shall limit myself to the following: First, we should rephrase the law and rules to make them more understandable, more social, more human, and change our way of implementing them to protect the unemployed instead of the fund; we should retrain, and that is important, as many civil servants as possible, those who do not work or who do not do their work properly, in an atmosphere of practical comprehension, by rotating lay-offs, so they become aware of unemployment related problems through living experiences. Let us lay them off for a while and we shall see their reactions. When they have waited one month, maybe two or three, to get their first benefits, they will be in a better position when they are back on the job to listen to what the unemployed have to say. Maybe they would be eligible for holidays allowances or a severance pay and those moneys will be considered as revenue pursuant to rules 172 and 173.

They would learn to live for a few months under the same conditions as the unemployed and in many cases they could advantageously be replaced by qualified unemployed whose applications for jobs have been on file in the manpower office for months. That would not increase the number of unemployed and would contribute to train a team of civil servants who would be qualified to administer the law and rules, and appreciate the hardships and worries associated with a period of unemployment such as the one we are experiencing now.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-27, which we are debating this evening, is part of the package which the government calls its new employment strategy, and we ought to examine the bill in that context.

If we are to endorse and support a policy for employment, that policy surely ought to meet two basic and vital tests. First, such policy must give individual Canadians the opportunity, encouragement and assistance required to obtain self-respect, adequate income, and satisfying employment. Second, it must do everything in its power to ensure that the priceless human resources of this nation do not go to waste or lie idle; it must ensure the well-being of all people, and see to it that the productivity of all our people is used to its best advantage.

A major contradiction is involved here, Mr. Speaker, because at the very time we are considering this "new employment strategy" which the government has brought forward we are observing in this country, as my colleague mentioned, a monumental increase in the number of unemployed. At present more than 750,000 Canadians are unemployed. They are people who are prevented from contributing productively to our economy.

To this group of unemployed one can add other groups of people who are all too often forgotten and excluded from productive employment. I think, for instance, of young people who are forced to stay in some training program or the classroom because there is no opportunity for them at present to be productively involved in society. I think of the handicapped and the disabled; I think of the elderly who often are forced into idleness although they have many productive years before them. I think of the mothers of young children, mothers who would gladly work part-time, of workers whose jobs make poor use of the skills they have acquired, and of those who are in employment which underutilizes their capacities. Finally, I think of the discouraged worker who has simply dropped out of the labour force because there are no openings for him. Measured in those terms, I believe Bill C-27 is a modest piece of legislation indeed.

I am surprised at the government's attention to this measure, since this bill would open few new vistas for bringing neglected groups or areas into the productive mainstream of the Canadian economy. Apart from its over-all lack of vision, what disturbs me most about the bill is its insensitive—I might almost say unaware—approach to regional unemployment.

I am somewhat disappointed that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) has not yet, to my knowledge, publicly commented on this bill. Unfortunately he is not with us this evening. I certainly hope he will make some remarks at some stage during second reading because much of what I am going to say this evening has a real impact on the portfolio he carries with regard to economic disparities in this country.

I really wonder whether it is accurate to describe this bill as part of an employment strategy. As I said a moment ago, I am particularly concerned and I am going to speak very largely tonight about the implications of this legislation with regard to regional economic and social disparities in Canada. There are aspects of the bill I will not deal with that certainly are open to very real question. I presume other speakers will want to address their attention to them.

There is the question of job training. Over the past few years there has been a series of attempts, with programs under the Department of Manpower, to give people on-the-job training, and opportunities to provide skills and upgrade their education so that they will have better access to and better opportunity on the job market.

After the experience that we have had over almost a decade, it is high time that we know if there is any over-all strategy involved, if there is any realistic co-ordination between the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Transport, or some of the provincial departments which have exercised very active concern and interest in this area. It is not enough to announce we are going to have new pilot projects without giving an evaluation of how effective we have been with previous programs, whether we have learned from them, and how we are going to tailor more clearly job training programs to realistic job needs.

In the area of job-sharing, which the minister commented on briefly this afternoon, there is a great deal of question and uncertainty. My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), gave an indication from his experience of some of the difficulties that have arisen in other countries with regard to this particular proposal.

I am somewhat disturbed by the fact there does not appear to have been much meaningful consultation with either the various provincial departments or agencies that will be responsible in this area, or with the major sectors of the industrial and economic community which obviously will have to take a very activist role.

My present understanding is that organized labour and indeed the industrial community do not look with any great amount of favour or interest upon this proposal. It is somewhat useless for the government to say this is a part of a new employment strategy if in fact there is little interest or co-operation on the horizon from these significant groups.

As I said at the outset, fundamental to any employment strategy must be the recognition that each individual in our society who wishes or requires to enter the labour force should be entitled to do meaningful work at an equitable return. Surely all of us recognize that as an essential requirement. This is essential both for the well-being of individual workers in our society and for the well-being of society as a whole.

When we look at the extent to which people on an individual and collective basis require the help of the whole community, both on an economic and social basis, to say that that must not be the central and beginning point is simply not to recognize the reality itself. As we examine these present changes with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act, we must look at them against the backdrop of the individual's experience and companion programs which have been in the job creation field. It is a mixed record at best.

We have had programs particularly directed toward young people. Opportunities for Youth comes to mind as a first initiative of the kind of job creation area where people were given sums of money to create, in effect, their own jobs for socially beneficial projects of a short-term nature.

OFY and its companion program, Local Initiatives, which has gone through years one, two, three and four, have given us a great deal of experience with regard to the usefulness, advantages and disadvantages of this kind of job creation experience. In the last month or two the minister has launched the latest addition of these particular kinds of job creation programs with Canada Works and Young Canada Works.

The message is beginning to get through to the minister and some of his officials that all is not well with regard to a continued repetition of a particular, novel approach to job creation. While there have been substantial benefits in terms of some community improvements and some opportunities for people to be engaged in the work force for periods of time, it has not been shown to be at all encompassing or even a major solution with respect to job creation. I hope the minister will be one of the first to recognize this. I do not want to put words in his mouth, but he would not want to be anxious to say that through these programs, whether Local Initiatives or Canada Works, that in itself will affect in a major way the three quarters of a million people presently unemployed.

What disturbs me, and has disturbed me for some considerable time, is that at best these job creation programs are of an ad hoc nature. Their very set-up is an indication of that. Over the past four or five years that these programs have been in operation, there has never been any legislative measure which this parliament, or any of its committees, has had an opportunity to examine with regard to the efficacy of the programs or their required continuation. At best, this is a casual approach to a major expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. At worst, it is an indication that the government is not yet ready to say in categorical and long terms what are the benefits of such a program and why it should be enshrined within some form of statute which parliament has had a chance both to scrutinize and give its authority to.

To go on from year to year without any statutory consideration of programs of this nature, which obviously are now becoming somewhat of a permanent fixture, is really to play fast and loose not only with enormous sums of money but with the good will that is in communities, both large and small, from coast to coast in this country. They are willing to accept this form of government intervention, but only if there is proper stewardship connected with it. Unfortunately we have heard enough of abuses that have taken place to realize that public sentiment in a number of areas does not support these job creation programs.

I live in an area where people are so desperate for employment, and have been so concerned as to make the program work satisfactorily, that we have had a very high percentage of commendable projects both for individuals and for communities. However, for us to continue on a year after year basis with the government rushing in from month to month, either creating another kind of ad hoc job creation program or throwing more sums of money into specific regions because the unemployment figures have become absolutely intolerable, is a very irresponsible way for it to provide leadership.

I would hope that this government, even though it may well be in its dying days, would at least try to come to its senses with regard to a more sensible management of this particular initiative. That is all I will say about that particular matter because I know that other speakers will comment on it more extensively.

I want to deal with, as I said at the outset, what I see as a prime problem with regard to Bill C-27. Really it is a form of paradox or strange inconsistency. This is an interesting bill because, as the minister said today, and as was pointed out many months ago by his predecessor during the original budget debate when this proposal was first introduced, there is going to be a raising of the eligibility period from eight to 12 weeks. As my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, reminded the minister again today, this is a policy which we enunciated some years ago and which the government has now, with some very delayed wisdom, accepted. The minister has accepted it and has gone on to estabish another principle about which we have also been equally concerned, and that is to deal with all parts of the country fairly.

Here is where we come to this strange paradox, Mr. Speaker. On page 18 of the bill the minister provides in clause 35 for what will be known as a regionally extended benefit. Then on page 33, and particularly on page 34 of the bill, we discover what this regionally extended benefit may mean, that there will be in fact extended benefits in areas or regions with unemployment in excess of 4 per cent. Then there are various levels, depending on the percentage of unemployment.

I have no hesitation in saying that I think the government has recognized a fundamental truth about this country, one that it does not recognize very often. Perhaps that is the reason why the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has just left. I was going to refer to him in particular as one who has had great difficulty recognizing this fundamental truth about Canada. We are not a bland monolith from coast to coast. Perhaps it is not nearly so necessary to say it today with the kind of regional tensions and anxieties which obviously exist in the country, but I believe those who think for a few moments about the varying problems, capacities, concerns and needs of this country will realize that there is a wide variation, not only in regard to such subtle things as attitudes, concepts and understandings, but also in very basic things, such as the ability to work and the wage scales which people receive for similar kinds of employment.

The government is certainly not uninformed in this particular area, Mr. Speaker, because it has been the subject of debate from time to time. The fact that the federal government itself as a national employer has offered various rates of pay for the same kind of work in different parts of the country has been previously questioned. So it is right and proper that with respect to these benefits there is one standard whereby benefits will be based on the number of weeks a person has been employed, which I think form the standpoint of incentive, which concerns all of us very much, is a proper and effective principle to have in place.

Then there is another set of criteria with respect to benefits which relate realistically to unemployment levels in regions across this country. I have not heard anyone, either today or prior to today, when discussing this bill oppose this basic concept of regional variation with respect to benefits. But the part that concerns me is that while the government has accepted, enunciated and established this policy in the legislation before the House today, it has done it for only one side of the equation. The government has said that it should exist with respect to the benefit side, but that it should not exist with respect to eligibility. I am going to say a little more later on about the specific approach which we feel must be taken in order that this piece of legislation be consistent.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am not really giving the government news that it has not been aware of in bits and pieces in other areas of its responsibility. It is just that there is a shocking lack of consistency. In the program of local initiatives to which I referred a few minutes ago it is a well known fact that each year, once the program has been laid out, great attempts are made to judge, on a region by region basis, the exact unemployment situation so that the amount of money available can be tailored to particular needs. In fact in this particular year the variations are so great that the department discovered that certain constituencies could not even make use of their original allotment. Others were receiving two to three times the amount they were originally awarded last September. With respect to the Canada Works Program, as the minister knows, so far as additional provision for capital works is concerned there is no provision for those areas of particularly high unemployment.

We know that one of the fundamental principles of this bill is the bringing together of the Manpower side and the unemployment insurance side in some kind of package, the services being centralized and to a degree made more accessible to the individual who is looking for employment or to the individual claimant. There may be an additional hidden benefit, apart from the local services factor, or the national planning factor, which the minister has in mind in respect to this new legislation. Perhaps it will allow the department, this new reorganized department, to realize that it must be consistent on its eligibility side as well as on its benefits side. It will, in effect, let one side know what the other side is doing.

In its present context, this particular legislation is what I can only describe, in light of regional realities, as a sort of half pregnant piece of legislation. It is halfway there when it comes to recognizing that there is a particular problem, need or responsibility which the commission has in regard to abnormally high unemployment, and that there must be, as appears from the tables, a specific response to that particular situation.

I suppose that the minister or others might say that the reason we are not providing this eligibility period on a flexible basis is because the situation is basically the same from coast to coast. I think the minister referred to the fact that basically unemployment affects young people, those who are single, or second income earners; and he might also have said it affects those who are women. The implication is given, both in his comments today and in the notes earlier, that there is not really much of a difference whether people are unable to acquire benefits of 12 weeks, whether they live in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, St. John's, Newfoundland, Toronto, Calgary or Vancouver. I want to make it very clear this evening that nothing could be further from the truth.

The minister may now have had a chance to study the figures, but the fact is that the areas that are going to be hardest hit are the very areas with the highest unemployment. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that on a national basis the percentage of those who are going to be affected is something like 13.2 per cent, those who are in the category of eight to 11 weeks entitlement. But when we look at the province of New Brunswick we find the figure there is 18.2 per cent, in Newfoundland it is 17 per cent, in Prince Edward Island it is 15.5 per cent, in Quebec it is 14 per cent, and in Nova Scotia it is 14.8 per cent. In other words, the five eastern provinces with roughly one third the population of Canada will have approximately half their people who have this entitlement from eight to 11 weeks affected.

This means that these provinces are the ones that will bear the heaviest brunt with respect to alternatives—either the alternative of getting some form of employment to increase eligibility to the acceptable level of 12 weeks, or the alternative of drawing social security, or simply the alternative of not generating any income whatsoever. But let there be no mistake that the estimated loss in terms of income on a provincial basis is going to fall extremely heavily, inordinately heavily, on those provinces least able to protect themselves. When we refer to New Brunswick we are talking about $13 million to $16 million. When we talk about Nova Scotia, we are talking about $6 million to $8 million. For Newfoundland the figures are $14 million to $18 million. For Prince Edward Island, something between $2 million to $4 million, and for the province of Quebec, something around $80 million. I know some of the provinces have complained publicly, but I am surprised they have not complained more than they have to date. I suppose this is because they are preoccupied with other things and have not fully realized what a penalty they will be called upon to pay.

I suppose we shall be told that many of these people will find employment of an alternative nature to make up the difference. This is what the minister said in his statement. But look at the job vacancy rate in the Atlantic provinces. It has not exceeded 3,300, yet the statistics show that some 53,000 people in the Atlantic provinces will be directly affected by this change in the provision. If we assume that all of them will be looking for work, this means a ratio of 16 people for each job vacancy that exists.

Even more telling is the impact this measure will have province by province. I think, as I read the figures, we shall see a pattern here which is really serious from the point of view of reinforcing regional economic disparity. As the minister knows, there will be some benefits derived from the suspension of indexing. In 1977 this will mean a total over-all saving of something like $250 million, which will produce a benefit to Newfoundland of something like $4 million, but the loss of income to individual claimants in that province, those who are presently receiving unemployment insurance benefits, will amount to between $24 million and $28 million, leaving a deficit of well over $20 million. With respect to Prince Edward Island there will be a saving of $1 million and a loss of $4 million to $5 million; in Nova Scotia, a saving of $7,750,000 and a loss of $9 million. The province will only lose something like $1,250,000. In New Brunswick there will be a saving of $6 million and a loss of between $19 million and $22 million; in Quebec, a saving of $66,750,000 but a loss of $93 million to $109 million; in Ontario, a saving of $97 million and a loss of between $85 million and $101 million. In other words, Ontario will just be about in balance. In fact, depending on how things work out, there could be some real economic benefit to Ontario. The province of Manitoba will save some $10,500,000 and lose between $7 million and $8 million. Saskatchewan will save $7 million and lose between $8 million and $10 million.

Take a look at the western provinces. In Alberta, they will save some $19,700,000 and lose only between $7 million and $8 million. In British Columbia they will save $29,500,000 and lose in UIC payments between $18 million and $21 million. In the Yukon and the Northwest Territories they will save $1 million and lose between $1 million and $2 million.

These figures are dramatic in their implications when one looks at them in terms of one simple comparison. The Atlantic provinces will be saving $18,750,000 but losing between $56 million and $66 million, as compared with western Canada which will save some $66,500,000 and lose between $40 million and $47 million. It is apparent, therefore, that there is a very real regional impact associated with this bill.

The minister has told us nothing about all this. The information has been given in percentage terms which always reflect an average on a national basis, with an indication that this proposal will affect only certain individuals who are not closely attached to the work force anyway—they are little people who work a few weeks to get enough stamps to draw benefits for a considerable period, and the assumption is that we should not be too concerned about them. The insidious thing about the comments that have been made is this: there seems to have been an attempt to cast aspersions on those who are young, or single, or second-income earners, as though they are somehow a second order of humanity.

An hon. Member: That is your interpretation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is an interpretation. That is right. And it is one which I make with a very strong assurance. As I studied those figures I realized that a very high proportion of these people are also low income earners, as the minister himself agrees. He told us they have a weaker attachment to the work force. One of the conclusions I draw is that these are the people who are likely to be hit first by any change of program, the people who find it hardest to establish a permanent attachment to the work force. This is not because they are consciously trying to rip-off the unemployment insurance fund but because they are the people who find themselves at the bottom of each and every scale in terms of employability, opportunity, training, and forms of employment available to them. This approach on the part of the government, taking it out on those least able to protect themselves, is not a new approach.

We may have a new minister, but what is being developed here is consistent with what the government has been doing over a considerable period. I would remind hon. members that it was the present government which, only a short time ago, decided to eliminate from benefit possibilities those who are over 65, and decided to reduce benefits for those whose families were larger in size than average. Again a high proportion of such groups live in the very regions which have the highest unemployment rates. On a per capita basis, provinces such as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have a much higher proportion of people aged 65 and over than the national average. In those same provinces larger family units are to be found on a per capita basis than in other parts of the country. Yet these are the people who are called upon to bear the effects of these benefit changes.

There is a consistent pattern here. I suppose that as one member coming from a disadvantaged province I should be grateful that the bill at least offers a provision for regional benefits. Maybe the government is taking one timid step toward recognizing that this is a country of regions and that it must respond to the needs of those regions sensitively and reasonably. However, what we have found up to the present is an anti-regional development policy, with the sole exception of the benefit provisions. If the government really wants to harmonize its program with respect to regional disparities—and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has often said that this is one of the cornerstones of his leadership—it will need to be more consistent in its legislation than it is in the bill before us.

If there are those who believe that the whole question of opportunity for employment is the same from coast to coast and they have not yet begun to realize that there is some major variation in employment opportunities, I would just like to throw out this one further fact with respect to the seasonality in employment, and I want to make it very clear that one of the underlying problems we face in dealing with abnormally high unemployment in several regions of the country is that far too many of the major industries in these areas are seasonal in nature. We have only to think of industries such as agriculture, fisheries, and tourism to realize the very short duration of employment that is offered in these specific industries.

As one indication of this variation in unemployment rates from the best to the worst month in 1976, let me point out that it was two and a half times greater in terms of variation in Newfoundland than in Ontario, and that was because the province of Newfoundland, perhaps more than any other province in this country, has so much of its industrial employment located around seasonal industries, and until they recognize this, not just in terms of the benefit provisions but also in terms of the eligibility, this legislation represents at best an inconsistent attempt to deal with an employment insurance program for this country.

I said a few minutes ago that the minister referred today—and there have been references previously—to the situation of those who are single, young, or second income earners, but, as I noted, particularly those who are in the low income brackets are in that situation because they are employed in jobs which pay very little and, in far too many instances, provide employment for a short-term period. I am specifically and consciously aware of this fact because during the past few months one of the major industries in my end of Prince Edward Island, that of Irish moss harvesting, has been particularly hard hit. In a good year there may be employment in harvesting Irish moss for perhaps 10 or 11 weeks, of maybe even 12 weeks. In a bad year they will be lucky to get eight weeks. That has certainly been the situation this year. But perhaps I am not telling the government something it does not know because, as a matter of fact, just a few days ago the federal Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) announced a subsidy program because of the particular hardship borne by these fishermen in PEI and other provinces as well.

I want to come to the essence of what I think is important to make this bill equitable and consistent, and I draw the attention of the minister and of all hon. members to the amendment which my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, indicated today he intends to propose in committee. I think that this is a basic approach, and while affirming our desire to see the Unemployment Insurance Commission move closer to its original insurance principles, he has recognized that it must not be done by attacking the poor, and that any solution must be highly sensitive to the differences and the composition of our regional work forces.

The amendment would accept the basic 12 week entrance minimum but would allow, in regions of chronic unemployment or seasonal unemployment, the lowering of the minimum down to eight weeks where there would otherwise be undue hardship caused for those who live in those situations. I think this is a fair amendment. Without going into detail, it is certainly consistent with the other parts of this bill where we see, for instance, that regional unemployment rates are used as part three of the benefit structures. I would hope therefore that the minister would seriously consider it when this bill reaches the committee stage. Certainly it fits very clearly with the report of the Economic Council of Canada in 1976 when, in commenting on the general question, in this document entitled "People and Jobs" it states the following, on page 39:

> It would, of course, be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work before claimants become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely and involuntary unemployment. It would seem better to go after "malingerers" more directly. For this reason we believe that much of the problem of abuse of unemployment insurance could be solved by two methods—by tightening administrative efforts to get persons back to work, and by creating jobs to absorb them.

I believe my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, has focused on the problem in the right context. He used the words this afternoon of a new federalism, one that will be realistic and flexible but one which would consistently recognize the basic employment and insurance needs of people in the various regions of this country. I hope that members on all sides of the House, and in particular other colleagues of mine from the Atlantic provinces in other parties, and those who are concerned that we have in effect a national program which adequately reflects the situation in this country, will give favourable consideration to this proposal when it reaches committee and make this in some measure at least a more responsible bill for the Canadian people generally.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the main purpose of this bill is to camouflage another major policy shift in the direction and the thrust of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and one which I predict will be as unsuccessful in meeting the needs of the Canadian people as the earlier reorganizations which have taken place in the last dozen years have been.

I remind the minister that until 1966 we had a national employment service whose function was to find jobs for people who were unemployed, and an Unemployment Insurance Commission whose job was to provide insurance for those who were temporarily unemployed. Then the so-called experts inside the department, and some of the myriad experts from outside who were hired on contract at fat prices, decided that the real trouble in this country, the reason we had so much unemployment, was because our work force was under trained. They ignored the fact that in the last 20 years tens of thousands of young people continued through the high schools, young people who in earlier generations would have left school after grades six, seven or eight. But the panacea for unemployment was to give people training to fit them for the jobs which were supposedly available. So we concentrated on job training.

We built community colleges and technical vocational schools, we spent tens of millions of dollars, we hired teachers and we offered courses. In the estimates for the last fiscal year we provided for job training and training allowances to keep people while they were taking courses $771 million, and in the supplementary estimates, low and behold, there was another $100 million. So we spent $880 million on job training in the last year. With what results? Let me quote from a study done by Barbara Goldman who worked for the C. D. Howe Research Institute, in which she said:

> Canada gets a real pay-off from training only if the trainees can find steady employment. Otherwise, training is simply another form of income support, and there are, in many cases, more effective ways of providing income support.

In the same study she pointed out that current manpower programs are heavily weighted toward training, even though the training given does not often match labour market requirements. She pointed out that the amount of manpower training money was often decided not by the needs of the people who supposedly would get the training but by the political considerations of the government. She gave examples. She pointed out that in June, 1975, the then minister announced a $450 million direct employment program to last two years. When he did that the unemployment rate was 7.1 per cent. However, in December of the same year, when unemployment was up to 7.3 per cent, the then president of the treasury board announced cuts in Manpower programs of over $100 million, not because we did not need the money, not because there were not people who needed the training, but simply because it suited the political objectives of the government at that time.

Despite the $880 million we spent on manpower training last year, we have the highest unemployment this country has seen since before World War II. Now the experts are going to break up the existing structure of Canada Manpower centres and the department on the one hand and the Unemployment Insurance Commission on the other, and they are going to amalgamate the two departments into a commission headed by one deputy minister and an assistant deputy minister. I have a great deal of respect for the capacity of these two gentlemen, but they will be responsible for twice as much work as they have been responsible for up until now. I suggest that what we will have is a bureaucratic structure which will collapse under its own weight. However, there is another reason why this program will not work, and that is that the government has no commitment or belief in full employment.

We have heard two members from the official opposition today, and they really believe that many of the people drawing unemployment insurance benefits could in fact be working if only they wanted to. It is obvious the official opposition believes that, because it was the official opposition which first proposed that the period during which people should work before they can draw benefits should be increased from eight weeks to twelve weeks. They reason that many people get a job and work for eight weeks, just long enough to qualify for benefits. Then they quit and live happily, easily, and comfortably on unemployment insurance benefits. There is just no truth in that kind of thinking.

Mr. Epp: Oh yes, there is.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) says that there is. No member of parliament and no person who has looked at the question of employment and unemployment seriously would suggest for one moment that nobody is ripping off the unemployment insurance system any more than anyone would suggest that nobody tries to beat the income tax system or the medical insurance system, or anything else.

Mr. Epp: That doesn't make it right.

Mr. Orlikow: Of course it does not make it right, any more than it is right for some doctor in some part of Canada to pad the bills he sends to the health insurance commission of that particular area. The question is, is there a substantial percentage of the people who are getting unemployment insurance benefits who could be working, and I say that the figures we have which are compiled by Statistics Canada prove conclusively that that is not true. Let me put on the record what the figures for unemployment are, what the job vacancy figures are, and if the hon. member for Provencher would compare those new figures, he would see that even if every job vacancy in Canada were filled, there would still be over 700,000 unemployed. That is a fact, and the prejudices which members of parliament or people outside parliament may have will not disprove the facts.

What are the facts as we have them from Statistics Canada? As reported in the Globe and Mail of January 12, 1977, the unemployment figures for December of 1976 were as follows:

> Unemployment jumped to 7.5 per cent of the labour force during December from 7.3 per cent a month earlier, Statistics Canada reports.
> The number out of work jumped sharply to 754,000 from 708,000 in November.

In December of 1975 there were only 693,000 people unemployed, so there is an increase of over 60,000 in December of 1976. Quoting again from the Globe and Mail:

> The higher December unemployment brought the average unemployment rate for all of 1976 to 7.3 per cent. For each month, there were an average 736,000 jobless.

If we look at the provincial breakdowns, we really get a feeling of total despair. In Nova Scotia the number of unemployed jumped in December of 1976 to 32,000 from 26,000 the year before. In New Brunswick unemployment jumped to 30,000 from 27,000 in December the year before. Unemployment in Quebec jumped in December of 1976 to 253,000 from 216,000 in December of 1975. I have said this before and I say it again: I am not surprised that the people of Quebec did not re-elect a Liberal provincial government. With that kind of unemployment the people there did not have much choice. In Manitoba the unemployment figures were at a stationary rate. In British Columbia—

PUBLIC SERVICE—REASON FOR DENIAL OF EXISTENCE OF BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to what I thought was a fairly straightforward question which I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) last Friday about denials by a top civil servant of the very existence of the now widely known and widely discredited so-called EPO list.

On September 30 of last year, Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council, said in a letter to Walter Rudnicki, one of those on the list, the following: "I have never before heard of the concept of an extra parliamentary opposition, least of all one so officially dubbed". He then went on to elaborate.

What I would like to know is how it is that someone in such a high position did not know about this odious list and the silly letter accompanying it, particularly since last October 2 hon. members of this place made inquiries, and while no one knew anything then either, at least notice was, in effect, given.

Months later, confronted by a copy of the list and the letter, however, suddenly official minds and attitudes changed, and the whole matter is really quite shocking. It involves more than just the credibility of this government or a top civil servant. It reminds us of the so-called October crisis which was magnified by this government out of all proportion and became one of the worst blots on the civil liberties of Canadians one could possibly imagine. It also recalls the famous Aislin cartoon of a then prominent cabinet minister carrying Bell Telephone directories in his arms with the caption: "Now we have the list of suspects". All of a sudden lists are in the news again, not separatism this time, but EPO sympathisers, of all things.

The stonewall techniques and the silly, evasive non-answers are just as distasteful in some ways as the list itself. Are we so weak a democracy that we must have lists of young people and students who are radicals of the left or of the right? Are we to be lumped in with the iron curtain countries and former Nazi regimes which epitomize the police state concept, which deal in lists, which dealt in lists of all sorts, and which tolerate no dissenters?

I wonder, when the government House leader was attempting today to avoid the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) by saying that the Pearson guidelines for giving persons singled out for certain purposes a chance to be informed and to defend themselves did not apply in the case of the EPO list, was he thinking how keen he was when minister of immigration to have Mr. Loney dismissed from his summer job and then, before he was even mentioned in the letter—before the list ever compiled—were we in 1971 and are we now so fragile a democracy that we resort to putting young people on lists—in many cases the best and brightest of our young people—merely for having strong views and speaking out, or for being activists.

As nearly as I can ascertain, the "radicalizing of the under classes of society", one of the things that the then solicitor general indicated some of these people on the list were doing, appeared to consist of trying to get a better deal for non-status Indians and Metis people by encouraging them in self-help.

I hope the present Solicitor General will take a strong stand against this sort of listing process and join with us at this time in roundly condemning the whole circumstances and practice. It reminds one of the Christmas rhyme which goes as follows:

He's making a list,
He's checking it twice;
He's going to find out
Who's naughty or nice.

In the particular case of the former solicitor general, he personally hand delivered it, and apparently all those to whom he gave it forgot about the whole thing. I have a feeling that Walter Rudnicki and some of the other score of persons will want more justification for what was done than this.

There is a lot of injustice still around, Mr. Speaker. Recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made some comments on the way the Japanese were treated during the war. Perhaps people like Walter Rudnicki, formerly a member of the Public Service of Canada, and Don McCleery and Gilles Brunet and Joe Primeau and others formerly in the RCMP ought to merit some redress and apology while their cases are still current.

In the meantime a little more frankness, openness and information would help a lot, and we will be counting on the Solicitor General for his co-operation in this respect.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate tonight, I am of course aware that I have only a few minutes to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). Late on the morning of January 28 last, the hon. member asked me if I knew that certain high officials not under my jurisdiction had supposedly denied at a certain time the existence of the letter read in the House by one of the colleagues of the hon. member, the member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that I was not aware of the letter which had supposedly been written by the Clerk of the Privy Council since I do not usually—I think that we do not usually do this on this side of the House—read the personal mail of other people. In any case, I think that the reply given at that time in the letter to which the hon. member for Central Nova has just referred clearly shows that among both politicans in the House and high officials, there never was in their opinion a black list like the hon. member tried to imply in this House.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is indeed because this document has constantly been referred to as a black list that it has been mentioned only in general terms without any precision as to the date, so as to make allegations that there may have been a misunderstanding on the subject raised in fact by the hon. member for Central Nova. It is therefore not surprizing that no one on either side of the House ever heard of a black list because, as a matter of fact, there was no such list.

We all know that that the sole responsibility as concerns security that befalls the Royal Canadian Mounted Police consists in gathering information which is then transmitted to the departments and that it is then up to the departments, if they believe the information to be based on fact, after their own evaluation of this information, to apply their own rules. Of course, as the House leader and Acting Prime Minister explained this afternoon, if ever there was any doubt as to the loyalty of the person involved which could lead to a new classification or even to a demotion, a transfer or a simple dismissal, it would then rest with the department concerned to approach the individual, to acquaint him with the doubts raised and thus solve the entire matter.

Mr. Speaker, I think that one of the basic questions raised by the hon. member is the existence of a security service within a state. Nevertheless, when the report of the Royal Commission on Security was tabled in the House in 1969, it was clearly accepted by all the parties in this House that a security service was indeed essential in any democratic country if it did not want to behave like an ostrich in the face of the possible existence of subversive groups.

HEALTH—ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—ACCEPTABILITY OF MEMBERS OF TASK FORCE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, the topic with which I wish to deal this evening concerns the establishment by the Department of National Health and Welfare of a task force to study arsenic pollution in Yellowknife, in the Northwest Territories.

The issue of arsenic pollution in Yellowknife is not new, by any means, since Yellowknife residents have known about arsenic pollution for some years. On January 18 of this year, as the arsenic story broke in the newspapers, an early Yellowknife pioneer by the name of Charles H. Schwerdt wrote me a long letter in which he described Yellowknife in the 1930's and 1940's. Mr. Schwerdt is retired and presently living in Surrey, B.C. He stated that residents of Yellowknife were aware of arsenic pollution even in those days. I shall quote part of the letter he wrote. He said:

> We had arsenic pollution of snow, water, vegetation all over the area as early as the spring of 1947—exactly some 30 years ago.
> I do not know if any records are in existence at this time to establish certain facts . . .
> This I do know. One Mr. Callaghan, known as the Peace River farmer, brought some milk cows and other stock in Yellowknife, hoping to establish a dairy farm there. I believe that was in the summer of 1944 or 1945, but not certain. However, this I do know. He lost all of his stock in less than a year after bringing them. Dr. Stanton, who was the resident doctor at the 'Con' mine, diagnosed and established the cattle died from arsenic poisoning on the vegetation. Plus the water. What compensation he was given I do not know.

That was the situation around 1947, Mr. Speaker. Over the years there have been many studies on arsenic, and people are losing confidence in the government's ability to cope with the problem; but the minister has announced yet another study, which I welcome, although with reservations. One of my reservations is that so many such studies have been undertaken over the years.

The Grainge report, which is part of the Yellowknife environmental survey, lists 24 separate studies on environmental conditions in Yellowknife in the last ten years alone. Most of those studies dealt with arsenic pollution. One study done in 1969 neglected to inform the public about such dangers as unsafe drinking water in Yellowknife Bay. The YES study indicated that there is a high level of arsenic in the snow. These and other examples over the years show that residents of Yellowknife have reason to be suspicious of the federal health department.

I also have reservations about the terms of reference of this task force, as set out in the minister's news release of January 18, 1977. There is no indication that this task force intends to break new ground. It is instructed to review all available data relevant to arsenic in the Yellowknife area; and, 24 official studies having been done in the last ten years alone, I wish them luck. But the minister has not laid down instructions for the testing of specific groups, particularly miners and people living in the Indian villages near Yellowknife.

On January 15, at a press conference I attended in Toronto, the National Indian Brotherhood and the United Steelworkers issued a statement declaring that there is a most serious arsenic problem in the Yellowknife area. As a result of these charges and the national publicity in the media, the minister announced the establishment of the task force.

One fact which came across clearly in the NIB and Steelworkers press release was that certain specific groups in the Yellowknife area, especially miners and certain Indian people, have come into contact with high levels of arsenic. However, little provision has been made in the terms of reference of the task force for directing the task force to examine closely these specific groups. Perhaps the general health of Yellowknife residents is good, and the exposure to arsenic low; but if certain groups are being exposed to unacceptably high, even dangerous levels of arsenic, the federal health department ought to act quickly.

I call for immediate action with respect to the Indian children tested by the National Indian Brotherhood. I also call on the task force to examine closely the working conditions of those working in the mill and the mines. We know that the arsenic in the area is the result of the mining operations in that region. Mr. Speaker, the people of the region must risk exposure to arsenic on a daily basis in order to provide a home for their families. Surely, since the task force is to deal with arsenic and the dangers it creates to one's health, the first priority should be to examine workers who are in daily contact with it.

I would also point out to the minister that I found out earlier today that both the National Brotherhood and the United Steelworkers of America are highly dissatisfied with two of the three members on the task force, namely, Dr. Mackenzie and Mr. Tupper.

These two groups have asked, right from the day the minister announced the task force, that the members of this body be acceptable to all parties concerned, the mining companies, the unions, the Indian bands, and the federal health department. It was to this matter that I referred when I questioned the minister on January 24 of this year. As a result of appointment to this task force many concerned groups are prepared to be cynical of any findings even before this task force has had its first meeting.

The residents of Yellowknife are proud of their community. They are not ashamed of hard work, and they have adapted to a cold and often harsh environment in the northern half of our nation. Because they do work so hard they have the right, I repeat the right, Mr. Speaker, to expect the government to act responsibly in protecting their health and environment.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) has raised a serious question this evening about arsenic pollution. I want to assure him on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his parliamentary secretary, who unfortunately cannot be present this evening, that they take his concern seriously and those of the people of the area which he represents. That concern is demonstrated by the fact that the minister has taken the initiative to appoint a task force to investigate the situation.

I am grateful for the serious and conscientious approach to this matter which the hon. member for Northwest Territories has shown this evening. He has put a very useful commentary on the record tonight.

I was pleased to hear his words of welcome for the recently announced task force investigation into the situation which may exist at the moment. We are confident it will do a constructive job in identifying the nature and scope of any problem which may exist, and will recommend the appropriate kind of action that ought to be taken.

With regard to the hon. member's specific representations and suggestions about the work of the task force and how that work, in his view, could more properly and effectively be accomplished, I want to assure him that I will ensure that the ideas he has placed on the record this evening are brought to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare so that he can take them into consideration with respect to the task force.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last week I concluded a speaking tour of 16 Canadian cities where I discussed with audiences across the country the subject of Canada and the Third World future. This journey followed a six-week study tour of development in Asia, where I visited China and also examined the operation of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) in Indonesia and Bangladesh.

Thus in the past few weeks I have been able to examine Canada's foreign aid in the field itself, and also to observe the reaction of Canadians across the country to CIDA's $1 billion program. I made a similar tour of Canada one year ago and found widespread confusion about the effectiveness of aid.

I am sorry to report that confusion has worsened in the past year. There is now, in fact, a crisis of confidence in CIDA. The agency has been attacked for "goofs", the Auditor General of Canada has criticized "a serious internal control weakness," and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has let the agency drift without full-time ministerial leadership. Canadians are now asking where CIDA is going. Until that question can be adequately answered by the government, CIDA will continue to suffer from an appalling image across Canada.

I found Canadians generally to be in favour of assisting developing countries, and I want to underline that fact. There is still support for Canada's involvement in helping developing countries, but the declining credibility of CIDA is undermining that very support for foreign aid. That is the point I want to bring home to the government tonight in asking that there be an overhaul of CIDA. This overhaul is now imperative to restore the support of parliament and the public in the strengthening of Canada's relations with developing countries.

The sub-committee on international development which received a reference from the House just prior to Christmas will begin its hearings this month. I think those hearings must attempt to get beyond the superficial criticisms of CIDA which we have been hearing from such critics as Dr. Morton Shulman, who has been raising questions which, whatever validity there may be to the charges raised, are still peripheral questions and do not address themselves to the heart of the question. The heart of the question is: does Canadian aid actually help the people for whom it is intended, and is it getting through to them?

I found on my tour of Asian countries, particularly Indonesia and Bangladesh, which are among the top ten aid recipients of the Canadian government, that not enough of our aid is getting through to the village level and that there ought to be greater emphasis on the community level. I think more attention should be paid to those projects that reach people's lives and which enable them to take hold of development in their own lives. This would entail at the very least the raising of the priority of funding available to non-governmental organizations within the existing CIDA budget so that there would be a greater ability on their part to take part in community development in Asia.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am making an appeal for an improvement in the quality of CIDA's aid as distinct from increasing the quantity. The question of quantity is now, to my mind, a secondary question. The first question is to improve the quality. In order to do this certain steps must be taken. It is now obvious that the external affairs minister has neither time nor the inclination to control CIDA as it must be controlled. Here is a $1 billion agency that is not receiving any sort of full time ministerial control. The agency does need its own minister to control its far flung operations and to report on them to parliament. There is too much money involved for it to be given casual ministerial supervision.

This question has been floating around Ottawa for the past several months. It is time that the Prime Minister took specific action and made that change in CIDA's leadership. I think it is time now to re-evaluate our aid to Cuba and to consider cutting off aid to that country. Whatever good CIDA's agricultural projects are doing in Cuba, it is not possible to support them when Cuba finds the resources to send troops to Angola, and also now to train guerrillas for war against Rhodesia's white minority. The expulsion of Cuban diplomats from Canada for conducting an intelligence operation in Montreal raises further questions about CIDA being duped.

In other words, I think every so often CIDA must re-evaluate the actions of countries that are receiving our aid, and if indeed they do have resources to conduct spurious activities I think it is a solid enough reason to reconsider aid. The parliamentary sub-committee on international development must deal with the basic question I raise of whether aid is getting through to the village level, and of an increase in priorities.

Finally, CIDA ought to start a concerted drive of development education in Canada so that Canadians would have a better understanding of the actual help that CIDA is providing, along with the limitations of aid. There are many good things about CIDA. It is not only a question of the mistakes made by the agency. Canadians, as well as the members of this House, need to be able to get a balanced appraisal in order to have a proper judgment made of the value of this very important agency. The CIDA five-year strategy for international development co-operation has been in existence now for 18 months and supports the trade and monetary changes called for by the United Nations. I am sorry to tell the House that Canadians hardly even know of the existence of that strategy, and for that I blame the government for putting its own strategy on the shelf.

I think the time has come when those who feel warmest toward the aspirations of the Third World should probe the faults and failures of policies in both the developed and developing nations. Only such a thorough probe which the committee would be able to give if it had access to complete information about CIDA, including country reports, will help Canadians have a deeper appreciation of our changing role in developing nations. Only that kind of study will help us go beyond aid so that we can take part in the structural changes called for by the United Nations, and bring the Canadian public along with us.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has assigned very precise duties to the hon. member for Edmonton-Stratchcona (Mr. Roche) as regards the External Affairs Department and I wish to congratulate him for it. I was under the impression, falsely it would seem, that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) was our department's official critic. It would appear however that he is no longer in his leader's good graces and that the hon. member for Edmonton-Stratchcona will be taking over.

In the debate of October 21, 1976, the hon. member asked some questions which have not been repeated tonight. He has dealt what I consider to be low blows to CIDA but these attacks were surely not included in the questions he asked on October 21 and that his leader has again asked on November 1, that is who is the minister in charge of CIDA. But that is not the case tonight, they are attacking CIDA, something we do not like at all and in the limited time allowed me, it is evident that I will not be able to present all the benefits of CIDA and specify exactly under whose control the federal government has placed it. Here again, I think that when they want to debate a question the members of the opposition should try to limit themselves to that question and not act as did the hon. member for Edmonton-Stratchcona and make criticisms while knowing perfectly well that I am unable to answer in the three minutes I am allowed.

On November 1, 1976, his leader asked other questions about the minister in charge of CIDA, to which the Prime Minister replied:

> That proposition has been under examination for several months now. The fact that the cabinet shuffle took place before the decision was actually made led me to discuss with both ministers the possibility of not having a junior minister for CIDA but using the present House leader to continue his excellent direction of CIDA, and that is a matter which is still under discussion between the House leader and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This question is still under examination. I think it is a straightforward, clear and precise answer. Nonetheless, I think it would be appropriate that I add a few remarks in English.

[English]

The government House leader (Mr. MacEachen) is continuing as the co-chairman of the Conference on International Economic Co-operation in Paris until the end of that conference. The responsibility for CIDA rests at the present time with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). Not only has the minister had regular meetings with the president of CIDA, but in recent months he has familiarized himself with CIDA operations in several countries in Latin America where he concluded bilateral agreements on development aid and technical assistance.

With regard to the reconstitution of the subcommittee on International Development, the hon. member knows that as the last item of business before parliament rose for the Christmas recess on December 22, 1976, the President of the Privy Council introduced a motion which the hon. member has himself discussed.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that members wishing to discuss a question on adjournment should perhaps limit themselves to the specific substance of the origianl question, thus making it much easier to answer appropriately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

REQUEST FOR ADMISSION OF PROFESSOR ANDRÉ GUNDER-FRANK TO GIVE LECTURE AT QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canada is a signatory to the Helsinki Accords which state in part that the signing countries will, and I quote, "facilitate the dissemination of oral information through the encouragement of lectures and lecture tours by specialists from other participating states", and in view of the fact that the Department of Manpower and Immigration has denied entry to the internationally known sociologist-economist, Professor André Gunder-Frank to speak at a symposium at Queen's University on, "Canada and the Third World", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House express its desire that Canada live up to all sections of the Helsinki Accords and allow Dr. Gunder-Frank to enter into the country for his lecture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR AID IN PAYMENT OF DEFICIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency and that is why I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43.

Considering that the Olympic Games held in Montreal have been an achievement for all Canadians; considering also the repeated requests directed to the federal government by the Quebec government to obtain financial assistance to reduce the deficit of these games; considering that the reasons given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for non-participation are not in order now, and the fact that Loto Canada revenues fall far short of forecasts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the government to take a substantial part in making up the deficit of the Olympic Games of 1976.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED CHANGES IN PROVISION FOR SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency, and that is why I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reconsider the spouse's allowance, as set out and confirmed in Bill C-35, which continues to discriminate against widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors between the ages of 60 and 65, and to substitute for the spouse's allowance the payment of old age security to all persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who leave or are out of the labour market, regardless of marital status.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ADEQUATE POLICY FOR EASTERN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the depressing state of every form of transportation in the Gaspé area in eastern Quebec, but more specifically in my constituency of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, be it transportation of passengers, goods or mail by air or otherwise, a situation which is greatly hampering the economic development of this region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr):

That the government, and more specifically the Minister of Transport, establish as soon as possible a transport policy which is modern, consistent, efficient, which could meet the present and future needs of our area and which would satisfy the desires of our residents who are tired of begging and talking to deaf ears, a policy which would come into force the moment it is formulated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED REDUCTION TO 60 OF ELIGIBLE AGE FOR RETIREMENT TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent and the silence of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of extreme urgency.

Given the alarming increase in the number of young unemployed, which deprives our country of a human potential which is necessary to its development and prosperity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House strongly urge that the government introduce without delay a bill lowering the voluntary retirement age to 60, so that young people can find jobs on the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBLE DATE OF TERMINATION—TARGET FOR LEVEL OF INFLATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the House when a decision will be announced specifying the date of the termination of the controls program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that will be announced only after there has been much more extensive consultation with the provincial governments, and indeed with business—

Mr. Fairweather: And with Keith Davey.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —and labour communities. The critical question is whether there is some general undertaking within the community that there will be an effort to restrain expectations after the end of the control period.

Mr. Clark: I am sure the minister would agree that it is important, in establishing some degree of certainty in the Canadian community generally regarding the nature of the economic policy, to have as soon as possible an indication of the termination date and the nature of the post-control policy. I wonder if he would tell the House when he expects to be able to tell parliament and create that condition of certainty within the community regarding both the termination date and the nature of the post-control policy.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think it is equally important in a community such as ours where you have a great degree of decentralization in economic decision-making between the private sector and the provinces as well as the federal government, that any major step such as this should be taken so far as possible in concert with the views of other elements. In that sense, that process of further discussion and consultation will continue. I hope that within a month or so we might be in a better position to find out if there is any possibility of the provinces agreeing on appropriate timing or, if there is not, whether we should go ahead and conclude ourselves on the length of the anti-inflation program.

Mr. Clark: Let me congratulate the Minister of Finance on the completeness of his conversion, and let me ask him whether the government is still committed to achieving a 6 per cent rate of inflation by the end of this year and a 4 per cent rate by the end of 1978.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hope we can do better than that, but my hope is tempered by some of the difficulties of the economic situation.

SIZE OF MONITORING AGENCY ENVISAGED FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF CONTROLS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has been speaking about a monitoring agency, leaving the impression that he wanted to turn the job of monitoring over to the Anti-Inflation Board which has grown to an excessive size. Is that in fact his intention, or does he intend to follow the recommendation made generally by the Senate committee which would establish, instead, a spotlighting agency which would be much smaller that the Anti-Inflation Board? Are we have to have a large monitor or a reasonable monitor?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear in this House and outside that we do not envisage the continuation of mandatory controls certainly beyond December, 1978 or, indeed, beyond an earlier period if we can, as I said in my previous answers, find some general agreement within the community on restraint of expectations. If there is to be an agency of that kind for the purpose of examining specific situations which could be inflationary, which would not be passing mandatory orders but making public comments on those situations, it could obviously be very much smaller than one which has specific responsibility for enforcing mandatory controls, as is the case with the Anti-Inflation Board.

POSSIBILITY OF COMMITTEE STUDY OF PROPOSALS FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question also is for the Minister of Finance. Since he has referred to a certain dialogue which is to take place between business and labour with respect to when the controls should end and what should happen in the decontrol period, since it appears that this House is being ignored, and since it is hoped that the ministry will allow a committee of this House to study policy options with regard to the decontrol period, options which the ministry may suggest, would the minister indicate when there may be a reference to the appropriate committee of this House, to study not only decontrol positions with respect to the government but to give us also a preliminary view of the economy in anticipation of the budget, bearing in mind that there may be decontrol and a new budget both before April.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the latter point I would only say that I would expect to put before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs some proposals with respect to a change in the manner in which we handle the annual budgetary statement. That being so, I would not contemplate bringing that matter to the same committee which would have the responsibility for examining questions involving decontrol and post-control. If the hon. member and his colleagues are agreeable to this, I would be prepared to talk with the House leader about the terms of a joint committee of this House and the other place, to be set up for the specific purpose of studying the long-range questions which would be involved. I suggest that particularly because of the heavy legislative timetable which faces the finance committee.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the variety of procedures by which the economy may be decontrolled, particularly relating to extended wage controls on public servants and the methods by which a retroactive price and wage explosion may be avoided, would the minister go further and tell the House whether it is intended to allow a parliamentary debate on the government's specific proposals for the decontrol period, or whether the administration proposes to take unilateral action without a debate in this House on the administration's position?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the position with regard to further discussions has been made clear. To a great degree, the position we would take would be the result of the dialogue with other elements within the community, and I think it would be most appropriate at that time to have the discussions of that kind either in the joint committee which I mentioned or in the House as a whole, if the House leaders agree to that procedure.

NOTIFICATION OF PEOPLE WHOSE NAMES ON BLACKLIST AND REMOVAL OF NOTATION OF BLACKLISTING FROM PERSONAL FILES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said at his press conference last week that the people on what is now known as the former solicitor general's secret list had been told that their reliability had been called into question in some sense. Since it has been confirmed that since the Prime Minister spoke at his press conference last week such people were not told about this, I ask him to ensure that present ministers of those departments notify such people that their names are on such a list. Second, will he take steps to ensure that the ministers remove from the files any such references to those individuals, so that their personal records do not show that their names were ever on such a list?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am aware there is no reference on the personal records of these people that they were noted by the RCMP and that their names were transmitted to the Solicitor General for whatever action he believed necessary. Therefore, I cannot give an undertaking to remove their names. I repeat, insofar as I am aware, and I believe a search has been conducted, there has not been any entry upon the records of these people that in some way they were to be watched, fired, demoted or otherwise have their careers placed in jeopardy. Therefore, I really cannot give the undertaking for which the hon. member asks.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister did not deal at all with the first part of the question which pertained to these people having the right which was laid down in the 1963 guidelines by then Prime Minister Pearson and subsequently endorsed by the present Prime Minister in 1969 to be informed that their reliability was in question. Yesterday the Acting Prime Minister asserted that this action had not been taken. He interpreted the guidelines not to pertain to these people. Since the guidelines pertain specifically to such actions which "may" lead to a dismissal, will the Prime Minister agree that it does apply to such people and that they should therefore be told that their reliability has been called into question?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The point of my previous answer was that in no way did this information which was collected by the police adversely affect the careers of these people. Mr. Pearson's guidelines, my own and those of this government, state that if security information collected by police agencies in some way adversely affects the career of any person, that person should be entitled to refute the information, discuss it, contradict it and so on. I repeat that this circumstance did not arise. I believe that is the answer the Acting Prime Minister gave yesterday.

What in fact happened is a very simple sequence of events. The police select whatever information comes their way which might have to do with the security of this country. Their role is to take it in, collect it and, I suppose, sift it and verify it. However, their role is not to act on it. When they have this information, they hand it to the Solicitor General. I presume that if the Solicitor General had done nothing about it, he would be accused today of not doing anything about information which came his way from the police about possible security lists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He saw his duty and he alerted the ministers in charge of the particular departments and agencies that this information had come his way. I am sure that he personally knew none of the people on the lists. He was merely transmitting information the police gave to him. He transmitted it to the departments through their ministers. If they had decided some action should be taken, it would have been referred to their security official in the department who would have set a process in motion to examine these people.

I repeat my first answer. As far as we know, none of this happened. The ministers received the list. They made some judgment in their hearts that they would talk to, be careful with and so on, the people who were on that list, but no action was taken with regard to the files, the dossiers or security clearance let alone the dismissal of any of these people. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, and I said this last week, the matter is passed over. The only reason it is of concern now is that obviously some people within some department or agency have leaked this list and the opposition and the media are doing what they hoped we would not do, adversely affect the careers of the people on the list.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FAILURE TO INFORM MR. RUDNICKI HIS NAME ON BLACKLIST—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines use the words "may have to involve his dismissal". After their reliability or security has been questioned, it might lead to that action. Since the RCMP prepared information which they passed on to the then solicitor general and he in turn passed it on to other ministers, one must reasonably presume that someone, including the Solicitor General of Canada, has called their reliability into question. Therefore, if the guidelines mean anything at all, do they not mean that such people should be informed that their reliability was being questioned? In relation to this aspect, I want to ask the Prime Minister about the case of Mr. Rudnicki who was dismissed a few years ago and who claims that this clause protecting his rights has not been applied. Does this not constitute a dereliction of responsibility on the part of the government? Will the right hon. gentleman not take remedial action by providing for a review board, something which Mr. Rudnicki still desires?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Rudnicki's dismissal had nothing to do with the letter which the solicitor general then circularized.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Trudeau: Because I know. It was known why he was dismissed at the time. He was dismissed because of a particular case in relation to a cabinet document. That is the reason he was dismissed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Read the judgment!

An hon. Member: Phone the judge!

SUGGESTED REDUCTION TO 60 OF ELIGIBLE AGE FOR RETIREMENT TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As the number of unemployed is very high among the young and as there is no indication that the situation will improve in the near future, can the minister tell the House whether, as minister responsible for the matter, he has suggested or will suggest to his colleagues in cabinet that voluntary retirement age be lowered to 60 to allow those who wish to withdraw from the labour market to do so, thus creating openings for a number of young people?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I must reply to the hon. member that unfortunately the studies made to date do not seem to indicate that such a step would lead to job openings for a considerable number of young people.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we probably do not have the same information but, in any event, here is my supplementary: As, during the 1974 election campaign all political parties, including the Liberal Party, agreed unanimously to lower the retirement age to 60, can the minister tell the House when a bill to that effect will be introduced in the House so that it can be passed as soon as possible?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has once again been misinformed about the programs of the various political parties during the last campaign in 1974.

ORIGIN OF INFORMATION ON WHICH BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES BASED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question, too, is directed to the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman said the extra parliamentary opposition list is now a thing of the past and it was an innocent event. Since the Solicitor General has taken it upon himself to illuminate all aspects of this embarrassing situation, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has had discussions with the new Solicitor General, in particular, with regard to the origins of the list? Did the RCMP, the secret service, or the security service of the RCMP provide the information, or was the information made available to the then solicitor general by his own internal security group?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not recall having discussed this with the new Solicitor General. I may have done so, because I discussed the general matter with him. But I think I can give the answer to that question. I know the names of the people on that list came through the RCMP security services in the normal course of their operation, that they were transferred to the minister and that he acted on them as I indicated earlier.

Mr. Oberle: My supplementary, then, is this: does the Prime Minister consider it to be the normal course of an operation of a security service of the RCMP to illegally enter the offices of a legally constituted corporation during a fire and selectively burglarize such an office?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE EVIDENCE FOR BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES NOT OBTAINED BY ILLEGAL MEANS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, might I try to approach the matter from a little different angle. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he could make a categorical statement to the House, from his knowledge of this subject matter, that some of the evidence from which this list was prepared was not obtained irregularly?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am in some confusion here. The previous question apparently had to do with an illegal break-in. I missed the beginning of that question because there was so much noise in the House and I may have given a wrong answer to the question. I assumed that the previous question was a question about the list we have been discussing.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, it was.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says yes. Then I do not know what the question of a break-in and illegality has to do with this particular matter. Let me get back to the present question.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to let the right hon. gentleman get back to the present question, which simply asked him whether he is prepared to make a categorical statement to this House that part of the evidence and facts upon which the list was prepared was not obtained through irregular means.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to make that statement. I presume that the RCMP obtains its information in legal fashion and that the people on this list came to their attention through the normal operation of the security services. I do not ask them where they get their information on security matters. I believe that the opposition would be rather incensed if I entered into the operation of the RCMP and tried to find out how their security information is gathered.

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH INQUIRY INTO BLACKLISTING OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister again, and plead with him as I did with the Solicitor General when this whole matter came before the House, to set up an inquiry to give the House and the people of Canada an opportunity, since they are as much concerned with the security of this country as is the Prime Minister, to hear all that I know and all that these people connected with this affair know. Would he set up such a tribunal so that those involved in this matter can be vindicated?

Mr. Speaker: That clearly is a representation, not a question.

RESOURCES

AGREEMENT WITH MARITIME PROVINCES ON ADMINISTRATION OF OFF-SHORE RESOURCES—IMPOSITION OF TAXES ON PERMIT HOLDERS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. An agreement was entered into yesterday between Canada and the three maritime provinces with regard to offshore minerals. This agreement leaves the Government of Canada in control of the administration of offshore minerals. Would the minister tell me whether it is the case that the three maritime provinces which have entered into that agreement are not to be permitted to impose any taxes on income, or any revenue taxation, but simply receive their share of the royalties? In addition, they are not allowed to impose any provincial corporation tax or other tax on income upon the permit holders in the areas in question. Is it also the case that any revenues that they receive are to be included in the equalization formula and be adopted under that formula?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are getting into a very complicated area when we start to talk about equalization formulas and revenue sharing of royalties from offshore resources. I think the hon. member knows that, after very considerable negotiation, agreement was reached with the provinces respecting the sharing of the royalty revenues from offshore resources, 75 per cent going to the provinces and 25 per cent to the federal government.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I addressed my question to income and to whether or not those provinces are forbidden to impose any provincial corporation tax or income taxes upon the permit holders in their offshore areas. In other words, their only source of revenue would be to share in the royalties and fees: they are not permitted to tax the permit holders. That is a very simple question and I would ask the hon. gentleman to answer it.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, again we are getting into the whole area of taxation with respect to the application of corporate taxes and equalization formulas. I am not prepared to give the hon. gentleman these specific undertakings for which he is looking, but I will be very pleased to refer this matter to my colleague the Minister of Finance.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF GIVING BOARD JURISDICTION OVER EXPORT OF COAL

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the importance of safeguarding Canada's natural resources for future Canadian needs, has the minister considered bringing under the aegis of the National Energy Board control over the export of Canadian coal?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, from time to time I have given this matter some consideration. At the present time, as the hon. member knows, the National Energy Board does not have jurisdiction over our coal resources, and in order for it to do so an amendment to the National Energy Board Act would be necessary. I believe that we are well covered at the present time in the event of any emergency through the application of the Export and Import Permits Act.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCREASED RATES FOR COMMUNITY PASTURES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is responsible for PFRA. Recently it was announced that under PFRA there would be a 50 per cent increase in 1977 pasture rates at community pastures in western Canada. Because of the fact that we have a depressed cattle market value for beef producers and also increased production costs, would the minister reconsider these drastic fee increases and leave the rates the same as the 1976 schedule?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, we had to accept the fact that we should increase the pasture rates in the community pastures under our jurisdiction in the prairies. But such an increase will not even cover the increased operation costs we have to face. Under the agreement that we concluded with the provinces several years ago, we must recover the costs we have incurred in the operation and maintenance of those community pastures, but not capitalization. Over the last two years, we came up with a deficit and we will still be in the red at the beginning of the next year. This is why we definitely had to increase those rates but the increase is below 50 per cent.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF INCREASED RATES FOR COMMUNITY PASTURES ON PRICES OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am surprised at the minister's answer. However, I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As this government department does not want to adhere to AIB guidelines and this 50 per cent increase in pasture fees will only mean in the long term increased prices, will the minister have his department investigate these new fees and protect both the producer and consumer from this greedy government department?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly examine the hon. member's question and look into the situation.

MULTICULTURALISM

ALLEGEDLY OFFENSIVE ARTICLE IN "CANADIAN MAGAZINE"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. On January 1, 1977 the Canadian Magazine, purportedly the magazine with the largest circulation in the country, contained an article entitled "Saskatchewan Crude" which resulted in the publication of old prejudices against Ukrainian Canadians under the guise of humour. Since the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission has seen fit to criticize strongly publication of this article, could the minister indicate whether a branch of his department, the Canadian Consultative Council, is in a position, under the present legislation, and in view of his statement that the branch would be involved in communicating understanding, to counteract the incorrect impression left by this article, which was in questionable taste and so offensive to so many people in our country?

● (1440)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Council on Multiculturalism for the three prairie provinces and British Columbia met this past weekend in Edmonton and this matter came up. I can report to the House that the opinion of the council was that although many of the ethno-cultural groups represented are quite prepared to receive humorous puns with respect to traditions and so on and not be ultra sensitive about them, it was the general feeling of everyone there, including myself, that this transgressed any limits of humour. It was not humour at all; it was crude and stupid. We felt we should indicate that to the publication involved and see if they would be prepared to make amends for disseminating old prejudicial words which are insulting to the ethnic groups in Canada, in this case particularly Ukrainians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIRPORTS

GANDER—CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES FOR IN-TRANSIT PASSENGERS ON INTERNATIONAL FLIGHTS—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question affects the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but primarily the Minister of Transport. On November 8, I asked him about the restrictions imposed on in-transit passengers at Gander airport because of the customs regulations and immigration regulations. At that time he informed me that short-range steps were being taken. These have now resulted in a sort of holding pen almost like slave quarters, which do not answer passenger needs as it is without restaurant or toilet facilities. Can the minister tell the House what permanent and acceptable facilities will be constructed at Gander airport for in-transit passengers on international runs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate informed me earlier today about the concern of people in his area with regard to this matter. I have been able to check the current status which is that the temporary facilities are moving ahead, and so are plans for the more permanent facilities which will be satisfactory. Everyone recognizes that temporary facilities by definition cannot be fully satisfactory. I understand the region has developed a plan which will likely meet its needs and I will be asking that the plan be brought forward as soon as possible so that we can act upon it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask the minister to put a time frame on this? This is important in the context that the public should not have to continue with substandard facilities which will result in a loss of transit traffic through that airport.

Mr. Lang: I can put the time frame this way, Mr. Speaker—as soon as possible. I include the kind of consultations that were very desirable which have taken place between my regional officials and the people involved in the area in order to have agreement about the kind of facilities required. I will immediately have a chance to look at these proposals and I shall try to move them forward as fast as possible. Obviously, until I have seen the proposal I cannot predict the exact length of time required.

EFFORTS TO SECURE NAME OF AGENT USED BY ITALIMPIANTI IN SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Last night Mr. Gray, former president of AECL told the Canadian people on national television that he had no knowledge of who was the recipient of $2½ million paid to an agent in connection with the sale of a reactor to Argentina. In view of the fact that only two persons can divulge this information, namely, Mr. Sicouri, president of Italimpianti, and the head of the Swiss bank which handled the transaction, is the minister prepared on behalf of the government to contact both these gentlemen? The Swiss banker, by the way, is reported to have said he is prepared to divulge the information if requested to do so by the Canadian authorities. Will the minister undertake to make these contacts and ask for the name of the recipient of the $2½ million paid by AECL?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have made it very clear that we have gone directly to the partner of AECL, the partner with which AECL made arrangements for the payment of an agent. I believe that their banker or someone on their behalf has supplied additional information to the committee. I very much regret it has not been possible to get that information from the Italimpianti partner. I have received no information from the RCMP or my colleague to whom the RCMP report that there has been anything improper as far as any Canadian is concerned. I believe I have done everything I can to get to the bottom of this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTION CANADA WITHDRAW FROM SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA IF ITALIMPIANTI REFUSES TO DIVULGE NAME OF AGENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, apparently the minister has done everything except ask the head of the Swiss bank to come through on his undertaking that he will provide the name if Canadian authorities request it. The minister has apparently not requested it. In view of the fact that Mr. Sicouri in his letter of December 17, 1976 hinted that any further pressures to divulge the name of the recipient might jeopardize agreement for the construction of the nuclear reactor in Argentina, may I ask the minister, if that agreement has not been signed, is the government prepared to make the condition that their partner, Italimpianti, divulge the name otherwise Canada will withdraw from the deal? If we do that it will save this country an additional $25 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I should like to make two points, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee—which is properly dealing with this matter—has written to the bank referred to by the hon. member, seeking that information. I believe that the Public Accounts Committee, having taken that step in their wisdom, should be supported.

An hon. Member: Support them.

Mr. Gillespie: That clearly is the responsibility and decision of the Public Accounts Committee itself. Let us deal with the second part of the hon. member's question. He asks if I could impose some kind of condition with respect to this contract with the Argentinians. I wonder if he realizes that at this time, after lengthy negotiations—indeed a series of renegotiations—we would be putting at risk in terms of over-all responsibility, jointly and severally, something in the order of $400 million. We could be sued by the customer in Argentina for something like $400 million for non-performance. We would be putting at risk as well many thousands of Canadian jobs. Is that what the hon. member wants?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister has not answered the question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Has the agreement with the government of Argentina been signed? If it has not been signed then there is no risk. If the minister thinks, in order to create jobs and make CANDU reactors, we ought to lose $25 million, it seems to me we could spend that money making things in Canada which we could make without having to incur financial loss. Has an agreement been signed and, if not, why is the minister not prepared to tell Italimpianti we will only proceed with them if they divulge the name which ought to have been divulged in the first place and which the minister ought to have asked for two months ago?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that our Italian partner signed and we have signed. I have also been informed that the Argentinian agency has given its approval. That approval has not been formally transmitted to us. I believe there are one or two technical details with respect to some financing questions, but I believe that these can be sorted out and that the deal will stand with the Argentinians.

SUGGESTED SUPPORT OF REQUEST THAT SWISS BANKER NAME AGENT OF ITALIMPIANTI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is a supplementary. In an earlier answer the minister indicated he felt that we would agree, and we do agree, that the request of the Public Accounts Committee to the Swiss banker ought to be supported by the government. If that is the case, and I believe it is, would the minister communicate with officers of that institution indicating the support he has just expressed for the request by the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee for the information? Would he also indicate that he feels it would be in the best interests of Canada, and the completion of this matter, if the Swiss banker lived up to the undertaking and that such action would have the complete support of the Canadian government?

● (1450)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am sure that the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee listened very carefully to the answer I gave a few moments ago. I would expect that being the sort of person he is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. Gillespie: —he would not lose any time in sending a copy of today's Hansard as a follow-up to the letter that he has already written.

[Later:]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would ask the minister to stop clowning around on this question—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and to tell the House whether he will accept his responsibility and communicate directly, as the responsible minister of the government of Canada, with the Swiss bank involved to indicate that it is an official request of the government of Canada in support of the Public Accounts Committee of this House to have that information which this House requires and which the government, if it has any self-esteem, requires.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I can only wonder at the intelligence of the Leader of the Opposition when he puts a question of that kind to me. If he were really serious about having me support, as I have tried to do in the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: —the Public Accounts Committee, he would not put a question like that to me because he must realize that the Canadian government would frown and would not in any way want to put a Canadian in a similar position vis-à-vis a foreign government, and that is what he is asking me to do right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: You cannot have it both ways.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

ALLEGATION A PORTION OF ALLOTTED FUNDS USED FOR NEW OFFICE FACILITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The government of Canada recently announced an additional $40 million to be allocated for increased search and rescue facilities in Canada for the period 1977-78. Doctor Robert Sommerville, a coast-guard voluntary rescue agent from Campbell River, B.C., stated in a press release of January 1, 1977:

> The first $1 million of the $40 million allocated for search and rescue has gone to a new office, a sauna and a gymnasium in Ottawa.

Will the minister advise the House whether these allegations are correct and if in fact any of these funds have been allocated to Ottawa for recreational purposes?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the allegations are totally incorrect. No money has been identified in the new money for any accommodation in connection with search and rescue offices, and at no time has there been any mention of such things as a sauna and a gymnasium. I hope that in the future such people will obtain facts instead of making these accusations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES AGAINST ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA FOR FAILURE TO KEEP MINUTES OF DIRECTORS' MEETINGS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Last Friday, in answer to my question, the Acting Prime Minister said he thought the Minister of Justice might have some information on the matter of charges under the Canada Corporations Act against executives of AECL for failure to keep proper minutes of proceedings of directors' meetings and that the government would inquire and advise. Can the Minister of Justice say whether, in view of the fact that the evidence given to the Public Accounts Committee indicates that the former president, J. Lorne Gray, acted in an autocratic fashion, committing the company to contracts on his own and seeking board approval months later, and that the minutes frequently contained no reference to large contracts, such as the partnership with Italimpianti entered into by the corporation, and generally failed to record the decisions of the board, what charges has the government decided will be laid in these instances?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the result of the hon. member's question, I reviewed the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is prepared to answer it.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Corporations Act calls for a number of obligations and at this point the questions raised in the House may not have had any direct allegations that the minutes have not been kept. But I can only suggest that if charges should be laid, that they be laid in the proper fashion because the Corporations Act is not enforced by the department in this area.

Oral Questions

KITIMAT PIPELINE—CONSIDERATION BY ENERGY BOARD OF MARINE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION COSTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On Monday, my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, asked questions about the Kitimat pipeline. Can the minister advise the House whether the National Energy Board, before it makes a decision on this particular application, will have in front of it the costs of marine environmental protection so that those costs may be part of what is computed in the decision of the National Energy Board as to whether the pipeline is of benefit to Canada and in the public interest?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a specific answer to an environmental question, but if the question were to be directed to the Minister of the Environment, he might be able to provide this information. From the point of view of the National Energy Board, they would like to receive as much environmental input as possible, but their concern, as the hon. member must know, deals with the landward side of the application, not the seaward side. That is why this interdepartmental task force was created to deal with the pollution dangers, etc., that might be associated with this application.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister then advise the House how the National Energy Board can make the decision which it has to make under the statute if it does not have before it, not only the environmental consideration but the cost to the Canadian public of maintaining environmental protection of British Columbia's west coast?

Mr. Gillespie: The information will undoubtedly be made available to NEB but whether the NEB will want to take that fully into consideration is something of which I cannot be sure. I can assure the hon. member that the government will be concerned. It will receive the report of the NEB and a report of this particular task force. So the answer is, one way or another, that the information will be taken into account.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REASON FOR LOW PRICE ON SALE TO CHINA

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. According to recent news reports, the Canadian Wheat Board has sold some 56 million bushels of wheat to China for approximately $170 million. A quick calculation shows that it was sold for about $3.04 per bushel at a time when the Canadian Wheat Board quotations on the Vancouver market range from approximately $3.57 for No.1 to $2.99 for No.3. Can the minister indicate why the sale was for considerably less than the Vancouver wheat board asking price, and can he assure the producer that he will realize not less than the initial price on the sale?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the pricing of wheat in such a contract is a matter for the Canadian Wheat Board. While estimates are given in rounded figures and these calculations are often used in the press, these are not meant to be accurate descriptions of the price. The Canadian Wheat Board ordinarily takes the position that it does not give this information because of its commercial significance and its position with regard to other buyers as well as to its competitors in the world. I could determine whether that remains the Canadian Wheat Board position in order to satisfy the hon. member, but I am quite sure it would be so.

Mr. Neil: Could the minister advise us whether or not the figure of $170 million is the figure released by the Wheat Board or a guesstimate by the media?

Mr. Lang: In terms of the normal practice it is the latter, but I will check that.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER FOLLOW EXAMPLE OF PRESIDENT CARTER IN SETTING GUIDELINES FOR DISCLOSURE OF ASSETS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, and it involves the general area of conflict of interest. Considering the strict rules made public by the Davis government of the province of Ontario and the Lévesque government of the province of Quebec regarding conflict of interest both for the premiers involved and their ministers, and considering the example set by President Carter for the people of the United States by making a complete and open declaration of his own affairs and insisting that his ministers do the same thing, will the Prime Minister set the same example for the Canadian people as Mr. Carter has set for the American people by making a complete declaration of his own affairs and insisting that his ministers make the same disclosures as are required of cabinet officers in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a government we do have to bring in the bill on this whole matter. The bill will be the result of the conflict of interest guidelines which the government referred a couple of years ago to both houses of parliament, which was commented on by them, and which we are now incorporating into a bill. I just remind the hon. member that the Senate and the House of Commons themselves were not pressing the government in the direction which the hon. members says President Carter and other people have gone.

Mr. Grafftey: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that it requires a bill for him simply to make the same declaration

Mr. Carter made and to insist that his cabinet do the very same thing? Does he feel that in view of the example set by the Lévesque and Davis governments and Mr. Carter without bills, blind trusts and frozen trusts are satisfactory procedures in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: I find the argument passing strange because when we made our statements on conflict of interest a couple of years ago, this very opposition pooh-poohed them saying that they were just guidelines of the government and why did the government not bring in a bill; that is what we are attempting to do now.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—USE OF SPACE AFTER RELOCATION

Question No. 858—Mr. Herbert:

Does the Department of Veterans Affairs intend to utilize the space vacated by the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, the War Veterans Allowance Board and the Bureau of Pension Advocates as well as veterans services, treatment services and administration services after their relocation to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island and, if so, in what manner?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Utilization of space vacated by the Department of Veterans Affairs through relocation to Charlottetown, P.E.I. will be a Department of Public Works responsibility and would be included in that Department's space utilization program for 1980-81. The Department of Veterans Affairs will continue to utilize some space in Ottawa for the office of the Deputy Minister, a small nucleus of staff, and for the Veterans Land Administration program which is not part of the relocation planning.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—POSITIONS DESIGNATED BILINGUAL

Question No. 860—Mr. Herbert:

In the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, the War Veterans Allowance Board and the Bureau of Pension Advocates as well as veterans services, treatment services and administration services of the Department of Veterans Affairs, how many positions are designated bilingual?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Canadian Pension Commission, 128; Pension Review Board, 11; War Veterans Allowance Board, 29; Bureau of Pensions Advocates, 26; Veterans Services, 181; Treatment Services, 777; Administrative Services, 178.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CONSULTATION WITH EMPLOYEES AFFECTED BY RELOCATION

Question No. 861—Mr. Herbert:

Did the Department of Veterans Affairs question any employees who will be affected by the relocation to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island as to whether they wish to be relocated and, if so, with what results?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No. Employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs will be questioned as to whether they wish to be relocated to Charlottetown, P.E.I. when they can be provided with full information on any revised Relocation Guidelines which may result from current study by the National Joint Council.

INFORMATION ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND CHARLOTTETOWN

Question No. 864—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the current population of (a) Prince Edward Island (b) Charlottetown?

2. In each case, how many persons list French as (a) their mother tongue (b) the language of the household?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: 1. The preliminary population[1] according to the 1976 Census for: (a) Prince Edward Island is 116,251; (b) Charlottetown, 16,908[2].

2. (I) In 1976 only the question on mother tongue was asked, but the information will not be available before the last quarter of 1977. (II) However, according to the 1971 Census for: (a) Prince Edward Island: (i) 7,365 reported French as their mother tongue. (ii) 4,405 reported French as the language most often spoken at home. (b) Charlottetown: (i) 370 reported French as their mother tongue (ii) 60 reported French as the language most often spoken at home.

[1] Preliminary population counts are subject to revision. For example, they exclude people enumerated at a temporary address (hotels, general hospitals, construction camps, etc.) and people who temporarily live outside of Canada. These people will be added later to the population counts of their usual place of residence. In most cases, however, the figures shown here are very close to the final population counts.

[2] Revised preliminary population figure.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—VETERANS PREFERENCE FOR NEW EMPLOYEES

Question No. 868—Mr. Herbert:

1. Will there be hiring of new employees with the Department of Veterans Affairs move to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island and, if so, will preference be given to veterans?

2. Will it be necessary for these veterans to be residents of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Yes, there will be hiring of new employees. The Veterans' Preference will apply as prescribed in the Public Service Employment Act.

2. The Public Service Employment Regulations give preference to residents of a locality when the positions to be filled are either in the Administrative Support or Operational Category. For the other occupational groups, the department will determine which geographic limitation will apply for recruiting purposes, taking into account the requirements of the Public Service Employment Act and Regulations and the labour market conditions. The Veterans' Preference would apply to all qualified candidates regardless of place of residence.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO EMPLOYEES WHO OWN HOMES

What financial assistance will the Department of Veterans Affairs offer to employees who (a) have unexpired leases (b) own homes in the National Capital Region and are to be transferred to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Treasury Board Relocation Directive, Part 4, describes the financial assistance related to the disposal and/or acquisition of accommodation by federal employees who relocate. This Directive deals with disposal of both leased and owned accommodation. Any relocation of staff will take place some years hence by which time the current Directive could be changed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—ASSISTANCE TO UNILINGUAL FRENCH EMPLOYEES AFTER RELOCATION

Question No. 870—Mr. Herbert:

What plans have been made by the Department of Veterans Affairs to assist the unilingual French-speaking employees of the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, the War Veterans Allowance and the Bureau of Pension Advocates as well as veterans services, treatment services and administration services of the Department who will be relocated to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Since the analysis of the implications of the relocation on DVA personnel is not completed, and moreover, since no employee assistance policy has been adopted, we are not in a position to answer this question at the moment.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—FRENCH LANGUAGE SCHOOLS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 889—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the government assured itself that there will be sufficient openings in the public school system in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island for the children of public servants employed by the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, the War Veterans Allowance Board and the Bureau of Pension Advocates as well as veterans services, treatment services and administration services of the Department of Veterans Affairs who are to be relocated and who wish to continue their education in the French language?

2. Will such facilities in the French language be available for all high school grades?

3. What distance will the students be required to travel when entering a French language university?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1, 2 and 3. The requirement for education facilities in the French language for the staff who will be employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs in Charlottetown, P.E.I. in 1981 cannot yet be determined. Identification of any such need can only be made when employees are in a position to indicate their wishes concerning relocation. Their wishes will be obtained only when they can be advised of the provisions of the revised Relocation Guidelines currently under study by the National Joint Council.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—EMPLOYEES HIRED FROM MANPOWER JOB CREATION BRANCH

Question No. 970—Mr. Smith:

1. How many persons have been hired by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development from the Manpower Job Creation Branch since January 1976 and, in each case, what are their (a) positions and qualifications (b) salaries?

2. Has the Department given support to individual members or groups known to be affiliated with the American Indian Movement and, if so, is this done in conjunction with or on specific instructions from provincial/territorial Indian organizations and/or chief of bands?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Seven.

Seven

(a)		(b)
1 Assistant Deputy Minister	SX-3	$35,500—$47,500
1 Director, Management Review and Development Group	PM-7	$26,400—$33,000
1 Director, Program Evaluation Division	ES-4	$31,299—$34,691

2 Research Associates	PM-3 (term)	$15,459—$17,523
1 Project Officer	PM-3 (term)	$15,459—$17,523

These employees were hired in accordance with Public Service Commission Selection Standards.

2. The Department has not given support to individual members or groups known to be affiliated with the American Indian Movement.

BOOKSTORE CONCESSION—MIRABEL

Question No. 1,160—Mr. MacKay:

1. Were tenders called for the bookstore concession at Mirabel Airport and, if so (a) which companies tendered and what was the bid in each case (b) which bid was accepted by the Department of Transport?

2. Were there any conditional clauses attached to the winning tender and, if so, what was their substance?

3. Have there been any revisions in the lease arrangements between the company with the winning tender and the Department and, if so, what are the details?

4. What has been the monthly gross revenue of the bookstore concession since it first became operational up to October, 1976?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Tenders were called for the bookstore concession at Mirabel.

(b) Coles Book Stores Limited were awarded the tender, the operation commencing on December 1, 1975.

2. There were no conditional clauses attached to the winning tender.

3. By mutual agreement between Transport Canada and the successful tenderer, the storage space was reduced from 270 square feet to 100 square feet. This action had no bearing on the revenues to Transport Canada. No other revisions in the lease arrangements took place.

4. Monthly gross revenues from December 1, 1975 to October 31, 1976 are as follows: December, 1975, $26,300; January, 1976, $22,500; February, 1976, $21,000; March, 1976, $23,500; April, 1976, $22,000; May, 1976, $24,700; June, 1976, $23,500; July, 1976, $29,900; August, 1976, $33,200; September, 1976, $26,300; October, 1976, $22,100.

PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC UNDER THE ESTABLISHED PROGRAMMES (INTERIM ARRANGEMENTS) ACT

Was payment made to Quebec for all or part of the total of $250,212,000 shown in Supplementary Estimates (B) as provided under the Established Programmes (Interim Arrangements) Act and the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and, if so, on what date?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The amount of $250,212,000 for the statutory item—Established Programmes (Interim Arrangements) Act and the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964, consists of $213,407,000 included in the Main Estimates and $36,805,000 which is the latest estimate of the additional amount required under the provisions of these acts. Payments to Quebec under this program are made in 12 approximately equal monthly instalments, with each instalment being paid on the last calendar day of the month. To date, during 1976-77, nine such monthly payments have been made.

PAYMENTS UNDER THE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT

Question No. 1,236—Mr. Herbert:

Were payments made in the past year under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and, if so, by province, on what dates?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Payments are made under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act in respect of several activities. During fiscal 1976-77 payments have been made to the provinces in respect of these activities on the dates shown below:

Activity	Date of Payment	Province
Revenue Equalization Payments	Two payments each month—on the first and third working day following the fifteenth calendar day of the month.	All provinces except Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia
Tax Collection Payments	Four payments each month—on the sixth working day of the month and on the first, second and fourth working day following the fifteenth calendar day of the month.	All provinces except Quebec
Revenue Guarantee Payments	Variable—in fiscal 1976-77 on May 12, 1976 and December 29, 1976.	All provinces
Payments in respect of Provincial share of Federal Tax on 1971 Undistributed Income	One payment per year which is variable by month—in 1976-77 in August of 1976.	All provinces
Post-Secondary Adjustment Payments	Twelve payments each year on the third Thursday of each month.	All provinces

CONSIDERATION OF PAYMENTS TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS IN THE PREPARATION OF MAIN ESTIMATES

Question No. 1,237—Mr. Herbert:

Were payments to provincial governments, which are indicated on page 36 of Supplementary Estimates (B) in an amount of $72,329,000 considered in the preparation and presentation of the Main Estimates and, if not, by province, for what reason?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The additional amount of $72,329,000 is required for statutory payments under the various activities listed on page 36 of the Supplementary Estimates (B). The legislation and regulations providing for these payments indicate in considerable detail the information to be used and the procedure to be followed in calculating the payments. The Main Estimates provisions were calculated, in accordance with the legislation, using the most up-to-date information then available. Since that time some of the information has been revised, in particular the revenues of the provincial and federal governments, thereby necessitating a revision in the amount of the statutory payments.

POST OFFICE CALENDARS

Question No. 1,296—Mr. Crouse:

1. Did the Postmaster General have 1977 calendars printed and distributed compliments of the Post Office of Canada and, if so, how many?

2. What was the cost of the calendars?

3. Were the recipients classified in any special way prior to dispatch of the calendars?

4. What is the approximate number of recipients?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Yes, 800,000. It has been established that the production of the annual Post Office calendar is the least expensive way of providing essential mailing information to the general public.

2. Just under $117,000.

3. The calendars are being made available to the general public at post office counters where counter cards encourage people to ask for your copy here. A small number of recipients such as Members of Parliament, Senators, and large volume mailers receive calendars through the mail.

4. It is anticipated that all 800,000 calendars will be distributed or picked up.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I began my speech yesterday I put on the record the fact that unemployment in December, 1976, jumped to 7.5 per cent. The number of unemployed was 754,000, up from 693,000 the year before. I also put on the record some provincial unemployment figures for December of 1976. I do not want to repeat those figures, but I was in the middle of saying—and I will complete the sentence—that the unemployment figure in British Columbia for December of 1976 was 92,000, an increase from the figure of 82,000 in December of 1975.

There was a sharp increase in the jobless rate for young workers in the 15 to 24 year age group. In that group 14 per cent of the eligible workers were out of work in December, and as my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), has already indicated, this is the group which will be most adversely affected by the decision incorporated in this bill to increase the number of weeks during which a person has to work before qualifying for unemployment insurance, from eight weeks to twelve weeks.

The minister and some hon. members of the official opposition implied that there are jobs for many of the unemployed, both those who have been counted and the thousands who have not been counted. We know from the questions which were asked about a week ago by members of the New Democratic Party and by members of the Conservative party from the maritime provinces that the figures which I have quoted are not the real unemployment figures. Those figures do not take into account thousands of people, especially in slow growth areas like the Atlantic provinces and like the interlake area of Manitoba, where the rate is probably twice as high as the official rate because so many people have simply given up hope of finding work even if they look for it. I think it was the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who estimated that in Newfoundland the real rate of unemployment is probably not the 14.5 per cent Statistics Canada gives us but probably 30 per cent.

If we are going to start making things tougher, as a number of hon. members of the Conservative party suggested yesterday we should, if we are going to police the unemployment insurance system more actively, if we are going to put more restrictions on people qualifying, and if we are going to cut off people who do not meet certain standards, it seems obvious to me that we do that because we believe that there are many jobs which can be filled by people who are unemployed, people who are drawing unemployment insurance benefits, and people on welfare who simply do not want to look for those jobs.

Statistics Canada tells us not only the number of people who are unemployed but also the number of job vacancies in this country, and according to information Statistics Canada released just a few days ago, in the fourth quarter of 1976 the number of full time, part time or casual labour job vacancies decreased from 62,300 for the same period in 1975 to 41,700 in 1976. In other words, if every one of the almost 42,000 job vacancies was filled, there would still be over 710,000 people unemployed.

If we look at the provincial breakdown for job vacancies, we can get an understanding of what is happening in this country. In Alberta, where there is almost full employment and little unemployment, and people can afford to quit one job in order to look for another, there are 13 job vacancies for every 1,000 people. In Saskatchewan, where employment is at relatively high levels and where there is not much unemployment, there are eight job vacancies for every 1,000 people. But in Nova Scotia there are two job vacancies for every 1,000 people.

Therefore it is not surprising that people in Nova Scotia do not quit their jobs easily, do not leave their jobs unless they have other jobs waiting.

I am not surprised that many in Canada are under the mistaken impression that thousands of our unemployed could find jobs if only they wanted them badly enough. I am not surprised that some members of the official opposition think that, although I should expect members from the Atlantic provinces, where there is heavy unemployment, to know better. But I find it most disturbing that senior officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration do not agree with Statistics Canada figures relating to unemployment and job vacancies.

I want to put on record the views of the Assistant Deputy Minister of Manpower, Mr. Harry Hodder, as expressed in the Toronto Star on December 10, 1976. I do not often raise in this House the views of senior civil servants; but when a senior civil servant grants an interview or makes a speech which is reported in a newspaper, I think it is quite proper to comment and put his views, as expressed in the newspaper article, on record. I hope the minister is listening because the point is important. Mr. Hodder's views, as expressed in that newspaper article, part of which I shall quote in a moment, show an inexcusable contempt for people. The expression of such views on the part of a public servant is indefensible, and I question whether he should be employed as a public servant.

The headline over the story in the Toronto Star reads, "50,000 'vagrants' to be cut off unemployment." The article quotes Mr. Hodder, who deals with the 50,000 people who will be cut off from unemployment insurance under the new regulations which will require a person to work for 12 weeks instead of eight weeks before collecting unemployment insurance. The first part of the article is in quotation marks. Mr. Hodder is quoted as saying this:

'They are mostly young people, moving in and out of the labour force and using unemployment insurance to fatten their income' . . .

The next part of the article I shall quote paraphrases Mr. Hodder's views, as follows:

Government studies estimate the 50,000 claimants eliminated under the bill can easily find work if they want to.

The studies estimate that it is unlikely that more than 2 per cent or 3 per cent of them would be forced to seek welfare.

Part of the next paragraph is in direct quotation marks and reads:

'The fact is, a very small proportion of them really need unemployment insurance benefits. They've been getting money for jam' . . .

Later, the article goes on to say this:

Hodder, who estimates the experiment might cost $5 million in the first year, says: 'It's better than having them lying in bed drinking beer.'

I suggest that a deputy minister earning probably more than $40,000 a year—

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What's the matter? This is a point of debate.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has quoted a paraphrased version of Mr. Hodder's views, and he also read the headline of the article which mentions the word "vagrants," a word which I do not think my official used. Since officials cannot defend themselves in this House, surely it would be more appropriate if the hon. member were to write to the official, charge him with holding the views he is alleged to hold and allow him to make a response, before raising the matter in the House where the official has not got the opportunity to defend himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I think I read five or six paragraphs of that newspaper story and I said specifically, I think, that two of those paragraphs paraphrased what the assistant deputy minister apparently said. The other four paragraphs were in quotation marks.

Mr. Cullen: Allegedly.

Mr. Orlikow: Not allegedly; they are in quotation marks. I am sure the assistant deputy minister saw that story, and if he was misquoted he would have made his complaints to the newspaper. I have quoted an article which appeared more than six weeks ago. I think I have every right to quote it. If the assistant deputy minister was misquoted, as the minister suggests or alleges, it was his job, not mine, to take that question up with the newspaper. I merely say that what he is quoted as saying is in line with the minister's thinking, as expressed yesterday. The minister may shake his head, but I suggest that I am correct.

We face the prospect of more unemployment in this country than at any time since World War II. The projections of government organizations, academics, banks and insurance companies show that unemployment will be worse in 1977 than it was in 1976. I could spend a couple of hours reading such dismal reports into the record.

I shall quote one more newspaper story, written by Wayne Cheveldayoff in the Globe and Mail of January 11, 1977. Dealing with the statistics issued by various economic organizations, he said:

Economic forecasters expect real gross national product (excluding inflation) to advance by about 3.5 per cent this year—a rate of growth that is significantly below the long run potential rate and down from last year's gain of 5 per cent . . .

Despite the expected stimulus, 1977, as the second year of recovery from the 1974-75 recession, will show slower growth in all components of GNP (excluding housing construction and business capital investment) than the average for the past five economic recoveries . . . The jobless number will exceed 850,000, while job vacancies remain under 100,000.

That is precisely what I said earlier. Mr. Cheveldayoff in his article estimated that the unemployment rate for all 1977 will fluctuate between 7.5 per cent and 8 per cent. We say that kind of unemployment is unnecessary. We do not think the country can afford that kind of unemployment. We do not think it is necessary to pay out as much in unemployment insurance and welfare as we have paid out in recent years. My party is not alone in putting forth this opinion. That is also the opinion of the former head of the Economic Council, Arthur Smith.

A number of economists in governments, universities, and business have been calling on the government to stimulate the economy and follow the example set by President Carter. He has proposed a two-year program, to which Congress will undoubtedly agree, calling for the expenditure of $31 billion. Half that amount will be used for job creation; the other half will make its impact felt in the form of tax cuts, to stimulate the economy. We do not have anything like that being proposed for this country by this government.

I wish to give one example of what unemployment has caused us. An article by Don McGillivray appeared in the January 12 edition of the Montreal Gazette. He calculated what unemployment has done to this country. He stated that last year 9,572,000 Canadians who worked produced about $180 billion worth of goods and services, the gross national product. That works out to $18,800 for the average employed Canadian. However, 736,000 Canadians were unemployed. That is the number averaged over the whole year who were officially out of work and seeking jobs.

He pointed out that, until a few years ago, the Economic Council calculated that full employment would be reached when we had only 3 per cent unemployed. He does not agree. He said that in recent years the Economic Council increased the rate of unemployment which they believed would represent full employment to 4½ per cent. He stated that even if you take that figure there were 286,000 Canadians in 1976 who should have been working but were in fact unemployed.

Mr. McGillivray pointed out that if you assume that these are the least productive people, and if you cut in half the $18,000 average which was produced by each Canadian citizen who was employed, which would be about $9,000, you come to a figure of $2.5 billion in lost employment which we had in this country because of the existing unemployment.

The government has not taken the problem of unemployment at all seriously. It has paid little more than lip service with regard to the objective of achieving full employment. The LIP, LEAP and OFY programs have not been serious instruments in a broad, consistent attack on unemployment.

There is no iron law which states we cannot reduce unemployment to 3 per cent. Other countries have done it. France, Japan, Sweden and Germany had unemployment of less than 2 per cent in the ten year period 1962 to 1973 while our unemployment in that period averaged over 5 per cent. That level of unemployment is neither natural nor acceptable.

We have to take whatever steps are necessary to achieve full employment. The government is not doing that. Instead of aiming for full employment, as I said last night, there have been massive expenditures for manpower training for jobs which simply do not exist. They have not existed in the years we have had manpower training, they do not exist today, and are not likely to exist unless the government takes a much more active role in producing jobs than it has in recent years.

As I said last night, the manpower programs we have had have been aimed in the wrong direction. I quoted a sentence or two from the study commissioned by the C. D. Howe Institute on manpower training programs by Barbara Goldman. She found that current manpower programs are heavily weighted toward training, even though the training does not match the labour job market requirements. She found the program started and stopped, not because of manpower or job needs, but because of political decisions on the part of the government. This department has consistently been wrong in the advice it has given to the government and in the kinds of programs it has offered to the public.

I want to spend a few minutes on the proposals in this bill, first with regard to job creation. The government is proposing that UIC recipients who accept work on federal government work projects will be paid out of UIC funds and will receive the greater of UIC rates or the prevailing wage rate for that job in that area. Refusal to join such a project, or quitting the job once employed, will not result in disqualification. However, working on such projects will not be considered "employment" and will not make one eligible for future UIC benefits. It sounds like a cheap way to get work done. It gets paid out of the UIC fund rather than departmental budgets, and it does not provide the worker with credits for future UIC benefits. That could create a very serious situation for people who participate in such programs.

It is interesting to compare the proposal made in 1977 with what a former minister of manpower and immigration said. That member tried to be elected to the Quebec National Assembly at the time of its recent election. This was in 1966 when the House was debating estimates for his then new department. In response to a proposal by an opposition member for job creation programs, he said and I quote:

> The hon. member made a suggestion with which I basically disagree when he said we should try to find part-time work for those who draw unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance is a type of insurance. The people who get unemployment insurance are not living on public charity. If we give start to competition between workers and those who are on unemployment insurance, I fear we will create an unbearable situation. Those people start working for lower salaries and will finally end up competing with regular workers. To my mind we must instead find regular employment for the people on unemployment insurance, full-time jobs that will afford them a livelihood. We must not allow them to compete against the working class.

In recent years I have usually disagreed with the then minister, but I must say that in 1966 he had a very sound, humanitarian, and realistic point of view, one with which I agreed completely.

In order to free up training funds, people eligible for UIC would be paid their training allowance, the greater of UIC or training rates, out of UIC funds, thus leaving more training money available for those who cannot qualify for UIC. Looking over Manpower's budgets from 1970-71 to 1974-75, we see that the department has spent up to 75 per cent of its annual budget on manpower training. For what purpose? To keep training the same people over and over again for jobs that do not exist. Very little is spent on job creation. This scheme is another example of the kinds of things which should not be done.

I wish now to put on record a criticism by a provincial civil servant which I believe to be very valid. He is active and knowledgeable in the field of manpower training and education. He said, and I quote:

The manpower system in Canada has also witnessed considerable change in the past 20 years. This development has been primarily quantitative with scant attention to the interests and needs of the manpower trainees. Manpower decision makers have concentrated upon re-educating, retraining, and remolding the trainees without much attention to changing the requirements of the labour market.

My hon. friend from Nickel Belt talked about the large number of women being trained to become hairdressers in Newfoundland, probably enough to supply the entire need for hairdressers in all of Canada. I am not against hairdressers, but we can only use so many of them in this country.

The growth of the many manpower programs obscures the illogic of much of this direction. The absence of full employment often ensures training for more skilled unemployment. Differing levels of training allowances and attendance and varying recruitment systems for trainees, reinforce the standard educational systems under which universities are essentially for the children of middle and upper classes, community colleges are for the blue collar class, and adult basic education, with its related purposes courses, is for society's losers. I think that is a valid assessment of what we find in our manpower training program.

I want to talk now about one other proposal which is before us, that is, the developmental use of the unemployment insurance fund. One of the proposed sweeteners in this bill is the use of unemployment insurance funds to help create employment. These measures are supposed to be brought into play in the fall of 1977 as part of the government's push to reduce unemployment.

We have the work-sharing proposal, a scheme by which an employer who is forced to lay off part of his work force could make an agreement with the government whereby he would instead reduce the number of hours worked by everyone and the government would pay UIC benefits to everyone to make up for their drop in income. Participation in work-sharing would not affect eligibility for benefits later on. While it would be nice to prevent lay-offs, will the scheme not turn into another way to subsidize employers who claim they are forced into a lay-off? One remembers the Training in Industry program which had to be abandoned when the department found out it was simply subsidizing employers who were paying low wages. Work-sharing agreements will not be subject to appeal. The cost of this developmental use will be borne by employee-employer contributions.

When I saw that proposal, Mr. Speaker, it seemed inconceivable to me that it could have been approved by employer and employee groups which usually advise the Department of Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I took the trouble to inquire whether the matter had even been discussed with those people, and I was informed by a source which I believe to be reliable that this and other proposals were not even discussed with the advisory committee on unemployment insurance.

I have sometimes not agreed with all the views of my friends in the labour movement. I was not enthused, to put it mildly, by their reaction to the government's anti-inflation program, their manifesto and the call for tripartism. But how can the government expect to get the co-operation of labour or industry on basic matters such as this, in the light of present economic circumstances and the very large number of unemployed, if it does not deal in depth, if it does not deal honestly and frankly with the people who are so vitally concerned?

I am not saying that those people will necessarily agree with this or any other proposal. I am not saying that a government should not act in the absence of unanimous agreement. Governments may feel they are bound to act even if a particular group or vested interest disagrees with a program which has been proposed. But how can a government expect to get co-operation and bring in a successful program when, in a field where for 25 years or more there have been institutions such as advisory committees, questions of this kind are not even discussed?

The government is not interested, though, in what labour wants. It is not interested in what the employers want. After all, the government has experts of its own, bureaucrats.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, we are debating here one of the most difficult and complex social problems a government can face. It is not just a question of unemployment, important though that question may be, and it is not just a question of unemployment insurance, important though that program undoubtedly is. We are discussing the whole range of problems which go to create a dynamic, complex and fluid labour market, incorporating a huge annual addition of new workers and shifting with the pressures of international trade and commerce.

In such a situation no government can have a higher priority than to deal effectively with unemployment. I believe that the income earned from the dignity of work is preferable to the income which arrives in the form of an unemployment insurance cheque. And I believe that we must support and develop an employment strategy designed to create what unemployed Canadians most want and need—the dignity and personal satisfaction provided by real and worth-while jobs, not to mention an earned income higher than unemployment insurance benefits.

Although private sector employment is expected to keep growing, the number of jobs in the short term over the next year or two cannot realistically be expected to increase much faster than the number of Canadians seeking those jobs.

Moreover, in the early 1980's, when the influx of young people seeking jobs will taper off, we may well face a situation in which the shortage becomes one of workers rather than jobs. Therefore, we must have a strategy which will provide jobs today but meet the need of tomorrow.

Our strategy must be one which will avoid massive inflation-stimulating deficits. It must not be a strategy of major monetary or fiscal stimulation, vast programs of public construction or public service expansion, or major tax cuts. These would not help to reduce inflationary forces. What we need, and what the government's employment strategy aims to achieve, is a progressive reduction of unemployment over the next five years without generating other major problems.

I believe the vast majority of Canadians want to work. And there is work to be done. But since there is no single cause underlying our rate of unemployment, there is no single solution either. There must, however, be a unified strategy, not to cure unemployment but to help keep it down, a strategy which allows us to reduce unemployment progressively over the next few years in a way consistent with the removal of wage and price controls.

Our labour market is too dynamic and the problems too complex and fluid to be able to afford a fragmented, inefficient approach to employment policy and to the organization of the labour market. That is why we are merging the UIC and the Department of Manpower and Immigration into the new commission and department of employment and immigration, and that is why the new organization must continue and strengthen the participation of business and labour in its work.

The activities of all levels of government in the labour market must also be better co-ordinated, as I think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was correct to point out yesterday in the course of his rambling remarks. But I might just point out in that connection that figures from the district UIC office in my own riding indicate that not more than two people would be added to the welfare rolls each week as a direct result of the increased entrance requirement. And the London district office serves not just one constituency, but three. I hope that the hon. member, therefore, was not suggesting that long consultations are necessary before the federal government should propose changes in unemployment insurance legislation which would effectively place two additional people per week on the assistance rolls in the area served by a centre as large as London, especially when the cost of that assistance is shared 50-50 with the federal government.

With a stronger institutional base, then, and with co-operation from the private sector and between governments, we can reduce our employment problems in Canada if we can plan an effective, flexible strategy. The government has such a strategy, Mr. Speaker, a strategy with three components. The first is a comprehensive job creation program squarely based on community priorities; the second consists of youth employment and employability measures, to ease the transition from school to work for young people, who make up half the unemployed; the third is a group of selective preventive measures to reduce the loss of work and hasten a return to employment.

We all recognize that a permanent private sector job is what Canadians most want and that we must help them find it. But we must also recognize that when private sector jobs do not exist in sufficient numbers, we have an obligation, both to the unemployed themselves and to the Canadian community, to make sure that people can have work and the incomes that go with work.

From the point of view of both society and the individual concerned, work is far better than just giving people a cheque. The cost of unemployment is not just a loss of so many dollars or so much output. Much of the cost comes in failed career hopes, lost opportunities and eroded skills, in family stress, and in a growing dependency on the working members of the community.

Unemployment, therefore, is costly not only for our economy and our society, but most particularly for the worker who loses his job. Idleness brings loss of skills, loss of confidence, and erodes the worker's feeling that he participates in his community. While he may need, and has a right to income maintenance, we must be able to offer him something more. The government is now developing job creation models in which workers who are likely to be unemployed and on unemployment insurance for some months would be invited to participate in activities which have social betterment value for their communities.

We have in mind projects which would utilize many of the best features of earlier local initiatives programs, but which could be tailored more carefully to the needs of the individual—his need to spend some time in a continued job search, and his need for job counselling. The plan would allow participants to continue receiving UIC benefits, and they could receive additional support, for example, from cost of work allowances and for project overhead costs. These additional moneys would have to be voted for this purpose.

In 1977-78, the first full year of the government's five-year employment strategy, there will be an investment in the neighbourhood of $350 million over and above regular expenditures on manpower programs. And in that five-year period much of the incremental funding for the employment strategy will come from changes in the unemployment insurance legislation.

In the first full year, for instance, savings to the government from the legislative changes will be about $110 million. Future savings will be even greater. Because unemployment insurance savings will mount as unemployment declines, we can look at costs and resources averaged over five years. It is therefore expected that, if parliament approved the changes that have been proposed in the Unemployment Insurance Act, reduced government contributions to the unemployment insurance account will offset the incremental costs of this employment strategy.

Some people are repeatedly on unemployment insurance because they lack basic job skills and would benefit from occupational training or re-training. Although there is already some integration of unemployment insurance and training allowances, the system is complex, and the training program which is entirely voluntary cannot accommodate all who need training.

Another potential developmental use of unemployment insurance is the short work week. In Europe some enterprises—enterprises which would otherwise have to lay off part of their work force—retain all workers on the job with shorter hours. Allowances are paid in respect of the difference between the hours worked and the normal work week. This sort of program requires the co-operation of company and union, but it has the great advantage of keeping people on the job and maintaining the skills of those workers during temporary business downturns.

Canada has one of the world's most efficient and comprehensive unemployment insurance programs, but it must be adapted continually in order to keep pace with changes in society and in the labour market. The proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are designed, at the same time, to make that program more effective in protecting Canadian workers from the financial hardship of unemployment, without spending money which would be better allocated to employment programs.

The proposals put forward by the minister are designed to enhance motivation for work, to achieve simplicity, and to provide equity. There will be a more equitable relationship between the number of insured weeks and benefit entitlement in the initial benefit period. Greater equity will result, too, from eliminating the national unemployment rate as a trigger for extended benefits and from basing regional extended benefits entirely on regional unemployment rates. Regional rates are a better indicator of the difficulty of finding and holding employment. While the benefit entitlement of those with a shorter attachment to the labour force will normally be curtailed, adequate income protection will continue through benefits for those with a longer attachment to the labour force, and for those who reside in a region with a high rate of unemployment.

But the best way to fight unemployment is to prevent it. The federal government right now is investing well over half a billion dollars in the training and retraining of Canadians to increase their employability and income. Most of this very productive training is carried out in provincial institutions. I must say that very seldom does the federal government get any credit for this.

In the past five years government funding of industrial training has increased 500 per cent from $10 million to over the $51 million originally planned for next year. That will be increased by $19 million to a total of $70 million in 1977-78.

These training opportunities will particularly benefit young workers, women returning to new careers in the labour force, native people, and the many Canadians who each year find that they must acquire a new occupation to earn their living.

No comprehensive employment strategy for Canada would be complete without providing more opportunities for Canadians who are, in one way or another, seriously disadvantaged in finding and keeping jobs. The Outreach Program, intensive counselling programs, the Local Employment Assistance Program, and the development community employment strategy—these are the programs that we can and should improve in order to do more for the Canadians who are hardest hit by unemployment, regardless of the state of the economy.

As these innovative measures develop and prove successful, we shall expand them as rapidly as possible. In this way we will enable yet more unemployed people to take advantage of skill development programs and job creation. The result will be a much more productive and more fully employed labour force.

Canadians are vigorous and active—although I think this is sometimes not shown on the other side of the House. They want to work, and they often need training. They deserve a decent chance to have both. The role of an employment strategy is to see that they have the fullest possible access to job opportunities. And the role of the government is to see that this strategy is developed and put into place.

In order for an over-all employment strategy to be effective, it must be administered by an efficient organization and backed by sound legislation. I urge members to support this measure as a solid contribution toward the achievement of both these aims. I am sure this government can do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow the hon. member on the government side who just read through his speech. To save time I thought he might have appended it to the proceedings of the day. It is good to see him participate in the debate, however.

I should like to concentrate on two matters, first, the reorganization of the department as it affects immigration procedures, which is my special interest; second, unemployment insurance, both as to local organization and the eight to 12 weeks extension for attachment to the job market.

We received an organizational chart of the proposed Canada employment and immigration commission from the deputy minister, dated January 20, 1977. The first impression is of a well defined department. The flow charts are all in place. But when you analyse it further you find that the problems raised so often at the special joint committee on immigration, and the bureaucratic nightmares, will be duplicated.

The names of the deputy minister and assistant deputy minister appear in little boxes at the top of the organizational chart. But then one finds another bureaucratic layer of people with the title of executive director—there is an executive director for immigration and demographic policy with special responsibilities relating to the Immigration Act, the selection of immigrants, the resettlement of immigrants and Canada's demographic policy. Yesterday I asked the minister if we would have a demographic policy before the House at second reading of Bill C-24. The minister indicated we would—if it is possible. I should like to urge the minister to have the policy and the regulations before the House at that time.

The next executive director has the title executive director of labour market policy. I understand he will look after training programs, development, counselling, placement services, employment development programs and so on. That seem to parallel closely the program that exists within the department already. And not only will we have an executive director of labour market policy but he will have an assistant executive director in charge of training programs.

There is an executive director of benefit programs primarily relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The small print shows that this person will be responsible for immigrant adjustment assessment or resettlement programs. One of the major criticisms heard by the committee as it met with Canadians was that the resettlement programs break down after immigrants arrive in this country. The argument was made that the best resettlement programs were those run by local community organizations interested in immigrants. This seemed to make more sense than having large bureaucratic programs put into place and operated by the department.

Then there are executive directors of national systems and services, of personnel, of finance and administrative services; as well there is an executive director general in each province and one in charge of foreign operations.

When you look at the department the minister has envisaged, not only is it going to be top heavy but, more important, it is going to be a maze, especially for immigrants. They will simply be amalgamated into programs that have high manpower orientation. I am not convinced that the high priority of manpower objectives, good though they may be, is in the best interests of immigrants. None of us quibble with the idea that in order for immigrants to be successfully resettled in Canada and have opportunities using their full potential and earning power, they must have jobs. It makes no sense for these people to be allowed to come to Canada and then to join unemployment rolls. That is not the argument. The argument is that in the manpower side of the department, the manpower mentality will become so dominant in immigrant selection that I fear the minister might be creating something with which he himself in the future will have difficulty in coping.

There are various suggestions as to reorganization, and I want to place a few on the record today, if I may. As I have indicated, I am not saying that all those executive directors are needed. I simply want to say, let us not have an over-emphasis on manpower when looking at immigrants and their needs. The special joint committee on immigration looked at the reorganization of the department and made recommendations to the minister of that day regarding this. This is clearly spelled out in the report of the special joint committee to parliament which is included in the minutes of that committee. The committee recognized that the former minister of manpower and immigration had an unduly heavy burden with regard to the myriads of programs that had attached themselves to that department, not only in the area of manpower but also with regard to unemployment insurance, which then was a separate commission but reported to the minister and which will now be amalgamated, as well as immigration, resettlement and training programs.

So no matter who the minister is, the heavy burden was recognized by the committee and recommendations were made. It was a large portfolio and a number of committee members felt that immigration linked with manpower led to an exaggerated importance being attached to employment considerations. Much of the discussion centred around this thought. For instance, Dr. André Raynauld, chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, had similar views when we spoke to him about it, and so did Dr. Harvey Lithwick who was at that time attached to the Toronto Board of Education. All of them seemed to indicate that while employment had to be related to the immigration selection procedure, it should not be the dominant factor.

The special joint committee said the following about departmental reorganization. This recommendation had the majority support at that time. I am quoting from the minutes of the special joint committee which met on Thursday, November 6, 1975, issue 53, page 43. It reads:

> Of the several proposals put to the committee, the one which attracted most support was that immigration be detached from manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission and instead be linked with citizenship, multiculturalism and population to form a new portfolio.
> It was felt this represented a rational grouping of federal responsibilities, and a minister with such a portfolio could expect to carry considerable weight in the cabinet. Also, there was a widespread feeling that serious efforts should be made to strengthen the settlement services within the immigration branch.

Having placed the caveat that of course manpower and employment factors have to be part of the selection process, I personally favour a linking of immigration with citizenship, multiculturalism and the demographic policy. That demographic policy not only will affect the future of Canada with regard to the numbers and distribution of the population and regional requirements, but will also include the large question in Canada today of land use, and the use of both renewable and non-renewable resources. I believe that this area is one to which, I submit, we have not given sufficient thought as Canadians because we have always projected Canada to be a large country with unlimited resources but with a limited population. The point of the matter is that if we do not start making some serious studies on the question of land use as well as on the distribution of population, and how our economic policies have contributed to the movement of people to places like Toronto and the Golden Horseshoe, it is encumbent on a department of the government to look upon these human resources and twin them with Canada's natural resources. I believe it is simply too large a task to ask of one department. I favour the approach that a separate department of immigration and citizenship be formed in charge of multiculturalism and the question of the demographic policy, including land use and resource use.

There is another reason that one could give for that proposal, and that is the question of citizenship. I am sure each member of the House has been told by people who live in his or her riding, who have landed immigrant status, that when they get to the point of applying for citizenship they generally think of citizenship as a natural extension of the immigration experience. They have made contacts in the immigration department and suddenly they find that they must go to another department, in this case the Department of the Secretary of State. I think it makes more practical sense for immigration and citizenship to be a natural continuum of the experience of a person becoming an immigrant and finally a Canadian citizen. I fear that with this division between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of the Secretary of State a dichotomy exists and confusion results. I think that would be another reason why that union should take place.

Another point in favour of this approach is multiculturalism. Frankly, this concept has been the whipping boy. It has been used for political purposes by the government during elections. Surely multiculturalism, and the desire to retain one's culture which is experienced in new immigrant communities, would be better served by the Department of the Secretary of State if this were part of the immigration experience, than it is today by the Department of Labour. I see no association between multiculturalism and labour. Why is it not part of the Department of Finance or of any other department? I want to stress to the minister that I believe that the reorganization of the department has not been done in the right way. As I say, a very fine academic organizational chart has been created, but is it going to serve Canadians? That is the question to which we must address ourselves. I will speak at greater length on the question of a population study when Bill C-24 is before us.

One other aspect of the reorganization of the department is the concept of the one stop service for those applying not only for unemployment insurance benefits but also for those who want to register with the Canada Manpower Centres for job acquisition and corporate job changes. I think it is important that we look at the present procedure, and I can only relate my own experiences.

Experiences might vary slightly from region to region, but in my area it goes something like this: as members of parliament we come into contact with unemployed persons, those who are applying for unemployment insurance, only when they are in trouble. We do not hear much from them until their benefits are withdrawn by the Unemployment Insurance Commission or unless they are not awarded in the first place.

Mr. Hogan: That is not the maritime experience.

Mr. Epp: I said I was talking about my experience. You can speak for yours. You have a seat here.

These people call their member of parliament, they come to his constituency office, and they ask for help. I think most members of parliament now have an arrangement with provincial offices whereby they call specific people in those unemployment insurance offices in order to dispatch as quickly as possible the claim which has been presented to them.

I can say very frankly that the person the minister has in the Winnipeg office who helps members of parliament with these problems has gone far beyond the call of duty. She has worked overtime and been very prompt, and I think she is to be commended. However, reorganization has already started and is taking place in local areas. In my area, for example, it is taking place.

What happens now is that when people are in difficulties they go to the area Canada Manpower Office wondering what to do with their problems. We have seen what has happened in those offices. They get a Winnipeg telephone number. Many of these people are already sick and tired of bureaucratic red tape. They are in a maze, they want to get out of it, but this puts them in even further. These people are unemployed; they are given a Winnipeg telephone number; but are they told to call collect? No. They are expected to spend their own money to phone Winnipeg, without any assurance that they will contact the right person or that their files will be examined quickly. Where can they go? They come back to the constituency office of their member of parliament, but they are a little more frustrated than they were before.

If the minister wants to reorganize at the local level, that is fine, but he should put insurance officers in local offices who can make decisions as to eligibility. Those officers should have the authority to say to applicants when their claims will be valid, what the weekly benefits will be, and when they can expect their money. If that does not happen and if applicants have to go back to Winnipeg, the only thing which will have been established is another layer of bureaucracy. It is vitally important that not only do we have Canada Manpower people in place but also that unemployment officers are in place locally, and that those officers can make decisions so that claims can be handled very quickly.

All of us know that unemployment creates hardship for people, and nothing is more frustrating to claimants who make applications than not knowing what is happening with their claims. If the reorganization at the local level contributes in any way to giving these people the information they deserve and to which they have a right, and if decisions as to their eligibility for benefits or as to the amount of benefits can be made quickly, the reorganization will have been worth while.

There has already been some rhetoric with regard to the change from eight weeks to twelve weeks, and I expect there will be more. One thing which is borne out very quickly is that it is much easier to put something in place than to take it away. It should be the duty of all of us, before we legislate and put a program into place, to see that that program does not create a dependency, and to see that, when that program is removed, hardship is not the result. I think there is some awareness developing that government programs which initially look advantageous, in the long term very frequently are self-defeating.

I want to say at the outset that I welcome and favour the change from eight weeks to 12 weeks attachment to the labour market. I support that amendment. Why? The unemployment insurance claimants who come to my office—and somebody might say that it is easy for me to talk because there is relatively little unemployment in the area I represent—fall into three general categories.

The first category comprises people who have been attached to the labour market for some period of time, in some cases years and years. Those people have made a considerable contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. They generally look upon unemployment insurance as insurance against a period of time when they are between jobs or, if there is a downturn in the economy, when they are laid off. However, in their minds it is insurance, they have paid for that insurance policy, bargained with their employers, and their employers also have contributed to that insurance policy. These people who have had a long attachment to the employment market are some of the severest critics of the present Unemployment Insurance Act because they see the insurance policy they have been buying seriously jeopardized by those who have not had the same attachment to the labour market as they have. There is no question but that I want to protect those people and the insurance that they have rightfully earned.

The second group comprises those who are chronically unemployed due to lack of training or skills, but are we providing these people with any service by marginally attaching them to the labour force so that they can collect unemployment insurance and then, once that unemployment insurance has expired, attaching them marginally once again so that the cycle continues? Is that a service? I say no. The people to whom I am now referring have a right to be trained and to develop their skills. It is a worth-while social goal to develop fully our human resources. However, is the Unemployment Insurance Act the best vehicle by which to meet that goal? I say no. I believe that the minister is correct in attempting to categorize those people who have been chronically unemployed and to give them training which will increase their attachment to the labour force, rather than simply to attach them to the labour force for brief periods which qualify them for another round of benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Then there is a third group, and I find it interesting that members of parliament can speak against the abuses of unemployment insurance so frequently when they are in their ridings. I suppose all members have had constituents coming to their offices and complaining about the abuses of unemployment insurance. I do not say that all the unemployed abuse unemployment insurance, but some do. Some try to claim unemployment insurance after a minimum attachment to the labour force. Actually, they look on unemployment insurance benefits as added income to be derived after a minimal attachment to the labour force.

People have come into my riding office asking how many weeks they must work to qualify for unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Epp.]

I am sure most other hon. members have had similar experiences. I say openly to NDP members from Manitoba that the Manitoba government introduced a program for giving people eight weeks of work in order to remove them from welfare rolls. Yes, that has happened in Manitoba. I say that that is an abuse of unemployment insurance, and people who do that are jeopardizing those who have bought insurance. I do not think the unemployment insurance fund should be used in that manner. Let me recite another example.

Once a person came to my office with a separation slip, signed by some official working for a department of the Manitoba government, indicating that the holder of the slip had worked for eight weeks. The period of employment was shown on the slip. Looking at the calendar, it became obvious to me that the person had worked less than eight weeks; it was about seven weeks. When I informed that gentleman that he could not qualify for unemployment insurance, he said, "If that is the case I shall ask my social worker to give me another week's work, and if he does not do that, I will be back on welfare."

In the past the minimal requirement for attachment to the labour force has been a disincentive to work. I commend the minister for bringing in the 12-week qualifying period of employment. Many of our social benefit programs which help the less fortunate are excellent. On the other hand, a certain percentage of our population looks on governments or government agencies as a means of getting something for nothing. Some who have been marginally employed have looked on the unemployment insurance fund as a source of income, as a method whereby they could continue earning money after only a minimal attachment to the labour force.

Let us consider the initial benefit phase, as proposed in this bill. The new bill would change the five phases of the present program to three phases. Under the initial benefit phase provisions a person could get up to 25 weeks of benefits. Some say, "What, will they get benefits for only 25 weeks!" Mr. Speaker, 25 weeks is six months. People in my region have come into my office, wanting to hire people to fill jobs because jobs were not being filled. That has happened in my region; I do not say that is the case in all regions, but in my region it is.

Let me tell hon. members of another experiment taking place in Manitoba, involving the Manitoba government and the Department of National Health and Welfare. The experiment concerns a program known as Mini-Income. The Mini-Income program is being tried out in Dauphin, Manitoba, both in the town itself and its environs. They are finding in Dauphin, Manitoba, that a certain percentage of people who were previously employed are willing to go on mini-income. It is debatable if the program is truly serving those it was supposed to serve. Are we improving their position by putting them on the welfare rolls? The experiment is costing Canadian taxpayers $17 million. If you try to get facts concerning the program from the mini-income people, you will find that those facts are not forthcoming. All local indications show that a minimum benefit has been derived from the spending of that $17 million.

The NDP, especially, does not like the change in the minimum working requirement to 12 weeks, from eight weeks. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) suggested that for bringing in this provision the government ought to be tried under a section of the Criminal Code. But the hon. member's party thinks that only one agency, government, can create jobs. Mr. Speaker, such reliance on government must be reduced. With all due respect, we already have in this country the LIP program, Canada Works, Young Canada Works, FLIP, LEAP and many other programs. The question is, are we helping Canadians to obtain long-term jobs?

Without doubt, benefits were flowing from the operations of citizen advisory group committees when local projects were undertaken. After all, it is better to have people working than to have them on unemployment insurance. But the essential point remains to be considered, and it is this: we must find a new climate in this country, Mr. Speaker, and that new climate can only be created by the private sector. I know that we shall see joint ventures involving governments at all levels and the private sector. The point is that all relevant figures show that private investment is down.

We know that investment has declined. People are holding back, not investing. Mr. Speaker, nothing reduces available jobs and creates a downturn in the economy more quickly than a loss of investor confidence. The minister can bring forward all sorts of make-work programs which will give temporary relief, it is true, but they are not the long-term solution for which we are looking.

We hear a lot these days about people being ripped off. The one being ripped off is the worker, the person who goes to his job day after day. When jobs are placed in jeopardy because of a lack of investment, it is the worker who suffers first. There is no question about it.

We must return to where employment is created in the private sector. This will mean a reduction in the demands of all governments at all levels on the production of all Canadians. We are now at a level where all levels of government demand 42 per cent of the gross national product. I say to the government, freeze it!

The fact that the economy would grow would not only increase revenues for governments at all levels, but would allow each individual and each corporation to start making more of its own decisions. They cannot make those decisions if 42 per cent is taken off the top. It is the other 58 per cent that they need simply to stay alive. However, that does not build confidence in investments.

The minister spoke at some length about a new employment strategy, the work-sharing experiments for example. To my way of thinking, work-sharing indicates partial defeat. It also indicates that large pools of labour will be asked to reduce their productivity. Rather, the reverse action should be taken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will just be another minute or two.

Let us improve the productivity of workers and create investment confidence. A number of representations have been made to the minister regarding exactly this point. In most cases they have said that unemployment insurance as presently constituted has not only become a very costly way of doing business but has reduced investment confidence.

Our unemployment rate goes up possibly most dramatically when construction in Canada is faltering. There is no greater indicator of unemployment difficulties than when construction is faltering. The Canadian Construction Association stated very clearly that they are in favour of the increase from eight to 12 weeks and the development of confidence of which I have spoken. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, a large organization of small business interests in Canada creating many thousands of jobs, are in favour of the eight to 12 week amendment. I could go on. There is the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. These are all private industries.

What about the Canadian Labour Congress? The Canadian Labour Congress also analysed it. The person to which they have first responsibility is the one who paid his dues for years and years to that congress. That person today is seriously questioning why he has to work day in and day out. Others who worked with him were able to leave the labour market and literally thumb their noses at him saying, "Why work? It is just as good on unemployment insurance". Let us bring back an intelligent policy for those who have earned it. I hope these amendments will go a long way in that direction.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the main points of this bill concern, first, the reorganization of UIC and Manpower offices into an integrated setup; two, increasing the entrance requirement for receiving UIC benefits from eight to 12 weeks; three, reducing the number of benefit weeks payable while simplifying the benefit structure; and, four, providing for the payment of UIC benefits to those on training, in work-sharing agreements and in job training projects.

The first thing I want to say about this act is that it, in itself, is a prime example of how the economic and social policies of the Liberal government under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had been marked by inconsistency, flip flops and excessive ad hocery. The following are some examples.

One, wage and price controls were considered as no good for the country, and then they were implemented.

Two, in 1973 we were told that there were plenty of Canadian oil reserves well into the future, but by 1975 we had become a net importer of oil.

Three, tax laws were reformed with the closing of loopholes for the rich, and then the effects of these reforms were thrown out the window when recent budgets introduced new ones like RHOSP and RRSP, and taking the 10 per cent surtax off those who make more than $30,000 in Bill C-22.

Four, job creation programs, both for adults and students, were established, then cut back and abolished, and then restored again.

Five, in this bill the government is combining the UIC operations and manpower. It is doing another flip flop and admitting a costly mistake was made in separating them in 1966. Of course the public has to pay for the reintegration of these offices.

Six, unemployment insurance was substantially broadened in 1971, then significantly narrowed again last year, and made even more narrow in the bill that is before us today.

My major concern about this bill is not with the reorganization mentioned earlier, or even with the question of paying UIC benefits to those on training, in work-sharing agreements and job creation projects. My hon. colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), dealt with those in leading off the debate for our party yesterday. I want, instead, to put emphasis on the changing entrance requirements from eight to 12 weeks, and the reduction of the number of benefit weeks payable under the new streamlined benefit structure. Later, if I have time I may comment on some of the former.

Any MP from the Atlantic region, except perhaps those representing the few metropolitan areas in those provinces, knows that such changes can be a grave threat to seasonal workers in that region. This generalization will also hold for areas in Quebec and possibly others such as northern Ontario, and possibly remote northern areas of some of the western provinces.

When the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) first introduced notice of the changes on Thursday, December 9, the minister of labour for the province of Nova Scotia was quoted as saying on the front page of the Halifax Herald that such a move at this time could impose serious economic hardships in Nova Scotia, and I quote:

> The timing is wrong, many people who want jobs can't get them—the real unemployment figures are soaring ... it's not just people who don't want to work.

Mr. Fitzgerald also said, and I quote:

> The provincial social services department will have to pick up the slack for many jobless people left without UIC payments under the proposed changes.

I suggest that if the Liberal minister of labour for the province of Nova Scotia is right, then we can expect even more severe problems in New Brunswick, and, especially in the northern areas represented by Liberal members. Last week end I was in the Chatham-Newcastle area and the unemployment in these northshore Miramichi communities is up to a sickening 30 to 35 per cent.

● (1640)

Recently a team of New Democratic Party members of parliament were looking at the situation in Newfoundland. The increased entrance requirement to 12 weeks from eight weeks will adversely affect many Newfoundland communities dependent upon fishing and fish processing. Outport communities such as St. Anthony and Twillingate, and indeed the whole north and northeast coast of Newfoundland, will be hit by nothing short of a disaster if these amendments are passed. In past years this coastline has sometimes been icebound till June, enabling fish plants to work only ten weeks, or less. This situation will certainly arise again in the future and the fish plant workers, through no fault of their own, will not be able to qualify for UIC benefits to see them through the long hard winter.

How Liberal or Conservative members of parliament from Newfoundland could support this piece of legislation, which will hit their province harder than any other in Canada, is beyond my comprehension. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) must be very familiar with this problem. In his constituency of Burin-Burgeo there is a fish plant at Isle aux Morts in which the workers are lucky to get eight to ten weeks employment because the federal government has allowed the herring stock to become so depleted. What will the hon. gentleman tell these workers when they will not be eligible for unemployment next year? It truly will be an Isle aux Morts in any language.

One of the sweeteners in this bill, which, in general, is a sour one, is that there will be a saving through reduction in the employer-employee premiums. For example, it would be $4 million in Newfoundland and $7.7 million in Nova Scotia. But each of these provinces in turn would see a reduction in unemployment insurance payouts resulting from the new amendment which would amount to between $24 million and $28 million in Newfoundland and between $9 million and $11 million in Nova Scotia. Manpower Department figures for the first five months of 1976 showed that 63.8 per cent of all eight to 11 weekers were in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces—areas with extremely low job vacancy levels and endemic histories of seasonal unemployment.

Taking the employer-employee reductions in the Atlantic region and Quebec, we find that $85,800,000 will be saved through reduced premiums but that $175 million is taken away from those provinces by these amendments. This means that taking only the effects of this bill into account there will be $89,500,000 less multiplying around in these provincial economies because of these changes.

These total figures for the Atlantic provinces and Quebec are the result not only of the changes in the qualification period but are also attributable to the reduction of benefits envisaged in this bill. No one would argue against simplifying the benefit structure for unemployment insurance payments. However, in simplifying the benefit structure by eliminating the national extended benefit period, the government has also reduced benefits for more recipients.

The minister and his departmental employees have tried to argue that tying special extended benefits to regional unemployment rates rather than the national rate would automatically result in longer benefit periods in areas of high unemployment such as the Atlantic provinces and part of Quebec.

As far as I am concerned, they are playing with words. It is true there would be shorter benefit periods in areas of relatively low unemployment such as the prairies, but this would be offset by the fact that the high unemployment areas in the Atlantic region would be still tied to a definition of a region which makes the region equivalent to the province.

For example, the Statistics Canada labour force survey in the province of Nova Scotia divides the area geographically into four groups, plus the Halifax-Dartmouth area. The provincial unemployment average is lower than the actual unemployment in many regions of the province. This is because of the traditionally low unemployment in the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area. In effect, ridings of high unemployment such as Cape Breton-East Richmond, Cape Breton-Highlands-Canso and Cape Breton-The Sydneys do not get their true share of funds through the regional rate of unemployment criterion. For example, in 1976 the average unemployment for the province of Nova Scotia was 9.6 per cent. However, it was 12.7 per cent in Cape Breton Island as compared with only 7.2 per cent for the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area. These, of course, are official statistics and I do not wish to belabour the point that they surely do not reveal the true unemployment picture there. My point is reasonable and important for all UIC recipients there.

Since the bill does not change the definition of the region and follow the labour force survey method of determining sub-regional unemployment, the UIC recipient receives less because, to repeat, the relatively low unemployment area of the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area consistently pulls down the average of unemployment in the province. Since part of the UIC payment is based on these averages, rather than on the statistics taken by the labour force survey for the whole of Cape Breton, people down there suffer. They suffer in two ways. They don't have the jobs and they don't get the amount of unemployment insurance that should be due to them. As a consequence, unemployment insurance fails to play the role of a local stabilizer in the economy that it should.

I cannot understand why the minister does not base the regional benefit on the labour force survey areas, which give a truer picture of the sub-regional unemployment within provinces. Given the fact that the Statistics Canada labour force survey is to be extended, by March, to cover some 55,000 homes instead of 40,000, this is an ideal time to make the UIC payout in these hard hit areas more realistically and fiscally responsible.

Even given this failure, there is no way the minister and his top officials should leave the impression with the public that the changing of the benefit structure is an improvement for areas like the Atlantic region.

The facts are simply these, and no amount of bureaucratic gobbledygook from high paid civil servants is going to change it. Under the present scheme, and I am referring now to the one which is currently operating, a person in Cape Breton who has worked for 20 weeks would get 51 weeks benefit. Under the bill before us, on the other hand, Bill C-27, the person who worked 20 weeks would only be entitled to 38-40 weeks. Similarly the person who worked for 12 weeks under the present scheme would get 44 weeks of benefit while under Bill C-27 the person who worked for 12 weeks would be entitled to only 30-32 weeks of benefit.

As if that were not bad enough, Mr. Speaker, I must express my anger at the present minister who, on a one-to-one basis, is generally more personable than most Liberal cabinet ministers. I am angry with him because he keeps trying to defend these changes by referring to the fact that only "kids and housewives" will be affected by this reduction in benefits. Not only is the minister's statement inaccurate but it smacks of discrimination. A young man who is 17 or 18 years of age is not considered a kid by the government if he has to fight for his country. Housewives who are among the far greater number of women in the labour force, especially in areas of high unemployment like the Atlantic provinces, work to supplement the family income. It is more than chauvinistic; it is very wrong for the minister's advisers to assume that these housewives would not want to work in order to supplement the family income at a time of high living costs, high educational costs for their children, and the high cost of everything in our economy today.

It is all right for an MP or top level civil servant whose wife does not have to join the labour force, and whose family income is naturally high because the chief breadwinner's income is high, to use the criteria or yardstick of the income of the breadwinner to determine the economic welfare of the family. But I want to tell the minister and his associates in the strongest possible terms, and with the deepest conviction, that they are wrong. They are using a double standard of economic welfare that discriminates against these housewives who want to work and these kids, so-called, between the ages of 17 and 22.

Recently on our visit to Newfoundland we had a well presented brief from a pro-femina group who were attached to the manpower department in St. John's. They told us without equivocation that the surveys that they have made among housewives in the Newfoundland area indicate that over 50 per cent of the housewives surveyed would like either to enter or re-enter the labour force. As the hon. member for Nickel Belt mentioned yesterday, Statistics Canada published a study of unemployment this past August comparing 1973 with 1971, and one of their conclusions was that in both years unemployed wives tended to come from families with low incomes.

The discrimination against young adults and housewives which is in this bill seems to be added to by the inaccuracy of the minister's statement about the composition of those who are to be desentitled. In June, 1976, a month when many students were on the job market and unemployed in large numbers, only 12.5 per cent of unemployment insurance recipients were under 20 years of age. Adult males made up 45.8 per cent of the total recipients, and adult women accounted for 41.7 per cent.

When these changes are viewed from a regional and subregional perspective, they become even more significant. The government tries to play all kinds of statistical games by giving a selective profile of these eight to 12 insured weeks applicants. These profiles say that 64 per cent of all these applicants in 1974 had dropped out of the labour force by March, 1975. This, I suggest, is due to the fact that the national economy is performing so badly under this government that the incidence of the discouraged worker withdrawing from the labour force is increasing. The Nova Scotia department of labour publishes monthly current labour force statistics for the province, and in November they included the following note explaining what seemed to be a decline in the unemployment rate in Cape Breton:

> However, the figure for Cape Breton is very misleading if one were to look at the participation rate next to the unemployment rate. The participation rate in Cape Breton fell by 4.3 percentage points and thus, accounts for the fall in the unemployment rate. The fall in the participation rate can mean that people in Cape Breton feel that there is no need to look for work because there are no potential jobs in the area, so they fall out of the labour force. Again, one can see the effect of the economic slowdown in that many people are now falling out of the labour force as discouraged workers. A fall in the labour force of the potential unemployed (that would be counted as unemployed if they stayed in the labour force) means a fall in the unemployment rate.

The federal Department of Manpower refuses to acknowledge that the recession is forcing thousands not just on to the unemployment rolls but out of the labour force entirely. They argue that they are trying, through this method of reducing the qualification for benefits by pushing the period up to 12 weeks from eight weeks, to improve the labour force attachment of this group. Indeed, one can view this move against the eight to 12 weekers as an attempt to force them into withdrawing from the labour force faster, and thus erasing the government's embarrassment over their failure to provide Canadian jobs. This is going to affect over 330,000 Canadians in the course of a year, not 50,000, as the minister keeps repeating.

A Canadian Press report yesterday had this to say on this question:

> Estimates of the number of claimants who would be cut from unemployment insurance payments as a result of the change range from 50,000 to 330,000.

So the figure could be 330,000, although the figure that the minister used at one time was 50,000. Let us not be fooled by the way the minister and his departmental advisers are using these statistics; some 330,000 are going to be affected by this measure although it would be only 50,000 at a particular time.

The Department of Manpower states that almost half these people are under the age of 25, and that many are working wives and young persons working at home as I have already said. What is left unsaid, however, is that over half are over 25, 75,000 are between the ages of 25 and 34, 41,000 between the ages of 35 and 44, 35,000 between the ages of 45 and 54, and 19,000 are between 55 and 64. As for the charge that some of these people are only a second income to the family, a kind of secondary worker, according to the 1971 census 6,200 heads of households in my riding—and I am sure this would apply to the riding of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen)—draw less than $5,800. Surely these families should not be denied a second source of income by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), or the Liberal cabinet.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Further, the minister says that only 30 per cent eight to 12 weekers have established a season repeat pattern. This amounts to a total of 110,000 Canadians in the course of one year, 110,000 people who will probably not be able to remain where they are to work those eight to 12 weeks per year, if this measure passes. Has the minister given any thought to what will happen to these seasonal enterprises if the people can no longer stay in the area to work for the two months required, since, this would not provide the necessary number of stamps to carry that person over the winter?

Further, it is alleged by the department that these changes would result, at most, in an additional 2 to 3 per cent in social assistance costs. The federal government is arbitrarily shifting financial burdens to the provinces and municipalities, and then it wonders why a significant segment of Quebec views federalism as a deadend street. Such narrow-mindedness on the part of the federal government helps sow a bitter harvest. The municipalities in my own riding can scarcely afford this increase, even without an Olympic debt. Their industrial tax base is declining, and you can only levy so much property tax before it becomes self-defeating.

Canada is a large country with regional economies that are not always in step. The former minister of manpower and immigration, now the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), promised in the budget speech that the so-called four weeks rule would be abolished. This rule now means that an individual who does not receive extended benefits for four weeks, or more, has his claim permanently terminated. Experience has indicated that this rule clearly served as a deterrent for claimants to return to short-term work that lasts more than four weeks and now less than 12. This is the regulation that caused Cape Breton steelworkers to be cut off their unemployment insurance, as reported in the Cape Breton Post on August 10, 1976, after being recalled to the steel plant for a short period of employment, so we are happy about that change and the change regarding severance pay as well.

The "work-sharing scheme" of this bill—under which a private employer can draw part of his wage bill from the unemployment insurance account—is full of pitfalls and opportunities for abuse. It will probably turn out to be like some of the projects on retraining on the job, or like "experience rating"—the idea that employers with lower rates of employee turnover should pay lower premiums. This well-intentioned tinkering with local job markets has now fortunately been scrapped.

The minister, of course, will answer that the new Canada Works program, which in essence is an extended LIP project, and the Young Canada Works program, in the Atlantic region will soften some of the dire effects that could ensue from these changes. I do not blame the present minister, but it surely is the height of departmental inefficiency to have rushed the application date of Young Canada Works as they have done. The high school and college age groups have not had sufficient time, or counselling with manpower and other groups, to come up with projects that could qualitatively improve their own skills and at the same time best help their communities.

Last week in Cape Breton I was trying to get the high schools to move on this because the cut-off date is February 4. All kinds of people were coming to me and asking what they could do. I am not blaming the new minister, for this, but there should have been some planning over the past five months so that there could be many qualitative as well as quantitative projects to improve the total community. The whole Young Canada Works program is now a complete administrative snafu.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote from a recent editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, which usually supports the Liberal government, and which is entitled "More Band-Aids For The Jobless". It reads:

> Manpower Minister Bud Cullen, like so many before him, mistakenly believes temporary job schemes solve this country's chronic unemployment problems.
> New Democratic Party Leader Ed Broadbent aptly calls these programs "handouts". He suggests the government might spend its time more profitably adopting policies to ensure that Canadians can find the jobs they want.
> The newest package involves allocating $350 million to such programs as Canada Works, Young Canada Works and summer job corps. A bit far-fetched from a government which only a year ago killed the Company of Young Canadians, in the name of restraint, to save $130 million.
> Mr. Cullen says the new program differs from the old ones because of "a permanency we never had in the past". The only hint of permanency is a commitment to a five-year program of temporary job creation.
> Ultimately, the government's attitude is the downfall of this system. The Company of Young Canadians case is the classic example: such programs are the first to go when budgets or ministerial portfolios are juggled.
> The Liberals should learn from past experience the inconsistency with which funds were distributed and the inherent opportunities for patronage dictate the need for real employment to offer workers the benefits and security enjoyed by those now in the labour force.

I was not surprised but was somewhat amused by the remarks of the Conservative manpower critic in the House yesterday. As the Canadian Press report in today's Citizen puts it, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) claims that his party should get the credit for the proposal to toughen unemployment benefits because he had called for such measures since 1971.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) says he agrees with the provision of eight to 12 weeks; what he did not say in the House but did say to the press was that he wanted 20 weeks. He says this has little to do with the fact that he comes from an area which enjoys relatively high employment. I wonder if members of that party from Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces would say that.

The bill before us is essentially another example of the inconsistency, of the flip flops and excessive ad hoc arrangement and band-aid applications used by the government as substitutes for policies of full employment and economic stability for the Canadian people. Whatever the virtues, political or otherwise, that the Prime Minister is considered to have by his cabinet and backbenchers, and by his followers, principally in Quebec, he certainly has made a mess of managing economic policy in this country. When he came to office we had the second highest standard of living in the developed world—as measured by per person income; today we are in the eighth place.

The latest available United Nations bulletin of statistics is for 1975. It shows that there were 13 nations in the world with lower unemployment rates than Canada.

Last year the Economic Council of Canada issued a paper entitled "People and Jobs—A Study of the Canadian Labour Market". At page 39 it had this to say, and the Minister of Manpower chose to ignore the advice:

> It would, of course, be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants, or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work before claimants become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to period and genuinely involuntary employment. It would seem better to go after malingerers more directly. For this reason we believe that much of the problem of abuse of unemployment insurance could be solved by two methods—by tightening of administration efforts to get persons back to work and by creating jobs to absorb them.

To that I say amen, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I read carefully the best speech my colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) ever made. I found it so thorough that I shall not go over the topics he dealt with. He denounced the ambiguity of the Unemployment Insurance Act and fustigated the regulations written by the technocrats for being three times as voluminous as the act itself. And to think that all that was done in an attempt to avoid paying the unemployed the benefits they are entitled to. The member for Kamouraska is a former union president, in addition to which he sat on the board of arbitration for several years. In other words, Mr. Speaker, he knows what he is talking about. I shall therefore limit my remarks this afternoon to the object of the bill, unemployment insurance with regard to work.

The minister entitles his bill:

> An Act to establish the Department of Employment . . .

The minister thinks he is changing the spirit of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I say the expression "Department of Employment" is even less true than "unemployment insurance" because at least unemployment really exists while employment is nonexistent most of the time. A while ago I heard the former speaker preaching full employment. I always find that slightly amusing under present circumstances. Why think, consider or even believe in full employment? Everything modern should then be completely eliminated. A stop should be put to the invasion of the labour market by the machine which does away completely with some workers; all scientific processes should be done away with if we want to have full employment and go back 50 or 75 years to the days when, for instance, sand was still carried about in little round shovels: that is humanly and economically impossible. So why talk and try to argue in favour of full employment? It is pointless.

● (1710)

Everybody knows very well for that matter that unemployment, just as welfare, which is its corollary, is the result of our era of automation which creates affluence and leisure. The present state of unemployment therefore demonstrates without doubt that we are fifty years late in adapting our economy to our social reforms and our social reforms to the scientific development we have known for the last fifty years. All this is due to our inability or reluctance to free ourselves from the old principles of the society based on production for the sake of profit that we have known. We are then forced to think out such ridiculous and temporary devices as unemployment insurance, which has the effect of a palliative in a nonevolving society.

Above all, let us not try to have people believe that the government will replace unemployment by full employment. Within the framework of our society where production is aimed at profit, it is impossible to talk about full employment. Let us then talk about full income or a minimum guaranteed income for all, but not about full employment for all.

In spite of all the efforts made by capitalist governments which have always sacrificed human capital to money capital, these gentlemen will be forced by events and by universal logic to agree with social credit proposals, namely the establishment of a dividend for everyone. This dividend will have to be distributed according to the income of Canada rather than be based on set premiums like present unemployment insurance. In fact, when unemployment insurance ceases, that is to say when the claimant can no longer receive benefits, he must necessarily begin to live on welfare. In other words he begins to receive a small national dividend. What people on welfare receive is a small national dividend which comes from the national product and which is the precursor of a dividend for everyone.

I am saying that unemployment insurance is a band-aid treatment because either the real cure has not been discovered or, which is worse, we did not want to apply the real and only cure possible because of stronger financial motivation. I say that these governments behave like criminals towards society.

Perhaps they will tell us that they ignored these data which would have enabled our society to move at the same pace as our scientific emancipation in all aspects of electronics and automation. However it was foreseeable that the more the machine would replace human energy, the smaller the number of workers who would have to sacrifice their lives to feed the rest of mankind. Today, I am well aware that several people in governments would have benefited from learning by heart the works of Major C. H. Douglas because they would have understood fifty years ago what they begin to grasp today.

People have always imagined that the founder of social credit was concerned only about the monetary system, which is untrue since this matter takes up only ten pages in his treatise. He talked mostly about economic and fiscal reforms, about social reforms to follow scientific innovation and to live with automation which was beginning at that time, and we can conclude from this that the national dividend is the only solution to all job losses caused by automation.

He even talked about unemployment and leisure. This is why I was pleasantly surprised when the minister, in introducing his new Bill C-27, told us about the three programs which he wanted to emphasize, that is recycling or adult training, the leisure fund and job sharing. I therefore congratulate the minister and urge him to continue in this direction. Indeed I would very much like to know if he has read the chapter on leisure and intellectual liberation in the book by Mr. Douglas. In this chapter, we see that it is not an exaggeration to say that 75 per cent of the new ideas, and even the inventions to which humanity owes its progress, can be attributed to unemployed people. As a matter of fact, this is what has enabled us to leave the age of the muscle which benefited a few people and to enter the age of automation, where science should serve everyone. Suggesting that we should keep an outdated and obsolete organization system because of the risk involved is like refusing to build a railway because of the unfavourable effects on stage-coach transportation. I have every confidence that the minister, who is young and full of vigour, will continue to open up new avenues and to find inspiration in the book by C. H. Douglas. If he does not have it, I can give it to him. This book was written 50 years ago, but it is now even more relevant than ever.

In the meantime, I understand that we have to operate as well as we can with the old tools designed by the financial controllers who lead the governments according to their will and the vagaries of their capital. For them, man has always been a simple production tool to enable them to increase their capital, but in the new society created by automation, man will give much more importance to intelligence and sports. I think the minister has just become aware of this, because once they are free from their total involvement in the work which gave them shelter, clothing, food and basic necessities, tomorrow's men and women will be able to spend more time on creative endeavours.

It is up to the government to further direct its efforts towards social security for all citizens rather than acting as a protector of money capital. I would like to add a few words about new programs such as Canada Works and Young-Canada Works. I think these programs are transitory but necessary incentives which will benefit the population provided they are well administered. They will reduce unemployment, using the same money but at least the unemployed will be given a chance to keep busy while producing useful goods. Still I am quite anxious to see what direction will be given to these projects. As I see it, the people of the area concerned are in the best position to advise the minister on that.

I think that Canada Works should be meshed with the other program over the summer months to make it possible to direct the efforts of both groups towards a sole objective. It would be unfortunate for instance if student projects could not be meshed with or even, depending on circumstances, incorporated into those of Canada Works. Therefore we urge the minister to encourage students to work in their respective municipality even if their activities do not coincide with their field of studies. I think I heard that student projects cannot be consistent with other endeavours under Canada Works because students must work within their field of interest so that it be a follow-up of their studies. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why a medical student for instance could not plant trees, work on green spaces or do whatever may be worthwhile for his town or his community.

Mr. Speaker, I think that having groups of students work within their municipalities will make them proud to see that they have built something; for when they become adults they will come back in their communities and say: we did that for our own community. And I think it is fine for students, even if they do not make direct use of the knowledge they may have acquired during the school year. I am sure the minister will consider these remarks. I think he agrees with all of us that these projects should not be launched simply to provide employment but rather to leave something in their communities.

We need these projects very badly. I know some in my region which two or three departments may be interested in, be it forestry, environment or green spaces; I know there are many thorough projects that will undoubtedly interest the department, but to do that, both groups must not be opponents or competitors. The projects should be easily merged so that we can do serious work at the municipal level. I am prepared to believe that regional officers do their best to satisfy recipients, although there are some—and thank goodness they are the exception to the rule!—who tell our voters that the MP has no right to interfere in such matter. When it comes to projects like the one pertaining to unemployment insurance, I do believe—and so does the minister since he uses our services so often and I commend him for it—that a certain propaganda goes on at the regional level and I know very well from the start that the minister takes absolutely no notice of it. In any case, as I said earlier, we simply must do something about unemployment insurance.

All these officials do their best, it is quite evident, and I am even prepared to give the benefit of the doubt and excuse the ignorance of those who would not let the MP look into their affairs, but they should try to understand that having voted a certain law the MP must first of all see that the law is enforced fairly and then check to see if it would not be necessary to amend it to make it clearer for the officials concerned and more flexible for the recipient.

That is a role as I see it, although some may choose not to assume it, saying that there are enough civil servants around to do the job; the choice is theirs. But I cannot shirk my duties. In any case, I can speak freely on this subject since I am generally satisfied with the work of the majority of officials in my region. I also wish to tell the minister that we are satisfied with the withdrawal of the regulation concerning the four week period of employment. We have asked for a long time that this regulation be abolished, since it caused so many injustices for certain recipients.

Finally, with regards to the right of appeal, we are glad to see that we will finally be able to appeal to the Federal Court even if the ruling of the board of referees is unanimous. What nonsense when, after having argued a case before the board of referees and even when the board was unanimous, it was absolutely necessary to get the permission of the chairman of the board—who had just concurred with the board—in order to go before another court! The minister now proposes to amend the regulation. Well, we discussed this during our last party caucus and did consider introducing a motion to that effect in the House. That is why I say we are fully satisfied with the change at this stage.

As for the 12 week eligibility period for benefits, it will certainly be an handicap for a great many workers in my area.

I am referring to the hundreds of people who travel to Ontario to work during the fruit and vegetable picking season. Because the season lasts only two months, or two and a half months at the most, it will be very difficult for those workers to complete the twelve week minimum period. This will affect Ontario producers as well because they will not be able to get the skilled labour they need to bring in their crops.

In addition to diverting workers to welfare, this will force the Ontario growers either to hire off-shore labour or to leave the crops in the fields. The committee should look very closely into the matter, and I would like to call the minister's attention on this. As I said, this is a most serious problem in our area. It has far reaching consequences for Ontario and raises grave concerns in our sector.

I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words on work terminations. Whether the minister gave orders or not to convince workers they should obtain the work termination form at all cost from their employers, UIC offices require that unemployed workers do everything in their power to obtain those forms. Indeed, I read the advertisements published by the government on this subject. In my view, they are misleading. Signs were put up urging workers to obtain the work termination form from their employers when they become unemployed.

Unless the act has been changed, certainly the employer must send that form to the UIC's regional office. Of course the worker should ask for it before leaving, but most of the time the employer is not ready to give it to him. In the case of a forest worker for instance he will go home, the camp will close down, and the worker will wait. Fifteen days later he will find the office does not have his work termination form, and he will be told to go back to the employer and ask for it. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the claimant should not have to do that. He has to go through it once, but, the second time, the employer has the responsibility to send a separation notice to the regional office. If he fails to do so, he should be fined. If the employer is at fault, it is the responsibility of regional officials to force employers to obey the law.

There have been so many abuses in this field lately that we wonder why officials seem so reluctant to fine unscrupulous employers. I have even heard of cases, which are fairly typical in my area, where they paid their workers cash instead of by cheque. In this way, the employee cannot prove that he has been working when he loses his job after eight or ten weeks. He is not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. I asked the commission to investigate theses cases; I told them the time had come to call in the RCMP, but they never did investigate. Those guys are taking advantage of the workers as much as they like, and the poor fellows have to go on welfare, after working for eight, ten, fifteen or even as much as twenty weeks.

Yet they never miss a chance to penalize claimants, we know that, to fine them right and left. But I have never seen an employer penalized. I do not know if sometimes some of them are penalized because they are late. We should probably start by penalizing the government of Quebec, they invariably take a month and a half to send employment terminations to their employees. When you think, Mr. Speaker, that those employees cannot draw a penny as long as their employment termination slip has not reached the office although they reported immediately after leaving their job. I do hope this matter will also be considered by the standing committee so an amendment if necessary can be brought in to further protect the claimant.

I would like to say a last word on vacation pay. This is another injustice being perpetrated upon the claimant. Everyone knows that the law now allows subtracting a number of weeks proportionate to the amount of vacation pay received by the worker. I am now advising employers to pay the vacation pay every month. The vacation pay is money earned. There are four, five or six months of vacation pay. What is the loss resulting from that vacation pay? To the worker it represents a loss of one week, two weeks, three weeks or four weeks of unemployment insurance. But let him draw immediately that vacation pay so that when he is unemployed he will have no more vacation pay. This is a monumental farce. It is robbery—I call it robbery. I thought the vacation pay compensated for the two-week waiting period. But no, that vacation pay can result in a penalty of four weeks, plus a two-week waiting period, which means six weeks before getting unemployment insurance. I find that absolutely illogical. Once again, I ask the minister and the committee to consider that matter very seriously.

Finally, in concluding I want to say to the minister that we welcome the combining as well as the decision to combine both offices, namely the Canada Manpower Centre and the unemployment insurance office. That is the way it was at the beginning. It is funny how the administration works. It was like that at the beginning; in my area we only had one unemployment insurance office. After much claiming and begging, it was finally divided into two. It was supposed to be subdivided into three, but no, things have stalled. We are still waiting. But now it has been decided to re-unite the two offices. I think it is essential. They work in the same field: unemployment and employment are in the same area. I have never known why the departments had put a partition between the two, an impassable barrier, to the point that some officers used to tell us: I cannot get the information; you should call the Manpower Centre to get such and such information. If the minister has decided to re-unite those two offices, I think a serious problem will then be settled, and the officers will provide a better service. First of all, it seems to me that a little less staff will be needed, for in my riding three or four more officers would have been needed to have an efficient UIC office, whereas with the reunification we will even save money.

Once again I want to thank the minister for having thought about it and I hope that when the committee completes its consideration we will have the amendments we want incorporated in the bill.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it can be said that the further one gets west, the more one's enthusiasm for this bill increases. That is understandable because the further west you get the lower the rate of unemployment becomes. Consequently, we have in effect a real dichotomy with this kind of a bill, the real regional disparities that exist in this country.

That is not to suggest we do not share the concern of other hon. members about the need to reform the Unemployment Insurance Act. There is a legitimate need for reform, a legitimate need to tighten up this legislation. I wish to quote from a study by the Economic Council of Canada in their report "People and Jobs" which came out early in 1976. It states this at page 39:

> It would, of course, be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work before claimants become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment. It would seem better to go after "malingerers" more directly. For this reason we believe that much of the problem of abuse of unemployment insurance could be solved by two methods—by tightening administrative efforts to get persons back to work, and by creating jobs to absorb them.

That says it all. I believe the need is there to tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act. Obviously the administrative mechanism needs tightening up. It is a fact that there are abuses, but this is not the time to tamper with the provisions of this bill whereby the qualifying period for unemployment insurance is increased from eight to 12 weeks.

Obviously that is a needed reform, but that reform should not be brought in at a time of critically high unemployment, a time when this country is facing a rate of unemployment projected to be in excess of 8 per cent, a time when unemployment in my province is more than twice the national average by the present Statistics Canada yardstick of measurement.

In actual fact the real rate of unemployment in the province of Newfoundland is more like 35 per cent if you consider that we have over 55,000 people out of a work force of 183,000 drawing unemployment insurance benefits at this time.

Another 10,000 people are drawing short-term or able bodied assistance.

In the few minutes I have left to me today I would like to speak in support of and commend to the House the very reasonable and humane amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). That amendment would provide a lever whereby the minister with the approval of the governor in council and the cabinet would have the discretion of applying that particular provision of the bill, the eight week qualifying period, only to areas where unemployment was critically high. It would give the minister the discretion of having the eight week period in areas designated by him. You could use the unemployment insurance areas that presently exist as a means of measurement. In so doing, the minister would have the discretion of keeping in effect the eight week provision.

I hope that amendment will commend itself to the House. It is a reasonable compromise to those who are enthusiastic about reform and to those of us who believe it is not the time to bring in that particular reform. I hope the amendment put forward by my colleague on behalf of my party will commend itself to members of the House.

I hope it will commend itself to members opposite who come from constituencies in the Atlantic provinces where unemployment is criticially high and job prospects are dismal. I hope it will commend itself to members from the province of Quebec where the problem is equally critical. We have had projections from the C. D. Howe Institute to the effect that unemployment will increase in Quebec to 11 per cent, and in Newfoundland to a total in excess of 14 per cent on an annual basis.

I know that some members opposite feel as I do. Many of them are genuinely concerned. They have to face their constituents. They have the same problem of unemployment that I have in my constituency. If these members feel inclined to support this amendment, perhaps it may even commend itself to the minister. It may even stimulate them to break ranks with their fellows and thus ensure that the amendment will be accepted by the House.

I have talked about the unemployment rate in my province. I can only speak from experience with programs already being administered by the minister. The LIP program, for example, is presently functioning on the basis of high unemployment regions, regions which have unemployment of 7 per cent or 7.5 per cent, which happens to be the national average. These constituencies will receive additional funds. Even on the basis of that methodology, my constituency, which is a way up there, currently qualifies for almost $4 million in LIP grants. That shows the degree of recognition by the government of the unemployment situation which prevails in my province.

It is interesting to note that the last time a government bill was before the House to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act the persons hardest hit were those most severely affected by high unemployment. I refer to the amendment brought down in the fall of 1975. At that time the House was faced with amendments the effect of which was to remove two groups from the eligibility list, first, old age pensioners, and, second, those in that special category who had the right to receive additional unemployment insurance grants because they had five or more dependants.

The region hardest hit by the removal of those two groups from the rolls was, again, the Atlantic provinces. For example, the removal of benefits from those over 65 years of age cost the four Atlantic provinces $7,270,000, broken down as follows: Newfoundland, $1,600,000; Prince Edward Island, $600,000; Nova Scotia, $3 million, and New Brunswick, $3 million. The elimination of the 75 per cent category, that is, those who were able to draw 75 per cent of their insurable income on the basis of having five or more children, cost us even more in terms of the effect on the region.

When you take into account the fact that we live in an area which has the distinction of having the lowest per capita income in the country and the highest per capita cost of living, you can understand the hardship members of these two groups suffer. Yet they are the very people who needed protection most—old pensioners and the heads of large families with five or more dependent children.

I am sure hon. members would be interested if I put on record the average per capita incomes of Canadians in the four provinces by comparison with the national average for all Canadians. In my own province, Newfoundland, it is 31 per cent below the national average. In Prince Edward Island it is 31.4 per cent below the national average. In Nova Scotia it is 21 per cent below, and in New Brunswick 23 per cent below. The loss occasioned by this bill is incalculable.

I would remind hon. members that a bulletin released by the Economic Council of the Atlantic Provinces last November had this to say in reference to the loss to the region because of these measures:

> The loss in total personal income in the region based on December, 1975 average weekly payments will be nearly $49 million. This is a very sizeable loss to the four provinces, representing approximately one per cent of total provincial personal incomes.

A great deal has been said about the change in the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks. This, of course, would mean an even heavier additional burden on each of those four provinces at a time when they can ill afford it. It removes from benefit those people who presently qualify under the eight-week provision. More than 7,000 people will be involved in Newfoundland. This will have the effect of seriously exacerbating the unemployment situation in the region because of the loss of cash income circulating in those provinces. It will mean further lay-offs as a result of this loss of income.

I hope these factors will be borne in mind by the minister who sat here all day attentively listening to the debate in his own quiet way. I hope he will take these things into account when the bill gets before the committee. I hope he will take into account the seriousness of the unemployment situation in my own province where the rate is, as I say, about 35 per cent. The hon. gentleman can talk all he likes about Canada Works and Young Canada Works and about his new employment strategy. The fact is, as has already been pointed out, that these programs will be based on statistics supplied by Statistics Canada, which means the awards will be made in my province on the basis of the latest unemployment figures which show a rate of about 14 per cent at a time when the real rate is about 35 per cent.

I am not seeking to criticize or undermine in any way the initiatives already taken. God knows, were it not for the LIP program in the last three years the situation would be even worse than it is. I want to tell the minister I have appreciated the co-operation I have received from him and from his officials, and from the job creation people in his department in my constituency. Under this program we are able to work together to get the best possible use of the dollars spent to produce jobs. I appreciate his co-operation, and I want to say this to him: do not put too much stress on the Canada Works program because, as the hon. member for Cape Breton has said, this program is merely an extended version of the LIP program, its application on a yearly basis. In other words, instead of a million dollars being concentrated in a short time on the critical months of unemployment, the same amount is now to be stretched out over a one-year period. Nevertheless, without initiatives of this kind, the situation would be so much worse. I shall have more to say about this later. I hope that before long we can get the bill into committee and begin a serious study of its consequences upon the hard hit regions of the country. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF MACE CRAFTED AFTER FIRE OF 1916

Mr. Speaker: With appropriate safeguards of the time set aside for proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43 and following that for Oral Questions, I would like to indicate to the House two things.

Hon. members will notice at once that the mace in use today is not the mace which ordinarily rests on the table. The reason for that is a decision I made today to resume a tradition which was adhered to, if not initiated, by my very distinguished predecessor, Mr. Speaker Michener. The mace which is now on the table was crafted very quickly after the fire of 1916 so that parliament could continue to sit, the mace as well as the chamber having been destroyed in the fire 61 years ago today.

This mace was crafted so that the Parliament of Canada could sit elsewhere while this chamber was being restored, and that took some four years. During the tenure of Mr. Speaker Michener, this mace was used on the anniversary of that fire. It seemed to me to be a good idea to return to that practice, and so once a year it is hoped that the mace which was crafted for that purpose will be used and accepted by all hon. members on the anniversary of that fire as the symbol of authority, as it was used during those years when parliament had to sit off these premises.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

ADDRESS OF LOYALTY AND AFFECTION ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SUCCESSION TO THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there is a disposition, because of the great significance of the 6th day of this month, being the twenty-fifth anniversary of Her Majesty's succession to the throne, to proceed immediately with the motion standing under government notices of motions in the name of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and that motion reads as follows:

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister), seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) moves:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg to offer our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the twenty-fifth year of Your reign.

The People of Canada have often been honoured to welcome Your Majesty and other members of the Royal Family to our land during Your reign and have witnessed directly Your inspiring example of devotion to duty and unselfish labour on behalf of the welfare of Your People in this country and in the other nations of the Commonwealth.

We trust that Your gracious and peaceful reign many continue for many years and that Divine Providence will preserve Your Majesty in health, in happiness and in the affectionate loyalty of Your People.

That the said Address be engrossed; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House has adopted the said Address and requesting their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address by filling up the blanks with the words, "the Senate and".

● (1410)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO LINERBOARD MILL AT STEPHENVILLE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The high unemployment in the province of Newfoundland is threatened even further by operational difficulties being experienced at the Labrador linerboard mill at Stephenville, which threatens direct and indirect employment and lay-offs of some 2,000 citizens. The urgent nature of the problem calls for federal government assistance with marketing, and help with rehabilitation of the operation.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House orders that this serious problem be considered as urgent and that consultation be arranged between the federal and provincial departments concerned to prevent hardships that are already evident by consistent downtime from becoming worse in the very near future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL FOR CONSIDERATION OF BILL TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House proceed, on the calling of the Orders of the Day tomorrow, to the second reading of Bill C-30, so that the said bill can be passed in time to provide for the observance of National Heritage Day on Monday, the twenty-first day of this month.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION THOSE ON BLACKLIST BE GIVEN OPPORTUNITY TO DEFEND THEMSELVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of urgent and pressing necessity. Given reports that at least three of the people named on the government's so-called enemies list have apparently had their careers seriously jeopardized, and since they have never been given an opportunity to defend themselves in accordance with the Pearson guidelines, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House advise the Prime Minister of his responsibility to protect basic civil liberties, and that it direct him to contact those named on the list and provide to them evidence for their inclusion on the list and an opportunity to defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Marshall.]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MATERIAL USED IN BLACKLISTING EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that government security forces may have obtained some of the so-called enemies list information illegally, that the list was widely circulated to a number of ministers and an unknown number of senior civil servants, and that the existence of such a list and its circulation represents a form of McCarthyism abhorrent to Canadian democracy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Solicitor General lay before this House, or any committee thereof, any data or material which was used to back up the charges of subversion against 24 Canadians, and evidence that led to arbitrary inclusion or grouping of these people on the EPO list.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such motion. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO BELL CANADA'S RELATIONSHIP WITH NORTHERN TELECOM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the likelihood that telephone subscribers have been forced to pay telephone rates that are too high because of transfer pricing between Bell Canada and Northern Telecom which resulted in Northern Telecom having an after tax return on net investment of 59 per cent in 1975, which was not taken into account in assessing Bell's financial situation when Bell applied for rate increases, and in view of the announcement today that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission has called into question Bell's relationship with Northern Telecom, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the Commission hold public hearings on this matter and that Bell's rate increase application be suspended until these hearings are completed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such motion. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN REDUCTION OF COMMUTER SERVICE IN MONTREAL AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I will propose a motion of obvious urgency. In view of CPR's intention to drastically reduce the frequency of service along its commuter line in the Montreal area, and of the very real need of commuters in the Vaudreuil-Rigaud area; in view of the government of Quebec study on the province's involvement in urban transportation and of CNR's decision to postpone its projected reduction of services, pending the Quebec study up to July 1; and in view of this government's own recognition of the need for improved urban transportation in this country, I move, seconded by the member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker):

That the Minister of Transport personally intervene on behalf of all the commuters in the Montreal area and solicit from CPR a postponement of its intention to reduce the frequency of service until the province of Quebec indicates its policy on or before July 1.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: The Tories said no.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You people on the Liberal side said no.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think anybody said no.

PROPOSED RECONSIDERATION OF FORMULA FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS UNDER CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having to do with the allocation of funds under the new Canada Works program in the province of British Columbia. Of the nine allocations exceeding $300,000 seven have gone to constituencies currently represented by members on the government side. As I know the minister responsible for this program would not want it assumed that the election of Liberals had a debilitating effect on their constituencies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

REQUEST THAT FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CEASE INTERFERENCE WITH DEVELOPMENT OF RESOURCES OFF COAST OF NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the statements of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) that EastCan Exploration Limited of Calgary is not prepared to go ahead with an exploration program in the waters off the Labrador coast this year because of the present dispute between Canada and Newfoundland over ownership and jurisdiction over offshore mineral resources, despite this area being the current hot-spot for exploration off the east coast, and since the minister states that EastCan is in dispute with the government of Newfoundland over proposed regulations by Newfoundland for the offshore area and that the minister intends to intervene to attempt to settle the alleged dispute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) the following motion:

● (1420)

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to cease intervening in the internal affairs of the government of the province of Newfoundland, cease and desist from breaching confidentiality of information given him by oil and gas companies and ensure that exploration continue in the Labrador offshore area by withdrawing claim by the government of Canada to ownership and control over the mineral resources of the Continental Shelf lying off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, confirming the province's ownership and thus removing any obstacles to exploration in that area during 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION FORCE ILLEGALLY OBTAINED EVIDENCE FOR BLACKLISTING OF EMPLOYEES—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INITIATION OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Can he tell the House whether his view of the matter relating to the extra parliamentary opposition list coincides with that of the Prime Minister when he said to the House yesterday that the evidence that was before the solicitor general at the time was obtained through the normal operation of the security services of the RCMP and, further, can the Solicitor General cause an inquiry into the allegations which have been made that such evidence may have been obtained illegally?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, I think that in the House yesterday the Prime Minister answered the questions which had then been asked. As for the second part of the question, if the hon. member has some evidence that there was some illegal action in Canada, it is surely his duty to bring the matter to the attention of the authorities. It goes without saying also that he does not have to lay irresponsible charges against the RCMP which has so well served the Canadian people throughout the years. I do not think that his disparagement campaign against the RCMP is in the best interests of the country.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I would of course expect the House to recognize that I am making no accusation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: —but merely seeking information—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: —which so far has not been forthcoming from any source on the other side. I further ask the minister whether he will give the House an indication, assuming it was the RCMP which assembled the evidence used by the then solicitor general—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: —whether the RCMP acted on their own initiative or whether the initiative came from some department of government, in particular that of the solicitor general?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said that he is making no accusation but he is prepared to resort to insidious references as he has done with regard to the RCMP. The RCMP did not take any part in any illegal entry, as the hon. member for the Toronto area suggested. The report involved has been prepared by the RCMP. Further, it is not government policy to intervene in RCMP affairs and give them instructions in the preparation of this kind of report.

[Mr. Speaker.]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MATERIAL USED IN BLACKLISTING EMPLOYEES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I may of course have made the mistake of considering that the Solicitor General had the kind of authority—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will he put it forthwith.

Mr. Oberle: Will the Solicitor General undertake to lay before the House or a committee of the House any evidence or material which led to the compilation and circulation of the EPO list. Can he, furthermore, undertake to make a statement to the House in response to widespread reports that extra-legal methods may have been used to assemble the evidence and information which led to the compilation of the EPO list?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know the fishing season is not yet opened. Again, perhaps the hon. member will allow me to answer the question. In any event, if I understand correctly, they are not particularly interested in the answers I can give. Perhaps I should have my answers photocopied, put them in a Manila envelope and send them out to the hon. member; he might read them. Mr. Speaker I have nothing to add to the answer I have already given to the hon. member.

INVESTIGATION OF EFFECT ON EMPLOYEES OF BLACKLISTING—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer. M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question for the hon. gentleman. Is he in agreement with his colleague, the Minister of Justice, who stated that any investigation into the circumstances affecting those involved in the EPO list is his responsibility, that is, the responsibility of the Solicitor General, and if so has he begun such an investigation to back up assertions by the government that the list has not impugned the reputation or work relationships of any of those on it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): It has been clearly established on a number of occasions that responsibility for acting on information provided by the then solicitor general rested in the hands of the departments in question.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO ILLEGAL METHODS USED BY FORCE IN OBTAINING MATERIAL FOR BLACKLISTING EMPLOYEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I thank the minister for his answer. One further supplementary. Does he have, to date, a scintilla of evidence to indicate that there was any justification for the list? I also want to ask him this: In view of certain unfortunate incidents which have led to a public inquiry in Nova Scotia into RCMP methods in gathering information and also the unfortunate example in Quebec involving the Agence de Presse Libre, is he certain that there were no unusual methods used by the RCMP with respect to this case?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I am informed that no methods of the type referred to were used in the case. The actions to which the hon. member refers indicate clearly that the mandate of the security service is to act within the limit of the law. Should any case be brought to the attention of the government in which it is shown the law was not adhered to, action would be taken.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES IN AREA OF HOUSING AND MUNICIPAL CAPITAL WORKS TO CREATE JOBS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Given the persistence of unemployment—the figure is presently in the neighbourhood of 800,000—will the minister give all members an assurance that in the areas both of housing and of municipal capital works the government will soon announce new federal spending programs to stimulate job creation throughout the country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We have committed ourselves to holding a tight line on additional federal spending. I regret, therefore, that I cannot give the hon. member the assurance he seeks at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary to the Prime Minister. Given the attitude of the Minister of Finance, which can best be described as one of benign indifference to the unemployed, and bearing in mind that the Minister of Finance said the other day we might not have a budget until June, and, further, the indication by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that no further full-employment-oriented programs will be forthcoming from his department, is it the official view of the government that nothing more will be done about unemployment before the next budget?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I find it preposterous that the hon. member should suggest that the attitude of the minister toward unemployment is one of benign indifference. This government has been doing everything it possibly can to improve the unemployment situation. But I do not think it will be an exaggeration to say that the hon. member and his party have taken an attitude of open hostility toward the government's fight against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister failed to tell us about any new programs, so I assume we cannot expect anything before June. Does he believe that with real unemployment running at 25 per cent in Newfoundland and 30 per cent in Cape Breton, and with the prospect of an unemployment rate of more than 10 per cent in Quebec, these people will remain idly by while the government does nothing about this serious problem in the first quarter of the current year?

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question, needless to say, is somewhat argumentative.

ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN REGULATIONS AND COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT IN CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I wrote to him on November 24, 1976. I wrote to him again on December 10, 1976. On January 24, 1977, I asked him a question on this matter and today I would like to know whether the minister is in a position to give a decision on the case of the 50,000 Quebec workers who so far have been victims of the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act. As a matter of fact, according to the UIC, these people were related to the widespread dispute in the construction industry. Can the minister inform the House on the decisions taken by the UIC in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the appeal procedures are available to those who feel that the decision taken was incorrect. I would hope that if they feel as strongly as the hon. member seems to indicate, they will follow these appeal procedures, which I think are most informal, very, very fair and easy to come by.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary?

I am very glad to hear the minister say that these workers are in a very comfortable situation but he does not answer my question. I want to know the following: Are there still litigious cases? If I refer to Hansard of the House of Commons, page 2269, the minister himself recognized that several other cases had not been settled by the commission at that time. Is the minister responsible for this commission in a position to tell the House that a decision has been taken on these 325 cases?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: The latest information I have, Mr. Speaker, is that the backlog of inquiries concerning the dispute was finalized on January 28, 1977 and out of the thousands of cases which were involved there were 325 appeals to the board of referees which have been received and which are currently being processed for presentation.

INVESTIGATION OF EFFECT ON CAREERS OF THOSE ON BLACKLIST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated, as reported at page 2634 of Hansard:

> Mr. Pearson's guidelines, my own and those of this government, stated that if security information collected by police agencies in some way adversely affects the career of any person, that person should be entitled to refute the information, discuss it, contradict it and so on. I repeat that this circumstance did not arise.

The Prime Minister's opinion as to whether or not the circumstance arose at all in this case is not agreed to or not shared by a number of persons on the so-called list that we have been discussing in the House. Consequently, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether a case by case review has been conducted into the career paths of those persons listed to determine whether they were in fact adversely affected in some way by the circulation of the list.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member checks my entire answer he will see that I was so informed that persons who were on that list were not adversely affected. By this I meant that a search had been made of the relevant records and that there was no notation against these people that indeed they had been prevented from advancing in any way or been fired. So in that sense my assertion stands; but because of the hon. member's question I will go back and make sure that indeed every record was checked. This is the information that I received.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the undertaking given by the Prime Minister, but would he take the second step that seems to be necessary in these circumstances? I put it to him that surely the people on this list ought not to have to rely upon a representation made in this House and ought to be able to examine the list for themselves to determine for themselves, in the circumstances, whether or not their careers have been adversely affected. Is the Prime Minister adverse to allowing those people that right, whether or not in his opinion their careers have been adversely affected?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the argument of the hon. member. I said yesterday, and I repeat today, that there must be thousands, if not millions, of files with the RCMP concerning many people in Canada and other countries. Until those files become activated in some way and negatively affect the career of a person, I do not think it is a reasonable or acceptable suggestion to make that everyone check with the RCMP to see whether they have a file on them and, if they do, check what is on the file.

POSSIBILITY OF BREACH OF PEARSON GUIDELINES IN CONNECTION WITH THOSE ON BLACKLIST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I suggest by way of preamble that that seems to offend at least the spirit of the human rights legislation of this government. In any event, may I direct my final question to the President of the Treasury Board. As reported at page 2529 of Hansard the minister gave the House an undertaking to report to us with regard to whether or not he had made inquiries through the Department of Justice to determine whether a breach of the Pearson guidelines occurred with respect to any public servant listed on that list. Is he prepared to indicate to the House whether he has in fact made that investigation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated privately to the hon. member the other day, I have taken a preliminary look at the situation. The guidelines were, and quite properly so, issued by the Privy Council office in 1963. There is no mandate for Treasury Board to follow through, even though it is quite obvious that we do have a general, over-all personnel-administrative policy responsibility, but that precise area of potential security is not included therein. Nevertheless, having said that, I have already indicated to the hon. member that some discussions are going on.

BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PHRASE "SPLIT LOYALTIES"

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. As reported at page 2435 of Hansard the minister stated that the recommendations of the then solicitor general "were to ensure that the people understood that they could not be in the government of Canada and have split loyalties at the time". Further the minister said, in reply to a question in the House, that differing philosophic orientations or value systems would not constitute the basis upon which the listing occurred. May I ask the minister to explain to the House what he means by "split loyalties?"

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I repeat that what I meant, Mr. Speaker, is that when a civil servant or any other public service employee takes the oath of office, he promises never to divulge the gist of documents. Of course he must realize what he was doing when he took his oath of office. It is as simple as that, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

REASON FORCE COMPILED BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES RATHER THAN PROCEED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister implied in the House that the RCMP had compiled the list on the basis of vital information regarding the release of documents without government authorization. Would the minister explain to the House why the RCMP did not proceed under the Official Secrets Act, rather than electing to choose the McCarthy route?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, hon. members would certainly be well advised to read again the letter which was divulged and made public by their own colleague. This letter did not accuse anybody of anything. Whoever will read it again will realize that, as far as government employees are concerned, the one and only recommendation is that, should there be any doubt about their loyalty, the people in charge should meet them and remind them of their oath of office. Needless to say, people who have taken an oath of office should behave accordingly, even if some of them appear to be sending copies of these documents to members of the opposition who, in turn, do not seem to have any difficulty using them or find anything wrong with receiving them from these people.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether, since he stated in the House at page 2396 of Hansard that the RCMP did proceed on the basis of information which had come into their possession regarding the unauthorized release of documents, he would on his own authority proceed under the Official Secrets Act so that these people on the list would at least have a chance to have their day in court to defend themselves?

● (1440)

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it is once again obvious that the only course which had been recommended by the then solicitor general, who had carried out his duty, that is bring to the attention of his colleagues some doubts in order that the necessary steps might be taken if indicated, was the one and only course open in this case. As a matter of fact, if the hon. member is referring to the RCMP, I must say, as it has already been said in the House, that the solicitor general had then acted on the basis of a report which had been prepared for him by the RCMP and brought to his attention in order that he might take the necessary steps.

ACTION TAKEN BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I believe he is behind the curtain, so in his absence I should like to direct it to the Secretary of State whose department is one of the departments involved. On January 26 of this year, and again today, the Solicitor General has indicated that the responsibility with respect to the enemies of the government list was that of each government department to use according to their judgment. I ask the Secretary of State to tell the House, as the minister responsible for one of the departments, if he had communicated with the then solicitor general and if he could let us know whether the employees of his department were apprised of the fact that they might be considered security risks? Has the minister informed himself as to just what action was taken at the time, and could he let us in on exactly what was the procedure adopted with those named on the list?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no personal knowledge of any such list or of anything that can be remotely described by any reasonable person as such a list. An inquiry has been made within the Department of Secretary of State, but we have been unable to find any information about anything which the hon. member would refer to as the list.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Acting Prime Minister has acknowledged the existence of a list in his answers, so I do not think it is fitting for the minister to deny the existence of the list.

ACTION TAKEN BY MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION ON BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and ask him whether or not he has informed himself with respect to the existence of this list, and if he could tell the House and the people of Canada exactly what procedure was used with respect to departmental officials, whether they were informed with respect to the identity of the people on the list or whether the people on the list were informed of the fact that they were on the security list.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this matter I did ask my officials to determine if in fact there was any letter or any indication of this nature that had come to the department. I have asked them to check all the files, both departmental and ministerial, and to date I have not been made aware of any such content.

Oral Questions

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF LABOUR OF BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION WITH FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Transport said in answer to an earlier question in the House that he does not recall having received a copy of the letter and the list which has been referred to hand-delivered by the former solicitor general. I would like to ask the Minister of Labour, whose reputation up to the time he was giving this answer was for a memory that is not quite as selective as that of the Minister of Transport so far, whether or not he recalls having received this letter and the hand-delivered list from the then solicitor general and whether he had any discussions—I am not asking for the contents of the discussions—with the solicitor general at the time.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I have thought about the situation and I have absolutely no recall of it. This is not to say that it did not happen—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I do not recall having received such a letter nor have I any recall of any conversations involving it. As the hon. member knows, it was some time ago.

Mr. Baldwin: I was going to ask the President of the Treasury Board a similar question, but he is not here. This situation will wait.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COMPLAINTS REGARDING CHANGES IN RADIO PROGRAMMING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State concerning the CBC.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Canadians have been—

Some hon. Members: Ask it in caucus.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I might be permitted to hear the question.

Mr. Sharp: Canadians have had reason to be proud of CBC radio, both AM and FM, and recent programming changes have, in my opinion, greatly reduced its reputation which I would like to see restored.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Sharp: I would, therefore, like to ask the Secretary of State if he would transmit these complaints to the CBC and report to the House on the reaction.

[Mr. Cullen.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have received a large number of complaints from citizens across Canada. As the hon. member knows, I do not give direction to the CBC in relation to programming, but I have been disturbed by the number and obvious weight of these various complaints. Now that I have the representation of the hon. member, I shall add my own concern and make sure these are brought to the attention of the CBC, and will reply to the hon. member directly.

MANPOWER

REASON FOR ISSUING PERMITS TO UNITED STATES CONSTRUCTION WORKERS TO WORK IN SARNIA AREA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the most serious problem facing the Canadian people at this point is unemployment and the fact that there are over 750,000 Canadians unemployed—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Rodriguez: —and in view of the fact that there were some 600 to 900 work permits issued in the Sarnia district to citizens of the United States to work on construction projects in the last little while for such jobs as pipefitters, welders, electricians and carpenters, can the minister tell the House why these work permits were issued when there are so many skilled Canadians unemployed in this country?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to speak to the hon. member as a guru and tell him that he failed his transcendental meditation course. He is a little loud here today. What we did in that particular area is that these jobs were made available. We advertised across Canada to see if we could get skilled workers to come in. They would not move from areas as near as Toronto, and because this project was creating jobs for thousands of other Canadians it seemed appropriate to get that construction going.

Mr. Rodriguez: Can the minister inform the House why his department did not use its relocation grants and its mobility grants in offering jobs to Canadian workers in an effort to get them to relocate to this district for these positions?

Mr. Cullen: Once again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has to check his facts. Mobility grants are available, but the individuals indicated they did not wish to move because of the cost of room and board in that area. They felt they could probably do better waiting for another job that would come up which might be further away but which would have a longer work attachment.

ALLEGED FAILURE TO ADVERTISE JOBS ON SARNIA PROJECT IN SUDBURY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): In view of the fact that I checked with the local manpower office for the district of Sudbury and was told that these positions were not telexed to the Sudbury Manpower Office and that there is an abundance of carpenters in the Sudbury area, I ask the minister whether he is prepared to investigate the fact that these jobs were not telexed across the country and offered to unemployed Canadians?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): When you are looking for pipefitters, you do not advertise for carpenters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOAN OF DC-8s TO CUBA—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister promised to give information and details regarding the loan of DC-8s to Cuba. Is he now prepared to do this?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have answered this question a few times, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: Is the Prime Minister prepared to give details of the arrangements by which Canadian DC-8s were used by Cuba, and will he assure the House that the DC-8s were not used to transport troops or military equipment to Angola?

Mr. Trudeau: When this question was first asked several months ago, I gave the extent of my knowledge at the time. If the hon. member is really interested in the answer, he should put the question on the order paper. We can then transfer it to the Crown corporation and get an answer easily.

Mr. Paproski: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR TRADES TRAINING IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the information relayed to me in a letter dated January 11 in reply to questions I posed to the minister in a standing committee of this House—and I am thankful for the minister's courtesy and co-operation in providing this information— that $340,000 had been provided for training for trades at the request of the province of Nova Scotia plus $200,000 for living allowances for trainees, and in view of the statement by the minister of labour of the province that this is only part of the funds requested, can the minister advise how soon more funds will be made available to the province so that more people can be placed in training?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the data on that, and if the hon. member would write me a letter, I will try to be just as courteous and give him a reply as good as the one I gave to him in the first instance.

Mr. Muir: Considering the fact that the minister of labour of the province of Nova Scotia, when announcing this program, said it would involve 2,000 people and $2 million, and in light of the fact that the last time the minister and I discussed this in the House prior to the Christmas recess the minister of labour of the province said that neither Cullen nor Muir knew what the hell they were talking about, would the minister be good enough to reply to the request of the minister of labour to me, which reads: "I would ask that you use your good offices to press for the approval of more funds for this project"?

Mr. Cullen: It is nice to see that we have a good Grit behind a Tory to get him to work.

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT WITH RESPECT TO UNIFORMS FOR CADETS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I would like to ask the minister if he is prepared to reveal to the House the policy of his department with respect to uniforms for cadets, particularly air and sea cadets.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The answer to that question ought to be sought in another way.

AIR TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE SERVICE IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the negative decision handed down recently by the chairman of the air transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission respecting applications for class II licences for air passenger service in Atlantic Canada, can the minister inform the House what initiatives he will be taking to develop a policy which will bring air passenger service to Atlantic Canada, and further, can he advise if he will be discussing this very important question at the upcoming meeting he is to have with the council of maritime premiers.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of routes, of course, goes primarily to the Canadian Transport Commission, which determines public convenience and necessity, and I think that is an appropriate way to move. I will be taking a special interest in the whole question of regional carrier service and third level service in upcoming discussions with the various carriers, and I will be especially interested in seeing whether eventually service could be provided to cities which do not now have it.

The meetings I have with the Atlantic premiers will deal with a wide ranging selection of transport subjects, although rail and road are the key subjects rather than air.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF SERVICE TO WINNIPEG, BRANDON, YORKTON AND SASKATOON—DURATION OF SUBSIDY PAYMENTS TO CARRIER

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Transport, and it has to do with carrier service between Winnipeg, Brandon, Yorkton and Saskatoon. In view of the fact that many expected that an announcement would have been made as to the air carrier which will be servicing this area, and in view of the fact that it appears that the minister is still taking applications, what target date has he set for the announcement as to when the carrier service might be provided in that area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following the receipt of proposals from various carriers and the examination of those proposals by the Canadian Transport Commission, I was able to determine the amount of assistance which would be required over a two year period in order to assure five years of service on a variety of routes and combinations of service. I have now made this known to the most relevant carriers and also through public notice to all other interested ones. I have asked them to put in applications during the month of February for licences which, of course, is a ncessary procedure and which had not been a part of the original flow of information. I anticipate that carriers will put in their applications within that period. I anticipate that the Canadian Transport Commission will move expeditiously because of the work which has already been done, and therefore I hope that there may be a decision by, perhaps, summer.

Mr. Korchinski: As a result of the decision, will the subsidy be in effect for five years rather than the two years the carriers previously expected it would be?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not accurate. I think there may have been a press report which carried that implication, but in fact the subsidy payment is a payment to be made over a two year period. However, it is our intention to get a commitment from the carriers to provide service for five years so that they will be eligible for those payments.

FISHERIES

PROGRESS IN DETERMINING STOCKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the closure of a fish processing plant in Newfoundland and the curtailment in January of fishing operations at Canso for a period of time due to questionable total allowable catches as allocated by the minister and his officials, what progress is being made in determining those factors which affect changes in abundance as well as in obtaining an accurate fish stock assessment within our declared 200-mile zone? Obviously, these facts must be known before we can declare any stocks surplus to Canadian needs.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not agree with the reflection on the reliability of the scientists. It is because we know that some of these stocks are badly depleted that we are trying to effect conservation measures. We have set low allowable catches, which obviously are having some impact, albeit a negative impact.

In the matter of the Cape Breton industry some slight adjustments have been made which will allow some vessels which have absolutely no alternative to do some fishing. In fact, they have already gone back.

In the case of the plant referred to by the hon. member, the specific industry has not availed itself of what it has, which is a quota of one trip per month. We hope that that will be done soon, and we are considering adjustments. In fact, I hope to meet with some officials who are returning from Newfoundland later this afternoon.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR ADVERTISING IN UNITED KINGDOM FOR WORKERS FOR NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and it is supplementary to the questions asked by the hon. member for Nickel Belt and by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. I received a copy of an advertisement placed in the Daily Mirror of London, England calling for maintenance workers, fitters and a project engineer for Nova Scotia. I would like to ask the minister if it is the policy of his department to grant work permits so that European workers can come and work in areas where there is 15 per cent unemployment.

Mr. Muir: We've got over 30 per cent.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Why did you do it then, Bud?

Mr. Friesen: I wonder if the minister would make sure that workers across Canada are aware of this opportunity, and would he also provide the same benefits this employer is obviously providing, that is, permanent employment and relocation benefits?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Pembina.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that on a Canada wide basis Liberal ridings receive in excess of $50,000 more per riding compared with Conservative ridings under the Canada Works Program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The old pork barrel.

Mr. Hees: Dirty politics.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REASON KITIMAT PIPELINE NOT SUBJECT TO ORDINARY ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT REVIEW PROCEDURE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. It involves the application for an oil pipeline terminal at Kitimat on British Columbia's west coast. Can the minister tell the House why this application and the maritime approach routes are not subject to the ordinary environmental assessment review procedures as laid down by the government?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand clearly the hon. member's position. The on-land pipeline is a matter upon which the Energy Board must rule. We have said clearly that we would make available and we have offered the Energy Board all the environmental information we have.

As to the matter of the tanker approach, my colleague, the Minister of Transport and myself have been having some discussions. We favour public hearings and full discussion of this item. I do not understand why the hon. member is complaining.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that there are environmental assessment review procedures laid down by his department. It is also my understanding that this particular pipeline does not come under that set of guidelines. Can the minister explain to the House why there is a different procedure involved in this case from those cases which would be subject to the environmental review assessment procedure?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly check the technical details of why this would not be included under what is called the EARP process, the environmental assessment review process. It is because of our feeling that this would not enter the guidelines of the EARP process that we will be moving forward with a proposal to have full public hearings.

SHIPBUILDING—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PROPOSALS OF ASSOCIATION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Despite the fact that the 13 per cent construction subsidy available under the shipbuilding industry assistance program has now been extended to cover conversion of existing ships as well as new ship construction and this assistance, valuable as it is, will only be of limited value to the shipbuilding industry as a whole, what other assistance does the minister contemplate in order that this valuable industry may maintain the 13,000 jobs which are in danger of being reduced by half because of the lack of work orders?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this problem. Of course I am grateful to the hon. member for recognizing that we took action with a view to improving the situation, but more needs to be done. We are now considering this problem. I must say to the hon. member that this is an extremely difficult problem because of the world situation in shipbuilding, and also of the low demand; consequently, I am not sure that, for the time being, a change in the rules could improve the international situation.

[English]

Mr. Mitges: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would give even more consideration to the many worth-while suggestions made by the Shipbuilding and Repairing Association, proposals which if implemented would go a long way toward keeping this important industry viable and help it compete with heavily government-subsidized shipbuilding industries of foreign countries?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to meet once or twice with officials from the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association and particularly some members of this association. We are now considering their suggestions and if this leads us to a new policy, I will announce it in the House as soon as possible.

ALLEGED FALSE PUBLICITY CONCERNING BENEFICIARIES

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is the minister aware of a mendacious and outrageous publication against the unemployed which has just been issued in his department—and I sent him a copy—and which shows an unemployed lying in the sun with a soft drink and a bag of chips, and another who leaves on a honeymoon trip at the age of 65 with his meager three weeks unemployment benefits? Will the minister take immediate action to have those horrors removed?

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR DENYING ENTRY TO PROFESSOR GUNDER-FRANK

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and my office gave him notice of it a few days ago. Would the minister at this time give the House an explanation for his department's actions in denying Professor Gunder-Frank entry into Canada to give the keynote address for the Queen's University symposium on "Canada and the Third World"?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me advance notice of this particular question. The information I have received is confidential, unfortunately, so I cannot reveal the details. However, I have gone to the appropriate officials and have checked the reports over carefully. In the final analysis, I regretfully had to say no.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Since Canada is a signatory to the Helsinki accord and part of that accord was that this exchange of lecturers would be increased among all signing countries, and since Canada and West Germany are two of the signing countries and Professor Gunder-Frank comes from West Germany and also since Dr. Sinclair of Queen's University has in effect called this an interference by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in academic freedom at Canadian universities, can the minister offer an explanation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat at a loss to understand why the question is addressed to me. The question of admitting people to this country, no matter what the purpose, relates entirely to the responsibilities given by this House and parliament to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

INCREASE IN STRENGTH OF FORCES—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING NATIONAL YOUTH GROUP—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of National Defence. At the Conference of Defence Associations the minister promised to try to get authority from cabinet for an increase of 4,000 or 5,000 in the authorized strength of the forces. Can he advise the House if he has yet made his presentation to cabinet and if so, what the result was? If not, can he inform the House when he intends to fulfil his commitment to the conference?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is not the policy of any member of cabinet to indicate when a certain matter is going before cabinet or when it is not. I am doing the job to the best of my ability, and I intend to continue doing that.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There are persistent rumours that the minister is attempting to get approval to set up a national youth group sometimes referred to as "Barney's Brownies", a kind of sanitized and militarized version of the Company of Young Canadians. Could the minister inform the House if this is so and could he also tell the House the projected cost of the organization and which minister is to be responsible for the program?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, when I am in a position to make an announcement I shall make an announcement.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WORKERS WITH CONTROLLED ILLNESSES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Labour? In view of the fact that the Canada Labour Code does not cover all forms of discrimination, and in view of the fact that in the last month there has been some evidence of discrimination by industries falling under federal jurisdiction, will the minister be introducing amendments to the Labour Code to rule out the discrimination against people with controlled illnesses?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the matter the hon. member is talking about. We are investigating this in terms of the package of amendments we have, as to whether we should provide prohibition against discrimination in matters of certain illnesses and I hope to do this very shortly. I believe the hon. member is referring to diabetes.

Mr. Dick: Yes.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would also indicate that I saw a press release issued by the hon. member to the effect that we were insensitive to this concern and we were not doing much. That is contrary to what I have advised the hon. member. We are very concerned about the matter and hope to do something about it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF DEFINITION OF PHYSICAL INFIRMITY CONTAINED IN PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice who has indicated to me that the topic would be covered in the proposed human rights legislation. According to clause 20, however, the definition of physical infirmity would not include a controlled illness. I wonder if the minister would introduce an amendment when the bill is brought forward?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I really did not hear the hon. member's previous question but obviously the clause relating to the handicapped was designed to go as far as we felt we legislatively could by way of definition. I will be happy to listen to the hon. member's remarks during second reading debate and when the bill is in committee.

DATE WHEN PROPOSED LEGISLATION WILL BE DEBATED

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, could I address a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council? In view of the fact that the human rights legislation has been languishing on the order paper since July, 1975, could the minister indicate when the bill is to be called?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I hope to call it next week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the government House leader to confirm that the business for today will be a continuation of committee of the whole proceedings on Bill C-22? Could I also ask him what he plans for tomorrow and to give an indication of the work for next week, and whether he is prepared to designate any opposition days?

• (1510)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue discussion of the Income Tax Act today in committee of the whole, and tomorrow if necessary. The item to be called after the income tax bill will be the Old Age Security Act amendments, then the human rights, immigration and Auditor General bills. Thursday next, February 10, I wish to designate as an opposition or allotted day. The hon. member has made a number of proposals with respect to allotted days and I might indicate to the House that he has proposed Tuesday, February 15, and Wednesday, February 23, as well as other dates in March. They certainly will be considered. At present I should like to designate only next Thursday as an allotted day. Later designations will be made known.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The government House leader will not be surprised if I ask him again when he is going to call Bill C-30 which includes, among other things, a provision for National Heritage Day. I realize that he keeps saying he does not think the bill will get through, but unless he is prepared to call it and find out if there is opposition to it we can only assume that the government is not interested in the bill. Seeing that it is a government bill, will he call it soon?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I could have the assurance that the bill the hon. member asks me to call soon would pass in a day or so, I would be glad to call it.

Mr. Basford: Let's have some human rights legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: But there is every indication that it would not pass in that time and I do not give it the same priority which I give the bills I have already mentioned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since the government House leader has our assurance that we would let Bill C-30 pass quickly, from whom has he had word that it would not pass?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Concerning the question asked earlier, it looks as if the interpretation did not reach the minister . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe is recognized.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the President of the Privy Council could indicate if consideration has been given recently—this matter has been under consideration for the past few years—to bringing forward amendments to the Pension Act in order to help the widows of veterans who are receiving pensions of less than 48 per cent.

Mr. Basford: Let's have some human rights legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, no pension legislation is proposed except, as I understand, the amendment to the Pension Act which is already on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member was talking about war pensions.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. There was some disposition on the part of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to have a reference to it in order to review the general energy situation. I believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was agreeable to that proposition. Can the President of the Privy Council say if such a reference is likely to be made in the near future?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, such a reference will be made. The hon. member is joining in representations which have been made vigorously by the chairman of the committee, and I intend to have the reference made soon.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like, as a point of order, to make a correction to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. please. Hon. members will realize that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is one that is raised every Thursday at the conclusion of the question period and has to do with the business of the House for the forthcoming week. I would prefer to be sure that we have laid that point of order to rest before considering other points of order. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River will be recognized on motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that when I put my question, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) did not have time to get the interpretation. I do not want to blame you, but I do think the minister heard the interpretation too late and was getting ready to answer when you gave the floor to another hon. member. I would appreciate it if the minister could give me an answer today with regard to that advertising folder.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Speaker. I understood the hon. member, as I always do. I understand him either with or without translation, but I did not have the answer at the time and I thought I would let the matter go.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING OFF-TRACK BETTING

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary for External Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-391, to amend the Criminal Code (off-track betting).

Mr. Speaker, first of all I must make one correction: the seconder of the motion is Mr. Serge Joyal, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Mr. Speaker, in 1967 I had the honour of introducing for the first time a bill to legalize off-track betting. Consequently, the year 1977 is this bill's tenth anniversary. Through the years I introduced a series of identical bills and a notice of motion to that effect.

The main objectives of this bill, both short and long-term, are as follows:

First, to give the province of Quebec an additional source of revenue to pay off the Olympic Games debt, as a counterpart to the income provided by the federal institution Loto Canada.

Second, to create a new source of income for all provinces. Third, to increase federal involvement in improving horse stock. Fourth, to create employment.

Mr. Speaker: This is time merely to explain the purpose of the bill and not go into debate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate to acquaint this House that the Senate do agree to the address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, offering congratulations on the happy completion of the twenty-fifth year of Her reign, and have inserted in the blank spaces therein the words "the Senate and." The message is as follows:

● (1520)

Resolved—That the following Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY;

The Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, offering to Her Majesty our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the twenty-fifth year of Her reign, in the manner set forth in our Joint Address hereto attached, and respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

ORDERED—That the Clerk go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit our Joint Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen offering to Her Majesty our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the twenty-fifth year of Her reign, and more particularly set forth in the said Joint Address, and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting the words "and Commons".

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance), seconded by Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition), moved:

That this House do concur in the address of the Senate to His Excellency the Governor General.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand today.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, January 31, consideration in committee of Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. The House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax. When the committee rose at the last sitting, clause 21 was under consideration.

On clause 21.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, at the last sitting I raised a question with the minister which is recorded at page 2571 of Hansard for January 31. I asked whether he had some information. The exact quote is as follows:

It is therefore important to know to what families this benefit is going according to size of family income. Does the minister have this kind of information for us?

I also entered a reservation; I pointed something out to the minister which all of us know, namely, that a lot of second income, especially in the middle and upper income groups, is earned on a part-time basis. Therefore, it is important to note the number of hours worked for the income in order to relate it to the sort of general family income, or know it by family income rather than by individual income. The minister invited me to look at the volume on taxation statistics, 1976 edition, which because of compilation relates to 1974, table 2. I took up the minister's invitation, as I always do. I always welcome the minister's advice on matters of this kind. As I anticipated, it is not possible to come up with an answer on child care expenses because it does not relate to family income. In addition, there are so many part-time incomes involved that it would not prove a point one way or another to use the statistics.

Looking at the table and making some comparisons, it is interesting how graphically it demonstrates the kind of argument we have been trying to make about the different kinds of tax benefits and who benefits from these taxation measures. There is the one that I described under child care expenses, where it is impossible to come to any firm conclusion on the basis of the evidence, the way that it is collected and compiled. In other areas it is possible to come to some conclusion. There are areas where it is quite obvious that the income tax system works with considerable fairness. They are not any of the measures presently before us.

I wish to illustrate the difference between how these measures are grossly unfair in comparison to other income tax deductions which have an element of fairness and relate to actual incomes and percentages that are going to people in various income categories. The one that jumps out is not really a deduction although it is called a deduction. It is a kind of tax credit because everyone gets it; it is a standard deduction. If we look at the table for the standard deduction, we find that the class of people with incomes to $5,000 who reported losses amounts to 38.4 per cent of the taxpayers in that group. Under the standard deduction that group receives 40.8 per cent of the benefits, which is quite fair.

In the $5,000 to $10,000 income class, which comprises 31.5 per cent of taxpayers, under standard deductions that group gets 32 per cent from the benefits. Again, that is fair in its relationship to the group of taxpayers. In the $10,000 to $15,000 income bracket, which comprises 18.7 per cent of the taxpayers, that group gets 18 per cent. In other words, the first three groups are virtually bang on. In the $15,000 to $20,000 of income class, which comprises 6.8 per cent of the taxpayers, that group receives 6 per cent of the benefits; again, a fair relationship to the size of the group and to the actual benefits they receive. In the $20,000 to $25,000 income class, which comprises 2.2 per cent of taxpayers, that group gets 1.7 per cent of the benefits, something less than the actual size of the group. In the $25,000 to $50,000 income class, which comprises 1.9 per cent of the taxpayers, they get 1.25 per cent of the benefits, somewhat less than the size of the group. In the $50,000 and over class, which comprises 0.4 per cent of taxpayers in Canada, under standard deductions they get 0.2 per cent of the benefits.

That is an example of a benefit in the income tax system which is roughly equivalent and fair virtually all the way through, give or take one or two percentage points on each side. This is really a kind of tax credit. I wish to compare that to something which is gross beyond belief when it comes to fairness. I am looking at the retirement savings plan premiums. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to hand one of these sheets to the minister who will be here all afternoon. He may want to make a quick study of these figures to check their accuracy and make some comment on them. I have given the example of the standard deduction, stating that it is fair all the way through as it relates to the percentage of benefit going to a group, and the actual percentage as a group of taxpayers. We now look at the retirement savings plan premiums. Under the column of loss to $5,000, which represents 38.4 per cent of the taxpayers in Canada, the amount of the benefit this group gets is less than 1 per cent: the exact figure is 0.92 per cent.

This is exactly what we have been trying to say throughout the debate. This kind of benefit does not help people in the lower income categories because they have no income to offset RRSPs or else their incomes are so low that savings are minimal. They represent 38.4 per cent of the taxpayers and they get only 0.92 per cent of the benefits. In the income class from $5,000 to $10,000, representing 31.5 per cent of taxpayers, benefits received amount to 10.18 per cent. In the $10,000 to $15,000 income class, which represent 18.7 per cent, this group of taxpayers gets 20 per cent of the benefits, roughly equivalent to the size of the group.

It is interesting to find, as one looks through these examples, that this is the one group which is roughly in balance. This is true of the standard deduction, certainly, because everyone is in balance there. But with regard to virtually every program this group receives its percentage of the benefits. But the groups below get less and the groups above get far more. If we turn to the $15,000 to $20,000 income class, which represents 6.8 per cent of the taxpayers, we find they get 20.6 per cent of the benefits, three times as much as those in the $10,000 to $15,000 class, and an incalculable percentage as compared with those whose incomes are less than $5,000. Turning to the group getting between $25,000 and $50,000, representing 1.9 per cent of taxpayers, we find that this 1.9 per cent is getting 24.5 per cent of the total benefit. When we come to the income class receiving $50,000 and more, a class which represents 0.4 per cent of taxpayers, we see that this group gets 8.6 per cent of benefits, roughly 16 times what one would consider to be a fair percentage.

In our argument up to the present we have used tables to show that people at certain income levels get $200 in benefit, say, and that people at higher income levels get twice as much, and so on. But I do not believe anything shows the inequities so graphically as these tables. Some programs under the Income Tax Act are reasonably fair, but others are grossly unfair. The significant thing is this: the programs which are really out of proportion are the ones for which the minister is pushing hardest. Indeed, he has to bring in closure to ensure that they will take effect.

I should now like to give the committee some further examples. The interest income deduction provision tends to be reasonably fair and progressive. People with less than $5,000, representing 38.4 per cent of the taxpayers, receive 27.67 per cent of the benefits. That is not quite in line with their numbers in percentage terms, but it is much better than the 0.9 per cent they get under the retirement savings plan. Turn, now, to the group getting between $5,000 and $10,000. In interest income deductions they get 29.3 per cent, again roughly in line with their percentage as a group. If we go to the $10,000 to $15,000 income class we find they receive roughly 30 per cent of the benefits, which again is roughly in line. But even when we are talking about a reasonably progressive program, the moment we move to the group getting between $15,000 and $20,000 the figures begin to spread apart, because this group, representing 6.8 per cent, winds up with 10.4 per cent of the total benefit. The 2.2 per cent of taxpayers in the $20,000 to $25,000 group wind up with as much as 4.7 per cent, and in the $25,000 to $50,000 group, 1.9 per cent wind up with 5.5 per cent of the benefits. This is twice as much as its numerical percentage should entitle it to.

As for those with $50,000 or more, even under the terms of this interest income deduction which was brought in essentially to compensate for RRSPs, benefits from dividends, and so on, which the low income earners were not supposed to get, the 0.4 per cent of taxpayers receiving this high level of income still get 1.6 per cent of the benefits, four times as much as their numerical percentage would indicate they were entitled to, in our view. So even with respect to provisions which are supposed to redress the balance and make up for the benefits the rich are getting in other ways, the rich do not fare badly.

Let us turn, now, to consider the item "Other expenses of employment". This is an interesting example to take. I have given the figures with regard to the general expenses allowance which is $150 for everyone. But looking at the other items one finds the same "askewness" in terms of the number of taxpayers in certain groups and the benefits they receive. But those in the income class getting less than $5,000, representing 38.4 per cent, receive 1.93 per cent of the benefits from "Other expenses of employment".

I assure hon. members that if they go through these figures, they will find they are running roughly true at every level because this group is consistently getting the least benefit in relation to its percentage of the population. But as we move into the higher income ranges we find the picture changing. Those in the $20,000 to $25,000 class, which represents 2.2 per cent of the taxpayers, are getting 12 per cent of the benefits here. They are getting extra benefits because they are able to make deductions which the ordinary worker is unable to make.

If we go to those receiving between $25,000 and $50,000, representing 1.9 per cent of taxpayers, we find they are getting 19 per cent of the total benefits under this provision for other expenses of employment, while those receiving $50,000 and over, representing 0.4 per cent, are getting 6 per cent of all the benefits, some 15 times more than their percentage as taxpayers would seem to justify.

Even when it comes to medical claims it is still the rich who benefit most. One might ask why. Are the rich less healthy than the poor? One would think the opposite was the case. Do the rich suffer from some special, esoteric forms of sickness to which the poor are not subject, and do they, as a result, spend more on medical treatment? This does not appear likely to me, and I do not think experience would suggest it. Yet when we look at the medical claims we find that the group receiving less than $5,000, and representing 38.4 per cent of taxpayers, gets only 17.25 per cent of the benefit package. From $5,000 to $10,000 it is roughly equal. The position is the same from $10,000 to $15,000, but when we go from $15,000 to $20,000 the pattern emerges as before. While this category represents only 6.8 per cent of the taxpayers, these taxpayers are getting 10.7 per cent of the benefits. Then when we move to the $20,000 to $25,000 income group, representing 2.2 per cent of taxpayers, they receive 5.9 per cent of the benefits, I suggest double the benefits that their position in the tax structure indicates is fair. Those in the $25,000 to $50,000 category, representing 1.9 per cent of taxpayers, are receiving 8.1 per cent of the benefits in terms of medical claims that are deducted. The $50,000 and over group, representing 0.4 per cent of taxpayers, receive 4.5 per cent of the benefits, which is 20 times as much as the benefits that go to people in the lowest income category. That is the effect of these kinds of deductions.

The minister may say—I hope he will reply—that this is a characteristic of the progressive income tax system; that the more money you make, the more benefits you should receive. If that were so, the percentages should remain constant. It seems grossly unfair that one group of people should be collecting infinitely more by way of benefits under our tax system than any other group; really these kinds of deductions are subverting the progressiveness of the income tax system.

When you have made all these deductions, Mr. Chairman, and put in all these claims, the income tax system does not look all that steep anymore. I think this is a very graphic way of demonstrating the point that we are trying to make in this debate, which is that the government's approach to the problem is wrong. There are, in fact, ways to do this properly. I have already pointed out that allowances like the general expense allowance offer equal opportunity to people in all income groups, and this seems to me to be fair.

An hon. Member: Why do you say that?

Mr. Saltsman: Because I think society is far better when that kind of fairness is perceived to exist in the taxation system.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is egalitarianism. It is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. Saltsman: That is right, it is egalitarianism. I know that my hon. friend from Edmonton West does share my philosophy, but what I do not understand is how my distinguished friend can sit there listening to what I am saying and not take public exception to it by standing up and making a speech.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I intend to. I am just waiting for you to sit down.

Mr. Saltsman: Then I welcome that. That is what this place is all about.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Saltsman: I always like interventions from my hon. friend.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge for having sent over his table of figures. I think the interesting thing is that the table, far from proving his argument or stating the reason that he and his colleagues have for making the point they have for the last four or five hours, proves the very opposite. I do not want to distort the hon. gentleman's argument, but I will state it as I see it, and I am sure that if he feels that he should respond he may find time to do so.

The first thing that is rather interesting about this table is that while he has put in a series of comparative figures he has left out one very important series, very important in terms of retirement income. He has retirement savings plans premiums in the table, but not registered pension plan premiums. Who are we talking about when we speak of registered pension plan premiums? We are talking about the union worker, the blue collar or white collar worker, the man on the assembly line, the municipal clerk, the clerk in the federal public service, the school teacher, and so on.

The interesting thing about this—and these figures are on record in the earlier debate—is that with regard to retirement incomes the weight is heavily balanced in favour of those with incomes less than $15,000. Just as a quick estimate, something over 60 per cent of those with incomes of less than $15,000 make up this particular group. These figures have been left off this particular list, and if we are talking about registered retirement savings plans I think we should also take account of registered pension plans.

Let me take a look at the basis for his argument, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member says that he finds treatment of standard deductions equitable and fair and he has no quarrel with it. Let us compare it with child care expenses which he finds to be perverse in this respect.

Mr. Saltsman: So much of this results from part-time employment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suppose that if there is so much part-time employment one can argue that from both ends, the lower and the upper end of the income scale. However, for those who do report it, 25.7 per cent are claiming child care expenses among the income group up to $5,000; the standard deduction is claimed by 40.8 per cent of this group. So clearly in that first category of taxpayers there are more people taking advantage of the standard deduction in the lower income group than is the case with regard to child care expenses.

However, the situation is quite dramatic if you include those in the group earning up to $10,000 as well, which includes those with very marginal low incomes right up to those who are not really very well paid in the public service or in many private firms, particularly in small firms. You then find that 51 per cent of a group which comprises 31.5 per cent of taxpayers take advantage of the deduction for child care expenses.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, when you aggregate the two groups claiming child care expenses you see immediately that 77 per cent of a group representing about 70 per cent of taxpayers take advantage of this deduction. However, with regard to standard deductions, which the hon. gentleman found admirable, only 72 per cent of the same group were treated that way. So that on the basis of the figures presented by the hon. gentleman, if standard deductions are a fair and reasonable way of treating people, at least in those two lowest groups, then those drawing child care expenses are treated even more reasonably.

If we go to the other end of the spectrum, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have been arguing that those at the upper end of the income scale have been getting a greater benefit, per group, than those at the lower end. With regard to child care expenses, for example, those earning between $20,000 and $25,000 a year, who represent 2.2 per cent of taxpayers, are getting 0.9 per cent of the benefit, and those earning between $25,000 and $50,000, representing 1.9 per cent of taxpayers, also get 0.9 per cent. Those earning $50,000 and over, representing 0.4 per cent of the taxpayers, account for 0.17 per cent of the total amount of deductions for child care expenses.

I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for his figures, but it seems to me that they show that the system, at least in regard to child care expenses, is not weighted in favour of the upper income scale earners, as is alleged by the hon. gentleman, but rather is most heavily weighted in favour of those at the lower end of the income scale, and more heavily weighted than standard deductions which the hon. member has just said are a reasonable way to deal with this particular situation.

The hon. gentleman obviously thinks that the taxation system is the principal method of providing income support. In this respect, of course, the government has proceeded to use other vehicles, such as the transfer payments under the family allowance program. In addition there is the guaranteed income supplement and old age security, and transfer payments through the Canada Assistance Plan in conjunction with the provinces. We have thus operated programs which make actual cash transfer payments to people at the lower end of the income scale.

With respect to the family allowance, it seems to me that the arguments being put forward in this debate contradict the ones we heard in the debate in 1972 and 1973, at which time the government put forward a measure which did weight that particular transfer payment in favour of those at the lower end of the income scale. As I recall it, the hon. member and his colleagues took the position that it should be across the board: whether your income is $5,000 or $50,000, you should be entitled to the same gross family allowance payment, although that payment would be subject to reduction for taxation reasons. At the time when we were a minority government this measure did not go through in the form we proposed, which would have favoured the lower income group more particularly, but as a government we favoured the transfer payments for those at the lower income level. Another good example is AHOP, the mortgage interest assistance and other housing measures where literally hundreds of millions of dollars have gone into low income housing.

I may make one further comment. The hon. gentlemen thinks that this should be handled through the taxation system. The only extent to which I would agree with that is through the taxation system as an administrative vehicle for delivering the basic transfer payments referred to that we have put on the statute books and that Canadians are now receiving. It is really to determined whether the use of the taxation system as a transfer vehicle or an administrative vehicle for making those payments is feasible that we have that question currently under examination together with the Department of National Health and Welfare and other departments.

Going back to my first point, it is interesting range of figures which the hon. gentleman has given the House. It seems to me that they sustain rather forcefully the argument that child care expense reductions with which we are dealing here have favoured those at the lower end of the income scale rather than those at the upper end.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that what is happening here today might well turn out to be a debate. I want to deal with some of the issues the minister has raised, and I am pleased he has raised them. One of the reasons I sent him the sheet was so he would not think I was pulling those figures out of the air, and I am quite happy to see him extrapolate some of the figures if he thinks they are to his advantage. However, I am sorry he overlooks the very important rider that I indicated about child care allowances, and neglects the other argument that makes the better case.

I was saying that we cannot really demonstrate anything from these figures about child care, but we can certainly demonstrate that the minister does not deny that, but I am rather surprised to hear the kind of argument he used on this occasion—because of the way the tax system is balanced, the deduction means far more to somebody with a higher income than to those on lower income. So there is no quarrel here and I want to leave it.

I want to say something else about family allowances. We have argued for a standard deduction. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre throughout the many brillant years he has graced this House, has argued for universality. I can remember how impressed I was when I was a little younger than I am now and I heard him speak on old age pensions. Someone asked him, "You mean, when we have a standard old age pension you will give it to E.P. Taylor as well?" The reply was, "Yes, the old age pension is a matter of right and it goes to everyone, to the poor and to E.P. Taylor. This is not a charitable act".

We have argued the same thing with regard to family allowances. We did not say, "Take it away from the rich." The rich have children, too, and they are entitled to some consideration. What we are saying is that they are not entitled to more consideration than the poor. We think E. P. Taylor is entitled to his old age pension so long as he hangs around Canada, and if he has any children of eligible age, he is entitled to family allowance. We do not think people with higher incomes are entitled to more than the poor, because that is perverse and the kind of tax system we have is a very perverse system.

I hope the Minister of Finance clearly sees our point. We were not being unprogressive by voting against that measure and insisting that family allowances be equal for everyone. We were being consistent with the policy of this party over the years, that all people should be treated alike, especially under universal programs. Progressivity comes from having the income tax recoup whether it is the old age pension or the family allowance. That is what we are arguing about.

Let me deal with one other matter, since this is becoming a debate of sorts. The Minister of Finance said the income tax system is not the only way of distributing income. I agree with him that it is not the only way. One deals with every issue as it comes before the House, and one does not pretend it is the only way. There is a lot more that is wrong with the minister's party and his government than what appears in the income tax system. But today we are dealing with that system and we do not want to go over all these things.

The income tax system is a very useful way of redressing imbalances in other parts of the system, and I will give you the committee an example of this. When the Minister of Finance brought in the wage and price control policy with some reluctance, he did not use the words "rough justice"; they were used by the hon. member for Halifax. But I listened to the Minister of Finance on radio and television and found he had in fact picked up this phrase and called it "rough justice". It is at best rough justice. You cannot have an income policy that does anything more than control wages. The minister is beginning to realize that. Even when you want to control profits, there is an inherent difficulty in trying to do it in the kind of system under which we live. You cannot control dividends or prices effectively, but one thing the minister has been able to control—and this is one of the reasons the policy is so grossly unfair—is wages.

How do you get people to live with rough justice? The way to do is to say, "All right; we admit we have not been able to control much more than wages, but we will do something to the income tax system. We will see that some of the surplus income at least is siphoned off through the income tax system." But when the income tax system cannot do everything, as the minister says, it moves in a regressive direction and compounds the inequality of the wage and profit controls system. Then you have really accomplished the ultimate in injustice. This is why we have argued in favour of redressing the balance in the income tax system and at least making it progressive.

In the future we must have some kind of income policy, not the kind the government has now. The government will not be able to make it work through direct controls, because those controls only work very imperfectly and in some circumstances they cause a lot of problems. Therefore, you will have to use the income tax system to make up for the rough justice that occurs with direct controls. On that basis the minister should recognize that while the income tax system cannot do everything, it should not at least make the situation worse in the way his proposals in Bill C-22 will do.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am glad to rejoin the debate on the issue with the hon. gentleman, particularly on the question of transfer payments to individuals. He says that his party's dogma as stated by their high priest, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that there have to be across the board universal programs. I was going to say it in the absence of the hon. gentleman, but I see him appearing spectre-like from behind the curtains. I would disagree categorically with the dogma of the party of the hon. gentleman regarding family allowance payments.

● (1600)

I was a supporter of the family income security program because when public resources of that kind are available, just like public resources in the housing program, the great weight of those public resources should be used to support those who have the least in our community and I think we should not have these across the board payments. Indeed, that has been the consistent policy in the case of retired people with the guaranteed income supplement program. I would not support a payment to E. P. Taylor, if he happened to be in this country, or to his sidekick, McDougald. I do not know whether he is here now.

An hon. Member: Pay the old age pension.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Pay the old age pension: that is right, and this is the way it has evolved. As far as I am concerned, the weight of the pension system and the weight of the family allowance system should go to those who are least able to protect themselves in the economy. With the public resources which are available, that is the group which I, and I think many others in my party, would favour in dealing with these particular problems.

We are not really talking about the controls program but I will say just a couple of words with regard to the point the hon. member raised. Dividends have been controlled and profits have also been controlled. There have been rollbacks of profits in situations where they have amounted to excess revenue. One of the other factors—and this is observable from the aggregates of the economy—is that the profit level in Canadian firms has been below the trend level of the economy, and certainly below the level one would expect at this time. It seems to me we are almost getting to the ideal NDP state where nobody makes any money at all. Profit levels have been down. It is quite true that the controls on profits have not been as numerous as they have been with regard to incomes, principally because profit levels generally have been down.

The hon. gentleman was talking about this year of injustice to the wage earner. He talked about the difficulties wage earners had during 1976 because of the controls but, curiously, the working man has experienced a 4 per cent real increase in income through this period, principally as a result of the reduction in prices which was brought about by the controls program. The controls have put more real income into the pockets of wage earners of this country and have had the very opposite effect to what the hon. member has suggested.

The Chairman: Perhaps we could come back to clause 21, and I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has been talking about rough justice. I wish he would at least be roughly relevant to clause 21. It seems that on any clause one can raise any subject which is within the four corners of the Income Tax Act, and it does not matter; but those who want to make a relevant contribution—and there are many in this House—find that with a limited time debate they are cut short. All I want to say about the comments with regard to the increase in child care expenses and the statistics we have heard ad nauseam is that the hon. member made one great oversimplification. He failed to point out the number of taxpayers who are spouses and therefore file separate income tax returns. I am sure the hon. member's observations would have been far different if he had considered family income.

It is all right to say a man earns $25,000 a year, but what if his wife is not working? The hon. member made some observations about the extraordinary, outrageous and disporportionate benefits a man earning $25,000 or $30,000 a year gets. However, if his wife is not working, he is the family breadwinner. Let us consider the man who makes $15,000 and whose wife works and makes $10,000. They are two separate taxpayers, albeit at lower levels. For a family earning $25,000, in which the wife is not working, there is no child care expense allowance. Where the husband earns $15,000 and the wife earns $10,000, there is a child care allowance.

I suggest that the table put forward by the hon. member fails to recognize one fundamental feature. As a matter of fact, even the minister in his observations on this fails to see that today there are hundreds of thousands of taxpayers who are married women and have to be classified as single taxpayers. They may claim the allowance for some of the children in the family. This varies. Each spouse picks the best advantage he or she may have under the Income Tax Act. It is a matter of sorting out the children and deciding who should claim the allowances.

The hon. member, however, lumps everybody into the same bag as though each taxpayer is the sole earner in the family group. It is the family group that we have to consider. Do not tell me that there is injustice to somebody earning $16,000 or $18,000 a year as a teacher who has a wife working part time either in an office, as a secretary in a school board office, in a school office, or in a supermarket, whatever the job may be, who earns, say, $6,000 a year. The hon. member has failed to take into account that there are two taxpayers in that family. I have a son who goes to university. He works part time during the summer. He is classified a taxpayer even though he may earn only between $4,000 and $5,000 a year. Therefore, all these suggestions with regard to the benefit of child care to taxpayers in this particular class are very misleading and constitute an oversimplification. I find it extraordinary that the hon. member should have fallen into that trap. Frankly, it is an unconscious—I do not think he has done it consciously—misleading of the House for him to cite statistics such as those.

If the hon. member had been talking about 20 or 25 years ago when relatively few married women were working, perhaps his conclusions would have been more apposite, but today that is not the case and I hope that somewhere along the line in considering income tax we will get to the situation where joint income tax returns can be filed by a family group, husband and wife. It would be much more fair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then the hon. member could start making complaints with regard to the benefits of increasing the child care allowance from $2,000 to $4,000 as a maximum. Frankly, I was surprised. I think he has been misled by some of his research staff in arriving at his conclusion. He should study table 17 as it appears on page 160 of "Taxation Statistics 1975" which is headed "Returns with child care expense claims". He would find that the maximum number who claimed for the taxation year 1974 were in the $5,000 to $6,000 taxable group. I will put it on the record. For working mothers in the income bracket less than $2,800 there were 9,606 claimants; $2,800 to $3,000, 4,107; $3,000 to $4,000, 21,130; $4,000 to $5,000, 26,461; $5,000 to $6,000, 29,683; $6,000 to $7,000, 22,589; $7,000 to $8,000, 16,953; $8,000 to $9,000, 12,688; $9,000 to $10,000, 6,908; $10,000 to $11,000, 3,373; $11,000 to $12,000, 2,625; $12,000 to $15,000, 3,592; $15,000 to $20,000, 1,564; $20,000 to $25,000, 427; and, over $25,000, 412 claimants.

● (1610)

If the hon. member looks further at table 17, he will see the number of claims by working mothers and the number by fathers. A study of the statistics indicates that the tabulations and computations he made in assessing what class of taxpayer was receiving the benefit of child care expenses and registered retirement savings plans are totally wrong. He failed to look at the joint family income, which is where the real benefit lies. In the $20,000 taxable income class, which means a salary of about $25,000 with the normal number of exemptions, the chances are that the wife would not be working. As the income scale goes up, usually the wife does not work. Today the working spouse is a social phenomenon more than an economic necessity.

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are a number of cases where the wife does have to work to help maintain the home, but there are far more cases where couples have bought a house at $18,000 or $20,000 more than they would if she were not working, or bought a second car or wanted to do extra things. In such cases, the spouse works in order to justify a higher standard of living, not from economic necessity. There is no criticism of that; it is a social phenomenon of today. Husbands and wives have decided to work in part in order to raise their standard of living, not to subsist.

Mr. Rodriguez: Go down to Newfoundland. Tell that to your colleagues from Newfoundland.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In this city of Ottawa, in this very building, in Sudbury, in Sault Ste. Marie among the steel and nickel plants, there are many men earning very good salaries.

Mr. Rodriguez: Come off it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are women who are also working in order to increase their standard of living.

Mr. Rodriguez: They are all lawyers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member should get his head out of that bag of doctrinaire prejudice he has because he is a member of that party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member for Edmonton West suggesting he is against those families in the Sudbury basin who are trying to exist and subsist within a regressive income tax structure by the wives having to go out to work? I want to know that.

The Chairman: Order, please. This, surely, is not a point of order. The hon. member is making an argument. If he wants to ask a question, he should ask the permission of the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member is trying to suggest that people in Sudbury are generally in that category, then he is full of tripe.

Mr. Rodriguez: Except the lawyers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will come back and look at the average income reported by taxpayers by district, and we will see where Sudbury is. It is certainly in the lower part of the table.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a letter from a man who says he is a teacher and whose wife is not working. He wonders about the increase in the child care benefits to $4,000 a year. I do not declare this a correct argument, but it is a point of view held by a number of people. It may be that hon. members will want to correct this, but at least we will discuss it. He writes:

> There are many people who utilize the daycare—babysitting—deductions so that both parents can work, not in order to survive, but rather only to have a higher standard of living. Should parents whose combined incomes are in the $15,000 and sometimes much above brackets, i.e. $30,000 plus, be able to take advantage of tax deductions which were really aimed at the lower income sections of the community?

I am sure the hon. member for Nickel Belt would say that above a certain income there should be absolutely no allowance for child care. The writer makes this point:

Daycare expenses should be available only for those who are (a) single parents with pre-schoolers, or (b) parents whose combined incomes are below a certain level.

The writer feels that more women should stay at home and look after the children, because as a teacher he sees children who have been brought up by day care centres, not through necessity as in the case of the single parent of whom there are a great number. He feels that more children should be looked after at home by the mother, because as a teacher he sees what he considers to be almost social monsters as a result of lack of parental care. They are pushed out in the morning or dropped off at school or picked up by the bus, they lunch at school, drop in on a neighbour after school, and return home about the same time as the parents. That is the extent of their upbringing.

I want to put it on record to indicate that not everyone is in favour of, shall we say, this unrestricted subsidy to child care centres, for that is what it is. Personally, I feel that there is a need for child care centres to serve, particularly, single parents. Indeed, I would much rather the state provided that service for those people. It could be provided through provincial governments or municipal administration and for those whose incomes fall below a certain level there would be no charge. But beyond that fees ought to be charged and such centres ought to be considered as private schools and the double family income ought to bear the brunt of that charge. It ought not to qualify for the allowance.

Since the government has allowed inflation to go along unchecked for a number of years, certainly since the induction some years ago of the child care expense allowance, the ceiling certainly should be raised to the extent envisaged in the bill at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, it is the first time I have the opportunity to rise on this issue and I would be happy if the minister could go back to his seat, because I would like to ask him a single question. After all I have heard since the beginning of the discussion, and I did not miss much, the longer the discussion of clause 21 goes on the less we understand. Every spokesman for the New Democratic Party tried to give evidence that clause 21 was for people with high income at the expense of those at the lower end of the income scale, whereas the minister is trying to explain that it is not true.

Yet, a while ago, listening to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) reading his letter, I was thinking that this letter says a lot. We were wondering what low income people could get from that, compared to people with high income. I think light always comes from the working classes, it is quite clear now.

I will ask the minister, who is getting advice from experts, whether he can tell the House what a couple, whether both are working outside or not, will get in terms of family income. From what the hon. member for Edmonton-Centre has just told us, it is unfair that a spouse who works to raise a family and earns $25,000 and whose child is placed in a day care center should be disadvantaged in comparison with another couple in the same conditions but with an annual income of $50,000. I would like to know what each of these two couples is getting? If the minister is prepared to answer now, I will have only one other point to deal with.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That may be rather difficult to answer without knowing what tax rate applies or what deductions the individual is entitled to. But perhaps we can try to figure it out quickly.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Both are in the same economic situation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You spoke of a couple earning $25,000, and another earning $50,000.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Yes, both are in similar economic circumstances, benefitting from the same exemptions, to which the same tax rate applies.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Their economic situation is not the same. One gets twice as much as the other. They may be subject to the same maximun deductions according to the bill, but the effect on their income tax will in fact be different. The percentage may be the same, but there will be a higher absolute amount where the income is greater.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. That is precisely what I wanted to hear the minister say. That is precisely because the error lies in the rate. A deduction is made in terms of the percentage of the tax paid. I can understand the hon. members of the NDP who fight for that principle, because I feel that if we want to be fair to those who have to entrust a child to someone's care, we should fix a set amount. For instance, we should say that $40 or $45 a week will be allowed, which amount could decrease as salaries go up, because whoever earns $25,000 cannot afford to pay as much as the person who earns $50,000. As a result, those who earn $50,000, under the system I am advocating, would not be entitled to deductions for child care while those who earn $25,000 or $15,000 would be allowed more deductions. That is what we should do if we want to help the couples earning whereas the minister indicates vaguely that he wants to give more help to the couple whose income is highest. In this case, the NDP are right.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) says no. Of course, because the minister has already said that whoever pays more income tax should have higher deductions. That goes without saying. If you stick to the deduction by the percentage, it is obvious he will get more. But you must not forget that the one earning $50,000 who places his child in a day care centre will not pay more than the one with a $15,000 income. You have to be fair. Will the day care centre charge $150 a week to the one earning $50,000 and $25 to the other earning $25,000? Come on, this is done only in senior citizens homes in the province of Quebec. In these homes, one person with a little more money will be charged more, but we must not get in the same mess. I may be wrong but if we want to give direct assistance to minimum income couples, I think the percentage ought to be forgotten. I would like the minister to say what he thinks about it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Truthfully, to answer the hon. member's previous question, the taxpayer earning $25,000 will have a marginal tax rate of 39 per cent, and if he deducts the $4,000 maximum indicated on the bill, he would then get $1,560. However on a taxable income of $50,000 the marginal rate will be 43 per cent and the tax saving will amount to $1,720. But I must point out that the total federal tax for the taxpayer will be $7,250 if he earns $25,000, while it will reach $17,440 for the one who earns $50,000 and in that sense the tax paid by the latter is quite higher than that paid by the first taxpayer.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I realize once again that it is quite fine. I am told that the taxpayer who earns $25,000 will have a reduction of $1,560 in comparison with $1,720. Still the higher wage earner will receive $160 more than the lower wage earner.

An hon. Member: He pays more.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Well, he paid more because he had more money, but if we consider the needs of the couple we must take an entirely new position. Let us consider the one who paid and not the needy. In that case it is somewhat like the case of pension plans, we agree on that point. A man needs an adequate income if he is to invest. The investor must be rewarded, because investments are needed. Such is the line of reasoning.

But with regard to child care expenses, it is very difficult to take. The hon. member for Winnipeg can say no all he likes, it is very difficult to take when one wants to plead for the family . . .

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hope the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) will admit that Winnipeg is not Edmonton. I come from Edmonton! I want to make a slight correction. Edmonton is not in greater Winnipeg, it is further west. Edmonton is a lot more important than Winnipeg!

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member's point is well taken.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A few more figures. Calculations are continuing. I provided the tax figures on an income of $25,000, which is $7,250, representing 21 per cent. But for a couple with an income of $50,000 the amount would be $17,440 and this deduction represents 9.8 per cent of their income tax.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, I understand very well what you have just told the House but I maintain my position because it so happens that the tax deduction applies to the amount of tax paid; this is all very well, but I recognize that we had better do it otherwise if we really wanted to help directly the needy family.

[English]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, the debate this afternoon has been an interesting one, with interventions from the minister and my friend from Edmonton West. We have been talking about clause 21 of Bill C-22, the child care deduction allowance. Throughout the discussion we have been ranging over the concept of whether this is a deduction that benefits upper income Canadians more than lower income Canadians.

The Minister of Finance has been trotting out the income tax rate and how the rate increases as we go up the income ladder. He has been making the argument that indeed we have a progressive income tax system, that upper income Canadians pay more in taxes, and therefore the kind of complaints being made by the NDP about these deductions really do not hold much water. He states that upper income Canadians pay more income taxes, and therefore they should be entitled to the benefits of these deductions. I wish to address myself to that point and to the whole concept of what makes an income tax system fair. To make an income tax system fair, we have to base it on the principle of the ability to pay, namely, that the more one earns, the more one is able to afford to pay higher taxes. The fact that with our income tax system the percentage tax rate is lower for people at the low income level, and higher for higher income people, indicates that the government believes in the concept of progressivity: the more one makes, the more one is able to pay.

What we have been complaining about with regard to Bill C-22 is that that principle is undermined by virtue of deductions that are in the bill. What these various deductions do is reduce the taxable income of a person, and hence the rate at which that tax will come into effect. I would like to show how this happens by zeroing in on the clause before us, the child care deduction. The bill will double the deduction from $500 per child to $1,000 and bring the family maximum up from $2,000 to $4,000. In 1974, the last year for which we have up to date statistics, the child care provision under the old rate cost the government over $29 million in taxes that would otherwise have been collected if that deduction had not been available. It is interesting to note that this was only $3 million less than was spent by all levels of government in directly subsidized day care programs.

I hope it will be seen by the conclusion of my speech that there are better ways of spending this money than by the present deduction system. We in the New Democratic Party do not object to the idea of a child care deduction. We know that it is becoming more and more expensive to raise a family in this day and age of increasing costs, and that the burden falls harder on low income Canadians. We agree there should be some compensation for raising children, in terms of the income tax system. However, we ask the government and the public to examine how this present deduction system works and whether it is a fair way of providing support for families who are raising children. In other words, who does it help the most: the lower income families who obviously need aid, or upper income Canadians who are better able to meet ever-increasing costs?

We contend that it is the well-off who benefit most from these deductions. The Minister of Finance and spokesmen for the Conservative party say this may be true, but since we have a progressive tax system the well-off pay more tax anyway and for this reason the programs are not unfair. In response to that argument I should like to quote from a current study which was undertaken recently by a government-funded agency, the National Council of Welfare. I quote from page 20 of a council report entitled "The Hidden Welfare System." The authors considered the child care deduction system and say:

> When the child care deduction, or, for that matter, any deduction or exemption, is examined in the light of the progressive tax rates, it become obvious that it stands the ability to pay principle precisely on its head. A deduction always gives a greater benefit to persons with a higher income and a lesser benefit to persons with low incomes. This is because deductions always take money out of a person's highest tax bracket—the bracket which is taxed at the highest rate applicable to his income.

We are not, of course, against child care allowance. But the system should be structured in such a way that deductions in respect to it do not subvert the concept of progessivity and ability to pay. Let us see how the present system works and how the bill before us will work when passed. Take the example of two women, one a minimum wage-earner earning $6,000 a year. Consulting the 1976 tax schedule, we find that if she were allowed no child care deduction, federal and provincial tax upon that $6,000 would amount to $518. But if she is allowed the child care deduction in respect of one child, her taxable income is reduced by $1,000. Therefore, federal and provincial tax would be reduced to $261 and the child care deduction would provide a tax saving of $257.

Now take the case of a woman earning $20,000. Her taxes on this amount, before the child care deduction, total $4,972. If she takes advantage of the child care deduction, her taxable income is reduced by $1,000, which in turn reduces her tax bill to $4,592. Her tax saving amounts to $380. In other words, each woman gets the same basic deduction of $1,000, but the tax saving in dollar terms is quite different. The low-income person saves $257, but the upper-income person saves $380. So what we must concentrate upon is the dollar effect of the reductions built into the tax system.

What the income tax system should be doing is narrowing the gap between the rich and the poor to provide relief for those living below the poverty line. It is shocking to note that in this wealthy country there are five million Canadians living below the poverty line. The Prime Minister himself stated that it was a goal of his government to narrow the gap between the rich and the poor. I note that the Prime Minister said in 1971:

> The whole idea of redistributing wealth so that there might be a greater opportunity for all has been a national goal of this government.

That was in 1971. But what has happened since is that successive budgets by various finance ministers have failed to achieve this goal. Wealth has not been redistributed and the gap between the rich and the poor has not been narrowed. I should like to give some figures to indicate how the tax system has become perverse. In 1951, the bottom 20 per cent of income earners got 4.4 per cent of the total national income. Twenty years later, in 1971, the same bottom 20 per cent found their percentage of the national income reduced; they received only 3.6 per cent. In 1975 they registered a fractional increase which brought them up to 3.9 per cent.

Consider what has been happening to the top 20 per cent of income earners. Their share of the income pie has grown. In 1951 they got 42.8 per cent of the total national income. In 1971, the year in which the Prime Minister disclosed his goal and spoke about narrowing the gap, the same 20 per cent increased its share of the total national income and got 43.3 per cent. In 1975 that figure was reduced only marginally to 42.4 per cent. So through two decades each group finds itself in relatively the same position. There have been marginal movements but the gap was just as wide as it was. This is what we object to so strongly in the bill before us. The deductions here will perpetuate the inequity in the economic system as it pertains to low income earners. Moreover, the national government is losing billions of dollars of potential tax revenue, revenue which might be used to introduce income support programs in favour of lower income Canadians.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That would sure create a lot of jobs, too.

Mr. Symes: The National Council of Welfare estimates that all these various provisions cost the treasury $4.6 billion in lost tax revenues in 1974, and goes on to say that if the government were to eliminate or revise only half of these provisions, the tax revenue available to the federal treasury could be used to eliminate poverty for the five million Canadians living below the poverty line.

What we would like to see, instead of the present provision in clause 21 of a standard $1,000 deduction applied to both low income earners and upper income earners, is a new system of tax credits which would provide some kind of relief to families who are raising children. It would be arranged in such a way as not to benefit upper income Canadians more than lower income Canadians. Again I quote from the National Council of Welfare report at page 21. This is their finding:

● (1650)

The way to eliminate this inequity is to replace the child care deduction with a child care credit. (A tax credit is just what its name would imply: a credit of a fixed amount which each taxpayer could apply against his/her tax bill—or, in other words, a fixed amount of tax which he/she does not have to pay.)

In the example above, suppose the child care deduction were eliminated and replaced by a tax credit of $350 per child. The two women—

They are the two women I mentioned earlier in my speech.

—Would both then be eligible for the same $350 credit. For the woman whose earned income was $6,000, this would mean a $93 reduction in her tax bill. (Instead of the $257 tax saving she now receives from the deduction, she would have her taxed reduced by $350, a difference of $93.) The $20,000 a year woman would have her tax bill increase by $30 (since the present tax deduction gives her a saving of $380, but the credit would only give her a saving of $350).

So I submit that there is a way through the tax system to help families that are rearing children. The way to help them is not, as this bill proposes, by means of a standard deduction but, rather, a tax credit. Then those who need help the most—that is to say, those at the lower end of the income scale—would receive the maximum benefit, rather than, as the system is now, those at the upper end of the income scale who do not need the kind of tax saving offered as much as those at the lower end of the income scale getting the unfair advantage which is inherent in this provision of the bill.

As a Canadian, Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about fairness in our tax system, and the more I look at the tax system that is designed by the Liberal government, supported by their Conservative friends, the more I see how it discriminates against those who are least able to fight back in terms of their income and their political strength. That is why we say the bill is unfair, that there are better ways to provide assistance to families. The better way is the tax credit, not the regressive kind of deduction that the government is proposing in this bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, may I just add a postscript to that. According to the figures presented by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, 77 per cent of the benefits from child care expenses go to those with incomes of $10,000 or less.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance loves to point out in percentage form who receives the benefits. I do not quarrel with the concept that lower and middle income Canadians should receive benefits from the child care deduction system. But what I do quarrel about is the fact that upper income Canadians, who really do not need the kinds of deductions that we have here, are benefiting in dollar terms more than lower income Canadians. Therefore, if the minister is concerned about fairness and not with just quoting percentages showing who gets what, he will remove this provision from the bill and replace it with a tax credit system.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Just to respond to the hon. gentleman, he was making the argument that it was politically expedient for us, for some reason, to put in a measure favouring those in the upper income group. In fact, it favours the lower income group, so it seems to me that the hon. member's argument does not follow.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, when you look at the total number of provisions in our income tax system of which the minister is so proud, since the minister is so fond of talking about averages, if we add up all the exemptions and deductions permitted in the income tax system we find that taxpayers earning $5,000 average a tax saving of $244, whereas taxpayers earning over $50,000 save about $4,000. I would ask the minister, what is fair about a tax system which permits 27 per cent of all tax savings to go to the top 5 per cent of tax filers, while only 33 per cent is distributed among the 70 per cent or more of lower or middle income? I say that is not fair.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With a progressive income tax system, Mr. Chairman, people at the upper end of the income scale pay a much higher dollar amount, if the hon. member wants to talk in terms of dollar amounts. What I am pointing out is that from the figures that his colleague tendered to the House it appears that the vast majority of taxpayers in this country who take advantage of child care expenses, which is the clause we are dealing with at the moment, earn incomes under $10,000. So it is scarcely a measure that is weighted in favour of the upper income group.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I never cease to be amazed to find, when we are discussing bills having to do with income tax, a close liaison existing between the Liberal and Conservative parties. They certainly form a coallition to support this kind of maldistribution of income tax. The point that my colleague for Sault Ste. Marie was making seems to me a very legitimate one.

Mr. Woolliams: He never made one, though he tried to.

Mr. Rodriguez: We are not objecting to child care expenses being increased. What we are saying, in effect, is that because it is a progressive tax system this is another distortion in the system. As we go through the bill we see other give-aways and exemptions are permitted only for people who are earning large amounts of money, and therefore it becomes a distortion when it is superimposed upon—

Mr. Woolliams: What is your salary?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, you do the same job as I do, so you know my salary.

Mr. Woolliams: If I did my job like he does his, I would not want it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock p.m., it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA

MEASURE TO CONVERT IAC INTO CHARTERED BANK

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 25, 1976, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid that Bill C-1001, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1700)

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on Bill C-1001, an act to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, on November 25, 1976, I started quoting an article published in the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil on March 25, 1976, which article was written by a citizen of the Sherbrooke area, Mr. Gaston Bégin; he described the disadvantages in the fluctuations in the cost of interest which he described as being a parasite. That article is so well written that I feel it is well worth quoting:

"Those financiers are represented by the chartered banks and ably camouflaged by the Bank of Canada which makes only pocket money at the rate of 8 per cent a year on the monetary mass of the country while the others make the rest, namely 92 per cent. With their multipliers, with a stroke of the pen, they cash in on the wealth of the nation and collect unfair interest on it. They take over our wealth and become our masters; they are the tyrants from whom we must ask permission to breathe.

A country must not buy money, it must create it itself, and without being forced to do so. That is the supreme right of the state; otherwise a country cannot be administered. Its economy becomes distorted, turned upside down, damaged, even tainted, as ours is today.

Nothing will change if we do not have the courage to force our governments' hand so that they revamp this impostor of a monetary system which directly causes miseries, perpetual indebtedness, inflation, high cost of living and laxity."

I think it is quite in order to deal with the whole flaws of the present banking system, since the object of Bill C-1001 is to create a bank. This is clearly indicated in clause 1, and I quote:

1. There is hereby incorporated a corporation under the name Continental Bank of Canada, in English, and the name Banque Continentale du Canada, in French, hereinafter called the "Bank", consisting of such persons as are from time to time shareholders of the Bank.

In short, just another bank.

For all those who seem sceptical when we refer to the role of banks in the creation of money, here is a quotation from a book by Paul Samuelson, winner of the Economics Award of the Royal Bank of Sweden. I have this book here, if anyone has doubt, a book published in memory of Alfred Nobel.

This new edition of the translation is based on the fifth edition of the book reviewed and supplemented by the author, third printing, 1966. On pages 277-278 under the title: Can banks create money? the author has the following to say to explain the basic banking system:

The banking system as a whole can act as no single bank: it can develop its investments and loans to the extent where they reach a multiple of the total resources orginally available to the system. However each small bank in doing so lends only a part of its deposits.

We therefore reply in the affirmative to the question asked at the beginning of this section. Yes, the banking system and the American public jointly create about $5 in bank deposits for each dollar withdrawn from circulation and delivered to the banks.

Is this clear enough? Yet that book can be found in nearly all universities and all collections of the work of Samuelson. I had the opportunity to meet students at the La Pocatière community college and they told me that they had those books, but that they had not noted the important points that we can discover when we read the books.

Samuelson then explains in three tables how deposits are created.

Table 26 A: Initial situation of the mother bank;

Table 26 B: Untenable situation for a small isolated bank;

Table 26 C: Final situation of the mother bank.

On page 284, the same author says the following:

Through these same processes, the banking system finally creates desposits for a total amount equal to five times that of the additional initial coverage.

This is what we, Social Crediters, talk about regularly and what we try to force government representatives to admit, that we cannot continue to live in a system of perpetual debt when we have federal-provincial conferences to try to discover who will have the right to collect the most taxes from the taxpayer. There must be an end to this. This is a cause of dispute.

Samuelson also explains in Table 26 H the multiple expansion of deposits throughout the banking system. He adds at the end of the table:

. . . in each generation, each small bank has "created" new currency so that terminal banking deposits are five times higher than the coverage finally collected from the rest of the economy.

The same author also says—and I have taken notes to be quite sure that what I am quoting can be checked anytime by anyone so inclined:

We can obtain the same answer two other ways—by using common sense or elementary algebra.

We can now observe that banks as a whole can achieve a credit expansion which a single bank could not achieve.

In Table 26 I, he gives a synthesis of the final position of all banks together. In the field of banking legislation, we have a number of freshmen who show good dispositions, but in an era of electronics and automation they go on using old rusty machines whose gears do not work any more. That is why our financing machine is falling apart. Those in charge of its operation do not even think of putting some oil where it is needed to prevent the bankruptcy which every unbiased observer says will hit us sooner or later.

We are worried by the list of fraudulent bankruptcies and we do not dare take the necessary measures to put an end to that state of affairs because we are afraid of disturbing the big shots who keep on taking advantage of the system.

Usually, at least, the essential product always comes when you can pay for it. Various organizations have studied the matter of housing, so what are the results? We ask from the government a working man's credit, namely loans for those families who want to buy a house. What does that mean? We have enough room, wood, stones, manpower and technicians to build houses. We lack money. Let us make loans and we will see houses being built. Let us do the same in other fields. Let us give money to the father of a family and we will see that he will find something better than rags or second-hand clothes for his children.

Of course, we will not give heaps of money for products that do not exist, but we simply want to give enough money so that a citizen can buy the goods that will help him meet his needs.

Bankers and politicians now say that there is too much cash in circulation. However very few people say that they have more money than what is necessary for them to meet their needs. This is what we can see everywhere.

So we fail to understand why governments take one portion of the worker's pay because the workers' families really need the whole pay of the father to meet their ordinary needs. If there is too much cash in circulation, the government should take it where it is most abundant, but never where it is lacking. Money is a creation of man! But as soon as a problem concerns money, we are stuck, we bow as before to what is inescapable, just as if it was a question of weather. Nothing can be done against the sun nor the rain. Nevertheless some so-called cultured minds take for granted that nothing can be done against lack of money and inability to pay.

However, money is not a creation of God, but an invention of man. Money was not created at the beginning of the world in a limited and immutable amount, by God's decree or by the forces of nature. Nothing such. Whether money be of metal, paper or whether it be only credit transfers in bank books, it exists because it was made somewhere by man.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On the last day this bill was debated the hon. member who has the floor asked for a few moments to conclude his remarks. Since that time the hon. member has spoken for 12½ minutes. I realize that he has important things to say on this bill, but there is a tradition in the House of Commons that a few moments are given to hon. members to conclude their remarks. I invite the hon. gentleman to conclude within a reasonable length of time so that other hon. members might have an opportunity to participate.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, we in this party would be very happy to forgo the time for our fourth speaker, whom we have here this afternoon, in order to permit the hon. member to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. On page 1392 of Hansard for November 25 the following is reported:

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired.

MR. DIONNE (KAMOURASKA): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to add—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the House ready to give unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

So I ask the hon. member whether he is drawing to a close shortly; if so, we will let him carry on.

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and also my colleagues. However I would tell you as well as to the hon. member who rose on a point of order that I am now well rested and fit. The other day I was about to conclude my speech, but today I can go on again. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me a few more minutes to end my remarks.

In any case the hon. gentleman who rose on a point of order even said it was interesting. So I go on. When the money supply in a country goes up or down, it is because somebody makes or withdraws some money. Money is coming from people who have the power to make it. That is the first thing we must have in mind if we are to overcome the financial obstacles placed between goods and needs, between the wheat in the field and the table around which hungry people sit.

The second thing we have to learn is that money is the only thing in the world that can be made in required quantity. When Canada declared war in September 1939, the whole country had been short of money for a decade. But overnight there was plenty of money until the end of the war. Money came by millions and billions, as much as was needed. That was so in every country at war. How was that money begotten? Certainly not by opening new gold mines; workers were led to the forces and war equipment plants rather than gold mines. The money came by a stroke of the pen. It was simply decided it should be there.

Food, clothing, shelter require work. Goods are the result of work. But not money. Money is the result of a mere decision by those who have the right or privilege to so decide. This is a point on which I would like hon. members to think, to try and understand all the difficulties in our system. This system could be amended anyway. When this is realized, one can no longer accept that there be no money when the lack of it is the only reason why goods in stores cannot be had by consumers. When this happens lack of money is a criminal mistake fraught with consequences. Name one government that would decide in wartime to send its soldiers home or shut down its war equipment plants for lack of money. This we did not see in Canada. How come then that the same successive governments accepted to leave hundreds of thousands of individuals and families suffer hunger and illness, lose their houses and farms because they had no money? I for one was a victim of the depression. At the age where everyone looks ahead with some confidence, we were living in a crazy system where we were earning 50 cents a day. Because I could never forgive the system for supporting that, I welcome this opportunity to express my views on the current situation.

A country should not buy money, it should create it. Such is the sovereign right of a government, without it no country can be governed, and the economy becomes thwarted, upside-down and weakened as we see it today. We therefore urge the government to use their right to create all the money needed for trade in an active and prosperous country, or to create credit instead of money. But let that be to society's benefit, let us have social credit instead of bank credit where interest is personal and trade like rather than social. It is simply that, but all that.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the debate at this stage of this particular bill may have a rather dreary resemblance to the debate when a former bill, S-30, came back at the report stage. It is true that Bill S-30, accepted by the other place last session, was modified extensively in committee and met the objections of the majority of the members at the time, and it was only by some belated intervention at the report stage that some assiduous but misguided research assistants prepared a number of amendments merely to engage in a doctrinaire blockade of a bill which had satisfied the members of the House after extensive examination in committee. None of the objections which were made at the report stage had been raised at the committee stage. As a matter of fact, it seemed to be an almost total abdication of any examination on the basis that had been suggested. Of course, this is merely a tactical blockade, and this House should be more than conscious of the effect of such a blockade. The blockade may amuse some people, edify others and satisfy some doctrinaire quirks, but the point is that there are some 12,000 people who own a portion of IAC, many of them—

Mr. Rodriguez: Poor Canadians.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is true of the great majority of them. There may be a few wealthy people among them, but it is strange to inquire about the portfolios of 12,000 shareholders of a company like IAC, which is a large, all-Canadian company. Some people who care little have a total disregard for how they trample on other people's property, how they may kick them in the teeth and how they may cause them loss without right of repartition. They are quite prepared to act as long as they see fit, but should they feel hurt themselves you would hear them bleat. If those who want to intercede at this time cite one or two names—as was done in debate this afternoon—of people who have worked and risked a lot, it is primarily because of jealousy because these people are smarter or a little more astute.

● (1720)

The hon. gentleman suggests there might be a character in the shape of a dog's hind leg. Unless one is able to put forward proof of misfeasance or improper practices, I think he should not cast aspersions on others. I would like to see the proceedings of this House broadcast when such statements are made. We would see how fast a libel suit would be slapped on. It is easy to make statements in the confines of this Chamber where there is absolute privilege, but they would not dare to make those statements outside. I find it rather difficult to accept observations like that.

This House has to act responsibly. If there are proper objections to a bill and we have heard them, the bill goes to committee and it is examined as to misfeasance, instead of wild allegations being made which have no substance. We should not be caught up in causing potential damage or financial loss to people who have no recourse. Some members dismiss the fact that they can cause economic loss to others by playing games, but if anyone were to start stepping on their toes we would hear them scream.

I put a lot of blame on the government for the fact that certain objections are being raised to this particular bill at this time. A white paper on banking revisions should have been prepared for reference to the standing committee on finance immediately after the conclusion of the throne speech debate. But we are not going to get a white paper, we are going to get a bill and the second reading debate will be extensive because the government will be committed to a particular course of action. After that there will be reference to the committee, and then public hearings. I forecast that the only amendments to the Bank Act in 1977 will be a one-line amending bill about May or June extending the life of the act for another year.

What about this bill to incorporate the Continental Bank of Canada? Does it face another year of total opposition, and is that opposition justified simply on the doctrinaire grounds that banks should be nationalized? There is no other reason for the opposition to this bill.

This is a Canadian operation and it is going to start with some money. I suppose to members of the New Democratic Party, the fact that it makes money makes it a reprehensible operation. To them the only things that are good are loser, state-operated ventures. They all become losers unless they have an absolute monopoly. I think members of that party should examine their stand and the interests that other people legitimately have. It is totally wrong to blockade this bill all through this session. Undoubtedly, if this practice continues it will take another year before the bill can go through. The Bank Act is not going to come forward, and there will be no opportunity to incorporate a bank by letters patent which would eliminate the private bill.

This House has to be responsible to the public interest, Mr. Speaker. Over the years I have seen some shocking examples of abuse of parliamentary privilege and parliamentary practice. People who have absolutely no right of redress have suffered grievous loss. I think those losses should lie in the souls and minds of the people who caused the excessive delays. The case can be argued, and it is then up to us to incorporate the body. We do not guarantee it will operate at a profit.

I dare say members of the New Democratic Party were quite happy to see the Unity Bank go through. It has had some difficulty in its operations, but others have gone through recently that seem to be operating very well and which are likely to be successful. They are like any new business except that the stakes are higher. At the present time, foreign financial interests can operate freely in this country—the suitcase bankers. Foreign banking interests are allowed to incorporate subsidiary institutions, not called banks but carrying out many banking functions, without supervision. This is because there are people who think that some Canadian operations are too big. By trying to get a squirrel with an elephant gun they miss the squirrel but get the much bigger game. I urge hon. members to let this bill go forward to the next stage. Surely the people who are putting forward this proposal are entitled to justice and fair play from this House. That is all I ask.

I urge hon. members not to delay unduly passage of this bill. Some may have legitimate remarks to make. I made plenty of suggestions with regard to the bill last year and was able to obtain many changes, as I saw fit, on behalf of my party, and those changes were accepted by the committee. None of the amendments was opposed by members of the New Democratic Party, who also found the amendments satisfactory.

We are considering a large Canadian company. Incidentally, IAC is the largest Canadian-owned auto-leasing company, but its share of the Canadian market is much smaller than that of a subsidiary of a New York company which can operate with greater freedom than IAC. If the House allows the Continental Bank bill to pass, the operations of the Canadian-owned company will be strengthened and the company will obtain a bigger share of the Canadian market.

The position of the NDP on this matter is remarkable. They cannot have it both ways. They are strong economic nationalists, but not, apparently, in the case of banks, because they want all banking to come under one big, massive, national bank. The result of their proposal would be foreign-owned interests coming in and taking an ever bigger share of our business. Really, they are adopting two positions which I find totally unreconcilable.

I hope that this bill can go forward. I do not think that passage of this bill should await passage of a new bank act which will become effective only in 1978. I think the people promoting the bank and the shareholders of IAC deserve more honest and fair treatment from this House.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). He has long been a member of this House. I recall, when I was first elected to this House in 1965, that he was the chief financial critic of the Conservative party, and in 1967 he played an active role in the finance committee in discussing amendments to the Bank Act. I listened carefully to his remarks this afternoon. It would be only fair to add that in 1967 when we sat in committee he was the corporate apologist. Two members of my party, the late Colin Cameron and I, attempted to carry the flag for most Canadian people in the discussion of those amendments.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Hah!

Mr. Gilbert: If you remember, Mr. Speaker, back in 1967 a Bank Act amendment lifting the 6 per cent ceiling was being considered. I remember witnessing a motion, proposed by a Conservative member and seconded by a Liberal, for lifting that ceiling. It was accepted, despite the opposition of a strong contingent of young Liberals led by Walter Gordon. The corporate boys won the day and the 6 per cent interest ceiling was lifted. The hon member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) pointed out the results of the acceptance of that motion brought forward in 1967.

We, of the New Democratic Party, feel that it is our duty to review Bill C-1001, the bill to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada. We want to consider how such a bank would fit into the general banking picture in Canada. I enjoyed listening to the hon. member for Edmonton West. He partly blamed the government for not bringing forward a white paper for discussion both in the House and in committee, a white paper which would have enabled us to consider amendments to the Bank Act. Actually, one of his main arguments was similar to the NDP argument with regard to the incorporation of IAC as Continental Bank of Canada. We say that IAC should not be incorporated as a bank until the Bank Act has been amended. The principle is important and there is a good deal of support in the financial community for that position.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Tell us about it.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, may I refer the hon. member for Edmonton West to an article in the Financial Post of April 3, 1976?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Written by whom?

Mr. Gilbert: It was written by Beatrice Riddell and Stephen Duncan. The headline reads, "Stall of IAC Conversion to a Bank Raises Larger Issues ." The article reads in part:

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Barring an unexpected change of heart by the 16—member NDP caucus, the IAC Ltd. proposal to convert to a chartered bank appears stopped in its tracks—for the time being at least.

I shall quote what I consider as the main parts of the article. I hope the hon. member for Edmonton West is listening. The paragraph I am about to quote is headed, "Conversion vs Creation." It reads:

Clearly, the IAC-Continental stall raises some serious questions for the financial system as a whole—questions that will certainly get important billing during the forthcoming Bank Act debate.

As that paragraph suggests, the issue is one of conversion as opposed to the creation of another bank. The next paragraph of the article reads as follows:

At issue: is it in the public interest for a large, efficient financial organization to convert to a chartered bank? If so, what special arrangements should be permitted to allow for an orderly transition, and what time limit should be set?

The issue, as I said, is one of conversion as opposed to the creation. That question can only be debated fully by members of this House, and of the finance committee, when they see the proposed Bank Act amendments. That, I suggest, is what the two learned authors of the article say.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who are they, and what are their interests?

Mr. Gilbert: They are Beatrice Riddell and Stephen Duncan, writers for the Financial Post. I do not know them but have read what they have written in the Financial Post. I am sure that they have both knowledge and experience of this matter.

The article goes on to say:

Ever since the Porter royal commission on finance reported in 1964, it has generally been considered acceptable, and even desirable, for existing near-banks to become banks if they want to do so. But, in fact, this is the first such request.

I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West remembers the Porter commission report of 1964, and the questions which were raised at that time concerning the conversion of near-banks to banks. Well, here is a large institution attempting to convert itself into a bank. We say, properly, I think, that before this conversion takes place we should see the new bank act and the standards which are to apply under that new act.

The authors of the article go on to say this:

Obviously, a bank sponsored by an organization of IAC's size, reputation and financial expertise provides much greater potential competition for the existing big banks than one starting from scratch.

● (1740)

"If anyone is entitled to a new banking charter, IAC with its proven management and strong Canadian flavor (96 per cent owned by 13,000 Canadian shareholders) certainly is," a senior Canadian banker says.

Before the Finance Committee on Bill S-30 there appeared the Inspector General of Banks, C. L. Read. He set forth a principle which we should look at very closely. He said that in order to put the banks in a proper perspective we should have more competition. That is the thrust of his statement. That is what C. L. Read, the Inspector General of Banks, told the Senate Banking Committee when it convened in November to hear an application from IAC of Toronto to form the Continental Bank of Canada. He said government policy favours the chartering of new banks to provide competition for the 11 existing banks. If I thought there was real competition among the 11 existing banks with regard to interest rates, I would more than welcome the instrusion by IAC into the banking field. However, one need only look at the interest rates with regard to personal loans, mortgage interest, and rates to companies to realize that there is no competition whatsoever. There may be a little bit of competition with regard to acquiring business and services, but one could not for a moment say that there is any competition with regard to interest rates.

An article in the December issue of Maclean's is entitled "Let There Be Banks—A Little Something For The Rich". After setting forth the principle by C. L. Read, the Inspector General, the writer, Terrence Belford, sets forth the background of the persons who conduct the IAC operation. He says, and I quote:

Take IAC's Continental Bank. Among its 16-man board of directors, thirteen sit on the boards of other banks or trust companies. They are: J. S. Land, Royal Trust Co.; Ronald Cliff, National Trust Co.; Frank Covert, Royal Bank; John Dewar, Toronto-Dominion Bank; Conrad Harrington, Royal Trust Co.; David Kinnear, Bank of Montreal; Louis Lapointe, Toronto-Dominion Bank; Keith MacDonald, Canada Permanent Trust Co.; Paul Paré, Royal Bank; Charles Rathgeb, Royal Bank; Renault St.-Laurent, Banque Canadienne Nationale; James Thackray, Bank of Montreal; and Dennis Yorath, Montreal Trust Co.

With an array of directors like that who sit on the IAC and also on other banks, one draws the immediate inference that competition would remain the same as it is today among the other 11 chartered banks. I would think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) would see that that is a reasonable inference on the basis of the facts that have been presented by this writer and myself. If you have the IAC with 13 directors who have interlocking directorships with other banks, you cannot reasonably expect competition in the banking field.

Terrence Belford in the article in Maclean's goes on to say, and I quote:

IAC's major shareholder, with a 19 per cent interest, is Carena-Bancorp Inc., controlled by Peter and Edward Bronfman, who incidentally are also principal shareholders in the company sponsoring the Commercial and Industrial Bank. Their partner in Carena-Bancorp, which owns the Montreal Forum and Canadiens hockey team, is Jacque Courtois, a vice-president of the Bank of Nova Scotia. The Bank of Nova Scotia itself also participates in Carena through its holdings in Placements Rondelles Inc. Yet another IAC shareholder is Royal Trust. Both the Bronfmans and the trust company will transfer their shareholdings to the new bank.

On the evidence of the article by Terrence Belford, we come back to the original proposition by the Inspector General that the incorporation of new banks will be for the purpose of providing more competition. We find that the directors of IAC have interlocking directorships with other banks. We also find that IAC's major shareholder has many other corporations which are directly related to banks. Therefore the inference is reasonable that there will be little or no competition.

Mr. Belford goes on to say:

This galaxy of corporate talent has managed to convince the Senate banking committee to exempt the IAC bank from many regulations governing similar ventures. For example, the Senate says the Bronfmans can keep their 19 per cent shareholding for two years in spite of the fact all other bank shareholders are limited to a maximum 10 per cent interest.

That is a concession which is worthy of note and worthy of examination. The hon. member for Parkdale said that appears to be discrimination. I quite agree with him.

Mr. Belford went on to say:

The IAC bank bill will allow the company to keep its two insurance subsidiaries for at least two years:—

Again the inference can be drawn that this is a discrimination in favour of IAC against other banks.

—other banks are specifically banned from the insurance business. The bank will also be allowed to keep its current board of directors for ten years even though the Bank Act says directors cannot sit on both bank and trust company boards. IAC has five such directors including its president, J. S. Land.

On the basis of the evidence by Terrence Belford, we should examine thoroughly and exhaustively the reasons why IAC want to incorporate under Bill C-1001. The reasons are quite obvious. They want to continue their operation with exemptions and preferences that other banks do not now enjoy.

The hon. member for Edmonton West says that there are 12,000 or 13,000 shareholders who may be suffering certain losses as a result of the holding up of this bill. There are 23 million people in Canada. Their interests far exceed the 13,000 shareholders represented by IAC. They do so in light of the favours that IAC would obtain by its conversion from a finance company to a bank.

This is the first attempt by any finance company or near bank to move to a bank. All other applications have been started from scratch. Therefore it behooves all of us to study in depth this problem of conversion versus creation.

When I consider the array of directors, when I consider the type of shareholder, when I read about the exemptions which would need to be made with regard to the finance act, I come to the conclusion that in fairness to all Canadians, not merely to 13,000 shareholders, there is a duty incumbent upon all members of parliament to delay this bill until a new Bank Act has been presented. When we know what the amendments are to be, and when these matters have been fully debated in the House and in the Finance Committee, we shall be in a position to deal with applications from insurance companies and near-banks in a spirit of fairness, knowing what is contained in the new legislation.

This, in summary, is why we in the NDP oppose Bill C-1001. We have no axe to grind with the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Reid) who brought this measure forward as a private member's bill. I am sure he does not rank with members of the other place who have corporate holdings and deep financial interests in many of the major corporations across the country. I think he is a poor country boy who represents the people of Rainy River. He represents them under different banners. At times I do not know whether he is representing them as a Liberal, as Labour, or as Liberal-Labour. Now he really has me confused. He advises us he represents them as Liberal-Labour. If he does, I think he will recognize the fairness of the argument put forward by members of the New Democratic Party, particularly by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) and by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who have studied this subject closely and concluded that in no way should the bill be approved until the new bank act is passed.

I happen to be a poor city boy with much the same background as the hon. member for Rainy River. I did have a certain amount of university education, but I am just a humble lawyer attempting to look after the needs of my constituents. Many of my constituents come to me and complain about the exorbitant interest rates they pay on their mortgages and personal loans. It makes me—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like for the first time to make a few comments about this private bill which, like all other private bills, will keep coming back before the House until we get so tired of it that it will eventually pass.

This bill provides for the organization of Continental Bank of Canada as a wholly-owned subsidiary corporation of IAC Limited. The bank and IAC Ltd. would be almagamated within ten years, with shareholders of IAC Ltd. becoming shareholders of the bank. The bill contains a number of provisions to ensure that the business and capital structure of IAC Ltd. will be brought into conformity with the Bank Act during the period prior to amalgamation.

This is precisely why we cannot pass this bill for the time being. First of all, to organize this bank, they failed to comply with the Bank Act and are in complete contravention of that legislation, and it is mere patronage. A moment ago, I was looking at the hon. member who put this bill forward. I understand he did it because he had to and I wonder—one always wonders about things—how much financiers have paid the Liberal party to convince them. One is always entitled to ask questions and that is what the Canadian people are doing.

All we ask for at present is to wait until consideration of the new bank legislation is completed. Then we will deal with this matter. But the Liberal party seems in such a hurry, they look as if they were spurred on by some outside force to give speedy passage to this bill, which every week is coming back before the House. They seem to say it is urgent but IAC Ltd. will surely not go bankrupt, Mr. Speaker, because we will not agree to this bill immediately. That is impossible. I have known IAC Ltd. since I was a child. They make so much business and lend money at such prohibitive interest rates that we should not feel sorry for them at all. Of course, when one gets lots of money, one always want to get more.

And the existing finance company, in spite of its extraordinary interest rates, wants to get even more. This is why they want to convert into a bank in order to be allowed as well to loan $100 for an asset of only $6, and get 10.5 per cent interest. That is quite all right, I am not giving them orders, in their place I would do the same, but we members should . . .

[English]

An hon. Member: Six o'clock!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. Perhaps the House would permit us to go back into Committee of the Whole before I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Turner in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock, clause 21 was being considered. The hon. member for Nickel Belt had the floor.

On clause 21.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, when we broke off at five o'clock for private members' hour I think I was commenting on the great coalition which seems to take place between the two old line parties in this House when we come to deal with such things as changes to the Income Tax Act. I am always very impressed by the way in which the official opposition stops opposing and suddenly becomes supportive of the government when it comes to income tax changes affecting those in the upper income brackets.

As my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie has quite correctly pointed out, we have no quarrel in principle with this particular clause which seeks to increase child care deductions.

Mr. Saltsman: We all have families.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, we all have families and know what it costs to raise children in this country today. I myself have five and can attest to what it costs to raise children. So as I say, we have no quarrel with this clause in principle. But we submit the government must be prepared to make some meaningful changes in the structure of the income tax system so it becomes a tool for redistributing wealth. The government is superimposing the kind of change outlined in this clause upon a structure which is badly distorted and as a result, people who earn a lot of money can take advantage of such changes to get richer, while the spread between the incomes of those at the top end of the scale and those at the bottom becomes greater.

The minister has made all sorts of points about the number of people who have taken advantage of child care deductions and so on. But this is not the point that we have been trying to make, Mr. Chairman. The question is: how much is that in actual cash to a family? The National Council of Welfare—one has to assume this council knows something about low income families and income distribution, and one has to assume it has expertise in this field for which, I think, members of the House will be prepared to give it the benefit of the doubt—has shown how the tax saving from the deduction is substantially more beneficial to the wealthy than to the low income groups. The National Welfare Council has pointed out that at the $10,000 level such a $1,000 deduction would be worth $210, while at the $50,000 and plus income level it is worth $410. Here is the kind of distortion we were talking about, that the increase in child care deductions for the upper income bracket would be worth to them twice the amount that a person making $10,000 would have.

Last Monday the Minister of Finance claimed that the quarter of a million Canadians who claim the child care allowance stand to benefit from the increase, but he failed to say that some benefit more than others, and the ones who tend to benefit more are the ones who are already enjoying a greater benefit from society in terms of wages. I think the minister misses the point we have made that in effect this kind of amendment maintains the constant inequality and keeps the spread, and even widens the spread between the upper income groups and the lower income groups.

Not only does this bill deliberately improve the tax position of the middle and upper income earners, it does absolutely nothing to plug the existing loopholes which really turn the ability-to-pay principle upside down. This is a period of time when even societies like ours are concerned about plugging loopholes or at least narrowing the gap between the top and the bottom income levels.

What are all these amendments doing? They are doing nothing to change the fact that in 1974 deletions from the accounts of the income tax revenue that could not be collected because the taxpayers were no longer resident in Canada amounted to $850,000, owed by 161 taxpayers. What attempts has the government made to collect those taxes? In this situation the tax dollars have gone down the drain and the rest of us will have to pick up the slack in that area.

Does the bill do anything to change the fact that in 1974 252 persons who made over $50,000 that year paid no tax at all, and that 17 of them had incomes of over $200,000? Does it do anything to collect these taxes? I want to know that because it is rather important.

Another question that one should ask oneself is whether this bill does anything to change the fact that professionals who want to avoid taxes set up dummy companies, since small businesses pay taxes at a lower rate when compared with marginal rates in the personal income tax system. What are we doing to plug that loophole to make sure that that segment of society pays its fair share of the taxes? These are the kinds of questions that we would like to ask. Do we not see some of those changes being brought here as well as an increase in child care allowances? Does the bill do anything to change the fact that interest costs on money borrowed for the purpose of investing in something that may ultimately earn income for the taxpayer is deductible in the year in which the interest expense is incurred? Does it do anything to plug that loophole?

We are prepared to say that if you are plugging those loopholes with amendments in the bill, then of course what you are doing with respect to increased child care expenses has relevance. Indeed, when the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie repeated what the Prime Minister had promised in 1971 in respect of closing the gap between those who have and those who have not, we realize that that philosophy seems to have changed because as recently as January 26 the Prime Minister said the following at a Press conference:

> It is not part of the Liberal philosophy to equalize everybody towards the middle; to make sure that the top quintile and the lower quintile are equal, or even, for that matter, very close. It is part of the Liberal philosophy to make sure that the poor in this society get richer. If the rich get richer too, we really do not take offence to that.

I do not mind if the rich get richer, but surely they should not be getting richer with the connivance of the income tax structure which permits all sorts of loopholes. Surely that is not fair. Surely any person who has a sense of justice would never subscribe to that theory. Suddenly it is 1977 and the Prime Minister has changed his tune.

Some of the rather interesting distortions in the income tax structure are rather disturbing. It should be very disturbing to members on the government side to realize that the just society has been in effect for eight years. Certainly we cannot see any justice with respect to the way the changes to the Income Tax Act have come to the House during that time.

I want to point out that we on this side of the House do not oppose the whole concept of increased child care cost exemptions. However, in this debate we want to focus attention on the distortions in the income tax structure. It seems to me that the Income Tax Act certainly provides loopholes which not only benefit the rich but are a deliberate tax policy of the Liberal government. This helps to explain the fact that in 1971 taxpayers in the $25,000 and over income group, where ownership of stocks, bonds, mortgages and business interests are concentrated, paid only 13 per cent of the federal personal income tax, while those taxpayers earning less than $10,000 paid 51 per cent. To know that it is a premeditated, deliberate attempt on the part of the government to help the rich get richer we only have to look at the remark which I mentioned earlier made by the Prime Minister at his press conference on January 26.

But we have seen other amendments go through the House. We have seen changes with respect to the surtax. That occurred when the anti-inflation program was established. They were supposed to go in tandem. Here we see one coming off and the other staying in. I suppose this is what the minister would term the way ahead.

There is no question that when we look at the bill and we see the elimination of the surtax, we see changes with respect to the registered retirement savings plan, and when we see the write-off on personal income tax of moneys put into exploration, we become very concerned about these kinds of proposals with respect to child care expenses moving up because in effect they will not really help the lower income persons in terms of cash. We have no hesitation at this particular point in saying that this clause is going to be inequitable when taken together with the other changes which are envisaged in this bill.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I rise in this debate because at an earlier stage last week when we used some figures to suggest that the overwhelming percentage of the savings made by these various income tax provisions which the minister is proposing would go to people in the upper income bracket, the minister argued against the points put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, by myself and others, using figures with regard to registered retirement savings plans. He was supported by the hon. member for Edmonton West. They argued that a very large majority of the people taking advantage of these plans were people in the lower income brackets, people earning up to $15,000 a year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Ten thousand.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Edmonton West interjects that they are people earning under $10,000.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Taxable income.

Mr. Orlikow: Taxable income, and technically he is correct, but we have had some calculations made from the information provided by the Department of National Revenue and Statistics Canada, and while the hon. member is technically correct, if we look at where the savings actually go, it becomes very obvious that the real savings go to the people who earn over $10,000, and particularly to those who earn over $15,000.

I think it would be useful to put the precise facts on the record. The argument advanced by the minister and by the hon. member for Edmonton West is the usual argument we hear, not just from politicians from the Liberal and Conservative parties but also from people who write financial columns in newspapers, business editors and so forth. We have a typical example of this in an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 20, 1976 written by Ronald Anderson, and which reads as follows in part:

> ... the retirement savings plans encourage people to save for their retirement, the home ownership assistance plan helps and encourages people to provide their own living accommodation, and the interest and dividend exemption encourages Canadians to build a modest investment portfolio.

As I say, this is the typical view of middle and upper income people because they look upon themselves as being typical of all Canadians, and of course nothing could be further from the truth. These plans encourage thrift, supposedly, on the part of those who can afford to save, and in these days that is not very many people. These gimmicks are supposed to foster savings, but they only foster savings if people have extra money to save. In 1974 there was a total tax benefit of $513 million from the registered retirement savings plan, and the figures show that most of that went to the affluent. Last week the minister argued that RRSP's were not benefiting the wealthy at the expense of everyone else because in 1974, the last year for which we have figures, nearly 940,000 people had RRSP deductions. What the minister did not tell us was where the benefits accruing from these deductions went.

We have had an opportunity to look at statistics which show that just under 5 per cent of the people in the $20,000 and over category got over 57 per cent of the tax savings in 1974 from RRSP deductions. I will put the figures on the record, and I would be happy if the minister could show us that we are wrong. People with a taxable income of under $5,000, 38.4 percent of all the people who took advantage of this provision in the income tax law, had an average saving in taxes of $1.02 for the year. The people who had taxable incomes of between $5,000 and $10,000 per year—and they made up 31.5 per cent of the people who took advantage of this provision—had an average saving for the year of $9.81. The people who earned between $10,000 and $15,000 taxable income—they made up 18.7 per cent of those who took advantage of this provision—saved an average of $38.43.

Now we come to the big winners, those people who had taxable incomes of between $15,000 and $20,000 a year. They made up only 6.8 per cent of all the people who took advantage of this provision, and they saved an average of $125.01. People with taxable incomes of over $20,000 made up 4.6 per cent of those who filed under this plan, and they saved $551.88. That is the kind of rough justice the Minister of Finance believes in, $1.02 saving for those who have taxable incomes of under $5,000, and $551.88 for those who had taxable incomes of over $20,000. That is the just society of the Trudeau Liberal government.

Let us look at the registered pension plan, which the minister said was a better illustration of equity than any other. Registered pension plans were supposed to benefit the ordinary working person as opposed to those more affluent. The savings are divided up in the same way, although the result is not quite so extreme.

Of those who took advantage of this plan 38.4 per cent had taxable incomes of under $5,000 a year. Their average saving was $1.85. Of those who took advantage of registered pension plans 31.5 per cent had incomes of between $5,000 and $10,000, and their average saving was $21.29. Of the people who took advantage of the registered pension plan 18.7 per cent had incomes of between $10,000 and $15,000, and their average saving was $73.26. However, when we come to those people earning between $15,000 and $20,000 taxable income, they made up only 6.8 per cent of those filing under the registered pension plan, and they saved $135.76. Those people who earned $20,000 taxable income, and who took advantage of this plan had an average saving of $225.50, and they made up 4.6 per cent of those filing. In other words, under this plan those who were able to make use of it and who earned under $5,000 saved $1.85. People earning $20,000 taxable income saved $225.50. That is another example of what the minister considers just.

If you combine these two sets of figures and look at the total retirement picture you find that those with low income and no other resources get virtually no help. They get the old age pension, but then so do the wealthy. Supposedly income tax takes away from the wealthy—except that the minister permits them all kinds of exemptions.

The affluent and powerful who have other sources of income, and who do not need to worry about retirement, receive generous benefits from the government. We have calculated this as follows. The group with under $5,000 taxable income per year have an average saving of $2.88; between $5,000 and $10,000, $31.10; $10,000 to $15,000, $11.68; $15,000 to $20,000, $260.77; and over $20,000, $777.38. The same applies to the Registered Home Ownership Plan about which the minister spoke so proudly this afternoon.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I did not mention it this afternoon.

Mr. Orlikow: If the minister did not mention it this afternoon then I will not deal with it. There is one other thing which distorts the whole tax structure and which again is a bonanza to those in the upper income brackets, and that is the indexing of income tax. We consider this to be the biggest boondoggle of all. It is an idea that the Liberal government stole from the official opposition several years ago. It has been touted as a plan which benefits everyone because all save the same as a result of inflation, and therefore if income tax is indexed everyone receives equal benefit. If you look at the actual figures, however, you see that as usual under a Liberal government those at the top benefit much more than those at the bottom.

The tax rate at the bottom is much higher than it needs to be. If you give money away to everybody, particularly to the wealthy, then you have to find the money to meet expenses. To pay for the services you have to take the money back from everybody, and take more from those at the bottom.

Using figures supplied by the Department of Finance we looked at the savings for a taxpayer with two children under 16 for the years 1976 and 1977. The group with a taxable income of $5,000 a year will pay $46 less tax; $10,000, $284 less; $15,000, $413 less; $20,000, $621 less; $30,000, $884 less; and $50,000, $1,259 less.

These savings are for what the Department of Finance called a typical taxpayer at various income levels. In fact even these figures do not tell the whole story because people in the upper income bracket do not make all their money from wages and salaries. They often have income from capital gains which escape taxation and are not taken into account. No account is taken of other potential deductions that I spoke of earlier such as child care, RRSP, RHOP, interest income deduction, and so on.

I think we have demonstrated quite conclusively from the statistics issued by the government that our system of taxation is geared to give the greatest benefit to those who already have. This is why we have the situation which some of us have spoken about for a number of years where, despite all the plans for social security, despite the fact that we now have hospitalization insurance, medical insurance, family allowances, despite all these federal and provincial programs, rather than the gap between rich and poor being narrowed, in the last 25 years it has widened.

One of my colleagues quoted figures on this earlier today, and I want to close by putting them on the record myself. In 1951 the bottom 20 per cent of income earners, as a percentage of the total income, received 4.4 per cent of the gross national product. The figures we have show that in 1975 this had dropped to 3.9 per cent. On the other hand, the percentage of the total income received by the top one fifth of the income earners in 1951 was 42.8 per cent of the GNP; in 1975 this group received 42.4 per cent. We believe it should be the objective of a modern industrialized society to ensure that no one lives in real need. The gap between those at the bottom of the income scale and those at the top should be narrowed. This government has not done that and this bill will not do it. It is for that reason that we oppose the bill, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, we listened this afternoon to arguments that were supposed to pertain to clause 21 of the bill which deals with deductions for child care, but although I listened carefully they seemed to relate to other matters. I suppose there is not a clause in the bill which does not relate to the Income Tax Act and I think the New Democratic Party have at least grasped that fact. I should like to answer some of their arguments.

The new act passed in 1971 was piloted through this House by one who now sits in the Federal Court. Taxing laws are complicated, and certainly not all accountants or lawyers understand them. Mr. Chairman, I have just returned from the Canadian Bar Association's mid-winter meeting, and it is the opinion of the association that no act is as difficult to understand as that act to which I just referred, which was passed by parliament. In saying this I am not criticizing the government, because no matter which party is in power, Liberal, Conservative, or even NDP, the drafting of tax laws is an expert's job. And, Mr. Chairman, hon. members listened this afternoon and for three quarters of an hour this evening to the biggest drivel you ever heard. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, would you trust any one of those people to my left—and I say this to the press as well, even though only one press man out of 70 is in the gallery—would you trust any one of them to do your tax return? Those people are terribly ignorant about tax matters.

Mr. Rodriguez: I suppose you are an expert?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: There is ignorance personified.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, considering from where that remark has come, I will not even ask for withdrawal. The hon. member in his rhetorical question asked if any people would trust us to do their income tax. The answer, of course, is that it depends on whether you are rich or poor.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is entering the debate. He and other members of his party have had a chance to speak without interruption; I think he ought to let the hon. member for Calgary North continue.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that interruption. When talking about child care deductions hon. members on my left covered the whole scope of income tax. Mr. Chairman, every day I sit close to the leader of the NDP; although I am not in my seat at present, this debate being in committee of the whole. Mr. Chairman, every day the leader of the NDP rises to criticize the government with regard to unemployment. Really, what the hon. member's party says—and I should like the Liberals to listen—is this: if a person makes a profit or earns a high salary, unless you tax him right down to the poverty level there is something wrong with the country.

I say people must have the right to a profit, since profits lead to investment. You should be able to make a little money, because then you can invest in the industrial development of the nation. But the NDP wants to bring us all down to one level. Really, when they talk about 30 per cent unemployment here, 20 per cent there, and 10 per cent in Quebec, the NDP are saying this: tax everybody to death; give the money to various organizations or spend it on phony programs, and then blame the government for unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Really, that is what we are talking about. Mr. Chairman, I have been here for a long time. We have witnessed an NDP filibuster. But then, they are merely trying to maintain their votes, the votes of people with a certain level of income. They are trying to show that they have done their job on behalf of those people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad you are yelling and shouting. That party is trying to hang on to its votes, trying to show that it is doing its job. Let me deal with what they talked about earlier.

Mr. Rodriguez: How do you know what we said? You were not here this afternoon.

Mr. Epp: We told him.

Mr. Woolliams: Those hon. members discussed the child care expenses, and in so doing covered the whole field of income tax. That brings me to my point concerning the Income Tax Appeal Board. When you, as a taxpayer, raise a matter coming under section 21, or any other section before the appeal board, if you win your appeal the Crown will not disclose what cards it has up its sleeve. When I speak of the Crown I am not speaking of the minister; my remarks in this regard are not meant to criticize the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: The same old gang.

Mr. Woolliams: Hon. members on my left should consider what is happening in Manitoba and Saskatchewan; they can laugh if they like, but we are not talking specifically about governments; I am talking about the tax act. If the taxpayer wins his appeal before the appeal board, the Crown will not disclose its cards. If it does not like the board's decision, it can take the matter to the Federal Court. Mr. Chairman, in Federal Court you are not allowed to say that you won your case before the Income Tax Appeal Board. You start from scratch. Therefore, you might as well scratch out the Income Tax Appeal Board, because it does not work to the advantage of the taxpayer. No matter whether he has raised any question coming under section 21, 22 or 23. I hope the minister and his officials will take my remarks into consideration. I say, if you are going to have an Income Tax Appeal Board, give that board some powers.

This afternoon the NDP tried to make representations on behalf of the little taxpayer.

Mr. Rodriguez: I suppose you are one.

Mr. Woolliams: Hon. members on my left can laugh and shout, but they are not really concerned about the rich or the poor. They are concerned about the fact that they now have the best jobs they will ever have in their lives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I raise the point concerning the Tax Appeal Board because I happen to know something about it. I know that if you take your case to the Income Tax Appeal Board and win it, you might as well forget it, and I will tell you why. The Crown is not worried if you are rich or poor, but it is worried in case the appeal board decision sets a precedent which could affect many people, be it one million, 100,000, 10,000, or any number you can think of. The fact that you have won your case before the appeal board has no weight at all at the Federal Court level. I therefore say to the minister, if there is to be an Income Tax Appeal Board which is empowered to render decisions, surely one should be able to appeal the board's decisions to the Federal Court in the same way as one can appeal in the appellate court of a province a decision handed down in the superior court.

I did not realize the situation was quite as bad as I have painted it until I listened last week to a Canada Bar Association lecture. As things now stand, the appeal board is a nullity because it does not matter if you win or lose your case. If the Crown thinks you have a good case, it will not disclose its cards before the appeal board, but will wait for the case to be heard in Federal Court. I ask the minister to look into this question. Perhaps some of the problems which even NDP members raised in committee might be solved more cheaply at the lower level, because if you must go to the Federal Court, you have to hire lawyers, and the whole process is much more expensive. Who can afford to go there? These are important matters.

I now want to move on to something else. We have been talking about the whole realm of income tax. This is an important clause to many people, but there is something even more important. All across this country people are struggling to get a house. Some may have a little savings that they can put into a second house, a small farm on the prairies or small piece of land in Ontario or Quebec. One of the most destructive things with regard to investment has been the capital gains tax. I will state why.

A person may have invested his savings in a small piece of property. At age 65 he will be going on pension and may want to sell that property. The valuation was set on January 1, 1972. I am not talking about rich people. I am talking about those to my left who preach their drivel. They are the ones who wanted the capital gains tax for every farmer in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I will bet that when my friends to my left go to Saskatchewan they do not tell the public they were the ones who were in favour of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I realize it poses quite a difficulty for Your Honour to hear me over the noise that is going on. Nevertheless, I believe I have a legitimate point of order. As much as I admire and respect the hon. member for Calgary North I am sure he would not want to leave a misleading impression in this House. If he will go back to the debates on capital gains to which he referred, erroneously I am afraid but I am sure it was unintentional, he will find that while we were in favour of full taxation of capital gains, we made it very clear during the entire time that the family farm was to be exempt. We are for motherhood just as he is.

The Chairman: Let us say that was a point of clarification.

Mr. Woolliams: It is time we had a debate like this. The only reason they get up is because I am telling them the truth. They cannot stand to hear the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The fact is that if you go through the committee records and the records of this House you will see that the NDP were for capital gains taxes. If it had not been for this party, we would not have had the amendments to protect the average man and the family farm.

Let me get back to what I was talking about, the little person. Whenever I do that, the NDP members get irritated. They try to leave the impression that they are like God and the angels, the only people to look after little people.

The average income earner may buy a small house or little piece of property. Immediately he sells it he must prove the evaluation to the department. These people who are elected to the NDP like bureaucracy. Therefore you have to hire an appraiser and an accountant and get other expertise to prove the valuation, or else the tax department will gouge you. That is where the NDP should be directing their attention, instead of peddling that drivel they have peddled all night. Socialism led to unemployment and the destruction of the United Kingdom. It would destroy Canada if this government ever followed their example.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Conservatism destroyed it.

Mr. Woolliams: I can answer that very easily. The hon. member says conservatism destroyed Canada. We have not been in power that much in Canada since John A. Macdonald left the scene, to destroy anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: However, that party was in power in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia and we know of the destruction there. It is very difficult with a debate which I hope I am leading tonight—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Maybe this is the only night I will lead the Tories. At least I am bringing some life into the Chamber. It has been dead all day. The NDP filibustered all afternoon on clause 21.

An hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Woolliams: This is the first time I have spoken on this bill, but it won't be the last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Under the general administration of the Income Tax Act, you can have an assessment in 1972, one in 1974, one in 1975 and one in 1976. It can all be approved by the department. All of a sudden, the person who wants to sell comes to my office to his member of parliament and says that the bureaucracy wants to reassess him because they do not agree with clause 21, even though that person has had approval for four years. I want to make a very serious suggestion either with regard to this clause or the next. We need a group of men and women in the department who will meet with the ordinary taxpayer and say to him, "If you have done A, B and C, that will be it and it will not change in three or four years."

The ordinary taxpayer does not have the accountants of the CPR, Canada Permanent or the Royal Bank. He has to rely on himself or possibly one accountant. What we need in the department is a small group to sit down with the taxpayers and tell them, "If you make this move, this will be your tax position, this is the amount of tax you will pay and it will not be changed in three or four years because of someone reinterpreting the act."

I have had a lot of experience with the department in Calgary. I have worked with top accountants in reference to these matters. There is the finest group of men and women in the public service. Unfortunately, many times a problem affects many taxpayers. Therefore it cannot be settled in Calgary, or even in Regina, or Winnipeg. It must be done in the east. Instructions come from the east because if a precedent is established with regard to one taxpayer, it could change the whole tax picture and, of course, the flow of revenue.

I will be open with the minister. I think he has looked at the picture in a tougher and more realistic way than his predecessor. He has been, in the circumstances, with inflation and unemployment, a pretty able and reasonable Minister of Finance.

● (2100)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: You are preaching for a call. Next week you will be supporting John Turner.

Mr. Woolliams: That's fine. You can yell or shout. You can do that from the stomach or from other parts of your anatomy but not your mouth, if you have a brain. What I would like to say is this: please get together a group from every part of the Department of National Revenue, whether it is Calgary, Vancouver, or right across the board, and have a group the average taxpayer can go to and say, "If I make this move will it be accepted today or four years from today?" That will win the NDP a few votes which have faded ever since I have been here. That is a recommendation which I make tonight—and I know something about tax law. I have listened to members of the NDP—

Mr. Rodriguez: You were not here!

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I was here. I have listened to you people. I will back my attendance against you, you little—you know what I mean—any time. But take these three recommendations I have made. It doesn't matter what is put into the act, because if it is interpreted in a certain way by the department the taxpayer doesn't stand a chance.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I ask the minister to take a look at what the capital gains tax is doing to the little person. Let us have some way of assessing the effect of the capital gains tax without needing to consult a lawyer, an accountant, and an appraiser. Arrange things in such a way that if a taxpayer has a problem he can go to the department and get a decision made, a decision which will not be reversed in four years time, upsetting his whole economic applecart. That is what I am asking, and these are the problems the taxpayer is worried about more than the nonsense I have listened to today. Those people—and I will say this about the NDP—want to take all the money away from anybody who makes more than $10,000, except themselves.

An hon. Member: We don't!

Mr. Woolliams: Oh yes, parliamentarians do. It is the best job you will ever have, young man.

Mr. Rodriguez: You devil!

Mr. Woolliams: I am a devil because I am telling you the truth. The devil has to tell the truth sometimes.

Mr. Rodriguez: I got elected.

Mr. Woolliams: I know. That was an accident and it will never happen again. Those people over there preach these things. They want to take all the money from all the little people, from business, from the corporations so that there is no investment, and when people are out of work they will say to the taxpayers I have mentioned, "Aren't you terrible? You have caused unemployment." But that party's economic principles are such as to ensure built-in unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, first of all, I want to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. He made what was certainly the most sensible speech we have heard this evening. It is indeed good to hear a man who doesn't hesitate to express his mind.

I do not have a long contribution to make to this debate because I was not aware what it was about until I heard the speech made by my hon. friend from Calgary North. But since this seems to be a wide-ranging debate and since it does not seem altogether necessary to keep to the point, I should like to put one or two questions to the minister.

My hon. friend was most eloquent when he spoke about the need for the bureaucrats and the rest to look after the small taxpayer. I have a question about a large taxpayer. I think the way in which his case is being treated is a public disgrace and I want to know when it will be proceeded with and when justice will be done. I refer to the case of John C. Doyle, the owner of Canadian Javelin Limited and the man who controls it or who owns 18.2 per cent of the shares.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, if we had the TV cameras here tonight there would be no fear of the NDP ever getting into power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Their strong point is pretending that only they have decent perceptions—that they are the only decent people in Canada, the only ones who care. We are sick and tired of their hypocrisy. They pretend, the NDP, the party of newly decent perceptions, that they and they only have the welfare of the public at heart. That is the line they hand out all across Canada. Well, it doesn't fool me. There is not a member of the NDP who has the public interest more at heart than I do, and their blatherskiting about how they are for the small man, the little man, is enough to make anyone throw up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We have had to sit here listening to their blather hour after hour, and now they will have to sit and listen to ours.

The point I am making has nothing to do with the small taxpayer. It has to do with a large taxpayer, a fugitive from justice, the man who has had control over Canadian Javelin Limited for the last 20 years and who has taken money from that company in every way, shape and form, and who has diddled the shareholders of that company year after year, and the law is apparently powerless to do anything about it.

There are 18,000 unregistered and some 12,000 registered shareholders of Canadian Javelin Limited. The company's shares are no longer listed in most of the registries and do not trade. The gentleman in question now resides in Costa Rica and Panama, because if he comes to Canada he faces 406 charges under certain sections of the Criminal Code, and two for criminal fraud in Newfoundland. But he still has control of the company. And he still owes the Canadian government in excess of $4 million under a judgment delivered in the Exchequer Court five years ago by Mr. Justice Hugh Gibson. That judgment was appealed by Mr. Doyle. Five years later, Mr. Chairman, the appeal has still not been heard and the amount is still outstanding.

I would like the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue to tell me what is being done about the large taxpayer—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: —and why this matter has not been brought before the appeal court long hence. Will it, in fact, be brought before the appeal court?

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: What do you mean, "Order"? There has been no order in these matters. I should like the minister to tell us what has happened in this case.

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: If somebody has a point of order to raise, I am willing to sit down and listen. This is not order, it is disorder when a situation of this kind confronts us in the courts and nothing is being done about it. I want that matter attended to and I shall be asking other questions about it.

While we are considering the Income Tax Act I should like the minister to get me some information as to the effect on provincial revenue of his arbitrary and unilateral amendment to the act several years ago when he indexed income taxes.

The minister opposite in the government of Canada collects income tax not only for the government of Canada. He also collects the federal corporation tax for at least eight provinces, perhaps nine. He also collects the provincial corporation tax. In his budget of two years ago, I think it was—I do not have all my notes here tonight so some inexactitude might be forgiven me—he indexed income tax without consultation with the provinces, without asking the provinces what they thought about that. He brought down his budget and in his budget indexed personal income tax.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is all well and good. If the federal government can afford to index personal income tax—and heaven knows, they can do so because they have all of the tax sources in Canada, direct and indirect—then that is fine. But there are provinces which cannot afford any loss of revenue. Because it is a more efficient system and it suits the Government of Canada better to have certain provincial taxes collected by the federal government, the federal government collects personal income tax and corporation tax for seven or eight provinces. To do so these taxes must be uniform in their application or the minister cannot very well collect taxes for the provinces.

The hon. gentleman therefore made a change which applied not only to federal personal income tax but to provincial tax as well. I should like to know, as a result of this arbitrary action taken without consultation, what it costs the various provinces of Canada to have the income tax collected. I understand that it is costing the provincial government of Newfoundland this year some $30 million when you take into consideration not just the tax collected directly but its effect on tax equalization. The province of Newfoundland alone has lost $30 million of its revenue. This is money that the Minister of Finance took away from the province without so much as a by your leave, and without ever offering to replace the revenue he took away from those provinces whose income tax he collected.

That is one reason—there are many others—why we have the present state of federal-provincial relations in Canada today. It is the reason why the provinces are calling out for more decentralization and for a change in the distribution of powers. It is not the constitution which is all that much out but the way that it is administered. Nothing is more irritating and aggravating to provincial governments than to have the federal government make a change like this without even consulting them and agreeing to compensate them for such a change, so I would be interested to see those figures if the hon. gentleman would get them. He may not be able to get the figures showing what the loss of tax equalization might be, but if he can tell me what it costs the various provinces, including the province of Newfoundland, by way of lost tax revenue from the change that he made, I would appreciate it.

I believe these are the only two points that I want to put forward tonight, unless some hon. gentleman down in the corner says something that might irritate or aggravate me, in which case I will be on my feet again. We are not worrying about the NDP up here in this corner because we know they are nothing to worry about. They are a necessary irritant, like a burr under the saddle. It does us some good to have them around, because when there are a few of them around you realize what you would suffer if they ever formed the government. As I have said, and NPD government would comprise a cabinet of about 30 incipient Otto Langs; at least that is the way I look at it. They know what is good for us, and by golly we do what is good for us or they would know the reason why. It would be user-pay multiplied about 100,000 times if those gentlemen ever got into power.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think hon. members would want me to irritate the hon. member for St. John's West just a little bit to have him keep going. I have known him in some different capacities over the years and I never cease to find him an entertaining man when he is on his feet.

With regard to his two points concerning Mr. Doyle, very happily the Minister of Finance does not have custody of tax administration; my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has that. Indeed, if the matter has gone to litigation and is before, I guess, the Federal Court of Appeal at this point, it would be a responsibility shared with my colleague, the Minister of Justice. I cannot, therefore, answer this evening the status of that particular suit, but I would be quite prepared to make inquiries and if this is not a matter of confidence on behalf of the taxpayer—and if it has come to the point of litigation—then I would be glad to let him know.

On the question of indexing, it is quite true that both federal and provincial revenues have been affected by the decision of this government several years ago to introduce indexing of personal income tax. We calculate that as of January 1, 1977, with the indexing which occurred then, on an annual basis for 1977 about $1,250 million of federal and provincial income tax will be left in the hands of individual taxpayers which, but for the indexing, would have been collected under our taxation system.

Mr. Woolliams: That was Stanfield's policy.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member for Calgary North points out, that was the policy of the member of parliament for Halifax. Indeed, we have been castigated over the years by the hon. gentleman's colleagues for having adopted that particular policy. As I say, Mr. Chairman, he is always a refreshing speaker, but not the least when he is doing things, as Frank Sinatra would say, his way, rather than the way of his party generally.

It is true that revenue has passed out of the government's hands and back to the taxpayer. If you talk about decentralization, that is almost the best kind of decentralization to have if you can possibly have it—leave the money in the hands of the people and not take it away by tax.

If the provincial governments, like the federal government, needed additional revenue they are not powerless in this regard; they could have changed the rate and recovered it. But the fact of the matter is that, despite all the protestations at federal-provincial meetings, there has been pretty general acceptance of that and of the decision that was made.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, during the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for St. John's West, I felt very strongly that I really had to rise on point of order after point of order, but I restrained myself knowing that the Chair would at some point recognize me. I think it is important, particularly to the hon. member for St. John's West who seems to be very concerned about whether we in the NDP think he is decent, that he should know that I have spoken to every single one of my colleagues here and we all agree that he is decent. We all agree that all the Conservatives are decent. As a matter of fact, we never listen to what the Liberals say to us about the Conservatives. So we say he is decent and he is not to worry about it. We think you are all decent fellows.

We have been speaking for quite a long time on this clause in the bill, and I have to tell you frankly, Mr. Chairman, that we were getting to the point where we were having a little difficulty. After all, our voices were starting to give out, and so we appreciate the kind of assistance that we have been getting. We have been sitting here day after day arguing this bill, trying to get the Conservatives to state a position. While I do not like closure and we have all spoken against closure, the fact that closure has been brought in has seemed to prompt some members to rise and speak.

I want to say a couple of other things, particularly to the hon. member for Calgary North. I want him to know that I am not against rich people—some of my best friends are rich people. We are for everybody. I do not talk about it too often in public but I must admit that we do not have anything against rich people; the only thing we are concerned about is that the rich people do not get any richer than they are—that is all. I also want to say that it was not very nice of the hon. member to have made the remarks he made about the election of my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, having been an accident.

Mr. Woolliams: He said himself he got lucky.

Mr. Saltsman: The first time he was elected it might have been an accident—these things can happen to anybody—but the second time it was wilful mischief on the part of the people of Nickel Belt. They elected him deliberately and they sent him here so that you could take the measure of this man. You must admit that you know he is around. Whether you may agree or disagree with some of the remarks that my friend may sometimes bring to the attention of the House, I am sure nobody would say that he hides his light under a bushel. He makes sure that the brilliant light that emanates from him is distributed evenly toward everyone.

I think there is something else that should be said. In putting forward the arguments we have on behalf of people in Canada who are not quite as rich as other people, we may not have been as successful as we had hoped in moving the hard heart of the Minister of Finance. After all, one of the qualifications for being Minister of Finance, even if you have a nice, soft heart, the way the minister used to have before he became Minister of Finance, is to be like that. Once you become Minister of Finance, there is a kind of needle that they have in that department which they jab into you which hardens the arteries, the heart, and occasionally the head. But I am grateful for one thing.

Perhaps we have not moved the Minister of Finance, but as people who believe in making love, not war, we are just delighted to see the Liberals and the Conservatives falling in love with each other all over again. It is really very touching to see this kind of affection taking place. During the day we hear them calling each other names, but we know it is a lovers' spat, we know it is not for real. They are calling the other side all kinds of terrible things. They are saying the Liberals are guilty of all kinds of scandals and that they are depriving people of civil liberties, but this is just like a family. You know deep down that when it is something important such as taxes which affect the rich man's pocket book, they are in love again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: These are lovers' spats; they are for the neighbours.

Mr. Paproski: You should know, Maxi.

Mr. Saltsman: The hon. member for Calgary North said that this is the best job we will ever have in our lives. He may be right. I bet some of us have had pretty rotten jobs in our lives. I do not know what jobs he has had in his life, but most of our guys have had pretty rotten jobs, just like the people in Canada have. That silver spoon was not placed in our mouths at birth. There may be better jobs than this, and I am sure there are worse jobs. I do not crab about the job. The food is not bad and the pay is not bad but, as my mother-in-law says, it is not a very steady job.

Mr. Woolliams: You yourselves voted against an increase in pay. That has always amazed me.

Mr. Saltsman: You amaze very easily.

My friend, the hon. member for Calgary North, spoke about the accident of the election of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. I can assure him that it is not as easy even for New Democrats to be elected in Ontario as it is for a Tory to be elected in Alberta. You do not even have to show up to be elected in Alberta.

Mr. Paproski: You try it, Maxi.

Mr. Saltsman: If I were a Tory I would be a shoo-in in Alberta, but not being a Tory—

Mr. Woolliams: I would not want the hon. member to be historically wrong. When I first ran, there was one member from Alberta who was a Conservative—the rest were all wise men; they were the Social Crediters. I must tell you that I was the first member ever to be elected from Bow River. I would also remind the hon. member—and the former premier of Saskatchewan would know that—that I left home with a grade eight education and took all my high school grades by correspondence. If that is a silver spoon, I can tell him I do not understand silver, but I did find out one thing, that once they had a CCF government in Saskatchewan, they found out what silver was like.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member get back to the debate on clause 21 of the bill.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Now we can head back to a somewhat more serious discussion.

An hon. Member: How did you like that commercial?

An hon. Member: I wish we had television in the House.

Mr. Saltsman: I am glad to learn that the hon. member for Calgary North was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth—it might have been a brass spoon, but not a silver one. Nevertheless, I want to say one thing to him. The remarks we are making are not of a personal nature. We know he is a fine, upstanding Conservative. As to how the Conservatives replaced the Social Crediters, the thing happened so that almost nobody noticed. They went out, changed their hats, and came back and said, "Yesterday I was a Social Crediter and today I am a Conservative".

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair would once again remind the hon. member that we are on clause 21 of the bill. I would appreciate it if he would revert to speaking on that clause.

Mr. Saltsman: You will have to excuse me, Mr. Chairman. I know you are a very tolerant and distinguished gentleman and certainly one of my colleagues in the House, but let me point out that we in this party have been trying to maintain the rule of relevancy until we got the lecture on relevancy from my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North. If I recall correctly, he accused us of going all over the subject matter of income tax since we were on the clause dealing with child care, and after lecturing us in the NDP about the rule of relevancy, he then proceeded to talk about the appeals court, capital gains, the family farm, the general administration of the Income Tax Act, and the Federal Court. So I am afraid that the rule of relevancy has been stretched tonight, and I regret it because I think it is important to stick to the point.

It is to the point to see the way this debate is developing. It is very funny to take off on each other, although it is a shame in a way, but I think one thing is quite clear, that is, where the Conservatives and Liberals stand. We do not accuse people in other parties of not being decent, of not being honourable, of not caring, but they have a different perspective, a different view. Their idea of what the little man or the common man is, is a lot different from our concept of him.

Mr. Woolliams: The little man knows this too.

Mr. Saltsman: When we come to the House of Commons and are asked to bleed for John Doyle in talking about the little man, we say that John Doyle may be worthy of that, but he is certainly not a little man. This is the kind of confusion which always exists in these debates.

I am glad that this intervention, as goofy as it may have been, has taken place because people have taken part in the debate. There is a kind of anger that erupts. What are they worried about? There are 16 of us sitting here. You would think we were the government of this country. In some ways we are the government of this country. Certainly when it comes to standing up for ideas, and to standing up for people for whom nobody else will stand up, we are the government of this country and in that sense we represent that constituency. I take pride in the fact that we are attacked from that side and from the other side. As a matter of fact, sometimes you do not know how well you are doing from what your friends are telling you, but you certainly know you are doing well when you take a look at your political enemies.

● (2130)

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Chairman, for some days now I have been hoping against hope that the members of the NDP would have the common sense to realize that they have long since run out of arguments with reference to clause 21 and that they have wasted the time of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: They openly declare that they are the favourite sons of John Q. Public and the upholders of liberty, righteousness, and justice. They say they are for the little man and for the poor, downtrodden masses. They say that they can tell a Liberal or a Conservative by looking at him. Well, I want the House to know that I can tell members of the NDP by looking at them because they have three qualities. Most of them have that whining voice of complaint, and all of them have hemorrhoids to give them that look of concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: And the hon. member has diarrhea of the mouth.

Mr. Brisco: I question the veracity and the integrity of a group which would delay the passage of this bill and which says it is the upholder of John Q. Public and the downtrodden masses, and yet its members are not prepared to address themselves to the problems dealt with in this bill dealing with the blind, the chronically ill, or to the problems regarding farms transferred from fathers to sons. None of these issues which are important to John Q. Public has been mentioned by the members of the NDP. They are stuck on clause 21, and they do not give a damn about invalids in wheelchairs for the rest of their lives, or about people who are chronically blind. If they did, they would find those parts of the bill and deal with them. I think their conduct is reprehensible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Parliament lives.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, it is because we are very concerned about the low income earners of this country that we are concerned about the way the income tax structure is designed. It does not ensure that there is a redistribution of wealth in this country.

We certainly have no quarrel with the proposal in clause 21. All we are saying is that the income tax structure of this country should be examined.

Mr. Woolliams: You are enlarging your lectern.

Mr. Rodriguez: We know where the hon. member for Calgary North stands. He stands foursquare with his buddies across the way. I am never more conscious of the club atmosphere in this House—

Mr. Woolliams: What about the adultery between Lewis and Trudeau? Have you ever thought about that?

Mr. Rodriguez: —than when we get talking about changes in the income tax structure. This party tries to hold the government liable for the promises it made with respect to changing the income tax structure and making it more equitable with regard to redistributing the wealth of the country. Can the minister tell me why one man in this country can earn $375,000 because he is the president of a corporation, and another man who works in a car wash—

Mr. Epp: What about your union bosses?

Mr. Rodriguez: —in Toronto can make $8,600 a year? What is there in this system which allows one man to earn so much more every year?

Mr. Neil: Should they all be paid the same amount?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question which I am sure the hon. member will understand. Why is it that some union members make $100,000, some make $50,000, and some make $8,000? What determines that discrimination?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: At least we know that the union members bargain for that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: That is the free enterprise system.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the free enterprise system. That is the system in which inequities like that exist. I would like to know what the yardstick is for that. If we have these income disparities, surely it is the job of the government, through the income tax structure, to take from that person who is getting so much out of the economy and to redistribute it to those who are at the bottom end. Surely such things as registered retirement savings plans, which allow a man to borrow money and write off the interest on his income tax, and then turn around and write off the amount he has put into the retirement savings plan, should not be superimposed on our tax structure. Surely it does not help the income tax structure and the redistribution of wealth to let a person claim $1,000 more for his wife per year and $1,000 for himself, and then to allow them to split it up when they come to the age of 71.

Is the minister telling us that plans like the registered retirement savings plan are supposed to gouge the income tax system? I thought it was supposed to be used to save for retirement years. All the advertisements of banks, finance companies and insurance companies are saying: "Come in, and we will show you how to get around the income tax structure". Is that what the system is all about?

Mr. Woolliams: That is what Canada is all about.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not about that. Surely Canada is not about making the rich richer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has difficulty hearing the hon. member for Nickel Belt. He was recognized a while ago. Would hon. members please grant him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am sure the hon. member for Calgary North will agree that Canada is not a cow for certain elements to milk for their benefit.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. At one time in my life I milked cows. I used to milk them, but I have never before listened to a stripper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Calgary North may have milked cows, but now he milks the people of Canada. Canada is not a cow which a few milk for condensed milk, and the rest get skim milk.

Mr. Neil: You have never been on a farm, that's for sure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Surely that is not what Canada was designed for.

Mr. Woolliams: What about clause 21?

Mr. Rodriguez: When we come to clause 21, we find that it is superimposed on a structure which has all the distortions which we have tried to stress. It is very poignant to note that the Tories were prepared to pack this in a long time ago and get into bed with their buddies across the way with that in mind. It seems to me we have used this time fruitfully in an effort to bring up relevant questions about the way the income tax structure has been developed in this country.

• (2140)

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 22 agreed to on division.

Clause 23 agreed to.

On clause 24.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, this clause, I understand, will eliminate the principal business test for a 100 per cent write-off of Canadian exploration expenses for taxation purposes. I understand that previously someone in business could write off 100 per cent while investors whose principal business was not natural resource oriented could only write off about 30 per cent. As well, government incentives such as drilling incentives or provincial aids to encourage increased exploration, are not required to be handed out with the exploration expenses before calculating exploration development deductions.

I should like to try to put this clause into the context of what has been happening in the resource industry in order to try to assess whether the amendment before us will have the desired effect of spurring exploration for oil and energy. I therefore look at the largest oil company in Canada and its record of exploration, and I have some serious reservations about the effect of the clause.

Through advertisements on television we find that Canada's largest oil company, Imperial Oil, needs more revenue to explore for new oil. According to the oil industry we are rapidly running short of this precious resource. But is that really true? Does the oil industry need more incentives through the tax system to encourage it to explore? I should like to look at the history of Imperial to argue just the opposite.

In 1972, the last year before the international oil price increase, and in 1975, we find the production levels of this company were virtually identical. There was a dramatic change in the earnings of the company between 1972 and 1975 and we should try to find out how this affected exploration. In 1975 their revenue was $4,047 million, an increase of 98 per cent over the 1972 revenue of $2,104 million. In 1975, the profit after taxes was $250 million, an increase of 65.6 per cent over 1972. A very important category if we are talking about exploration budgets is the cash flow which was $464 million in 1975, an increase of 53.6 per cent over 1972.

What happened to the company's oil exploration budget when it earned this record income in 1975? Remember, Imperial has been advertising about the big, tough, expensive job of exploring for oil, and telling how it needs more revenue and less taxes if new energy sources are to be found. What was the exploration expenditures in 1975 after these record earnings? It was $74 million, the exact same amount as it spent in 1972. It has been making the argument on television and in other media that it needs more money through price increases to the consumer for oil and gas. That does not hold water—should I say oil?

Mr. Gilbert: Gas.

Mr. Symes: In the light of the record of earnings of this company and its exploration budget, what has it been doing with the profits? Certainly it has not been putting them into exploring for new oil. It has been diverting money into the Syncrude project in Alberta because of the tax incentives built in through special legislation passed in this House a few years ago. That legislation exempts Imperial from federal corporation tax on its provincial royalty payments, and under the system the company can write off $4 for every $3 invested in Syncrude.

In light of that kind of record of financing of exploration, and in light of the other tax incentives in existing legislation which urge Imperial to divert funds from exploration into projects like Syncrude, I wonder what this amendment will do to enhance exploration in this country. It is an attempt to get further funds from other investors put into energy exploration, but when the companies themselves have other priorities that the income tax system seems to dictate to them, I do not think this clause will have the desired effect.

In light of past experience what guarantee is there that this tax amendment will promote energy exploration? I think Canadians will seriously ask this question. Companies claim they do not have enough incentive to explore from the recent increases in the price of the wellhead barrel of oil but companies again have produced record profits for 1976. If we break down the wellhead price of a barrel of crude oil as of January 1, 1977, $9.75, we find that the cost of producing that barrel of crude oil is 68 cents; provincial royalties in Alberta, for example, account for $3.90; federal income tax, $1.54, but the profit on that barrel of oil is $3.63, or 40 per cent of the total price. I submit that there are enough existing revenues to promote exploration for oil for the benefit of Canadian consumers.

The multinational oil companies which control 90 per cent of this country's oil industry at the moment are not serious about developing new energy reserves. They are playing the scarcity game, predicting shortages so that consumers and the government will be panicked into accepting ever higher prices. One should consider the situation in the United States today. There natural gas is in short supply, mainly because of a poorly designed distribution system, and because, as some think, there has been collusion on the part of energy companies to keep energy supplies at low levels. This has been done because the companies want to press for changes to oil and gas legislation now before the Congress of the United States.

One must ask, considering recent events in Canada, can the oil and gas companies be trusted? Only a few years ago they were predicting that we had enough oil available to last us for many decades. Of course it was in their interest to say that because they wanted to export 50 per cent of Canada's oil production. When the world price of oil went up and the Canadian price remained comparatively low, it was to the advantage of oil companies to change their song, to change their predictions. Suddenly we learned that estimates of reserves had been revised downward. The many billions of barrels of oil which we were previously told we possessed suddenly disappeared, and the oil companies said that unless they could charge the world price for oil in Canada they would not be able to explore for new oil reserves.

I have tried to show what has happened in the case of Canada's largest oil company, Imperial Oil. Although that company has made record profits and enjoyed a tremendous increase in cash flow, it has not carried out exploration, exploration which would reassure Canadians that more oil will be available. I therefore submit that clause 24 of Bill C-22 will probably be ineffective in the long run, and that the government in the past was manipulated by the oil industry. Having examined clause 24, it appears to me that once more the government is bowing to demands of the industry and has designed tax legislation which will unduly benefit the oil industry.

For those reasons I submit that we ought to look carefully at clause 24 and ask the minister and his officials to tell us what the effects of this clause will be. If the minister could guarantee that if we were to pass the bill, including clause 24, we should see an increased exploration for oil, and that we shall establish an ongoing monitoring agency to ensure that exploration will take place, I might be persuaded that clause 24 is of value. But, Mr. Chairman, when I consider the record of the oil industry, I have some reservations. I think of the Syncrude deal the minister was blackmailed into signing that fateful day in Winnipeg when he was accompanied by the then president of the treasury board and the Minister of Supply and Services. I just shudder at the thought that the present Minister of Finance, who was then the minister of energy, mines and resources, has proposed legislation of this sort.

Canadians have given far too great a tax advantage to multinational oil companies. The government is providing further tax incentives, and not only to energy companies which have enjoyed the advantage of a 100 per cent write-off. Any business, energy-related or not, will now be able to qualify for this 100 per cent write-off.

Mr. Rodriguez: No wonder the Tories like the Liberals.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, that makes one wonder about the government's priorities. Members of my party have examined various other clauses of this bill which are designed to give a greater dollar advantage in terms of income tax to upper income Canadians. It is obvious that clause 24 is designed to fit into that pattern as well.

Our income tax system is supposedly progressive. The percentage of income payable as tax ranges from a low level for low income earners to a somewhat higher level for high income Canadians. However, as I said this afternoon, and as other colleagues said this evening, the concept of progressivity based on ability to pay is subverted by the kinds of deductions for which the bill provides, because the percentage of income payable in tax at upper income levels is reduced.

I doubt if the exploration expense write-off provided in clause 24 will have the desired effect. I say this, bearing the history of the oil industry in mind, and because this tax law has been designed in the context of unfairness and inequity.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION—POSSIBILITY OF EXISTENCE OF GUIDELINES GOVERNING ACCEPTANCE BY DEPARTMENTS OF FREE ADVERTISING

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my intervention this evening arises as a result of the question I raised on December 15, 1976, with respect to a matter which had originally been addressed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) to the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, I may add, was subsequently elevated to the great office of Whip on the government side.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain had asked the Postmaster General if the Post Office had accepted a freebee from Time magazine, a freebee with respect to Post Office advertising in that particular publication. When answering, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he did not understand my question, that he did not know what a freebee was. I found this difficult to understand because in a number of instances during the past few years the term "freebee" has been used in the course of debate in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister, much to my amazement, was not able to understand in a very simple question asked of him during the course of the question period what a freebee was in terms of political activity. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) appears to be very agitated and excited when I mention these things. I simply want to say that it is a term that is not in the Oxford dictionary, but indeed is in the dictionary of the cathetral of here and now in which we address ourselves in the House of Commons.

I say to the parliamentary secretary, who apparently is here tonight to answer this question, that a freebee can be defined on a number of occasions by actual performance of members of the Treasury Bench. Freebe is a very understandable term. Quite frankly, it involves a situation where the government and members of the government accept, without payment, a kind of reward that might in fact influence the activities or decisions of government. I do not suggest for a moment that is the case. However, we who are involved in the governmental process should be very concerned that we do not do anything that might in fact be interpreted by the public as being something that might influence governmental decisions.

When we talk about freebees, we may be concerning ourselves with the perception that people have of what government is doing and what government might in fact be inclined to do in the area of discretionary decision.

My question to the Prime Minister at the time simply asked whether there was anything in the government guidelines that might determine not only whether it would be appropriate but proper from the point of view of acceptance on the part of government of free advertising in the communications and publications industry. The time that I raised my question was after a question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain with regard to an answer by the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) to the effect that the Post Office had accepted a freebee or overt gesture by Time magazine to try to improve the service of the Post Office by means of an advertisement placed in that magazine.

Although the question of influence peddling may not be legally provable in this case, certainly the practice of accepting free advertising from companies whose activities are directly affected by government legislation, such as in the case of Time magazine, is questionable. It suggests a serious lack of judgment on the part of the department and the government. It also bears a direct relationship to the use by ministers and members of parliament of aircraft owned and offered by private companies or foreign countries.

I mentioned at that time, when the Prime Minister evinced some surprise at the term freebees, a few examples he might consider, for instance, the use of private jets belonging to liquor companies, the use of jets belonging to a particular lobby group, the Canadian Bankers' Association, by the minister of consumer affairs at a time when the question of consumers affairs legislation was before the House. That association is involved in making representations to the government regarding amendments to the Bank Act, and other important legislation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply want to end by asking the parliamentary secretary to tell me whether there are any guidelines, and whether he can explain to the House whether the Prime Minister has now discovered what "freebees" are.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member exceeded his time because he became involved in an explanation of freebees. I shall not attempt to follow his dissertation as to the description of freebees, but he was quite correct in saying that the question was first raised in the House by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane). I should like to draw his attention to the answer as reported in Hansard for December 10, 1976, at page 1868. The hon. member did refer to it, but I should like him to review that question together with the reply from the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais).

I cannot accept the suggestion by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that this subject was dealt with by the Postmaster General in a facile manner. In fact he stated that the Post Office had not requested Time magazine to insert the advertisement in question, and that the Post Office was not charged for it; the advertisement was a gesture by the magazine, and he, the Postmaster General, considered that overt gestures of this nature were acceptable and consistent with efforts to improve services in the Post Office.

I understand—and this will answer one of the hon. member's questions—that the government has not issued guidelines regulating the acceptance of free advertising, nor is it evident that there would be a need for such a policy. However, if a need is demonstrated, further consideration would be given to the matter, and I am sure the remarks of the hon. member will be looked at carefully in that connection.

GRAIN—USE OF ELEVATOR SPACE FOR DURUM OR RED SPRING WHEAT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on December 13, 1976, as reported at page 1919 of Hansard, I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the following question:

> In view of the storage space available in Canadian government elevators in western Canada, for example, some four to five million bushels in Moose Jaw, and in view of the fact that utilization of this space for Durum or Red Spring wheat would inject some needed funds into the western economy, would the minister undertake to instruct the Wheat Board to take immediate steps to utilize this space to the advantage of the producers and businessmen in the communities?

To which the minister replied:

> No, Mr. Speaker. I would not give that instruction to the Wheat Board. The Wheat Board is fully aware of the existence of that space and also of the extra cost involved in using it and the advantage of using it. I am sure they weigh these factors and come to conclusions which are in the best interests of farmers.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), to whom I put a supplementary question, had this to say:

> I am sure the hon. member knows that these elevators cannot be used to the extent we would like them to be used unless the Canadian Wheat Board instructs that the grain be delivered there. Full utilization has to be with the full co-operation of the Wheat Board and the trade in general.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

In western Canada there are five government elevators. They are located at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and Lethbridge. These elevators have a total capacity of some 17,100,000 bushels. According to Grain Statistics Weekly, which is a weekly publication of the Canada Grain Commission, for the week ending January 19, 1977, there are presently some 6,634,000 bushels of grain in storage in those government elevators. If you deduct that figure from the 17,100,000 bushel capacity, there is storage space for roughly 10,500,000 bushels in these five elevators. Of that 10,500,000 bushels of available storage space, approximately one half, or 5,300,000 bushels, is available in the terminal elevator at Moose Jaw.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no quota, for example, on Durum except for those chosen few who were fortunate enough to receive a special quota for the two types of Durum, Macoun and Wakooma. I am concerned as to why the Wheat Board cannot set up a special permit to allow the other people who have Durum in storage to deliver and utilize those 10,500,000 bushels of available space in these elevators, or, on the other hand, to use the space to store Red Spring wheat and thus put additional money into the hands of the producer and into the economy of western Canada.

There has been a suggestion that it is too costly to utilize these government elevators, but it seems to me that it is costly to allow these elevators to lie idle or at least not to use them to maximum capacity. It is also costly to have boats sitting in Vancouver harbour for several weeks on end waiting for grain to be loaded. Over the year end, I understand there were some seven to eight boats in the harbour at Vancouver, and while I was unable to get the figures for demurrage, a Canadian Press report indicated that a Chinese boat in the harbour was costing the western farmer some $10,000 a day in demurrage. If my math is correct, that $10,000 would pay for the storage of one million bushels of grain for one month in one of these government elevators.

The Moose Jaw terminal has a capacity of 5,500,000 bushels and has a throughput of anywhere from 25 million to 30 million bushels a year. Yet according to the annual report of the Canada Grain Commission for 1975-75, there were only 34 million bushels put through the five government elevators in western Canada, and the historical average is only 20 million bushels.

The Moose Jaw elevator can dry, clean and place the grain to export standards, and it can load a hopper train of 100 cars a day. Those 100 cars will carry 330,000 bushels of grain—approximately a third of a million bushels, and the average ship carries a million bushels. So in three days the elevator at Moose Jaw—that is one of five—could send out sufficient grain to fill one boat and the railway can carry that from Edmonton, Moose Jaw, or Calgary to the west coast in two days, so there would be no need to have these vessels sitting in the harbour at Vancouver where we are paying demurrage. If anyone cares to look at Hansard of January 24 at page 2284, in response to written question No. 687 by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), they will find that in the period of one year from October, 1975 to October, 1976, the prairie farmer paid over $4 million in demurrage charges on the west coast at Vancouver, and approximately $1 million at east coast ports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government elevators to which my friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), has referred in his question this evening follow an established policy to work closely with producers, with grain companies and, of course, with the Canadian Wheat Board to make these very important facilities in western Canada available in a manner that will maximize Canada's grain movement both for export and for domestic purposes.

In day to day operations, space is made available in each of the elevators to accommodate Canadian Wheat Board requirements as they arise. This has its greatest application particularly for high moisture grain. Other such applications relate to special accumulations and storage of specific grades of grain, especially during periods of unprecedented demand when bunching of vessels occurs in Vancouver.

As well, currently about half the space at Lethbridge is leased out to local feeders and processors, thereby fulfilling a useful purpose in this heavy feeding area.

As my friend pointed out this evening, Canadian government elevators do not buy grain themselves. That is, of course, the responsibility of the Canadian Wheat Board and the grain trade.

In deciding whether or not to utilize Canadian government elevators at any given time, the Canadian Wheat Board has to evaluate a number of factors including the cost of assembling grain in the terminals by producers using their own trucks, by custom trucking or by rail movement; as well as the over-all space available in the primary elevator system and the advantages to the rail shipment program which the Wheat Board has established at any moment in time.

Until this week no Durum quota had been established by the Canadian Wheat Board in the current crop year. However, there has been a heavy Durum movement since December through Vancouver and it is anticipated that this will continue at least until the end of March. This has allowed the Canadian Wheat Board to establish effective February 1, a Durum quota of 4.46 bushels per acre, or, as some would want to know, 300 kilograms per hectare. This will enable producers to deliver into the licensed elevator system and provide an injection of funds into the western economy.

There is currently under way a heavy shipping program for Red Spring wheat through the west coast which will continue at least until the end of May. This will be augmented by an eastern movement through Thunder Bay upon opening of Seaway navigation.

In view of this, Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board at this stage of the crop year does not see the need to utilize the government interior terminal elevators. Of course, as circumstances change later on in the year, the situation could be reviewed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have to interupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION IN VIEW OF CLOSING OF LINERBOARD MILL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on November 17 last I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) whether he had been contacted by the provincial government of Newfoundland for assistance because of the worsening situation at Labrador linerboard mill in my district at Stephenville, Newfoundland. The continuing deterioration of the mill was the result of the fact that the bulk of the resource had to be transported from Labrador, a distance of 600 miles. It must be realized that the resulting cost of producing a ton of linerboard is seriously affected by the transportation cost. Added to this handicap, the distance of the mill from the off-shore market further exacerbates the problem when the mill has to face competition from similar operations closer to the market. This doubles the problem which is difficult to overcome.

Furthermore, adding to the problem is the fact that this mill came onstream at an inopportune time when demand for the product was at a low ebb. Efforts by the sales forces to break into the market left much to be desired. Third, to inflict a further scar on the disease, the wood source near the mill is not available to the mill in enough quantity to relieve the cost of producing a ton of linerboard.

The continuing failure to overcome these problems has resulted in the provincial government of Newfoundland, which owns the mill, having to subsidize the operation at an annual expenditure of some $25 million to protect, in its own interest, and the many hundreds of jobs directly and indirectly related.

It has now reached the point where new management has been brought in, and an advisory board with economic expertise has been appointed to determine the future viability of the operation, subject to the consideration of various options, and it is my opinion that with federal government assistance the mill and its operation can be rehabilitated, to the benefit of a depressed community suffering from the continuing downturn of economic events.

Having reviewed the problem with the assistance of officials in the federal departments concerned, and after making my own assessment, I came to some conclusions, and they are best expressed in a letter I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). He indicated his concern through his own portfolio and when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce. In my letter of November 8, 1976, I expressed the problems as I saw them and as they relate to the mill, and other factors, and I recommended the following:

1) That the federal government initiate a co-ordinated effort with the provincial government under and including the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Manpower, along with probably CIDA and the Export Development Corporation directed towards the following objectives:

a) to review studies carried out on the operation of the mill;

b) to examine ways and means of rationalizing the cost of the resource in line with availability;

c) to examine the possibility and the need for support funding to streamline the operation in order to compete with offshore capacity;

d) to determine the need for assistance in shipping cost to and from the mill as a result of distance from the resource as well as the distance from offshore markets;

e) to consider in the determination of assistance to underdeveloped countries to whom Canada provides interest free loans to establish mills, the feasibility of promoting the purchase of linerboard on the same basis (CIDA);

f) in the continuing efforts to establish trade with other countries that the sale of linerboard be given high priority;

g) to examine the possibility of finding firms that use linerboard extensively to invest in Labrador Linerboard in order to ensure capacity where those firms would provide a steady market, or alternatively to consider through Export Development Corporation, the possibility of investing in firms that use an abundance of linerboard to ensure sales, or to invest in the mill itself;

h) to consult with all firms producing linerboard, that may have plans for expansion in line with expanding markets to invest or purchase the Labrador Linerboard Mill;

i) that Manpower extend efforts to examine the results of high unemployment that is occurring and to examine and implement re-training and other programs, to prepare for the impending need for mobility transfers and alternative job opportunities;

j) that the facilities at the Harmon Base be examined to recognize the possibility of considering that base in the government's decentralization objectives, e.g. Taxation Data Centre, Canadian Coast Guard (Search and Rescue) fisheries, etc.;

k) to investigate the physical inventory of valuable property left as a result of the phase out of the American SEAC Base and to determine its use as a result of decentralization planning.

In recent days I have discussed with the mill management the present status of the mill, and I have confirmed that immediate co-operative action by all concerned is necessary. I am convinced that with the evident upturn in the whole pulp and paper industry, the operation can succeed. I am confident that the present management is capable of revitalizing the mill. It has a new dedication and determination, not just with regard to the mill itself but with regard to saving the economy of an important sector of the province.

I can only appeal to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make a determined effort to co-ordinate federal support with his colleagues concerned to form a team and to meet with mill management and Newfoundland provincial officials with a realistic and positive approach to ensure the success of the operation, and with a flexible approach to ensure the protection of an economic base for one sector of our nation.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to expand on the response which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) gave on November 17, 1976, to the question from the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) concerning Labrador Linerboard Limited.

DREE is aware of the difficulties which the provincial government is facing in respect of that provincial Crown corporation. However, the minister has not been approached by the province in respect of the recently reported closure of the linerboard mill at Stephenville.

The provincial government recently announced the establishment of a study committee and a reorganization of the corporation's management with the objective of examining and recommending an alternative course of action.

As the hon. member should be well aware, our department is primarily concerned with effecting improvements to the basic economic structures of areas such as the Atlantic region and identifying and pursuing development opportunities of a long range nature. There are other mechanisms designed to alleviate the economic and social hardships which arise from the short term unemployment resulting from difficulties experienced by a particular company. I must say that it is my understanding that the Labrador Linerboard Mill at Stephenville was closed recently for an indefinite period, due to high production and raw material costs, as well as poor world market conditions for linerboard. I have also seen reports that mills producing linerboard in western Canada have closed recently for the same reason.

DREE has played an active role jointly with the provincial government in Newfoundland in attempting to develop the province's forest industry. In April, 1974, we signed the Forestry Subsidiary Agreement with the objective of expanding and diversifying the forest industry in Newfoundland and Labrador through a series of projects on forest management, access road construction, harvesting and utilization, and other forest improvements. That agreement initially provided for an expenditure of $34 million on such activities. It was amended in January of 1975 to provide an additional $17.7 million, so that federal participation in that agreement represents a financial commitment of almost $48 million. The amendment, incidentally, was intended to increase further the sustainable level of utilization of forest resources on the island of Newfoundland through the use of mechanized logging equipment, the establishment of logging camps, and the construction of an additional 400 miles of forest access roads.

The amendment to the agreement also made provision for joint initiative with the provincial department of forestry and agriculture to improve the efficiency of the wood harvesting operations of Labrador Linerboard Limited.

Needless to say, we very much sympathize with the position of the Newfoundland government which is faced with continuing deficits in the operation of the mill. However, I must emphasize that the operation of the Crown corporation is the responsibility of the provincial government and does not directly involve our department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

PROPOSED PROHIBITION OF THE PASSAGE OF TANKERS THROUGH GEORGIAN BAY DURING WINTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I have been a member of this House for four years and have never risen under Standing Order 43 before now because in most cases I feel the motions do not accomplish very much. However, in this particular case I think this matter is very important.

On December 23 of last year a large oil tanker spill occurred covering some 50,000 plus miles of the shoreline of Georgian Bay, and the many islands there. In view of past representations to the Ministry of Transport and a recent petition to the Prime Minister containing over 2,000 names which he personally received, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House direct the federal government to prohibit the winter passage of oil and gasoline tankers through Georgian Bay so that the potential environmental and economic disaster which would arise from a spill of greater magnitude may be prevented.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for debate in this House only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT CONCERNING ADMINISTRATIVE DIFFICULTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that almost two months have elapsed since I brought certain difficulties to the attention of the government with respect to Loto Canada, and in view of the fact that investigations by the police into both Loto Canada and its predecessor have not yet prompted any official response by the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the minister responsible for the operations of Loto Canada make a formal statement on motions at the earliest opportunity outlining the difficulties which he knows, or ought to know, exist within the administration of Loto Canada, and measures to correct them, in order that public confidence will be maintained and this organization can function as was intended; in other words, that the government act soon before it has to react.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate in the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF ACCIDENT ALLEGEDLY CAUSED BY CHANGE IN DRILLING PROCEDURES IN BEAUFORT SEA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of information on CBC news this morning that the drilling blowout last summer which occurred in the Beaufort Sea came about as a result of eased requirements on the drilling procedures granted to Dome Petroleum.

Given the risks involved in the project as proposed, given that the amended drilling procedures were authorized without reference to the minister responsible, that the accident caused the death of one man and serious injury to another and that this information was not available at the time of the inquest into the accident, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and that the committee be asked to investigate this serious accident.

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS UNDER CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since Phase I of the Canada Works Program has a deadline of February 4, which is today, for applications to be postmarked, and since this program is directed at areas of high unemployment and many of these target groups live in remote areas of Canada and have not had an opportunity to be briefed on the program nor to submit applications, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House give unanimous consent to extending the deadline for applications to February 18, 1977, in order that remote areas may have an equal opportunity to participate in the program.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented to the House for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST THAT CERTAIN WHARVES BE TRANSFERRED TO QUEBEC JURISDICTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the negotiations between Quebec City and Ottawa concerning the transfer of certain wharves to the jurisdiction of the Quebec government do not seem to be progressing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the government to accelerate the negotiations to conclude an agreement before those wharves be hopelessly damaged.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF VETERANS WHOSE DISABILITY PENSIONS ARE LESS THAN 48 PER CENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to introduce an amendment to the Pension Act to provide for pro-rata pensions to be paid as of right to widows of veterans whose disability pensions were less than 48 per cent, as recommended in the Woods Report, in the Hermann Report, and in several reports of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and, as urged very strongly by the Royal Canadian Legion, the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, and other organizations representing the veterans of this country.

COMMUNICATIONS

SUGGESTED REJECTION OF APPLICATION OF COLIN JAMIESON FOR RADIO STATION LICENCE IN ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The motion concerns the application made to CRTC by Mr. Colin Jamieson, of St. John's, in the name of Beothic Broadcasting, for a licence to operate a 25,000 watt AM radio station in St. John's on the 850 frequency, with the matter set down for hearing on March 1, with unusual speed.

In view of the fact that Colin Jamieson is a brother of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and manager of CJON radio and TV in Newfoundland for many years, and in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs owns 49 per cent of the CJON radio and TV empire in Newfoundland with a total of 25 TV transmitters, six AM radio stations and with licences now issued for nine FM radio stations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House direct the CRTC that the said application of Mr. Colin Jamieson be rejected because of the dangerous concentration of ownership and control of the telecommunications media in Newfoundland in one family and in one political affiliation and because of the obvious conflict of interest implications in connection with this application.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF EXTENDING DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister in a position to tell the House whether a decision has been made with regard to extending the deadline for the Canada Works Program and the Young Canada Works Program in areas of high unemployment where the rate of application has been unusually slow due to the fact that application forms were in the constituencies for less than three weeks? In my opinion, there has not been sufficient public relations.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, applications are coming in very rapidly from all parts of the country and I am keeping a day to day telephone watch on the situation. I expect a large number of applications to arrive by or on Monday, February 7. I think I would prefer to look at the situation at that time. I think that in isolated areas of the country there is a problem. Program officials have been instructed to accept late applications in those circumstances. However, I think I will be in a better position on Monday, when I have seen how many applications we have, to make that announcement.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION ACCIDENT CAUSED BY CHANGE IN DRILLING REGULATIONS FOR BEAUFORT SEA—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, may I direct some questions to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising out of the news report on CBC radio this morning concerning the accident which took place at the Dome Petroleum drilling site in the Beaufort Sea? Apparently some drilling authority had been changed or amended, and this eventually caused an explosion. I ask the minister to confirm if his department yielded to pressure from Dome Petroleum, one of the major oil companies involved in oil exploration in the north, as a result of which a blowout occurred, killing one man and injuring another.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was only made aware just before the question period of the CBC radio broadcast in which these allegations were made. I will have to investigate to see whether those allegations are correct, and report in due course.

Mr. Firth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This matter raises serious questions regarding the chain of command and accountability within the department and, in addition, about the competence of Dome Petroleum and the general risks involved in drilling for oil in the Beaufort Sea. Will the minister refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and not grant further permits for drilling in the Beaufort Sea until this matter has been resolved?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, during the winter we are to undertake a complete review of the Dome Petroleum drilling in the Beaufort Sea, which review will include consultations with communities in the Beaufort Sea area. Once that review has been completed we will decide whether to tighten up procedures or control drilling to a greater extent than we did last year. The hon. member asked that this matter be referred to the committee. I would not be prepared to recommend that course now, because I should like to see the result of the review process which has been set up, a process which is public and open.

Mr. Firth: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. After the risks involved in the process by which permits have been granted have been reassessed, will that assessment be made public, and if not, why not?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think they will be made public. It is our intention to make them public.

POSSIBILITY OF RELAXATION OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—RESPONSIBILITY FOR AUTHORIZATION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? Am I correct in assuming that if there was a relaxation of regulations, the authorization for such relaxation did not come from the minister or his predecessor?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer with respect to my predecessor until I look into the matter, but I did not give authority myself to relax the regulations.

ABORTION

REASON FOR COMMISSIONING BADGLEY REPORT—APPROXIMATE COST

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice along the lines of one I asked earlier in the week arising from the Badgley report on abortion. I point out that we have ten people in Statistics Canada working exclusively on abortion statistics, abortion laws and how they are working in various countries of the world as well as in Canada. Is the minister now prepared to tell the House why it was necessary to tell Dr. Badgley to report on abortion particularly when we have studies of this nature and the study of the Department of Health? What has been the cost of such a report and when will it finally be produced?

● (1120)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the Badgley committee will clearly demonstrate that their examination goes away beyond what is prepared and published by Statistics Canada. There is a budget for the Badgley committee. I will have to take note of that part of the question to see what the actual expenditures of the committee are as of now. I have not yet received the committee's report, but I understand that I am able to make arrangements for its publication and tabling within two weeks.

Mr. Woolliams: Is the minister really aware of the research being done along the lines he is talking about, the terms of reference of the Badgley report, by Statistics Canada. Is he aware of the studies going on in the Department of Health, something that I raised in the House before Dr. Badgley was asked to report on this matter? Would the cost to the taxpayer, at a time when the Minister of Finance is mentioning the word restraint, be close to $2 million for something we already have on the record in various departments?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the committee were drawn up by a group of officials representing not only my own department, but the Department of National Health and Welfare and Statistics Canada, all of whom were familiar with work already done or under way in order to assure that there would be no overlap. The figure of over $2 million is a gross exaggeration. I do not know where the hon. member got that figure. As to the possible costs of the Badgley committee and the purpose of that committee, I have said many times it will hopefully provide a basis of analysis for a rational discussion on abortion law. The hon. member has asked many times about the abortion law and made a number of statements about it, all of which would be helped by a rational analysis.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact the minister said the figure of $2 million might be some exaggeration, he must know the true figure. Maybe that figure includes the cost of material prepared by Statistics Canada, the costs of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Badgley report. If the minister says the figure is wrong, he must have the true figure.

Mr. Basford: As I recall, Mr. Speaker, the original budget set aside for the Badgley committee, as an estimate, was $500,000. I will want to check as to what the actual expenditures are and report back to the House.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY—ALLEGED OBJECTIONS OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Minister of Agriculture said that we already have a national food policy and do not need a new one. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has declared publicly that we do not have one and that we need to develop one. My question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is this: Has he been able to convince the Minister of Agriculture that we can have a national food policy that takes into account the necessity of orderly marketing of farm products vis-à-vis marketing boards and so on and at the same time protecting the Canadian consumer? In other words, in spite of opposition from the Minister of Agriculture, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs going ahead with developing a national food policy for Canadians?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the quote attributed to the Minister of Agriculture. He and I have had several discussions, both of us perceiving the need for a national food policy. Probably the Minister of Agriculture, with a good deal of justification, believes that the sound, sensible policies of his department are the basic platform on which any national food policy would be built.

SUGGESTION MINISTER CEASE PROMOTING SUPPLY—MANAGEMENT PROGRAM FOR CATTLE

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. Due to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture's concept of marketing board supply-management for cattle has been rejected by the western stock growers, and again in my own towns of Milk River and Lethbridge, Alberta, on Wednesday of this week, would the Prime Minister assure the House that he will instruct the Minister of Agriculture upon his return from Lethbridge to cease forthwith the promotion of this scheme for cattle before he does any more damage to this important industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be glad to convey the representations made by the hon. member to the Minister of Agriculture.

TRADE

APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES ON INTERNATIONAL TRANSACTIONS TO CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it arises out of the guidelines issued on December 16 governing the activities of Crown corporations in their international transactions. Do these guidelines apply to all Crown corporations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to refresh my mind on it. I believe that in the statement there was a distinction made between the various Crown corporations under the Financial Administration Act. Some of them, like the CBC for instance, would not have occasion, I suppose, to fall under these guidelines. Certainly, the statement was meant to be general, though there may be some exceptions for Crown corporations in special sections.

Mr. Gillies: I raise this question specifically in relation to testimony provided before a committee by the Minister of Finance concerning an area where they did not apply. Could the Prime Minister clarify this situation and perhaps make certain that all the Crown corporations which are operating in the international field, and involved in transactions similar to those engaged in by AECL, are brought under the guidelines?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I believe the hon. gentleman was suggesting that the guidelines of December could be applied retroactively which is not possible. However, the guidelines were meant to apply to corporations like AECL, and the Minister of Finance said that the question, as phrased, is a total distortion of what he said.

Mr. Gillies: Again to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance said very specifically that the Prime Minister was not referring to all Crown corporations and it was totally in the context of the problems of AECL in its international transactions.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That was pre-guidelines.

Mr. Gillies: I want to know whether or not it is the government's policy that Crown corporations which are engaged in international transactions come under the guidelines as promulgated on December 16.

Mr. Trudeau: I find it difficult to discuss the hearings of a committee when I did not attend the committee or read the report on them. I do not know whether it is in order to discuss these committee proceedings in the House. The Minister of Finance insists that the hon. member is distorting the import of his testimony.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF APPEAL OF DECISION IN BRIAN DAVIES CASE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice and it has to do with the case against Brian Davies, the great pretender of the seals—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marshall: —who was charged in a provincial court. The judge ruled the matter was outside his jurisdiction. Has the minister had an opportunity to review the findings of the court and can he tell us what action is to be taken to appeal, or take the matter to a higher level, so that it can be correctly dealt with in view of the fact that Mr. Davies deliberately contravened the Seal Protection Act.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): A decision has been made by my department and the officials in the Department of the Environment to appeal the decision. I must admit I am not aware whether the notice of appeal has been filed.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REPLY TO PERSON OFFERING SUM OF MONEY IF HUNT ABANDONED

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary to the Minister of the Environment. Could the Minister tell us the nature of his reply to another humanitarian over in Sweden who offered $400,000 for the lives of the seals? Would he advise the House whether in his reply he told him to give the $400,000 to the starving children of the world?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): There was a gentleman who communicated with me through the media. I responded in kind. I indicated this was obviously a decision which the fishermen themselves would have to make, but I thought the offer was low because it was $400,000 against an income of more than $2½ million. In fact, the gentleman in question has accepted my invitation to meet next Monday. I will meet with him, as I will meet with any group if I feel they are sincere. The problem is that in many cases they are misinformed. The seal is not an endangered species.

● (1130)

NEED FOR PUBLIC TO HAVE RIGHT OF ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the Prime Minister accurately reported when he remarked that Canadians "don't need rights to governmental information enjoyed by U.S. citizens"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is some article or headline to that effect in the Globe and Mail. I am rather certain that that is a misquote. I did talk about the subject, but perhaps I will ensure that a transcript of what I said will be sent to the hon. member.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware that for some time a parliamentary committee has been looking at this question of freedom of information, has visited various European countries, has consulted with representatives of the United States government, but has not yet been able to report? Is the Prime Minister also aware that there is widespread concern in Canada as to why government information paid for by the people of Canada is so frequently kept secret?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do know of the work of this committee and I hope it will report to the House so we are able to study the matter in more depth. The government has stated that it is our intention to make submissions to that committee at an appropriate time.

REGULATIONS FOR TANKERS OPERATING IN CANADIAN WATERS—CO-OPERATION WITH UNITED STATES—PLANS FOR ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and relates to a potential catastrophe caused by sub-standard oil tankers. In view of the fact that the new United States transportation secretary, Mr. Adams, announced on Tuesday stricter regulation of all tankers operating in U.S. waters, will the minister advise the House whether he plans to announce similar or identical regulations for tankers operating in Canadian waters; and what further concrete measures is he taking other than those announced by the Minister of Transport in the House on Tuesday last?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, under the Shipping Act this is obviously the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Transport. However, we have discussed this matter with our officials, especially those dealing with pollution matters at the Law of the Sea Conference, to see how international co-operation can advance faster than it has. Personally, I rejoice that the new United States Secretary of Transport is taking a more hawkish position on this issue.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind that if our standards are lower than those in the United States we will inevitably find ill-equipped tankers diverted from U.S. ports to Canadian ports, is it the intention either of the minister of the environment or his colleague the Minister of Transport to engage in discussions with their U.S. counterparts in order that Canada and the United States can co-operate fully to ensure a common and comprehensive tanker regulation program? More preferably, would the minister, either directly or through his colleague the Minister of Transport, make representations to Mr. Adams and ask for Canadian participation in the newly formed marine safety task force in the United States to protect our common interests?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Well, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that in the matter of environmental protection our two countries have been working very closely together. In fact, as the hon. member knows, even within the previous administration there was a difference of opinion between the transportation interests and environmental interests in the United States. As I say, I rejoice that the new Secretary of Transport is taking a more hawkish view or more environmentalist view of this issue.

I think that international co-operation and agreement on tough standards is, in the long run, the only solution, as it has been in regulating transportation through the airways. For some reason this mystical freedom of the high seas, which was really a freedom or right of passage, has been extended to freedom to pollute, and I think every nation in the world must resist this movement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the minister's words, but I am trying to find out when he is going to turn from a dove into a hawk and whether the Minister of Transport is going to do something. If I may forget that non-answer, can I ask the minister, with respect to Canadian waters, whether he will advise what plans exist for the enforcement of present and future regulations in Canadian waters within the 200-mile limit so that accidents such as we have been experiencing lately will at least be minimized along our coastline?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the extension of the jurisdiction to 200 miles is an extension of fisheries jurisdiction. Whether or not eventually, as a result of the Law of the Sea Conference going one way or the other, nations will declare this type of jurisdiction for the protection of their coasts certainly remains open.

DATE OF INSTALLATION OF RADAR TO CONTROL MOVEMENT OF TANKERS THROUGH STRAITS OF JUAN DE FUCA—CO-ORDINATION WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. It is expected that supertankers carrying oil from Alaska will be travelling through the Straits of Juan de Fuca by next fall. Can the minister give the House any assurance that passage through the straits will be radar controlled by that time, and if the control system is not to be in place by next fall, when will it be in place?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would have to defer to my colleague the Minister of Transport because of the navigational aids involved. I understand that a fairly sophisticated system is envisaged if these tankers do sail through these waters.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Due to the unusual treaty governing traffic in the Straits of Juan de Fuca wherein the U.S.-Canadian boundary is traversed freely by shipping, has the minister made any attempt to co-ordinate our traffic control regulations with the United States, bearing in mind their new and tougher regulations?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at what has been done in terms of co-ordination, but I am convinced that we are working very closely with United States authorities. We realize, as they do, that an oil spill would not choose borders; it would go into our waters and their waters.

POSSIBILITY OF PROHIBITING TANKERS FROM ENTERING PARRY SOUND HARBOUR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment in the absence of the Minister of Transport? I am wondering whether the Minister of the Environment would inform me if a decision has yet been reached by the government to prohibit the shipping of oil by tanker to the harbour of Parry Sound and in Georgian Bay, taking into account the literally tens of thousands of miles of shoreline among the 30,000 islands which would suffer damage in the case of a major oil spill?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice. I am not informed whether the Department of Transport has made a decision.

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister is aware, a petition was presented to the Prime Minister personally on January 25 and the Prime Minister has expressed very grave concern about this oil spill and what the possibilities of a future one will be. Imperial Oil has repaired that tanker and it is in Sarnia now loading up to head north through the Great Lakes, I believe today or tomorrow. We are hoping that it will be kept out of Georgian Bay.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware—I have been made fully aware—of a meeting which took place and which I believe the hon. member attended with my colleague the Postmaster General and my parliamentary secretary. I have also read the document that he sent. If he is asking me whether an answer is available right now, I have to tell him that I do not have an answer right now.

PROVISION FOR BOARDING OF TANKERS WITHIN 200-MILE ZONE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In light of the possible damage which could occur to fisheries resources, is it the minister's intention to impress upon his colleagues the need to amend the Canada Shipping Act in order to permit boarding of tankers that are within our 200-mile zone, in the same manner that the act was amended to permit us to board and examine tankers within the 12-mile limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not an international law expert. I understand that we have that authority within the 12-mile limit. As I explained to one hon. member a little earlier, the provisions of the extension of jurisdiction deal with fisheries and fisheries matters only for the present time. Whether we will evolve to this type of regulation in the 200-mile zone will depend in large part on what happens at the Law of the Sea Conference in relation to pollution.

• (1140)

IMPACT OF POLLUTION ON FISHERIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment. It refers to the twice expressed view that we are in a fisheries zone situation. Is the minister then denying that there is any relationship between pollution and the life of fisheries, and that therefore in the interest of Canada's fisheries we should not be dealing with pollution in terms of fisheries?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am obviously not denying that pollution has a great impact on fisheries, but I am telling the hon. member that the avenue of international co-operation is surely the route which must be followed at the beginning. It does not matter if you have jurisdiction over 200 miles and if at the 212th mile an oil tanker opens up and 6 million gallons of bunker oil pours out. It is obviously through international standards for tankers, their access to ports, etc., that we have to find a solution to this problem. If that does not happen, we will have to take other measures, as we did in fisheries.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF POLICY STATEMENTS ON CATTLE INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, but first I should like to welcome him back from sunny southern Alberta and in particular from the barnyards around Milk River. My question relates to the minister's three recent policy statements issued during the recess concerning the Canadian cattle industry, the first one on December 23 about off-shore beef import quotas, the second on January 4 when he announced his cow-calf policy for 1977, and of course, the recent federal cattle support price for 1976. Will the minister use his good office and his most persuasive manner to have these very important items referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for an adequate and very important debate?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would welcome a debate on these items at any time. The hon. member should have been in Milk River and Lethbridge Alberta with me, where he would have heard the public debate there, as we did. I want to report through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member that the farmers there were very receptive—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —and responsive, and those people at Medicine Hat were not really laughing at me—they were laughing at someone else who was there the week before. I want to say that I think all the programs are very well accepted. Today my officials have meetings with officials of the provincial departments of agriculture concerned with the cow-calf program. The other program on quarterly payments for stabilizing beef has been very well accepted and easily understood. I believe there is no difficulty understanding the quotas. They were clearly explained in the press releases, and we thought it was most urgent that the beef producing population of this country be informed.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, surely if the program is that good, the minister would refer the three specific items to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I will discuss it with the House leader, but I understand the committees of the House are being overworked at present.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: But there is nothing I would like better than to get it on the record of the House because I am so proud of what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Since the Standing Committee on Agriculture is not meeting, will the Minister of Agriculture stop all this fudging around, whether here or in Milk River, and make a concrete commitment now to ask his colleagues to refer the three items mentioned by my colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat, to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that there can be a public and detailed debate, free of the additives which are the specialty of the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I will not use the words that were used to describe what the Leader of the Official Opposition was doing out west before I arrived there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I want to say this, that members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture are members of several other committees of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: As I said, I would like nothing better than to get it before the committee because the proceedings of House of Commons committees are sent all over Canada and I cannot think of a better propaganda medium for me to use.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary question to which a yes or no answer will do. Will the minister ask his colleagues to make that reference to the standing committee, yes or no?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the Leader of the Official Opposition. I hope he does not do that to his own members. I hope he does not tell them what they are going to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: He is trying to tell me what to say. Even if he asked the Prime Minister, he would find out that it is difficult to tell this minister what to say or what to do. I already said I would discuss it with my colleagues.

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TOWARDS MARKETING BOARD FOR BEEF CATTLE WITH SUPPLY-MANAGEMENT POWERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in view of the furor in Manitoba resulting from the objections of beef producers at having to vote for full marketing board powers for any beef agency that might be established by the Manitoba government rather than a beef agency without marketing or supply-management powers, and in view of the fact that in Manitoba the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that the federal government is also interested in supply-management of beef, can the minister now indicate clearly whether the federal government favours a beef marketing board with supply-management powers on a national basis?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have said that there must be a better system for marketing beef, but I have also said I would not impose a beef marketing system on beef producers in Canada as R. B. Bennett did when he imposed the Wheat Board on wheat producers without a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: It will be up to the producers to decide. I understand that what is taking place in Manitoba is very democratic. They will allow farmers to vote on a program if they want. I am not telling the province of Manitoba what to do and I would not even tell the province of Ontario what to do, even though the minister of agriculture for Ontario is sitting in the galleries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: I would like to indicate to the Minister of Agriculture that it is not democratic and that is why farmers in Manitoba are in such an uproar. I would like to ask the minister very clearly whether the National Farm Products Marketing Board, through the agencies of the Department of Agriculture, is promoting a national beef marketing board, yes or no?

Mr. Whelan: I make no bones about my opinion of people running marketing boards. The marketing boards that are successful in Canada receive no federal funds and cost the taxpayers no money. Some people still think that I have a bottomless bucket from which to hand out subsidies for other efficient or inefficient operators in our country. I do not intend to continue to do that and I will encourage properly run marketing boards. Even the hon. member's leader said—I saw a quote of what he said—that he was surprised at how many people in Ontario were in favour of the supply-management system for beef.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT CANADIAN COMPANIES AND BANKS FROM ASSISTING ARAB BOYCOTT OF ISRAEL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Given the continuation of Canadian companies and firms complying with the Arab boycott, and furthermore Canadian banks aiding and assisting in the Arab boycott, can the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether his government will be bringing forward legislation prohibiting Canadian firms and banks from complying with the Arab boycott?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): A statement was made on this subject a couple of months ago. The hon. member might want to refer to it.

BANK ACT

POSSIBILITY OF INSERTING PROVISION TO PREVENT CANADIAN COMPANIES FROM COMPLYING WITH ARAB BOYCOTT OF ISRAEL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the statement contained no teeth, can the minister say whether he is seriously considering including in the Bank Act, which he will be bringing forward, a clause which would prohibit Canadian banks from aiding the Arab boycott which they presently do by certifying through clauses in letters of credit compliance with the boycott?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to consider that.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OUTLOOK FOR GROWTH IN QUEBEC—POSSIBILITY OF EXODUS OF CORPORATE HEAD OFFICES FROM QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the chairman of the Montreal exchange indicated, Quebec is heading into a recession this year and the Conference Board has indicated that real growth in that province will be only 2.3 per cent, the lowest of any province in Canada. Would the minister indicate if his departmental figures confirm this bleak outlook for Quebec in 1977?

• (1150)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: As the chairman of the Montreal stock exchange predicts there will be an acceleration of departures of corporate head offices from Quebec or the establishment of dual offices elsewhere resulting in still higher unemployment levels in that province, would the minister confirm if to the knowledge of his department there is any such exodus of offices from Quebec? Is his department at least monitoring the situation, and if so, does the minister feel that there is in fact any danger of an acceleration of this trend?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The situation has been monitored so far as it can be, but the corporations are under no obligation to report a decision of this kind, and therefore it would be very much on the basis of public announcement. I just have to regard Mr. Dlouhy's statement as being altogether too pessimistic.

COMMENTS OF MINISTER CONCERNING LACK OF STABLE CLIMATE FOR INVESTMENT IN QUEBEC

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Considering the unsatisfactory growth position in Quebec, would the minister confirm or deny his reported statement of this week that he must inform foreign investors of certain insecurities in that province, and if the purport of his remarks is correct, would he indicate in what way such comments will restore confidence and encourage needed investment in that province?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I pointed out what I think is obvious to most hon. members of the House, and that is that there is some uncertainty in Quebec because of the political situation.

MULTICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO UKRAINIAN CHOIR FROM EDMONTON

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of multiculturalism. In view of the magnitude of staging a multicultural festival of choirs, which I must add was an excellent production and a success, and in view of the misunderstanding and irritation caused by the lack of funds to pay back the bank loan obtained by the worthy Dnipro Ensemble, the Ukrainian choir from the great metropolis of Edmonton, to travel to Ottawa from Edmonton to perform, is the minister prepared to announce assistance to fulfill the department's obligation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Ukrainian choir, about which the hon. member is very concerned, is indeed very highly thought of by everyone who is aware of it and aware of the tremendous performance it put on when it was here. The choir was very helpful in terms of national unity and understanding, and also in terms of their participation in Hull.

Mr. Paproski: Our sister city.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In view of that we are prepared to take care of the deficit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SKIM MILK POWDER—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN EXPORT LEVY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. World prices of skim milk powder have fallen to a level of 10 cents a pound for feed purposes and to a low of 16 cents a pound for food purposes. In view of the fact that the present export levy of $1.35 per hundredweight has meant a sharp cut in the incomes of producers and has created in addition a debt in excess of $100 million against the industry and, unless the present policy is changed, could easily create an increase in the present levy of $1.35 to $2.00, is the minister giving serious consideration to policy changes which would substantially reduce the present export levy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the dairy farmers of Canada have made that representation to us, as have some of the provincial governments through their provincial marketing boards. They are concerned about this problem. We are considering it, but we feel that there will be less need for a large levy because of the co-operation we have received from the provinces and from the dairy processing industry as a whole. More milk is being directed to specialty products, of which consumption is continually rising. So we are looking at that, but we do not feel that we will have the surplus of skim milk powder we had last year. In fact, we know we will not. For instance, at the end of the dairy year last year we had over 330 million pounds of surplus skim milk powder; at the end of this dairy year we will have approximately 110 million pounds. That is still not desirable, but it enables us to continue our food-aid programs, etc. None of this unsold powder which we have on hand is very old, so we look forward to a much better dairy year, and all these things will be considered in the new program for this year.

Mr. Wise: Since a large percentage of the $150 million debt was caused by over-production as a result of intent and design, errors in planning, mismanagement, over-reaction and miscalculations by this government, has the minister made recommendations to the government with regard to assuming the responsibility of at least a portion, if not all, of this debt?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question has a slightly argumentative tone to it. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR CAREFUL CONSIDERATION OF BERGER REPORT

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is related to a CBC news story and interview this morning. I suggest to the minister that his use of the word "blackmail" during that particular interview was most unfortunate and a misrepresentation of a very complex problem.

However, I would like to ask the minister if he supports the position of his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who indicated when he was speaking to the Territorial Council on January 22 of this year that the Berger report will be very carefully considered not only by the Territorial government but also by the federal government when it is introduced in this House somewhat later this year.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I made that very clear in the interview, and perhaps if the hon. member would listen to the whole interview, which he will have an opportunity of doing on Sunday, he will find some of the answers.

Mr. Stanfield: He'll have something better to do on Sunday.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO REFER BERGER REPORT TO COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Having due regard to the minister's comments with respect to the importance he placed on the assessment which will be made by the Territorial government and the various departments in the federal government, will the minister indicate at this time if he has given careful consideration to referring that very important report to a standing or special committee of the House of Commons as soon as it is available.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that question has not come up before. As the hon. member knows, the Berger report will be made public when it is produced by Judge Berger, and it will be available to all hon. members. However, no consideration has been given to the suggestion made.

POST OFFICE

ISSUANCE OF STAMPS COMMEMORATING TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ACCESSION OF QUEEN ELIZABETH TO THRONE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I congratulate him for issuing a commemorative stamp honouring the Queen—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: —and also for the ceremony which was held this morning at which the minister upheld the reputation of the Post Office by arriving slightly late.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the high denominational value of the stamp and the popularity of the monarch, is the Postmaster General planning to use this stamp to retire the deficit of the Post Office?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Well, Mr. Speaker, that would be desirable, and I appreciate the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I would like to add that if there was a slight delay, it had nothing at all to do with the Post Office. I was relying on the Ministry of Transport to bring me there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: However, with reference to the high value of the stamp, we felt that a 25 cent issue would coincide with Her Majesty's twenty-fifth anniversary very well. I would like to indicate also that the silver foil which was used in that stamp was not the result of any melting of silver coins left over from the coin program, in case the hon. gentleman might ask.

Mr. Jarvis: Is that going to be the postal rate next year?

APPOINTMENT OF JAMES CORKERY AS DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, arising from the comments of the minister concerning delays, could he inform the House when he will be appointing a new deputy postmaster general, so that the work of improving labour-management relations in the Post Office, which has been going on during recent months, will not be interrupted?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, by some strange coincidence I can advise the hon. gentleman that the governor in council has appointed Mr. James Corkery, who is presently the regional general manager for the Ontario region, as the new deputy postmaster general. I am sure that the new deputy postmaster general and I will have a very prolonged relationship.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

GRANTING OF PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF VETERANS WHOSE DISABILITY PENSION WAS LESS THAN FORTY-EIGHT PER CENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs due to illness may I direct a question to his parliamentary secretary? Will the parliamentary secretary convey to the minister the regret of all of us that he has been ill and our pleasure in learning that he will soon be back with us?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When the parliamentary secretary does that will he also inform the minister that many of us in this House hope that when he gets back to his office he will activate the consideration of amendments to the Pension Act, particularly with respect to the granting of pensions of widows where the veteran's pension was less than 48 per cent?

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the hon. member by saying that I am going to see the Minister of Veterans Affairs at 12.30 p. m. today and will convey his message and the best wishes of the House. He is recovering beautifully and will be out of hospital this weekend and back in his usual place about a week from next Monday, we hope. I will also convey to the minister the hon. member's request which I will take as notice, that he do something about the widows of veterans whose pensions were less than 48 per cent.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, during the question period the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe asked me whether an appeal had been taken and I indicated that one had been decided upon. I can now advise him that the appeal has been filed.

STATEMENT ON APPOINTMENT AND EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House of recent developments respecting appointments and employment practices in the public service. You may recall our discussions here on December 9 and 10, 1976, concerning allegations of improper staffing action. I have been advised that the Public Service Commission has taken the matter in hand and that the chairman of the commission has made a public statement. I should like to table his response and, on behalf of the Prime Minister, indicate his support of it. I firmly believe our federal public service ranks high on the list of federal public services in western democratic countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We have been fortunate, indeed, to attract the large number of qualified public servants we have in the service today and their dedication and loyalty is to be commended.

As members of this House know, it has been nearly ten years since the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the revised Financial Administration Act were passed by the House. In recognition of the need for a review of this situation, the government asked Dr. Finkelman to undertake an examination of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and its administration and to make recommendations having regard to the experience gained since that act came into force, and how it should be amended or revised adequately to meet the needs of the employer and employee in the public service and the employee organizations that represent them and to serve the interests of the public. That report was the subject of consideration at a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Employer and Employee Relations.

The government intends to introduce amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act based on the recommendations of the Finkelman and parliamentary reports. In this context it would also introduce amendments to the Public Service Employment Act and the Financial Administration Act.

As announced by my predecessor in May, 1976, the government will establish a review body to examine staffing, appointments and training in the public service. I am pleased to announce that following consultation with the parties concerned, the terms of reference of a special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle has been agreed to.

This committee will examine all matters pertaining to the Public Service Employment Act with particular reference to (a) the merit principle and its application as it relates to initial appointment, internal appointment and promotion and eligibility of public servants to participate in competitions; (b) access to employment with respect to training; (c) process of appeal and redress relating to appointment problems and demotion; (d) scope of collective bargaining as it applies to (a), (b) and (c); (e) operation and assistance in the operation of training and development programs; (f) fostering of improved employee-employer relations; and (g) more efficient personnel management systems taking into account operational needs of departments and the need to provide an efficient and effective service to the public.

At the request of the unions, and upon mutual agreement by all affected parties, the first phase of the review will involve a separate examination by each side of the above-mentioned issues. Following a suitable period for these two exercises, the special committee, composed of a chairman and a representative of the government and a representative chosen by the unions, will begin meeting, leading to the preparation of a public report.

An announcement of the membership of the special committee will be made at a later date. Where it is possible to reach agreement, recommendations will be made to the government. In areas where no agreement is possible, the chairman will identify the different points of view and will be free to make his opinion known as to what options should be considered. During the deliberations of the committee there will be consultation between the government and the unions and between other interested individuals and organizations, particularly the Public Service Commission. While the committee will be examining roles and relationships, it will not be asked to make recommendations concerning organizational structures.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the traditional way I wish to thank the President of the Privy Council for forwarding an advance copy of the statement to me. I also wish to join the minister in paying tribute to the public service of Canada which I have reason to believe, from experience and for other reasons, ranks high among public services in the western world. It is a fine service, but I am afraid the admission today that a special committee is to be set up to examine some very important matters suggests that, fine as it is, it is in a state of some uncertainty as to its general acceptance by the government.

One of the matters raised in this statement is the proposed amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. We heard about this from the former president of the privy council, so this is the second time we have heard of it. It sounds as though we are putting up the banns for marriage. Will there be a third statement before the amendments are introduced, or are they to be brought before us soon?

Speaking as a member of the committee which studied the Finkelman report and looked into employer-employee relations in the public service, I feel it is high time to bring that legislation before the House. I hope that this is not another stalling tactic on the part of the government, another delay in bringing forward the legislation. In general, we welcome the statement, although with reservations.

Unfortunately, the statement does not mention something else which also stemmed from the work of the joint committee on employer-employee relations in the public service. It says nothing about the need to examine the operation of the Public Service Commission within the ambit of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. If that question is to be the subject of further legislation or study remains to be seen. Regrettably, it was not raised in the statement.

The list of matters set out on page 2 of the statement which the committee is to examine is of prime importance to the public service and shows the degree to which the public service has fallen on evil days. As has been said more than once, public servants are uncertain about their future. Regrettably, there is a drop in the morale of the public service. The establishment of a special committee which is to study certain questions fundamental to the public service suggests to us that the government recognizes the demoralization of the public service. When I say this, I am thinking particularly of the merit principle, and promotion.

There are procedures for appealing decisions concerning promotion. One can take one's appeal to the federal court, if necessary. I have correspondence from the chairman of the Public Service Commission saying that few appeals have been taken to the federal court. But that fact, I suggest, is not an indication of the amount of discontent in the public service or the way in which appeals are being handled. I hope the committee that is to be established will look into these matters carefully.

I notice that subparagraph (f) on page 2 of the statement speaks of the "fostering of improved employer-employee relations." That language shows, I suggest, that the government recognizes something is wrong. I wonder if that "something wrong" is not spotlighted by the expression in the last paragraph on page 2 which reads in part, "the first phase of the review will involve a separate examination by each side—" Why by each side? Are we not all on the same side? When the public service was known as the civil service, it was on the same side; we were all on one side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It worked hand in glove with the government. Then there was no mention of the parties being on each side. That we have come to such a pass is regrettable. It is high time for the matters listed in the statement to be examined.

Certain other questions ought to be taken into account. For example, the public service is demoralized partly because there are no standard conditions of work throughout the service. In one department the employees are entitled, say, to three weeks annual leave, whereas in other departments they could be entitled to more. Also, provision for sick leave is not standard across the board. I think all such questions should be treated in a standard way, so that each department will know it is being treated as all other departments are being treated.

Finally, I shall comment on the expression on page 3 of the statement reading, "Where it is possible to reach agreement, recommendations will be made to the government . . ." Since the statement speaks of the two sides in this matter, I suggest that if one side feels aggrieved, it should be able to make recommendations and have them considered. Any decision, including a rejection, if that is necessary, ought to be handed down with reasons. Although we welcome this particular statement as an indication that the government intends to improve the morale of the public service, we have some reservations about it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly pleased to hear the President of the Privy Council in the early part of his remarks use these words: "We have been fortunate indeed to attract the large number of qualified public servants we have in the service today and their dedication and loyalty is to be commended."

I was also pleased to note that at that point the House applauded. It was interesting to hear a comment like that, following some of the other things which have been said in this House in recent weeks about the loyalty and reliability of some of our public servants. We have also heard members in this House, even on the government side, indulging in the pastime of sniping at public servants and blaming them for the faults of the government. I think that once in a while it is good for the sort of thing the statement says to be expressed in the House, and for the House to applaud it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The fact is that we have a very good public service.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Well said, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is inevitable that when very large numbers of people are involved, some mistakes will be made. However, in the main, we are well served. I am also interested to note that Mr. Gallant's statement, which the minister tabled at the same time, emphasizes the importance of protecting the merit principle. Mr. Gallant recognized in his statement that the delegation of hiring powers to the departments had created problems, but he affirmed in the statement that the Public Service Commission regards it as its job to make sure that the merit system is observed. Because there have been some questions about that point, this review is important.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Today in his statement the minister said that two things are to be done. First, as the minister announced, the government intends to introduce amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Public Service Employment Act and the Financial Administration Act. All those acts have to do with the public service. Like the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich I hope those amendments will be forthcoming soon.

The second proposal concerns the establishment of the special three-person committee which is to study the matters the minister listed this morning. I am not horrified, as was my friend for Esquimalt-Saanich, at the suggestion that the representatives for either side in these discussions would have the chance before they meet to line up all the issues with which they are to deal. After all, it is a management-labour situation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): But it should not be; it ought to be a service relationship.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One should be realistic in arrangements of this kind. The things to which special attention need to be given in the attempt to improve the work of the public service in the main fall under three headings. First, we must do everything possible to enhance and protect the merit system and see to it that all the changes which have been made have not chipped it away. Second, we must underline, confirm and widen the collective bargaining process. It is still my view that it should include such things as classifications, promotions, and so on. I believe that is in the review which is to be made.

In the third place it seems to me that more ought to be said and done about the pensions of our public servants. That I believe those pensions should be improved is well known. But I think the government should take a more aggressive stand in defence of our public servants and their pensions. I deplore, with everything within me, the sniping and attacking that is going on, based largely upon hypothetical situations and a few individual cases. Many public servants, retired and working, wish the government's voice would be heard with regard to this matter. If the government were a little more outspoken in defence of its public servants both working and retired, it would help to improve the morale in the service.

● (1220)

I am a little amazed at the suggestion that this committee will make no recommendations. I suppose if it has the right to express its opinions, that is really the same thing under another name. In any case, we welcome this display of interest in the good job being done by our public service and also the display of interest in improving it. We wish this committee well. We hope that before long we will see the legislation that has again been promised.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to express my appreciation to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) for having had the courtesy of sending me his statement in French. One might say, Mr. Speaker, that it complies with the procedure—and I agree—but still one must accept to do one's duty. That is why I congratulate him.

The president's statement deals first with appointment and hiring practices in the public service. Those practices are not widely known but I presume that every candidate for a position within the public service is fairly treated. Otherwise the President of the Privy Council is fully justified to consider amendments to the public service legislation. The President of the Privy Council has informed the House that he will set up a review body to examine staffing, appointments and training practices in the public service. In paragraph (g), page 2 of his statement, the minister said the committee will examine, and I quote:

(g) more efficient personnel management systems taking into account operational needs of departments and the need to provide an efficient and effective service to the public.

Mr. Speaker, I would not apply that criticism to civil servants generally because, on the whole, I agree with the President of the Privy Council that standards are quite good in the public service. Still, the fact remains that some civil servants should be reminded of their duties in the performance of their work if they are to lose their illusions of grandeur and quit behaving as if they owned the country.

I should like to draw the attention of the President of the Privy Council to the delays in some of the negotiations between the various levels of government, and to the fact that in some cases those delays can be blamed on the officials to whom the negotiations were entrusted. The public is becoming increasingly aware that officials are responsible for big policies and big decisions and that some of them could not care less about the authority of their minister. Such a behaviour encroaches upon the principles of administrative hierarchy.

I therefore hope that the nature of the measures mentioned in the statement of the President of the Privy Council are such that they will improve relations between employers and employees, and that every civil servant will be treated on merit without political considerations entering the picture. I know, on the other hand, that it is not easy to serve the public. Still, those who chose that vocation, the civil service or the political arena, should expect to be the target of some criticism. However, if in the space of two months the government has felt that it should draw the attention of the House to this matter, obviously there is some unrest. If creating that committee, and changing the public service legislation as the government suggests, can improve the situation, I am sure that is what everyone of us wishes.

So, under the circumstances, I feel that the government is making an effort to act; but, if there are complaints about administrative delays in the case of some officials, then the government will have to set the example by going ahead as soon as possible, since it has introduced those measures.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Privy Council. I will preface my question by saying that I share the sentiments expressed by the members of the House who have spoken in welcoming the statement. The statement did not make it clear, but in the course of the matters before the examiners, will it be within the purview of the examination to be conducted of various items listed in the minister's statement to examine the effect of the implementation of the official languages program in the public service as part of discussing the general field of employer-employee relations? The reason I ask this is that during the course of the Finkelman committee that matter was not discussed. It was said at that stage that it would be left to a later time. Is this the time when that kind of examination will take place? Is it the type of examination that would be within the purview of this committee?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, first may I thank hon. members opposite for the generally positive response to this step which results from a recommendation of a joint parliamentary commission. It is not the intention to have this committee directly enter into an investigation of the operation of the bilingualism program. As I look at the terms of reference which have been agreed to, it appears to me that it may be brought in indirectly, but as I understand it, it is not the intention to have this as a frontal approach or frontal project of study.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is as I suspected, Mr. Speaker. The minister has answered my question with regard to this matter. The other aspect I want to raise refers to that part of the statement where the minister indicated there would not be an examination of structures. Does that preclude the committee from dealing with the pay research bureau, for example, and the part it plays in assisting the bargaining process and in assisting the public to understand the considerations that come into play with regard to public services salaries, how they are established, and pension matters, particularly the question of indexing. Will it be beyond the purview of this committee to deal with, and perhaps answer, many questions that are being asked, thereby allaying many fears that are being expressed? Does the reference to the inability of the committee to deal with the structural problem exclude that kind of consideration from the work of the committee proposed in the minister's statement?

● (1230)

Mr. MacEachen: This is a new question for me and I will answer it as I appreciate the situation as it ought to be, that the committee would not in any way be obligated or entrusted with examining the reorganization of government departments or the creation of new departments or matters of that kind. But it would seem to me that under (f), for example, improved employer-employee relations might involve consideration of an institution like the pay research bureau in so far as it assists and could assist more in the fostering of better employer-employee relations. That is how I appreciate the situation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two short questions. First, will the report of this new tripartite committee be made public? Second, does the government intend to bring in its legislation amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Public Service Employment Act and the Financial Administration Act before, or after, it receives the report of this new committee?

Mr. MacEachen: In answer to the first question, the intention is that the committee's deliberations will lead to the making of a public report. As I indicated in my statement, where possible the committee will make recommendations where they agree, but if they are unable to agree, the chairman, carrying out his functions, will identify differences of opinion and outline possible options in areas of disagreement. It is not the intention to hold up the amendments to the measure the hon. member mentioned pending the receipt of this report, because I do not know how long the special committee will take. I would hope we would have the amendments to these statutes before the House well before the report is made.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BRAMPTON-GEORGETOWN

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-392, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Brampton-Georgetown).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Milne: I should like briefly to explain my reason for introducing this bill. The commissioners recommended that the redistributed riding be known as Brampton-Halton Hills. I propose, by this bill, to change that and name the new riding Brampton-Georgetown. This would bring the name into line with the wishes of the people of Georgetown and prevent a good deal of confusion which would exist if Halton Hills were left in the name, because the majority of the area covered in the town of Halton Hills will remain with the riding of Halton.

I think the traditional relationship between Halton Hills and the riding of Halton, which my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) represents, should remain. It would clear up this confusion to have the constituency known as Brampton-Georgetown.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING WELLINGTON-DUFFERIN-SIMCOE

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-393, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Milne: Again, Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the commissioners propose to call this new riding Dufferin-Wellington. I propose, under this bill, to have that name changed to Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe. This is primarily in recognition of the fact that a substantial number of people from Simcoe, some 11,000, will be included in this riding, two townships and one municipality by the name of Alliston, which is a substantial town in Simcoe and which will be one of the larger centres in this new riding. I think, therefore, that part of the riding from Simcoe should have recognition by being included in the name of the new riding.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PROPORTION OF SALES EARNED BY THE LARGEST WHOLESALERS OF FARM MACHINERY AND EQUIPMENT

Question No. 345—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What proportion of total sales did the four largest wholesalers of farm machinery and equipment in the industry earn in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

2. What proportion of total sales did the eight largest firms in the industry earn in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: 1. The proportion of total wholesale sales of farm machinery made by the four largest firms in the wholesale farm machinery industry in 1971 was 19.2 per cent and in 1973 was 22.2 per cent.

2. The proportion of total wholesale sales of farm machinery made by the eight largest firms in the wholesale farm machinery industry in 1971 was 24.8 per cent and in 1973 was 26.5 per cent.

NOTE: Data for 1960 and 1965 are not available.

FISH PRODUCTS INDUSTRY SALES

Question No. 356—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What proportion of total sales were the sales of the four largest firms in the fish products industry in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

2. What proportion of total sales did the eight largest firms in the industry earn in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: 1. The proportion of total sales earned by the four largest firms in the fish products industry was 41.2 per cent in 1958*, 35.6 per cent in 1965, 39.1 per cent in 1970 and 42.5 per cent in 1972.

2. The proportion of total sales earned by the eight largest firms in the fish products industry was 51.9 per cent in 1958* 50.6 per cent in 1965, 52.4 per cent in 1970 and 54.4 per cent in 1972. * Data are not available for 1960. For certain industries data are available for 1958 as the result of a recent historical study of selected industries.

EDC—TRADE RELATIONS WITH THIRD WORLD

Is the government aware of a reported statement by an official of the Export Development Bank that "Canada must establish trading relations with the Third World and is in a good position to do so because Canada is not thought to have ulterior motives" and, if so, does the government support a policy of investment in Third World countries that is not subject to conditions or understandings of at least partial reciprocal benefit for Canada?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: The government is aware of a reported statement by an official of the Export Development Corporation that "Canada must establish trading relations with the Third World and is in a good position to do so because Canada is not thought to have ulterior motives". The government supports Canadian investment in Third World countries through Section 34 of the Export Development Act. The Export Development Corporation has an established policy which specifies that only investors who can demonstrate economic benefits for both Canada and the host country are eligible for foreign investment insurance under the Act.

PORK IMPORTS—SEPTEMBER 1, 1975 TO AUGUST 31, 1976

Question No. 504—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

From September 1, 1975 to August 31, 1976, did Canada import pork and, if so (a) in what quantity (b) at what price (c) from which countries?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports as follows: In the period September 1975 to August 1976 inclusive, Canada imported 146,149,900 pounds of pork for a value of $129,868,312, at an average cost of $.89 per pound. A breakdown of this total by supplying country appears on the table below:

Country	Qty (cwt.)	Value ($)	Price per Cwt. (100 lbs.)
United Kingdom	3,928	407,733	103.80
Ireland	1,869	277,207	148.32

STUDY OF HEALTH CARE PRODUCTS SECTOR

Question No. 796—Mr. Herbert:

What are the terms of reference and what is the objective of the study of the health care products sector being undertaken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The health care product sector is one of growing importance to Canada, having the capacity to make a significant contribution to the government's objective of improving the quality of life for all Canadians. Canadian consumption of health care products, which include medical supplies, equipment and devices as well as pharmaceuticals, is now well in excess of one billion dollars, nearly half of which is imported. Growth in consumption of health care products has been above the average of that of manufactured products and it is expected to continue this way. The objective of the study now being undertaken is to determine how the health care manufacturing sector in Canada can capitalize on domestic growth prospects and maximize its contribution to the Canadian economy through sound industrial development. The study outline has not yet been finalized but it is expected that the study will include, inter alia, the development of a profile of the Canadian industry, a determination of market trends by major product groups, an analysis of the international structure of the industry and how it exerts an influence on Canadian industrial development, an evaluation of the effects of the existing government policy environment on the industry and its development, and an identification of potential research, development and manufacturing opportunities. An in-depth study such as this will require very close cooperation from a number of federal departments, provincial governments and associations representing the private sector's participation in all phases of the study, including its definition, detailed analysis and identification of possible policy options and their impacts will be essential if the desired results are to be obtained.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—FINAL REPORT OF AIRPORT PLANNING COMMITTEE

Question No. 934—Mr. Reynolds:

1. How many copies of the final report of the Airport Planning Committee in British Columbia were produced?

2. Have any copies been distributed and, if so (a) in what manner (b) how many were free and to whom were they sent (c) how many were sold and by whom?

3. How many copies are still in inventory and where are they located?

4. Has the government received any requests from community associations or persons involved in the airport planning process for free copies that it is not able to fulfill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. There have been 3,000 copies of the Airport Planning Committee final report ordered and 3,015 delivered by the printer.

2. There have been 1,957 copies of the report distributed. It was agreed in the APC that Transport Canada would carry out the distribution: 2,000 were allocated for free distribution: 1,943 of the copies were distributed free by mail and vehicle delivery to the following:

	Number of copies
Staff members of the Tri-Level Committee	22
Senators and MP's from British Columbia	26
		48
APC Member Agencies
Air Carriers	31
B.C. Aviation Council	50
City of Vancouver	150
Community Forum	400
Department of Environment	50
Department of Public Works	10
Government of B.C.	100
Greater Vancouver Regional District	400
Ministry of State for Urban Affairs	25
Municipality of Richmond	100
Transport Canada	400
		1,716
Media	36
Libraries	90
Associations	10
Universities	43
		179
		1,943
Sold by Transport Canada on behalf of APC	14
Total distributed	1,957

3. Of the 1,000 copies allocated for sale, 986 copies remain in inventory at Transport Canada planning offices at Vancouver International Airport. Of the 2,000 copies which were allocated for free distribution there are approximately 75 left and these have been reserved to meet requests from members of parliament, libraries, universities, colleges, associations and the media.

4. The Community Forum requested 100 additional free copies but the request was not granted because they had previously been given 400 free copies consistent with their membership. We have stressed that there are some 90 copies available for reference in lower mainland public libraries and that copies are available both for reference and sale at our offices.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—TOLLS

Question No. 971—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government considering increases in the tolls charged by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, to what extent and on what date?

2. When the proposed higher tolls come into effect, will they, in the best estimate of the government, be sufficient to (a) enable the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to operate without incurring operating losses (b) to fully recover capital costs and, if not, to what extent, in the best estimate of the government, will the proposed toll increases fall short of achieving these goals in the first full year of operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1 and 2. The whole question of Seaway tolls is presently under consideration and discussion.

PAYROLL COSTS IN FRINGE BENEFITS

Question No. 1,000—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the percentage of payroll costs go in fringe benefits in 1975 for (a) manufacturing industries (b) non- manufacturing industries?

2. How were these benefits divided between (a) pension plans (b) unemployment insurance payments (c) other insurance payments (d) paid vacations (e) paid holidays (f) paid sick leave (g) workman's compensation (h) other benefits?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: 1 and 2. The information requested is not available in the form required.

ESTIMATED AMOUNT OF DIRECT INVESTMENT BY UNITED STATES COMPANIES IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,003—Mr. Herbert:

What is the estimated amount of direct investment (a) in actual dollars (b) in constant dollars by US companies in Canadian industry for the years (i) 1950 (ii) 1955 (iii) 1965 (iv) 1970 (v) each year since 1970?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: Estimates of United States direct investment in Canada are prepared on the basis of the current cost of the investments at the time they are made. The net inflow of United States direct investment during each of the following years is estimated at:

(millions of dollars)

202	317	421	628	599	457	423	615	535

Each year statistical reports are obtained showing the updated book value of direct investment as recorded in the accounts of companies in Canada in which there is direct investment. These statistical reports are based on the normal financial reporting system of the companies, compiled in accordance with accepted accounting principles. The year to year change in the book value of direct investment is affected not only by net direct investment inflows but also by net increases in undistributed earnings of the companies and other factors. The book valùe of United States direct investment in Canada at the end of the following years is estimated to be:

(millions of dollars)

3,426	6,513	14,059	21,100	22,443	23,679	26,113	28,996

An estimate on this basis is not yet available for 1975. Estimates of direct investment at constant prices are not prepared because the information that would be required in order to make such estimates is not available.

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION, FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,064—Mr. Howie:

1. Has any request for financial assistance for the construction of a highway bridge across the St. John River at Fredericton, New Brunswick been received from the Province since January 1, 1975 and, if so, what was the response?

2. How much was requested and how much, if any, was committed?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. The Fredericton bridge was included as part of a package, submitted to DREE on April 30, 1976, and intended to open program discussion on a proposed 5 year Highways Agreement. This project was not considered a high priority item within the context of the General Development Agreement objectives and was therefore not included in subsequent discussion documents.

2. (a) The project cost estimate contained in the submitted package totals $43 million over four years. (b) No commitment was made.

PUBLIC WORKS—TRANSFER, ACCOMMODATION COSTS

Question No. 1,071—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the Department of Public Works intend to transfer accommodation costs to the user departments and, if so, on what date?

2. (a) Of the $434,355,000 allowed for accommodation in the 1974-75 budgetary expenditures, what amount, by department, can be reallocated (b) apart from the cost of accommodation for the Department of Public Works, what are the reasons that any remaining balance cannot be similarly charged out?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): 1. As this question relates to a change in present government policy, it cannot be properly answered by Department of Public Works. Public Works, over the past few years, has recommended that accommodation costs be carried in the programs of the user departments. However, this recommendation has not been accepted and for 1976/77, generally only those departments/agencies operating from a revolving fund or otherwise required to pay for their services, are being charged by Department of Public Works for the space they occupy. All departments/agencies, however, presently pay for "tenant service" work carried out during their occupancy. In 1976/77, it is estimated that only approximately 10 per cent of Department of Public Works' Accommodation (Operating) program costs of $355 million will be recovered from other departments/agencies.

2. (a) and (b) The 1974/75 budgetary expenditures of $434,355,000 referred to in the question, represents the actual net expenditures for the Department of Public Works' Accommodation program:

	($000)	($000)
Operating expenditures	267,486
Less: Revenues	41,845
Net operating		225,641
Capital Expenditures		208,714
Total Accommodation (net)		434,355

Departmental records do not provide for a breakdown of these costs by department/agency. In the case of the Capital expenditures, it would not be proper to allocate costs incurred in one year for facilities that are designed to provide services for 25 years or more. The Department does have available however, a register showing the amount of space assigned to each department/agency, together with the cost of that space as calculated by the Department of Public Works. For example, the department on April 1, 1975 controlled a total of 75 million square feet for which we had established a rental valuation of $344 million.

PRODUCTION OF DAIRY PRODUCTS

Question No. 1,074—Mr. Halliday:

What was the production of (a) cheese (b) butter (c) powdered milk in (i) Ontario (ii) Quebec for each year 1971 to date?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports:

Production of Specified Dairy Products—1971-1975

ATLANTIC PROVINCE AIR SERVICES

Question No. 1,078—Mr. Howie:

1. On what date was the last public hearing of the Air Traffic Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission held in New Brunswick concerning air carriers supplying a service exclusively in the Maritime provinces and what applicants were before the Committee?

2. Has a decision been taken on the matter and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, have any of the applicants discontinued service while awaiting the decision?

3. Is an interim financial assistance available to any such applicants who discontinued service while awaiting the decision?

4. What assistance is available to such air carriers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: 1. The last public hearing of the Air Traffic Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission was held on June 11, 1976, on applications by Atlantic Central Airlines, Eastern Flying Service and Eastern Provincial Airways. (The hearing subsequently adjourned to Halifax and was completed there July 10.)

2. Yes. (a) Decisions were issued December 21, 1976. (b) There was no discontinuance of licensed service.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

1974-75 ESTIMATES—EMPLOYEE PENSION AND MEDICAL PLANS

Question No. 1,083—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the total amount contributed in the 1974-75 estimates to employee pension and medical plans?

2. What amount of this sum was not allocated to the user department and for what reason?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. $375,351,000. This amount comprises $256,206,000 shown in those Departments and Agencies whose employees come under the Public Service Staff Relations Act and $119,145,000 in the Estimates of the Treasury Board. There is in addition: (a) $318,915,000 contributions to the Defence Forces Pension Account; and (b) $32,698,000 contributions to the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Account.

2. $119,145,000 made up as follows: Public Service Pensions: (a) Public Service Death Benefit Account, $2,350,000; (b) Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, $32,000,000; (c) *Locally Engaged (Outside Canada) Pensions, $433,000; Public Service Insurance: (d) *Surgical-Medical and Other Insurance Premiums, $55,000,000; (e) Contributions to Unemployment Insurance Account, $36,000,000; (f) *Hospital Insurance (Outside Canada) Plan, $900,000; (g) *Health Insurance Plans for Employees Engaged Locally (Outside Canada), $55,000; Total: $126,738,000; Less Revolving Fund Recoveries, $7,593,000; Net total: $119,145,000. In 1973-74 Superannuation and Supplementary Retirement Benefits amounts were allocated to user departments. In 1975-76 a further distribution of Canada Pension Plan/Quebec Pension Plan and Death Benefit charges was made. It is planned in 1977-78 to allocate Unemployment Insurance employer contributions; this being made possible by amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which authorized the charges as a statutory payment. After 1977-78, the only undistributed items will be those shown above marked with an asterisk. These items will remain in Treasury Board Estimates as the authorizing legislation is provided in Treasury Board Vote 20. To allocate these to departments would require extended Vote wordings in each such department.

AIR CANADA PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,089—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1975, how many persons were added to the personnel of Air Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: Between January 1, 1975, and November 1976, the total number of employees decreased by 281.

PROJECTED ADDITIONAL COSTS FOR THE NEXT FISCAL YEAR FOR ALL INDEXED PROGRAMMES

Question No. 1,099—Mr. Herbert:

What are the projected additional costs for the next fiscal year for all programmes that are indexed in the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs for (a) anticipated normal growth (b) indexing at 8 per cent?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): The only programs whose costs are indexed are: Old Age Security Pensions and the Guaranteed Income Supplement—The payments are indexed quarterly based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index for a previous quarter (i.e. July to September for January; October to December for April; January to March for July; and April to June for October.) Family Allowances—These payments are indexed January each year and are based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index for the 12 month period ending in September of the previous year. War Veterans Allowances—These payments are indexed quarterly using the same formula as the OAS-GIS payments. Was Veterans Disability Pensions—These payments are indexed January each year using the same formula as Family Allowances. Training Allowances under the Occupational Training Program—These payments are indexed yearly in July using the increase in the average hourly earning in manufacturing for the previous year ending in June. Bill C-19, the Government Expenditure Restraint Act, would eliminate the indexing provision. Unemployment Insurance Benefits—The maximum payments are indexed yearly in January using the increase in the average earnings index. The actual increase in government costs depends on the unemployment experience. The costs for each of these items will be shown in the 1977-78 Main Estimates which are expected to be tabled in February, 1977.

UNEMPLOYMENT AS OF SEPTEMBER 30, 1976

Question No. 1,162—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

On September 30, 1976, what was the percentage of unemployment in the region of (a) Montreal (b) Quebec (c) the Eastern Townships (d) the South Coast (e) the lower St. Lawrence (f) the North Coast (g) Lac St-Jean (h) Northwestern Quebec?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports as follows: Estimates of the percentage of unemployment as of September 30, 1976, are not available for the regions specified. For the week ending September 18, 1976, Statistics Canada estimates of the percentage of unemployment for various regions of Quebec are as follows: Bas-St. Laurent-Gaspésie, 14.3; Saguenay-Lac St. Jean, 14.6; Québec, 9.0; Trois-Rivières, 11.9; Cantons de l'Est, 10.5; Montréal, 7.6; Outaouais, 9.4; Nouveau-Québec, Nord-Ouest, Côte-Nord, 10.5.

SEATRAIN LINES INC., NEW YORK—CONTAINERIZED CARGO BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Question No. 1,167—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government aware of the announced intention of Seatrain Lines Inc., of New York, to file new tariffs with the Federal Maritime Commission in the U.S., specifically designed to cause losses to the ports of Halifax, Saint John and Montreal, in respect of their handling of containerized cargo destined for or originating in the Midwestern United States and, if not, for what reason?

2. If the government is aware of Seatrain's intention, has it assessed the impact such a move would have on Canadian ports particularly if followed by other lines and has it prepared plans to offset any such losses and, if so, what (a) is the government's assessment (b) are the government's plans?

3. Has the government raised this matter with United States authorities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. The government is monitoring the movements of containerized cargo between Canada and the United States. The full impact of such possible development is not known yet.

3. No.

NUMBER OF PEOPLE RESIDING IN CANADA AS OF MARCH 31, 1976

Question No. 1,183—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

As of March 31, 1976, how many (a) male (b) female persons were there residing in Canada between the ages of (i) 0 to 18 years (ii) 19 to 25 years (iii) 26 to 40 years (iv) 41 to 50 years (v) 51 to 59 years?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports as follows: The approximate number of persons residing in Canada on April 1, 1976, by sex and by the requested age groups are set out below:

		(a) Males	(b) Females
(i)	0-18	4,072,300	3,887,200
(ii)	19-25	1,512,700	1,488,100
(iii)	26-40	2,397,700	2,343,800
(iv)	41-50	1,287,300	1,259,400
(v)	51-59	957,000	1,003,900

These figures have been arrived at by applying to the total Canadian population estimate on April 1, 1976, the same proportions as obtained in the estimate by age and sex on June 1, 1975.

IMPORTS OF DEHYDRATED PRODUCTS

Question No. 1,186—Mr. Loiselle:

Are any products dehydrated by atomization imported and, if so, which products?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: The commodity classification used by Statistics Canada to compile foreign trade statistics does not make a separate provision for imports of products dehydrated by atomization. Because of the relatively low volume of shipments, such products are included with other similar materials in general categories; consequently, they are not identifiable from the published totals.

CARGO SHIPPED THROUGH THE GROS CACOUNA HARBOUR SINCE 1972

Question No. 1,203—Mr. Forrestall:

What was the amount of cargo, in tons, shipped through the Gros Cacouna Harbour each year since 1972?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As there are presently no marine terminal facilities at Gros Cacouna, no cargo has been shipped through this harbour.

TRANSPORT—RENEWAL OF PILOTS PRIVILEGE

Question No. 1,205—Mr. Johnston:

1. Have any pilots over 40 years of age been discouraged from renewing their pilot's privilege because of the added expense and greatly increased inconvenience of having the electrocardiogram and subsequent tests and, if so, how many?

2. Have any pilots over 40 years of age, since the inception of these requirements, been assessed unfit to fly and, if so (a) how many (b) how many have successfully appealed the assessment?

3. Were any pilots over 40 years of age assessed unfit to fly in the two year period prior to the new ruling and, if so, how many?

4. What is the ratio of English/French speaking pilots (a) who have been assessed unfit to fly (b) presently under training for flight in Canada?

5. In the period 1972 to 1974, how many accidents involving aircraft (a) have been caused by the pilot suffering a "heart attack" (b) have involved pilots over 40 years of age (c) have been the result of the pilot suddenly being taken ill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. We have no way of knowing if any pilots over 40 years of age have been discouraged from renewing their pilot's privilege because of the added expense and greatly increased inconvenience of having the electrocardiogram and subsequent tests.

2. Yes. (a) statistics are not kept with respect to the number assessed unfit, or (b) the number of successful appeals.

3. Yes, but statistics in this regard are not kept.

4. Statistics are not kept of the ratio of English/French speaking pilots.

5. During the period 1972 to 1974 inclusive there were: (a) three accidents caused by a pilot suffering a heart attack; (b) 667 accidents involving pilots over 40 years of age; and (c) four accidents as a result of a pilot suddenly taken ill.

AEROSOL SPRAYS STUDIES

Question No. 1,220—Mr. Howie:

Are any studies underway or authorized by any government department, agency or consultant, into the effects of propellant gases used in aerosol sprays on the ozone layer of the atmosphere and, if so, which departments, agencies or firms are conducting such studies?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Yes, the Department of the Environment, Atmospheric Environment Service is the lead agency in Canada with a significant research effort in this area. Since 1974 Project STRATOPROBE utilizes high altitude balloon platforms to obtain comprehensive measurements of key stratospheric constituents involved in the chemistry of the ozone layer in order to test stratospheric pollution models. A latitude-dependent, computer model to simulate the effects of freons on the ozone layer has been developed. Additional modelling and experimental research in Canadian universities is presently being supported. BOMEN Inc. of Ste Foy, P.Q. also take part in the experimentation and SED Systems Ltd of Saskatoon, Sask. provide payload engineering and field support.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—SECOND PARALLEL RUNWAY

Question No. 1,227—Mr. Leggatt:

1. Since the January 1976 summary report by the Ecological Sub-Committee for the Vancouver International Airport Planning Committee, did the Department of Transport suggest that a second parallel airport runway might be possible as an alternative and, if so, are any studies, environmental assessments or evaluations now under way regarding concepts for a second parallel runway?

2. Has the Department of the Environment received any referrals from the Department of Transport for the consideration of any new development concepts for a second parallel runway at Vancouver International Airport and, if so, what specific concepts have been referred?

[Mr. Johnston.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. I announced on August 12, 1976 that there would be a two year delay in making a decision on this proposal. During this period the proposal will be subjected to the Federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process.

2. The proposal that the parallel runway be constructed within the dyke at Vancouver International Airport has been referred to the Department of the Environment. Drawings and other information related to the runway proposal have been forwarded to the Chairman of the Environmental Panel.

TRANSPORT—CHARTERS TO RIVTOW STRAITS FOR PROVISION OF PASSENGERS AND FREIGHT SERVICE

Question No. 1,260—Mr. Leggatt:

1. Are there guidelines and service requirements under the Department of Transport charters to Rivtow Straits for the provision of passenger and freight service on the British Columbia coast and, if so, what are they?

2. What commitment, if any, did federal authorities receive from Rivtow Straits in regard to tariff charges for freight and passenger service or the granting of their charters?

3. What subsidy, if any, is paid by the (a) federal (b) provincial authorities to (i) Rivtow Straits (ii) Coast Ferries Limited?

4. What was the date of the last inspection by the Department of Transport of the vessel Malibu Princess now serving Prince Rupert to Masset?

5. What are the names and addresses of the Directors and shareholders of Rivtow Straits Limited?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. A service contract in respect of passenger service between Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte Islands is being developed by the Canadian Transport Commission.

2. No committments were given other than Rivtow Straits public announcement that it would offer freight service to any port of call abandoned by Northland and not already served by Rivtow Straits, at Northland's published tariff whilst experience was gained in traffic quantity and mix.

3. (a) (i) None yet. CTC negotiating in respect of passenger movements to Queen Charlotte Islands. (ii) None. (b) (i) Not known. (ii) Not known.

4. November 25, 1976.

5. Not known.

SULPHUR EMISSIONS

Question No. 1,278—Mr. Leggatt:

1. Are there regulations currently in effect to control sulfur emissions into the atmosphere (under the Clean Air Act) by oil and coal burning electric generating plants?

2. Does the government in any way finance or subsidize the development and installation of flue-gas desulfurization units designed for thermal-electric generating plants?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. There are no regulations currently in effect under the Clean Air Act to control emissions of sulphur oxides from oil and coal burning electric generating plants. The Clean Air Act does not give the federal government direct control over emissions of an air pollutant unless it is a significant danger to health. The Department of National Health and Welfare has not, at this time, declared sulphur dioxide to be an air pollutant presenting a significant danger to the health of persons. However, current consideration is being given to a regulation limiting the sulphur content in fuels, under Fuel Provisions of the Clean Air Act. This would have the effect of controlling sulphur emissions from electric generating plants in the same way as direct emission control limit. Also under preparation is a National Emission Guideline for the Thermal Power Generating Industry with stated limits on sulphur dioxide emissions.

2. There is no direct subsidy program for pollution control equipment such as flue gas desulphurization units for thermal-electric power plants. However, the government does have a funding program for the Demonstration of Pollution Abatement Technology (DPAT). This program could be used to cost share under contract with an industry, the demonstration of new flue gas desulphurization technology. These funds, however would normally be restricted to one installation of a type. Under the program, the technology then becomes available for use by all similar plants in Canada. Flue gas desulphurization units would also qualify for the Accelerated Capital Cost Allowance program that allows fast write-off of money spent on pollution control equipment.

TAXABLE INCOMES IN EXCESS OF $100,000 FOR 1975

Question No. 1,313—Mr. Herbert:

For the 1975 taxation year, how many persons declared taxable incomes in excess of $100,000 in (a) Canada (b) each province?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Statistics for the 1975 taxation year will not be available until approximately July 1, 1977

1976-77 PROMOTIONAL PROJECTS—EUROPEAN REGION

Question No. 1,327—Mr. McKenzie:

What was the cost of project number (a) 76-676 (April 1976) (b) 76-975 (April 1976) (c) 76-689 (April 1976) (d) 76-690 (April 1976) (e) 76-680 (May 1976) (f) 76-640 (June 1976) (g) 76-710 (June 1976) (h) 76-729 (September 1976) (i) 76-976 (September 1976) (j) 76-623 (September 1976) (k) 76-634 (September 1976) (l) 76-685 (October 1976) (m) 76-667 (November 1976) (n) 76-726 (November 1976) of the European Division of the Office of Export Programs and Services and, in each case, what was its purpose?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The projects specified are a part of the annual trade fair program carried out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Question No. 1,328—Mr. McKenzie:

What was the cost of project number (a) 76/633 (May 1976) (b) 76/627 (May 1976) (c) 76/716 (August 1976) (d) 76/697 (September 1976) (e) 76/699 (September 1976) (f) 76/714 (September 1976) (g) 76/981 (September 1976) (h) 76/696 (October 1976) (i) 76/694 (October 1976) (j) 76/695 (October 1976) (k) 76/732 (November 1976) of the Pacific, Asia and Africa Division of the Office of Export Programs and Services and, in each case, what was its purpose?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The projects specified are a part of the annual trade fair program carried out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This program permits Canadian companies to promote their products and services in foreign markets; appoint representatives and distributors; become aware of the technological progress in their spheres of industrial activity; seek out joint ventures abroad; and to assess the competition. The specific purpose and cost of the projects which have been identified in the Pacific, Asia and Africa Region are as follows:

APPLICATION BY BRITISH AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY RELATING TO PURCHASE OF THE GRISSOL COMPANY

Question No. 1,390—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Was an application filed under the Foreign Investment Review Act with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce by the British-American Tobacco Company with regard to the purchase by the company of the Grissol

Company, which manufactures Viau biscuits and candies and, if so (a) have the provisions of the Act been applied or will they be applied (b) if the application was accepted, on what date did the Minister approve the transaction?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: Imasco Limited, a subsidiary of British American Tobacco Company, acquired control of Grissol Foods Limited in May 1972. As the provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act pertaining to the acquisition of control of Canadian business enterprises by non-residents did not come into force until April 9, 1974, and as they did not apply retroactively, the above noted acquisition was not subject to review under the Foreign Investment Review Act.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 3, consideration in committee of Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening, clause 24 was under consideration. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There have been some discussions about five amendments which the government would like to put forward to take account of representations received with regard to the bill. I believe there was agreement that we might for the moment stand clause 24 and the intervening clauses so that I might have an opportunity of moving those amendments. After that, we would come back to clause 24 and continue the debate.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The first of the amendments has to do with clause 31(1). My colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, has been kind enough to offer to move it on my behalf.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Chairman, I move:

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding thereto immediately after line 12 on page 33 the following clause:

31.1 (1) Paragraph 82(1)(b) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) where the taxpayer is an individual, other than a trust which is a registered charity, ½ of the aggregate of all amounts described in paragraph (a) received by him in the year from taxable Canadian corporations".

(2) This section is applicable to the 1977 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment is in both official languages.

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps we might move on, pursuant to the special agreement, to clause 71. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has been showing equal enthusiasm about this amendment, and he would like to move it as well.

Mr. Lessard: My hon. friend knows I am always happy to support him when he is presenting proposals which are in the interests of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I move that Bill C-22 be amended as follows:

(a) by adding thereto immediately after line 13 on page 94, the following subsection:

"7.1) Paragraph 212(14)(c) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(c) he is

(i) a person who is or would be, if he were resident in Canada, exempt from tax under section 149,

(ii) a trust or corporation established or incorporated principally in connection with, or the principal purposes of which is to administer or provided benefits under, one or more superannuation, pension or retirement funds or plans or any funds or plans established to provide employee benefits, or

(iii) a trust, corporation or other organization constituted and operated exclusively for charitable purposes, no part of the income of which is payable to, or is otherwise available for, the personal benefit of any proprietor, member, shareholder, trustee or settler thereof.";

and

(b) by adding thereto immediately after line 26 on page 94, the following subsection:

"(13) Subsection (7.1) is applicable to the 1977 and subsequent taxation years."

Mr. Chairman, I move that Bill C-22 be amended by striking out lines 45 and 46 on page 97 and lines 1 to 15 on page 98 and substituting the following:

"(4) Clauses 219(7)(c)(iii)(A) and (B) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(A) where the owner is a life insurer resident in Canada, the maximum value thereof as determined for the purposes of the relevant authority, and

(B) in any other case, the maximum value thereof as it would be determined for the purposes of the relevant authority if the owner had been a life insurer resident in Canada and registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to carry on an insurance business in Canada."

(a) by striking out line 1 on page 101 and substituting the following:

"80. (1) Section 26 of the said Rules is amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (8.2) thereof, the following subsection:

"(8.3) Where a corporation resident in Canada has, after 1971, received a stock dividend in respect of a share owned by it on December 31, 1971 of the capital stock of a foreign affiliate of that corporation and the share or shares received as the stock dividend are identical to the share in respect of which the stock dividend was received, the share or shares received as such stock dividend may, at the option of the corporation, be deemed for the purposes of paragraph (3)(c) and subsection (8) to be capital property owned by it on December 31, 1971 and not to be property acquired by the corporation after 1971 for the purposes of paragraph (8)(c)."

(1.1) Paragraph 26(12)(d) of the " ; and

(b) by striking out lines 35 and 36 on page 101 and substituting the following:

"(4) Subsections (1) and (3) are applicable to the 1972 and subsequent taxation years."

● (1240)

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: If I may suggest to members of the committee, shall we adopt these amendments as we go along?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, just put them on the record.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Chairman, I move that Bill C-22 be amended by striking out Item 2, on page 111 and substituting the following:

The expression "registered charity" shall be substituted for the expression "registered Canadian charitable organization" wherever the latter expression appears in subclause 56(1)(a)(i)(C)(I), subparagraph 81(1)(j)(i), paragraphs 104(15)(b) and (c), paragraph 110(1)(a), subsections 110(3), 168(1) and (2), paragraphs 172(3)(a), 172(4)(a) and 180(1)(b) and subsection 230(2)."

[English]

That makes it more clear, more precise.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Would the minister advise whether he has withdrawn what had been suggested as an amendment to clause 40 in a group of amendments given to me late in November?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. My understanding is that the clause 40 amendment is of such a character that it could be amended by the table in the course of reprinting the bill. On the basis of that advice, I have withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Secondly, Mr. Chairman, I am subject to correction here, but I think the minister's colleague may have inadvertently left out a whole line in his reading of the French version of the clause 80 amendment at page 101. So whilst the amendment was noted, I think there may be a difference between the manuscript copy of the amendment and that which might appear in Hansard. It refers to subsection 1.1, paragraph 26(12)(d), which is the final line of the amendment, and I do not think it was read.

[Mr. Lessard.]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Chairman, I suggest I would have read that amendment if I had seen it. I think I did read it.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, in view of the agreement of the House to take a look at these amendments, which might not have reached your attention because of the imposition of closure, I should like to bring a matter to the minister's attention in the line of an amendment. We may not reach the section because of closure, but it seems to me to be a very important matter. The minister may have been considering an amendment along this line, in which case I should like to bring the matter to his attention now and find out what his plans are.

What I am referring to is a practice that seems to be a racket which has developed with registered retirement savings plans. A spouse goes to a financial institution and deposits an amount of money, which could be $1,000, $2,000 or, when the bill passes, a larger amount. The spouse for whom the money is deposited has no taxable income. Then the next day the spouse who does have taxable income withdraws the amount of money that was placed in the financial institution, pays a nominal administration fee for having taken out a registered retirement savings plan, which can be with a trust company or other financial institution, and then is able to use it to lessen their income tax liability.

I understand this matter has been brought to the attention of the finance department and is being reviewed. Therefore, I ask the minister whether the matter has been brought to his attention and whether it is possible under the act for someone to behave in this way. If so, does he intend to move an amendment to close this loophole and prevent this kind of rip-off from taking place? If I have not made myself clear, I would be very happy to repeat this procedure which has been brought to my attention.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I can advise the hon. member that the matter is under consideration. I am not sure that the consideration is mature enough that we have an amendment to move at this point, but it is a question we are taking into consideration for the next budget in several months' time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We understand at the table that clauses 24 to 30 were stood. Is that correct?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Only for the purpose of putting amendments.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I understood it, Mr. Chairman, the intervening clauses were stood for the purpose of my putting the amendments. We have now returned to clause 24.

● (1250)

On clause 24.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, may I continue with this matter? I beg your indulgence and the indulgence of the committee in this regard for the same reason we accorded the courtesy to the minister to allow him to place his amendments.

I think this is a terribly important matter which needs to be cleared up, and since it relates to amendments generally the committee has been disposed to standing certain things in order to deal with possible amendments before it. I would like to take up this matter until we can get some kind of answer from the minister, because it seems to me that this is an incredible kind of loophole and that people will be able to indulge in an incredible racket if in fact it is so.

It seems that the minister has implied in his statements that in fact some people can work a racket under the income tax law because of the way it is written now. This is what I want to know from the minister. Is it taking place, and, if so, I think the House needs some assurance that this will not be dealt with in the next budget but will be dealt with right now. I raise it today because we still have an hour or so to debate this matter on Monday. Over the weekend the minister and his officials could glance at the appropriate clauses and draft an amendment.

We could stand the debate at a certain point on Monday and have this amendment introduced. Since the House has been disposed to go along with this procedure, we could close this loophole. Aside from the general objections we have been raising to the disproportionate benefits that the wealthy are getting from this bill, to allow them this kind of loophole and to allow them to work this kind of racket compounds the injustice. I think we really need some kind of answer from the minister.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the assessment that I have received of the situation is that if such a procedure is possible—and I gather from conversations with Revenue Canada that they are not totally satisfied that it can be done from a legal standpoint—the possible exposure of the fiscal authorities in this particular situation is quite limited. So there are really two elements to be considered: the first is that some question has been raised as to whether this can be done legally, and the second is the more practical consideration that if it can, how much is involved in terms of the tax laws? On the other hand, the problem which has arisen is to resolve the kind of question the hon. member raised, that is, to find some effective means of dealing with the situation if there is any loophole in that regard. The judgment in this regard has not yet matured, but the feeling is that the risk involved is not substantial.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, certainly the minister's answer cannot be acceptable. His argument is that they are not quite sure whether or not it is legal. In fact, people are doing it and are assuming it is legal. They are getting advice to do it, and trust companies are going along with it. Obviously, they have had a look at the legal implications. The fact that relatively few people are doing it and, therefore, because there is not that much of a loss to the treasury, it should be overlooked, seems a pretty shaky argument for the Minister of Finance to make.

As to the remedy, I do not pose as an expert in drafting legislation. Certainly, one of the things that could be done to close this loophole is to say that these registered retirement savings plans have to be held for a specific period of time in order to avoid this one day in, the next day out, practice to get the benefit. Who is going to do it? It certainly will not be my steelworker who will do it. The guy who will do it is one who can get good tax lawyers and accountants to give him advice on how it can be worked. People in the highest income tax brackets will take advantage of the situation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Don't kid yourself; it is practised by others, too.

Mr. Saltsman: I am glad it is now being confirmed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I do not really pay too much attention to what the minister's advisers tell me, competent as they are, but when the hon. member for Edmonton West intervenes to tell me that it is so, I take it as being so.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Loopholes are not only for the wealthiest taxpayers. If there is one, it is used by others.

Mr. Saltsman: If a poor man had $11,000 worth of savings with which he could move through these loopholes, I would accept it. But I do not care whether it is the poor or the rich who use it: it is wrong to have this kind of loophole; and to say it does not cost the treasury a great deal is wrong. This is a racket, and I think it is our obligation to make sure that a loophole that permits this kind of racket is stopped before this bill goes through. I think the minister should give the House some assurance that he will do something about it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The comment I just made is that I think the hon. gentleman is exaggerating the problem. He says he knows lots of people who are doing it. There are lots of people who may be going ahead and doing other things under the tax law, but they wind up having themselves reassessed. So the fact that someone makes a mistake in his judgment of the tax law may involve him in due course in the payment of more tax. As I have said, the question has been recognized. There has been some discussion as to whether or not the advice which private parties have been taking is well given. The hon. gentleman suggests there would be a massive leak from Revenue Canada in this regard. Certainly that is not the feeling held by my advisers.

Mr. Saltsman: I rise on another point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not suggest for one moment that there is a massive attack on the treasury. I accepted the minister's statement that while this may not constitute a very large loss to the treasury, that was not my point. My point was that it was dishonest and a loophole. Despite the assurance of the minister that it would not cost the treasury very much, it is a bad thing for the government to allow. This was the point I was making. I would like a statement from the minister at least to that extent. He says that they are liable to find themselves in trouble if they take this advice. Is there anything in this legislation which makes illegal the kind of practice I brought to the attention of the minister?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is the question I asked of Revenue Canada, and it is apparently their opinion that it is illegal.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): In view of the short time that is left, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may call it one o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: It being 1 p.m., I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at one o'clock, clause 24 was under consideration, and the hon. member for Timmins had the floor.

On clause 24.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, after I read clause 24 of Bill C-22 I requested some explanations from the minister's officials with regard to the meaning of the clause and its implications. I wonder if the minister could enlarge on those explanations today so that the matter can be clear in my mind. The officials of the minister's department indicated to me that this clause is to allow all taxpayers to deduct in the year in which they are incurred 100 per cent of their exploration expenses.

In a subsequent paragraph in the letter I received from the officials the only thing that is mentioned with regard to the Canadian development expense account is the acquisition of Canadian resource property. I would like the minister to confirm that both the acquisition of a property and the additional exploration expenses which are added to that acquisition go to what is called the Canadian development expense account in order to establish the value of that property or the cost of that property to the investor.

Second, I would like the minister to confirm that the exploration expenses are treated as an income allowance rather than as a revenue allowance and therefore are not recoverable on the disposal of the property, like depreciation or capital cost allowances. In other words, normally when a piece of equipment or property is sold, the capital cost allowance is recoverable by the government or the tax system. I would like to confirm that this is not so with regard to the exploration expenses which are added to the acquisition of a property.

Finally, at the time of disposal of a property, I would like to know whether the difference between the income from the property and the cost which has been entered in the Canadian development expense account is the profit, and I would like to have the minister confirm whether that profit is considered as a capital gain or as normal income. I hope it would be a capital gain, because I think there is justification for it. If it is normal income, I would like the minister to confirm whether there is not justification for differentiating between the source of that income, whether it is a normal development corporation, whether the main business of the corporation involved is exploration and development, or what have you. I think there should be a difference if the investment is simply an incidental one, if it involves just a small individual or a small corporation which has invested in the acquisition and development of such a property, and if it is not its normal business and it is just to help in the development of resources in Canada.

The law as it presently stands indicates that if payment for a mineral property, for instance, is made in shares, that is considered a capital gain; but if payment is made in cash, it is considered normal income. I suggest that there is some confusion there. I placed this matter before the former minister. It was my view that the designation of revenues as capital gains or normal income should not be determined by the source or the kind of payment—whether it be shares or cash—but rather by the type of transaction. I put this to the former minister. I should now like to put it to the hon. minister opposite and urge him to consider that the revenue derived from the sale of property should not be determined by whether it is shares or cash but, rather, by the type of transaction.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, on the first question raised by the hon. member, I can confirm that in our judgment both the acquisition cost of additional exploration and development expenses would be deductible for the purpose of this exemption. On the third question, my understanding is—and this is from the application of the law under the principal business exception—that this in the normal course will be treated as normal income rather than capital gain. On the second question, I just cannot remember offhand whether there is a recapture upon disposal or not. I am afraid the best I can do is undertake to make an inquiry and respond further. I cannot give a tax opinion this afternoon, but if the hon. member wants to make a representation on the point I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, if I may, I again make a small plea to the minister with regard to capital gains. If the property registered in the Canadian development expense account is sold, under the present laws the revenue derived therefrom, if paid in shares, would become capital gains, so there is a difference there that presents some confusion. Maybe the minister could look into this matter at the same time and see if the confusion could be cleared up.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am quite prepared to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I am glad, generally, to see clauses 24, 25 and 26 because they are aiming at removal of the principal occupation rule. It was rather interesting yesterday evening to hear the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie engage in a full-scale attack upon Imperial Oil. As it is a principal occupation business corporation, I suggest the whole exercise of his speech was totally irrelevant and had no application whatsoever to this proposal in the Income Tax Act.

It is rather interesting that we are celebrating this month the thirtieth anniversary of the discovery of LeDuc No. 1 which opened up the Alberta oil development industry. It is unfortunate that at that time and up to now the principal occupation rule had any place in the Income Tax Act. I recall a period of ten years when there was still room for the small-time operators and people who were in the oil development business to acquire freehold leases or overrides on the royalties, that it was always guaranteed that in about 80 per cent of the cases Canadians were outbid by Americans. Leasehounds and agents of American investors were in on the oil patch like flies around a honey-pot. That was to be expected. After all, there was no expertise in Canada for the development of oil fields. The drillers, equipment dealers and those with any knowledge of developing oil came from the United States in the same way they moved from Canada elsewhere when the oil play was over in the prairies.

One of the difficulties was that, say, a Canadian syndicate wanted to drill a D-2 well which would require $70,000 to $85,000: it could be made up of a couple of farmers, a garage owner, a druggist, a doctor, or whoever wanted to get together in a partnership and put up $10,000 or $15,000. Unfortunately, oil well drilling is a highly speculative business. Three holes out of four holes drilled could be dry. Up to a few years ago the law has consistently been that the recovery of drilling expenses could only be made against the revenue of any producing wells. If there were no producing wells, the money was gone.

Of course, dry wells took up as much money as producing wells. Our American friends, under American law, could offset their lost drilling expenses against ordinary income and therefore recover and recycle into what you might call exploratory working capital the allowances that they could make against ordinary income. Many persons, including myself, tried to convince the Canadian government to do this through ministers of finance and their advisers who unfortunately had a "made in central Canada" bent of mind and did not understand the oil business and rejected these proposals year in and year out.

A few years ago, in a two-step operation, up to 30 per cent was allowed and now the minister proposes to increase that to 100 per cent. I want to congratulate the minister and his officials on this. Maybe the fact that there is now a deputy minister who worked a long time in Saskatchewan helped in this regard. In any case, I commend the government even though it is pretty well locking the stable door after all but the last horse has been stolen.

I should now like to hear from the minister whether clauses 24 and 25 will effectively allow an individual or corporation who is not in the petroleum development business to write off 100 per cent of its contributions to exploration and development against income other than that arising out of the production of oil and gas. Or is there some residual formula which would phase it out over a number of years?

• (1420)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the amendment is only applicable for a trial period. That is, it will apply to investments made during the trial period. Otherwise, a taxpayer in that situation will be treated in exactly the same way as a principal business taxpayer in the sense that he can apply this expenditure entirely to income.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, am I correct in assuming that the trial period is to run for three years?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, yes, up to July, 1979. It started last May.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask another question about the trial period, Mr. Chairman? Does the minister envisage a continuing review, because once we reach the last year of the trial period there could be great uncertainty as to whether it will be continued, and that uncertainty, quite naturally, would inhibit future development plans?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I recognize that. The trial period has been instituted really for the purpose of seeing how effective we shall be in attracting exploration. We are having some early success and there is some indication already that funds are being used in this way. We shall want to overcome the potential hiatus which could occur as we approach the anniversary date.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, sir.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, the present measure is an about-face on the part of the government. Over the years, at least ever since I have been a member of this House, the government has been most reluctant to make available to the oil, gas and mining industries the benefit of the principal income clause. I remember many years ago being asked to invest in an oil well. At that time I did not have any money, but two or three years later I asked if I could invest because I was interested in an investment which I considered about as safe as a horse race. The person who had earlier asked me to invest had drilled some oil wells himself. He said that there was no money in oil, that the government had enacted a certain law with regard to principal income, and there was not much point in investing in an Alberta oil well. Actually, I was interested in an oil well in the Lloydminster field. A few years ago the then minister of finance—Mr. Benson I think—amended the tax act and allowed deductions of up to 30 per cent. At least that was a good start. But you had to wait for about five years before you got your money back if you invested in certain resource industries.

Without doubt, the existence of the particular section of the act we are now discussing is largely responsible for the predominant American ownership of the oil industry in western Canada. Unless that law is changed, the outlook for oil and gas drilling in this country will not be good. At least it will not be easy for individuals to become part owners of oil wells. Unfortunately, Canadian oil, gas and mining industries are not doing as well as they should. I understand that for the first time in many years, this year no new mine has been opened in Ontario. In northern Manitoba a good many mines have closed or are closing, and activity is at a low level. I understand that only one diamond drilling outfit is operating in northern Manitoba, whereas normally you would see between 30 and 40 operating there. Companies in this field seem to have moved their operations across the border. One cannot blame the federal government entirely for this, although to some extent the controversy between the provincial and federal governments has led to the slowdown in investment in our oil, gas and mining industries.

We have often been told that we must spend a great deal of money if we are to be self-reliant in energy. One hears talk of self-reliance in the mining field by 1985 or some time in the future. I shall make two or three points and then sit down. I was much taken by something the Canada West Foundation in Calgary said recently. It had some things to say about the implementation of guidelines for national resource policies which should be established for the country's long-term interest. For example, it was proposed that the general structure and basic level of taxes imposed on the non-renewable resource sector should be reassessed by provincial and federal governments acting together. It was also proposed that a single definition of resource income directly related to ability to pay and mutually acceptable to federal and provincial governments should serve as a basis for all income-related taxes.

Mr. Chairman, federal and provincial people are still not sitting down with a clearcut policy in mind. They are still confronting one another, and confrontation is hardly in the national interest. Although certain amendments to the tax act are welcome, I suggest that until the federal and provincial governments decide on a single, reasonable, uniform taxation policy with regard to our resources, we shall not advance much.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the hon. member for Edmonton West and was struck by how we can look at the same set of facts and come to different conclusions about them. The act we are discussing has been in existence for a long time. I suspect that it would not be quite the same as it now is if the hon. member for Edmonton West and I had not served in this House at the same time.

I want to talk about the oil industry and raise some questions. The government is introducing measures similar to those which were discredited in the past. Essentially, the government's measures are designed to encourage, by the provision of depletion allowances and write-offs of various kinds, excessive exploration and overinvestment in the oil industry. We are going to wind up being back in our old position, although under somewhat different circumstances.

The hon. member for Edmonton West drew on his profound experience and knowledge of the oil industry and said that the United States has offered many advantages to its investors which our country has not offered our investors. That is only half the story. At one time we offered as many advantages to investors within the industry as the United States has been offering.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not at all.

Mr. Saltsman: The truth is that the advantages the United States has offered its investors has been an ongoing scandal in that country and members of Congress and the United States Senate have continually risen to denounce the concessions made over the years to the oil industry.

Let us consider what has happened to the oil industry in Canada. What has been the result of concessions which the Alberta government and other governments have given to the oil industry in order to encourage it to look for oil? The conclusion we must come to from an examination of the figures is that we so stimulated the oil industry to produce that we had oil coming out of our ears. We literally gave it away because we could not do anything else with it. We had to give it away. Then, when we needed the oil, we did not have it.

Let us consider how we have encouraged exploration in Canada. What has been the history of exploration? We encouraged exploration and drilling so much, particularly in Alberta, that we produced a glut of oil. We could not use for ourselves all our own oil coming out of our wells; ultimately, we prorated the production of those wells. Wells were forced to operate at between 30 per cent and 35 per cent of capacity because we could not use all our own oil. There was no market for it. What did we do? We said we must export our oil. We pleaded with the United States to take it. Our National Energy Board, acting under our national oil policy, allowed us to sell oil to the United States at between $1.50 and $2 per barrel. Nobody had any conception that this is a finite resource, that there is just so much oil in the ground and when it is gone it is gone. We did that for about ten years, only to discover to our horror that all the information on proven and potential resources that had been given to us by the oil companies was just a pack of lies. It was not true. We found ourselves in a crisis.

When the OPEC countries decided to raise their price and put the squeeze on Canada, we were vulnerable. That is what stimulation through taxation in the oil industry did for us. It left us exposed. It encouraged an overproduction of a commodity that would have been better left in the ground until needed in the future. We need it today and we will need it in the future.

I see the same situation with regard to this method. There is no future. We cannot solve future energy problems by pulling the oil out as rapidly as possible. As a matter of fact, it would probably be most useful if we left the oil in the ground and used it for petrochemicals in the future, rather than burning it now in our furnaces and refineries.

We are kidding ourselves. How long will the oil last? Supposing we do find some—how much will it be? We have already taken most of it out of the ground. It is very difficult to find, and what we do find is in small amounts. However, we go ahead with the same kind of pattern that created disaster for us in the past and will lead to disaster in the future. When the time comes when it will be needed for the petrochemical industry in Alberta, it will not be there. Alberta is doing very well today. I am pleased that it is doing well. However, the people of Alberta know they are dealing with a finite resource. They know they have to husband that resource in a particular way in order to have a prolonged and ongoing industry, particularly in petrochemicals.

What do we do? We tell the oil companies to go there, find the oil, use it and get rid of it as quickly as they can. What shortsightedness; what foolishness! Rather than encouraging the finding and production of this resource, we should be discouraging it in order to save it for the future. Future generations will look upon us as having been the most stupid people on the face of the earth because of what we are doing with our resources. It took billions and billions of years for that small amount of oil to be produced and settle itself in pools in the ground. We have taken only one generation, two at the most, to deplete that resource of billions of years, leaving virtually nothing for future generations. It is tax measures of this kind which have assisted this despoiling of our resources.

Going back to the situation in Alberta, I ask the hon. member for Edmonton West whether, in retrospect, it would not have been better to provide less encouragement to production in those early years. The production was going to take place anyway. Suppose we had not produced that oil as quickly as we did. We would not have had to export it. We would not have had to look for markets outside our own country. We would have had a supply of oil for the future infinitely greater and more valuable today, instead of giving it away for what we did. It was a foolish policy.

How did the hon. member for Edmonton West view that kind of approach? I am sure there are many people in his province of Alberta who see the folly of that kind of policy. I am sure they would have preferred a gradual development based on Canada's needs, rather than based on investors pulling out as much as they could in order to make a fast buck. I see the hon. member for Edmonton West shakes his head. After that lesson, has he not learned anything about the use of resources? I see he wants to rise and reply. I am quite prepared to yield the floor to the hon. member for Edmonton West, if he wishes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I will make a short comment. This is not a debate on oil development policy. As a quick observation, I will say that hindsight sometimes is a very cheap commodity and the conclusions based upon it are just as valuable.

Mr. Saltsman: I agree that it is very easy to have hindsight and to come to some conclusion about hindsight. The point I am trying to make to the hon. member for Edmonton West and, hopefully, to the hon. minister is, let us not repeat the same mistake. In those days, the same sense of urgency arose and the same speeches were made. We had to bonus the investor to explore and produce oil, thinking that today was the only framework in which we were to operate, that there was not going to be a tomorrow. That is the point I am trying to make. Let us not repeat the same stupid error we committed in the oil industry in the past.

This is a bad piece of legislation, one that I personally am not prepared to vote for. What would we accomplish doing this? We would probably make some people very rich. We would allow them to shelter a lot of their tax through exploration. I could perhaps even go along with that, if it were the only way of doing it. I do not say that I would like it, but if there was a compelling need, we had to have the oil immediately, and something would happen if we did not, and that the oil today would be more important now than in the future, we would have to cut some corners. If we had to drop some equity in our tax system to accomplish that, I could understand it. I may not like it, but I could understand it.

However, when we drop equity and provide an enormous bonus to the wealthy of Canada to find a tax shelter through exploration, damaging the country at the same time by their activities, that is an outstanding example of insanity. Let me read to the committee what has been said about this situation. I quote from the Financial Times of November 8, 1976. The article talks about units sold by Midland Doherty Limited acting as agent for Ranchmens:

> Minimum subscription is $10,000 with increments of $5,000. The issue and its pricing is deliberately designed to appeal to investors in 50 per cent and up tax brackets.

That is who it is designed for. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West will not repeat his speech of the other day and say that this is something for the little man. It is obvious that those who stand to benefit most from this kind of investment are those who have tax liabilities and cannot find loopholes. Therefore, the government has opened up a new one for them. They can invest in the oil exploration industry and write off the total cost of their investment in oil exploration and production against their tax liability. Later they will come back here to us or other legislators who may be around and use what they got for nothing from tax money as a cost basis for determining what they should get for oil. In other words, the oil companies will do as they are doing now. They will say they need more money because it costs so much to produce oil. They will not say that what they are claiming as costs were in fact depreciation and depletion allowances which were bonuses from the various levels of government. They do not pay for them. It is money saved in the tax system.

● (1440)

At some point I should like to ask the minister whether these benefits which are being given to investors in the oil industry will some day form a cost basis for them, whether that will be recognized as a cost basis despite the fact that the money really came through a savings in the tax system—not all the money, but a substantial part of it: for instance, if taxpayers are in the 50 per cent tax bracket and they invest $100 in the oil industry, then they have invested $50 and the government has invested $50 and it is an investment on the part of the government, because it is not as though the government had no alternative, the government could collect the tax from people in the 50 per cent bracket and divert it to Petro-Can. We can do our own financing. We can do our own exploration. After all, I presume that was what Petro-Can was set up for. Petro-Can is capable of doing it. If it is not capable of doing so, it can certainly be the entrepreneur. It can hire drillers in the same way as somebody in Texas can hire drillers, or somebody from Bay Street, Toronto.

So it is really being done with our money, and later on they will not come back and say the cost basis upon which we think the oil should be priced is 50-cent dollars. They will say it is $1 dollars and they will want a return on that amount even though half the risk and half the investment came from the people of Canada.

The point to make about depriving the federal treasury of revenue at this level is that there is no such thing as income tax avoidance. The extent to which one group of people does not pay the tax it should means that another group of Canadians has to make up for it. So the oil investment bonanza becomes a burden to the small taxpayers.

Hon. members in the Conservative party will say," It doesn't have to be that way; we can reduce government expenditures instead." Well, of course, we could reduce old age pensions and family allowances and achieve the same result, but I am sure that is not what we want to do, and that is not going to happen because the people are not going to let it happen. But this kind of thing does happen because it is not highly visible, it is not obvious; it gets buried in the tax system, this great subsidy to the rich of Canada, and the subsidy which is paid to them has to be made up by the smaller taxpayers.

Let me continue by quoting from an article by Jack McArthur which appeared in the Toronto Star of December 16, 1976:

> When you fear for Canada's future and wish you had less money tied up in Quebec ... when profits have gone flat in the manufacturing of cigarettes, booze, beer and a dozen other products ... when big Government and its confusing controls seem to make life hardly worth living ... when those worries are jabbing at the old ulcer, you go looking for oil and natural gas in Western Canada.

This article was written with reference to the amendment before us now. The writer concludes by saying:

> Some of the enthusiasm in Canada stems from last May's federal budget.
>
> Finance minister Donald Macdonald had a carrot for those whose main businesses are not in natural resources. For three years, they would be able to write off immediately for tax purposes the costs of looking for resources. This deduction reduces taxes on their other activities. Ottawa's idea was clear. It wanted more money looking for oil and gas and was prepared to give tax-breaks to get it.
> With so many reasons for investing in exploration and production, it's no wonder the Toronto Stock Exchange index of prices of western oil shares has jumped almost 10 per cent since mid-November.

I don't know what it would take to arouse this committee, to make it see that we are repeating a mistake of the past by providing tax benefits of this kind in connection with exploration for oil. If there were a possibility that exploration for oil would enable us to meet the projected energy needs of the future for any substantial period in the future, it could be understood, but all we are looking at is, at best, a short period of relief. The real solution for the future is conservation, as the minister himself pointed out when he was minister of energy, mines and resources. The logic he displayed as minister of energy, mines and resources is being confounded by what he is doing today as Minister of Finance.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Saltsman: I should like to put to the minister the questions to which I alluded in my remarks. Would he give us an explanation of the clause which states that the various benefits received from governments, forgivable loans, deductions from royalties, investment allowance, and so on, will not reduce the amount people will be able to deduct under this clause? That is how I read it; they can receive all those other benefits without having this kind of allowance reduced.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman, in the situation in which a provincial government has taken steps to provide that kind of incentive, it would seem to be perverse to treat it adversely from a federal taxation standpoint.

Mr. Saltsman: So this particular arrangement, if a person is in the 50 per cent tax bracket, means that 50 per cent of the money he is investing comes from the federal government, and if provincial governments allow them another set of money it is theoretically possible that if a person plays very cagily and gets different concessions he could be working almost totally with government money in terms of the development of this industry. I see the minister does not want to deal with that aspect as a theoretical proposition.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): One way or other, the fellow will incur expenses. Since he is not paying a 100 per cent tax rate it is not clear to me how he can get all those expenses back. It certainly will reduce his tax liability, but I do not quite follow the mathematics.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, you are providing him basically with free capital, 50 per cent under this provision. If he is in the 50 per cent tax bracket, for every $100 he invests he only puts up $50 of his own money; the extra $50 is money he has saved in terms of his tax liability. In other words, his own capital is only half of what it would otherwise be for investment purposes. What would be his cost base later on? Let us suppose the AIB continues. Will it be the money he put in? I do not see how it can be. So will it be the total amount put in?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): His cost base will be his expenditure, but for ultimate purposes the amount of his expenses will be deducted.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the minister's attention to what has happened in northern Manitoba as far as exploration goes. At the present time, mining is our main industry but there is literally no exploration going on in northern Manitoba. I can remember a time when there were up to 28 diamond drilling rigs engaged in exploration work in the north. It seems to me that as the federal government and provincial governments try to get more and more tax dollars out of the industry, the industry becomes increasingly less inclined to undertake the risk of engaging in exploration work. They question whether it will bring sufficient return to their investors or shareholders.

● (1450)

The province of Manitoba is paying 50 per cent of the cost of exploration. However, it does not have many takers at this time, for the simple reason that the industry, knowing very well how governments operate, realizes that there is going to be nothing left for the industry if any finds are made. In the province of Manitoba $1 million has been spent on exploration so far, and I do not think that even the crews have gone out into the bush to this point. So I think we have to be very careful, if we do want to encourage development, that we do not tax industry to death before it ever gets started.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said when he went to the United States last week that our future is in the untapped resources of the north. Unless government is prepared to take the same kind of risk that industry takes in the field of exploration, then the government had better take over all the exploration work in the area. This is what the province is trying to do and it is just not working out.

Industry itself is not expanding in the north but is simply mining what it has found to date. Exploration is moth-balled for the time being until there is some realization that it is a costly business to explore, to diamond drill, and so on, in the north where costs are prohibitive. The government does not seem to take these things into consideration. The cost of exploration has skyrocketed. Companies like International Nickel have moved their exploration crews completely out of the north and are operating out of Ontario at the present time. A company like Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting has absolutely curtailed all exploration in northern Manitoba and the north in general, for the simple reason that they cannot show a decent return to their shareholders in view of the tax that is required by the federal and provincial governments. Sherrit Gordon at the present time are closing down parts of their operation; they are also faced with the same situation, with no exploration work going on whatsoever.

So far as this bill is concerned, we should be thinking very seriously of encouraging industry to go into the north. To do this we have also to provide incentive through having a less firm hand on the tax side of it in order to encourage development. I am not for giving everything away, Mr. Chairman, but I still think that private industry can do a far better job of exploration than the government.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one question of the minister. It is some time now since the budget; I think I understood it on budget night and I did look into it. Is the clause of the bill that we are dealing with now the one dealing with the encouragement of exploration and development? Is it the clause that provides for individuals and corporations taking so much money off their taxable income provided that, within a certain period of time, they invest the money in exploration and development?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is dealing specifically with individuals and corporations whose principal business is not resource exploration and development. As the hon. member will recall, somebody whose principal business was of this character previously had that advantage, and we have now extended it to others in the community.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I just say a few words on that for a moment. I want to congratulate the government on this clause. I hope that members in all parties in the House, including the socialists, might appreciate that we are now reaching the stage where probably the greatest problem we have to face, not only on this continent but throughout the world, is the cost of energy. The cost of energy is one of the main factors creating inflation. If there is sufficient exploration and development to make sure that we are self-sufficient in this country in gas and oil, then we have gone a long way; and the government has gone a long way if it offers encouragement of this sort in order to control inflation other than by way of wage and price controls.

As I have said before, when we are dealing with this subject there is one thing that is always overlooked. I see the hon. member for Calgary South here; he has had a lot of experience in this field. When you are looking for investment for exploration and development purposes in the gas and oil field, you are not competing in Canada, you are competing throughout the world. Unless we give the industry incentives and let the industry benefit under this provision, then drilling equipment and other items of equipment will be sent to the North Sea and elsewhere in the world. We will be the losers. We will be paying $12, $13, $15 or $20 a barrel for crude petroleum if we do not develop our own supplies.

I hope this is a matter to which hon. members will direct their attention. I agree with the last speaker that, whatever the industry, there is ample evidence that private enterprise, particularly when risk capital is involved, certainly in my opinion can do a much better job than state control. Even communist countries are making deals with free enterprise and entrepreneurs in the United States and Canada to drill for gas and oil, because they realize that communist countries have complete state control and that there will be greater efficiency with free enterprise or in partnership with free enterprise. Surely that is ample evidence of the direction in which this country should be going, rather than in a socialist direction. If the United Kingdom's reserves are proven, as now appears is the case in the North Sea, then they may be able to pull themselves out of the economic collapse they have suffered during the last few years. I do not want to repeat what I said last evening about where some of the blame might lie.

This is one clause of the bill to which I think the government and the minister's department have given a lot of thought. I want to congratulate the government on being realistic enough to realize that exploration and development of gas and oil today must continue at an accelerated pace; otherwise we will no longer be self-sufficient in this field.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to direct a number of questions to him with regard to some of the remarks he has just made?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let us get on with the bill.

Mr. Saltsman: This has to do directly with the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): All kinds of people are waiting for a refund. Let us get on with the bill.

Mr. Saltsman: It is directly on this particular clause. The hon. member for Calgary North was talking about free enterprise in the oil industry. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the oil industry is hardly free enterprise any more in terms of who gets the benefits. Let me ask the hon. member for Calgary North, who is very knowledgeable about these things, this question. Of the present price of a barrel of oil, how much goes to the oil industry, how much to the federal government and how much to the government of Alberta? The reason I ask this question is pretty obvious: I think something like 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the price of a barrel of oil does not go to private enterprise at all; it goes to public enterprise, the government of Alberta.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, my hon. friend has already answered the question. I like to be helped, and when a member asks me a question I like to help him. Now the hon. member has given me the answer. What he is trying to say, Mr. Chairman, is that the industry is sort of split between government enterprise and private enterprise. But I think he has missed the point, and I will clear it up for him quickly. Certainly, the greater share of the revenue today is going to government, and this will discourage exploration and development in the oil and gas field. This is what the government is trying to relieve.

• (1500)

The point I am making is that when you invest risk capital you should do it efficiently. To put a hole in the ground, drill it and organize the whole operation technically, is done more efficiently under the free enterprise system than by the government. It is true that these corporations and individuals pay large taxes. That has been the great complaint. I think my good friend, perhaps unintentionally because I know what his business was before he came to the House, missed the point.

Mr. Saltsman: I will make another point, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Calgary North has an argument for supporting the government very strongly on this measure. He said that this is one way of significantly lowering the price of energy in Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Saltsman: It seems to me that the province he comes from is taking the position that when the OPEC countries raise the price of energy by 400 per cent, as they did a few years ago, the province of Alberta is entitled to the same amount, and the reason it has not done so is because of the confrontation between the federal and provincial governments on this matter, with the province of Alberta kicking and screaming about not being allowed to raise its price. Therefore I would like to ask the hon. member for Calgary North how the price of energy can be lowered if it is the policy of the oil producing provinces to raise it to world levels.

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer that question, Mr. Chairman, but I am not the Minister of Finance as yet. It is his job to answer these questions. But let me say this to him. He talks in his preamble about Alberta. The reason there is no development or exploration going on in Saskatchewan is that whatever Alberta might have done, they pay twice as much in taxes. You only have to talk to the top men in Calgary and they will tell you that it really costs them money now to produce a barrel of crude petroleum in Saskatchewan, so they pump it so slowly that none will come out. If that is the kind of development under a socialist government which my friend likes, it is not the kind I would accept.

Certainly if we explore and develop resources and find certain quantities of oil, perhaps cheaper energy will be provided. I know that if my friend were minister of finance, like his governments in Saskatchewan and Manitoba which have their two hands in the till all the time, the price of oil would not go down. But the way to lower the price of energy—and I say this to him in terms of sound economics—is to cut down taxes, not increase them. His philosophy is to increase them and to discourage exploration and development.

I do not mind answering his questions, but I realize there is a time limit on this debate. I am not really wasting any time because finally their filibuster will have to end.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let us get on with the bill.

The Chairman: Order, please. I wonder if I should allow this exchange between hon. members to continue. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge asked questions of another hon. member, not of the minister, then yielded the floor, regardless of whether the Chairman agreed or not, and regardless of another hon. member who might be interested in seeking the floor. To allow the committee time to reach a decision and to re-examine this procedure, I call upon the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. Do I understand correctly that on development expenses rather than exploration expenses the write-off is 30 per cent a year on a diminishing balance?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, that is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bawden: I would like to ask the minister how he arrived at this in view of the fact that exploration is a key factor in finding additional reserves. One of the great problems we will face in this country is the development of reserves and production in the high cost frontier areas. I recall reading recently that a fully developed production platform in the North Sea will cost in the order of $1 billion.

One of the problems we are facing in this country is not only finding the reserves but justifying the investment to put these reserves on production, thus making them viable. Has the minister given any thought to making development expenses fully deductible in view of the fact that this would be an important factor in making certain that off-shore fields which would be uneconomical today would become economical to develop? Perhaps Sable Island or the area surrounding it is a good example of a very high cost area. I recall, for instance, the construction of a pipeline there costing in excess of $1 million a mile. I wonder therefore if the minister is prepared to reconsider making development expenses fully deductible, thus making off-shore reserves an economical production.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the real purpose was to provide an incentive at the highest risk end of the operation, namely, the exploration cost which would be involved potentially, such as if you are going to drill two or three holes and might find nothing but dry holes. Naturally when you move to the development phase, you have assessed for yourself that there are good chances of finding something. At that point the development can be more easily financed than can the highly speculative effect of capital involved in exploration. I do not take issue with the point the hon. member makes about the cost of development. I know it is high, and will be particularly high in the frontier areas. The thought we had in mind in this change was to encourage risk money to explore for additional oil and gas.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I was hoping to direct my question to the hon. member for Calgary North, but I will have to put it to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell me what study has been carried out on the effect of this concession with regard to what sort of reserves or potential reserves we might get by increasing the benefits to investors in this field? Surely when the Department of Finance allows people to do this instead of paying the federal treasury in taxes, they have some idea of the benefits to be derived. How many more years' reserve can we expect to have, and how much more secure will our future be as a result of the concessions the minister is offering to investors in the oil industry?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In this regard you can only talk about the potential of the hydrocarbon bearing zone in Canada. This is a measure of judgment by experts in the field, founded among other things on the drilling experience or, in some cases, the seismic information. On the basis of this and other experience in comparable areas in Canada one can make an estimate of the potential production that can be gained from a particular area. What you cannot estimate is at what time exploration will be successful in tapping that potential, as a succession of firms have found out. Shell Canada in the late 1930's and 1940's, having the drilling rights to the Leduc field, found it very hard to develop the field there and gave it up to another company, only to suffer the chagrin of seeing another company bring in a wild-cat at that point. Even with all the scientific assistance one can have, ultimately there is a very high measure of chance involved in putting a drill down.

In response to how many drill holes will be successful as a result of this kind of tax arrangement in the next three years, I cannot really give a specific figure. I could seek from my colleague the current estimates of the geological survey of Canada as to the hydro carbon potential of the various areas of Canada, but one can draw the general conclusion that on the whole the more drill holes which are put down, the better chance there is of finding the resource.

I do not know anyone at this point who can say with any precision how successful we are going to be in a short period of time in bringing on additional oil and natural gas. Certainly we can expect to bring some on, but how much can be expected has to be a matter of chance as much as anything. Unless we take that chance and drill the holes, however, we are definitely not going to get it.

Mr. Saltsman: That is the same as playing Russian roulette with taxpayers' money. The reason I asked that question was really to elicit the response I got from the minister. The point is he does not know; nobody knows. We could in fact be pouring this money down the sink hole. We may just be spending this money to find out how much oil we do not have because, even under the most optimistic examination of our future for hydro carbons, we do not have very much.

Mr. Woolliams: How do you know?

Mr. Saltsman: Well, that is what they say, and to make a comparison, at Leduc in the early days of oil exploration people did not know very much about it. Scientific ways of discovering oil really had not been worked out very carefully, but today a great deal of work is being done in this country in terms of finding out what the potential is. We can always strike it lucky on some field, but from everything I have read there do not seem to be any Leducs around any more waiting to be discovered.

At the very best there are small pockets around which may be found; therefore, to provide this kind of stimulus in this game of Russian roulette does not seem to be a terribly wise proposal to put before this committee.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In the first place I take exception to that kind of reasoning. Let us divide the potential up into the more conventional hydro carbon provinces which we have in the western Canada sedimentary basin and then talk about the frontier. It is known and it is clear that there has been some success during the course of the current year, and that there are additional deposits, particularly of natural gas, which can be identified by drilling and brought into the system, so there is something very substantial to be gained with regard to our natural gas supply by additional drilling of this kind.

However, what is even more significant is the fact that seismic indications in the high Arctic and in the Arctic offshore show that there are very major structures which could be even larger than Leduc in terms of production if these structures are filled with hydro carbons, and I go back to my point: we are not going to identify whether we have a supply of oil and gas unless we drill holes, and we are going to have difficulty raising the funds to drill holes without the kinds of incentives we have right here.

In a perverse way it is even desirable to know that the hydro carbon provinces, for whatever reasons, over geological time may no longer contain hydro carbons. In an economy very substantially based on oil and natural gas, if indeed we do not have any more potential, we should be working very hard at developing alternative sources. If we do have natural gas and oil, I think it is important for the decision making level to find this out as soon as possible by drilling.

Mr. Saltsman: On that last statement of the minister I find that I can agree with him completely, and that is one of the things I am getting at. We do in fact know a fair amount now. We do not know as much as we would like to know or should know, but I think it is pretty obvious that we cannot predicate the future on hydro carbons, gas and oil. We must move to other forms of energy.

While I do not have before me the speeches the minister made when he was minister of energy, mines and resources, it seems to me that he said very much the same thing, that if we are to be spending money we should be spending money on new forms of energy instead of just wasting our time and providing tax benefits in a field which is not really very good for the future, even at the most optimistic estimates. Even if more oil and gas were found than expected, how much oil and gas could be found in terms of future supplies? Will there be enough for 25 years or 50 years?

Then we go through the same thing again. The point is that we have to move to new forms of energy, and these things can be marginal until we do find them—they can hold us until we get there—but we should not be placing a heavy reliance on this kind of energy for the future.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to deal with that as well. We have in my lifetime found an additional new source of energy in the form of the nuclear power reactor. It has taken very nearly 25 years to move from the theoretical technology involved to the effective commercial exploitation of it. There is a common practice on the part of some observers of energy policy to talk about solar energy, biomass, wind or tidal energy, and to assume that to think about it is to install it with the present technology. However, that has not been our experience in technology. We in this country are going to be dependent—as indeed the world is going to be dependent—on fossil fuel sources, probably for the balance of my lifetime, and I think it is therefore important for Canadians to identify our sources if we can, rather than pay somebody else for them.

In due course I think we are going to evolve effective alternative sources of energy, and that is desirable, but I do not think it is adequate to say that we will stay cold for 20 years and that by then we should have some effective solar technology to take care of us.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Chairman, further to the question I asked the minister about the 30 per cent diminishing balance write-off on development expenditures, I am wondering if the minister is aware that any sophisticated company which looks at its exploration program in any off-shore and high risk area at the same time has to run through the economics of producing, before it even gets involved in the early exploration. Does he realize that they examine on a very careful basis whether the land regulations and the tax rules which are in place permit them to develop if there is a discovery of a certain size?

I believe this is an alteration to the rules as they were in the past. In other words, development expenditures were fully deductible, and I suggest to the minister that this is a retrograde step which would make it less attractive to develop. It would discourage explorers from going in in the first place because they recognize the probabilities. They recognize that they have certain chances, but if they fall somewhat short of the reserves they hope to find, then under certain tax rules they could not proceed to develop. I suggest to the minister that this is a discouragement to exploration in the first place. I think this has been evidenced in the North Sea where a great many small companies, particularly Canadian companies, were forced to sell out to bigger companies, simply because they were unable to raise the very large amounts of capital required. I think the minister recognizes that if there is a problem in the energy producing industries of our country today, it is the availability of capital not only for exploration but also for development.

Everybody is short of capital. In fact even the very large companies are, as evidenced by their activities in the recent past. They simply cannot find the sources of capital which are going to be required.

I would like to ask the minister whether he would give consideration to changing this write-off provision and increasing it to 100 per cent, in view of the fact that this government has for a number of years been stingy with regard to everything it has done. It has always been treading the narrow line of being too tough. The minister is well aware of the cutbacks in exploration which have taken place. That is one of the reasons why we have a serious energy outlook in this country at the present time.

I am wondering whether the minister is going to err on the side of being too tough, bearing in mind particularly that there are no rules in place today relating to off-shore areas. We have so many uncertainties, so many unknowns, and so many rules that we err on the side of being too stingy and we have created a very great uncertainty, particularly as it relates to the frontier areas under the control of the government.

I wonder if the minister would consider this question of the 30 per cent write-off for development, recognizing that it would give further stimulus to exploration and would bring less economic fields into the realm of economic fields. Presumably in the slightly longer term it would improve the energy outlook in Canada. It would at least nail down one area as a certainty rather than the basically negative things that have prevailed in recent years, notwithstanding the fact that the basic thrust of this clause, which permits Canadians to invest in exploration, is a good one.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The difficulty, of course, is just how much of the public purse you are going to make available for any of these operations. One could say in a single minded way that you should make all conceivable funds available for this purpose. We have said that as a matter of priority in terms of forming a Canadian energy policy it is important to identify the potential of an area, which is to be done primarily by exploratory drilling. It may well be because of the high capital costs involved in development we would want to look again at the rate of write off for those who at the moment do the exploration drilling we are most concerned to stimulate.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

Mr. Saltsman: I see the chairman is becoming somewhat familiar with the name of my constituency.

I should like to direct this question to the minister. It will be quite obvious why I am asking, but before I do I wish the minister would not drag out his red herrings about how we are going to be freezing in the dark unless we pass this kind of legislation. There is energy available. There are other forms of energy that can be purchased at this particular time. I want to ask the minister to make a comparison between the kind of tax benefit and loss to the treasury that is going to take place through this measure as against what Canada is spending in trying to develop new forms of energy.

The reason I ask this question is quite obvious. In other words, what is this measure going to cost? How much are we spending in exploring for or examining new forms of energy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On the second part of the question, Mr. Chairman, I would have to inquire of my colleague as to the expenditure in the private and public area on new forms of energy. On the first part of the question, there is going to be some cost certainly, but it will depend on the extent to which it is seen as an attractive investment by many people. In other words, one of the reasons for having a trial period is so that the government's liability in this area may be limited for the purpose of determining the efficacy of these means of stimulating investment or whether, on the other hand, we may be giving too much away at this point.

I cannot give a precise figure now but I can say that since the matter has come up there have been a number of funds put together for the purpose of engaging in this kind of exploration.

Mr. Saltsman: Is the minister telling the House that he cannot tell this committee what the cost to the treasury will be as a result of the passage of this particular clause?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not any final definitive figure, Mr. Chairman. No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 24 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clauses 25 to 30 agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 31, as amended, carry?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, it is not an amendment to clause 31. It is an addition to the bill of clause 31.1.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 31 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Lessard moved:

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding thereto immediately after line 12 on page 33 the following clause:

31.1 (1) Paragraph 82(1)(b) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(b) where the taxpayer is an individual, other than a trust which is a registered charity, ⅓ of the aggregate of all amounts described in paragraph (a) received by him in the year from taxable Canadian corporations'.

(2) This section is applicable to the 1977 and subsequent taxation years.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 31.1 agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 42 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 43.

Mr. Saltsman: May I first of all say that in principle I am very pleased to see that the question of assistance to dependent children or other persons confined to wheelchairs is being provided. I think this is something long overdue. All of us have personal experience of people who have children who require very close attention, and we are familiar with the costs associated with that care. I am therefore happy to see this particular measure included in the bill. My happiness is somewhat soured—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Tempered.

Mr. Saltsman: —tempered, by knowing that I have to say the same thing on this as I have said on some of the other reasonably good measures which are put into the tax bill and then distorted because of the disproportionate benefits they give to the rich as against what they give to people on working incomes.

It must be obvious that the cost of looking after a child in a wheelchair bears as heavily on the poor as it does on the rich; in fact, perhaps more heavily on the poor than on the rich.

This allowance is really not going to cover totally the cost of supporting a child of that kind, yet if we look at the effect that this has we can see quite clearly that the better off are going to benefit more from the dependent child disability deduction. Someone with an income of $10,000 a year receives a benefit of $275; someone fortunate enough to have an income of $50,000 a year receives a tax benefit of $563. The higher income receives more than twice as much, and of course it is proportional all the way through.

It seems to me that to distort a humanitarian measure like this is the wrong way of going about things, and I have to object to it. I do not think anything points more significantly to the kinds of things that happen in our society, the kinds of distortions that take place, and the positions in which members of this House are often placed. The government brings in a measure which is humanitarian on the surface and has the support of all people, then deliberately distorts it to maintain the bias between rich and poor in which the rich do better and the poor do worse. The government says, "The poor will get something, so why should they complain if the rich get twice as much? If the poor complain and this bill does not pass, they will get nothing at all."

● (1530)

Mr. Woolliams: We should get our handkerchiefs out.

Mr. Saltsman: It is easy for my friends on my right to jeer, but let them stand up and tell me on what sense of morality is a measure like this based, a measure designed to assist crippled or disabled children but under which the rich are to be compensated twice as much as the poor. What is worse, if you do not earn any taxable income, you will get nothing. If you are very poor, you get nothing at all. What is the moral basis of this measure?

Mr. Woolliams: If you have no taxable income, you do not pay any tax.

Mr. Saltsman: Because you do not pay tax, your crippled child will not get benefits.

Mr. Woolliams: But there are other programs, you know.

Mr. Saltsman: What benefit do you get if you do not pay tax? Mr. Chairman, we are not speaking of a kind of universal demogrant. We are speaking about a deduction from taxable income. If you do not earn taxable income you do not get any benefit. Perhaps we should leave that point. After all, judging from the comments one hears, some hon. members feel that the poor are not deserving and perhaps should not get any benefit.

Let us assume that you earn less income than some other people. Why should you get only half as much of a benefit to assist your disabled child?

Mr. Woolliams: Why do you pay more than twice as much tax if you make twice as much money?

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Saltsman: I know that this whole business is very symmetrical. Hon. members will repeat the argument of the Minister of Finance, that the tax system is proportionately based and since we are talking about tax reduction, why, this is the way it works. Mr. Chairman, that is a lovely piece of symmetry. But what kind of morality is it? That is what I am asking the committee.

The benefit need not be given in the form of a tax deduction. It could be given as a tax credit. If it were instituted as a tax credit, each person would benefit equally, including the person who does not earn taxable income. That, it seems to me, is the way it ought to be done. It should not be instituted in the form of a tax deduction, because under the present system the more you earn, the greater is the benefit you can obtain.

We object to that sort of thing not only in the clause under discussion but in other clauses of the bill which provide uneven benefits to taxpayers. My remarks apply even to the clause about which we talked previously, which one cannot mention at this time. That has been the pattern of this entire bill. Under this bill, the more you have got, the more you "gets", and the less you have got, the less you "gets". We object to that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, generally I commend the changes being made. May I raise a question about the meaning of "prescribed information"? I am referring to those words appearing on line 27 of page 46 of the bill. A student attending an approved educational institution had to prove his attendance by filing with the minister a certificate of attendance from that educational institution. What does the minister intend in this regard? Why have the words "prescribed information" been included in subparagraph (g)?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I understand the situation, Revenue Canada felt that a mere certificate of enrolment was not adequate. They wanted additional information as to the nature of courses, the period of time attended, and so on, for the purpose of making a judgment as to whether the individual person fitted within that category. That is my information.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, could I please have some information with regard to the new definition of "registered charity"? I am referring to page 47, subparagraph (4)(c). The amending paragraph reads in part, " . . . and was either created or established in Canada." That provision did not exist in prior legislation.

There is, as a schedule to the Income Tax Act, a list of some 268 educational institutions, I think, known as universities outside Canada. They appear under Schedule I. Many Canadians have the advantage of an education at a university outside Canada, and from time to time they are asked to contribute to a foundation or scholarship program. Usually they are well disposed to make that contribution. After all, they have attended these institutions of learning, often at no expense to themselves, because they went on a scholarship. Frankly, I consider myself as one of them. We derived great benefit from our stay in those universities. Naturally, from time to time we are called on to make contributions, either to a building fund or to a scholarship program.

In future, how will a Canadian resident or citizen who has attended one of these schools approved under Schedule I make a contribution, as a gift, to a charitable organization? In other words, the gift is truly to be considered as being made to a charitable organization. Does the present provision mean that we shall need to establish some foundation or what have you in Canada, which will collect these funds and then transmit them to the institution in question, whether in the United States or abroad?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suppose the question is whether the hon. gentleman would make his contribution to Oxford University; I would make mine to Cambridge.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would even allow you to do that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In either case, the contribution is made directly to the institution, for example, to the trustees of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. The university itself will give me a receipt for that contribution. That, as I understand it, is not changed by the present provision. By way of comparison let me add that I believe that the Friends of Harvard University in Canada have a Canadian foundation to which funds are contributed; as a result of the contribution you get a receipt. As I understand it, under the new arrangement my hon. friend and I will still be able to make a trans-Atlantic contribution to an institution of learning. We will not have to make the contribution to a foundation in this country; but this provision has been introduced in case there is a foundation here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, speaking about contributions to Oxford, it seems to me that there was an establishment in Toronto to which one sent contributions. That organization issued a receipt under the registered charities section. Unless one filed a receipt which had a registered number on it, the Minister of National Revenue would not recognize it. Therefore I could have sent thousands of pounds, if I had them, to my old college in the United Kingdom, but the Minister of National Revenue would not have recognized them.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I could talk from other experience. I have sent contributions, not thousand of pounds, directly to my institution and received a receipt which has been allowed for tax purposes.

● (1540)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I quote you?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): By all means. I have to say that as one of those of my college in Canada interested in this question, I took the precaution of seeking advice from National Revenue in advance before I dunned everybody else to make a contribution. I believe that is in accordance with the law.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will quote you.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 44 and 45 agreed to.

On Clause 46.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As I recall it, Mr. Chairman, this has to do with the unused portion of the interest and dividends deduction that is allowed to taxpayers. This allows the transfer of unused portions from one spouse to another, both of them being taxpayers. Am I correct? Also, what is the net effect of the amendment that is proposed at this time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the purpose is to simplify the procedure here, the income tax form. The purpose of this technical amendment, which adds new section 110.3 to the act, is to lay down uniform rules to govern the transfer of transferable deductions between spouses. Presently the student living allowance deduction and disability deduction are transferred on one basis, and the pension income deduction, interest and dividend income deduction, and old age deduction are transferred between spouses on another basis. As a result the taxpayer has to make a separate computation in respect of each deduction he may transfer. This amendment will permit the taxpayer to make one computation in respect of all of his transferable deductions.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the minister. We are going through all the shenanigans of transferring from one spouse to another, and going through the kinds of things I pointed out earlier today about what one spouse can do on behalf of another. Why does the minister not in fact move toward a system of joint filings? It would get rid of half of this mess in the income tax system. Instead of all the loopholes that are opened and closed, providing a social security system for lawyers and accountants in this country, why not simply move in the direction of a joint filing system rather than what we are dealing with here all the time? If you are going to need a lawyer, you might as well be a joint filer.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, this question has received extensive consideration. In observing internationally, we have found that the trend appears to have been away from the joint returns. I think there is probably something to be learned from the experience of others in that regard.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 47.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is the explanation of this?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, subsection 113(2) of the act provides that a taxpayer may offset the taxable portion of a dividend received from a foreign affiliate after the end of the taxpayer's 1975 taxation year against the adjusted cost base to him of the share on which the dividend was paid at the end of this 1975 taxation year. This amendment to the act provides that the amount available for offset in this manner must be reduced by any repayments of capital on that share subsequent to the end of the taxpayer's 1975 taxation year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hope the minister is further ahead after having read that than I am.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will not concede that. This is the first time I have read it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 48 agreed to.

On clause 49.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, this clause is presently under the guise of existing small business. The benefits being provided to small business are very substantial. The question is whether they are really going to small business rather than to the upper echelon, maybe a very small percentage of small business that in fact is not small business at all but verges on what I call much larger business, and these benefits are being provided under the guise that they will be of assistance to small business.

Rather than engage in an argument on this sort of thing, I would ask the minister for some figures that we could examine. The kinds of figures I would like from the minister include how many small businessmen there are in this country, how many of those small business companies pay any tax and, of that group of small businessmen, how many does the department anticipate would benefit from this kind of measure? Also, what is the cost to the federal treasury of this provision?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I have to confess that I do not have instant responses to those four questions. I can seek them for the hon. member, but I do not have them at hand at the moment.

Mr. Saltsman: If we are being asked to pass a measure of this kind, that kind of information should be before the committee. As I started to say, it seems that the benefits really are not going to small business.

Just drawing on my memory of very old statistics, which are going to be approximate, and I put this before the committee with no more authority than to try to make a general point, the last time I looked at the figures, there were approximately 400,000 small businesses in Canada. Of that 400,000, over half paid no tax. They were not even in a taxable bracket, let alone being assisted by a measure of this kind. Of the other half, very few earned enough money to benefit from the provisions in any substantive way. The real beneficiaries of a clause of this kind are not small businessmen but some very substantial businesses which can well afford to pay the tax and do not need this kind of assistance.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On the final questions, Mr. Chairman, I can make an approximation. It is estimated that Canadian small business, however that may be defined, whether to the satisfaction of the hon. member or not, will save about $30 million in taxes in the first whole year.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

On the question raised by the hon. member as to how small is small, or when does small become medium or even large, to a degree the limits are set on the size by definitions already in the Income Tax Act. Without being precise in that regard, the hon. member and others can identify in their experience Canadian firms in particular which are in that middle ground without being able to carry on business with the contributed part of partners or subscribed capital of shareholders, and the very large businesses which are in the position to finance by a large public issue of shares.

There is a substantial number of companies in the centre, many of them Canadian owned, which are faced with the choice of either going out of business or selling the business to a going concern, primarily to a foreign party. One might argue that many of the takeovers which occurred in Canada in the past have had this transition difficulty, this financial difficulty which firms have run into. I do not pretend for a moment that this income measure is the complete answer to that problem, but it does seem to respond to a great deal of the concern Canadians have and, it seems to me, to a concern I have heard the hon. member himself mention from time to time, that Canadian controlled enterprises should have an opportunity to grow, and if that be our objective, as I take it to be, then some relief, at least from the standpoint of the corporate income tax burden, is one way of assisting in this respect.

Mr. Saltsman: It is the concern of this party that small business should grow to the extent possible, and it certainly is a concern of this party that as much of our business as possible be Canadian controlled. Nevertheless, I often think that many of the measures the government introduces in the guise of moving in this direction are perverse and misleading. It seems to me that the years in which we experienced the highest degree of foreign ownership were the years in which we had one of the most favourable tax systems in the western world. The favourableness of the tax system rather than the burden of taxation is what induced many businesses to sell out. We were the last country in the world to impose a capital gains tax, and when we did bring in such a measure it was only at half rates.

What was the consequence of not having a capital gains tax in Canada? The consequence, in my view, and I believe in the view of others who studied this question, was to encourage Canadian owners to sell their businesses, usually to American buyers rather than to Canadian buyers. The system works in that way. If you had a business and were working hard, you had to pay the regular rate of taxation. If you sold your business, without being liable for capital gains tax, you got a whopping sum of money which was totally exempt from taxation. The temptation to do so was incredible. Somebody would go to a businessman and say "Why are you working so hard? You are doing well and making money, but if you sell out you would do twice as well, because instead of having to pay tax on your earnings you would receive a capital amount and would not have to pay anything at all." That is one reason why so much of our industry sold out. It was not because the tax system was too harsh. It was because the tax system was too biased in favour of selling out as against running at a profit.

To some extent the same situation prevails today with a 50 per cent capital gains tax in operation. The temptation is not so great but it still exists. It is still attractive to sell a business rather than run it, and this is really the problem. I believe a lot of things are wrong with our present system and that we have to assist Canadian business. But I do not think this provision will make any difference whatsoever.

What is interesting in observing the decisions which have come from FIRA is that this institution is in a box. It wants Canadian business to be bought out by Canadians, but there are very few Canadian buyers around to buy it out.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No wonder. They have no money. They are taxed to death.

Mr. Saltsman: That is the problem. There has been a failure to create institutions which can assist small business financially. One of the difficulties is the attitude of small businessmen themselves. They do not want to take in partners or put shares on the market; they want to own the whole thing themselves.

We have spoken in the House on a number of other occasions in favour of the Canada Development Corporation. We hoped we would have an instrument which would help Canadian business. Our argument was that instead of all these give-away programs through the tax system, the hidden welfare system, it would be better to take this money and turn it over to a venture company which would assist small business, go into partnership with small business, and help them with management, financing, merchandising on so on. This would do far more for Canadian business than these little bits and pieces, this shotgun approach by means of the tax system.

I am sure these measures do some good at some point. They are not totally lost. What I am suggesting is that so much is shot into the system that you do not know what does good and what does not do any good. The scatter gun approach is adopted simply because, after all, you have to do something. The government cannot be accused of not trying to help small business, of not being on the side of the little man, so it approves these measures which essentially help the bigger operator more than the smaller companies. The smaller operator really needs money not when he is making money; when you are making money you can usually get money. You have got credit by that time. You can get money from a bank or from investors. The problem for small businesses arises when they are not making money and when they do not benefit from measures of the kind proposed.

If the government really wants to assist small business it must provide assistance where it really counts. One way is by creating a venture capital company to help small business in every way possible. The other way is to help them when they are not paying tax rather than when they are paying tax. The worst possible way, and the least effective way of helping small business which is really small business, is through the measure which has been put before us this afternoon. I say this because the benefits of tax measures of this kind do not, in my experience, go to small businesses but to much larger businesses which are quite capable of looking after themselves.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My only comment is that it is high time that this provision was introduced. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has said, it represents a belated recognition by the government that we have experienced inflation for a number of years and that it is nonsense to keep things down at absolute figure maxima as they were in the act.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 50 and 51 agreed to.

On Clause 52.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On clause 52, Mr. Chairman, I see that in proposed subsection 127(3) there is a change in definition, from "candidate" to "an officially nominated candidate." What was the rationale behind that change? Is an officially nominated candidate one who has been certified by the party leader to the chief electoral officer?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The explanation is this. Theoretically any individual might call himself or herself a candidate and commence issuing receipts to his or her supporters in return for political contributions. This is an attempt to bring the section a little closer within the framework of a formal political campaign.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being four o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY, AND INCREASE IN BENEFITS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $250 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I find it an interesting coincidence that this motion has been called for debate this afternoon. It so happens that yesterday when the government House leader was announcing the business for next week he indicated that one of the items to be called for second reading would be the government's bill, C-35, which is, in effect, an overhaul of the Old Age Security Act.

If I may underline what I mean about its being a coincidence, it arises from the fact that I shall be speaking in support of Bill C-35 when it comes before us. But I shall be indicating that there are two major shortcomings in Bill C-35. My motion deals with those two shortcomings. I hope the discussion we have this afternoon, and the discussion we will have on Bill C-35, might prompt the government, either at the second reading stage or in committee, to do something about these two shortcomings. One of these shortcomings has to do with the age at which pensions are available; the other has to do with the adequacy of the basic amount of old age security.

The first subject I wish to raise is that of the eligible age for pensions. I want to emphasize, even before I make my argument for lowering the age of eligibility, that what I am advocating—and advocating very strongly—is voluntaryism so far as early retirement is concerned.

I am not arguing that age 60 be the compulsory retirement age. However, I am arguing that the possibility of retiring at age 60 be available. If we are going to make that possibility real, I suggest we have to amend both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan.

The minimum age for payments under these two pensions is still age 65 and in my experience there are a great many Canadians, particularly Canadians in industry, who find the "rat race" very hard these days, and who feel that they ought to have the opportunity of retiring at age 60 instead age 65.

If we could persuade the government to make old age security available at age 60 that would be a good step, a partial step. If we were to make both old age security and Canada Pension Plan benefits available at age 60 many persons would be able to take advantage of that. However, as my motion suggests, that in itself would not be everybody.

The fact that I am emphasizing voluntaryism is underlined by the words in my motion that state pensions should be available under the two acts to persons at age 60 who are out of the labour market. I propose that there be no means test between ages 60 and 65. I wish also to emphasize there should be no marital test as there is with respect to the spouses' allowances that are now available.

A pension to those between the ages of 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market would take care of the spouses of pensioners, or of those at home whose spouses are working. It would also take care of spinsters and widows, bachelors and widowers who are not now covered by the spouse's allowance.

In the 1974 election campaign when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first announced that the government would bring in a spouse's allowance I distinctly remember hearing him say that this would create problems. It has created problems. The main problem is that it does not cover a great many individuals. There is the horrible problem that arises where a spouse between the ages of 60 and 65 may get the spouse's allowance because he or she is living with a spouse who is of pensionable age, then a year or so later the older spouse dies when the younger spouse has not yet reached the age of 65, therefore, the younger spouse loses the allowance.

The figures we have from the department indicate that this is affecting approximately 200 individual Canadians every month. The Prime Minister was right during the 1974 election campaign when he said this would create problems as well as solve problems. I think the problems should now be solved by extending pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market. I use that phrase to cover both those who are already out of the labour market because they are at home, or whatever, and those who voluntarily leave the labour market.

I am quite sympathetic to the arguments made by some about the difficulties of a fixed pension age. Speeches to that effect have been made in this House, and may again be made today. Studies made on this issue, particularly one under the aegis of the Canadian Council on Social Development raise this whole question of whether or not we should have a fixed age at which people must retire, and I go along with the proposition, that it should not be fixed, it should not be compulsory. My motion does not ask for compulsory retirement. My motion asks for the possibility of retirement at age 60. That would be possible if the old age security pension and the retirement benefits under the Canada Pension Plan were made available at that age.

I know what happens to private members' resolutions in private members' hours. I do not see any reason to hope that the same thing will not happen to mine this afternoon, but I hope that the discussion we will have today will have some bearing on the debate next week and on the debate when we get into committee on the government's Bill C-35.

The other phase of the motion that is now before the House is to the effect that the basic amount of old age security should be increased to at least $250 a month. There are organizations and persons in Canada who will say that that figure is not high enough. I have seen resolutions for a much higher figure and I go along with them, but in this House one has to move a step at a time, and since the basic amount of old age security is at present $141.34 a month, perhaps I am asking for all I dare ask for, namely, that it be increased by about $109 to $250 a month. I am still opposed to the means test concept that attaches to the guaranteed income supplement. We have been over that battle many a time and I do not wish to take time on it this afternoon, but at the moment at any rate there are amounts available on top of the present basic pension which bring the total that an individual and a married couple can reach up to a certain figure. But these figures are still very inadequate, and even though it is a time of restraint, a time when some persons will say we have done enough for pensioners, let us leave that subject alone, I insist that our older people have the right to have their plight considered.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, January 4, 1977, with a Canadian Press dispatch from Toronto under the heading, "Elderly Need Up to $695 Each Month". This story is based on a report put out by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The figures in this report suggest that a couple in Toronto today, if that couple owns its own home, needs at least $654 to get by. On the other hand, if that couple has to rent accommodation, it needs at least $695 a month to get by. I have looked at the details making up those figures and in a number of cases it seems to me that the figures are very conservative. These totals of $654 a month for a couple owning their own home and $695 for a couple having to rent are certainly minimal.

In defence of the proposal I make which would add about $109 a month to the basic pension now being paid, may I say that even if my motion were passed and everyone received the full $250 a month which my motion proposes and, on top of that, the full amount that is now being paid as a supplement, the totals would still be a little below these minimal amounts that have been given to us by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

I urge that this matter be given serious consideration. I know that there have been times in this parliament when the mood and the climate were such that one could push for better benefits for senior citizens and make more headway than one could at other times. I know that at the moment it is a rather hostile time, with all the preaching about restraint and all the rest of it. But the fact of the matter is that the nearly 2 million Canadians who are 65 years of age or over have a right to have their conditions improved, and I think it is little enough to ask that the basic pension for these persons be fixed at not less than $250 a month plus the additions that are provided in the legislation.

Now, Sir, there are many aspects to this. There is the whole question of escalation, the question of universality, taxation, and other things in which senior citizens are interested.

We have moved a long way since I first started talking about old age pensions in this place. We have moved into the field of housing, of medicare, and so on. but it is still true that at least half of the Canadian people who are 65 years of age and over are having a tough time to get along, and we should do a lot better for them.

Time is limited in this hour and I want to use less than the full 20 minutes allotted to me, so I simply present this motion once again, perhaps the thousandth time or more that I have made an old age pension suggestion in this Chamber. I plead that the time has come to increase the basic amount to at least $250 a month plus the extras, and certainly the time has come to make pensions available both under the Old Age Security Act and under the Canada Pension Plan to all our people on a voluntary basis at the age of 60, provided only that they are out of the labour market. I present the motion, hoping that this time the House will consider it favourably.

● (1620)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to the debate on this motion will be as brief as possible; however, first of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the motion he has placed before the House. We must recognize that the dean of the House is demonstrating considerable perseverance while taking advantage of every means offered by the procedure to urge the government to improve the lot of each and every Canadian 60 years old and over, something for which the House should commend him.

On the other hand, the platform of the Social Credit Party of Canada, to which I belong, has always included a provision for lowering the optional retirement age limit to 60. Therefore, not only do we advocate lowering retirement age, but we urge the government to increase the amounts paid under the Old Age Security Pension and the Canada Pension Plan so that all retired Canadians may have enough to support themselves.

Is Canada economically and financially able to meet the requirements of this motion? The gross national product is kept at a reasonable rate, in spite of the increase in the number of unemployed Canadians. They could help increase the GNP if they could use their energies to make the production greater, thus allowing us to reach quite easily the aim of the motion.

Financially, we also can wonder whether Canada can face such expenditures. As far as I am concerned, I think so, but budgetary cuts should obviously be made, especially with respect to the interest paid by Canada on the national debt. In the current fiscal year, the federal treasury will have to pay $4 billion; interest on the national debt alone and it is impossible to know from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to whom that interest is paid. Let me refer to the answer reported in Hansard for February 1, 1977 in reply to a question I raised, No. 1,389. I was asking for some information every Canadian should know, namely the total amount of the national debt, to whom is this debt owing and who are our creditors. Is this a long term or a short term debt? Efforts will be made to try to find answers which are not available. Interests are paid, but we cannot know to whom? We owe money and we do not know to whom?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I believe the Minister of Finance should consider the answer that has been given, and I imagine it was prepared by a public servant who did not want to take the trouble of going to the bottom of things. I do not know the public servant who prepared the answer, but I know the Minister of Finance well, and this is why I ask him to do everything possible to provide us with information on this matter because we are entitled to it. We should know the true financial situation of our country.

From the reply it has given, the government is obviously not prepared, as I have just said, to give us this information, but once again, I demand it. The government is able to tell us to whom we have paid $2,975,787,998 for the old age security pension of people 65 and over. It is able to provide us with names and addresses and it is also able to tell the House that an amount of $34,936,432 was paid out in allocations to the spouses 60 and over from October 1975 to March 31, 1976. It can also tell the House that the amount of $923,251,220 was paid out in income supplement, which makes a total of $3,933,975,630. The government is able to provide all this information to the House. I congratulate the government because those are clear answers that have been read into the official report.

Mr. Speaker, as of April 1, 1976, there were 855,600 males and 1,101,300 females aged 65 and over, or a total of 1,956,-900 people who received old age security pensions. I am putting all those figures on the record in answer to those who suggest that it is impossible, that the expense is beyond our means. And when I am finished with those figures, I believe it will be recognized that the motion now before us is reasonable and Canada can afford it.

At the same date, there were 896,900 people between 60 and 64 years, 434,900 males and 462,000 females. We would have to know how many are now receiving spouse allowances, in order to know how many would be entitled to OAS pensions and to determine the actual cost to the federal treasury. That could be computed. Of the total cost, deduction should be made of the current cost to the federal treasury of social welfare benefits paid to people in that category under agreements with the provinces. The actual cost would be known only after such computations were made.

There is another factor to consider. A number of those people will retire voluntarily from the labour force, to be replaced mainly by people currently unemployed who now receive government assistance in the form of unemployment insurance or social welfare benefits. This involves a significant amount of money. If those unemployed were to take the jobs vacated by people retiring, this would mean so much UIC and welfare benefits we would not have to pay. Moreover, these new wage earners will be paying taxes that will replete the federal treasury and help pay the OAS benefits referred to in this motion.

For all these reasons it is high time in my view that the government introduce legislation to amend existing acts, to give such persons the benefits referred to in the motion.

I suggest this country must secure a well deserved income security for elderly people. If we consider all achievements in Canada over the past 40 years, one can see they are largely due to people who are 60 years or over, keeping in mind nevertheless that younger ones have also contributed.

One must also take into account that people of 60 and over have worked in very difficult and sometimes inhuman conditions and that without their courage and strength, today's generation would not have the facilities and opportunities now at their disposal. By the way, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask young people and adults who are or would like to be on the labour market to talk to elderly people and draw comparisons between opportunities today and at that time. At present, one can load a van while sitting on a heavy machine and handling levers, whereas people of 60 years and over had to do it with small shovels with handles three feet long. It was much more exhausting and much less profitable. Young people, who critize easily, should absolutely consider all the advantages of which they can avail themselves. I am convinced they can reason and take all these matters into consideration. They would surely be willing to pay more taxes to ensure old age security pensions at a reasonable rate and enable elderly people to enjoy for a few more years the opportunities Canada may offer them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we must be grateful to the hon. member and we should adopt this motion as soon as possible. We would then show much understanding and would at the same time carry out our duty as parliamentarians and administrators.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, with pensions being so prominent in the news, particularly with regard to indexing, I am very pleased to be able to speak today on motion No. 23. The reputation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is well known and respected, particularly in the area of pension plans, and for that reason I should like to be able to assure him of my support for this motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least the hon. member's heart is in the right place.

Mr. Philbrook: However, that is not possible because, far from improving the situation with regard to pension plans in Canada, this motion might in some ways and in some cases make the situation even worse.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a number of suggestions in his motion which would represent a radical change in the Canadian pension system and in the costs paid by the Canadian taxpayer. Before looking at these proposals in detail, I think it might be useful to look at the present system of pensions in Canada, to consider the many changes and improvements which have been made in the old age security program and the Canada Pension Plan, and to examine the benefits retired Canadians can expect under the current provisions of these programs. Such an examination appears to be in order if an objective assessment is to be made of the sweeping alterations proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1630)

Just 12 years ago, in 1965, the income guaranteed to a retired Canadian by the government of Canada was only $75 per month, payable at age 70 under the Old Age Security Act. In other words, a married couple both 70 years of age or over could expect a total of $1,800 per year only, in public pensions. If they wished to retire at an earlier age or live at a higher standard it was expected they would have private resources to do so. Since then some dramatic improvements have been made in retirement benefits for the elderly.

In 1966 the retirement age for old age security began to be reduced, a year at a time, until it reached the present old age security retirement age of 65 in 1970. This fact should be borne clearly in mind when looking at suggestions to reduce retirement age to 60. The payment of OAS benefits as early as age 65 has been available for only seven years.

Also in 1966 the Canada Pension Plan came into effect. This compulsory and contributory pension plan, which covers virtually every Canadian wage earner, has grown increasingly important as a source of present and future retirement income. The maximum new CPP retirement benefit payable in 1977 is $173.61 per month, and consequently exceeds the current Old Age Security benefit of $141.34 per month.

Two points underlying the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan and most relevant to this motion should perhaps be made at this juncture. The first is that the Canada Pension Plan was designed as a pension scheme whose ultimate retirement benefit would be related to the contributor's lifetime earnings, and which would be funded by the contributions of its membership. It was realized that living costs vary greatly between urban and rural areas as well as between different regions in Canada. The income which Canadian people needed, if either retirement, death or disability of the head of the family were to remove the regular source of income, was related in part to the level of earnings to which they had become accustomed. Thus, what underlay the creation of the Canada Pension Plan was an understanding that adequate levels of pension could not realistically be achieved in a country like Canada simply by increasing the flat rate OAS pension indefinitely. That understanding is equally applicable today in considering this motion.

The second point that should be made about the Canada Pension Plan is that it was not intended to provide all the retirement income which Canadians might wish to have, even in conjunction with the Old Age Security pension. Rather, the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act were seen as providing the first two layers in a three-tiered retirement system. The first tier, the flat rate Old Age Security pension, provides a base on which the second tier, the earnings related

Canada and Quebec Pension Plan benefits, is built. Together with the guaranteed income supplement, these benefits ensure a minimum amount of income which adequately provides for the basic needs of the individual on retirement. The third level of the system is the additional income available through private pension plans, registered retirement savings plans, investments or other sources, which can be seen as providing whatever supplementary margin of comfort the individual might require.

The suggestion that Old Age Security benefits be raised to $250 should therefore not be looked on as a recommendation that Canadian pensioners should be provided with a retirement income of $250 per month. Rather, it is a recommendation that the over-all benefits for pensioners from a three-tiered system of retirement income should be increased, by an amount which would vary between about only $10 and $110. This variation, by the way, comes as a result of the suggestion in the motion that the other income support programs embodied in the OAS program be dropped. These income support programs are the guaranteed income supplement and the spouses' allowance.

The guaranteed income supplement, or GIS, was introduced in 1967 very shortly after the Canada Pension Plan came into being. The maximum benefit under this program was originally set at $30 per month during the first year of the program and 40 per cent of the OAS pension for subsequent years. An income test was applied to the benefits, and provided for reductions of $1 for every $2 of extra income, excluding Old Age Security benefits for a single person. For a married couple the reduction was $1 for every $4 of family income.

GIS was originally intended to be a transitional program which would gradually be phased out as the Canada Pension Plan took effect. The supplement was therefore made available only to persons born before December 31, 1910, that is, to persons who were over 55 years of age at the inception of the CPP and who would therefore not have an opportunity to build a full ten-year CPP benefit before reaching age 65.

It was felt that those who did have an opportunity to build a full CPP retirement pension would have less need for such a supplementation program. However, in practice this has not proved to be entirely the case. Some persons, housewives, for example, are not directly covered by the Canada Pension Plan or only become entitled to a small CPP pension on retirement. The guaranteed income supplement proved to be of great value in providing income only for those retired Canadians who were most in need, without placing an inordinate burden on the Canadian taxpayer. Consequently the supplement was made permanent in 1970, and since then has been expanded and improved. The maximum GIS benefit is now $99.13 per month, which is more than 70 per cent of the current Old Age Pension.

I should emphasize the value of this program, since it is implicit in the motion which we are discussing that the guaranteed income supplement would be eradicated and, in effect, replaced by a very large increase in the flat rate OAS benefit. The replacement will cost vastly more, and will mainly benefit those whose income is already large enough that they do not qualify for a substantial amount of supplementation. I would note that the suggested benefit level would raise the income of a single person now receiving the full supplement, by less than $10. Such a pensioner already receives $240.47 per month as of January 1, 1977. With the pension being indexed, this may well go over $250 in the near future.

It is clear that the member's proposal fails to bridge the income gap between those who depend on OAS benefits and those who have other means. On the contrary, a retired Canadian who formerly received the guaranteed income supplement would suddenly find that his income, relative to that of other pensioners with large CPP or private pensions, has dropped sharply. The existence of GIS has, in effect, been a recognition that those who had no opportunity to contribute to CPP have made a contribution, perhaps in other ways. We should not be overly hasty in removing this recognition simply in order to provide some pensioners with more money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the hon. member have permission to put a question to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook)?

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to leave it to the end, if I may. I have only a few more remarks to finish off.

These remarks would apply equally to the spouse's allowance, which is also an income tested benefit, and which was made a part of the old age security program in 1975. The spouse's allowance provides a benefit for spouses, between the ages of 60 and 65, of persons in receipt of old age security benefits. The maximum amount of the spouse's allowance is equal to the basic old age security benefit plus the maximum guaranteed income supplement at the married rate.

This program, like the guaranteed income supplement, was introduced in recognition of the special needs of a particularly vulnerable segment of the retired population. Married couples are more often than not several years apart in age. Consequently, it will often happen that the major or only wage earner in the family will reach age 65 and retire, or be forced to retire, but the spouse, being several years younger, is not yet entitled to OAS or GIS benefits. This situation meant that many retired couples were having to struggle along for several years on a single old age security pension and a single guaranteed income supplement payment before the other spouse finally became eligible for OAS and GIS benefits.

On the other hand, many couples are not placed in financial difficulty through differences in their ages. We can imagine, for instance, a family with a single wage-earner where the spouse who works at home has reached age 65, while the wage-earner is several years younger and is still working. This couple has not retired in any sense of the word and should not be given any special benefits. It is for reasons such as this that benefits like the spouse's allowance are income-tested.

To show what can happen with an inflexible and monolithic approach we could imagine for the moment that the suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have been adopted in full. Suppose now that the major wage-earner in the family reaches age 60 and retires. Again this may very well be a compulsory retirement, if past experience with lowering retirement ages is any indication. If the spouse at home is a few years younger, we have recreated the same problem five years earlier. The government of the day would have the alternatives of ignoring the same very serious problem which this government felt it could not disregard, or of reintroducing the income-tested spouse's allowance, payable now at age 55. Therefore you are back to square one.

With the introduction of the spouse's allowance, the current spectrum of public retirement pension programs is virtually complete. However, there are a number of major benefit improvements which have also occurred in the past few years which are relevant to this motion.

May I mention them briefly, without going into detail? I am thinking of measures for indexing OAS and CPP introduced in 1967. These programs have been indexed quarterly since 1973. I think also of the periodic quantum jumps in these benefits which took place in 1970, 1972 and 1973 and of the elimination of qualifying tests with regard to CPP in 1975. As the minister has announced, the government plans to introduce a new bill providing for reciprocal agreements with other countries for pension plans and payments.

As a result of the many improvements in benefits for the aged in recent years, some of which I have described, the elderly are now guaranteed income levels which often exceed those guaranteed to other deserving groups such as the disabled, the retarded, certain single parent families, and the working poor. Could we in all conscience direct the very large amounts of additional funds which these proposals would entail entirely toward increasing benefits to the elderly, without considering whether, with the limited resources available for income security, we should not be directing our attention to the needs of these other groups?

In closing, may I congratulate the hon. member on introducing this motion for debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask my question now?

Mr. Philbrook: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member not realize that in my motion I did not ask for the eradication of the supplement? I asked for the removal of the means test on it. Since that is the basis of my motion, would it not make quite a difference to the hon. member's argument?

Mr. Philbrook: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, if that point was clearly defined in the motion. It is valuable to have it noted. I can only say that the hon. member's suggestion would raise total payments under our pension program to higher levels and impose an increasingly difficult tax burden. I think it is worth making that point clear.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member who resumed his seat a moment ago, because I wanted to know if, in regurgitating ministerial speeches as reported for many years in Hansard, he would address himself to the thrust of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and tell the House why the basic pension figure mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not attainable in present day circumstances. He did not do that. Therefore the case made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not been rebutted. If the hon. member made a case with respect to the figure mentioned, that case has not been answered.

Conversely, I listened carefully to my friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to hear him justify the particular figure chosen, because we must all admit that it would entail a considerable increase. Unfortunately, I heard no figures relating to national economic expenditures of government and a whole host of other criteria which must be considered, which would justify and establish the figure the hon. member suggested.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My purpose was to establish the need.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would not deny for a moment the figures brought forward relating to need. I am not arguing that point, but I am glad he raised it. That is why it was doubly incumbent for some spokesman on the government side to indicate why the hon. member's proposal cannot be adopted. But this has not happened.

I suggest that not one member of this House would say that if the figures proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are reasonably attainable, those amounts ought not to be paid to senior citizens of this country. But some members skirt round the issue. Some regurgitate ministerial speeches; some read answers to questions on the order paper. But I suggest that not one member of this House would say that we ought not to pay that amount if it could be established that, as a country, we can afford to pay it.

The hon. member's case must be made or rejected, otherwise this kind of debate degenerates to an auction, to a tendering contest.

Some further considerations deserve mentioning. I do not know if the $250 figure is right, if it ought to be $300, or more, or less. I do not know that; that is why I listened carefully to the debate in this House. I wanted to hear someone say that that figure is wrong. Yet nobody on the government side said that. I suggest that, in the face of the need demonstrated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if the figure he mentioned is attainable, it ought to be paid. But it is important not to let this kind of debate degenerate into an auction.

We ought to address ourselves to the problems of this country's senior citizens, because there are problems. I talked on the telephone yesterday to a senior citizen who says that the pension base is too low. Our older people say, "We like indexing; it is fine, but the figure upon which indexing is based is too low." Senior citizens are in favour of indexing. Some think it is wonderful. Although some of them deny it, I suggest that indexing is a great benefit for senior citizens. Yet, as I say, the base is low. They come to me and say, "Mr. Baker, I cannot pay my rent; I cannot pay the fuel bill; I am a proud person; I do not want to go on welfare." They say this to all of us in this House. I am sure that hon. members who represent senior citizens know that this is the case, that I am correct in saying these things.

All in this House applauded when we recently increased the Canada Pension Plan pay out. What happened when we increased that pay out? That increase was necessary by virtue of the ravages of inflation. I do not intend to sound partisan, because our inflation was out of control. No sooner had we granted an increase in the Canada Pension Plan than the provincial governments lopped off from their contributions an amount equal to the increase we had brought forward. Provincial departments responsible for social affairs put people back into positions they had previously occupied when they had suffered from the ravages of inflation running at 10 per cent, or more per annum. That is something we in parliament must attack if we are to walk out of this place with our heads high. We should be able to tell our constituents that we are doing something for the disadvantaged.

Why are we in politics? All of us, regardless of what side of the House we sit on, are here because we are concerned one way or another. Everyone of us wants this country to be a place where a senior citizen or a person approaching that age can have a sense of security. They do not now have a sense of security. It is better than it was, but they do not have it. Anyone who goes among senior citizens knows this.

We want this country to be for senior citizens just as we want it to be the land of opportunity for young people. We do not want our young people to be satisfied with the lowest common denominator. Surely we ought not to allow our senior citizens to be satisfied with the lowest common denominator either. There are some real challenges to us in social services legislation, not only in dollar terms but in the integration of that legislation. There is not a member of this House who does not support the spirit in which this has been advanced.

I want to say something else to the hon. member. I know he emphasized at the beginning of his speech the aspect of voluntariness in terms of retiring. He knows and I know, because we have discussed it, that there is bound to be in any system, even based on a voluntary acceptance of it, an encouragement to people to opt out of their professions and jobs because there is an opportunity for them to do so. I would not deny them that opportunity, but I think there can be a denial of their expertise, training and wisdom to the country. The country needs them.

My father, who died a year ago on March 5, was a druggist in a small town. My mother, my brother and I tried to persuade him to stop working because he was getting old. He said to me, "What would I do? I could work in my garden for a while. I could look after my wife, but how am I going to stay in the mainstream of life? Who is it that can face me and encourage me to leave the mainstream of life?" That is what we may be doing with this motion. We finally talked him into selling his small business. The only term and condition upon which he would sell was if his nephew, who bought it, would allow him to work in it. He worked out his days until he was stricken and died, but he contributed.

In many ways we are looking at the wrong end of this spectrum. We ought to be encouraging people to work. We let judges sit until they are 75, and very few of them retire before that time. Why? Because they have something to contribute.

I went to a senior citizen's meeting at the Nepean Sportsplex. Good friends of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were there. We discussed the problem of how to involve them in the community in a big way. The hon. member's good friends, and he knows who I am talking about, came to me and said that they want to be involved.

I looked over that group. There were retired statisticians, businessmen, professional men, teachers, nurses, all people who want to contribute. We have come to the point where we look for people going out of the work force instead of working and searching for policies that will widen the opportunities for people to go into the work force. We sometimes see the wrong end of the problem.

I do not want the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to feel that I oppose his motion, because I do not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do you support it?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I would be quite prepared to sit down and allow this matter to come to a vote. I hope that happens. At least this matter would get to a committee where we could study it in depth, rather than in the bowels of the bureaucracy, and then be presented with a bill, white paper or orange paper. It could be discussed openly. People could come before a committee of this House to discuss their problems in terms of retirement and pensions. We who are younger and try to impose things on older people could have the benefit of advice from those upon whom we might wish to impose programs. That is the problem with this place.

I am going to sit down in the hope that this matter can and will be resolved in this House today.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has asked for costs. Well, I have some costs. Unhappily, in the two minutes remaining there will not be much time to put them on the record. I reckon that at a minimum in the first year of operation the program proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would cost $1.5 billion.

The recommendation is for a program without a means test. That means there is no guarantee that the increase in benefits would go to those who need them most. The people whose plight the hon. member—

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTED RESTRICTION ON USE OF AGENTS BY CROWN CORPORATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under a matter of vital importance to this nation. In view of the ongoing debate on the mystery surrounding agents used by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in selling atomic reactors to other countries, and in view of the fact that the minister responsible for this agency says after all these months he is still in the dark about who gets what as agency fees in those export sales, and because there seems to be a direct contradiction between the statement of the Banca della Swizzera Italiania on the role of its subsidiary, Intercontinental General Trading Establishment, in the sale of the Canadian atomic reactors to Argentina and that of the president of AECL before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the major officials of the Crown corporations and indeed of all federal Crown corporations, engaged in selling products or services, be required to take an oath of office upon accepting their position that they will not make any payments of taxpayers' funds that the minister responsible to the House cannot account for to parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT HOLD FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE TO SET STANDARDS FOR MEAT INSPECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an extremely important matter.

Considering that present regulations governing slaughterhouses differ depending on which permit they operate under, either Canada Approved or Quebec Approved, and that this may create problems for the management of such business as well as a certain confusion among consumers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House strongly recommend to the government of Canada calling a federal-provincial conference of agriculture ministers of the federal and provincial governments to agree on standard regulations for the classification of meats and the general operation of slaughterhouses.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

PENSION ACT

PROPOSAL TO PROVIDE COMPENSATION TO WORLD WAR I PRISONERS OF WAR SIMILAR TO THAT PROVIDED WOLRD WAR II PRISONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion concerning a matter of urgency, to be dealt with by the minister concerned when he returns to the House, as we hope, in a few days. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Stanley, are you lost for words?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I had the motion mixed up with other amendments which are to be moved later this day.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming:

That this House urges the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce the necessary amendments to the Pension Act so that the compensation for prisoners of war provided therein will apply to the limited number of Canadian veterans still living who were prisoners of war during World War I, as it does to those who were prisoners of war during World War II.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF FUNDS PROVIDED TO CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, may I seek permission to move a motion under Standing Order 43? In view of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) remark last week, when asked why he did not do something about separatists in Radio-Canada, that it was "one of the most impossible tasks I've ever tackled. What can I do?" I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy):

That the government immediately reverse its decision to increase the budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation next year by $50 million, to a total of $466 million, limit the increase to 7 per cent or $30 million, use part of the funds thereby released to return to medical and scientific research the funds that were withheld last year for reasons of restraint, and use the balance of these released moneys for other desirable programs such as widows' pensions for veterans whose disability pensions are 48 per cent or less.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF RENEWAL OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—COMPOSITION OF GROUP MEETING WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the Minister of Finance has managed to maintain simultaneously both that economic conditions are favourable at the present for an end to controls and that the decontrol process may not begin for another year, would he now try to make some contribution toward clarifying his position? First, can he tell the House whether he will ask the provinces to renew their anti-inflation program agreements when they expire this April; and, if he will ask for a renewal, can he tell the House for how long a period he will suggest that the contracts ought to be renewed?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the provinces to continue their participation. In the meantime a group representative of several government of Canada departments will be calling on the provinces for the purpose of discussing the provisions which we set before the meeting last week and seeking their support in particular for a general agreement in which the private sector would participate to restrain inflationary expectations after controls.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's reference to a group to be sent forth, and his statement on the CTV program "Question Period" last weekend that "in the case of provincial governments we'll be proposing to send out contacts at the official level, to pursue in more detail our proposals," may I ask the following question? Will the minister indicate how many contacts will be sent forth, who they will be and what will be the nature of their briefing prior to their going forth to meet, presumably, with their provincial counterparts?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, each of the provinces will be visited by the group representative of the Anti-Inflation Board, my department and the Department of Labour. The principal reason, of course, will be to speak to the provincial governments as a follow-on to the meeting last week to see what their preferences are with regard to the decontrol and post-control period, the provinces having asked for the opportunity to consider the proposals I put to them last week.

ALLEGED LACK OF PROPOSALS FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): As more than one provincial treasurer was disappointed in the substantial lack of planning shown at the federal level at the meeting last week with provincial treasurers, and considering that provincial economic policies will require adjustment to a decontrol economy and other fiscal positions, wage negotiation strategies and other decisions relating to the pricing of government services, does the minister concede that it will be exceptionally difficult for the provinces to prepare their economic plans until the minister makes some public proposals which will fill the policy vacuum left by his indecision and vacillation in these important areas?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we see one side of a tactic. If I had put forward definitive proposals for bringing it to an end, ending all federal control, undoubtedly the hon. member and many of the provincial ministers would have condemned me for having presented the provinces with a fait accompli.

Mr. Stevens: That is how you brought in controls.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I might point out to the hon. member that we brought in controls after the request of the provincial premiers and direct consultation with them about this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Since controls were introduced after that consultation, it seems to make ample good sense to remove them after consultation with the provinces. We hope that the provinces will pay close attention to the options available so that we may introduce them in the decontrol and post-control periods.

REASON FOR SUGGESTING DECONTROL NOW—POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUING HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND NO GROWTH

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, considering that the minister said on January 24 at the Canadian Club in Toronto that "we need to see further progress in reducing the rate of inflation" before ending controls and then one week later on February 1 said that there now seems to be a green light for decontrol, what has happened in the economic situation which now leads him to believe this is a proper time to go ahead with decontrols?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the hon. member is not quoting fully the speech I made in which I said that the general economic climate would appear to favour decontrol but the ambiguous and difficult thing is that there is not that reduction in expectations necessary. If we can get a commitment on the part of all the major decision makers in the community to restrain expectations after controls come off, indeed we could look to do so at an early date. If we fail to get that then of course controls will have to continue through the end of this year into the next.

Mr. Gillies: As well as the minister's suggestions on January 24 and February 1, the minister also said, adding to the confusion of the situation, that perhaps controls could last well into 1978, does the minister believe, seeing that he has now said that the situation in economic terms is favourable for decontrol, we will have precisely the same economic conditions in 1978 as we have today?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, one cannot be certain of that, but there would be indications that we would not have as, for example, the United States had in the year 1973-74, that severe pressure of demand that made it so difficult for the Americans to withdraw from the controls. Naturally, the economic situation may change over time. That is all the more reason that, not only the provinces, but the business sector and the union movement should agree on participating with this government in effective decontrol and post-control measures so that we can indeed take advantage of getting controls off as soon as we can.

Mr. Gillies: Is the Minister of Finance suggesting in his answer that Canadians can look forward, through the balance of this year and into 1978, to continuing high levels of unemployment and no economic growth? Are these the implications of the remarks the minister is making at the present time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member knows that is not true.

STATISTICS CANADA

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON NEW METHOD OF COLLECTING STATISTICS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since Statistics Canada excludes from its determination of monthly unemployment levels all those who have not looked for work since leaving their last job, and since such a method seriously understates the real level of unemployment in Canada, particularly in regions of persistently high unemployment, will the minister undertake to investigate this situation immediately and bring forward a new method of collecting unemployment figures which more accurately reflects reality?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I already considered this matter and communicated with Statistics Canada. Of course, the question of the scientific methods of assessing the unemployment level in Canada is extemely complex and I think we can argue at length on that matter. The hon. member might think that the questions are not put in a satisfactory manner, but a large part of the Canadian public also think that the questions are put so as to reflect a higher unemployment rate than the actual rate. This matter may be debated at length. I took note of the hon. member's recommendations, which I already transmitted to Statistics Canada, but so far they have not told me they intend to change their method.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Since the inclusion of the 450,000 who left the labour force because they were either fired or laid off during 1976 would have boosted the national average rate of unemployment to 11 per cent as against the official rate of 7.1 per cent, would the minister not do something more than he has just indicated he has done, which, if I understood him correctly, was simply to communicate his interest in this subject to his officials? Would he go beyond this and make a recommendation to his officials to include such people in the official data so that when we get the monthly figures we would know more accurately where we stand with reference to this serious human problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this is not a very simple proposition. We must look at both sides of the medal. For example, many people refuse jobs which do not meet their requirements.

I believe this is an extremely complex technical question. The hon. member cannot look at only one side of the medal, he must also consider the other. Although I am not an expert in that field, I think the Statistics Canada has shown in the past a great expertise in this regard. Several countries seek information from our institutions with the hope of getting statistics as good as those Canada now has.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—SUGGESTION NEW CRITERIA BE USED FOR ALLOCATING FUNDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Since I have obtained no commitment whatever from the minister to do anything about this situation I will refer my last question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the inclusion of the 450,000 men and women to whom I have referred would bring the number of Canadians out of work for 1976 to a total of more than one million, and since the regions of persistently high unemployment are those most adversely affected by the present method of presenting data, which distorts the real unemployment figure, I ask the minister responsible for a variety of job creation programs which are dependent on the official statistics whether he will undertake an immediate revision of the criteria he now uses when allocating funds for job creation and adopt new criteria by the end of the week?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Here again, we have Broadbent's Bureau of Statistics. There are great distortions in his figures as well. In point of fact, we do know where the high levels of unemployment are and we know that the funds are being directed to those areas with increasing emphasis; there were some changes I thought necessary in the criteria for the Canada Works and the Young Canada Works programs. I welcome input from the hon. member. I have yet to hear from his or from any member of his party as to how things might be improved.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Cullen: They have yet to take up my invitation to discuss the matter with my officials and examine the criteria, but if they have any suggestions I shall be happy to look at them.

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW FACILITIES IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Over the weekend, information media reported that the government plans to build four federal buildings to be used as penitentiaries in Quebec. Can the minister tell the House whether the construction of those penitentiaries is due to the fact that the number of clients in that field is increasing or to the fact that buildings now used to this end have become so dilapidated as to be non-usable?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, of course we have across Canada a penitentiary building construction program which takes several factors into consideration. One of these is the federal government's wish to finally close down some old institutions and, seeing the hon. member speaks of the province of Quebec, one of the reasons why we wish to build additional facilities is to allow us to close down what is commonly known as the "old pen". As the "old pen" has cells for over 400 prisoners, and as we intend to build new prisons taking into account the most modern concepts of penal science, we intend to build institutions for a maximum of 185 to 200 inmates. Now, the wish to close down the "old pen" at St. Vincent-de-Paul in addition to the need to face the increase in the number of prisoners, which goes up by about 3 per cent each year but which last year in Quebec went up by almost three times the national average, force us to build new penitentiaries in that area.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Given his positive answer, could the minister tell the House which sites and locations are being considered for the erection of these buildings and also how many inmates each one of these buildings will house?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, we are considering buildings which would house around 185 inmates in medium security penitentiaries and about 196 inmates in maximum security penitentiaries. Concerning the selection of sites where these penitentiaries will be erected in Quebec, we are now considering a whole list of possible locations and I hope to be able to make a final decision in four to six weeks from now.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a further supplementary to the minister.

Considering the affirmative answer of the minister and the fact that the media have already made public the sites selected for these buildings, can he tell the House whether this information was correct or it was only speculation?

Mr. Fox: Of course this was speculation, Mr. Speaker, because none of these sites has been definitely completed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Welcome back, Erik.

POSSIBILITY OF DELAYING DECISION ON SITES OF NEW INSTITUTIONS PENDING REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I am never at home any more and I am never in the House any more. Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. In his reply to the hon. member who preceded me, he said that he would be making decisions in four to six weeks with respect to the locations of several new institutions in the Canadian penal system. Will he inform the House whether it is his intention to delay the making of those decisions until after receiving the report of the sub-committee investigating penitentiaries, which has kept me and a good many other members of the House busy since last October?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the penitentiaries mentioned by the hon. member are part of a program which was initiated a long time ago by my predecessor, because he had to face an extremely urgent need for cells in several areas in Canada. We intend to proceed with a few of these programs, considering that the decision to do so will not be affected in any way by the report of the committee which deals, of course, with a whole range of other matters.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—DATE OF SIGNING DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT—NATURE OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. With reference to the remarks of the premier of Prince Edward Island a few days ago when he indicated that agreement has been reached on the funding for the next year or two of the P.E.I. development plan, I wonder whether or not the minister can give us a firm date of the actual signing of this next funding agreement for the amount of $30 million, and also whether there will be at the time of the signing a more complete explanation of the nature of the expenditure of funds in the next period, particularly taking into account some of the criticisms that have been made within P.E.I. about public participation and the particular economic needs of this area in terms of high energy costs and probable seasonal unemployment?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do expect that the agreement covering the funding for the last three years of phase II of the Prince Edward Island development plan might be signed within the next few weeks. As to the series of questions asked by the hon. member, I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I would have to make a rather lengthy statement to cover all the points he has mentioned. But I could take the first opportunity to do so. Should the hon. member wish to meet me personally to pursue the conversation, I am always at his disposal.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): As I am sure the minister is well aware, on the original signing in 1969 there was a very complete explanation of the plan to the people of Prince Edward Island and the people of Canada generally. In view of the fact that many unanswered questions existed after the signing of the second phase in 1975 at which the minister participated, and in view of the considerable funds yet to be expended both by provincial and federal governments, can the minister assure the House that there will be a detailed accounting of the funds that are to be expended either in the next year or the next three years as well as some specific reference in dollar amounts as to where these funds will be expended in terms of the basic sectors of development in P.E.I.?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I will try to provide the hon. member with as many details as possible with regard to expenses and amounts which will be allocated to various sectors of the economic activity in the island, according to the agreement which has been signed. It is very detailed and I think the hon. member might be satisfied with it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY WHETHER BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS INSTITUTE, TORONTO, WAS INVESTIGATED—REASON STOLEN DOCUMENTS NOT RETURNED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that it is now clearly established that the security services of the RCMP used as the basis for the evidence which they turned over to the Solicitor General in 1971 materials which were stolen from the office of Praxis Institute in Toronto, can the Solicitor General inform the House today whether he had any discussions with the RCMP to determine whether the break-in was investigated at the time or whether an inquiry will commence now to establish who the thieves were and what their motivation was in carrying out this selective burglary?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is fully aware that if it is a criminal offence committed in the province of Ontario—and from what he said it did happen in that province—needless to say the investigation, if there is to be one, must be conducted by the Ontario attorney general, in a well understood federalism.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, since the section of the security service of the RCMP does not operate under any jurisdiction other than that of the minister's own department, can the minister undertake today to initiate discussions with the

RCMP to at least determine one of two things: after the RCMP had assumed responsibility for the stolen documents, why did they not take the obvious action, namely, to incarcerate the people who were accused of subversive activities within our country, or else inform the Praxis Institute that these materials had been found and return them to the institute?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that the hon. member assumes certain facts and that the RCMP practice is not to confirm or deny the existence of sources, no more than the hon. member was reluctant to provide me in the House with the names of people who sent him documents which were illegally leaked out.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REASON LIBERAL RIDINGS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA RECEIVED BULK OF FUNDS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that 7 of 10 ridings in British Columbia receiving the bulk of Canada works grants are held by Liberals, would the minister tell the House whether that is by accident or design?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if it had been by design, I would have done a much better job. But I commend to the hon. member one of the better reports on this distribution written by Mr. Ken Pole in the Ottawa Journal. If the hon. member reads the article he will find that it spells out the matter so that the hon. member would be able to understand.

Mr. Whittaker: In view of the unemployment rate in the Okanagan-Boundary of 20 per cent, the third highest populated riding in British Columbia, and in view of the fact that this riding is receiving $198,000 in Canada works grants while the riding of Vancouver Centre is receiving $514,000 although it has a much smaller population, can the minister tell the House what the rate of unemployment is in Vancouver Centre?

Mr. Cullen: As I indicated to the hon. member, I am having both his riding and the riding of Cape Breton-The Sydneys checked out because it appeared to me there was an anomaly and I wanted to find out not only what unemployment figures were used but other factors as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Oberle.]

FISHERIES

SEALS—RESULTS OF MEETING WITH SWISS PROMOTER—MEASURES TO PROTECT THE HUNT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister report on the outcome of a meeting he had with a Swiss promoter on behalf of a group of international do-gooders who would interfere with the legitimate seal fishery off Canada's east coast? Can the minister tell the House what steps he intends to take to protect Canadian fishermen from these international do-gooders, and has he warned some of these people that they could in fact be mistaken for harp seals?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I might not join the hon. member in his use of colourful adjectives. However, I did try to explain to the gentleman in question and to his groups the scientific data on which this management decision was based. I did not detect in them great interest in that matter. It seemed that the group in question decided that animal killing is forbidden only for seals but not for any other species of animals which are killed for our use as meat or clothing.

As for the matter of offering money for the seals, I said that this was a matter for the fishermen themselves to decide. If they prefer to receive money rather than go to the seal hunt—which is a very dangerous occupation and at which some of them lose their lives—it is a decision for the fishermen themselves. I made it clear that the rules and regulations governing the hunt would not condone interference with honest-to-goodness efforts to earn a living, which is what the fishermen in Newfoundland and Magdalen Islands are doing. I tried to establish the facts, and I hope that this parliament will accept and the press will report those facts as they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SEALS—STATUS OF CHARGE OF INTERFERENCE WITH HUNT AGAINST BRIAN DAVIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I thank the minister for his reply. What concerns me is the incomplete litigation of the federal government with regard to the incident at the hunt last year and the impact that that could have on these people who would probably try to repeat the performance this year. Can the minister tell the House what steps the government intends to take to prevent this kind of harassment of a legitimate Canadian industry which is probably one of the most humane in the world?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): It is possible the hon. member might have been absent when my colleague, the Minister of Justice, indicated that we were appealing the decision of the court in Newfoundland. Obviously, the matter of the Canadian jurisdiction in the 200-mile zone in relation to the fisheries matters has to be reaffirmed. If the law is inadequate, I am sure the House will very quickly change it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—DATE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS AND PUBLICATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment regarding the hazards which are inherent in having supertankers delivering oil to Kitimat in the event of the proposed pipeline being constructed, from Kitimat to Edmonton. In view of the fact that on February 2 at page 2640 of Hansard the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is reported to have said that the National Energy Board is concerned only with the landward side of the project and that he could not be sure that the environmental consideration will be taken into account by that body, I wish to ask the minister two questions: the first is when will public hearings be held in the area likely to be affected; and second, can the minister assure the House that the report of the interdepartmental committee looking into the environmental impact of this proposal will be made public prior to the public hearings being held?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is correct when he distinguishes between the actual pipeline and the seaward or termpols which we would have to put in. These facilities for the navigation of tankers are obviously a subject of discussion between the Department of Transport and my own department. We have indicated that we are in favour of public hearings to make sure that all the facts are on the record. We are now having discussions between departments as to what the parameters of these public hearings would be, and we are also looking for people who could undertake to direct these hearings. I hope we can get them going as quickly as possible.

ENERGY

KITIMAT PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDIES MADE PUBLIC BEFORE HEARINGS HELD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that this matter comes under divided jurisdiction and that not only has there been an application to the National Energy Board but I understand also an application has been made to the Canadian coast-guard services, I want to ask the minister if he is prepared to consult his colleagues, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Environment, to ensure that before the National Energy Board makes a decision with respect to the pipeline from Kitimat to Edmonton, the environmental impact study is made public and public hearings are held so that the people who are affected by this project may have an opportunity to make their representations.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to give those kinds of assurances, assurances that the three ministers most concerned and identified by the hon. member do have an opportunity to assess the environmental question. I cannot give an assurance that the National Energy Board will hold up its report because we have perhaps found that the environmental risks have not been fully covered by environmental studies, but I can give the hon. member the kind of undertaking for which I think he is looking, and that is that no decision to proceed with the pipelines will be taken by the cabinet until such time as there has been a proper environmental assessment along with the National Energy Board assessment of the landward risks.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Energy Board Act requires the National Energy Board to look into the matter of the environment, I want to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources how it is possible for the National Energy Board to make an intelligent decision regarding this pipeline without looking into the marine hazards which are inherent in having 350,000 ton tankers traversing a 60-mile route to Kitimat. Surely the environmental investigation ought to be made before the National Energy Board makes a decision and submits a recommendation to the cabinet.

Mr. Gillespie: As the Minister of the Environment has already made clear, there are really two different kinds of jurisdiction involved here, the landward side and the seaward side. However, I agree with the hon. member that both have to be considered, and no decision should be taken until both have been fully considered.

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW INSTITUTIONS—POLICY WITH REGARD TO HIRING OF TECHNICAL AND DESIGN PERSONNEL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the answer of the Solicitor General to the hon. member for Yukon with reference to the building of penal institutions, I should like to ask the minister a further question. Will he advise the House if the design personnel and architects will be members of the public service, or will these technical people be hired from the private sector?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, a joint committee of my department has been set up to look into the whole matter and, of course if it is necessary to hire people outside, it will be done through my colleague, the Minister of Public Works. I am under the impression that, in some cases, it will be necessary to hire architects or professionals outside the public service.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: The answer of the Solicitor General to the hon. member for Yukon seemed to imply that the matter is already in hand, and I believe there are people from the private sector already hired and engaged. Will the minister advise whether those jobs have been tendered or whether they are being handed out to friends of the government, and is any consideration being given to hiring those technical people from the locality where the institution will be built? For example, we were talking about an institution in Alberta near Calgary or other places in Alberta.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the selection of professional people for the construction of government buildings is obviously a matter of policy which goes much beyond the scope of my responsibilities. It is a matter which, for all government works, comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works who alone could answer my colleague's question.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON PROGRAM IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Following the tabling of the Bibeau report on bilingualism in the Public Service, can the minister tell us whether the government has completed its study of that report and, if so, what is the reassessment of the validity or merits of that program in the Public Service? Can he tell us whether he has now drawn up some policies regarding a further review of certain positions in the Public Service? Can he or the Secretary of State tell the House whether at the present time a fairly large number of civil servants have been recalled from the language school half-way through the school year?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the full examination of the Bibeau report and other subsequent considerations with regard to policy have not yet been completed. This is being pursued very actively, and I anticipate that the government will be in a position to make a fairly comprehensive statement on the whole range of matters involved therein within the not too distant future.

[Translation]

RECALLING MEMBERS OF PUBLIC SERVICE WHO HAVE NOT COMPLETED COURSE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a final supplementary question.

Will the minister deny that there are at present guidelines in effect at the language school concerning the reassessment of the program and the progress made by civil servants? Every week, a good number of civil servants are being recalled before they have completed their course.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Well, Mr. Speaker, major changes are not taking place at the present time. There may be what I would describe as relatively minor adjustments being made, but to my knowledge no major changes are taking place. However, that is not to deny that the over-all assessment and comprehensive examination of this policy may not bring about some more significant adjustments later.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Could you publish the guidelines as soon as possible?

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

REASON FOR REPLACEMENT OF MR. GÉRIN-LAJOIE AS PRESIDENT—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SEPARATE MINISTRY FOR AGENCY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given the extension Paul Gérin-Lajoie received last year as president of the Canadian International Development Agency, what was the reason for his replacement last Friday? Second, is consideration still being given to establishing a separate ministry for CIDA to establish a much firmer ministerial and parliamentary control over this billion dollar agency, and when will this announcement be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to make any announcements in that regard. I hope members of parliament will feel free to ask the new president of CIDA any question they feel necessary, and I am sure they will receive great co-operation from the new president.

Mr. Roche: Was the criticism of the Auditor General that CIDA has "a serious internal control weakness" a factor in the replacement of the president? What instructions are being given to the new president to tighten CIDA's management operation so that public support for this important agency can be maintained?

• (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: To the first question, Mr. Speaker, the answer is emphatically no. To the second question, I have, and the minister has relations with the president of CIDA and we will indicate to him the ways in which we think he should be following government policy.

CHEMICAL CONTROL RESEARCH INSTITUTE

REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF DECISION TO RELOCATE IN SAULT STE. MARIE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment arises out of the proposed relocation of the Chemical Control Research Institute from Ottawa to Sault Ste. Marie. In view of the fact that considerable concern has been expressed by the governments of Quebec and New Brunswick and also by industry associations over the fact that this move will tend to diffuse the national flavour of this institute, and in view of the fact that the close ties established between CCRI and many government departments and agencies of government in this very important area will be broken, may I ask if consideration is being given to re-examining this move and are the objections that have been voiced by the two governments and the associations being taken into consideration?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to look at the points made by the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—POSSIBILITY SUBJECT WILL BE DISCUSSED BY PRESIDENT CARTER AND PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister intend to place the Garrison irrigation project uppermost or high on his agenda for discussion when he meets with President Carter of the United States later this month?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the agenda itself has not been formally determined. The hon. member will remember that last time I met with the president of the United States, President Ford, I believe in December of the year before last, I discussed this subject with him and got certain assurances from him.

GARRISON DIVERSION—SUGGESTION CONSTRUCTION BE HALTED AND LONETREE RESERVOIR PROJECT RECONSIDERED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what assurances he got from President Ford at that time and if he believes that those assurances will be maintained by President Carter. I should like also to ask if he would urge a halt to the construction of the Garrison project affecting Canada specifically and immediately join in further consideration of what is called the Lonetree reservoir which affects the southern portion of Manitoba?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall make every representation which I believe is in the interest of Canada. I would just remind the hon. member that when I raised the question with President Ford there had not yet been a report made to the IJC. The hon. member is aware that that report has come out now and is before the IJC and is favourable to Canada. We are expecting that the IJC will accept the conclusion of the report.

GARRISON DIVERSION—PROPOSED TRUST FUND TO PAY FOR ALTERATIONS—ALTERNATE SOURCE OF WATER FOR PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in regard to the Garrison diversion? As the United States government is proceeding with the Garrison diversion project and ignoring the $1,200,000 IJC study and report which calls for $50 million of alterations to stop pollution, and as the United States government is proceeding with work on the Lonetree and Velva canal sections of the project which will create pollution problems in Canada, I would ask the Prime Minister to negotiate with the president to place $50 million in a trust fund to allow for the alterations needed to the project and also that a timetable be established for the work necessary on such projects as the $6 million alternate water supply that will be needed for the city of Portage La Prairie?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously drawing heavily on the report itself which was commissioned by the IJC and which the IJC is presently studying. The National Joint Commission was set up by both countries precisely to deal with such matters. I am confident that they will deal with them in an equitable way and favourable to the thesis in which hon. members opposite and ourselves believe.

THE CONSTITUTION

VIEW OF PRIME MINISTER ON GREATER POWERS FOR PROVINCES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister, in a news report last week, was reported to have stated that he would be happy to live with an 1867 constitution but would be willing to be flexible and give Quebec and other provinces greater powers, would he tell the House what his concept of these greater powers consists of?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Some other time, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

GREATER USE OF RECYCLED PAPER TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that hundreds of thousands of new Bell telephone directories and government of Canada telephone directories were delivered in Ottawa recently, thus creating countless extra tons of waste paper because directories are not recyclable, may I ask that steps are being taken to ensure that government departments and industry will use more recycled waste paper with the resulting conservation of forest and energy resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope that other departments, governmental agencies and the private sector are following the lead of my department and using recycled paper for letterhead and using, if I may so describe it, the back of the sheet as well.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE LANDING STRIP AT ROUYN AIRPORT WILL BE LENGTHENED

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

He is aware of the file concerning the Rouyn-Noranda municipal airport. He met the mayor of Rouyn, as I did, on this particular issue. Is the minister in a position to come to the point about the assessment of this file, and will he be able to announce shortly some good news about the lengthening of the runway?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I did receive representations from the authorities of Rouyn-Noranda. I met them twice, we discussed this project and the need for it, particularly about the airport. I hope to be able in the not too distant future to answer the authorities of that municipality and give them a report on the progress of representations I made on their behalf.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FORCE DID NOT RETURN PRAXIS FILES AND INVESTIGATION NOT CONDUCTED INTO POSSIBILITY OF ARSON

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In answer to a question put by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, the minister asked if he could have a name to follow up on some of these things. I wanted to give the minister the name of Peter Worthington, Editor in Chief of the Toronto Sun. This information about the disappearance of files from the Praxis Institute has been with the Solicitor General for just under a week. Can he advise the House why the RCMP held the files for some six years without returning the stolen property to the owner of those files?

[Mr. Clarke.]

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier today, the RCMP had absolutely nothing to do with the alleged disappearance of files at the Praxis Institute in Toronto, and it never had in hand any indication as to what persons might have been responsible for the fire mentioned by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Solicitor General would want to canvass that answer with Mr. Peter Worthington in view of his statement that he turned those files over to the RCMP. My supplementary question is this: following the fire at the Praxis Institute no inquiry was made under provincial fire laws in respect of arson in spite of the fact that arson was suspected. Can the minister advise if he has determined in his investigation whether the RCMP contacted any provincial authority regarding whether an inquiry would be held following that fire?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, obviously I am being asked in this House a question which ought to be brought to the attention of the attorney general of Ontario, namely why there was or was not an investigation following the fire. As for me, I am unable to answer the hon. member's question.

POSSIBILITY OF BANNING YELLOW DYE NO. 5—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON USE OF FOOD COLOURINGS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that three food colours have been banned in the United States for certain uses but not banned in Canada, these being red dye No. 2, red No. 4 and carbon black, can the minister advise whether he plans to take any action on yellow dye No. 5 as new restrictions have been placed on this in the United States by the food drug administration?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, many chemicals which are banned in Canada are not banned in the U.S. and vice versa. In the specific case referred to by the hon. member, I shall have to check with my officials to see whether we intend to follow the decisions made in the U.S. or take another course of action.

• (1500)

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any progress report to make to the House on the complete review he announced last October with regard to the Canadian policy on colours in foods, drugs and cosmetic products?

Can the minister describe the difference between unemployed status Indians living on or off the reserve?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think the answer is self-evident.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that was much of an answer, considering that 2,137 status Indians living in remote areas will not qualify for Canada Works.

INFORMATION

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE CITIZENS WITH RIGHT OF ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT FILES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? In view of the Prime Minister's recent statement confirming that there are government files on millions of Canadians, and since we have no legislation the intent of which is similar to that of the United States information act, legislation which would provide Canadians with access or the right of access to such files, is it government policy to correct this situation, or should Canadians in this respect be content with having lesser rights than Americans?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I for one, as a Canadian, would not admit that we have lesser rights than the Americans. They may have more abuses there and that is why, perhaps, they have to have corrective measures. I do not think the people suspect the RCMP of conducting themselves as the FBI do.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the Prime Minister for his answer and ask if he would consider introducing methods to improve the situation since, in the past, it has been necessary for Canadians to obtain information about their own country in the United States, under the information act?

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 133—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1975-1976, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programs or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Department of Supply and Services?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-1974?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Supply and Common Administrations are concerned: 1. (a) Nil; (b) 10 contracts.

2. (1) H.G. Hunt, $14,000; (2) Pass Management Consultants Ltd., $28,500; (3) Thorne Riddell Associates Ltd., $17,000; (4) Peat Marwick and Partners, $5,000; (5) Stevenson Kellogg Ltd., $22,000; (6) E.A.C. Amy & Sons Ltd., $2,200; (7) Price Waterhouse Associates, $8,000; (8) Pass Management Consultants Ltd., $15,500; (9) Haskins and Sells Associates, $20,000; (10) E.A.C. Amy & Sons Ltd., $1,800; Total: $134,000.

3. Nil.

In so far as the Services Administration including the Receiver General for Canada is concerned: 1 to 3. The information is provided in answer to Question No. 587, answered this day.

RECEIVER GENERAL—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 587—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1975-1976, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programmes or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Office of the Receiver General?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-1974?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) Nil; (b) Three contracts.

2. (1) Peat Marwick and Partners, $8,350; (2) Peat Marwick and Partners, $2,032.30; (3) Barnet Data Systems, $1,281.70; Total: $11,664.

3. (a) $9,860; (b) $93,200.

WEST COAST WATER FREIGHT SUBSIDIES

Question No. 839—Mr. Horner:

1. For each year from 1970 to 1976 to date, how much money has been spent on the maintenance of water freight service on the Vancouver coast up to Prince Rupert?

2. Under what legislative authority, subsidy or grant do these amounts of money fall?

3. Are these amounts or subsidies now discontinued and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Vancouver N.B.C. Ports, B.C. Subsidy: 1970-71, $503,000; 1971-72, $753,000; 1972-73, $753,000; 1973-74, $753,000; 1974-75, $2,545,159; 1975-76, $3,144,374; 1976-77, $2,186,625 (seven months).

2. Section 22(d) National Transportation Act.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

3. The subsidy was discontinued on October 31, 1976 when it was determined that alternative services could be provided with significantly reduced subsidy. The new arrangements provide a separation of passenger and cargo services which should result in greater efficiency. Cargo service is being handled by tug/barge systems which have virtually replaced conventional ships in the British Columbia coastal trade. Responsibility for passenger service along the coast has been accepted by the Provincial Government with limited financial support from the Federal Government.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—OPERATING COSTS

Question No. 840—Mr. Horner:

What is the cost of operating and maintaining Mirabel Airport since its opening to date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Costs of operating and maintaining Mirabel Airport, as well as revenues received, are as follows: 1. Operating and Maintenance Costs: December 1, 1975 to March 31, 1976: $8,338,000; April 1, 1976 to September 30, 1976: $11,091,000; Total, $19,429,000.

2. Revenues: December 1, 1975 to March 31, 1976: $3,201,000; April 1, 1976 to September 30, 1976: $10,970,000; Total, $14,171,000.

SHIPS CHARTERED TO CNR—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 930—Mr. McGrath:

1. What are the names of the companies which chartered ships to CNR in Newfoundland in 1976 and were public tenders called in each case?

2. (a) What were the names of the ships (b) what was the amount and date of the charter in each case?

3. What was the daily and overtime rate in each case?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The following companies chartered ships to Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland in 1976 on a time charter basis for movement of freight to coastal points: NFLD. Marine Services Ltd., D. Frampton & Co. Ltd., The Lake Group, Topsail Shipping Co., Fogo Transport Ltd., Dorman Roberts, Puddister Shipping Co., J.B. Foote & Sons, Lake & Lake Ltd., Stena Line AB (Sweden). Tenders were called in each case.

2. (a) and (b) The names of the vessels and the dates of charter are listed below. It is not the practice of the Company to disclose the terms of arrangements with other parties. M.V. Topsail Star, 29/07/76; M.V. Dunure, 06/04/76; M.V. Clyde, 13/03/76; M.V. Nfld. Coast, 26/05/76; M.V. Marine Transport, 25/05/76; M.V. Kloster, 07/06/76, 07/10/76; M.V. Marine Voyager, 25/05/76, 24/11/76; M.V. Ambrose Foote, 01/06/76; M.V. Prince Andrew, 03/06/76; M.V. Harry Lake, 07/06/76; M.V. Glencoe, 29/07/76; M.V.

Marine Trader, 29/10/76; M.V. Sarah, 18/11/76; M.V. Stena Nordica, 01/05/76.

3. The daily and overtime rate of charter are considered privileged information between the owner and Canadian National Railways in that the bids were received in a competitive situation. In order to protect the ship owner's interest, this information is held in confidence.

CONTRACT FOR AIRPORT AND RUNWAY EXPANSION IN THE MARITIMES

Question No. 1,050—Mr. Howie:

What contracts have been executed for (a) airport building renovation or expansion (b) runway expansion or improvement in the Maritime Provinces since January 1, 1976 and, in each case, what amount is involved?

DEFENCE PRODUCTION REVOLVING FUND LOAN

Question No. 1,051—Mr. Bawden:

Was an aircraft manufacturer loaned $6,000,000 in 1972 from the Defence Production Revolving Fund and, if so (a) what was the name of the company (b) for what reason was the company not named in the Public Accounts of Canada (c) what was the purpose of the loan (d) what were the terms of repayment (e) what was the interest rate?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) Canadair Limited. (b) It is not general accounting practice to disclose the names of commercial organizations unless such information is pertinent to the disclosure note. However, reference to the loan has been made each year without naming the company viz Defence Production Revolving Fund-Balance Sheet March 31, 1976 Note 4 Public Accounts Volume II, pages 25.12 and 25.13. (c) Working capital loan was provided to Canadair for the purpose of assisting the company to carry out defence contracts. (d) Loan was to be paid two years from the date the loan was made. The original repayment date was June 8, 1974. The repayment date was extended to June 8, 1975 and again to June 8, 1976. A joint submission from D.S.S. and IT & C to the Treasury Board requesting authority to extend the Loan until September 8, 1977 is in preparation. (e) The cummulative unpaid balance of the Loan will bear interest at the current prime bank lending rates applicable throughout the period.

COST OF ICEBREAKING SERVICES

Question No. 1,145—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What was the cost of icebreaking services for the (a) St. Lawrence River (b) Gulf of St. Lawrence (c) Arctic, during 1975-76?

2. In the best estimate of the government, for the years (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76, if the total cost of providing icebreaking services in the St. Lawrence River and the estimated cost of icebreaking services undertaken in the Gulf of St. Lawrence to aid winter navigation on the St. Lawrence River from Quebec City upwards, were fully recovered by cargo assessments, what assessments would have to be levied on each ton of cargo moving via the Ports of Quebec, Trois Rivières, Montreal, Contrecoeur and Sorel assuming that such costs were fully recovered from tonnage assessments on cargo moving via these ports during the period when icebreaking was provided?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. The cost of 1975-76 Icebreaking Services:

(a) St. Lawrence River	$5,751,570
(b) Gulf of St. Lawrence	$6,914,872
(c) Arctic Operations	$8,252,884

2. (a)

Icebreaking costs	1974-75	1975-76
St. Lawrence River	$5,446,648	$5,751,570
In Gulf To Support River Shipping	4,482,430	4,036,632
Totals	$9,929,078	$9,788,202

(b) Tons of cargo moved during months of January, February and March

Port	1975	1976
Montreal	2,135,349	1,516,731
Trois-Rivières	276,255	192,445
Quebec	1,563,345	2,105,099
Sorel	166,995	69,676
Total Tonnage	4,141,944	3,883,951

NOTE: Contrecœur is considered as part of Montreal Port.

(c) Assessment per ton to recover cost of icebreaking services

1975 9929078 / 4141944 = $2.40

1976 9788202 / 3883951 = $2.52

NOTE: Assessment is based on the assumption that full icebreaking costs supporting winter river operation is recoverable from users of the above named port facilities. If user changes were instituted generally, other areas benefiting from the Coast Guard icebreaking activity would include: 1. Many private facilities along the river. 2. Those ports on the North Shore which are broken out in the spring. 3. The icebreaking carried out in the Montreal area to alleviate possible flooding of low lying areas along the river.

TRANSPORT—GRANTS TO FERRIES

Question No. 1,161—Mr. Allard:

For the fiscal year 1975-76, did the Department of Transport give any grants to (a) Dalhousie-Miguasha Ferries Ltd. (b) Northumberland Ferries Ltd. (Wood Island-Caribou) (c) Grand Manan Ferries Ltd. and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: For the fiscal year 1975-76 the Department of Transport did not give any grants to (a) Dalhousie-Miguasha Ferries Ltd., (b) Northumberland Ferries Ltd., (c) Grand Manan Ferries Ltd. For the fiscal year 1975-76 the Canadian Transport Commission did administer operating subsidies to the three named services as follows: (a) Dalhousie-Miguasha Ferries Ltd., $5,036; (b) Northumberland Ferries Ltd., $2,503,864; (c) Coastal Transport Limited, (Grand Manan-Mainland), $259,000.

PURCHASE OF RAILWAY EQUIPMENT FOR MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN GRAIN

Question No. 1,238—Mr. Herbert:

During each of the past ten years, what was the total payment made to purchase railway equipment to facilitate the movement of Canadian grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Railway (Grain) equipment purchases: 1967-68, Nil; 1968-69, Nil; 1969-70, Nil; 1970-71, Nil; 1971-72, Nil; 1972-73, $47,305,-989; 1973-74, Nil; 1974-75, Nil; 1975-76, $40,639,100; 1976-77, $100,400,000 (estimated).

"MALIBU PRINCESS"

Question No. 1,276—Mr. Friesen:

1. Has the Malibu Princess, used in the British Columbia coastal trade, been registered, insured and/or bonded by Lloyd's of London and, if so (a) what is the amount of the insurance or bond (b) on what date did the registration, insurance and/or bonding take place (c) for what length of time has the registration, insurance and/or bonding been issued?

2. What is the length, the beam and the draft of the Malibu Princess?

3. What are the Department of Transport regulations for the draft of ships assigned to open waters?

4. Since November 1, 1976, has the Malibu Princess been able to stop at all of the ports on her schedule and, if not (a) how many times has it been unable to complete its schedule (b) what were the reasons for not fully completing each trip?

5. Since November 1, 1976, has the barge service used for cars and freight been able to stop at all of the ports on the schedule and, if not (a) how many times has it been unable to complete its schedule (b) for what reason was it unable to complete each trip?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. The Malibu Princess is listed in Lloyd's Register of Shipping. This vessel is not classified by Lloyd's. Canada Steamship Inspection classified the vessel as home-trade class III. The placing of Hull and Machinery, and Protection and Indemnity Insurance is an owner/operator responsibility and risks and limits insured are not known to Transport Canada.

2. Malibu Princess as per registry of shipping: Length, 38.41 metres; Beam, 9.83 metres; Draft, 2.286 metres.

3. Draft, per se, is not regulated but is directly related to freeboard which is regulated under the General Load Line Rules. The load line position on a vessel is determined by design criteria and intended trading area. The rules for determining same are highly complex. In addition to the General Load Line Rules passenger vessels carrying more than 12 passengers must meet the Subdivision Rules for passenger vessels. These rules generally deal with the relationship of water tight subdivision, draft and freeboard. In the Canadian context voyages are foreign, home-trade, inland waters or minor waters. The Queen Charlottes lie within home-trade class III limits and any vessel wishing to trade in this area must be classified as home-trade class III. The Malibu Prin- cess has been classified as home-trade III by Canada Steamship Inspection.

4. The Malibu Princess has made all stops on her regular service schedule up to December 12, 1976 when inquiry was made of the operator.

5. So far as is known, yes, but the Government of Canada has no direct interest in the barge service referred to and, as such, detailed operating knowledge is not available. Inquiries of this nature should be requested directly from the operator.

TOTAL COST OF SNAVELY COMMISSION

Question No. 1,326—Mr. Neil:

What is the total cost to date of the Snavely Commission on the cost of transporting grain by rail?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The total cost to October 31, 1976, which is the latest date for which invoices have been received, is $422,094.74.

MONCTON AIRPORT

Question No. 1,361—Mr. Jones:

1. Are further and additional capital improvements planned for the Moncton Airport and, if so (a) what are they (b) what are the time schedules?

2. Is Moncton Airport used as an alternate international airport and, if so, what arrangements have been made to provide complete customs facilities?

3. Are steps being taken to designate the Moncton Airport as an international airport and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Otto. E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. In the master plan now under development for Moncton Airport, requirements for the following projects have been tentatively identified and desirable scheduling established. Since the Master Plan is not yet completed and approved, no commitment can yet be confirmed. Major renovations to the Air Terminal Building, 1979/80; Design and construct waste water treatment facility, 1979/80; Pave employee parking lot and industrial roads, 1977/78; Renovate Control Tower air conditioning, 1978/79; Acquire land for new Air Terminal Complex, 1979/80; Purchase property off end of runway II, 1977/78; Construct new taxiway, terminal ramp and runway 29 c/w lighting, 1979/80/81; Replace ILS equipment on runway 29, 1979/80; Construct new flight hangar and offices for Transport aircraft, 1979/80.

2. Although there is an occasional Air Canada diversion from Halifax, Moncton is not an international alternate. Limited Customs facilities are provided to meet general aviation requirements. A study on international charter access to non-international airports in Canada is currently being conducted. The results of this study pertaining to Moncton Airport are not yet known.

3. There are no plans to designate Moncton Airport as an international airport.

Order Paper Questions

PASSENGER ELEVATORS ON FERRY STEAMSHIPS

Question No. 1,398—Mr. Crosbie:

1. (a) What government authority or agency is responsible for the inspection of passenger elevators located on board passenger ferries operated for Canadian National by the East Coast Marine Services between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia (b) what safety standards are in effect with respect to such passenger elevators?

2. Are the same safety standards required for passenger ferries owned or registered under Canadian law and those chartered ferry vessels registered in other countries?

3. Are the safety standards provided by the Canadian Standards Association B44 Safety Code for elevators and lifting devices applicable to both Canadian and foreign vessels involved in passenger ferry service?

4. Have any representations been received from the Government of Newfoundland or any agency thereof about the safety features of passenger elevators on board passenger ferries operated between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and, if so, what is the nature and content of the representations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) Transport Canada (Coast Guard Ship Safety), being the authority responsible, has arranged that the inspections of these elevators be carried out by provincial (Newfoundland) inspectors who make similar inspections of shore-based elevators in buildings. The Transport marine surveyor is authorized to accept these inspections if he is otherwise satisfied. (b) The safety standards in effect for these inspections are those used normally for building elevators.

2. The Non-Canadian Ships Safety Order presently provides that chartered passenger ferry vessels registered in other countries are deemed to comply with the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act if they carry Passenger Ship Safety Certificates issued by the country of registry under the conditions of the Safety of Life at Sea Convention (1960). Since the Convention does not make specific provision for elevators, it is now the intention of Transport Canada to propose amendments to the Order to require such vessels to meet the same requirements for passenger elevators as are applied to Canadian vessels. These requirements will also be stated in greater detail by means of proposed new regulations that are now being circulated for comment.

3. Under the proposed new regulations the C.S.A. Code safety standards would apply both to Canadian ships and to foreign-registered ships operating in the Canadian Coasting Trade. At present they do not apply to the latter.

4. A letter dated August 23, 1976 was received by Transport Canada from the Hon. E. Maynard, Minister of Manpower and Industrial Relations, Newfoundland. Mr. Maynard points out that the passenger elevators on the chartered, foreign-registered passenger ferry vessels operating in Newfoundland lack certain safety features required by the C.S.A. Code.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, February 4, consideration in committee of Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax. When the committee rose on Friday, February 4, clause 52 was under consideration. Before recognizing the next hon. member, may I inform the committee that according to our records, and within the terms of the order made pursuant to Standing Order 75C, one hour and twelve minutes remain to conclude the eight hours of debate ordered by the House. Therefore, if necessary I will interrupt the proceedings at 4.20 p.m. and put all questions necessary to dispose of this stage of the bill. Shall clause 52 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 52 agreed to.

Clause 53 agreed to.

On clause 54—Determination of taxable capital gains, etc.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I am looking at the clause to make sure nothing slips by—not that the minister would wish to slip anything by. Mr. Chairman, clauses 54 and 55 are all right.

Clause 54 agreed to.

Clauses 55 and 56 agreed to.

On clause 57—Revocation.

[Mr. Milne.]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, clause 57 of the bill deals with the registered home ownership savings plan.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And other things.

Mr. Symes: I want to make some comments about this provision in the Income Tax Act. A few years ago in a budget the government introduced a provision to stimulate home building and assist young couples and lower income people to save in order that they might build a new home. The government hoped to accomplish this end with the registered home ownership savings plan. Under the plan a person would register and be able to contribute $1,000 per year to a maximum of $10,000 in ten years. That $1,000 set aside under the registered home ownership savings plan was to be tax free, as was the interest earned by moneys deposited under the plan. In other words, the moneys diverted into such a plan would never be taxed. When you look at the program and how it has been working, you find that as of 1974, the last year for which I have statistics available, some $65 million of tax savings were allowed through this registered home ownership savings plan.

• (1510)

The concept of helping Canadians to save in order to purchase a house is one with which all members of this House of Commons are in agreement. The government, looking at its record of housing in Canada, has something to be ashamed of in terms of the cost of housing today because of the high interest rates it has tolerated, especially in terms of mortgages that low and middle income people have to pay. The policy of this government in so far as adequately housing Canadians is concerned is something that I deplore, considering how many Canadians today are ill-sheltered.

If, in order to help Canadians build houses, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs were to stand in the House and announce that he would provide a cash grant to Canadians based on terms that the more you earn, the greater your grant, all of us in the opposition would be indignant at the unfairness of such a program. The public at large would have great objection and great difficulty trying to fathom why, the more you made in terms of income, the greater the house buying grant the government would give you.

When we look at this clause of the bill which has to do with the Income Tax Act and how it operates in terms of RHOSPs, we find that is the very principle with which we are dealing. In other words, the greater your income, the higher you are on the income ladder, the greater the tax benefit will be for you if you subscribe to a registered home ownership savings plan. That is what we in the New Democratic Party so strongly object to, namely, that his plan, like many of the other provisions, benefits wealthy Canadians more than lower and middle income Canadians for whom the plan was supposedly designed to help in the first place.

Looking at the figures from Statistics Canada and how the various income groups have been able to benefit from the registered home ownership savings plan, we find that if a person's income was under $2,000—and this would only apply to people on pensions, disability pensions and so on—their average saving under this plan was $105. If we move up the income-ladder to those earning between $2,000 and $5,000 a year, we see that their saving under this plan would be about $203. For the income group between $5,000 and $10,000, their tax saving would be about $264. Notice that as we go up the income ladder the tax saving increases. For those earning between $10,000 and $15,000 a year, the average saving is about $309. For people earning between $15,000 and $20,000 a year, their average saving is $365. For people earning between $20,000 and $50,000 a year, the saving under this plan would average $462. For those earning over $50,000 a year, the average saving would be $571.

Rather than providing a kind of tax structure through this home ownership savings plan to help those who need help the most to find decent accommodation through home ownership, the plan works in the reverse direction. I agree there would be some saving to lower and middle income Canadians, but it gives a far greater saving to upper income Canadians whom we assume have greater ability to afford housing than low income Canadians. That is unfair.

Looking at the way the savings are proportioned among the different income groups, I ask the minister what is fair about a home ownership savings plan for the income group between $5,000 and $10,000 a year when only one in 49 taxpayers was able to take advantage of it. For someone earning between $10,000 and $15,000 a year, one in 32 was able to take advantage of the program, and for those earning over $50,000, one in 16 was able to take advantage of it. I refer not only to the amount of money one can save under the plan, as I illustrated by earlier figures—the more you make, the greater it is—but in terms of who is taking advantage of the plan we find, again, it is upper income Canadians, those we would assume to have the means to buy a house, who benefit the most.

These are the people who are taking advantage of the plan in terms of numbers and who are also gaining the greatest benefit in terms of dollars. This plan, like the registered retirement savings plan and the child care deduction provisions which we criticized earlier, provides disproportionate advantages to upper income Canadians. For that reason, we strenuously object to it.

If the government is serious about providing adequate housing for Canadians, there should be a cut-off limit, in terms of income, as to whether you qualify for this plan or, better still, a tax credit formula so that low and middle income Canadians who most need help will be able to get the dollars savings that one would assume a fair income tax system would provide.

On the whole, when we look at this gimmick, this registered home ownership plan as a tool to help Canadians find adequate housing falls far short of the goal. We are, unfortunately, facing a tremendous problem of high unemployment. Officially, the rate run at about 7 per cent, but very likely, because of inadequate statistical methods, this figure does not represent the true position which is probably around 11 per cent—800,000 or one million Canadian are out of work. If the aim is to get these Canadians back to work as well as to provide decent shelter for the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who need it, we should not rely upon these tax gimmicks; there should be a massive investment of public money in a national housing program to stimulate home construction. Not only would this get many unemployed Canadians back to work, but we would begin to provide a housing stock adequate for the needs of many Canadian families who are presently living in slums or near-slums.

Another way in which the government could help solve the housing crisis would be by regulating mortgage interest rates either through the Bank of Canada or through the budgetary process. We in this party have suggested that the government instruct the commercial banks to set aside a certain portion of their capital to provide mortgages, at 6 per cent to low income families deserving of such assistance. If we brought down high mortgage rates we would do more to stimulate home construction than by introducing the kind of gimmick represented by RHOSPs.

It must be disillusioning for Canadians to face the mortgage payments they are required to make today. Over the weekend I was talking to a constituent who had taken out a $40,000 mortgage at 10½ per cent. He had received an annual statement from the bank which showed he had reduced his mortgage over the past year by some $400. But his interest payments amounted to around $4,000. When a family is burdened with mortgage payments on that scale, is it any wonder that in so many cases both spouses need to work?

Not only does the RHOSP benefit the wrong group, that is, those in the upper income brackets who have a better chance of coping with housing costs, but it does not begin to come to grips with the housing crisis. I am concerned, also, about the loopholes in this plan. In theory it is supposed to help people save toward the purchase of a house. But the provisions are so loose that money can be paid into the plan and used later to buy furniture. Use can be made of it as a tax dodge, and at the end of ten years there is no need to buy a house at all; the money accumulated, say $10,000 plus interest, can be transferred to an RRSP so as to avoid taxation.

Even in cases where a person already owns a house, the fund can be transferred to a spouse and the spouse will qualify under the plan. There are various provisions which make it possible to transfer these funds into RRSPs, and so on— all in all, a loophole big enough to drive the family car through. In my opinion, the plan is poorly designed in relation to whom it helps and to what degree. I think it really amounts to a tax dodge available to the wealthy rather than a tax break to those who need it most. For this reason I strongly object to the way in which it is designed. We in the New Democratic Party would like to see it restructured as a tax credit and a limitation placed on its use. We want homes for lower and middle income Canadians.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am obliged to the hon. member for his contribution. He talked about a family in his riding, a family which, I take it, is typical in the sense that it is carrying a $40,000 mortgage and paying $4,000 or $5,000 a year on it. May I point out that this is exactly the kind of household which under RHOSP would be able to put money aside to provide a down payment on property. This measure will, in a substantial way, assist young people in particular who have entered the work force to set aside money to acquire property and make a home for themselves.

I think it is fair to remind the hon. member that this measure does not in any way exhaust the list of those the government has taken in the housing field. He would like to see a massive program of government spending in the housing area. Might I point out to him that this is exactly what was undertaken by the government in 1976 through various programs within the responsibility of my colleague, the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs. In round figures, $1.5 million was channelled by the federal government into programs concentrated mainly on those at the lower end of the income scale so as to make available one form of assistance or another, accounting for 120,000 of the 275,000 units of housing under way during 1976.

Incidentally, the figure of 275,000 units in that year was not only a record; it was well in excess of the target which had been set by my colleague. In that sense we have already witnessed a massive injection of money into the housing sector. I think, for example, of the Dundas-Sherbourne project in my own constituency. Federal funds represented about 95 per cent of the total cost in addition to the shared-cost of rental subsidies with the provincial government, and the result was the availability of accomodation in the downtown area for people in the lowest income groups who, but for this federal assistance, would not have such housing at all. In short, we are seeking to provide a spectrum of housing opportunities, and I think it is fair for me to comment that there has already been an effective and substantial addition to Canada's housing stock as a result of the programs to which I have referred.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, the minister started to recite some of the government's housing policies and programs, revelling in the 275,000 new units to be created. He would, of course, be the first to admit that there are some problems with the figures he recited. One of the major problems, which is evident to me from constituents who come to my office in Sault Ste. Marie, is the fact that of the many new houses that are built, most are priced beyond the family incomes of these people. In view of the actual cost of building a house and the cost of interest payments people are faced with today, the dream of owning a house is away beyond the reach of most. Not enough moderately-priced houses are being built.

Private developers, of course, can make a greater profit from the more expensive homes which upper income Canadians can afford, and this is the kind of home construction that is taking place all across Canada. Certainly, many more are built than the moderately-priced homes which the average Canadian would like to be able to afford. The government will probably counter that argument by stating that there is the assisted home ownership plan, which again is a plan that in theory is very good but which in practice cuts out average income Canadians from any benefit. A ceiling is placed on the price of a house under which AHOP will grant a subsidy. For example, in Sault Ste. Marie there are just not enough moderately-priced houses on the market to qualify for AHOP assistance and provide a home for those with an income requirement to bring them within the program.

So although the government can trot out statistics showing the great work it is doing, the people whom I see from day to day who have problems finding adequate housing tell me a different story. They tell me the housing situation is not as rosy as the minister tries to make out. That is why I say that if this registered home ownership plan is to have any real benefit for those who need it the most, we will have to redesign it so that, in dollar terms and in terms of who can take most advantage of it, it is made available to low and middle income Canadians and not, as is presently the case, to help those in the upper income brackets.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to supplement the remarks of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Our objection to this clause is not to the principle of government intervention and assistance for those unable to set aside sufficient funds to obtain housing; our objection to the clause is that it is taxation in reverse. It is a taxation policy which in effect rewards those of middle and high income and is of no advantage to those of low income.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie suggested it would be ludicrous to have a system under which the higher one's income, the higher the grant to assist in obtaining housing under the home ownership plan. In fact, if one compared the value of the grant with various income levels, one would find that in terms of its being a tax shelter to put money away for the purpose of purchasing a home, those earning less than $2,000 would qualify effectively for a grant of $105.21. This figure would continue to increase until when you reach those who earn over $50,000 the value of this tax shelter is $571.06. In other words, the value of the tax shelter is some five times greater than is the case with those at the bottom of the income ladder.

In other words, the principle is exactly the same as the one we argued about when discussing retirement savings plans. Unless there is some fairness in these plans, rather than applying them across the board, unless progressive rates in terms of the value of the tax shelter to individual taxpayers is built into the plan, we will have taxation in reverse. You will have a system that rewards those at the upper end of the income scale and penalizes those at the lower end. If members of the committee examined this proposal in that light, rather than in terms of its being a way to encourage saving, I think they would oppose the principle that is applied here.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, we are not against intervention. Were we the government we would intervene in a much more massive way in terms of assisting those of average and low income. We are not opposed to the principle of this clause; what we are opposed to is what I would describe as consistent Liberal philosophy, that of not only assisting middle and upper income earners but richly rewarding them in terms of the provisions of this particular clause. That is all I have to say on that aspect. I still think that the real effect of these kinds of tax shelters on individual taxpayers has not been properly studied. If it has been properly studied, then in spite of its fundamental unfairness to those on low income, the principle has nevertheless been proceeded with.

I hope that the minister has read a document entitled "The Hidden Welfare System", produced by the national council of welfare, which analysed the personal income tax system. This particular provision came under very careful scrutiny and was heavily criticised in the report. It underlined the example that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie so explicitly put before the committee—that of the plan's basic unfairness. It pointed out that the loss to the treasury as a result of these tax shelters is some $6.4 billion a year, and that if you took away those shelters every man, woman and child in Canada could be given $100 a month for the purpose of education, clothing or some basic and fundamental need. Yet the government continues to bring forward a system of reverse taxation.

I could go into the question of the effect of this system on indexing, which makes it even more iniquitous. As a result of indexing we find that the value of these shelters to those of upper income is even greater. However, that is all I have to say on this clause, Mr. Chairman.

Clause 57 agreed to.

Clauses 58 and 59 agreed to.

On clause 60—Definitions.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I shall not speak for any length of time, but I should like some clarification of clause 60 which unfortunately picks up some of the matters already dealt with in clause 43(3) on page 47 of the bill having to do with the definition of "charitable foundations", "charitable organizations", and so on. My question refers specifically to activities which are not necessarily related to the charity in question but are engaged in by a charitable organization or foundation, whichever is the case, in order to finance the further carrying on of their charitable work.

● (1540)

I am thinking, to be specific, of an operation such as a parking lot, the proceeds of which would be recoverable by the charitable foundation or organization to finance that charity's operation. There is another form of activity that a foundation or organization might be involved in, namely, the purchase of a building by way of investment in order to produce revenue which would assist the charitable organization or foundation in carrying on its work. I wonder whether the minister is in a position to say now whether any criteria are being used to determine which business activities would be permitted within the meaning of this bill as being eligible for tax exemption.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member has touched on one of the difficult questions involved in the exercise of reviewing the tax law as it affects charities. The basic purpose, going back to the common law, is that by definition a charity should not carry on a business, that it should engage primarily in the benevolent purposes for which it has been set up. But we all know that over a period of time, specifically for the purpose of augmenting the funds of charitable organizations, related businesses have been engaged in by the charities.

In my own city, the women's committee of the Ontario art gallery has been engaged in such activities, as have other charitable organizations; for example, in the preparing and sale of meals on the premises of the charitable organization as income earners for the particular charity. It is for that reason that subsection (j) has been added to try to define a little more clearly the question of related business.

The example given by the hon. member would not fit within the related business category, that is to say, the operation of a parking lot. Indeed, it is conceivable that it could be run by volunteers for the purpose of augmenting the income of the charitable organization; but that is not primarily what would be regarded as a related business. However, ultimately it is not for me to say: the definition of "related business" is included in the statute and it would be for the courts to interpret it. I should indicate, however, that from the extensive discussions that have been held with charitable organizations as a result of the study paper and the bill which was given first reading late last spring, and of this bill, the conclusion has been drawn that the introduction of the rules would not materially affect the existing operations of most charitable organizations and public foundations. This will be determined by the law. It may well be that there will be some activities which are not compatible with the carrying on of a charity which may fall afoul of this provision.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely satisfied. The minister has given some clarification, but the "related business" concept would have to be clarified by the courts. The courts have in front of them the wording of this bill. Presumably they would have, as well, any precedents established by court ruling. But this imposes upon charities a requirement to resort to legal action in order to resolve problems in which perhaps they had been involved for several years on the understanding, in the past, that these activities were recognized as legitimate businesses which would be carried on by those charitable organizations without implicating them in deeper tax commitments.

I notice that the minister spoke of the example of a parking lot operated by volunteers to raise money. Let us suppose that the parking lot happened to be in the same municipal area as a hospital, for example, and it was not volunteers but paid staff who were being employed in this operation; therefore it was a business with employees who are parking lot attendants being paid for their services. Would this further complicate their problem, or did the minister just throw in the word "volunteers" simply as one of the words that might be used with reference to persons running the parking lot?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The word "volunteer" is really a synonym for the definition in the latter part of clause 60(1)(j). I should indicate that it is anticipated that where formerly a business of one kind or another was carried on by an existing charity, Revenue Canada would have no difficulty in defining those practices as being within the definition of a charitable operation. However, if a charity proposes to move into an activity which is competitive with commercial concerns, then at that point there has to be some question as to the appropriateness of its being allowed a charitable exemption.

If the charity, for example, is operating a business at a loss, it may have to make up the losses with its own funds, often out of amounts for which a tax deduction has been given. Businesses may become divorced from charity for practical purposes, their revenues being reinvested rather than going to the charity. The running of a business may become the principal focus of the charity's activity, with its charitable activites relegated to a secondary role. Obviously, between the incidental operation of the kind to which I referred, for example, the gallery or the hospital running a cafeteria, or certain groups selling clothes, and the operation of an active business there is a difficult area to define; but the basic principle is that the activity should be related to those of the charity and it should not become the vehicle for a substantial commercial business.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have one more question, Mr. Chairman. I should like to be absolutely clear, further to what the minister just said, that if it were a new business or a new enterprise in which the charity might become involved, it would be subject to review, whereas businesses that are primarily and traditionally associated with those charitable foundations would be accepted by the income tax people as legitimate businesses in furtherance of the cause of that charity.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am advised that that is the intention of Revenue Canada in this regard.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I am fairly certain that this matter has been brought to the attention of the minister, but for the record I should like to express a concern which has been conveyed to a number of members of the House by universities in particular. I do not think I can put the case any better than has the chief financial officer of one of the universities of one of my colleagues. Reference was made in the letter to the green paper on tax treatment of charities which was published in 1975. I would like to quote some passages from that letter. One of them reads as follows:

The legislation expected to follow the green paper was given the further purpose of ensuring that the Income Tax Act did "not inhibit charities from carrying on their work in the most effective manner possible".

● (1550)

In further reference to the green paper, the letter indicates that the green paper says this:

"in the fields of education, medicine, scientific research, culture, religion and athletics to name just a few major areas".

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Then quoting directly from the letter:

The paper went on to say that the role of charities in these areas was "to fill in gaps of service and financial support where government should not or cannot play a significant part".

This chief financial officer draws the following conclusion from that references to educational institutes that:

—the paper was concerned not with educational institutions as such but with the independent charities which may provide financial assistance to them.

The feeling of this officer is as follows:

—that the legislation was not intended in the first instance to apply to publicly-supported educational institutions.

I would like to quote further from the letter:

The bill would require that we meet a certain prescribed percentage of income disbursement rules. For purposes of these disbursement rules, specific definitions of income are provided. The essence of the income definitions would seem to be that a registered charity would report as income (for purposes of disbursement rules) donations received from sources able to claim deductions for income tax purposes. Donations which would not produce an income tax benefit for the donor, and restricted donations which were to be held for a period of not less than ten years, would by definition be excluded from the calculation of income. The bill also contains a relieving provision that provides for the aggregation of income and disbursements over a period of several years in order to meet disbursement rules.

I do not intend to read the whole letter, but another part of it reads as follows:

If the bill passes as written, we will have to be able to prepare financial statements reporting income and disbursements as defined in the bill. This may not be perceived by others as an especially onerous requirement, but our accounting systems do not allow us to accumulate charitable donations by category of donor and substantial changes would have to be effected in the systems to provide such a capability. We would, I believe, have to develop and implement a charitable donation receipt classification system which would be unrelated to any of our needs or those of our donors.

As I have said, the writer is the chief financial officer of a well known university in Canada. This person also expressed concern about the problems which could arise from the provision in the bill whereby the minister's approval in writing would have to be obtained to accumulate funds for particular purposes. I quote again from the letter as follows:

More analysis on our part as well as additional information from the minister will be required before we can fully assess the effect of this provision but I think it is fair to say that it would probably involve an enormous increase in paper flow between the minister and educational institutions.

As publicly-supported institutions, universities in Canada have for years met all reasonable accountability requirements for the funds entrusted to them. Requiring universities to develop accounting and reporting systems to meet standards intended to control abuses in non-related areas will not help us to carry on our work in "the most effective manner possible". I feel strongly that the application of the proposed controls should be on a more selective basis and that some exempting provision should be made in the bill, either at the minister's discretion, or, perhaps as a specific exemption for universities and other designated educational institutions as defined in section 110(9)(a)(1) of the Income Tax Act.

In this connection it may be worth noting that those universities outside Canada which are authorized to issue charitable donation receipts acceptable for Canadian income tax purposes would appear to be exempt from the provisions of clause 60 as they are not registered Canadian charitable organizations. The 1975-76 edition of the Income Tax regulations lists 228 such universities. While I certainly would not advocate the extension of clause 60 to these universities, their exclusion from the proposed legislation does represent different treatment from that proposed for Canadian universities and will be more favourable to their costs of fund-raising activities.

Finally, reference is made to the penalty clause which is contained in this bill and the writer concludes the following:

I have not attempted the calculation of this tax as it would relate to (our university) because I cannot conceive of such an application to a Canadian university.

That statement is now on the record. I would like to ask the minister directly what kind of representations he has received in connection with the effect of clause 60, and what changes, if any, are proposed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I can confirm that the only representation I have received in this regard is from the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who spoke to me about this on Friday afternoon for the first time and then sent me a letter which included excerpts from the letter the hon. member read into the record and which one can judge by inference was written to the hon. member by somebody at Queen's University.

Although I have not checked with my advisers, I think I would be correct in saying that we did not receive that representation directly from the lady or gentleman of that university, so I cannot be confident at this point whether this question has been discussed previously between the department and the university in question. I go back to the portion of the letter which the hon. member quoted, which reads as follows:

More analysis on our part as well as additional information from the minister will be required before we can fully assess the effect of this provision—

I just indicate that we would be quite prepared to discuss with the representatives of Queen's University or any other university the manner in which they feel the administration of these particular provisions may be onerous to them, and if they would like to do so, I would be pleased to hear from them. I suggest, however, that this is a question of administration. I think the initial reaction on the departmental side would be that the difficulties are perhaps overstressed. But I repeat that we would be quite prepared to discuss the application of the law as it may affect the particular group, and to see if amendments might be required in the forthcoming budget.

Mr. Clarke: Just for greater clarification I would like to ask, again, if the minister has received representations from other Canadian universities as to the effect of this clause upon them. At the same time, I would like to ask another question. Is the effect that has been pointed out to the minister what was intended when he made these proposals in the first place?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not familiar with any other representations. I would have to have the records checked to see if at any time in the last two years any university has complained in this regard to my officers or to my department. We anticipated that there would have to be some changes in administration involved with the change in the act. That is not an uncommon circumstance. If, indeed, the writer's fears are justified—and I think we could only find that out after, as he or she has said, analysis—then we would be prepared to consider a change in procedures. At the moment we do not think they would be unduly onerous.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I have just a few comments on this point. I can readily understand why the minister was moving into the area of, shall we say, high cost—either high cost as to collection, or high cost as to administration—types of charities and into the area where individuals set up charitable foundations, that is, colorable charitable foundations in order to gain for themselves some tax-relieved income.

● (1600)

On the other hand, I feel that in an effort to tackle that type of gain he has armed himself with a high-powered rifle to go after a rabbit. I would say that the problems put forward by Queen's University, as evidenced by the exchange of views between the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and the minister, are valid for other universities. I would think it is difficult to say to institutions, "Let us see how this goes. In order to comply with this you will have to change your whole accounting system, and then we will look at it." There are areas where the accounting has to be a segregation of income. If a gift is given to a qualified charity within certain limits, that is permitted. But it is already permitted under the act, although that income has to be segregated.

As far as related businesses are concerned, my own University of Alberta took over a student union organization known as HUB, a totally segregated student residence; a business complex for student purposes. Is that to be a related business? What about bookstores, student health services and computing centres? A number of universities have computing centres which have spare time so they provide payroll services, etc., to other organizations. Is this a "related business", and what is to be done with regard to its income?

Section 149.1(2)(a) of the act gives the minister discretionary power to revoke the registration of a charitable organization that carries on an unrelated business. If any one of these unrelated businesses was unclear and the universities were to engage in that type of operation, does it run the risk of the minister deregistering that university or charity? I think it is quite unfair, unless it is clearly spelled out in the act and not left to determination by the courts or review by the minister. A university does not change its accounting practices as the minister or I might change a jacket.

The other thing that concerns me is in section 149.1(14) and (15). Why are two information returns required? These subclauses read as follows:

(14) Every registered charity, shall, within three months from the end of each taxation year of the charity, file with the minister both an information return and a public information return for the year, each in prescribed form and containing prescribed information, without notice or demand therefor.

(15) Notwithstanding section 241—

Section 241 prohibits the publication of information by any official in a tax department if the information is furnished with respect to a tax return. There is no doubt that the information sought under section 141.1(14) and (15) is respecting income tax. An exception to the confidentiality is being asked for in subsection (15) which reads:

Income Tax Act

Notwithstanding section 241, the information contained in a public information return referred to in subsection (14) shall be communicated or otherwise made available to the public by the minister in such manner as he deems appropriate.

Now that shall require a full explanation not only with regard to the universities but with regard to all charities. I ask, very sincerely, why this exception is to be made to the confidentiality of income tax returns. I am not 100 per cent sure, but it would seem to me this is likely the only instance under the Income Tax Act where section 241 is weighted with regard to any particular type of taxpayer. As I say, I am subject to correction on that point, but I am not aware that at any time in the past the minister had the right to communicate to any member of the public the contents of the income tax return of any taxpayer. I would suggest that the burden of proof is on the minister to indicate why that should be done in this particular instance.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The purpose of the requirement is, of course, that the public may know, in a broad category sense, the kind of charitable activity being carried on and the kind of contributions being made. The source of income by broad categories, that is to say, government, corporations, other charities, individuals, etc., the amount expended on charitable activity by broad category—education, research, etc.—gross administrative expenses, including salaries in aggregated form, and basic information of the name, location and function of the charity, is to be in the public information return.

The green discussion paper said that in view of the large tax concessions granted to registered charities, the public is entitled to know with some precision the activities of the charity. The proposal to require disclosure has met a very positive response from most groups, and rules will be incorporated in the legislation. In other words, you have operations being carried out for charitable purposes, ostensibly, being given the benefit of exemption from income tax provisions. In that sense, other taxpayers will have to bear the part of the burden which this activity might otherwise have borne. For this purpose, it seems to me to be reasonable from the public standpoint to have some public disclosure, in the broadest terms, of what the source of funds is and how they are being applied.

● (1610)

Representations have been received to the effect that the public information return should not be so specific as to embarrass the charity or its officers, for example by giving the names of the officers or their home telephone numbers where they could be subject to contact, or the names of the beneficiaries of grants, and an information circular will be issued by Revenue Canada to make this clear. The basic purpose, however, is that when you have an organization being run for the public benefit, the public should be entitled to know, in the broadest categories, as to the purpose, the source of funds, how they are applied and what the administrative expenses are. Hence, the disclosure formula.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

With regard to the carrying on of a business, it ought to be remembered that under the existing provisions of the Income Tax Act no business can be carried on by a charity. Therefore, in that sense the proposed amendment is of a relieving category.

The hon. member referred to activities at a university, for example, the provision of student accommodation, food and computer services for the benefit of students. Clearly, in those circumstances those activities would be related services and I would anticipate no difficulty at all. If a university at a certain point develops a computer service, say, to the point where it is engaging in a substantial commercial business, a business substantially more commercial than that of supplying a service to its own students, at that particular point Revenue Canada may indeed have to consider the status of that particular operation. In general, those services which are made available to the student body or for the purposes of the educational operation are clearly related businesses and would be so considered and permitted under the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I take it that the only authority the minister invoked today was based on the government's own green paper. I am referring to the intentions which it published in the green paper. Am I correct in suggesting that that is the sole, shall we say, criterion or authority on which it bases its conclusions as expressed in the bill?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am not sure what the hon. member means by "the only authority." Of course, the question was much canvassed in the green paper.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That was the government's green paper.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The government's green paper, which was much canvassed, as I remarked. The proposal received substantial support from those who responded to that paper. With regard to this point and the point concerning universities generally, the matter has been out in the forum of public discussion for close to two years. I think it is fair to say that there has been substantial agreement on the part of those responsible for operating charitable organizations in Canada with the proposals made. Although the green paper may have been the government's own green paper, it seems to have received substantial support from those most affected by it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Silence is not always golden.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, may I raise a question concerning charities which may have gone into business and which generate a substantial part of their moneys with business? Am I to take it that the provision mentioned would affect, say, neighbourhood services and other organizations in related fields, organizations which sell to the public and whose revenue derived from that operation is used for the purposes of charity? Am I correct in assuming that no matter how much of the income is derived from such operation, that operation will still be considered as a charity?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Exactly, Mr. Chairman. The operation, for example, of the Ottawa Neighbourhood Services, which sells clothing and furniture and, in my own city, of the Crippled Civilians, would be exactly the kind of related business which we have in mind.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, is it the government's intention to exempt these organizations from the charities act, or to bring them under it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The intention was to make it clear that if a charitable organization carried on this particular line of business, it would not cease to lose its category as a charity so as to lose exemption from income tax.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 60 carry?

Clause 60 agreed to.

On clause 61—Assessment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, since we are on clause 61, may I make a statement on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue? In this context the minister has advised me as follows, and I quote from her letter:

> Where my department has determined the amount of a taxpayer's loss, and that amount differs from the loss reported by the taxpayer, our official determination of the loss will be issued when the taxpayer requests it. This will allow the taxpayer to appeal the determination immediately in all cases where he wishes to do so. My department will be publishing information to taxpayers to explain how they may obtain a loss determination.

That is an indication from my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, as to how subclause 61(1) of Bill C-22 will operate.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 61 carry?

Clause 61 agreed to.

Clause 62 to 64 inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 65—Individual surtax.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, I see by the clock that but two or three minutes remain for discussing this important clause: discussion is to cease under the iniquitous closure rule imposed on us by the government. We are dealing here with a clause that has to do with the surtax which people earning over $30,000 a year were paying. This provision was introduced in an attempt to make the tax system fair and to complement the work of the Anti-Inflation Board which limited the maximum increases in earnings of ordinary Canadians to $2,400 a year. In the previous budget, the Minister of Finance admitted that it is difficult to keep track of professional incomes which are affected by dividends and other kinds of profit-sharing plans. He therefore wanted to impose a surtax on taxable income over $8,000 to make sure that professionals and other upper income Canadians bear their fair share of the burden of the government's war on inflation.

We find from an examination of Anti-Inflation Board reports that professionals have exceeded the $2,400 maximum, averaging increases of some $4,900 a year. What is more, the present provision in the bill will govern only the surtax for the year 1976: it does not extend it to the year 1977. To that the New Democratic Party seriously objects. If the government were serious about introducing fairness and equity to our income tax system, it would not allow the surtax provision to apply for one year only.

We shall find that, because of the passage of this bill and the elimination of the surtax provision for 1976, a taxpayer whose income is $50,000 will, in 1977, save $402 on his tax bill. Someone earning over $50,000, say someone whose income averages around $80,000, will save $1,654 by virtue of this provision. Someone earning $100,000 will save $2,491, because this surtax will not continue to the tax year 1977. In view of the Prime Minister's statement of October 17, 1975, in which he said that no one will be permitted—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being 4.20 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings, pursuant to the order made on Monday, January 31, 1977, and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of the bill. Shall clause 65 carry?

Bill reported as amended.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) moved that the bill as amended be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes very revealing and constructive to have debates such as we have had on Bill C-22. Members have revealed their true thoughts about particular situations or issues. One such situation prevented itself last Thursday. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in the debate on childcare deductions, stated that the working spouse is more of a social phenomenon than an economic necessity. He cited a letter which stated that women should stay at home and look after their children, and that children who go through day care centres are almost social monsters. He seemed critical of families where both husbands and wives work and hence benefit from child care deductions, whereas families where the wives do not work receive no benefit. The hon. member went further, calling for joint income tax returns to be filed by a family group. I received a letter from a constituent, a woman. She made some points which the hon. member for Edmonton West failed to take into consideration. I quote from the letter:

Dear John:

I am concerned about the narrow minded opinions that many of the politicians in the Conservative party have with respect to women's rights.

The working woman is not a social phenomenon.

The hon. member stood up last Thursday and said that. All the women on the government benches just sat there and took it. This woman went on in her letter:

For most women a job is a necessity rather than a pastime.

She quoted Sylvia Gelber, a consultant to the federal Department of Labour. This is what Ms. Gelber found:

Adding up the estimated 331,434 women who are the sole support of their families, 925,000 single working women and an estimated 678,035 working wives whose husbands have a median income of $6,454 a year, it is safe to assume that most women work because of economic need.

The letter continues:

On top of that how can anyone assume that the man and not the woman is working for economic necessity. In the case where both the husband and the wife are working, has anyone stopped to ask whether the man is working because he wants to and not because he has to. If these politicians would ask themselves that question they would probably come to the conclusion that society does not question a man's decision to work. But a woman is expected to play the role of housewife and mother and the minute she diverges from that role she is viewed as a social phenomenon, a social anomaly.

This is the typical attitude of the Conservative party. They expect women and other minority groups to behave in a certain manner which is consistent with their stereotypic vision of society.

I am a woman and also a human being. I am not an appendage of my husband and have the right to decide whether I want to work outside the home. Regardless of my husband's salary level, society has no right to impose a certain role on me. The right to decide whether to work in the home or to pursue a career is a matter of individual choice and human rights.

Judy Wasylycia'leis.

I should give the name of the constituent: it is Judy Wasylycia'leis. All I can say to that is "Amen". I wish the Tories would not be so phony on the hustings, representing themselves as the friend of women, the friend of youth, the friend of the unemployed, the friend of labour, the friend of the working class. Then they have the other group, the Bay Street boys. They are their biggest friends and allies. Here is where we see the great allies come together.

When we started the debate on Bill C-22 we tried to point out how regressive this income tax structure is. We watched the Tories defend the legislation. They represent one element in Canadian society—those who have made it. The Tories want to protect the status quo. Bill C-22 is being introduced at a time when study after study is showing that the economic inequality gap in Canada is growing wider. Contrary to Liberal mythology, there is no doubt that the rich are getting richer while the poor are getting poorer. The distribution of wealth in Canada is completely unfair, and we have put together the evidence to support this assertion. The report recently released by the Economic Council is a sad commentary on the existing state of affairs. In 1965 the top one-fifth of the population with an average income of $12,000 a year was getting nine times as much as the average for the bottom fifth's $1,300. Last year, the top group received $29,000, about 11 times as much as the $2,600 in the lowest income group.

● (1630)

Professor Irwin Gillespie of Carleton University did a major study on income distribution in Canada. He is convinced that anyone who believes Canadian society is becoming more egalitarian is living in a dream world. The distribution of money income did not change significantly between 1951 and 1974: the poorest one-fifth had 4.4 per cent in 1951, and 4 per cent in 1974; the richest one-fifth had 42.8 per cent of money income in 1951, and 42.4 per cent in 1974. According to the Senate Committee on Poverty, 27 per cent of Canadian households were under the poverty line in 1973. A more moderate figure of 23 per cent was reported by the Council on Social Development. This means that about one person in four, in one of the richest countries in the world, can be described as poor.

Another revealing study is by Professor N. H. Chi, also of Carleton University. He documents the statement that the gap between the rich and the poor is growing and that this inequality means dire consequences for the stability of Canadian society. I quote from this study:

It is true that economic progress has brought an increase in real per capita income which doubled in the years between 1951 and 1971. However, during the same period, "progress" brought a remarkable and disturbing increase in the level of inequality of income. Except for the years 1951-57, the gap between rich and poor grew wider in the form of a parabolic curve.

Professor Chi clearly documents the relationship between inequality and social problems in Canada. In the years between 1951 and 1971, the rising level of inequality in the distribution of income coincided with a pattern of growing labour unrest which took the form of strikes and lock-outs. It seems that the frustrations from working hard but not getting ahead can also account for the increasing crime rate. Inequality also results in psychological and emotional stress. It is not surprising, therefore, that Professor Chi should have found that mental illness, alcoholism and suicide rates have risen drastically since 1951 and followed the curve of increasing inequality.

The Liberal government says it is concerned about income distribution. But if it is interested, if it is so concerned, why has nothing been done during the nine years during which the Liberals have been in power? Why has it chosen to introduce Bill C-22 which makes the tax system even more regressive than it is now? It can only mean one thing: the Liberal government wants to hold inequality steady, or maybe increase it. Once more the Trudeau administration is insisting that the income tax system, the most logical and efficient instrument for income redistribution, must not be disturbed. Instead of using the tax system to distribute wealth more equitably, the government is allowing the affluent to shelter their incomes with the encouragement of the Income Tax Act. Just as Leonard Shifrin stated on December 29, 1976, in the Ottawa Citizen:

This government never ceases to amaze me. Every time I become convinced that it has exhausted all possible means of increasing the maldistribution of income in this country, it confounds me with yet another breathtaking initiative.

While mouthing platitudes about equality and income redistribution, the government is attempting to get away with an increasing number of tax breaks for the rich. It is clear the rich do not have to apply for welfare: they get it free from the Liberals. It is also, clear, from reading Bill C-22, that the true Liberal philosophy goes further than: if you work hard, you will get to the top. Rather, it is: If you work hard at finding tax loopholes, you will get to the top.

The government's attitude toward taxation is essentially one of making tax-dodging legal. This favours the erosion of the progressive taxation system which encourages those who have the ability to pay to take steps, legally, to minimize their tax contribution. It is this attitude which is largely responsible for the appearance of articles such as that which was published in the Citizen on December 20, 1976. The author is Paul Dioguardi—I presume he is an economist—who wrote:

As year-end draws closer, it is time once again to consider ways of minimizing or deferring taxes. Happily, this chore has been made a little easier by a tax bulletin put out by Coopers and Lybrand, chartered accountants. It has touched on some of the important points to be considered in year-end tax planning.

I always thought, Mr. Speaker, that the point of this whole income tax exercise was to determine what it cost to run this country and then to set about collecting taxes from the people, according to their ability to pay, so as to cover the cost of those programs and services. But here we see that anyone engaged in a banking or accountancy business of some kind is given advice about the best way of avoiding the payment of taxes on income. If all of us did that, how would we get the money to run the country and pay for the present level of programs and services?

It seems to me there is only one group which can benefit from that kind of tax-dodging: it is not the working poor; it has to be those who take a lot out of the economy. May I quote now from an article which appeared in the Financial Post of December 4 under the heading, "Time running out fast if you want to declare a tax loss this year." This article, by Beatrice Riddell, stated:

Time is fast running out for those who would like to get on with certain tax planning schemes which may reduce or defer 1976 income.

The game of tax-dodging is inherent in the system which creates numerous exemptions and deductions which are beneficial largely to high income earners. The income tax legislation already contains 17 subsidies which cost Canadians approximately $6.4 billion in 1974. The National Council of Welfare calculates that this $6.4 billion could have been used to provide every family in Canada with an extra $100 a month for food and clothing. Instead, it was used to improve the position of the well-off, while the poor whose incomes were below the tax threshold received no benefit at all. Imagine a government expenditure program which gave ten times as much to those with incomes over $25,000 than it did to those with incomes less than $5,000!

● (1640)

A government which is the least bit concerned would have spent this money equally on all sectors. I know that we cannot expect this government to transfer more money to the poor than to the rich, because they are playing a game with the Tories, trying to get the electoral support of people in the upper income brackets. They are trying to prove how much more of a friend to the wealthy they are than the Tories. This is the kind of political game that is being played—a very cynical, hypocritical one.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

It has been clearly documented that deductions stand the "ability to pay" principle on its head, and that tax credits in fixed amounts, when justified for social reasons, constitute a more equitable distribution of government expenditures. This government has never accepted that principle. I quote from the report entitled "The hidden welfare system":

When a deduction is offered instead of a credit, it means the government has chosen to do in a hidden fashion what it would never do openly—grant bigger subsidies to those of high incomes than to those with low incomes.

In full knowledge of this—not unknowingly, but in full knowledge—this government has chosen, through Bill C-22, to further increase the number of tax deductions and deferrals, which can only add to the regressivity of the way Canadians pay their income taxes. Amazingly, it has increased deductions for registered pension plans, registered retirement savings plans, child care and disability allowances.

Mr. Symes: And who benefits?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie asks, who benefits? We know who benefits. We have been through this bill clause by clause and we have tried to amass the facts and to present the picture of who actually benefits from Bill C-22. Contrary to what the Minister of Finance said last Monday, we in this party who have tried to examine this bill in detail are not ill-advised, as he suggested we are. Even if the minister could prove that deductions through pension plans benefit the middle income taxpayers, he has not shown how such plans will benefit the poor who have no hope of saving money for retirement.

The minister has not proven to us how the poor people are going to benefit by increasing the tax free amounts that are being invested in registered retirement savings plans. He also ignores the fact that the RRSP is not being used primarily as a means of saving for retirement; rather, the RRSP is being used by middle and high income earners as a means of escaping taxes owed. As Mr. Dioguardi stated in his column in the Citizen of January 31 last:

It is high time taxpayers considered pursuing the noble goal of wresting a few dollars from the tax collector's greedy grasp. The most straightforward method to achieve this goal involves the tried and true registered retirement savings plan.

Mr. Speaker, isn't that something? Even the hon. member for Edmonton West has got to admit that is pretty blatant.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Your view is that they are designed to be taxed.

Mr. Rodriguez: A progressive tax system should be designed so that every man pays his fair share of taxes on what he earns. It should not be designed so that a man can manipulate the tax system and write things off, because poor people cannot take advantage of that. That has not got through his thick skull yet. That is the problem with you Tories. It takes a long time for any idea to sink through your thick skulls. As my mother used to say, you have got to be a numbskull. I just do not understand it, Mr. Speaker. Surely every member of the House can understand that except the hon. member for Edmonton West. We have told them once, if we have told them a thousand times.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is not alone; there are a few others like him.

Mr. Rodriguez: But they always run him up to the front to make a speech to defend the "haves" in this country. Then they get someone from Atlantic Canada to make a speech on behalf of the "have-nots", so they can suck and blow at the same time. They do that consistently in this House. They did it when we were debating the unemployment insurance bill when it was before the House. They have done that all down the line.

Let us look at three examples which show how the RRSP is used as a means of tax-dodging. I would like the hon. member for Edmonton West to tell the House how poor people earning under $10,000 a year can take advantage of these tax dodges. The first way of using an RRSP as a tax dodge is the spousal RRSP, which can be used to split income. The husband who is in a high income range can use the RRSP to divert funds to his wife, who will pay tax at a lower rate when the funds are repatriated.

Secondly, an RRSP can be used effectively to convert part of a taxpayer's home mortgage interest expense into tax deductible interest. These are tax dodges, Mr. Speaker, and surely that is not what an RRSP was set up to be. Surely it was set up so people can save, and then when they retire get an income. Is the purpose of an RRSP that it be used as a tax dodge? If so, it is not fair. There is not a Tory or a Liberal in the House who can stand up and tell me point-blank that it is fair. It is lousy, and they ought to be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But that can be done even by a man earning $6,000.

Mr. Rodriguez: A lot of guys who are earning $6,000 can go to the bank and borrow $2,000. Bill C-16 has to do with giving low income earners an opportunity to get credit when they need it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are a lot more honest people earning $6,000 than you would admit.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thirdly, an individual who invests in an RRSP can defer the tax on the accumulated earnings of his annuity plan while deducting the interest cost of the money borrowed to invest in the annuity. That is a neat dodge. I suppose that anyone earning less than $10,000 can walk into his friendly bank manager's office and borrow $2,500. But, by golly, his wife cannot go down to the bank and do that because sometimes banks do not recognize that a wife can be a wage earner in her own right, and they may refuse to grant her a loan or they only consider 50 per cent of her salary for loan purposes. That is discriminatory. I do not hear the great defender of the banking system talking about such discriminatory aspects, yet he has the gall to stand in this House and declare that the working woman is a social phenomenon. I think working Tories are a social phenomenon.

Mr. Darling: There are more working Tories than there are working NDP'ers.

Mr. Rodriguez: If you want to make a speech, go and sit in your own seat.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We are not as sanctimonious as you are.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know that. Another example of the regressive nature of this bill is to be found in clause 21 which increases deductions for child care expenses from $500 to $1,000 per child, and the per family maximum from $2,000 to $4,000. The National Council of Welfare has illustrated how the tax saving from this deduction is substantially more beneficial to the wealthy than to the lower income groups. At the $10,000 level, such a $1,000 deduction would be worth $210, while in the $50,000 plus category it is worth $410. Last Monday, the Minister of Finance claimed that the quarter of a million of Canadians who claimed child care allowance stand to benefit from the increase. I am afraid that the minister misses the point completely and this type of deduction maintains constant inequality. The greater the deduction, the greater the inequality. Members on the government benches over there seem to operate on the principle that all persons are equal, except that some are more equal than others.

• (1650)

Not only does this bill deliberately improve the tax position of the middle and upper income earners; it does absolutely nothing to plug the existing loopholes which turn the ability to pay principle upside down. It does nothing to change the fact that in 1974 deletions from the accounts of income tax revenue that could not be collected because the taxpayers were no longer resident in Canada amounted to $850,000 owed by 161 taxpayers. Why are the names of those tax dodgers not published? What effort is the Department of National Revenue making to collect the money that these people owe the people of Canada?

It does nothing to change the fact that in 1974, 252 persons who made over $50,000 paid no tax at all, and 17 of them had incomes of over $200,000. These are the kind of people for whom the frontbench Tories stand up all the time. We saw one standing up for John Doyle—a nice working-class Canadian! That is the kind of defence they put up. When we defend people in the House, I can assure you we do not defend people such as John Doyle, or Bell Canada; we talk about working-class Canadians.

This bill does nothing to change the fact that professionals who want to avoid paying taxes set up dummy companies since small businesses pay taxes at a lower rate compared with marginal rates in the personal income tax system. Bill C-22 does nothing to change the fact that interest costs on money borrowed for the purpose of investing in something that may ultimately earn income for the taxpayer are deductible for the year in which the expense is incurred. We can look at the example which was provided by that Liberal in Manitoba whom everyone knows: they call him Dizzy Asper.

Mr. Stevens: They are giving him $7 million.

Mr. Rodriguez: He has probably been commissioned by the Liberals to do some consulting work. They either make them Loto Canada distributors or send them letters telling them how to make a tax claim 60 days after the taxation year is over. The same people who write the tax laws are the ones who interpret them. I am telling you, they have it made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: If any hon. member wishes to make a speech, I will listen to him. If he does not have the courage to stand up and make a speech, let him go behind the curtains and sip his tea. Here is an example of the way in which Mr. Asper suggests things should be done. He says:

> Jones earns $100,000 a year and pays $50,000 in tax.

I will need the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to help me with this one. It goes on to read:

> He borrows $1 million on January 1 at 10 per cent interest and secures the loan by a stock portfolio of $1 million in cost, which he bought with the bank loan. On December 31 of that year he has incurred an interest cost of $100,000 which he offsets against his $1,000,000 income—

There it is. Voilà, says Mr. Asper, no tax! At least we know that the man who borrowed $1 million from Obront paid a fair interest on it: he borrowed $1 million and paid $1½ million in interest. That is the kind of interest I am prepared to accept.

Finally, this bill does nothing to stop income-splitting or loans made by a husband to a spouse, or a father to his children, on an interest-free basis. The consequences of this are best revealed by another piece of advice from Mr. Asper which appeared in the Globe and Mail. This guy Asper is a fount of information on tax-dodging.

Mr. Leggatt: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Rodriguez: His buddy wrote it. He was probably consulted. Here is his suggestion:

> The father who is in the 60 per cent tax bracket and has a wife and three children (it gets even more exciting when there are grandchildren) can lend his brood $400,000, interest-free, which they invest in 10 per cent preferred shares. Assuming they have no other income, the $40,000 they collectively receive in dividends will bear no tax because of the Canadian dividend tax credit system.

The only little touch in that is that you must have $400,000 to lend. You can walk to a bank and get a $400,000 credit. I am sure that the miners in Nickel Belt and the steelworkers in Sault Ste. Marie can walk to the Imperial Bank or to the Royal Bank of Canada and say, "Boys, I want to borrow 400,000 bucks"! This is the way in which the experts and the Liberals view the tax system. This is not a method of paying one's fair share to support the country and to support the programs of the country. They use the tax system to dodge taxes.

May I call it, five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie)—Energy—Participation in maritime energy pool and construction of generating plants; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Energy—Government measures to increase exploration in frontier areas.

Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion no. 4, in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government. Notice of motion No. 7, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St.George's-St.Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is agreement among the House leaders to continue with motion No. 20, in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PLAN

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to establish a guaranteed annual income plan, which should be designed to encourage any able-bodied person to work, in order to correct the social injustices resulting from existing legislation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my motion No. 20 was allowed to stand last Monday at the request of the government on account of a storm in my riding. The same thing is happening today to a representative from Nova Scotia. Therefore, it is through an arrangement made by two parliamentarians that the motion standing in my name is called at this time.

I do not have to go over the motion just read by the Speaker because every member in this House knows about it. However, for the benefit of Canadian citizens as a whole, I must say first of all that I myself could have introduced such a piece of legislation to this effect. But, because of current procedures in the House of Commons, an hon. member is not allowed to introduce a bill involving expenditures of taxpayers' money. That privilege is now granted the ministers of the Crown alone, though they must be, first and foremost, members of the House of Commons. That is why an hon. member who is not a minister, regardless of whether he belongs to the majority party or even the Liberal party, now in power, does not have the privilege of introducing a bill involving the expenditure of money. That rule is a very old British tradition. However, it should be changed to meet the needs of Canadian aspirations in 1977.

To my mind, true democracy should differ from what we have known to date. As parliament is the general assembly of all the representatives of the Canadian people, I cannot see why that assembly should not be, in fact, the supreme authority in the land. The supreme will of the people could then be executed by the executive council known as the council or the cabinet of ministers presided over by the Prime Minister, and as such, designated by the representatives of the party in the majority.

Mr. Speaker, to be efficient and beneficial to all Canadian citizens, the economic system of a country such as ours should be able to ensure each and everyone a decent subsistence. For that, it must be constituted properly and only on that condition will it achieve its end, namely enable each and everyone to meet his needs. To achieve that end, the Social Credit Party of Canada has suggested one means: the distribution, periodically, of a monthly dividend to all Canadians; in other words, giving each citizen in the country the benefit of a discount equal to the GNP surplus after the deduction of public expenditures for the various public services given to the citizens by the state.

The surplus should be refunded to the public either as a rebate such as in a co-operative or as dividends in a capital stock company or as guaranteed annual income to each citizen. It does not matter, the words or names are not important, but the results obtained and enjoyed by each Canadian are, whatever may be his age, status, social position.

When Mr. Douglas, the author of the social credit philosophy submitted that formula, the economists were laughing at him since they considered his policy utopian, that is an ideology which is logical but impracticable in the orthodox financial conditions under which we are living.

Now, since 1935 while that man was suggesting that citizens of a community such as Canada should enjoy social benefits as a cultural heritage, namely old age security pension, family allowances, national dividend, compensated discount, we have accomplished much progress and members of parliament and society itself are more than ever supporting the principle.

I remember reading over and over again the encyclics of Popes Leo XIII and Pius XI on the social and economic problems of the years 1891 to 1931 and which contained direct recommendations to governments for implementing policies devised to help workers and small farmers and earners, such as family allowances and a guaranteed family income.

I also remember this favorite phrase of our labour leaders: equal pay for equal work, but to everyone according to his needs. That created astonishment at first, but as time elapsed, the idea made its way, so that it was finally accepted that women were entitled to equal pay and to a decent family income. That is why the legislation authorizing the payment of family allowances was finally passed by the Canadian parliament.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that from 1930 to 1945, I was, among many others, an advocate of the family allowances policy. With astonishing impudence, egotistical and blind opponents despised us as utopians because we believed that each family was entitled to an income proportionate to its needs and that the state had to pay family allowances to families according to the number of children and the economic wealth of the country. We were then charged with being communists. Yet God knows we are not champions of Karl Marx's doctrine, but supporters of free enterprise. That does not mean we are in favour of the capitalist philosophy, which would allow the powerful under the present capitalist system to realize excessive profits by every means, even by exploiting the poor because they are defenceless.

We believe a responsible government's role is to monitor the development of economic activities and prevent the powerful from taking unfair advantage of the underprivileged as it is unfortunately too often the case today. It is not the capitalist system which is bad per se, but rather the excesses of capitalism. That is why we must open our eyes to the truth, however hard and bitter it may be. The capitalist system will be reformed by men of order, or it will be destroyed by the others.

In my opinion, it will not remain as it is under its present form, which is not totally bad, but its operation will. We have all if not chosen at least accepted to live within a society because we saw that it was more advantageous to live so and that under this formula we could meet our needs more efficiently. Nevertheless, this society life offers in itself many advantages, which I do not have time to list, but anyone can discover them by thinking a little.

However, despite all the advantages it offers, this life within a society also means that each citizen incurs obligations which he must accept and meet: there could be no rights without obligations. This is, in my opinion, the true democracy. This being said, it does not mean that the state does not have duties towards the community. Its duty is to administer the community wealth to the advantage of everybody and make sure that human capital and money capital get their share from this association but that the latter does not exploit human capital and work capital, as it is unfortunately the case too often.

Second, taking into consideration the performance and the effectiveness of the combined efforts of human capital with money capital, the state must from year to year make a compilation and then ensure that human capital and money capital get their share without injustice for the other form of capital that is human capital. The share accruing to human capital will be distributed in the form of guaranteed annual income and salaries while the share accruing to money capital will be distributed during the fiscal year in the form of profits and dividends at the end of the business fiscal year.

Now, if you examine the rather constant increase in gross national output you find that human capital did not get its share regularly, hence the blatant social injustices which gnaw at society. That is why there is an immediate need to introduce an annual guaranteed income plan which first would provide people 60 years of age or over as well as widows and handicapped people with an income allowing everyone of those people to meet their needs and then those of the Canadian society as a whole.

As of April 1, 1976, Canada spent nearly $4 billion to provide some form of annual income to people 60 years of age or over. In addition, at the same date, Canada spent $1,957 million on family allowances for 7,900,000 children between the ages of 0 to 18. So we still have to make all other people between the ages of 18 and 59 eligible for a guaranteed annual income, as follows: 3 million people between the ages of 19 to 25; 4,700,000 people between the ages of 26 to 40; 2,547,000 people between the ages of 41 to 50; as well as 1,960,000 people between the ages of 51 to 59. There are 6,154,700 males, and 6,095,200 females, for a total of 12,249,900 people—a little more than half the population of this country.

We must therefore conclude that this group is responsible for the major part of economic activities and that the same goes for income tax, which is the main source of revenue for the state. This group of citizens is entitled to its share, and the state must recognize this by establishing a guaranteed annual income plan such as we have been promoting for many years under the honest and thoughtful direction of our lamented leader who was also a great Canadian, Réal Caouette, whose premature death I and many other Canadians deplore. Mr. Speaker, this political leader spent a large portion of his life promoting an economic and monetary reform based on the philosophy of Major Douglas aimed at establishing an economic system which would be fairer to all Canadians, whatever their language and religion. Of course, people who have wanted to preserve a status quo to make a profit have ridiculed the theories of Mr. Douglas, even though they were accepted by many serious people, like Mr. Aberhart, Alberta premier for many years, Mr. Bennett, from British Columbia, Mr. Goldsborough, from the House of Representatives of the United States, and Mr. Réal Caouette and his colleagues in the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Réal Caouette very often stated in this parliament his views about including in our statutes this formula of a guaranteed annual income so as to provide everyone with a sufficient income. I am certain that this formula will one day be included in the statutes of Canada, but the longer this is postponed, the more serious our problems will become and the greater the inequities of the system will be.

It is time to act. To make a choice is evidence of maturity, like the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in Quebec City on January 28, 1977. This is what Mr. Réal Caouette did, this is what thousands of Canadians have done, this is what my colleagues and I have done when we chose a socially distributed credit system instead of the credit-debt system that we have been using since the beginning of our Confederation, on July 1, 1867, and which no longer meets the needs of today.

At that time, the debt of Canada was $79 million, but it is now $64 billion. This choice of the credit debt system is impoverishing us and forcing us to pay $15 million a day in interest when we could do something else without printing dollar bills, like the Prime Minister said, but by taking into account the efficiency and production of all Canadians, like Social Crediters suggest, and by making the accounting mechanism of the Bank of Canada follow. We, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, propose a change in our financial system. Why? Because we sincerely believe that the present system no longer meets our needs.

In a democracy, it is normal to want to change the tools which no longer correspond to today's realities. We are conscious of these realities and this is why we insist on asking for a change in the financial system so as to establish in the near future a guaranteed annual income system, based on the collective performance rather than the debts of Canadians.

A few years ago, many people in important positions and otherwise mocked the economic and monetary reform suggestions of Mr. Réal Caouette and the Social Party of Canada, but today, all honest and serious politicians realize that the guaranteed annual income formula is very valuable and should be implemented if we really want to control misery and settle the two problems of inflation and unemployment. Very knowledgeable people, Mr. Speaker, consider a guaranteed annual income program as the first step towards a kind of family income, an equitable redistribution of the national wealth in this country.

It is important that we pass as soon as possible a bill designed to fill the gap between the lower and upper income brackets in this country. I believe it is most urgent and pressing that the level of guaranteed income be high enough to ensure a decent life and a full involvement in Canadian society. Sharing of the national wealth of Canada is ill-organized at present and maintains many of our fellow citizens in misery. This situation should be of serious concern to all those who take some interest in the future of our country.

The guaranteed annual income constitutes an income supplement which benefits poor workers, small farmers, small fishermen, non-organized as well as union workers, employees on a temporary or seasonal job, and even more like widows who have not yet reached the age of 60. A guaranteed annual income system on a national basis is workable. Canada is in a position to do it both on the economic and financial point of view. Surely we should bring about a reform to give back to the government of Canada absolute control over its money and in particular over the coining of its credit. It is in prospect—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, dear colleagues. You may feel sure I will not abuse this. I make it a habit of being true to my word.

An hon. Member: Quite right!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): It is with a view to getting results that I put forward Bill C-206, under which the Bank of Canada would be given extra powers to finance the Canadian and provincial governments without the need to borrow abroad.

Canadians are now supporting a tremendous tax burden in respect of interests on our national debt, and as I indicated Friday last we do not even know who that goes to. Let us put an end to the era of public ignorance in that area, they deserve to be better informed. Let us work together to break open the financial mystique, that profitable myth which is a boon to financiers at the cost of much hardship to and grumbling from the public.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge every member in this House to take this pioneering and courageous step. Let us invite the government to introduce legislation for a guaranteed annual income. Such an enlightened proposal would be a guarantee of social peace and prosperity in Canada. I am more convinced than ever that if implemented such a guaranteed annual income would help motivate many workers to contribute more fully through their work to an increased Canadian productivity. Such a work incentive would be far better than the current system that discourages too many people from working.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you I thank my colleagues once more for this opportunity to complete my remarks on the motion I had the privilege to put forward today.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) concerning a guaranteed annual income plan. I am sure hon. members on all sides of the House highly esteem the hon. member for the sincerity with which he has brought forward his motion and spoken today. Since I have been a member of this House I have heard the hon. member more than once raise this issue and speak in support of it forcefully and strongly. I think most members of the House, myself included, support the hon. member to some degree when he says that a guaranteed annual income is important; but it is important to make sure that it will provide an incentive to work, not a disincentive to work. That concept, I think, will find general support on both sides of the House.

As the hon. member said, the government recognizes the importance of this general area and has committed itself to a course of action which essentially bears on the matters the hon. member raised in his motion. As hon. members know, early in 1973 the government initiated action for meeting objectives set out in the motion raised this afternoon. At that time, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) tabled in this House a working paper on social security in Canada and, as well, chaired a joint federal-provincial social security review. During the course of that review many major initiatives were taken which have contributed greatly to the attainment of the type of income security system which presumably is the fundamental objective for Canadians of the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

During the course of the review, a wide range of improvement to the over-all income security system for Canadians was put into effect. In addition, the social security system also saw the emergence of a system of income support and supplementation which would replace Canada's current welfare system. The Minister of National Health and Welfare advanced these proposals, which constituted a form of guaranteed annual income system, to his provincial colleagues one year ago—last February.

The reform of Canada's welfare system, a reform which would be effected by the implementation of these proposals, conforms precisely to the objective as set forth in the motion of the hon. member who spoke so well this afternoon. In his motion, the hon. member for Bellechasse called our attention to the necessity of ensuring that any guaranteed income system provides strong incentives for productivity and self-reliance of those who can work. That same concern was voiced as a matter of top priority throughout the course of the social security review. Indeed, the first proposal of the working paper on social security stated:

—the income security system should remove any disincentives which may exist to discourage people who are on social assistance from taking advantage of the training and employment opportunities available to them, and thus from becoming wholly self-dependent. It should also take care to eliminate any incentive which may now exist for people to shift from employment to social assistance, by reason of the higher benefits which might thus be obtained.

I subscribe strongly to the views I have just quoted. If the hon. member will read my speech delivered in the throne speech debate, he will note that I spoke at length about productivity and the need to make sure that our social security system in Canada helps people to enter and remain in the work force and be useful citizens, and that it should not encourage them to go on welfare or leave the work force since any such encouragement in the long run would not be of service to our people.

The hon. member raised certain of the concerns which were raised in the social security review. It is true that our current welfare system provides some Canadians with disincentives to work which are very real. As a member of parliament, I have talked to many people who have voiced such concerns. Although it is true that there are disincentives in the system, I would argue that they are not as widespread as many people seem to think. On the other hand, we would be wrong to contend that there are no disincentives in the system. For many persons currently on provincial social assistance there are powerful financial disincentives associated with return to employment. In some instances, for every dollar they earn they lose a dollar of social assistance; that is, they face a marginal tax rate of 100 per cent on their earnings.

If other Canadians were to face the same tax rate, they would not remain silent. I am sure that the effectiveness of this disincentive needs no further elaboration. Indeed, when compulsory deductions and work-related expenses are taken into account the recipient may face the unappealing prospect of exchanging $1 of social assistance for 80 cents or 90 cents of take-home pay. In some cases, accepting even part-time employment can lead to total loss of benefits. In addition, return to employment can mean the loss of a whole array of benefits in kind, such as dental care and subsidized housing. From a financial point of view at least there is real substance to the complaint that some people are better off on welfare than they are working. I am sure all members of the House will agree that this is wrong.

These financial disincentives are often reinforced by failure at the administrative level to assist the recipients to translate into reality the desire to return to employment. There is no question that the vast majority of people on welfare have special problems in terms of finding and keeping jobs. Often many of them are marginally attached to the work force. Quite often these people have had serious industrial accidents. Perhaps they have low qualifications for jobs that have an increased technology factor. Often the resources made available for equipping these people to overcome these problems are virtually non-existent. I wish to depart for a moment to speak about one of the major concerns I have in this area.

I understand all provinces have some form of workmen's compensation. This is an area that should be studied. Many of my constituents who have been injured have come to seek my assistance. They have had a period of time on workmen's compensation benefits. They have received some therapy in an attempt to restore them to the work force. However, often the part of a person that is most seriously damaged is the emotional system. A person whose hand has been crippled may still have some use of it, but he cannot do his job as well as he could previously. It therefore becomes difficult to be at ease in his former work situation.

Many of these people become unemployed and subsequently look for other work. Because of some degree of disability they may find it very difficult to find an attachment to the work force. Ultimately they end up on social security, welfare, if you want to use that term, municipally administered. That is how they sustain themselves and quite often their families. What we need is an intermediate step that would assist these people to move back into the work force.

People coming off workmen's compensation benefits who cannot attach themselves to the work force are often faced with a situation that seems to be more prevalent than many of us would like to admit. They may have worked for an employer who has very little patience with people who have physical disabilities caused by an injury in their own plants and so they are subsequently laid off. I really have difficulty understanding the consciences of employers who do that. It happens more often than any of us would care to admit.

I feel very strongly about these people. Even though they were once productive, loyal employees, they end up in a welfare situation. Once they have this emotional problem, it is very difficult to get them back into the work force. It should be pointed out that many of them would actually lose money by returning to work because they cannot get back their old jobs, or one that pays at a level high enough to make it worth their while. We set up a whole syndrome for people to become dependent on these benefits. The situation talked about in the review of gradually working back into the work force and being allowed to keep many of the benefits would be very desirable.

I had not intended to digress in this manner, but in the past two or three weeks I have had a number of representations from constituents who have had industrial accidents. They are deemed to be physically well by those who are trying to rehabilitate them. However, because of emotional damage they have great difficulty returning to work and coping with the noise, emotion, and stress put on them by work with which they were originally quite able to cope. Often this results in a conflict between that type of person and his employer, and his employment is terminated. Such a person finds himself in the position of having somewhat of a physical disability and a very large emotional disability as the result of not having a job. It is soul destroying to watch these people lose their self-esteem and respect.

In terms of the motion put forward by the hon. member and the review of the social assistance program, we want to ensure that we have some means of helping these people who are affected by the types of problems about which I have been talking. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are clinging to their independence despite the fact that, in financial terms at least, they would be better off on welfare. These are the working poor. They want to work, work hard, but are rewarded very little for doing so.

Many of the people I was talking about a moment ago have some form of disability, either physical or emotional, as a result of an industrial accident. Only a small proportion of them have any contact with the world of welfare. Most of them do not. That is a testimony to the value Canadians put on self-reliance and the work ethic.

We often hear that no one wants to work any more. Quite a lot is made of that when criticism is made of social programs we have to help people. I take issue with that.

I represent a constituency that probably has one of the highest average incomes in all of Canada. However, there are thousands of people in my constituency, and I am sure in the constituencies of almost every member, who are not at the high end of the income scale. These people want very much to work. However, because of their qualifications and how life unfolded for them, they do not receive a very high financial return for their endeavours. In fact many of them, with technology changing in the work force as much as it is, find themselves in a very difficult position. Rather than forcing these people out of the work force, there ought to be some kind of assistance for them. Programs must be organized to help these people supplement their income. It must be done in a way that ensures these people stay in the work force in the meantime.

A good many of these people have families, perhaps families that are larger in number than those of higher income people. Most of them have paying jobs year round, but their income is inadequate relative to their responsibilities. Other members of the family, other than the principal wage earner, have to go into the work force just to make sure the family unit can survive. I note that a typical family of four in this group would earn between $4,000 and $8,000 a year.

Removing the inequities that exist between these people and those currently on welfare is essential. We must reinforce their self-reliance and provide incentives that reward them rather than create disincentives further inducing them to withdraw from the labour force.

The hon. member's motion implies there are other problems which plague Canada's welfare system. There exists currently a bewildering array of federal, provincial, and municipal programs with related objectives in the area of income maintenance. Not only do the provisions in terms of benefits, conditions of eligibility and so on vary widely, but there is no consistency from one program to the next even on such basic terms of reference as the definition of income and the definition of a family unit.

Anyone who doubts that statement need only spend sometime in a constituency office trying to help those who come for advice and for whatever assistance their MP can give. They are really bewildered as to who is responsible for which program. Many people are of the opinion that a municipal welfare program is a program of the federal government and administered by it.

Even with regard to old age security, in terms of understanding the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement and, in the province of Ontario, the Gains program, there is very great difficulty. This has to be sincerely studied. The federal proposals for income support and supplementation came to grips squarely with these problems. Unlike the current system, the proposals would ensure that the total financial rewards to those who work always exceed the benefits given those who do not work.

In addition to provisions for justifiable work-related expenses and compulsory deductions at source, "tax-back" rates for those on support could be reduced to 70 per cent. That is, for every dollar earned, the recipient would keep 30 cents while the remaining 70 cents would go toward reducing the social assistance benefit. Income supplementation would be made available to the most vulnerable members of the working poor—families with children, and singles and couples over 54. It would ensure that they need not fall back into the support system in the face of inadequate returns from employment. Those, such as young single individuals who are better able to increase their earnings through occupational or geographic mobility, would not be eligible for supplementation.

While the benefits available through supplementation are modest by most standards—a maximum of $80 per month for a family of four—they would be a welcome addition to the incomes of families currently struggling hard just to stay afloat. Furthermore, the "tax-back" rate on earnings in supplementation would provide an effective work incentive. For every dollar earned the recipient would keep 65 cents, while the remaining 35 cents would go to reduce the supplementary benefit. Thus the proposals would put in place strong and sensible financial incentives toward work and self-reliance.

These financial incentives would be reinforced by a requirement for periodic employment availability assessment of all recipients of both support and supplementation. To ensure a level of national consistency in this critically important feature of the system, the federal government has put forward a set of guidelines for these assessments. These guidelines require that an assessment be applied to all family units applying for benefits. Furthermore, the assessment would apply to all potential earners within each family, consistent with the objective of distributing available employment among applicant families in such a way as to minimize reliance on public support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) on bringing before us again today the idea of a guaranteed annual income. I understand that one of his colleagues hopes to be able to say a few words, and therefore I shall keep my remarks brief.

I could not be expected to agree with everything the hon. member said in his interesting speech, but with the main proposal he put forward I am in enthusiastic agreement. I doubt that the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) is aware of what is involved in the concept of a guaranteed annual income otherwise he could hardly have contended that the government side of the House is moving in that direction. The government's review of social security is aimed at ironing out some of the injustices and difficulties which are in our present social security welfare programs, but the guaranteed annual income concept which we hold over here is really an attempt to put society itself on a more just and fairer basis.

As the hon. member for Bellechasse said, what he is asking is that the incomes people have be based on our production as a nation. The basic fact of a society like ours is that the production of wealth is a social process, a social accomplishment. It is not done individualistically any more. It is done by society. The sooner we realize that participation in our society involves the right to be in the work process but also the right to share the goods we produce on a reasonably equal basis, the sooner we will make progress.

We have moved in that direction in a number of ways. Indeed, the best things about our society are the things which we provide universally—education, hospitalization, health care, roads and highways, police and fire protection and those kinds of things, plus pensions on a universal basis to a considerable extent. I look forward to the day when we will have the kind of demogrant which hon. members over here are talking about and which we have been talking about for years. I insist that when that day comes it should be not on a means test basis but on the basis of an allowance that goes to people because they are people, because they are here, because they are part of the Canadian family. If some get too much, let the income tax system then take care of that. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I like the idea that is before us. Let us get started on it soon. If we cannot start it soon for everybody then I should like to see it started soon for veterans. We could then do away with the means tests, the health tests and all the rest. We could say to all veterans over a certain age "Here is your guaranteed income for life."

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I said I would try to be brief. I welcome this debate. I welcome this idea being thrown open for discussion today. If there are some who say it is futuristic and that it will take a long time to come, like a few others in this House I can say that I have been here long enough to see ideas, which were regarded as impossible when I first came here, actually realized. I believe Canadians want a better society and that this whole idea of a universal demogrant or a guaranteed income for all our people moves in that direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, time is running fast and as I want to be brief, I will sum up a little bit.

In February 1976, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) distributed written information on the federal proposals concerning income support and supplementation. On page 6, paragraph (b) of that document, we can read and I quote:

> (b) That families drawing support allocations be subject to a minimum 70 per cent reduction rate on gains, pensions and other incomes from private source. In other words, every dollar earned would bring about a 70 cents reduction of the support allocation—

Mr. Speaker, that formula the minister stated last year and which is explained in the brief he submitted to the House of Commons is to penalize people who work and follows the same philosophy as all existing legislation that is to deprive people who work to give to those who do not work. And people are tired of all this, because the one who works is at the same level as the one who does not work. There is hardly any difference between the two people.

That social system, Mr. Speaker, which is widely accepted today is rotten and disastrous for those who work as well as for those who do not work. For instance as we know some people work for a while and when they have enough unemployment stamps they quit and draw unemployment insurance benefits. Then they get another job only to join the unemployed again. They go back to work and once more fall victim to unemployment and the whole thing starts up all over again. At the end of the year, they have worked six months, pay less income tax, received unemployment insurance or welfare benefits while often getting a hidden supplementary income. Most employers nowadays—it is common knowledge—are unable to keep their employees. There is a monthly staff turnover of at least 20 per cent. Every month they must train at least 20 per cent of their personnel who work only long enough to get the number of stamps required to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Moreover, how many workers do we see nowadays who are not the least interested in working overtime because the net salary for overtime is about the same to the net salary for their regular hours because income tax is killing the desire to work. Our current non-social laws are based on such a socialistic mentality. It is bad for the population itself and for the country's economy. If all the unemployed workers and welfare recipients in the country had a guaranteed annual income as advocated today by my colleague, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), and as recommended by the Social Crediters in Canada for over 30 years and by a social and non socialistic measure, the difference between a guaranteed annual income as we are proposing today and a redistribution of income and a socialistic formula, our national production could jump by 40 per cent if we put to work all those who are able to work today and are living off unemployment insurance and welfare benefits.

With a 40 per cent increase in national production, we would not have to take from the workers to give to those who are not working. Everyone would be better off without the government having to take away from anyone. As he has said on many occasions, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would take from those who have to give to those who are not working anymore and those who do not want to work anymore, so that everyone would be on the same level. He wants to make everyone equally poor.

Mr. Speaker, before beginning to talk about charity in Canada, we should begin by talking about social justice and distribution justice because it is unthinkable to want to do charity when a country does not respect justice first of all because anyone can take from his neighbour to give to charity. Can the country spoliate those who work, in order to give those who have lost the courage to work because of work disincentives? I hope that if and when the Minister of National Health and Welfare tables information on his formula for a guaranteed annual income, his first aim will be social justice rather than social charity. Because there can be no effective social charity in Canada if we do not have first the social justice that would allow someone who earned something through his work to enjoy and retain it.

Mr. Speaker, if the government starts taking away the result of an individual's work to give it to those who would not work because of work disincentives, before long we will have a society where nobody works anymore, where nobody contributes anything to Canada's production and where everyone expects social help, some source of social pittance. Call it welfare allowance, unemployment insurance benefits, Works Canada or what have you. Such programs are work disincentives that in the current economic context induce people to count on some pittance, to live at the government's expense.

• (1750)

[English]

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a fair amount of ignorance in Canada about our federal social security legislation. A great many people say that the government is trying to assume responsibilities that its own citizens should take unto themselves, that the government should abdicate its paternalistic role. However, there is no real foundation for this belief, since it is almost universally accepted that in some situations people are in definite need of income support and supplementation in addition to social and health services.

The federal government has been reviewing and discussing possible improvements in Canada's welfare system over the past three years. Family allowances, old age security, and the Canada Pension Plan provisions have been modified and improved. Federal-provincial discussions have indicated the need for wages to exceed unemployment insurance or any form of welfare benefits. In other words, though we guarantee a barely adequate income to those who are not working for good reason, we believe that financial incentives should be given those who are employed, thus bolstering our belief in self-reliance and productivity. In fact, by periodic testing of employment availability of recipients of this kind of assistance, we make sure that everyone can participate in the available work to the full level of their capacity.

We propose at this time to provide a program of income support to the aged, the handicapped and to single parent families who cannot work, and also to those for whom no work is available. At the same time, we propose to supplement the incomes of those who receive inadequate pay. This would help the vulnerable members of the working poor, namely, families with children and those over 55 years of age. There are probably half a million families in the country who fall into this category. Some of them would be better off to accept some form of social assistance or welfare; however, their pride keeps them working. Nevertheless, they suffer from a marked economic disadvantage. These citizens on marginal incomes should be encouraged to remain active members of the work force but should have recognition and assistance.

Our intention is to introduce a new social services act during this session, following up the Speech from the Throne. We also intend to make it more desirable to work than to accept welfare. We have support services in mind which are designed to allow the aged, the sick, and the handicapped to live at home rather than in an institution. Meals on wheels, home nursing and homemakers will keep folks in their own community. Rehabilitation will often make the handicapped employable, and assistance in helping them find a job will keep them off welfare. Many people heretofore seemed to be locked into unemployment because if they are handicapped they cannot afford transportation to get to work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ellis: That ardent Tory from Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not know about being an ardent Tory from Nickel Belt. The hon. member makes these remarks, but I want to assure him that the only known Tory in Nickel Belt is in the museum of anthropology at Laurentian University. We cannot find any live Tories in Nickel Belt. I challenge the hon. member from the Tory benches to come to Nickel Belt to see if he can find one. I must correct myself. There will be one Tory in Nickel Belt some time in the next month or so. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) is going to address a girls' college in Sudbury, and she will be the only admitted live Tory in Nickel Belt.

Mr. Ellis: What about the mayor?

Mr. Rodriguez: What mayor? The Tory mayor has been defeated three times in the last three months. However, that is a diversion, and I do not want to digress tonight because I want to zero in—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member was recognized to address the House on the bill which is before us, Bill C-22, so would he please do so.

Mr. Rodriguez: The diversionary tactics which are being used by the Tories prevent me from zeroing in on Bill C-22. If they would only cease their diversionary tactics, we could get on with this debate.

Prior to five o'clock I was raising some relevant points regarding Bill C-22, and I think it is only right, just, and proper that I should remind the House of the points I was raising before the supper hour. We members of the New Democratic Party have not been perverse in the way we have opposed this bill or in the way we have spoken on many clauses of it. We have said over and over again, and we intend to say over and over again during this debate, that a progressive tax system must serve to distribute wealth in Canada, not provide tax loopholes for the well-off. Every single time this government introduces a change with respect to taxation, we end up with loophole upon loophole upon loophole. We on this side of the House are in good company when we say that the tax system is nothing but loophole upon loophole for the well-off. I say that because of what no less a person than Marcel Bélanger, president of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, said in a speech to the annual conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation in November, 1975.

I want to put what he said on the record for all hon. members of this House to peruse at their leisure. He said that changes have made Canada's tax system so complicated that even professional tax experts can barely follow it. He asked rhetorically how we can expect the ordinary taxpayer to understand this mess. He urged the federal government to declare a two-year moratorium on tax changes and to concentrate on simplifying the system. He also called for a revision of the income tax rate schedule to ease the burden on lower income Canadians. That is important, Mr. Speaker. He said that governments have modified the tax system time and time again, thus adding to the complications which already exist, and the same time they have unconsciously created loopholes.

Many of these tax changes have failed to produce the intended results, and he cited the registered home ownership savings plan as one example. We have dealt with the registered home ownership savings plan in this debate, and we have pointed out how it is used as a tax loophole for the well-off.

Mr. Bélanger pointed out, as we have done in this House, that the RRSP was designed to help young people save in order to buy a house eventually, but it has degenerated into a loophole whereby spouses mutually transfer their property to take advantage of the deduction, and the barefaced aspect of it all is that this is blatantly advertised. Is that what a tax system is all about?

• (2010)

The members of my party have said time and again that the tax system ought to distribute wealth in the country, not accumulate it at the top levels and hope it will filter down. That is the trickle down theory which the government and its allies on the Tory benches have for a long time advocated. Look around, Mr. Speaker. The Liberals and Tories are all products of the trickle down theory. Just look at them. Incidentally, I see that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton is present. Mr. Bélanger went on to say that a straightforward reduction in tax rates would have been simpler and much more effective.

The question which arises is, why not institute a tax rate reduction? Surely that would lead to savings, including savings connected with the bureaucracy of Canada which oversees the RRSP program. I have a sneaking suspicion that RRSPs were set up to help the insurance companies accumulate capital so that they could invest it. I have a sneaking suspicion that that is why the whole program was set up.

An hon. Member: It is to help insurance companies invest in shopping plazas.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, so that they can turn round and lend money for the building of sky towers and shopping plazas.

Mr. Belanger went on to say that, as a result of numerous modifications, the federal guide to filing income tax is now 45 pages of small print, the Quebec guide is 41 pages long, and the Ontario guide is 12 pages long. He said that governments have hired actors and performers to convince the little guy that it is simple to fill out his income tax return. Before the poor taxpayer suffers from an inferiority complex he ought to ask those performers, who fills out their income tax returns? Mr. Belanger went on to say that the present income tax rate schedule discourages effort and savings. It has too many brackets. The rates go up too quickly, especially in the lower brackets, and reach too high a level. The federal income tax schedule has 13 levels, he said, more than half of which apply to taxable incomes of less than $10,000. This means that the lower or middle income taxpayer who finds his income increasing because of inflation could easily jump one or even two brackets at a time, thus incurring a proportionately heavier tax burden.

Mr. Belanger went on to suggest that the tax schedule ought to be changed, by cutting the present number of brackets in half, by widening the income classes, and by setting the maximum marginal rate at 38 per cent, instead of as at present, at 47 per cent.

That is the view which I have tried to put forward in the present debate. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Belanger said these things in 1975, and we are now in 1977. It shows that the more things change around here, the more they stay the same. Actually, they deteriorate.

As I was saying earlier this afternoon, tax credits are the most advisable way of distributing wealth in Canada. Some provincial governments have used the tax credit system for social programs. What about the federal government? Has it ever used the tax credit system? The answer is yes. And where has it used the tax credit system? I do not want to be cynical, Mr. Speaker. The people of Canada, particularly the people of Nickel Belt, are not cynical, and I speak on their behalf. When I think of the way we have used the tax credit system, it makes me want to vomit in this House. I am thinking of going behind the curtains and doing it.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Rodriguez: We have used it in the election expenses act. All along it was said that we could not do it; but apparently we can do it when it helps to keep parties in power. The act provides for a write-off, for a deduction from income of contributions made to political parties. That is a crying shame. We cannot use the tax credit to bring in a guaranteed annual income for low income Canadians. I know that any mention of the guaranteed annual income is like waving a red flag in front of the Tories. Perhaps that is why the minister is afraid.

There are advantages to a tax credit system. We think that since provincial governments have used a tax credit system for social programs, the federal government ought to use that system for its social programs. That is the only fair way of doing it, because then those who earn a buck will pay tax on that buck. As well, a tax credit system could lead to a rationalization of expenditures and a reduction in the numbers of bureaucrats needed to run our present social services system. Clearly there are concrete advantages to a tax credit system. Such a system would be better than the system envisaged by Bill C-22, for we shall need to create a whole new bureaucracy to administer the changes in the act, an act which does nothing but create loophole upon loophole.

Another advantage connected with the tax credit system concerns the establishment of a guaranteed annual income. Surely a tax credit system is one of the best ways of maintaining a guaranteed annual income. It would work to the advantage particularly of those too poor to pay taxes. It could become a negative income tax and that, Mr. Speaker, is in line with our idea of how the tax system of this country should work.

Why is the minister so sensitive about this concept? Let me quote some of his words. I will put them on record, since I think they may give us a clue to his sensitivity concerning the guaranteed annual income. He said this:

> We are not trying to slip a guaranteed income in through the back door. We have started from the premise that there will be no more new government expenditures on social programs. We've taken the pledge.

He has taken a pledge. The only pledge Liberals and Tories have taken in this House with respect to income tax is the pledge to make loopholes in the act so large that elephants could crawl through them.

Mrs. Pigott: Don't be personal.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton suggests that I am being personal. I am sorry; I could never equate her with an elephant, even though her hair may be white.

Why is the minister so sensitive? Perhaps I could illustrate my point by quoting what Mr. Stephen Duncan wrote in the Financial Post of November 6, 1976. He wrote in part:

> During the tax reform debate in the early 1970's the Ontario government battled to convince federal planners to make more use of tax credits. Ottawa said no. In the early 1970's and until recently, it was good politics to hand out money. New programs with new bureaucracies were the most visible way of showing government largesse. The politics can flip flop again. It is not inconceivable that by the time the tax study concludes a year or more down the road Ottawa would be happy to have some new programs to announce possibly during a federal election. If so, this current exercise could come to nothing.

● (2020)

That is the way it goes, Mr. Speaker. That is a quote that Mr. Duncan includes in his article. It was a comment made by one official working on this so-called income tax study.

In the last few days of this debate we have said time and again that this kind of system under which we are operating permits loopholes, and we pointed them out. Here is one pointed out last year in the Financial Post, and I think it will warm the cockles of the hearts of all the business elite and apologists for corporations in this House. This article by D. W. Smith and G. K. Dowsley, entitled "How financial firms Can Diversify: Use a Loophole," reads as follows:

> A new income tax provision that allows another avenue for taxfree corporate diversification will be of particular interest to financial institutions.
> As part of the general expansion of the sections of the tax law dealing with reorganization, the ability now exists to expand "upstream" without creating any capital gains tax liability.
>
> Tax rules allow taxfree "downstream" diversification, too. But since most financial institutions are not as free as other corporations to diversity through subsidiaries this new rule is an improvement in the tax system for a very large sector of corporate taxpayers.
> Surprisingly, the possibility of this type of reorganization has not been widely publicized and Ottawa has not received the credit it should for creating this "government sponsored loophole."
>
> It seems now possible for Canadian financial institutions to do what many U.S. banks did in the 1960's—create upstream parents in order to diversify and still meet the requirements of the regulatory authorities. Financial institutions, or, indeed, any company, will now be able to do so in Canada.
>
> The procedure works as follows:
>
> Company A wishes to create an upstream parent, X; company X is established with no assets. The shareholders of A exchange their shares for treasury shares in X. The shareholders now own X, whose sole assets are the shares of A.

Income Tax Act

Subsequent acquisitions may be financed by additional share exchanges, loans secured by the shares of the subsidiary, and dividends from the income of controlled companies earned after reorganization.

The problem in the past was that once a shareholder exchanged shares of A for shares of X he was considered to have disposed of them and was thus subject to capital gains tax. The magnitude of the tax bill for major shareholders made this procedure prohibitive; so it was seldom, if ever, used in Canada.

That is the indication that there has to be a loophole created.

But now the exchange will take place without incurring tax, by passing the tax cost associated with the original shares on the new shares.

However, the taxpayer may elect to assume that a disposition occurs at market values if this is to his advantage, if for example, a loss is produced or the gain is absorbed by losses from previous transactions.

This would result in a higher base from which future gains will be determined. The cost base to corporation X of the acquired shares is unaffected by the option selected; market values are consistently used . . .

There are, of course, conditions which must be met but these are not unduly restrictive nor unreasonable. The main one is that shareholders in company X must deal at arm's length before the exchange. That is, there must be different directors for the new company, at least temporarily. In addition, no one shareholder may hold more than 50 per cent of X's shares after the exchange.

These restrictions do not affect legitimate business procedures but are designed to prevent owners of closely held corporations avoiding tax.

There are other advantages too. A reluctant shareholder could be paid by X to sell his shares to someone willing to make the exchange. This would be important when the market prices are depressed. If, say, Mr. Jones originally paid $30 for the stock but the market price had declined to $18 at the time of the exchange, company X could pay him $12 on the condition that he sells his shares to someone willing to make the exchange.

The taxfree zone carries through with the exchange and a corporate shareholder would not lose the addition of its pre-1972 gain to its "1971 capital surplus on hand."

The taxfree status of share exchanges is not affected if fractional shares are offered for cash or if certain shareholders are offered additional inducements; the tax status of the remaining shareholders is not jeopardized.

The possibilities of this provision seem so promising that it is hard to see why it has not been explored in more detail.

The problem in the past was that once a shareholder exchanged shares of A for shares of X, he was considered to have disposed of them and was thus subject to capital gains tax. The magnitude of the tax bill for major shareholders made this procedure prohibitive; so it was seldom, if ever, used in Canada.

But now the exchange will take place without incurring tax, by passing the tax cost associated with the original shares on to the new shares.

However, the taxpayer may elect to assume that a disposition occurs at market values if this is to his advantage, if, for example, a loss is produced or the gain is absorbed by losses from previous transactions.

This would result in a higher base from which future gains will be determined. The cost base to corporation X of the acquired shares is unaffected by the options selected; market values are consistently used.

Corporations would be able to use this method to obtain shares in a wide variety of companies. Commentators have talked about individual takeovers, but a large diversified portfolio could be created. The cost base to X of these newly acquired shares would be the fair market value at the time of the exchange.

However, if less than 10 per cent of the shares are acquired by the corporation then the tax base is deemed to be zero. Hence widespread offers for exchanges would be discouraged because of the large capital gains tax in the future.

One large financial institution, AIC corporation—

You see, Mr. Speaker, how all these things tend to get tied in.

—has announced its plans to phase into the banking field and other similar corporations are examining the prospects of entering this field.

It does not surprise us that they trotted out the corporate apologist from Edmonton West to make a speech in this House recently against our filibuster or debate on the IAC private member's bill.

Reorganizing upstream offers another avenue to accomplish this and overcomes possible difficulties.

Leasing or insurance businesses separately regulated or not permitted by the Bank Act, could become subsidiaries of the upstream parent without affecting the operations of the main operating firm, or obliging the disposal of promising enterprises.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The list goes on, Mr. Speaker. That is another example. I do not know of too many people in Nickel Belt who could take advantage of that kind of chess game for the corporate world. As a matter of fact I do not know of anyone in Nickel Belt who could take advantage of this sort of thing.

As I mentioned before we broke for the supper hour, this debate on Bill C-22, like many other debates, tends to allow the House to really explore the thoughts and, so to speak, the psyche of members of the House. They tend to let their hair down and we get what they are thinking about. We had one such gem when the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) spoke about women and indicated that women in the work force were a social phenomenon working only for the second car, and that day care centres result in raising only juvenile brats. Conservatives have to live with that. They cannot continue parading across this country as the friend of the worker, the friend of women, the friend of labour and the friend of young Canadians. A debate of this kind tends to unmask this sort of thing. It rips away the pretences. Then we get to the real Tory or Liberal.

● (2030)

Mr. Peters: We see it as the same thing.

Mr. Rodriguez: We know they are the same. We saw an example of that.

Remarks were made earlier in this debate by another member to my right, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He apparently is the specialist in his party on policies on taxation. I will make myself clear on this; I am not so presumptuous as to suggest that the Conservative party at this time has a tax-policy. Far be it from me to do that. Who am I but a little school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, did I hear the hon. member right when he referred to his riding in pejorative terms as "the backwoods of Ontario?"

Mr. Leggatt: You don't know what pejorative means.

Mr. Peters: He was thinking about Nipissing when he said that.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will repeat it, Mr. Speaker. I am just a little school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario, which includes the hon. member's riding of Nipissing. There are a lot of us there. We are proud to be backwoods people.

An hon. Member: Backward you mean.

Mr. Rodriguez: We look at things as they are. We look at the taxation policy and ask why can it not be simplified. We pride ourselves on coming from the backwoods of northern Ontario. We tend to be "grass-rootsy" people.

An hon. Member: Grass-rootsy?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, grass-rootsy. We look at the income tax system and ask pointed questions.

Mr. MacKay: Ask intelligent questions, not punchy questions.

Mr. Rodriguez: Sometimes they are punchy, but they are always pungent. I want to comment on some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary North during this debate. He said that what we need is "a group of men and women in this department", meaning the taxation department, "who will meet with the ordinary taxpayer". I can only assume that the object of the hon. member's suggestion is a simplification of the present income tax system in order to allow the ordinary taxpayer to understand better the complexities of an act that has baffled many of the legal minds in this House to this day.

The hon. member has called for a one-to-one relationship in the income tax jungle. I do not know what he is up to. I want to go on record as supporting simplicity in our tax system.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are an expert in simplicity.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is more to come. I would like to see the ordinary taxpayer understand the tax system in this country without the additional and unnecessary costs that would be entailed in the proposal by the hon. member for Calgary North. Imagine the number of bureaucrats that would be required to give advice to each and every taxpayer, to say, "If you do this, this is what will happen; but if you do that, that will happen."

The hon. member suggested that we have taxation personnel available to citizens across this country, people who would meet with the ordinary taxpayer. At this time when Canadians are being asked to practice restraint, Tory members are continually on their feet lambasting the government for being wasteful. I find this not only amusing but typical. The spokesman of that party is now asking the government to spend Lord knows how much of the taxpayers' money for guidance through a system that many of his collegues helped to construct under past Tory administrations. As I pointed out earlier, they are sucking and blowing at the same time. On one hand they talk about hiring bureaucrats to give advice to ordinary taxpayers, and on the other they talk about fiscal restraint. It just does not work. It just does not make sense.

Surely there is a better way of simplifying the income tax system than hiring bureaucrats to build empires. Rather than building empires, we should be dismantling them. I hope I am not doing an injustice to the hon. member's suggestion. Far be it from me, a school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario to tell a corporate lawyer his business, especially when he has just returned from a bar association convention. It would be absolutely presumptuous of me to lecture him on the income tax structure. God knows how complicated it is. I do not intend to try and heavy foot it through the income tax structure. I am merely trying to ask punchy, pungent, pointed, and direct questions. I hope I am not doing any injustice. I have tried diligently to come to terms with the letter and spirit of his recommendation. It is rather difficult when so many of the suggestions offered by the party on my right are so frivolous and poorly thought out. However, I cannot help but feel that the hon. member's scheme would require a considerable expenditure.

Under the hon. member's scheme, we would either have to hire and train additional staff all across the country to explain our unjust and retrogressive tax system, which we have been blessed with by the free enterprise administration, or transfer staff within the existing taxation service. Either way it would entail an unnecessary expenditure of funds and a misallocation of human resources. Why? I will tell you why.

Once upon a time, and this may sound like a Grimm fairy tale, and in some ways it is, in the halcyon days of the sixties, the predecessor of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the late Lester B. Pearson, went to a man named Carter. He said Carter—

An hon. Member: Jimmy?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, not Jimmy. He asked him to determine what was wrong with our taxation system. And this man Carter did. And, much to the present Prime Minister's chagrin, he made a point of turning out one of the finest reports this country has ever seen. What was the cornerstone of that report on taxation? The cornerstone was that a buck was a buck was a buck and had to be taxed.

● (2040)

Mr. Carter did not even touch on the questions we socialists are concerned about. He did not talk about the redistribution of wealth. He talked about justice in the tax system. He talked about fairness. All he asked the government to do was to tax a buck every time a buck was made. Well, those Liberals are pretty tough. The Carter Commission made its recommendations to cabinet. It is now recorded history that when the first corporate delegation came to oppose Carter's recommendations they ran for cover. Instead of implementing a fair taxation system, they ran, because those were the same boys they would be asking for party contributions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Certainly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I asked my hon. friend whether he would permit a question, and I believe he said, yes.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think the hon. member should address himself to the Chair and not to the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Does the hon. member accept the question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Absolutely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A moment ago the hon. member said, if I heard him right, that it was Mr. Pearson who asked the late Mr. Carter to produce that report. I wonder if I can refresh his memory and ask him whether it was not the present right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In other words, it was a commission established by the Tories.

Mr. Rodriguez: My memory is now coming back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: It was the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That is one of the hazards which face one in the heat of debate and in making a point.

We have heard catcalls from across the way. I would point out that members over there have a chance to make speeches on this bill but they forwent the opportunity.

An hon. Member: We are waiting for you to finish.

Mr. Rodriguez: They gave up.

An hon. Member: Why don't you?

Mr. Rodriguez: They gave up their opportunity to speak on third reading. If they have any comments to make, they should wait until Friday when I finish speaking. They can make their contributions then.

I will say that my memory has come back. It was the right hon. member for Prince Albert who asked the Carter Commission to make recommendations. It was interesting to see how these two old line parties attacked that report because of its premise that a buck is a buck and should be taxed on that basis. Note how that document has been forgotten. Today that report is gathering dust in some office. They retreated before the corporations, but did they ever take a tough stand against labour in connection with the anti-inflation proposals? Those people over there really pride themselves on being tough. But when the delegations came from big business, they put their tails between their legs and ran for cover like a bunch of scared rabbits.

An hon. Member: Does a rabbit have a tail?

Mr. Rodriguez: The rabbit does have a tail. What has become of the Carter Report on taxation? It has been smothered. It was smothered in paper. They published a green paper, and then a white paper, and then went through the motions of participatory democracy as they always do when confronted by objective truth. Later, they forgot all about it. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Calgary North should have failed to mention the Carter Commission. The only charitable thing which could be said about this sorry government opposite is that at least it went through the motions. I imagine that the Tory party would have found the report alongside the M.A. thesis by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) on the shortcomings of the Diefenbaker government.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

I do not think we should forget for one moment the pivotal recommendation of the Carter Commission, because it is germane to our consideration of Bill C-22, as it is to any other bill relating to taxation. The contention that a buck was a buck and should be taxed every time it was made was one which sent Liberal and Tory bagmen running for cover.

The report went on to say other things. It said there should be no deductions, no exemptions, no more tax shelters for the rich and for the corporations, no more asking the lower and middle classes to carry an unfair tax burden, thus perpetuating the system under which the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. Since the Carter Commission report was filed away we have seen a deterioration in the quality of the lives of the people.

I realize that many of my friends and colleagues here will regret my spoiling their conception of this land as a land flowing with milk and honey, but I must tell them I had an opportunity recently to visit some of the poorest areas of Canada. I speak of the recent visit I made to Newfoundland and Cape Breton Island where unemployment has reached staggering proportions. The problem there was not inflation. The workers' wages were not sending up the prices of goods. After all, the average income there is only 70 per cent of the national average income. The problem there was unemployment. Nevertheless the government's so-called anti-inflation program is visited upon them as well as upon Canadians in other parts of the country. These are proud people, Mr. Speaker. They want to make a life for themselves and keep their families in some sort of dignity. They pay their taxes.

● (2050)

I cannot tell a lie. They are proud of their contributions to our nation's lifestyle. I speak of course of those who are still fortunate enough, in the face of Liberal and Tory federal and provincial governments, to have employment. These people are proud. They pay their share and help their neighbours across this great country. What are we as elected politicians to say to them when they ask us, as I was asked, why they must pay 25 per cent of their income in federal taxes when corporate giants, not struggling, poor, little corporations and small businesses—

Mrs. Pigott: Like mine.

Mr. Rodriguez: The "Cookie Monster" over here says they are like hers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am talking about such giants as Imperial Oil and International Nickel. Incidentally, I notice that the vice-president of International Nickel is now chairman of the Tory advisory board on policy. That is like asking Evel Knievel to park your car. It is ridiculous. Here are these giants which, I submit, are not even Canadian-owned, which are paying less than one-half the rate of these people, less than 25 per cent of their income in taxes. That has to be a travesty in this country and it has to be forever. It has to be a postscript to these two old line establishment parties in Canada. Small wonder that there is so much cynicism in the land.

Mr. Peters: It is interesting to note that all International Nickel people pay taxes, but not the company.

Mr. Rodriguez: When I came back from Newfoundland I could not help but think about why I am a member of parliament here. Why am I here and why are we all here? I think that is something that all members should think about, especially when we come to look at the whole question of taxation. We have assumed this responsibility as elected members of parliament. People ask what we are going to do for them, what we are going to do about distributing wealth, what we are going to do about the serious problems facing our nation. I always find a great deal of solace in reading Matthew, Chapter 5, verses 1 to 16, and often I meditate on it. I will read these verses for the edification of members. I seriously suggest that members think of this because it is very germane to the job we are doing here. They read:

1. And seeing the multitudes, He went up into a mountain:

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am quite ready to listen to the ramblings of the hon. member so long as he is dealing with the income tax legislation or the Carter Commission and who appointed the Carter Commission, but when he starts to indicate that the Bible is relevant to the bill presently under study, I think you should call him to order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I want to suggest one thing. Perhaps you should reflect on this before you make your ruling. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais), even though he is Postmaster General, has not even heard what the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is going to say. He will quote something that is relevant to this debate, and I think the hon. member for Nipissing should wait a few minutes and hear what my friend will say before he makes a fool of himself by suggesting my friend is out of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you take that into account before making a ruling, and give the hon. member for Nickel Belt a chance to say what he wants to say. After that perhaps the hon. member for Nipissing can rise and make a statement.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that what is relevant on third reading is to refer to the whole bill and the contents of the bill, not its details. It seems to me that from time immemorial, even though my athesistic friend objects to the reading of the Testament, there has always been, at least in the ordinary person, a desire to establish equality in taxation. From my limited reading of both the Old Testament and the New Testament it is my understanding that there is considerable relevance in the Bible to the collection of taxes and the way in which taxes are applied.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is quite right that those hon. members who are recognized should address their remarks to the bill, and for that purpose I think we should hear the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I hope he will continue his remarks on Bill C-22.

Mr. Rodriguez: Again I read:

2. And He opened his mouth, and taught them, saying,
3. Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
4. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.
5. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair recognized the hon. member for Nickel Belt for the purpose of commenting on Bill C-22. The Chair has difficulty in relating what he is reading now to Bill C-22. I hope the hon. member will limit his remarks to the bill now before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Peters: And this is a man of the cloth, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does Your Honour not think it might be useful to ascertain what it is that the member is reading from the New Testament, and what argument he wishes to draw from that with respect to the bill? I am sure his reference to the New Testament is for the purpose of commenting on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It might be interesting, but I am sure all hon. members would agree with me that it might be better for the hon. member to conclude his remarks on the Old or New Testament and to revert to the contents of the bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: I only have a few more lines to read, Mr. Speaker.

It continues:

6. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.
7. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.
8. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.
9. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.
10. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for their's is the kingdom of Heaven.
11. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This could go on for days and days. There are many quotations from the Bible. Again I ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair. There is sufficient content in Bill C-22 to discuss the bill alone. I ask the hon. member to revert to the bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: The point I was trying to make is that while this gives much spiritual comfort to the soul, it has been the rationale for parts of Atlantic Canada that we have always offered spiritual solace. That the meek shall inherit the land remains spiritual solace, but we have to put bread and potatoes on the table, and we have to do that through a tax system that is fair and just. That is what this quotation speaks about. It speaks about justice, fair play, and right.

The rulers of the country are the people who sit in judgment. Here we are sitting in judgment on Bill C-22. We have to make a decision on it. It seems to me that if there were some meekness in the hearts of the government, some righteousness and some mercy, they would not attempt to foist on the people of Canada a bill such as Bill C-22.

There is cynicism in the land. Some would put that cynicism down to experiences south of the border, and I suppose that is a good rationale. They have a right to be cynical, however, about the things they see in the government of Canada today. They see the Sky Shops Affair, bribes being paid to Argentinian government officials, agents being paid off in numbered Swiss bank accounts, and black lists being kept. Is it any wonder that we have that cynicism? We cannot rationalize it by saying it is the Nixon era. It is the same in Canada; we are no whiter than they are. People are being very cynical. The government is bringing forward at this time a very cynical bill, C-22, which we have criticized in detail on various points, and rightly so. We have pointed out how the system creates a loophole.

The hon. member for Calgary North has suggested that what we need to improve the tax system are more advisers. The root of the problem is that we are really treating the symptom, not the disease itself. In other words, we are applying a band-aid to a severed artery. What we need are not guidance sessions, with all the expense and manpower waste that entails; we need a serious commitment to major tax reform.

On top of that, the government's bill is limiting the 10 per cent surtax on high income earners for the 1976 taxation year. Removal of this meagre surtax will mean a substantial saving for these high income earners in the 1977 taxation year. This kind of subservience to the wealthy in Canada becomes clear in Leonard Shifrin's article which appeared in the December 29, 1976, edition of the Citizen and which I would like to quote as it is very apropos of the bill:

> First, the government ends the freeze it imposed last year on the cost of living index for family allowances. Since the allowance is taxable, families at different income levels get to keep different proportions of the increase. Thus a family of two earning $10,000 will retain $32 of it, while the same size family with a $50,000 income only retains $21. To compensate the $50,000 a year family for getting $11 less benefit from the allowance boost, the government is going to give an extra $593 by abolishing the 10 per cent surtax on incomes of more than $30,000. Increasing family allowances will cost the government $115 million. That's $165 million it will pay out, less than $50 million it will tax back. Cancelling the surtax will cost $135 million. And every penny of it will go to the two or three per cent of Canadians with incomes of $30,000 plus.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

The elimination of the surtax for the 1977 taxation year represents a major step back from the supposed attempt to force everyone to make equal sacrifices of some kind under the anti-inflation program. Was not everybody supposed to make a sacrifice according to his means? This has been honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. Peters: It sure didn't last long.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, it did not. We know those who are not making sacrifices and who will be laughing even more when the surtax is removed. As a matter of fact, they will be laughing all the way to the bank. These people are not Jerry Beaulieu who spent last year cold and wet working 60 hour weeks in a downtown Toronto car wash. Do you know what he earned, Mr. Speaker? He earned $8,268. It will not be Mrs. Shirley Barga who works long and hard hours in my constituency office making $7,920 a year. The persons who will be laughing all the way to the bank will be people like medical doctors, whose incomes have just increased from $45,700 to $49,000, and this in a period of so-called wage restraint.

Mr. Symes: There goes the $2,400 limit.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, as I have said, there are loopholes all the way through the system.

An hon. Member: Where do you get those figures?

Mr. Rodriguez: I realize that these are very conservative figures; they come from the Anti-Inflation Board. And let us not forget that the incomes of professionals and executives are not being restrained at all, despite the platitudes of the government. Just for the record, I think we ought to look at incomes by profession. I have the figures for the average net income of professional practitioners by category. The net income of architects is given as $46,100, having been increased from $43,400, an increase of $2,700, or a percentage increase of 6.2 per cent. Right off the bat I would ask, what about the $2,400 limit that is supposed to be placed on all increases?

As for chiropractors their average salary went from $27,500 to $29,100, an increase of $1,600, or in percentage terms 5.8 per cent. Consultants: their salaries went from $16,700 to $17,800, an increase of $1,100, or a percentage change of 6.6 per cent. Dentists: their base income went from $34,100 to $40,800, an increase of $6,700, or 19.6 per cent. That is almost three times as much as the supposed limit under the anti-inflation guidelines. I doubt whether the excess was ever collected. Engineers: their salaries went from $38,200 to $45,900, an increase of $7,700 or 20.2 per cent. As for lawyers—

Mr. Leggatt: Shhhhhh!

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) is shushing me.

Mr. Leggatt: No, I am not.

Mr. Rodriguez: Lawyers went from $34,900 to $40,000, an increase of $5,100, or 14.6 per cent. The salaries of optometrists went from $29,000 to $31,600, an increase of $2,600, or 9 per cent. Salaries of public accountants went from $38,500 to $42,700, an increase of $4,200 or 10.9 per cent. Veterinarians: their salaries went from $25,100 to $26,500, an increase of $1,400, or 5.6 per cent. Doctors' salaries went from $45,700 to $49,000, an increase of $3,300, or 7.2 per cent. The average increase, Mr. Speaker, was from a base of $35,700 to $40,600, an average change in dollars of $4,900, and the average percentage change is 13.7 per cent.

What kind of game is being played here, Mr. Speaker? Every time the government permits a tax change, it is imposing it upon figures and facts of this kind. This can only serve to heighten the disparities within the system. It gives it a warp and makes it unfair and unjust for people at the bottom end of the income ladder.

When implementing these tax changes from whom is the government asking a sacrifice? Who is the government asking to make a contribution to the national good and the national welfare of our country? Is it going to be Mr. Beaulieu, who washes cars for $8,000 a year or is it going to be that lady in my riding office who earns $7,900 a year? Who will it be? Will it be Mr. Albert Thornborough, the president of Massey-Ferguson Limited, who made $353,662 last year? My, but there is some restraint there! Last week I wanted to know how one man can earn $353,662 a year. The sky's the limit, and all we ever do is open up the floodgates so that more taxes can be written off, taxes which should be paid to this country. Mr. Thornborough ought to be proud to live in Canada, and he ought to learn to pay his fair share of taxes, but when he has handmaidens sitting over there, and when his mouthpieces support him over on this side every time a tax change is proposed, the Albert Thornboroughs of this world—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On second thought I wonder if we should not consider allowing the hon. member to go back to the Bible. I am also curious about the time limit of the hon. member. He started at 4.20 this afternoon. I am a bit curious as to how much longer we have to suffer through this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): For the information of the hon. member, I think the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is allowed to talk as long as he wishes. He is the first spokesman at third reading.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) ought to relax because I am getting to the Old Testament. I particularly like some quotations from Genesis, and tomorrow I am going to quote from the Old Testament because it is very relevant to the Income Tax Act. We know that Matthew, whose name was Levi, was a publican. He was a tax collector, and he put more taxes into his pocket than he did into the church collection. Does that sound familiar? By golly, Bill C-22—

An hon. Member: You are going to be struck by lightning if you keep that up.

Mr. Rodriguez: —is highly reminiscent of what had to be done to those moneychangers and tax collectors. They had to be cleaned out. Fortunately, we have abandoned capital punishment, and we are on the way to abandoning corporal punishment, so we cannot whip them any more. However, that might be a good idea.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We haven't done away with corporal punishment.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am always very happy when hon. members interject because, when they do that, and rise on points of order, I know that the points I am making are really getting under their skin. I can understand the hon. member for Restigouche coming to the rescue of Mr. Thornborough, coming from a riding like his which has unemployment of over 30 per cent. He would like to defend a person who earns $353,662. He should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Harquail: How much longer are you going to hold up the House?

Mr. Peters: Who cares?

Mr. Rodriguez: Who else is being asked to contribute? Will it be a chap by the name of Borje Salming, a Toronto Maple Leaf hockey player, who makes $250,000 a year? Will it be H. R. Fraser, the chairman of Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, who makes $160,000 a year? Will it be CTV news anchorman Lloyd Robertson, who makes $100,000 a year? Will it be Eric Trigg, the executive vice-president of Alcan Aluminum Limited, who in 1974 received a salary of $147,438 and in 1975 received a salary of $162,178, an increase of 10 per cent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, but they are squealing now. All their Tory friends are being named. Will it be John Armstrong, chairman of the board and president of Imperial Oil, who made $234,333 in 1975, $36,000 more than in 1974? Will it be Clifford Hatch, president of Hiram-Walker-Gooderham and Worts Limited, who earned a salary of $225,000 last year? Will it be A. E. Feldmeyer, president and managing director of Canadian Superior Limited, who received a salary of $311,400 last year?

Will it be John Devlin, chairman of the board of Carling-O'Keefe Limited, who received a salary of $164,829? Will it be Edgar M. Bronfman, chairman of the board of Seagram's Company, who made a salary of $300,000 last year? Will it be Sandy Holly, a jockey, who made $450,000 last year? He is a racehorse jockey, not a disc jockey. At one end of the spectrum we have these corporate wheels.

I would like to know the yardstick by which one man can earn $350,000 or $450,000 and take advantage of many loopholes besides. For these people it is like the gates of Jerusalem opening. There is a new Jerusalem for them. But what about the other end of the scale, where Mr. Beaulieu, working 60 hours a week in a cold, wet, damp and dank car wash, makes $8,600 a year? Surely if the government has its priorities right and if its head is screwed on properly, the verses I quoted, Matthew chapter 5, verses 1-16, have some relevance to the whole question of justice, meekness, and getting something back from the tax system.

Mr. Harquail: When were you ever meek?

Mr. Rodriguez: If hon. members want to make comments, they can speak when they get the floor, whenever that may be. I do not know when they will get the floor, but when they do, they can get up and make a speech. The wraps were put on the hon. member. He has to keep his mouth shut.

To add to this immense inequality, Bill C-22 does not contain a single clause which recognizes that the tax burden is being shifted from the corporate tax to personal income tax. From 1970 to 1975 the effective rate of corporate tax on profits went down from 29.6 per cent to 26.6 per cent, and did hon. members ever hear them squeal louder? And what do they want now? They want tax breaks. They are all wanting more concessions. Mining companies want more write-offs. They want more of everything. That is the kind of solution they seek. And here we have the government bringing in a bill which does nothing to deal with this inequitable situation.

We have shifted the corporate tax burden to the individual taxpayer and while doing so corporate profits have skyrocketed from $7.7 billion to $17.8 billion. Add to that the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board, which is controlling wages, allowed an unspecified number of corporations to exceed AIB guidelines by $70 million in the first six months of the program. Corporate taxes were cut this year by 1 per cent, as was the case last year, the year before, and the year before that.

There has been a corporate tax cut every year since 1972 so that today the corporate tax rate has been reduced to 46 per cent from 50 per cent in 1972. This, of course, is not the actual rate at which most corporations paid tax; that is a little closer to 27 per cent, Mr. Speaker. The other tax concessions made notorious by David Lewis in his 1972 election campaign are still being enjoyed by the same corporate welfare bums. In fact they have both hands in our pockets now. It is indeed unfortunate that the present government, aided and abetted by the Tory opposition, has conned, and I can use no other word—has conned the middle class of this country into believing that the economic woes of this nation are caused by a working class that is alternately greedy, grasping, lazy, dishonest and unconscientious. Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of thing it would want us to believe.

I often become cynical, and I have to admit this. I share the same cynicism that large numbers of Canadians have. I have to be ashamed of it. But do you know what makes me cynical, Mr. Speaker? My experience in Canada is short for I am not a native born Canadian—just a lowly little immigrant who went to teach school in the backwoods of Ontario. However, when I look at the tax system I cannot think of any group of people for whom taxes on part of their incomes are waived but members of parliament.

Mr. Peters: Don't get nasty now.

Mr. Rodriguez: This party has argued against that kind of elitist attitude. I have to call a spade a spade, Mr. Speaker. We have argued the principle that a buck is a buck is a buck and should be taxed. Members of parliament are now getting 10,600 bucks on which they pay no tax. Is it any wonder people in Canada are looking askance at members of parliament and becoming cynical, like me? What do they say to themselves? They ask how different we are from them. They have expenses too but cannot write them off. They have to pay taxes on everything they earn. This party has said there should not be an amount allowed as expenses; it should all be wages and be taxed.

I become even more cynical when it comes to making arrangements about what is going to come under the anti-inflation controls. That was always dumped on the non-taxable part. That is what the cynicism is all about. Every member has to stand up before his constituents and be honest with them, but how can we say we approve and advocate a fair taxation system? I know it is open season on Liberals in this country today, but that is another story that I have to deal with tomorrow sometime.

People are cynical about governments today that pass that kind of tax law. How quickly we could move to taxfree moneys for members of parliament, and look how long it takes to get old age pensions indexed! The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stands up in this House constantly and makes the argument for veterans' widows and widows 60 years of age.

It really hurts, Mr. Speaker. That is why I quoted from Matthew because it is relevant to what we are doing in this House. We pray every day before we start question period, but what does it all mean? We are just like those publicans in the Old Testament and the New Testament: we collect taxes and put them in our own pockets but do not put enough in the church poor box. That is what it is all about.

I get these black moments, but I come out of them pretty quickly, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying before, if we were to look at the percentages of tax payable to this government by the individual and corporate sectors the figures would show that the burden of taxation has been shifting from the corporate sector on to the individual in spite of all the froofraro, and public relations, and free enterprise, and all that sort of thing.

I get cynical about other things that I notice as well. I have here something handed out by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) called the Advisory Committee Annual Report, 1976. It contains exactly four pages on the work of a corporation that spent $3½ billion last year. I do not know how much this report costs. We cannot find money for people at the bottom end of the income scale but we can find money for four pages of nonsense supposedly reporting on a corporation that spent $3½ billion. They should put their heads in a bag in shame.

Never let it be said that the Liberals are not concerned about redistributing wealth in this country. They are never at a loss, but always flim-flam and whitewash a situation, and come up with something that takes the heat off the particular problem of the moment. I know they are concerned with income redistribution and they have come up with a unique way of doing it. Never let it be said they lack creativity or panache. They thought and thought about it, and came up with a national lottery. Some men in Montreal had a high-falutin' idea about the Olympics and ran up a billion dollar debt, and here is the solution—a lottery.

It was touched on in an article written by Russell Mills, editor of the Ottawa Citizen, on February 5, entitled "Lottery's Sweet Temptation Merely a Tax on Stupidity". He writes:

We've got to stop these whining do-gooders before they take away our lotteries. Their campaign is heating up.

This week a Toronto psychiatrist said that the unrealistic expectation of winning could be dangerous psychologically and that the lotteries were creating a generation of gamblers in Canada. Others maintain that they undermine the work ethic.

And there have always been those who claim that lotteries are a tax on the poor because many tickets are bought by desperate people.

But lotteries aren't really a tax on the poor, they're a tax on stupidity. And although it is true that a large number of the stupid do find themselves at the bottom of the economic heap they're not at all in the higher social classes.

Lotteries are a very effective way of isolating the stupid since with the absurdly low chances of winning that they offer, no one with a brain larger than an acorn would even consider buying a lottery ticket.

With the present odds, on Loto Canada, for example, you would have to spend $100,000 a year on tickets for 36 years—a total of $3.6 million, not including interest on the money—before you would even have a 50-50 chance of winning a $1 million prize. Who but a twit would buy a ticket at those odds?

● (2130)

That's precisely why our present lotteries are hopelessly inadequate and should be expanded and promoted far more than they are today.

How else are we going to get the stupid to pay their fair share of running the country?

Look at what they are costing us. The stupid are the ones who smoke and drink too much, don't exercise, don't wear seat belts, smoke in bed and drink and drive and thus add enormous amounts to our health costs.

They are the ones who drop out of school and then can't find jobs, run off and leave families without support, go bankrupt, quit their jobs or get fired and then expect us to support them with unemployment insurance or welfare.

Because most of the stupid don't make much money, they don't pay much in taxes, not nearly enough to pay for the trouble they cause.

Outside of a major slash in government services, the only way we can hope to reduce the cost of stupidity is to harness it, with lotteries. Because there's one thing about the stupid—they love to throw away their money.

But government promotion of the lotteries has been shamefully inadequate.

The average Canadian only spends $40 a year on lottery tickets now compared to an average of $150 a person in Britain and more than $200 in Japan.

With a little clever promotion this spending could be increased 10 times or more.

The advertising should take dead aim on the stupid and seek them out wherever they may be.

There should be lottery advertising included with all welfare and unemployment insurance cheques.

And no more of this namby-pamby 'lifestyle' advertising that the do-gooders are so upset about, let's use straight guilt and hit the thick right where it hurts.

How about this for the insert with welfare cheques:

Are you feeling bad because your family eats macaroni seven days a week? When did they last have steak? Do the other children laugh at the holes in their clothes? Give them a shot at a better life. Buy a Loto Canada ticket today!

Or how about this inserted with UIC cheques:

So you've lost your job. Do you realize that the unemployment rate is over seven per cent today and shows no signs of going down? You may never work again. Winning the lottery may be the only way out. You'd better buy a ticket!

Try guilt appeal.

All beer parlours and cheap bars should be saturated with guilt advertising and all waiters and bartenders paid commissions to push tickets on drunks.

Feeling guilty because you're drinking up the paycheque again? Taking food out of the kiddies' mouths? Give them a chance. Buy a lottery ticket along with the next round!

Hard-hitting lottery promotions should also be placed at other haunts of the dumb; on all cigarette machines, on bottles of Canadian sherry, at professional hockey games and horse-racing tracks and in all CB radio shops.

The ultimate aim should be to make enough profit from these tickets to pay for all government services. Then taxes could be reduced to zero and those of us too bright to chase the illusion of instant wealth could pursue our pleasures unimpeded by the burden of taxation.

It's all a matter of promotion. And for an advertising industry that can sell platform shoes, genital deodorants and electric shoebrushes, it should be a snap.

Lotteries apparently are the panacea for all our ills. We now have the Olympic lottery, the Ontario lottery, Loto Canada and the Quebec lottery. Lotteries, clearly, are the new wave.

We said, when we debated national lotteries in this country, that if part of the money derived from the national lottery were to be used for important programs like amateur sport and for health building programs, those activities ought to be supported under a budgetary provision and paid for with taxes collected from all Canadians working and earning a buck. That is the principle we have advocated consistently. We say a buck is a buck and should be taxed when it is earned. That principle this government has shied away from, for it wants to help its friends in the board rooms of Bay Street, Toronto, and St. Catharines Street in Montreal. I could even touch on who gets the distributorships for lotteries, but that is another subject with which I will not deal tonight. I can deal with it on Friday, when I return to this question. It seems to me that is a horse of a different colour.

I have talked about loopholes created in our tax laws. Lotteries are to be the substitute for a fair taxation system. While the government taxes the poor through lotteries, it subsidizes the rich with loopholes and reductions in tax. I have already talked about this, but it cannot be emphasized too much. If I am open to the charge that I repeat myself, I cannot help it.

Let us look at the question of interest earned in Canada. It is true that anyone earning interest income from investments can deduct the first $1,000 of such income before computing taxable income. But who uses that system? Who benefits? Each of the three million Canadians earning incomes of between $4,000 and $8,000 saved, on average, $35 from this provision. Yet each of the 225,000 people in the $25,000 to $50,000 category managed to save, on average, $216 in taxes, for a total of $49 million of unneeded tax breaks. That was the extent of the tax break to higher income brackets. They saved $49 million. There were 13 times more people in lower tax brackets, but their total tax saved was only twice that saved by people in the higher tax bracket. Yes, their total tax saving was only twice as large as that of the group at the top. In other words, this provision is heavily weighted in favour of the top brackets, precisely because they have disposable income to invest.

The point is that, for the $550 million total cost of the tax program to the treasury, the government could have increased family allowances by over 25 per cent, doubled the annual increase in the old age pension, or offered a substantial tax credit to those at the bottom of the income scale. But the Liberals did not want to do it that way. Instead they decided to distribute their largesse at the top.

Let us consider another tax gimmick. Our whole tax system is strewn with gimmickry. I said before that it is full of loopholes. I suppose the government can get away with it because lower income people are not able to comprehend the fine print in the income tax system. The gimmick to which I am referring is known as the Registered Home Ownership Plan, better known as RHOP. It was supposed to help moderate income people afford a house. It was supposed to help young people to save toward the purchase of a home. And how many people have used the program? Of those earning between $5,000 and $6,000 only one in 95 has used it. That is, just over 1 per cent of those people managed to sock away money under this program in 1974. They just did not have money to put away. But at the other end of the income scale, and I am speaking of people in the over $50,000 bracket most of whom own their own homes already and are thus ineligible, over 6 per cent took advantage of this gimmick. That is the crux of the point we are trying to make about this bill.

In effect, here was a program which, on the surface, was designed to help people to save for a house. That was commendable. Then the authorities said that if you already own your own home you can transfer ownership to your spouse's name. Then you can start collecting under the program and be eligible for the benefits and write-offs under the tax system. It is not fair. I just pointed out that six times as many people in the $50,000 and over bracket were able to take advantage of the benefits in 1974. If the minister and the government think that this is an effective means of helping the low income earners afford homes, they are just whistling Dixie. They are not telling it like it is.

Again with regard to this gimmick, the benefits are highly weighted in favour of top income earners. Let us not forget the spousal Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. A home is registered in the name of one spouse or the other. One of them can put away $1,000 of non-taxable income for a future investment in furniture or another home. This was commented on by Marcel Bélanger whom I quoted earlier in my speech this evening. He is quoted in the November 22, 1975, edition of the Financial Post.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Stevens: That's old.

Mr. Rodriguez: It may be old, but the same loophole is there. The government is talking about a fair taxation system. The reason I quoted from Matthew is because we are talking about justice and fair play. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Stevens) has the gall to say that is a fair tax proposal. The Bay Street barons may think so, but not those in northern Ontario whom I and other members of this House represent.

What Marcel Bélanger said about the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan is still applicable today. He said, and I quote:

> Let's take the case of the Registered Home Ownership Plan. It was designed to help young couples save in order to eventually buy a house; it has degenerated into a loophole where spouses mutually transfer their property, should circumstances so require, to take advantage of the deduction.

There is a strange morality about that!

An hon. Member: Immorality.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not doing anything illegal, merely taking advantage of a loophole which has been permitted by the government. If the tax on the $1,000 is not paid because of a spousal transfer, the rest of the population must pick up the deficit. That is not fair by any stretch of the imagination, even using Liberal or Conservative logic. There is not a member in this House, even those who make their remarks from behind the curtains, who is prepared to argue that is a fair proposal. That is why we are dead set against this bill and have argued against this particular clause.

There are other juicy loopholes in this bill. Let us not think that they are only limited to the federal income tax structure.

The province of Ontario came out with a $1,500 house grant. Who was the first in line applying for a grant on a $108,000 home in Carp? It was the Conservative member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek). He received a $1,500 house grant on a $108,000 house. Surely that is not the purpose of the Ontario scheme. As a matter of fact, the Ontario minister responsible for this program, Arthur Meen, said that he is prepared to write off all those who rip off the system. If someone were to take the unemployment insurance fund to the cleaners, they would not write that off. They would hound him to the ground. However, here we have a well-to-do Tory member of parliament receiving a grant on a $108,000 home. This well-heeled minister without portfolio in the shadow cabinet is taking money right out of the hands of the poor people of Ontario. It is for this reason I quoted Matthew 5: 1-16 which talks about justice and fair play. Hon. members should spend more time reading and contemplating that.

We then come to half taxation on capital gains. The story is the same. When capital gains were brought in, we heard a great squealing. Even though it was only to be on 50 per cent of the gain, the Tories were squealing and squirming. They said it would take away all incentive. In fact the only policy that party has enunciated is that they would return to the 100 per cent tax free on capital gains.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Will the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) accept a question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, Mr. Speaker, when I am finished my address to the House I will certainly permit a question. However, I cannot say when that will be. I have a lot of material and many ideas to present. It looks now as though I will take until Friday. Possibly some time between 4.30 and 5 o'clock on Friday I will permit a question, no later because I have a flight to catch. However, at this point I would like to continue because I have some very precise comments. They might interest the hon. member. In fact they may lead to some more questions.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. I believe the hon. member misunderstood me. I believe he would find my question most helpful if he would give me an opportunity to put it. Perhaps he could give an answer that would be of great interest to the members of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Again, the Chair must seek permission from the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Since the hon. member puts it that way, and as I am not a hard person to get along with, I do not mind him asking a question at this time. I have thought about it and the hon. member can ask his question.

Mr. Stevens: After listening to the hon. member for two hours and 20 minutes I wish to ask him out of curiosity whether he can tell us of any country in the world that has a tax system which he feels is ideal? If so, will he mention the name of that country so we can perhaps take a look at it?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question, that has always been the approach of Tory governments in the past. They look outside the borders of Canada for models which do not necessarily fit Canadian needs. Our party has come up with a taxation system that is fair and just. It follows the recommendations of the Carter Commission report. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the Chamber an hour and 20 minutes ago when I dealt with the Carter Commission report. Surely the hon. member cannot argue with the premise that a buck is a buck is a buck and it should be taxed when it is earned.

● (2150)

The next point in our program concerns tax credits. By using tax credits we could move toward what we have always called the GAI program.

An hon. Member: The Gay program?

Mr. Rodriguez: The guaranteed annual income program. We are not looking for a Shangri La outside Canada. We have the resources and the ability to enable us to build a tax system which meets our needs. In the United States today they are looking for ways to revise the tax system—

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about what they are doing in Russia.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for York-Simcoe is holding up the example of the Russian model. That is a very conservative model. That is state capitalism. He would be good as a commissioner on financial matters in the central committee. And do you know something, Mr. Speaker? He would not look out of place in that line-up. Get him a uniform, get him a cap, get him the order of Lenin—the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) brought several of those back—and he could take his place on the reviewing stand. He would fit in. But we who believe in democracy and freedom of choice could never accept such a system.

Mr. Stevens: What about the U.K., then?

Mr. Rodriguez: As to the United Kingdom, I would point out again to the hon. member that we must use Canadian talent, Canadian resources to build a tax system of a kind which meets our needs. And we who support the New Democratic Party would not come up with these fly-by-night programs such as the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. We would outline a housing policy based on housing as a social need, which is more than the official opposition and their new leader have been able to do; he has been going around the country talking about the Conservatives as an alternative government, but they do not have an alternative policy, so how could they form an alternative government?

The story is the same when it comes to the capital gains tax, even though the rate is 50 per cent. The Tories rushed to oppose it. One would think it threatened to take away all the wealth from those they favour. We have found out since that those with income of $20,000 or more made an average of $1,056 in capital gains in 1974, half of which was untaxed, for a total cost to the treasury of $148 million.

At the other end of the scale, the 4.3 million people getting between $4,000 and $10,000 registered an average capital gain of $14 for a total of $13 million. This is what we have been criticizing. We have been saying that our tax system, our model, would not contain loopholes. We have shown conclusively that no less than $6 billion was lost because of these loopholes. Somebody has to pick up that amount. Just imagine what would happen if all of us took advantage of the loopholes. Who would be carrying the tax burden? Somebody has to pay.

An hon. Member: The workers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Every time I think about work I am reminded of the industrial freedom songs I learnt when I was in school. We had them put in a little red book long before we ever heard of Chairman Mao's little red book. One, in particular, is appropriate. Since the hon. member for York-Simcoe is interested in the Soviet model, I think he will be interested in this song. It goes:

Why don't you work like other men do?

How in Hell can I work when there's no work to do?

Hallelujah, I'm a bum . . .
Why don't you save all the money you earn?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. We have sung a song in the House, but is was for a certain occasion. I do not believe this refers to the bill and I must ask the hon. member to relate his observations thereto.

Mr. Rodriguez: With all deference to the Chair, I was not singing. I was quoting the words of the working class people as they tried to bring out their feelings about the situation when they are unemployed and seek an opportunity of keeping their families going with some dignity.

Even education costs are going up, and we hear that only the children of the rich will be able to go to universities. I wanted to put those words on record because I think they are apropos when we are dealing with the question of who makes money in this country and who gets to keep it. It is certainly not the fellow singing that little rhyme.

We were talking about tax loopholes. I want to turn, now, to consider the loopholes which exist in the tax legislation as they relate especially to corporations, multi-national corporations.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—PARTICIPATION IN MARITIME ENERGY POOL AND CONSTRUCTION OF GENERATING PLANTS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on January 25 I raised again with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) a theme I voiced in a speech in this House on May 4, 1976, that of a maritime energy pool to make development of electric and transmitting facilities a priority and achieve maximum economies of scale with resultant benefit to all maritime users of electric energy.

I feel strongly that this is the course to follow and that the minister should give leadership in this direction. Dramatic increases in the cost of electric power in areas of Atlantic Canada have placed the region at a competitive disadvantage in the expansion of its industrial and manufacturing sectors, and inflicted a great measure of hardship on large segments of the population. We live with the fact that Atlantic Canada will continue to import over 100 million barrels of oil per year to sustain its energy systems. A carefully planned pool of generation and distribution systems would achieve vastly improved economies of scale. Strong interconnection with adjacent areas of Canada and the U.S.A. would optimize power pool benefits.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

These proposals are not new. Speaking in this House in May of last year I put forward similar suggestions. However, the government has done little about the situation, and now I find myself, once again, asking that something be done.

The challenge of meeting future energy requirements at a reasonable cost is one which cannot and should not be met by the Atlantic provinces individually. Co-ordination and co-operation are imperative if this goal is to be achieved. The provinces are interested. The federal government should provide the enlightened leadership and the imagination necessary for the implementation of such inter-governmental schemes. Until Ottawa can come up with a plan, long overdue, to assist in the setting up of a maritime power pool, the people of Atlantic Canada will suffer through bleak and expensive winters.

The government cannot abrogate its responsibility any longer. It is not enough to express interest and polite approval. The scheme deserves an investment which can pay great dividends: active leadership and a commitment of financial support.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find it refreshing to hear the distinguished member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) make his representations on behalf of his constituents after listening to the previous speaker who, in my opinion, has wasted the time of the House for the last two hours.

I can tell the hon. gentleman that the minister has exercised great leadership in this situation. I am sure the hon. member will be delighted to know that a decision will be announced probably tomorrow or the day after.

ENERGY—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO INCREASE EXPLORATION IN FRONTIER AREAS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of alarming reports in regard to the possibility of an energy shortage which would seriously affect all Canadians, I should like to register my concern over the government's lack of a clear energy policy. The recent report of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has called for new government policies for conservation and energy development to head off shortages, but I wonder whether the government of Canada has taken heed. The government of Canada has a moral obligation to answer the question: how are we going to meet our energy needs, and to what extent?

For the record, Mr. Speaker, the OECD has urged its members, Canada included, to develop additional energy supplies by implementing such policies as providing incentives for improvements in oil recovery and support programs. Measures to increase production should be aimed at improving the climate for investment. That certainly is not the case at present in Canada. In many respects the government is hindering development through excessive regulations. The reaction of the government to energy problems has been to regulate. Virtually every aspect of the Canadian petroleum industry is now tightly regulated. Canadians should really be concerned that one of our major industries is subject to regulations that are often unstable, unclear, and unco-ordinated to the point where the industry's performance is impaired.

The government must take a great deal of the blame for Canada's energy problems. Rather than assisting the oil industry by working in a spirit of co-operation on a problem that is vital to our nation, this government has put obstacles in the way of developing a positive energy policy.

The question of energy policy in the present and the future is among the most important issues facing Canada at this time. To most Canadians, energy policy is wrapped up in pricing—what we pay for home heating, electricity, of at the gasoline pumps. The government cannot hide from the fact that there is an energy shortage, and Canadians want to know what it intends to do about it. In 1974, Canada ceased being a net crude oil exporter. In 1975, Canada imported an average of 115 million barrels of crude oil per day. While Canada still exports 39 per cent of its natural gas production, this is expected to decline in the mid-1980's and create a serious balance of payments problem. Even by 1980 Canada is forecast to spend over $3 billion yearly for imported oil. Forecasts show the situation becoming progressively worse in the 1980's.

In addition to hindering the energy problem through excessive regulations, the government has also taken a large portion of revenue from the oil industry which could well be used in expanding the oil industry to meet rising energy demands. It must be pointed out that by far the greatest bulk of price increases in oil of late have resulted from increased government taxes. For instance, fully 60 per cent of the cost of a gallon of gas at the pump is federal, provincial of municipal tax. Only 38 per cent of the cost covers the oil itself, its refining, marketing, the dealer's wage, etc. Profit is approximately 2 per cent of the price. I for one reject the idea that the oil industry is enjoying excessive profits. The oil industry today is in worse position than it was prior to the fall of 1973. when the wellhead price of a barrel of crude oil was $3.

Taxes and royalties now consume, for example, about $6 of the $9.75 for a barrel of Alberta crude oil. After taxes, Mr. Speaker, the oil companies have little left for oil exploration and development. What can be said with certainty is that oil exploration costs are skyrocketing, not just because of inflation but because today drilling is at expensive sites since cheaper sites have already been explored. Returns from money invested in oil exploration are quite low compared to other investment opportunities. This too has discouraged investment in exploration. On top of all of that oil company profits are quite variable due to the uncertain nature of production.

While the energy problem continues to become serious, many Canadians are wondering what the government intends to do. Should we satisfy our energy needs from our own resources to the full extent possible at costs that offer Canada an economic advantage? I think most Canadians would answer yes, and yet the government is showing no leadership in developing such a policy. I would guarantee that our energy needs are met and mitigate the risks associated with massive oil imports.

As we all know, oil is a non-renewable resource. Canada's energy priorities should include an effort to minimize our use of energy. Producing our own energy resources where the costs are right may offer tremendous economic savings and benefits, but wringing out the waste in our use of energy offers even greater economic savings and benefits. Simply stated, our energy conservation objective should be the use of the minimum amount of energy required to meet our social and economic needs and aspirations. Conservation, however, cannot answer all of our energy needs.

In terms of the many challenges which today confront Canada, energy is only one challenge, but it will have inevitable effects on all the others. While there are no easy nor instant solutions to our energy challenge, that is not an excuse for the government to ignore the problem and drift along hoping the problem will solve itself.

As I stated earlier, the government has a moral obligation to answer the question of how we are going to meet our energy needs. If it does have a long range contingency plan, then it should be made public. Canadians will not tolerate secrecy on such a vital matter. I rather suspect, however, that it is not a case of secrecy but rather of no policy. I would urge the government to develop a clear policy for energy before it is too late.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the often raised questions from my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), I should say, on top of what the minister and I have already said with regard to many of these interesting questions that, as regards the special revenues from oil and gas production that the federal government is collecting from the motor gasoline exise tax and from the oil export tax, these funds are specifically designated to maintain the oil import compensation fund to equalize gasoline prices across Canada and are not part of general revenues. As regards the prevailing financial environment, the hon. member should be aware of the incentive nature of the government's federal corporate tax system as related to the mineral resources industries.

Furthermore, as has been pointed out in the House before, it is the government's intention to monitor both the volume of cash flows accruing to the petroleum industry and the level of expenditures made by the industry in the search for new energy supplies. This monitoring will be conducted by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and will provide the government with the information it needs to ensure that industry is using its increased revenues to respond to the country's need for new oil and gas resources.

In the statement of policy on a proposed petroleum and natural gas act and new Canada oil and gas land regulations tabled in the House on May 19, 1976, by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), he stated that the principles embodied in the legislation governing frontier exploration are designed to encourage exploration through ensuring a stable investment climate, allowing developers to hold their entire productive area, and imposing of equitable royalties. There are, however, at the present time significantly greater factors influencing the level of oil and gas activity on Canada's frontier regions than just the terms and conditions of the existing and proposed new oil and gas land regulations. One of the most significant overriding factors governing the frontier exploration in the territories is the uncertainty pertaining to the timing of a gas pipeline.

Comparing the federal government's terms and conditions with those of Alberta is not really appropriate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, this is unfortunate. Perhaps I could be allowed to inform the hon. member that recently, to further the national objective of increased exploration in Canada's frontier regions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Put it in a memo.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF METHOD OF MEASURING UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of Statistics Canada's press release of today showing the highest number of Canadians unemployed, ever and since many new programs initiated by the government, especially the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), to create jobs are based on a formula which uses Statistics Canada figures, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the new method of measuring unemployment which was adopted by Statistics Canada in February, 1976, be discontinued as experience has shown that it is not a more precise method of measurement in that it does not truly reflect the actual rate of unemployment both nationally and regionally, seasonal factors notwithstanding.

Mr. Broadbent: It's good to have you with us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the Standing Order, the presentation of such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the same standing order, on the same subject as that raised by the previous hon. member. I shall come directly to the point. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls upon the government to bring forward at the earliest possible date a program designed to deal with the human and economic disaster that is entailed in the fact that at the official figure level we now have 900,000 Canadians unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion cannot be presented for debate without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED MAILING OF DAILY HANSARD TO CANADIANS WHO REQUEST IT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a very important matter.

In view of the fact that public information on the proceedings in the House of Commons is essential so that the government will obtain better cooperation from the public and that Hansard is the best tool to inform the public, and considering that before making huge expenditures to organize the television of proceedings it would be advisable to know to what extent the public is interested in them, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House authorize the daily dispatch of Hansard to each Canadian citizen asking for it.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. It there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, the motion therefore cannot be put.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO LINERBOARD MILL AT STEPHENVILLE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Increases in the numbers unemployed suggest the urgent necessity to pinpoint and direct efforts to prevent deterioration of potentially sound industries by government intervention and assistance available. A glaring example of this situation relates to Labrador Linerboard Mill in Stephenville, Newfoundland, which employs some 2,000 and which is suffering from high cost of the available resource and marketing, problems that can be overcome by federal government attention. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House orders that the government immediately enter into consultation with the provincial government of Newfoundland with the objective of providing assistance to prevent a threatening closure of Linerboard Mill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FAILURE TO INTRODUCE BUDGETARY MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has not appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs since November last year, and with today's shocking figures revealing that a record number of Canadians are out of work, up 10 per cent over last January, while the minister stalls on the introduction of needed budgetary measures including a tax cut to stimulate the economy and ensure more jobs for Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That there be an immediate reference on the state of our economy to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that the Minister of Finance be required to appear before such committee to explain his lassitude in not introducing a budget that will more effectively grapple with today's economic realities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing, Order 43 such motion cannot be presented for debate without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTED ACTION BY MINISTER TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. With 105,000 persons in Atlantic Canada out of work in January, a rise in one month of a staggering 17 per cent in the ranks of the unemployed, and in view of the large losses this means to productivity and well-being in the Atlantic provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion take action today to get Atlantic Canadians back to work, that he call meetings in those communities hardest hit by unemployment to find out how large numbers of labour intensive jobs can be created, and that he give forceful direction to such departments as Transport, Public Works, Supply and Services, etc. to ensure that those jobs are available within the month.

SUGGESTED DELAY OF DECISION ON KITIMAT PIPELINE PENDING PUBLIC HEARINGS AND PUBLICATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the environmental hazards inherent in allowing oil tankers of up to 350,000 tons to ply the dangerous 60 mile channel leading to Kitimat, B.C. in order to deliver crude oil from Alaska, Indonesia and the Middle East to supply the proposed pipeline from Kitimat to Edmonton and from there to refineries in the United States. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the federal government

1. To delay any decision on the Kitimat pipeline project until an environmental impact study has been completed and made available to the public.

2. To hold public hearings in the area likely to be affected by possible oil spills before allowing the National Energy Board and the Department of Transport to make any final decision with respect to the two applications submitted by the Kitimat Pipeline Company.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED HARMFUL EFFECT OF BURIAL OF ARSENIC WASTE IN YELLOWKNIFE AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order No. 43 to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of reports that buried arsenic wastes in Yellowknife pose a potentially great environmental hazard and in view of reports indicating that the Department of the Environment has been urging the Department of Northern Affairs to correct the situation for a number of years, but as yet no action has been taken, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Northern Affairs or the Minister of National Health and Welfare explain the lack of co-operation between these two departments and, in a full and complete statement, tell the House whether any environment studies were conducted into the effect of waste burial before this action was taken, and explain what further action he intends to take this time in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR DELAYING BUDGETARY MEASURES TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT—LENGTH OF TIME FOR MEASURES TO BECOME EFFECTIVE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. With 889,000 Canadians out of work last month, a record figure and up an alarming 89,000 compared to January of last year, and noting that only 70,000 new jobs were created in Canada between January 1976 and January of this year, a fact which indicates that job creation has slowed considerably, will the minister tell the House why he has chosen to delay budgetary measures designed to stimulate job creation, bearing in mind that his last budget missed its job creation targets so badly?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have just concluded a series of consultations with the provincial governments on the question of the economic framework for the current year. Those consultations will be taken into account along with studies now under way in the department for the presentation of the budget in an orderly way within the next several months.

Mr. Stevens: As it is generally conceded that it takes six to nine months for the economy to feel the effect of a budgetary change, for example we are only now feeling the results of the minister's May 25 budget, and certainly the 889,000 who are out of work are feeling the effect of that budget, will the minister indicate if he agrees that upon the presentation of his next budget, it will take a further six to nine months for relief to be felt from any stimulative measures such as tax cuts which may be included and, if so, is it fair for us to assume that the minister is more concerned with his political timing than the economic realities of today?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. I would point out to the hon. member that as of the first of this year there were tax cuts the equivalent of $1,250 million as a result of indexing. Also, there was a cut in the rate of contributions to unemployment insurance which has further increased personal disposable income. The re-institution of indexing family allowances has also added substantially to those incomes, particularly at the lower income scale. On that basis, there has been, effective as of the first of this year, a substantial transfer of funds from the federal government to the private sector tantamount in percentage terms to those brought into effect by President Carter in his recently announced tax proposals.

HIGH LEVELS OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): While unemployment is a national problem, it is a tragedy in our five eastern provinces. Will the minister indicate if he or his government has instituted any study to determine why since the present government took power in 1968, unemployment levels in Quebec have been one third higher than the national rate and in the Atlantic provinces the unemployment level has been approximately 50 per cent higher than the national average? If there is such a study, will the minister indicate why this unfortunate situation must continue.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The obvious first step would be to make some studies to ascertain whether there is any truth in the figures the hon. gentleman has cited.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR FUNDS TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

Since the number of jobs has decreased by 9,000 in Quebec since January 1976, while the number of unemployed has gone up by 39,000 during the same period, and since 17 per cent of people between 15 and 24 are now unemployed and 50 per cent of those who became unemployed during the last year live in Quebec, can the minister tell the House whether this dramatic situation will be taken into consideration in his budget?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take into consideration the fact that the unemployment rate in Quebec has decreased during the last month.

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Since more than 50 per cent of the new unemployed due to the social and economic situation of the last year are in Quebec, can the minister assure the House that his job creation program, if any jobs are eventually created, will be implemented for 50 per cent in Quebec? Will the minister include in his budget policies which will be to the advantage of the underdeveloped regions of Canada, not only Quebec, but also the Atlantic provinces, which suffered much the same situation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member, as I reminded the hon. member for York-Simcoe, that by reducing taxes substantially through indexation and by raising family allowances, we made significant transfer payments to all the provinces of Canada but particularly to the five eastern provinces.

[Mr. Stevens.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ANNOUNCE NEW PROGRAMS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT—PROPOSED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Now that the official level of unemployment has reached 900,000 and the actual figure is likely to be well in excess of a million if one includes people who have voluntarily left the labour force because they were not able to find jobs, would the Prime Minister not agree that we now face a human and economic crisis in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Even if the figures were much lower I would think there is a human crisis for every person who is unemployed and looking for a job. I think the hon. member would agree with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister's sentiments are truly touching. If he agrees, as I do, this situation is a human tragedy for all those who are directly involved, can he tell the House why the government has not announced one single new program since before the Christmas recess to bring down the level of unemployment?

Some hon. Members: Where have you been?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member had been listening a couple of minutes ago rather than preparing his question, he would have heard that more than a billion dollars in tax reductions were transferred to the people of Canada since January plus a couple of hundred million in other payments.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that the tax deductions to which he has referred go overwhelmingly to upper income people because of the nature of the legislation, and since the Minister of Finance has indicated it may be many months before a budget comes down, would the Prime Minister not undertake to get in touch with the provincial premiers and set up a first ministers conference at which either he or the Minister of Finance would be instructed to bring forward proposals to create full employment over the next couple of years in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: The question is based on the assumption that we could get the premiers to Ottawa and that they, and we, could achieve a more satisfactory result than could a budget. I do not think such a premise is necessarily well-founded.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN IMPORTED DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is partially for the Minister of Agriculture and partially for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could the minister tell the House whether he intends to make early and definite changes to the import policy passed last year whereby dairy product imports would go up by at least 10 per cent of domestic needs and, if so, when does he intend to announce them?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have made a statement to the effect that at the present time the government has no intention of increasing the importation into Canada of specialty cheeses.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary. Can the minister tell the House whether there were any recent discussions and meetings on that matter with the management of the Canadian Federation of Dairy Products?

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this matter on several occasions. We discussed it at the annual meeting of the dairy farmers of Canada. We will be making an announcement regarding the new program for the whole of the dairy industry for the dairy year 1977-78 as soon as possible, and hope to announce it several weeks before the end of this dairy year, which is at the end of March.

HEALTH

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN DRINKING WATER IN YELLOWKNIFE AREA—SUGGEST REASSESSMENT OF 1975 REPORT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and arises out of a report presented to the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario last week, in which the suggestion was made that arsenic levels in the hair of more than one part per million, or in drinking water of more than one part per million, are of great significance, contrary to the accepted standards of the federal government up until now. In view of the possibility that levels above one part per million in drinking water, as reported in the hair studies, could suggest nerve damage in humans, I wonder whether the minister would care to indicate if he will revise or reassess the report on which he commented in October, 1975 when a study of 700 residents of Yellowknife was carried out?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the doctor who made this statement subsequently said that he had been misquoted by the press.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. The minister is hiding behind the facts. I happen to know that the parts which were misquoted were not related to the question that I am putting to the minister. In view of the fact that the report to which I refer throws into question the report the minister tabled in October, 1975, which at that time indicated that detailed studies had been carried out further to the hair studies only on those individuals who had arsenic levels in the hair of more than 10 parts per million, and in view of the fact that those studies did not include electromyographic studies for nerve damage, would the minister agree that further studies should be conducted, including electromyographic studies, on all those whose hair arsenic levels were between one part and 10 parts per million, as well as on a control group whose arsenic level was less than one part per million, in order to ascertain more accurately to what extent there may have been damage to humans as a result of arsenic pollution?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the hon. member recognizes that the doctor involved was indeed misquoted by the press. Second, as regards tests made from hair only, the hon. member is surely aware that all scientists in that field indicate that those tests are not sufficient and that urinalyses are necessary to determine if health is really damaged or likely to be. Third, the hon. member also knows that an independent committee established by the Canadian Public Health Association is now considering—

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: If you are drinking arsenic, it is going to affect you. Our wells are full of arsenic; you tell me what to do about it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member would be kind enough to listen to the small loudspeaker, he would understand what is going on and refrain from yelping right and left as he does.

So, there is an independent committee which was created by the Canadian Public Health Association to review the situation, particularly in the Yellowknife area, with a view to recommending appropriate corrective measures. I am sure that this committee which is made up of distinguished scientists will recommend any improvement required for current levels established for analysis techniques.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: I wonder whether the minister could give the House his assurance that he will consider giving instructions that electromyographic examinations be done on a random sample of the population in Yellowknife, in accordance with the report which was presented, to ensure that further information will be elicited based on this new technique which has not been used before.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, an independent committee made up of distinguished scientists has been appointed and was given extremely broad terms of reference which include suggesting any studies it may deem necessary. Therefore I have no intention of giving orders to this committee which is represented by leading scientists and which is duly qualified to make the necessary decisions.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and it is with respect to his responsibilities, particularly for the five eastern provinces, and more particularly for the situation in Atlantic Canada where unemployment has now passed the 100,000 mark. I wonder if the minister can indicate whether he is satisfied or feels that other federal departments are doing their utmost to re-orient their spending priorities with a view to creating the maximum number of jobs in the region for which he has basic responsibility. Second, can he indicate whether any new initiatives will soon be announced on behalf of his own department to deal with this very serious situation?

Finally, is he willing to have his Atlantic officials call together representatives from other departments in that area so that they can reorganize their priorities in an effort to see if some jobs can be created at the local level to deal with this very tragic situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed some projects will be announced shortly. I intend to go to New Brunswick as early as this week, this Friday in fact, where I shall meet the premier of the province. I was in Newfoundland just a few weeks ago where we signed new agreements. I also intend to go to Prince Edward Island in the near future to meet the premier and his associates with a view to coming to an agreement on development and expense programs which will probably help, at least partly, to resolve a few problems, particularly that of the underemployment that exists almost everywhere in the maritimes.

As for the suggestion to call together the economic leaders in the four Atlantic provinces, there already are organizations doing precisely that work; they communicate with us regularly and transmit their best recommendations about the situations they have been able to analyze themselves. So I do intend to keep on cooperating with those organizations now existing in the maritimes.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for that travelogue from the minister, and I would like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In a comment a moment ago to my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the Prime Minister indicated that the area of greatest assistance might be in terms of the tax returns taking place this year with respect to job creation. I wonder if the Prime Minister could give some more specific indication of how this return of income will achieve further job creation rather than widening the disparity gap, which I know is of concern to the Prime Minister, and can he indicate whether any special instructions have been issued, particularly to the planning and priorities committees of cabinet or whether any special attempt is being made on the part of the federal government generally to deal with the very serious problem of job creation within the five eastern provinces.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the return of income to individuals increases effective demand, and when you increase effective demand, you tend to reduce over-supply or over-capacity in the system.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED MEETINGS WITH ATLANTIC PROVINCES TO CO-ORDINATE JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the statistics released today showing further serious increases in unemployment, is the minister now prepared to accede to the request I made to him on January 26 which was supported by the Atlantic provinces chamber of commerce that the minister initiate meetings with the governments of the four provinces to co-ordinate existing job creation programs and to initiate new programs to meet the critical situation which could involve the four provincial governments?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be going to Newfoundland and I will be meeting the official from the chamber of commerce. I have forgotten the individual's name. At the same time I will be meeting business people in the community there who might indicate if they have some ideas about what we might do and how we might better co-ordinate our efforts. In so far as calling governments together is concerned, I have not reached that decision yet.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PROPOSED COMPARATIVE STUDY WITH STATE OF MAINE

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that New Brunswick has the unfortunate distinction of having the highest increase in unemployment last month—it now stands at 14.7 per cent—while the neighbouring state of Maine with a similar economy has an unemployment rate of 8 per cent, has the minister done any comparative studies of the two economies to ascertain the root causes for the difference and has he any new initiatives to improve the situation?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because we are aware of high unemployment in that area that we have heavily weighted all grants and funds made available from this department in the interest of helping these areas of high unemployment. I suggest that the hon. member would find that people in the state of Maine, in the rest of the United States and in other countries, are looking into our job creation projects, because we have shown some initiative there, and are prepared to adopt them.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION CONCERNING STUDIES OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. One year has now elapsed since a question, still unanswered, relating to such studies was placed on the order paper. Will the minister now expedite the answer to that question so that all members can look at the alternatives that are available to assault the unemployment problem in Atlantic Canada?

INDUSTRY

GULF OIL, SHAWINIGAN AND HOLMES FOUNDRY, SARNIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister well knows, the Gulf Oil Company has announced plans to close down this large operation in Shawinigan in Quebec, and the Holmes Foundry Company of Sarnia has announced it expects to make large scale lay-offs in the near future, both because of a serious slack in the economy. Has the minister been in touch with these two companies to see what assistance the government can give them in order to try to avert these large scale lay-offs and, if so, what is that assistance to be?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Gulf, in Shawinigan, I was in touch with the president of Gulf Canada and the president of Gulf International to discuss those problems. Of course, the problem is very difficult since we are dealing here with chemical products that go back to 1906 and since the cost of electricity in that field has increased by 20 per cent annually in the last few years. Naturally, I can do nothing about Hydro-Quebec. I offered the help of my department to the Gulf Company but so far have yet to get a definite answer from them. As to the other question, I shall look into the matter and give an answer to the hon. member when I have received more information.

HAWKER SIDDELEY, TRENTON—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENABLE EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): As we did not get much hope out of that answer, I will ask the minister another question and hope he can do a little better on this. Would the minister advise the House what he is doing to make it possible for the majority of the 2,000 workers at the Hawker Siddeley plant in Trenton, Nova Scotia who have been laid off since well before Christmas to enable them to get back to work?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member followed the news a bit more closely, I think he would know that the Minister of Transport recently announced that the government will give work to that industry.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE CROWN AGENCIES DO NOT COMPLY WITH ARAB BOYCOTT OF ISRAEL

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the interest of justice and international peace, will the minister use his influence to ensure that no Crown agency, such as the Export Development Corporation, will grant any incentives to firms which resort to Arab or indeed any other kind of boycott not sanctioned by the United Nations?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, following the announcement made by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I myself and my deputy minister gave very specific instructions to our department not to give any help to companies endorsing the Arab boycott. In addition, I contacted the chairman of EDC personally and gave him the same instructions.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DANGER FROM BURIED ARSENIC WASTE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment, although the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as well as the government of the Northwest Territories are also involved, and there seems to be a lot of buck passing going on because of overlapping jurisdiction. Will the minister confirm to the House that for several years government scientists have expressed concern that the practice of burying arsenic waste in abandoned mine shafts may be dangerous because of cracks in the rocks and melting of the permafrost around the waste which would result in water entering the waste areas and carrying highly toxic amounts of arsenic into the water system nearby? Will the minister undertake to make public those concerns and indicate what his department intends to do about it?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have just talked to the regional director about this problem. He informs me that it was an official from the Department of the Environment who indicated to the Territorial Water Board the potential danger of underground storage in permafrost instead of the traditional use of underground storage in the south. In fact, this intervention was in the record of the meeting of the water board which is a public document. I am also told that our officials insisted that it should be a condition of the renewal of the water permit for the company involved that this problem be focussed on. At the moment it is really because of unknown factors of permafrost versus other types of underground storage that there is concern. As far as I know, that is the only report. If there are other reports, I will be obviously quite willing to make them public or make them available.

HEALTH

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE AREA—REQUEST THAT ALL REPORTS BE MADE PUBLIC

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The people of Yellowknife are becoming quite pessimistic about getting straight answers after the failure of the government to release these concerns and after the failure to release at least three previous studies until after they had been leaked to the press. Will the minister undertake to ensure that any remaining studies, reports and correspondence pertaining to the health of Yellowknife residents are made public immediately, and will he undertake to discuss this with his colleagues, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of the Environment and report back on the possibility of setting up an interdepartmental committee to ensure long-term co-ordination of the government's efforts in this area?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member to specify which reports were made public only after they were leaked to the press. To the best of my knowledge, this information is completely wrong. All health reports in question were released before the eastern Canada press discovered them. As far as I know, there are no reports, confidential, secret or otherwise, that have not been released to the press or to the public as soon as possible after they were completed.

So far as the second part of the question is concerned, the hon. member knows that the CPHA, the Canadian Public Health Association, has a task force currently looking at the whole situation of arsenic contamination in Yellowknife. As far as the question of arsenic in Yellowknife is concerned, there have been close and constant consultations between the federal departments concerned and the territorial government. I fail to see, therefore, what another interdepartmental committee will achieve at present. But I will be happy to receive the report of the CPHA, and if they recommend specific steps such as this, I will look into them.

INDUSTRY

ELECTRONICS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it has to do with the plight in which the electronics industry in Canada finds itself. I am particularly concerned about the eroding employment opportunities and the best example I can give is that at RCA Ltd. in Prescott, where employment has fallen from 1,300 jobs to 335 jobs and that industry is in jeopardy. In terms of the problem presented by the statistics pulished today, what is the minister doing to assist the electronics industry in Canada as well as the others that have been mentioned to him?

• (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that there are problems in some sectors of Canadian industry, and the government policy to help industry is still the same. We are trying to help as much as possible, hoping that the anti-inflation policies of the government are going to bring along in the shortest possible time, the results we are expecting from them. If there is to be any explicit announcement concerning changes in our financial policies, this will be done at the proper time and place by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the policies of the government have raised the unemployment level in that area of eastern Ontario to some 12 per cent, does the minister have any new initiatives in mind to help the electronics industry, the food industry, the textile industry and the host of other industries in this part of Ontario that are suffering under similar unemployment levels?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STUDIES TO DEMONSTRATE BENEFITS OF FEDERAL SYSTEM—DATE OF COMPLETION AND PUBLICATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is a follow-up to one I placed the other day as to what specific studies, what new initiatives, are being taken by the federal government to demonstrate the benefits that accrue from a federal system? Given Mr. Paul Tellier's appointment to head a new unit on matters of national unity in the federal-provincial relations office, will the Prime Minister say what specific studies are being undertaken as a priority, what is the planned timetable for completion of these studies and most important, will this information be made available to all members of parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have nothing to announce in that regard today but I would be willing to sit down with the hon. lady or her leader and see if she has any ideas in mind that would be worth pursuing.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to say to the Prime Minister that my party will take up that offer at any time. While I recognize that the case for federal—

An hon. Member: Where is Joe?

Mr. Fairweather: Speaking on confederation in Alberta.

Miss MacDonald: —the case for federalism will not be made entirely on factual data or in economic terms, nevertheless would the Prime Minister give us the assurance that Mr. Tellier will have access to the wealth of information that already exists in so many of the federal departments so that the results of the early stages of his studies will be expedited?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is one of the main purposes in appointing Mr. Tellier, so that he can act as a co-ordinator to obtain from various departments any input they can supply to him, the rest of the government and the Canadian people.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF EIGHT-WEEK ELIGIBILITY PERIOD FOR AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that unemployment statistics, particularly in the high unemployment regions of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and similar places are generally conceded to be an underestimate of the real situation, can the minister tell the House whether the government will amend Bill C-27 so that regional differences in unemployment can be recognized to provide that in areas of unemployment higher than the national average, the eight-week eligibility period will not be changed to 12 weeks at the discretion of the cabinet and will the same principle apply to the extended benefit section?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No to both questions, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF WORK FOR DOCKYARD AT ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the government will not amend Bill C-27, can the minister tell the House what steps he had taken to alleviate lay-offs in the dockyards of St. John's, Newfoundland? I wrote to the minister about this eight or ten days ago. Will he be able to put some CN vessels in there for repairs or take other steps to avert lay-offs in that area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Canadian National for a report about its plan.

THE CONSTITUTION

BRITISH COLUMBIA'S PLAN TO CREATE FIVE REGIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the policy statement made by the government of British Columbia to the effect that if it can be recognized that there are five different regions in Canada, that different solutions are required in these regions and if working relationships can be developed between these regions Canada will be a stronger not a weaker country, does the Prime Minister agree in principle with this? Is he willing to broaden the terms of reference for a federal-provincial constitutional conference to allow enough flexibility for discussion of the British Columbia principle?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would agree that a stronger and more united Canada would come from greater understanding between the regions, both between themselves and in their relationship with the federal government. Whether this presupposes four regions or five or ten or twelve is a matter of opinion, I suppose. I think the principle as stated by the hon. member will be stated differently by different provinces.

IMMIGRATION

VISAS FOR VISITORS FROM COMMUNIST BLOC COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister advise the House whether it is still the policy and the practice of the Department of Immigration to require visas for visitors to Canada from Communist bloc countries?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That information ought to be sought in another way.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—JUSTIFICATION FOR THE REMOVAL OF GRANTS FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is responsible for the LIP program. It was desirable, on the basis of statistics on unemployment then available, to make a supplementary allocation for LIP purposes to New Brunswick. According to news in this House it has since been deemed advisable to take some of that money from New Brunswick and allocate it to other regions, in spite of the fact that the statistics which justified the additional allocation now show it was not then big enough. Can the minister explain or justify the removal of LIP allocations from New Brunswick to any other jurisdiction?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the allocation is a global one and we endeavoured to weight it as we did. New Brunswick's allocation was $17 million.

An hon. Member: Today Canada, tomorrow the world.

Mr. Cullen: I hardly think that is niggardly. It seems to me if that money could not be used it was appropriate that it be put back in an area where it could be used.

Mr. McCain: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that some members were not consulted as to whether or not it was usable it becomes questionable if the facts justify the answer. May I ask the minister, in view of having taken this money away from New Brunswick, if he will increase the allocation which has been used for training so that the province of New Brunswick may increase and not decrease its training capability in the various trades and expertise which are required of any work force?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have a very close working relationship with my opposite number in the province of New Brunswick who we are working with on on-the-job training programs. As I have indicated before, under LIP and under the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program the funds are heavily weighted in favour of areas of high unemployment. I think the hon. member should check the figures.

Mr. McCain: When unemployment went up the grants went down.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR SHIPMENT OF POTATOES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport? Since spokesmen for the potato shipping community down east are not at all happy and are rather discouraged by the lack of action and decision on the part of governments for not proceeding now with the construction in Canada of badly needed refrigerated railway cars, can the minister inform the House if he was able to achieve a consensus on this matter with his maritime counterparts when he met with them yesterday in Charlottetown and if so, what was decided?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter was discussed, particularly with Premier Campbell and Mr. Maloney of the government of Prince Edward Island so we have consensus on the need for steps to improve and assure facilities for the shipment of potatoes in the future, but there is not yet consensus on the exact type of equipment or facilities required. These discussions will certainly continue.

• (1450)

POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUED ASSISTANCE TO FLOUR SHIPMENTS THROUGH ATLANTIC PORTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport also arises from the meeting held yesterday in Charlottetown. Did he discuss Bill C-31, which would move flour and grain traffic from Halifax, Saint John and some St. Lawrence River ports; and, if so, with what result?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we discussed the bill, of course, but not the bill as described by the hon. member, because it would not remove flour from those ports.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the minister back from his conference with maritime premiers, including the Premier of Newfoundland. Is the minister now indicating to us that his brief statement on the user-pay policy, a statement which has given us heart since it seems that the policy will be laid to rest for the indefinite future, will not be of such a nature as to cause the minister to reconsider the clause in Bill C-31 which would remove the so-called restraint. Is the minister saying to us that the user-pay policy could not be extended to that?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member is asking. Does he want a full-blown description of our transport policy? I would refer him to a document of June, 1975. In it our whole approach to applying transportation as effectively as possible, while taking developmental and other questions into consideration, is laid out. I had indicated previously in the House that there is a variety of measures, including specific flour assistance measures, which will be considered in conjunction with that bill, and my comment would be that flour shipments there would continue.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—FUNDS FOR NATIVE PROJECTS IN URBAN COMMUNITIES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is in connection with the allocation of funds to constituencies under the provisions of the Canada Works program which makes specific allocations for Indian projects, presumably for those Indians living on reserves. Since an increasingly large number of registered Indians are living in cities like Winnipeg, where a large percentage of Indians are unemployed, would the minister give consideration to making funds available for native projects in urban constituencies in which large numbers of native people now reside.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to learn that the hon. member supports the allocation for status Indians and sees that as a step forward. I have indicated and given instructions to the ministerial advisory groups to this effect: that for projects, special consideration and priority is to be given to status Indians and those who live in cities such as the hon. member mentioned. So far as setting up a special category is concerned, I would prefer not to do it. These individuals are included in our survey statistics.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since in the constituency of Churchill there are some 25,000 native people from whom $900,000 has been specifically allocated—I have no complaint about that, Mr. Speaker—and since a city like Winnipeg which contains 10,000 native people, many of whom are unemployed, receives no money for that kind of project, and allocations in general are very small, would the minister consider allocating money to cities like Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver in which there are large numbers of unemployed native people?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we are endeavouring to cope with that situation as best we can, given the administrative difficulties which have arisen as a result of circumstances the hon. member mentioned. I think we have taken proper initiatives. Our stance with respect to status Indians on reserves is a step forward. There is no reason in the world why Indians in those areas could not get together, formulate a project and have it approved by an advisory group.

HEALTH

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SEND DRUGS TO DENIS NAUD WHO SUFFERS FROM DIABETES

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I have given him notice of it.

Last January 27 I sent the minister a letter regarding the case of a young citizen of my constituency, Mr. Denis Naud, who has been suffering from a very uncommon disease called diabetes insipidus. According to the attending physician, the needed medicine is being held by laboratories in Ottawa, therefore preventing this young man from getting the urgent treatment required by his condition. I know that the minister is getting a lot of letters and that we have to allow a certain delay before expecting an answer. But, in view of the urgency of the situation, I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to do something to have this medicine forwarded as soon as possible to the attending physician of this young man?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I can assure him that I am going to look into this matter today and check whether my officials have not already taken the necessary steps to have this medicine forwarded in order that this young man can get them as soon as possible.

FINANCE

TARIFFS ON OFFSHORE TOMATOES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In December a brief was presented to the Department of Agriculture by both processors and producers of tomatoes, asking for support. I understand that a recommendation concerning tariffs on offshore tomatoes has been made to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say what the recommendation was and when it might be implemented?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask his question. I confirm to him that I am at present giving active consideration to the question of the import of Taiwanese tomatoes to Canada and possible action under the jurisdiction of my department which might restore a fair balance and the competitive position of those tomatoes in the Canadian market.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a brief supplementary question? Can the minister tell us when action will be taken? Many jobs are involved and timing is critical.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am getting lots of pressure from the Minister of Agriculture in this regard and expect to be able to make an announcement at an early date.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOUNDARY DISPUTES RESULTING FROM EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON SETTLEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the extension by Canada on January 1, 1977, of our jurisdiction over fishing operations, a similar extension being planned by the United States on March 1, 1977 which will result in fishermen of each country fishing in areas which are now or soon will be within the zone of the other country, I ask the minister what progress has been made in finalizing the boundary disputes between Canada and the United States, as it relates to Georges Bank on the east coast, as well as between Canada and France as it relates to St. Pierre and Miquelon, and also the boundary disputes between Canada and Denmark?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can dispose of the latter parts of the question first, if I may. There is an arrangement in place with the government of France which provides for an interim solution during 1977, or an interim agreement during 1977, which should not cause any disruption in historic fishing patterns. This will be in place while further negotiations are carried on. Virtually the same situation applies with regard to the Denmark-Canada delineation.

With regard to the United States, a series of meetings were held last week in Los Angeles. We have had reports of some progress and will be resuming those meetings before our Prime Minister meets with President Carter. Hopefully at that time there will be further discussion on this point. The objective is to obtain for 1977 a similar form of interim agreement which will ensure that there is no disruption of fishing activity while discussion, which will be of much longer term, on a final settlement of the boundaries continues.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT COVERING RENFREW COUNTY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the minister and his department have supposedly been in consultation with the province of Ontario about a joint venture, a general development agreement for the county of Renfrew since 1973, and promised in 1974 that Renfrew county would be in line for the next joint venture following the $17 million for Cornwall, and since in 1976 Ontario, because it could not get the co-operation and agreement of the federal government, had to do it alone and pump $2 million into Renfrew county, I ask the minister, when will the federal government honour its commitment and sign an agreement with the province of Ontario to help with infrastructure and other basic developments needed in this high unemployment county?

● (1500)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are still going on between the two levels of government and I trust that we can reach an agreement that will enable us to meet at least in part some of the priorities particular to this area of Ontario, but we have not reached that stage yet.

[English]

Mr. Dick: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the expansion that is taking place, as announced last night, in the industrial park in the area, owing to the provincial funding of infrastructure, does the minister expect that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will negotiate for another four years, or does he expect an announcement to be made within the next six months?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I have to inform the hon. member and the House that I receive representations from a number of provinces of Canada and, in particular, from Ontario. There are several areas in Ontario where both the federal and provincial governments feel they should have higher priorities, and I hope this part of the province will have its turn.

AGRICULTURE

MEAT INSPECTION SERVICE—SUGGESTION MORE VETERINARIANS BE HIRED

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the World Health Organization set a rate of one veterinarian for three primary product inspectors for the purpose of maintaining good beef inspection services and as the ratio in the Health of Animals Branch is now one veterinarian to five PPI, a ratio which could be having a detrimental effect on our inspection service and export market, will the minister advise what progress has been made by his department to hire more veterinarians to lower this ratio to the acceptable standard, taking into consideration that the salary schedule for veterinarians in the civil service is still pretty low.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to state before answering the hon. member's question that the meat inspection service in Canada is second to none in any nation, regardless of how many veterinarians they have. We have technicians who are better trained than technicians in any other country. I just want to point out that some veterinarians are telling us, and I am sure the hon. member is aware of this, that we are educating too many veterinarians. All veterinarians educated in our schools in Canada last year received jobs. We are competing with the private sector. We are putting millions of dollars into veterinary schools to educate more veterinarians. We hope that our department will be increasing the number of veterinarians to the tune of about 5,000 in the next five years.

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister answered my question. In view of what the minister said about all the aid he is supposedly giving to veterinarians and veterinary schools, how is it that we cannot get these graduates to offer their services to the Health of Animals Branch?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have to compete with the private sector. Some of the hon. member's colleagues in this House are the severest critics of government spending. This affects government spending with regard to providing this type of service. We are competing with the private sector. We are being very successful in our discussions with Treasury Board with regard to veterinarians.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—JOINT COMMITTEE ON STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS—REMARK BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I am sorry to detain him, but I think it might be useful for him to stay. It concerns a statement he made to the press last Friday, a question he answered in the House on Friday, and the continuation of those questions yesterday. This involves a statement by the Prime Minister in response to a question by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) on Friday. The Prime Minister said, referring to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments:

> I do know of the work of this committee and I hope it will report to the House so we are able to study the matter in more depth.

That is referring to the question of freedom of information. I recognize very well that it is not a matter of privilege for the government to make statements which may be inaccurate. If so, we would be up every day. Also, it is not a question of privilege for us to be able to demand that the government take some action. However, I suggest that the sort of statements made by the Prime Minister on Friday, and carried on yesterday, which contain a clear inference that we have a strong, courageous government straining at the leash to bring in a freedom of information bill and is being hampered by the fact that a joint committee of this parliament is failing to do its duty, must be brought to the attention of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: This is not the first time: if it were, I would be inclined to let it go. I think the right hon. member has to be nailed on this one. I cannot put this matter before Your Honour and the House without a very brief chronicle of the facts leading up to this situation. One year ago this House passed unanimously a motion adopting the report of the committee that there be a freedom of information bill. Nine months ago the then House leader indicated in response to a question that the government was preparing freedom of information legislation and was giving it some priority. Four months ago the government brought in a very wispy statement in the Speech from the Throne with regard to this matter.

On November 15 I asked the House leader what the government was going to do about this particular issue. The hon. gentleman replied that they were going to wait until the joint committee made its report and then they proposed to do something about it. Three days later I rose and pointed out to the minister that the committee could not do anything because it had no terms of reference. The hon. gentleman should have known that, as the Prime Minister should have known it. The committee reference fell to the ground at the end of last session. We have been waiting patiently for four months to have a chance to deal with this issue. The Prime Minister's statement on Friday is a clear indication that either it was a statement made with deliberation, or gross negligence, without the knowledge of what the Prime Minister should have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I recognize that the government is not interested in passing workable freedom of information legislation. The events of the last year or so have chronicled scandal, near-scandal and incompetence which have hung over this government, brought about by—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Until now, at least, I have exercised considerable generosity in allowing the hon. member, who has considerable experience in this House, to develop a question of privilege. I am prepared to wait for that, but I certainly think the remarks ought to be relevant to the question of privilege only.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, this is background material to indicate why the government failed to bring in a bill. However, I will leave that aspect of it.

Mr. Lalonde: Follow the rules.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. minister, who is one of the most secretive ministers in this House, should not worry about the rules. I have established that it is within the knowledge of the government that this committee has not been given the terms of reference which would make it able to deal with this issue. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) knows it; the Prime Minister should know it. The right hon. member said on Friday that the government is not acting because it is waiting for this committee to make its report. I suggest that constitutes libel of the members of that committee who are anxious to complete their job. To suggest by innuendo that they are not doing their duty, and are not bringing in a report, when they do not have the terms of reference, is most improper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I leave it at that, Mr. Speaker. I have not moved a motion because I do not think I could discharge the onus which I would have. However, this is a very serious breach of privilege. The only way the Prime Minister can purge himself is to indicate that he is going to bring in a freedom of information bill. If the government is afraid or is unwilling to do so, they should use Standing Order 68 and instruct a committee of this House to do it through parliament so that we can get on with this issue.

● (1510)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has a weak case he usually states it in a very excited and emotional way. I think he has either forgotten what I said—it is on the record—or else he is unconsciously changing the sense of it. The reality is very simple. The standing committee has been actively and, I think, creatively engaged in this task for many months. It only reported toward the end of last week. In other words, it terminated its task in recent days. Now, apparently, it is chafing at the bit because it wants to get on with something else. What I said last week was that very soon we would put a government statement before the House on this whole matter of freedom of information and ask hon. members to get on with the task. All I ask of the hon. member is that he rest on his laurels for a day or two and not get excited, and everything will turn out the way it should.

Mr. Speaker: There being no motion attached to the intervention of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), no decision is called for by the Chair.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

ENERGY

TABLING OF AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE ON ESTABLISHMENT OF MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), a document which records the agreement in principle reached by myself, the Premier of Nova Scotia, the Premier of New Brunswick and the Premier of Prince Edward Island on the establishment of a maritime energy corporation.

MOTION TO REFER TO COMMITTEE SUBJECT OF ENERGY COST, CONSERVATION AND ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, with consent I should like to move and have accepted without debate a reference to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. I understand there is agreement to make this reference and have it accepted without debate. The motion is:

That the subject of energy cost and conservation and the annual report of the Department of Energy, Mines an Resources be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If such a motion is to be presented now, without notice, there would have to be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—NOTICE OF MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that I am advised it has not been possible to reach agreement under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B in respect to proceedings at the third reading and passage stage of Bill C-22, an act to amend that statute law relating to income tax, and that I shall propose tomorrow a motion pursuant to Standing Order 75C to allocate one additional sitting day to that state of the proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) on a point of order.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the motion is not tabled. I gave no consent to the motion read by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

DAIRY INDUSTRY—SALES OF FIRMS

Question No. 354—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What proportion of total sales were the sales of the four largest firms in the dairy products industry in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

2. What proportion of total sales did the eight largest firms in the industry earn in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 (d) 1975 (or the most recent year statistics are available)?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: 1. The proportion of total sales earned by the four largest firms in the dairy products industry was 25.1 per cent in 1965, 29.2 per cent in 1970 and 33.0 per cent in 1972. Data for 1960 are not available.

2. The proportion of total sales earned by the eight largest firms in the industry was 34.8 per cent in 1965, 42.3 per cent in 1970 and 45.8 per cent in 1972. Data for 1960 are not available.

AMENDMENT TO INCOME TAX ACT

Question No. 691—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government giving consideration to changing the income tax legislation to assist in the transfer of multiple-owned farm land from one generation to the next thereby giving them the same tax status as single-owner operations?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): While the Income Tax Act permits the transfer of farm property to a second generation on a tax-deferred basis from individual to individual, this treatment has not been extended to farms owned by corporations or partnerships. The deferral of capital gains tax on individually-owned farms is a very special exception to the general framework of income tax legislation. It was introduced only for very compelling reasons which stem from the continuing importance of the small family farm to our country and the disruptive effect which this feature of the income tax system could have where the family was not organized to deal with it. Most of the farms in Canada are still relatively small, unincorporated operations, i.e. in 1971 out of a total of 366,128 farms over 98 per cent of them were unincorporated. Farm corporations are typically larger operations and the corporation provides among other things a flexible vehicle which can be readily used for estate planning and the orderly transfer of property from one generation to another. Moreover, it would be hard to justify special rollover treatment for farm corporations and not for other family businesses or perhaps the whole range of capital properties passing between generations on death.

EQUALIZATION GRANTS TO NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 759—Mr. Coates:

What is the present estimate of total equalization grants which will be paid to the Province of Nova Scotia for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Total equalization payments to Nova Scotia in respect of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977 are currrently estimated to be $293,044,000.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—RENTAL OF TRUCKS

Question No. 880—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Does the Post Office Department lease trucks from private firms for the delivery of mail and, if so, by province and territory (a) what are the names and addresses of such firms (b) how many trucks are leased from each and at what cost?

2. Does the Department demand exclusive use of all such trucks to carry mail only or are they allowed to carry other goods?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. (a) and (b)

Name and address	Quantity and cost	Remarks
Five Wheel Truck Rental Montreal, Quebec	1 tractor $800 per month plus 22 cents per mile
Arrow Leasing 25 Comstock Road Scarborough, Ontario	2 5-Ton Vans $400 per month plus 15 cents per mile
Provincial Trailers Ltd. 1611 Brittania Rd. Mississauga, Ontario	15 45-foot trailers $250 per month
North Queen Transport Ltd. 60 North Queen St. Toronto, Ontario	1 shunt vehicle $6 per hour used $3 per hour standby

2. While under lease to the Post Office Department the vehicles are used exclusively for the transportation of mail or to train postal drivers.

Order Paper Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CO-OPERATION—PROJECTS

Question No. 920—Mr. Howie:

1. Have any projects been initiated under the five-year strategy for international development co-operation that focus on lower-income developing countries and, if so, what are they?

2. Are there any indications that such projects have begun to improve the living and working conditions in the countries?

3. What other major developments now underway, or in the planning stages, are the result of the government's endorsement of the five-year strategy?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. In the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1976, Canada disbursed 334 million dollars to those developing countries with an annual GNP per capita of less than 200 dollars. This represented 65 per cent of the Canadian bilateral aid disbursements. In the period from September 1, 1975 to October 31, 1976, CIDA initiated 9 projects with a total commitment of 176 million dollars to these poorest of the developing countries. The 39 projects were in the following sectors: 10 in agriculture, 10 in transportation, six in potable water, two in small industry development, two in energy, two in forestry, two in telecommunications, two in education, and one each in health, fisheries and topographical mapping.

2. Yes, according to all the evidence, these projects and each individual one according to its particular objectives, normally contribute directly to the satisfaction of basic individual needs and thus have improved living and working conditions by relieving hunger, providing safe drinking water, increasing the nutritional value of basic foods, providing protective clothing and personal hygiene. Moreover, these projects contribute toward the satisfaction of social needs such as education, public health and community development. Some of these projects contribute indirectly to the improvement of conditions of life and work in disadvantaged countries by providing for the necessary infrastructure for economic development and for equipment essential for production for the satisfaction of individual and collective needs.

3. In addition to the increased focus on the poorest people described in the answers to (1) and (2) above, the Canadian International Development Agency is currently engaged in various major initiatives, among which are the following: (i) The Agency has embarked upon a programme to identify methods to bring about increased cooperation primarily with middle-income LDC's in the industrial sector. It is expected that the completed preliminary studies, undertaken by consultants on CIDA's behalf in a selected cross-section of recipients, will lead to further more detailed investigation of some of the proposals made by the consultants. At the same time the Agency is about to launch an experimental programme aimed at identifying a broader spectrum of new avenues of co-operation with Latin America countries, such as twinning arrangements between Canadian and Latin American institutions for cooperation in science and technology. (ii) The Canadian International Development Agency had made considerable progress in implementing the policy of untying development loans to suppliers in LDC's with the objective of helping the LDC's to develop their capacity to respond to the needs of both other LDC's and of themselves. Intensive interdepartmental consultation has taken place as well as consultation with industry representatives. (iii) Working groups in CIDA are well advanced in studying ways to improve both Canada's food aid programme and the Canadian response to disasters in the Third World, the former in conjunction with Treasury Board, the latter within CIDA. It is expected that recommendations will be submitted to the appropriate decision-making authorities in the near future. Apart from the above-mentioned major initiatives, CIDA is also pursuing the implementation of the other points of the strategy.

SUPER MAXIMUM PRISONS

Question No. 987—Mr. Howie:

Are any small, highly automated, super maximum prisons planned for construction start before March 31 (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 and, if so (i) how many (ii) what is the estimated cost (iii) how many inmates would be accommodated in each (iv) what is the estimated cost of each one?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The Canadian Penitentiary Service has no plans for the construction of small, highly automated, super maximum prisons. However, three Special Handling Units are being planned at the Correctional Development Centre in Laval, Quebec, at the Millhaven Institution, in Millhaven, Ontario and at the Saskatchewan Penitentiary, in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, for the incarceration of very dangerous inmates.

PERCENTAGE OF TOTAL ASSETS CONTROLLED BY UNITED STATES COMPANIES

Question No. 1,002—Mr. Herbert:

What is the percentage of total assets controlled by US companies in the following Canadian industries (a) primary metals (b) metal fabricating (c) electrical products (d) mineral fuels (e) chemicals?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports: The following information has been extracted from Table 3 of the 1973 Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Report Part I.

	Total Assets ($000,000)	U.S. Controlled Assets ($000,000)	Percent U.S. Controlled
Primary Metals	5,199	376	7.2
Metal Fabricating	3,354	1,243	37.1
Electrical Products	3,060	1,758	57.5
Mineral Fuels	7,816	4,877	62.4
Chemical and Chemical Products	3,818	2,099	55.0

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—EQUIPMENT AND BUILDING REPAIRS

Question No. 1,059—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What items, buildings or other equipment were repaired or maintained by the Administration Section, Department of the Secretary of State in the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76?

2. In each case, what was the nature of the breakdown, malfunction or condition of the item and what were the repairs or maintenance?

3. In each case, what was the original value of the item?

4. In each case, what was the expected life span of the item before the repairs or maintenance and what is the expected life of the item subsequent to the repairs or maintenance?

5. For what reason was the repair or maintenance not foreseen at the time of the presentation of the 1975-76 main estimates, resulting in an expenditure of 57,200 per cent over the estimates and also the previous year?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. (a) and (b) All such items in use in the Department.

2, 3 and 4. Records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the Department to extract the required information readily and without an inordinate amount of work, time and cost.

5. The difference between the 1975-76 Main Estimates for Purchased Repair and Upkeep and the Forecast Expenditures for 1975-76 for these items, as shown in the 1976-77 Main Estimates, is due entirely to the inclusion of an item for $1,700,000 for Tenant Services in the Department's 1975-76 Supplementary Estimates "A" which had previously been provided in the Estimates of the Department of Public Works. This change was to reflect the Treasury Board's policy decision requiring departments to account for such services in their own Estimates rather than in those of the Department of Public Works.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MOVE OF COMMANDO UNIT AIRBORNE REGIMENT TO OTTAWA

Question No. 1,262—Mr. Paproski:

1. How much accommodation (stores, quarters and married quarters) is available at CFB (a) Uplands (b) Rockcliffe for No. One Commando Unit of the Airborne Regiment?

2. Is such accommodation sufficient and, if not (a) who is to be moved to make room (b) what amount will new construction cost and on what date will it be ready?

3. Based on the present plan (a) what will be the savings in personnel (b) will there be any savings in money and (i) if so, how much and where will the savings come from (ii) if not, how much will the move cost?

4. What amount will be spent on the airport at Petawawa to give it all-weather instrument flight rules (IFR) capability?

5. Was the Chief of the Defence Staff present when the announcement was made and, if not, is he available now?

6. Is there a threat which requires an infantry unit in Ottawa and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. There is sufficient hangar space at CFB Ottawa South (Uplands) to meet the needs of 1 CDO. Married personnel will compete according to current regulations for some of the about 800 married quarters of CFB Ottawa.

2. Yes.

3. Administrative support establishment positions formerly required to maintain 1 CDO at CFB Edmonton will no longer be required nor will they be required in Ottawa where they already exist and therefore shall be converted to operation positions. This relocation is expected to effect some economies but principally will improve the land force operational deployment. The move is expected to cost $500,000 on a one-time basis for personnel and equipment relocation.

4. None as this capability is not currently required.

5. No, but he is available now.

6. No.

RECONSTRUCTION OF RIDING MOUNTAIN PARKWAY, MANITOBA

Question No. 1,293—Mr. McKinley:

What was the final cost and the completion date for the contract to reconstruct the Riding Mountain Parkway from mile 15.86 to mile 24.0 in Riding Mountain National Park, Manitoba?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Contract was awarded in the Spring of 1975 in the amount of $1,062,000. The Interim Certificate of Completion has been issued in the amount of $1,215,965.20; however, the final contract amount will not be known pending completion of the final quantity calculations now under way. The original completion date specified in the contract was 1975-10-31. This Department on 1976-05-14, authorized an extended completion date of 1976-09-30, and, in fact, the work was accepted from the contractor on 1976-09-28.

UIC—PERSONNEL IN HEADQUARTERS

Question No. 56—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many persons are employed at the Headquarters of the Unemployment Insurance Commission located at 222 Nepean Street, Ottawa (a) what is the number of persons in each classification and what is the salary range (b) what are the total salaries per year paid to all persons employed there (c) what is the total amount of overtime paid to all persons who are working or who have worked at 222 Nepean Street in each of the past three calendar years for which figures are available?

2. Has any survey been made by the government to determine whether the Unemployment Insurance Commission Headquarters at 222 Nepean Street is overstaffed and (a) if so, on what date and what were the results (b) if not, will such a survey be undertaken to determine whether any staff cut-backs or transfers to other jobs in the Public Service are warranted?

Return tabled.

Unemployment

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) is not here. Question No. 56 is his question. I wonder why the reply has been made an order for return. Is there a reason for it?

Mr. Goodale: I should have mentioned that the answer to that particular question involves eight pages of documentation. That is why it is being answered in this way.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the revelation this morning that the continuing chronic level of unemployment has now reached critical proportions, with 889,000 persons officially unemployed, the highest level since the great depression and the highest level in the history of Statistics Canada.

It is to be noted that as bad as these figures are, they do not include an additional 100,000 unemployed who have withdrawn completely from the labour force in recent months. It should also be noted in this connection that the government has failed to announce any new initiatives to alleviate unemployment and will not do so until its budget which may be as late as June of this year. I submit this constitutes a crisis and an emergency situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made applications on previous occasions and the Chair has made rulings on previous occasions relating to the suitability of the use of Standing Order 26 in relation to a subject such as unemployment. I have made my position clear on the matter on previous occasions and, in turn, I have referred to precedents which seem to me to be applicable. I do not propose to read the whole of Standing Order 26 because it contains a number of subclauses, but I would draw attention to subclause 16(a) which provides:

> The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration.

I have said in the past that the matter referred to by the hon. member is one of extreme importance. As the situation becomes more severe, as was made evident by the questions put forward during the question period today and the answers thereto, it becomes an even more serious matter. However, this does not change its continuing nature or affect its eligibility for inclusion under Standing Order 26. In other words, no matter how important a subject, and while it might well be a proper one for consideration by this House in many other ways—and, indeed, it should be—this is a matter of ongoing concern and therefore is not a proper subject for debate under Standing Order 26.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION PAYABLE TO PERSONS SIXTY-FIVE YEARS OF AGE AND OVER CONTINGENT UPON RESIDENCE IN CANADA

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-35, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on April 14 last I tabled in the House of Commons proposals to amend the Old Age Security Act. It is with pride today that I speak on the fruition of those proposals, Bill C-35. The amendments contained in the bill mean that over half a million residents of Canada may eventually gain access to the social security credits they have acquired overseas. They will also ensure greater equity of treatment among old age security pensioners by relating the basic old age security pension more directly to actual participation in Canadian society, and will bring greater consistency between this program and the other components of the Canadian retirement income system which are directly related to it.

I should stress that the proposed amendments will not alter three essential ingredients in the old age security program. Firstly, it is universal and non-contributory, based exclusively on residence in Canada; secondly, the pensions it provides become payable at age 65 at the earliest; and thirdly, it is the building block of the Canadian retirement income system.

The amending legislation improves the program in three important ways. First, it authorizes the inclusion of the OAS program in reciprocal agreements, which is not now the case; second, it proposes one single eligibility criterion instead of the three current ones; and third, it establishes partial pensions, which do not exist at present. In order that the retirement plans of current residents of this country not be jeopardized by the amending legislation, Bill C-35 further provides for a transition period of 40 years before the same, single eligibility requirement applies to everyone.

I should like, first of all, to comment on the OAS proposals and the reciprocal agreements. The amendments would authorize inclusion of the old age security program in international agreements which would make benefits portable to and from countries with which Canada may negotiate agreements. Such agreements would directly benefit a large number of immigrants to this country, especially those who have chosen to retire in Canada to be near their children and grandchildren, many of whom find their foreign pensions frozen at the level at which they were on the day they left their country of origin, and eroded by inflation and devaluation. The central purpose of reciprocal international agreements is to protect migrants who spend portions of their working lives in more than one country. Such people cannot always meet the minimum eligibility requirements of the mandatory social security programs to which they have contributed.

Such countries as France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, from which a large number of Canadian immigrants have come in recent years, have expressed interest in having reciprocal social security agreements with us and in preliminary discussions among officials have formulated proposals involving varying combinations of Canadian programs. Until now Canada has had no adequate response to such proposals since OAS, the building block of our retirement income system, could not be taken to the bargaining table.

The great majority of social security benefits of other countries are tied to participation in the labour force and, in a few cases, to periods of residence in the country concerned. The amount of individual pensions payable by such countries is usually a function of the number of years of contributions or residence which the applicant has accumulated at the time he or she reaches pensionable age.

In addition, most countries place explicit restrictions on the payment of social security benefits outside their national boundaries. Some pay their benefits only to beneficiaries having accumulated a certain minimum period of contributions or residence. Others do not pay them abroad to anyone, or restrict such payments to their own nationals, or do not pay adjustments in their benefits unless they have a social security agreement with the country to which their beneficiaries migrate.

Both the current OAS legislation and Bill C-35 have a restriction of the first type I have mentioned, that is to say, the requirement that the beneficiary must have lived in Canada for a minimum of 10 years after age 18 to receive the pension of Canada, or 20 years before it can be exported. In much the same manner as Canada would want to protect the benefits which as many as half a million of its current residents have acquired abroad, so would other countries wish to provide, through reciprocal agreements, for the easing of restrictions which Canada places on its own benefits, such as the 20-year rule for export of the OAS pension.

Even if the current OAS program could be taken to the bargaining table, it would be unusable in reciprocal agreements because of the "all or nothing" principle embodied in it and the different weight which attaches to the same number of years of residence in Canada. In contrast, the corresponding programs of other countries yield benefits which are prorated to periods of contributions or residence.

Under international social security agreements of the standard type, the restriction which governments place on the payment of their benefits outside national boundaries is overcome by adding together periods of contributions or residence in each of the contracting states to determine eligibility under the programs of one or both countries. Once eligibility is established, each party to the agreement calculates, under its own rules, its share of the composite benefit payable and pays it direct to the beneficiary. By such techniques, contracting states can make social security benefits portable across their boundaries and thereby protect the social security credits of their residents who work in the other country for part of their lives.

International agreements also provide for the removal of duplicate coverage. Hon. members will be familiar with the difficulties experienced by Canadian residents working in the United States and, conversely, with the situation of United States citizens working in Canada. For the time being, most people in this situation have to contribute both to the Canada Pension Plan and to the United States social security scheme. A reciprocal agreement with the United States government would resolve such anomalies.

I would caution all hon. members that Bill C-35, while it authorizes inclusion of the old age security program in international agreements, will not, in and of itself, give automatic access by residents of Canada to the social security credits acquired in foreign countries. It takes two to negotiate. The precise terms which other countries will be prepared to offer under agreements, and the details of what they will require of Canada in return, will of course become known only when negotiations begin.

For its part, the government of Canada will be prepared to enter into formal negotiations with other interested governments as soon as Bill C-35 becomes law and we can take the OAS program to the bargaining table. I might note in passing that international agreements on social security exclude all income-tested programs. The guaranteed income supplement will therefore never be part of international agreements.

Secondly, I should like to say a few words about the single eligibility requirement which is found in the proposed bill. Forty years hence, the same, single eligibility requirement will apply to every resident of Canada: the OAS pension will be acquired a year at a time, through residence in Canada after age 18, over a maximum 40-year period. Partial pensions will be available for those with less than 40 years' residence based on one-fortieth of a full pension for each year of residence in Canada. A minimum ten years of residence will be required for any pension to be payable in Canada, and a minimum 20 years for it to be payable outside the country.

At present, residents of Canada can qualify for their old age pension at age 65 in one of three ways. First, by living here for a full 40 years after age 18. This produces a pension for which you can apply from anywhere in the world and which is payable anywhere in the world. Secondly, one can qualify by living here without interruption for the ten years immediately preceding application for the pension, normally from age 55 to age 65. This produces a pension payable in Canada for which you must apply from Canada and which becomes exportable after the pensioner has completed 20 years of residence here.

Finally, if an applicant has been absent from the country during the ten years preceding application for the pension, he or she can make up each year of absence by three years of residence between ages 18 and 54. This produces a pension payable in Canada only, unless the applicant can meet the 20-year export rule. The point to bear in mind, however, is that in order to qualify under this "three for one" provision the applicant must live in Canada for a full year before applying for the pension.

Unfortunately, the application of these eligibility criteria frequently results in inequitable treatment of beneficiaries. Let us take the case of someone who was born in Canada, lived and worked here and, say for health reasons, left the country at age 55. The 37 years of residence in Canada after age 18 which such a person had completed would not entitled the applicant to anything unless he or she were to re-establish residence in Canada for a full year before applying for the pension. On the other hand, a non-Canadian, say, again, for health reasons, can choose to come to Canada at age 55, live here until age 65, claim and get a full pension.

It will be clear from the foregoing that the current eligibility criteria, combined with the "all or nothing" principle, can favour applicants having had as little as ten years association with Canada over others who spent most of their working lives here. The amendments which the government has put forward will resolve this anomaly by giving each year of residence in Canada exactly the same value for OAS purposes and by establishing partial pensions. After the transition period, 40 years will draw a full forty-fortieths pension. Twenty years will be worth half as much as a full pension, and ten years a quarter as much.

In preparing the amendments which are now before us, one of the government's concerns was to ensure that no one currently in receipt of the pension, or in the process of building up their entitlement to it, would be affected by the changes in the rules. The OAS target population is composed of current and former residents of Canada. Within this group, those under the age of 25 when Bill C-35 becomes law and who have 40 years ahead of them to build up their entitlement to a forty-fortieths pensions will be governed by the new rules.

Current or former residents of Canada who are 25 and over when Bill C-35 comes into force will have the choice of the most beneficial set of rules when they apply for their OAS pension at age 65. Thus, no one—absolutely no one—who has some claim to an OAS entitlement by virtue of current or former residence in Canada will be deprived of the opportunity to earn a full pension. For the purposes of the act, current residents include those holding a valid immigrant visa when the amendments become law. They, too, could choose whichever set of rules is more advantageous to their particular circumstances.

It should be noted, as well, that receipt of a partial OAS pension will give access to the income-tested guaranteed income supplement, as the full pension currently does, and will be adjusted quarterly to the consumer price index, as is the case for the full pension now. Similarly, the younger spouse of an OAS pensioner will continue to be entitled to consideration for the spouses' allowance benefits; the OAS equivalent portion of such benefits will be calculated in the same manner as the OAS pension itself.

People who have never resided in Canada and who do not hold an immigrant visa will henceforth be governed by the new rules and earn their pension a year at a time, as will every other legal resident of Canada. Others—current and former residents of Canada—may qualify for pensions under the new law, while they have no entitlement at all under current legislation, or can receive a partial pension earlier than they could have received a full one.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on other features of the amending legislation. Bill C-35 also includes an amendment which will exempt family allowance benefits as income for the purpose of calculating entitlement to GIS and spouse's allowances.

When the GIS program was developed in 1966, family allowances were not taxable; consequently, they were not considered part of a GIS applicant's income and had no effect on the amount of the supplement payable. However, when family allowances became taxable in 1974, the benefits automatically counted as part of one's income in calculating eligibility for GIS. Henceforth, family allowances will not be counted as income for calculation of benefits under the guaranteed income supplement or the spouses' allowance programs. Approximately 10,000 pensioners, it is estimated, will benefit from this change.

A number of other amendments have been introduced in the bill to facilitate the proper administration of the program and to prevent abuse of the legislation originally passed by parliament. As an example, the amending legislation will prevent the payment abroad, for more than six months, of OAS benefits to persons who have ceased to reside in Canada and who do not meet the 20-year export rule. Technically, such persons can now defeat the 20-year rule for export of the pension by returning to Canada for one day every six months. Bill C-35 corrects this situation.

Provision is also made in the legislation for the granting of commissioner of oath authority to departmental officers to expedite the administration of certain provisions of the act, notably those relating to proof of marriage.

Finally, in order that parliament may fully exercise its authority over the use of public funds, Bill C-35 describes the procedure to be used for the ratification, by both Houses of Parliament, of reciprocal social security agreements which the government of Canada may negotiate with foreign governments under the authority of the governor-in-council. This ratification procedure is the same as that which applies to income tax agreements with which members of this House are familiar.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, Canadians have reason to be proud of the retirement income system which has been built over the years. It can stand comparison with the best in the world. We can be prouder yet when the amendments become law, because there will be more equity in the treatment of OAS beneficiaries, more consistency within the system itself, and the possibility of negotiating international agreements to protect the social security credits of people migrating into and out of Canada.

Let me emphasize that we have taken great care in the phasing in of the new residence requirements. No one in receipt of a pension will have that pension reduced. People under 25, who have 40 years ahead of them before retirement, will have the opportunity to qualify for a 40/40ths pension under the new rules.

Those 25 and over, current or former residents of Canada, will be able to claim their pension at age 65 under the most beneficial set of rules. Current residents, for this purpose, include people holding immigrant visas when the act is enforced.

Older immigrants to our country will earn their pension one year at a time, as will every other resident of Canada.

Pensions (partial and full) will be adjusted quarterly in line with increases in the consumer price index. Partial pensioners will be able to receive the full guaranteed income supplement, if their other income is low enough to qualify them for this. And in the small proportion of cases where there may still be a deficiency in income to meet basic living requirements, the individuals concerned will have access to the income support programs administered by provincial governments and funded jointly by the provinces and the federal government.

We are improving the equity of the program in future years, and relating the basic old age security pension more directly to actual participation in Canadian society. And we must remember that, in doing so, we also make this program more consistent with the programs of other countries, thereby facilitating the negotiation of bilateral agreements covering pensions. This, in turn, should make it possible for many immigrants to improve their retirement income position.

Mr. Speaker, those are the comments I wanted to make in introducing the bill. I thank hon. members for their kind attention.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first, that we on this side of the House consider that the steps the minister has taken are worthy of very serious consideration. The minister, on April 4, 1976, announced the government's proposed amendments to the Old Age Security Act which would——address the inequities which are rising because of the increasing number of persons whose active working life and retirement are not all spent in Canada.

Actually, as has been pointed out by the minister, there were two proposals. One will affect every Canadian through the change in residence rules and, of course, those who recently arrived in Canada, and the other will affect Canadians living abroad and older persons who have come to Canada. With particular reference to the last point, as has been stated by the minister there are some 500,000 people living in Canada who—I will not use the word "neglect" because I do not think it is fair—because of the foot-dragging, and perhaps, procrastination of this government have been denied benefits simply because this government was unable, with all its wisdom—

An hon. Member: Wisdom?

Mr. Alexander: —yes, wisdom and all its support staff, was unable to come up with legislation which would enable it to enter into reciprocal agreements with such countries as the United Kingdom, Italy and France. Therefore, these people have been deprived of benefits. I will not dwell on that too long, but let me say that we on this side of the House take a very dim view of that. I have here much correspondence between the High Commission of the United Kingdom and this government dating back to 1970. Proposals have been submitted. It is now February 8, 1977. The minister smiles. Perhaps he anticipates that I will clap him on the back, but it is not my role to clap ministers on the back for anything, because they are getting paid enough to bring forward legislation sufficiently early to benefit Canadians.

In the last Speech from the Throne we read the government's announced intention to address itself to inequities. There is more to that than residence requirements and reciprocal agreements. I should like to make a few comments on this without speaking at any great length. My colleague, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), and myself have been out on a quality of life tour to determine the quality of life of our senior citizens, whether they have any grievances, and so forth. Our governments—notice how I say "governments" so as to be purely objective—are doing the right thing with respect to our senior citizens. There are some two million Canadians who are at present entitled to old age security, but because of medical advances and improvement of the quality of life—my life and that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde)—will live longer in the golden years of their lives. Therefore, we must be concerned about those people because of the attitude of some of us in the country that older people should be shipped out to pasture at the age of 65 to fend for themselves. I heard that comment on many occasions as I travelled from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean and back. There seems to be an attitude in Canada that once you are 65, you are useless; there is no purpose to your life, and therefore you should be institutionalized.

Mr. Sharp: Be kind to me.

Mr. Alexander: There is a role for the institution to play, but we should concern ourselves with improving this situation. The reason I am so much in favour of immigrants and immigration to Canada is that the type of person we are bringing here respects and appreciates the worthiness of his elders. You do not find too many new immigrants sending their parents and grandparents to institutions. I see the minister nodding his head in affirmation. We Canadians have been sloppy in this respect.

Mr. Francis: Or worse.

Mr. Alexander: "Or worse", as the hon. member says. I want to let the minister know that there is concern about that matter. When we talk about inequities, let me point out that senior citizens are concerned about the rising cost of living. We found on our tour that they are concerned about food, clothing, housing and fuel. Yet the cost of living index, as the minister knows, is based on a multiplicity of factors, some of which do not affect senior citizens. So they want us to try to devise a new formula so that the indexing will relate more to their needs.

They were angry about the minister forcing senior citizens into retirement at age 65. The minister knows what I am talking about. His colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), introduced amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which denied benefits to people after age 65. In other words, this is forced retirement. Under the present Unemployment Insurance Act, after age 65 you cannot pay premiums and you are not entitled to benefits.

● (1550)

Mr. Lalonde: But you may get your Canada pension benefits without retirement.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, when the minister was speaking I did not interrupt him. He says they can get their Canada pension, but I am not talking about the Canada pension. I am talking about the work ethic and those who are aged 65 but do not want to collect the Canada pension because they are still energetic enough and have the strength to work. As I look to my left, and I will not mention names—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not?

Mr. Alexander: I think the hon. member knows what I am getting at, Mr. Speaker. If we were to force retirement in this House, some of the greatest parliamentarians would have to vacate the premises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Some people over 65 want to work, not because it is a great joy but because they have commitments, and the cost of living is high. Due to this government's ineptness in solving the many problems that are destroying our economy, however, people find it necessary to work in order to help themselves, those they brought into the world, and their children. But the government says that at age 65 they are not now eligible for unemployment insurance. It has been said they are ripping off the system. Why pick on these people who have contributed so much to the country? Surely it would be easy to find the few in this age group who are ripping off the system compared to the number between, say, age 20 and 25 who are said to be doing the same thing.

This bill is part and parcel of the whole mess in which we find ourselves as a result of this government and, in particular, this minister. The provisions regarding spouse's allowance are also cause for concern and we have fought them tooth and nail. The minister did not have the decency to define "spouse"—he did not even put "married" in the bill. "Spouse" could mean someone with whom you are living. But that is another problem, although it shows the direction in which this government is moving.

An hon. Member: Permissive.

Mr. Alexander: My point is that when one spouse is 65 and the other is between 60 and 64, their costs for housing and the necessities of life keep on and, indeed, sometimes increase. If the one who is age 65 dies, the other one does not collect old age security. If these people live in a senior citizens' home or nursing home, however, the person under 65 does get something, as does the one over 65; but when the one drawing old age security dies, the other one does not collect. Those are just some of the inequities, Mr. Speaker. The provision regarding the spouse's allowance excludes widows, widowers, spinsters, bachelors and divorcees: it encourages living in sin.

The New Horizons program is another matter of concern. The senior citizens to whom I speak are unhappy about the criteria set for projects. I think these criteria come from academics and eggheads who are fortunate enough to work in Ottawa. They are young people who have no idea of the needs of senior citizens. They can only see the obvious, and that is the type of program of which they approve. If it is in any way aesthetic or intangible, they rule that it does not meet the criteria. The criteria of people aged 25 or 30? With all due respect, I think some civil servants should get out of their offices occasionally and see what is going on in the country. Perhaps they would realize that some of the policies they conceive and pass along to ministers are ill-considered. I know they work hard on these things—almost as hard as members of parliament. We are all working together for a common cause.

Senior citizens are also concerned about not being able to live in their own homes. They, naturally, want to stay in the home they saved and suffered to pay for, and live in an environment they know amongst their friends and children. Perhaps there could be some form of incentive offered to keep senior citizens in the homes they now occupy. In the long run it might be even cheaper than building senior citizens' homes, although these are needed too. Perhaps some sort of incentive could be given to children to maintain parents in their homes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, these people who have brought Canada to where it is today feel left out of the mainstream of Canadian life in many ways. They believe they have been kicked out to pasture, are forgotten, useless and are not in a position to make any further contribution. I reject that philosophy, but it seems to be the thinking behind many things.

The formula proposed for the residence requirement is better than the present one because it simplifies the eligibility provision. This is a complex bill and worthy of our very serious consideration, so a lot of questions have to be asked, and I hope we will get the answers. As I said before, we are not going to chastise the minister; we will let the bill go to committee so that hon. members will be able to discuss it and understand it thoroughly. There are a few things that concern members on both sides who represent large cities. I hope the publicity concerning the residence amendment will make clear just who will be affected and that those collecting pensions will not suffer any loss of benefits.

I witnessed the government spend about $1 million publicizing the merits of the Anti-Inflation Board, how well it was working and telling us of the impact of wage and price controls on the economy. I hope consideration has been given to bringing information about this bill to the people who will be affected. I have no idea how this can be done, but surely if the government can spend $1 million in an effort to con people about the anti-inflation program and wage and price controls, it can find a few dollars to tell people about amendments to the Old Age Security Act.

● (1600)

At present, to qualify for the old age security pension a person must be 65 years of age and, (a) have resided in Canada for 40 years after the age of 18—that is the 40-year rule; or (b), have resided in Canada for ten consecutive years after age 55—that is the ten-year rule; or (c), if a person has resided less than ten years in Canada after age 55, or if the ten years of residence after age 55 have not been continuous, the difference can be made up at the rate of three years of residence in Canada, accumulated between the age of 18 and 55, for every year missing.

Each person must, also, live in Canada for the year immediately prior to the initial year of benefit, under that old age security rule. Therefore, one must consider the 40-year rule, the 10-year rule, the "three years for one"rule and the "last year of residency rule." All these rules are messy. The situation at present is full of inequities as different years of residence have different weights with regard to OAS. For example, if a person has lived in Canada for 38 years but leaves the year before his OAS benefits begin, he will not qualify for OAS.

Allow me now to allude to the situation of a man now living in Florida who does mind being referred to by name in this House. I brought this chap to the minister's attention. I know the minister reads most of the letters he gets. I think he must have read the letter I sent because it dealt with a matter of some significance. I am referring to the situation of Mr. William Cranston. Mr. Cranston left Canada in 1965. His period of residence in Canada after age 18 totalled 37 years, 11 months. I now quote from the minister's letter dated January 13, 1977, and signed, apparently, by the minister himself. The minister said in part in his letter:

> My officials inform me that Mr. Cranston left Canada in December, 1965. His period of residence in Canada after age 18 totals 37 years, 11 months. Mr. Cranston would not, therefore, qualify for the pension under any of the methods outlined above.

The minister was referring to conditions I put on the record a few minutes ago. Is it not strange that after being a resident of Canada for 37 years, 11 months, Mr. Cranston was not entitled to a pension? I continue quoting from the minister's letter, part of which deals with the legislation before us. He said in part:

> This proposal would remove inequities in the "all or nothing" feature of the present legislation under which residents of Canada may be entitled to a full old age security pension after ten years residence in Canada between the ages of 55 and 65—

Unfortunately, even though a person may have lived in this country for 39 years after his eighteenth birthday, under the present law he would not be entitled to a pension. Is this not strange? This bill addresses itself to situations of that kind. We do not know how many people are affected, but we intend to find out. The present arrangement is an "all or nothing" format which often does not give due recognition to the years of productivity and contribution a citizen has given to Canada over his years of residence. In light of this fact, we are now dealing with proposals saying that OAS should become payable in direct proportion to the person's years of residence. One year of residence will earn the person one-fortieth of his OAS pension, with a maximum of 40 years to receive a full pension.

It should be noted that the minimum residence requirement of ten years will be retained, but will refer to any ten years of residence in Canada after age 18. As well, a minimum of 20 years residence will still be required to collect OAS from abroad. Once again, any 20 years of residence after age 18 will qualify. This will essentially solve most, if not all, of the inequity problem which I have discussed. Since each year of residence will receive the same weight, the proposed provision will eliminate the "all or nothing" nature of the present OAS plan and it will become possible to collect a partial pension.

For the benefit of those who subscribe to Hansard, let me put on record the new criteria the minister has proposed under this bill. Although I do not like flattering our ministers, I think we ought to recognize what the minister has done in this instance. I hope I did not sound too flowery.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In other words, you are not all bad.

Mr. Alexander: I am not concerned about whether the minister is good or bad; I could not care less, since we intend to sit on the government side of the House. But I want to show our people how this country should be governed in a responsible and responsive fashion for the benefit of Canadians. Let me put on record some questions and answers concerning the proposed legislation to amend the Old Age Security Act. They read as follows:

Q. What would the new residence rules be?

A. Under the new rules, the Old Age Security pension would be "earned" by residents of Canada a year at a time, that is, at the rate of one-fortieth of the eventual full pension for each year of residence here after age 18.

Receipt of the pension in Canada would continue to be subject to a minimum residence period of ten years after age 18 and receipt of the pension abroad, to a minimum residence period of 20 years.

40 years of residence after age 18—a full OAS pension, in Canada or abroad;

20 years (or more) of residence after age 18 (but less than 40)—half a pension (or more) in Canada or abroad; ten years of residence after age 18 (but less than 20)—a quarter of a pension (or more, up to nineteen-fortieths) payable in Canada only.

The last part of that answer could create problems—which are not insurmountable, I might add. We ought to let it be known that the intention of this bill is to cut the pensions of the recently arrived. The minister has not said anything; therefore I assume I am right.

Mr. Lalonde: That is not the case.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the last part of the answer reads:

Ten years of residence after age 18 (but less than 20)—a quarter of a pension (or more, up to nineteen-fortieths) payable in Canada only.

Mr. Lalonde: If you reside in Canada at the time of passage of the bill, you have the choice of the best way of obtaining a pension.

Mr. Alexander: We ought to publicize that; most people are not aware of it. We should like to say that we like what the minister is doing. Unfortunately, we cannot keep abreast of much of what is happening in the government. In this connection I wish to pay tribute to my parliamentary intern, the brilliant Miss Lillian Wong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: We must give credit where credit is due. I favour our system of parliamentary internship and hope we can expand it. Our parliamentary interns assist significantly those of us who, by virtue of the pressure of business, find it difficult to know everything ministers are doing. Ministers have at their disposal considerable resources. They employ speechwriters, some of whom are paid $1,500 for writing one speech.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You have got to be kidding. Let us get back to flattery.

Mr. Alexander: I now raise the difficulty of those who arrive here from other countries in their later years of life, say when they are 50 years old or more. Under the newly-proposed legislation, they would receive only a proportion of the maximum possible pension because, apparently, now you must earn your pension. If the immigrants come from a country where social assistance is not available or with which a bilateral agreement has not been negotiated, will their partial pensions be adequate to support them if they have no other means of income? I ask this since I, as a member of parliament concerned about the welfare of Canadians, have some responsibility in this matter. That is why we must examine this bill carefully in committee to determine if my fears are valid or not.

I ask, will these people entering our country in their later years become burdens on the families which may have brought them over? Will this provision simply increase payments from other forms of social assistance so that the amounts saved from the new legislation will be cancelled out by increases in other payments? This concern was raised especially with regard to the new immigration legislation which will allow the immigration of parents of Canadian citizens or landed immigrants regardless of age.

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Alexander: I hear an hon. member suggesting that I do not know what I am talking about. Because the minister brought this bill forward so quickly, we have not had the opportunity to consider in depth the provisions of this complicated legislation. The fact that it was brought forward so quickly shows how poor is the government's legislative program. It is not the usual deal where you have a couple of weeks to look into it and have it researched. I was away looking after the interests of our senior citizens. I left last Wednesday. At that time there was no intention of bringing in this bill at this early stage. Back I came, and all hell broke loose. They are bringing in amendments to the Old Age Security Act. I hope the provinces are happy. I hope the consultative machinery which was required has been pursued, and that they believe we are moving in the right direction, particularly when I raised my concern about immigrants.

● (1610)

Here is another question. As I said before, the minister's kit is not bad. However, I want to put some of these questions and answers on the record of Hansard. They are as follows:

QUESTION: Could the amount of a partial pension be increased if the beneficiary resided for additional years in Canada?

ANSWER: Once in pay, the amount of a pension could not be increased by virtue of additional residence in Canada.

I think people would like to know that.

QUESTION: Once the proposed legislation comes into effect, would persons already in receipt of the full OAS pension, or who subsequently qualify for it under the present rules, be able to take it abroad?

ANSWER: Yes, If they have resided in Canada for 20 years, after the age of 18, as the present rules require. The same 20-year minimum for export of the pension abroad would be retained under the new rules. In other words, you could export a half-pension under the new rules. Currently, of course, this is not possible since there are no partial pensions.

QUESTION: How are former residents of Canada treated under present rules, and how would the new rules affect them?

ANSWER: If they have resided here for a full 40 years after age 18, former residents can receive their full pension abroad at age 65. If they have less than 40 years residence in Canada, however, they may qualify under the "three for one" rule—but they have to return to Canada and reside here during the year preceding commencement of the pension. Under the new rules, a former resident of Canada with at least 20 years of prior legal residence here after age 18 would be entitled to receive a portion of the full pension abroad at age 65, without returning to Canada.

QUESTION: To whom would the new residence rules apply?

ANSWER: After a transition period of 40 years, to everybody.

That is something I will have to look into. This is an example where we do not know what the minister is talking about. It seems obvious, but we will have to ask quite a few questions.

During the transition period, however, only to residents of Canada under the age of 25 when the new rules come into force, and to anyone, irrespective of age, who at that time, is not residing in Canada, has not had prior legal residence here after the age of 18, or does not hold an immigrant visa.

Persons 25 and over residing in Canada, having had prior legal residence here after the age of 18 or holding an immigrant visa when the new rules come into force, will have the opportunity, as they have now, to qualify for a full pension under the existing residence requirements. If they cannot qualify for a full pension under the existing rules, they could receive a partial pension related to their years of residence in Canada, under the new rules.

That is the part I am talking about regarding the immigrant.

QUESTION:. Would the new rules affect pensions already in pay?

ANSWER: The proposed amendments would not affect OAS pensions currently in pay nor would they apply to persons who, when the proposed new rules come into force, are 25 years of age or over and are residents of Canada, have had prior legal residence here after the age of 18, or hold an immigrant visa, unless those persons so elect.

It is with regard to these types of matters that the minister should ensure sufficient publicity is given, because at first blush it is extremely complicated. Let us get into the other matter which of course is of some importance. This question affects some 500,000 people in this country as well as those who intend to come here. It can be generally stated that all countries pay pensions, if available, to all within their own respective territories, but there is a difference if the person begins to reside abroad. We are now getting into the reciprocal agreement matter which I believe is important. It is necessary, and we should ensure that it is implemented as soon as possible. The differences to which I have referred include things such as some pay abroad under certain conditions, and some pay abroad to eligible nationals. For example, Canada and the United Kingdom pay abroad to nationals and aliens, but the United States pays aliens abroad if they are nationals of countries which pay social security benefits abroad in full to beneficiaries who are United States' nationalists. That is important. It will be seen that there are a lot of "if" and "but" approaches to security in terms of who gets what, depending on where you were born and what you contributed before you left the country.

There are problems with regard to increases, particularly as this system applies to those who live in the United Kingdom, France and Italy. Adjustments to Canada old age security, etc., are paid abroad because of our present legislation. The United Kingdom pays such increases abroad only to countries which have reciprocal agreements or arrangements on social security. It is interesting to note that there is such an agreement with the United States and the United Kingdom, but lo and behold, the same, necessary agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom is not yet in effect. That is what we are dealing with now.

Since 1959, the United Kingdom, with the consent of Canada, pays its pensions to persons returning from Canada who have failed the residence test. This is a unilateral arrangement, no obligation being incurred on the Canadian side and it confers no advantage on persons moving from the United Kingdom. If you live in some parts of the United Kingdom, you may get an increase or the possibility of indexing, but once you are here you do not get that. That is what this bill will allow people to acquire, if I understand it correctly.

At present, the United Kingdom feels that the cost of increases falls on contributors and employers in the United Kingdom, and therefore it is unreasonable and unfair to pay such increases to those outside the country. However, this policy can be modified by reciprocal agreements covering matters of the social security of people moving between these two countries and effecting avoidance of dual liability for contributions, the combining of periods of residence and labour force attachment in countries for benefit purposes, and a transfer of benefits of all kinds from one country to another. Under this type of reciprocal agreement, they usually include a provision enabling increases to be paid in either country.

In the meantime, a limited social security agreement exists between the United Kingdom and Canada designed to benefit persons returning to Britain from Canada after substantial periods of residence in Canada who fail to qualify for the Canadian old age security pension. I am using the United Kingdom as an example because I was able to get more information on it than others. The United Kingdom, in an exchange of letters with the Canadian government in 1959, undertook to pay United Kingdom pensions to such persons if they satisfied the same conditions as to age and United Kingdom residence as are applied by the Canadian law in Canada. At present, because of the lack of legislative initiative, Canada is unable to negotiate bilateral agreements involving old age security in order to make pension benefits portable across territories.

The new amendments seek the authority to negotiate such agreements so that credits from the various countries will become collectable. Therefore, on the international level proposals are now being introduced to protect the acquired social security credits of our residents who migrate across international borders during their active years, by negotiating reciprocal agreements with other countries. This would facilitate the receipt of pension credits accumulated by immigrants in their country of origin though they now reside in Canada.

Reciprocal agreements make social security portable between contracting countries and allow for the co-ordination of their social security programs. They will close the gaps in social security coverage. For example, if one country has a retirement plan based on employment, and another country has one based on residence, the person migrating will have problems receiving adequate coverage unless some arrangements are made between the countries to recognize his contributions to both. Therefore, we are going in the right direction; there is no question about that.

Another point is that by simple agreement we will remove duplicate social security coverage. Some countries require persons to contribute to their social security programs while in the country, though not resident: for example, the United States. Another point is that we shall be using the procedures of totalizing and prorating in determining an applicant's eligibility for benefit. Totalizing allows periods of residence or contribution in each of the contracting states to be combined for the purpose of determining the person's eligibility in one or both states. As the minister said, periods in country A are considered to be periods in country B as well.

Prorating involves the calculation of the amount of benefits payable by each contracting state in proportion to the periods of residence of contribution in them. Each contracting state is responsible for calculating its portion of the benefit payable under its legislation and for paying its fraction of the composite benefit. I should like to point out that the combination of the new residency requirement and the reciprocal agreements will make the old age security program consistent with the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. At present those programs are related to actual earnings and are prorated over the time during which a person has contributed. Old age security payments are at present not prorated over the time of Canadian residency. Further, the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan are obtainable from anywhere, whereas old age security benefits can be obtained only after one year of residency immediately prior to the beginning of benefits unless one has lived in Canada for 40 years after the age of 18. I might add that at present the Canada and Quebec pension plans may be included in international social security agreements by legislative authority.

Once the bill before us is proclaimed, the federal government can begin to negotiate agreements with countries such as Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom which have expressed a desire for reciprocal agreements many times in the past. I understand other countries such as Belgium, Bermuda, Guyana, Jamaica, Malta, Norway, France and Turkey would definitely be interested.

In conclusion, I have certain questions and answers which I should like to put on record in Hansard for the edification of my colleagues and people across Canada. These are questions relating to reciprocal agreements which have been both posed and answered by the officials:

QUESTION: Would Canada and Canadian residents be net gainers under such agreements or would the other countries and their residents?

ANSWER: There can only be a complete answer to this question after we have entered into agreements, since total benefit flows between countries depend upon such factors as the number of beneficiairies who qualify, their age and length of connection to the labour force, the number of immigrants remaining in Canada and the programs included in individual agreements. Because a greater number of people come here to live than leave Canada, the balance of expenditures is likely to be in Canada's favour.

We shall have to look in some depth at that question and the answer given, Mr. Speaker. Here is the other question and answer:

[Mr. Alexander.]

QUESTION: If enacted, will the proposed legislation increase or reduce the total cost of the old age security program?

ANSWER: The proposed amendments will not alter the cost of the program to any significant degree.

That is a phrase which I do not altogether understand. It depends, I suppose, on what one means by "significant". I know the minister has touched on this aspect, but I want to put these matters on record so we shall know what answer is given at this time and compare it with the answer which might be given in the future when we ask the same question. The answer continues:

As a matter of fact, the amendments may result in a marginal reduction in the total cost of the OAS program after, say, the first ten years of operation. What will happen, however, under reciprocal social security agreements, is that a significant amount of foreign benefits which are not presently payable in Canada will become so.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to put before the House the import of the legislation and indicate the aspects to which some thought ought to be given. I would hope that the details of the legislation meet the criteria of, in the first instance, Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom, the countries which have been pressing hard for arrangements of this kind. I do not know how we can be sure of this. Possibly our ambassadors abroad keep those countries informed, or perhaps they have already seen the legislation. Are high level discussions carried on between Canadian officials and officials of those countries?

I make these comments in the hope that once this legislation is given royal assent it will not be long before we can put the old "John Henry" on the respective agreements. I hope it will not be a matter of months or years before we can bring these arrangements into operation. Let me emphasize that in the absence of reciprocal agreements immigrants will continue to be deprived of benefits earned in their former countries of residence. Other speakers from my party will touch on these matters in more detail, but you can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that we will give this bill top priority to see that those who have been denied for so long will at last be given benefits they so richly deserve.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the things this bill does are good. We shall therefore give it not only our consideration but our support. A sentence like that carries with it the implication that there are some things which the bill fails to do, and before I end my remarks I shall refer to some of those shortcomings and urge the government to give consideration to those matters as well. However, I should first deal with the bill which is before us.

We welcome the proposed changes. As I was listening to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I went through two or three cycles of trying to decide what to say to him. At times he annoyed me, but I thought: No, this is not a time to be critical. I finally decided that instead of trying to answer him or attack him for some of the things he said, I would make an appeal to him. My appeal is based on the fact that what is most needed in Canada with respect to this bill is an understanding of it. My appeal to the hon. member and to his colleagues in the Progressive Conservative party is that they join with all of us in the House in helping to explain this measure to the people of Canada, instead of nitpicking at it, as I am afraid he did in much of his speech this afternoon.

This is not a bill which has been thrown at us out of the blue. I know it did not get first reading until January 31, which is eight days ago, not three, but I also know that ideas such as those expressed in this legislation were first discussed in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs some three or four years ago.

• (1630)

I also know that on April 14, 1976, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) made a statement in the House as to the government's intentions, and this bill is practically in line with those intentions. There was also a briefing session a few days ago to which all of us could go. So I suggest that we are not taken by surprise today; we knew what was coming. Furthermore, many of the provisions that are in this bill answer problems and questions that we have raised from time to time. So because what is mainly needed is an explanatory role, I hope that all of us in the House of Commons will join in that role.

I might take just a moment to say that I do smile at a piece of legislation which puts in it a proposal for its maturity not to be reached for 40 years. The suggestion is that somehow the arrangements set in this bill will be there intact for 40 years. Sir, the first old age pension act agreed to by both Houses of Parliament was passed in 1926, and old age pensions under the original regime came into effect in Canada in 1927, just about 50 years ago this very month. I have not taken the trouble to count how many changes we have made in our pension legislation in those 50 years, but I would say it is in the order of 25 to 30 times that we have amended our pension legislation. So I suspect that this new legislation will not stay just as it is for 40 years; there will be lots of changes down the road. I take it from the minister's smile that he takes the same attitude that I take in this regard.

An hon. Member: You will still be here then.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, Mr. Speaker, I was aware of the beginnings of old age pensions. I was aware of the battle that was put up by the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth. I have been here through most of the changes that have been made, so I thank my hon. friend for his invitation that I continue to be a member of this House until this bill has reached its full maturity.

I have indicated that my general response to this bill is favourable. For, after all, it is, in what it does, a housekeeping matter; it sorts out technical problems rather than changing any policy. Even at the risk of repeating what the minister said, may I indicate some of the things that it does which I think are good. First of all, it solves in a rational way the problem of Canadians who have lived here before they reached the age of 65 and who feel they have some entitlement to a pension from the country they have lived in, even though they have moved away. At the moment, the rules requiring residence for the last ten years, or coming back for a year, or the "three for one" rule, are indeed complicated, but the new legislation will put it on a very simple basis. Anyone who has been in Canada since the age of 18, no matter when he goes away, will be able to get that many fortieths of the pension that there are years he was here following the age of 18. So it solves that particular problem for many Canadians.

We have all had the experience of hearing about many Canadians who have gone abroad and who would like to get a pension. We write to them and say that there is a way they can do so, but it means coming back to Canada for a certain length of time. This is impossible in some cases, and costly in others, so it is not very practical. This is a practical, sensible way to solve this problem, and we welcome it.

Secondly, it does something for a great many Canadians who are here now, particularly persons who have come here from the United Kingdom. I have noticed the interest with which the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) have been following this legislation. If the correspondence I get from their constituents is an indication of the correspondence that they get, then they know, as I know, that there are many persons in that part of Canada as well as in other parts who came here from the United Kingdom and other countries who have pensions from those countries which are frozen because there is no basis for a reciprocal agreement respecting pensions between Canada and their country of origin.

Once this bill is passed and the agreements have been drawn up, this particular problem will be solved. People from the United Kingdom and from other countries who are living in Canada and whose pensions from their country of origin are frozen will have their pensions from their homelands escalated, so for them this legislation is good.

It will also do something for many persons in Canada who have come from a number of countries where they earned pension rights that they are not getting at all. Never mind getting a pension on a frozen basis, Mr. Speaker; many of them are not getting a pension at all because they have come to a different land and there is no reciprocal agreement. As the minister said in his introductory remarks, there are probably 500,000 people in these two categories living in Canada who will see an improvement in the amount of the pension they are receiving once this legislation goes through and the reciprocal agreements which are made possible under it are put into effect. This is good, and I think we should say so.

The only persons about whom there is any question as to what is going to happen are those persons not yet here, who do not have visas, and may not even be planning to come. These are people who come here, after this legislation is in effect, at the age of 45, 50, 55, and who will not be able to get, in the space of ten years, the full pension that such persons now here are able to get. What we should say to them, apart from the element of fairness which the minister, I thought, dealt with quite adequately, is that the reciprocal arrangements which are possible mean that these people may well be able to get, when they do come to Canada, a pension that they have earned in their original place of residence—or original places, if they have been in two or three countries—together with a portion of the Canadian old age security pension. In the end, they can probably be just as well off, perhaps even better off. The total amount of pensions they have earned in various countries could well amount to more than the basic old age security pension in this country.

It must also be said with respect to these people, despite the criticisms that I still register against the means test which applies to the guaranteed income supplement, that it is available to them in full. Therefore, the only people who can have any doubts about their being treated fairly under this legislation are, as I say, immigrants who come to Canada after the legislation is in effect, people in the 50 to 55 age bracket. But the fact is that when the whole package is put in place these people can be just as well off as they are now, or even better. Let me emphasize the fact that the legislation makes it very clear that there are no changes for any persons who are in Canada now and who are over 25 years of age. There are no changes for persons who have visas to get here now, or by the time this legislation comes into effect.

Some remarks were made a while ago about public servants. I am getting tired of these attacks that are made on public servants on the floor of this House. If there is one place where we ought to appreciate public servants, Mr. Speaker, it is here, where we know the work that they do for us. As one who raised questions on this kind of thing three or four years ago in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, I applaud the work that some hard working public servants have obviously done with respect to working out these details. Perhaps the minister would like me to give him all the credit for it, but I am not going to do so. He has to lay down policies. But I suggest that the detailed work done in order to see that there is fairness down the line was work that was done by these public servants.

There was the suggestion that they should get out of their offices and go out into the country and see what things are like. I do not worry about public servants going out of their offices. I wish that more members of the House would talk to old age pensioners and would realize how urgent are their needs—and I will be coming to them a little later when I talk about aspects that are not included in this bill. In any case, I am making it clear, without any question, that in so far as this bill is a housekeeping measure, in so far as it makes certain changes to the structure of the legislation, I think it is good and should have our support.

Yes, we have to take the bill into committee. Yes, we have to ask questions and get them answered, although our questions have been pretty well answered already in the material we have had in the last ten months. This was not thrown at us overnight, and much of the material which has been given to us in the last ten months has been given to us because over the years we have been asking for this kind of thing. So I urge very strongly that in respect of this piece of legislation we display co-operation amongst the members of the various parties in this House in explaining to the country and to the people concerned that what we are really doing is improving our old age security legislation.

I would like to turn to a few of the details—if I have not already been referring to details—and make a comment or two. I do so because of some of the strange things I have heard in radio and television announcements. It is really startling how they get things twisted. I heard a report one night that there was to be a new rule requiring ten years' residence in Canada before a person can get the old age pension. That rule has been there since the beginning of time. There is nothing new about a ten-year rule. It was always there. I heard references to the 20-year rule in order to take the pension away from Canada. That has been the rule for a long time. It used to be 25 years, but it was reduced to 20 years. As a matter of fact, it used to be that no pension was paid outside of Canada at all, so there is certainly no detraction in that from the rights which are now enjoyed.

Then there is another line I hear from some of these commentators, who know it all once they have heard a newscast or two, to the effect that the new rules are going to be discriminatory and that we are going to have two or three classes of Canadians. Well, one thing has to be said about this bill: it puts everybody on an equal basis whether he was born here and stays, born here and goes away, born here, goes away and comes back, or comes as an immigrant. No matter what the basis is, citizen or not, it puts everyone on the same basis. The amount of basic old age security a person will get at age 65 depends on the number of years that person has resided in the country after age 18. It is far from being discriminatory, in my view, because it puts everyone on an equal basis.

Speaking of these criticisms which are made, like other hon. members in the House I am called sometimes by radio stations for comment. I was called one day a while ago by a hotliner who wanted my views on this new bill. I could tell from the initial questions that the MC of that show wanted critical appraisal, but to his amazement I began to say a few good things about it, before I got to the things which are missing. But he broke in and said "Well, Mr. Knowles, it is obvious that you favour the bill, so may I ask you a question about something else?" If I was not going to attack something brought in by the government of the day, he wanted to change the subject.

Mr. Lalonde: He did not phone me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should say that I said "Well, just a minute. What I have said, I stand by; but I also want to tell you what is wrong about the bill, mainly because of some things which are not there". However, in saying that I suppose I was saying the same thing I am saying to my friends to the right, that since what we have here is a housekeeping bill which tries to make the rules more fair, let us do our best as members of parliament in all parties to help the people of Canada understand it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Speaking of details, I warmly welcome—in fact, the minister noted that I applauded him when he was talking about it—the inclusion of clause 7 in this bill. It removes that ridiculous situation under which grandparents, in particular, when receiving the family allowance for grandchildren they might be caring for had that counted as income against their guaranteed income supplement. When I raised this with the minister both in the House and privately, I admitted to him that I did not think there were very many cases, but because it was wrong I contended it should be corrected. I was interested today when he told us that there are about 10,000 such cases. At any rate, I am pleased that this is being corrected.

One detail which bothered me a bit when I was studying the bill line by line and comma by comma was the requirement that only a full year would count toward the number of years against the 40, and that there would be no fractional years. As I thought about that, it struck me that it could be quite unfair for a person at age 65 to have been in the country, say, 31 years and 11 months, when the next person had been here 32 years and 2 days and one gets thirty-one fortieths and the other gets thirty-two fortieths, despite the very slight difference.

I confess that at first thought I would have put it to the minister that there should be some fractionalizing of the years, but then I think I saw the answer to it myself, and I am giving it now so that if it is not right the minister can correct me at some stage. As I see it, there is no compulsion to apply for the pension at the exact time of a person's sixty-fifth birthday. In other words, if at age 65 a person has 34 years and 11 months, he could delay his application for a month until he has the full 35 years and get thirty-five fortieths. Let us go a little closer. If a person has 39 years and 10 or 11 months at age 65, he could wait a month or two and get the full amount.

I do not expect an answer today, but it is the kind of thing we might deal with in committee. I raise this matter mainly to emphasize my contention that what is needed principally with respect to this legislation is a widespread effort to publicize it so that people will understand it, and if what I have said about these full years as against the 40 years is correct, I think there has to be particularly helpful information given to people so that they will not make the mistake of applying a month too soon, when by applying a month later they might have got a pension of a larger size.

I noticed with interest that the guaranteed income supplement and, presumably, assistance under Canada Assistance Plan projects or things related to that will be available to those, when the plan gets into full force, who are here for only 10 or 15 years. I hope that fact will be widely publicized, along with the information about the totalizing of pensions earned in various countries, so that Canadians will realize in the years that lie ahead that in the total picture they are going to do just as well under this plan as they might have done under the old rules, and that many will do a great deal better.

So it all adds up to the fact that many people are going to gain by this legislation. All those Canadians who feel the country has become too cold and that they have to leave it at age 55 or 60 are going to be able to get, if not the full then a partial pension abroad. United Kingdom pensioners and those from other countries who are here and are not getting an escalation of their pensions from back home, will get it here. People here from other countries who have been denied the pensions to which they have contributed and which they have earned in other countries are going to get them if the reciprocal agreements are put into effect. So the total picture, as I say, as provided under this legislation is good and I hope we will be prepared to say so and do our best to explain it to the people of this country.

I said at the start that what this bill does is good, and that therefore we support it, but I have to say that I am thoroughly disappointed in the things that it fails to do. For all the speeches the government can make about the improvements that have been made in pensions for the aged in the last 50 years—and it can be quite a story from the original $20 or from the $75 that it was not many years ago to the $141.34 which is the current basic amount—the fact is that the amounts given to our senior citizens still fall far below the poverty lines that are established by many social welfare bodies.

Talking about escalation keeping the pension up to the cost of living is meaningless to those who did not have enough in the first place, and I regret very much that at a time when the government is bringing in an over-all rewriting of the Old Age Security Act it is not at the same time increasing the basic amount of the pension.

I had a motion last Friday in the private members' hour which was talked out—that is the usual course—suggesting $250 for the basic pension, and I had in mind that the other amounts paid under the supplement could be on top of that. That would be a little closer to figures such as those which the Toronto social welfare people proposed not many weeks ago. At any rate, in my view something that ought to be in this bill is an increase in the basic amount of the pension. I know that these are not the best times to call for increases, when there is so much talk about restraint.

On a more personal note, I want to recount what happened to me around Christmas time. I see the public servants whom I was commending a moment ago—some of them, at any rate—sitting up in the gallery. What they think is their business, but let me say that I received a Christmas card this year from one who used to sit up in the official gallery at times like this. Obviously, I will not name him, but of all the Christmas cards I received, it was one I particularly enjoyed. To paraphrase it, he said, "Thank you, Stanley, for keeping up the battle for improved social security in a hostile period." That is what it is. It is a difficult time in which to press for and expect to make gains in the old age pension legislation.

So many people say that we have done enough for senior citizens, and the government boasts about all the changes that have been made. Despite the hostility of the times, the needs of our senior citizens are still very real, and when we get into committee the minister will find me completely on his side with regard to the housekeeping changes in this bill but he will find me fighting as hard as ever for what I think should be in the bill, namely, a substantial increase in the basic amount.

Also, I wish to express disappointment at the fact that there is nothing in the bill regarding a change in the formula for indexing. It is simply not good enough to have a formula that relates to the general cost of living instead of to the cost of living that applies to senior citizens as such. It is not good enough to have a formula that is always running two, three, four or five months behind. The time when pensioners need an increase in the amount they receive is when the costs are going up, and it does not help them to meet their former costs to get an increase three, four or five months later for the period that lies ahead.

In these days of modern computers, when just about anything can be sorted out, I contend that we should have an indexing system which keeps the levels of pensions on a current basis related to the current cost of living. I would go much further, as I have from the start of this whole question, and contend that pensioners should get their pensions indexed not just in relation to the cost of living but in relation to the standard of living; in relation, shall I say, to the gross national product. If our senior citizens have played their part in helping to make it possible for the country to produce the wealth that it can produce today, and if that process continues to improve after they retire, they should not be condemned just to the level of living at the point of retirement. They should share in the improvements, and I shall be arguing in the committee for improvements in the whole indexing arrangements in the Old Age Security Act.

I have my eye on the clock now and then, Mr. Speaker. I know that my 40 minutes will not be up by five o'clock, but I shall try to complete my remarks by that time so that whoever comes next will know he will have the floor at eight o'clock.

The other thing I have to say—and I will say it as strongly as I was arguing 35 years ago for lowering the age from 70 to 65—is that the time has come to lower the eligible age for old age security and for the Canada Pension Plan to age 60. My friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West, had a good deal to say about the work ethic and about people having the right to work, the right to be involved, and so on. Certainly, we old-timers like my friend, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), myself and a few others around here who are in the category that was described a while ago, want to be involved; but the people I know who are older and who want to be involved are not asking to get back into the rat-race. They want the kind of security that will enable them to get involved in things that are interesting to them, things in which they can make a contribution.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

What I am asking for is not compulsory retirement at age 60, not an insistence that everyone must get a pension at that age, but that it should be available to them, and the pensions that should be available are old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. For all the good things that I have said about this bill—because its housekeeping changes are good—I have to be as critical as I can that for all we have said on this matter there is no reference to it in the bill. But you cannot rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, for talking about something that is not in the bill, because the bill confirms the age of 65 as the minimum age; it confirms the present figure of the basic old age security. But this is the time when both of these features should be changed.

I see my time is almost up; at least it is almost five o'clock. Let me say, however, that in conjunction with the insistence that there be a pension available at the age of 60, the time has come to put that kind of program into place instead of the spouse's allowance. Everything the hon. member for Hamilton West, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and others of us have said about this when it was before us a year and a half ago is still true, that it is most unfair to discriminate against spinsters, widows, bachelors and widowers, that it is unfair to deny them full benefits on the basis of a marital test. Persons who run into it now cannot understand how parliament ever passed such a law.

Mr. Alexander: We tried our best.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The time has come to replace that unfair and discriminatory piece of legislation with what would be fair, namely, old age security and the Canada Pension Plan available on a voluntary basis at age 60 to all those who are out of the labour market.

So the minister will have our support for the bill for the good things that it does in straightening out the rules about old age security, but he will have our continuing campaign for the real improvements that need to be made, and in the main those real improvements are a substantial increase in the basic amounts of the pension and a lowering of the age to 60 for all those who are out of the labour market.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)—Social Security—Suggested reduction to 60 of eligible age for retirement to create employment for young people; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Agriculture—Attitude of government towards marketing board for beef cattle with supply-management powers; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock

(Mr. Friesen)—Customs—Purchasing of groceries in United States by residents of British Columbia—Government action.

It being five o'clock, the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall all the orders preceding order No. 109 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): They stand at the request of the government.

ENERGY

MEASURE RESPECTING DOMESTIC AND INDUSTRIAL USE OF SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved that Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill before us today is to focus the attention of the House on the urgency of developing the potential of renewable energy resources and to suggest ways in which this can be achieved. But first let me thank, through you, sir, the leaders of the opposition parties for their permission to have this bill come up for debate today, replacing another bill of mine. May I also thank the government for having indicated its disposition, through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Faulkner), to allow this bill to go to committee for further consideration.

● (1700)

When I introduced this bill for the first time in June, 1976, the concept of using the sun to produce power for the immediate benefit of mankind was known only to small groups of Canadians who were intrigued by the idea of harnessing the sun. But now, less than a year later, solar energy has become almost a household word; hardly a week goes by without seeing a newspaper in this country publish an article on the subject. It is clear that Canadians are interested in the solar option and that they are beginning to recognize its advantages as an environmentally safe and clean energy source.

As to the potential of solar energy, a number of estimates have been made. According to page 104 of the report entitled "An Energy Strategy For Canada", issued last year by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, by 1990 renewable resources could supply up to 6 per cent of Canada's primary energy requirements if backed by a vigorous development program. According to the Middleton report, also published last year, by the year 2020, close to 20 per cent of Canada's energy needs may be supplied by renewable resources. I believe that decisions taken this year by the government will determine how much of this potential will be realized.

At a time when energy shortages and the exhaustion of non-renewable resources are predicted, these estimates and forecasts tell us that the attention of mankind must turn to the alternative of renewable sources of energy, such as solar energy which includes wind, tidal, biomass and geothermal. For the sake of future generations, solar energy offers an option we must explore and develop to the fullest. By developing the potential offered by the solar option, for example, we may be able to reduce our dependence on nuclear power with its inherent and dangerous problem of the disposal of spent fuel. Reducing our dependence on nuclear power would be an important step, particularly because we know that nuclear power stations are likely to proliferate throughout the world in decades to come.

The development of solar energy is no longer a "pie in the sky" notion. At the present time we have in Canada some 35 houses partially or completely heated by solar energy which incorporate either air or water storage systems. Funds have been invested from both the public and private sector. The federal government, under the auspices of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and through the National Research Council, is currently sponsoring 21 solar-heated buildings, 12 of which utilize water storage. In the private sector, 14 houses have been built, including six which use water storage. These are by no means complete figures, but they show that Canadians already have become actively involved in developing and demonstrating solar energy technology. These efforts, of course, need to be taken a step further.

Bill C-309 proposes the creation of an institute—if you like, an agency—that would pursue a number of tasks aimed at the fullest exploitation of the solar option. The agency which would bring under one roof all responsibilities pertaining to the research and development of solar energy technology, as was done for nuclear energy a few decades ago, would (a) undertake research leading to the development of solar energy technology for domestic and industrial purposes. At present, responsibility for the renewable energy program is divided among the Department of Science and Technology, through the National Research Council, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, and the Department of Agriculture. Then (b), it would actively stimulate and assist in the establishment of a Canadian industry producing solar energy equipment through programs like the new Enterprise Development Program sponsored by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There is a good prospect that thousands of new jobs will be created if we undertake the development of solar technology, not only suitable to the Canadian climate but designed for use by developing countries as well. Then (c), it would inform the public about the uses of solar energy and encourage public participation in energy conservation; and (d), help developing nations interested in developing their own solar technology.

The establishment of an institution of solar application would help to encourage the development and utilization of solar energy in this country and abroad, but we must also take a number of other steps aimed at giving increased momentum to the development of the solar option in Canada. Here are the steps I would urge the federal government to take. First, reallocate energy research and development funds to stimulated the development of renewable resources, because close to 70 per cent of energy research and development funds are currently devoted to nuclear energy and only about 8 per cent to solar energy research.

It is important to note that the United States, in one fiscal year alone, is spending some $280 million for research and development in solar energy. But we must not be content to sit back and let the United States do the work for us. Solar energy technology suited to the Canadian climate is a Canadian concern. The development of a solar industry would create thousands of jobs in this country in years to come as a result of our efforts.

Second, I would urge the government to increase the development, within the research and development, of solar heating systems utilizing crushed stone rather than water storage. This would be less expensive and more within reach of the average home owner. Third, I would urge the government immediately to begin to define rights to light and wind—the legal ownership of the sun—and prepare model legislation which would guarantee the rights of solar consumers and investors. The assurance in law that due access rights to sunlight and wind are safeguarded is what is needed at the present time.

Fourth, I would urge the government to provide in the next budget tax credits for Canadians who retrofit or build new houses which include solar heating or wind energy equipment. Fifth, I would urge the government to establish next summer an employment program for students who have advanced architectural and engineering training to develop innovative uses of solar technology suited to the Canadian climate. Sixth, I would urge the government to organize yearly a national award competition sponsored by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to stimulate the interest of the private sector in solar energy and to recognize Canadians who make an outstanding contribution to the development and utilization of solar technology in the broadest meaning of the term.

Seventh, I would urge the government to build in the national capital region a solar-heated house affordable by the average Canadian which would demonstrate the viability of solar heating to the millions of visitors who come to Ottawa each year. Eighth, I would urge the government to encourage Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to accelerate its development and demonstration of the mini-utility concept for urban centres. Finally, I would urge the government to participate actively in the International Energy Agency—IEA—in Paris in efforts to arrive at a solar energy technology which will benefit developing nations.

Because of the nature of our country, any leadership given by the federal government—and here I want to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) for introducing in the last budget the exemption from federal sales tax for solar and energy conserving items—must be matched by provincial governments, by hydro commissions, by municipalities, by architects, builders and developers.

The following are recommendations I would urge these other jurisdictions to consider: hydro commissions could introduce hydro rates that would reward the careful consumer. At present, we have the absurd situation whereby the more energy one consumes, the lower the cost charged per kilowatt hour. Further, hydro commissions could make available lower hydro rates to homes which have solar heating systems installed. Provincial governments could follow the example set by the federal government and remove provincial taxes for the sale of solar and energy-conserving equipment. Municipalities could provide, for instance, a ten-year tax reduction on properties where there is a solar heated home. Large municipalities, such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, could pass a bylaw requiring that building plans should be approved according to the basic guidelines of energy conservation. Finally, builders and developers could co-operate in this common venture by designing homes which would have one or more of the following features: orientation with maximum exposure to the sun; optimal window orientation to south and southwest and minimal orientation to the north; insulation according to the highest energy conservation standards; and incorporation of solar heating systems.

● (1710)

Before concluding, may I say that since introducing this bill last June I have been encouraged by the many letters received from Canadians across the country. I am also encouraged by the fact that the government is well disposed to having this bill sent to committee, and to this end I today seek the co-operation of hon. members of this House.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me quote the inscription visitors see at the entrance of the Ark, the solar heated and operated building in Prince Edward Island inaugurated last fall by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It reads:

The Ark—an early exploration in weaving together the sun, winds, biology and architecture on behalf of humanity.

What was early exploration yesterday is already practical application today. We are witnessing in Prince Edward Island and across the country the shaping of a new facet in the ancient, many-sided relationship between man and nature for the betterment of mankind and with full respect to the environment.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, first, may I express my pleasure that Bill C-309 is before the House for debate. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is proposing that efforts of the federal government toward the development and application of renewable energy resources be carried out and co-ordinated by one agency, an institute of solar energy application. The job of the institute would be to guide research and development in the solar energy field, to encourage the growth in Canadian industry producing solar energy equipment and parts, and to increase public awareness of the uses of solar energy.

In days gone by this would probably have been considered a unique debate, a debate on the subject of a Canadian use and development of solar energy. As the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), said:

> Our own time has been caught up with its own ironies. Recent political developments have abruptly fractured the industrialized world's petroleum supply. Gaping cracks have been uncovered in the energy systems of most countries. We have been forced to realize how single-minded was our energy planning.

Rising costs of conventional energy production necessitates an interest in alternative, renewable energy technologies. We must provide the framework to determine which sources, technologies and applications may be appropriate in this country and when and under what conditions they may be technically and economically viable. Principal sources of renewable energy, solar radiation, wind and biomass, as well as waves and thermal gradients must be reviewed to establish in general terms their significance in the Canadian context. The technical characteristics, efficiency, costs and impact, must be delineated as an information base upon which to build an assessment potential.

Canada can claim a world leadership role in the following areas: longer term thermal storage, solar-powered air-conditioning, vertical axis wind generators, honeycomb solar collectors, and appropriate technology for developing countries. This suggests that significant opportunities exist in Canada for industrial development to serve indigenous and foreign markets.

We are aware of the problem and we must decide to do something about it. The potential of new energy technologies, for instance, cannot be neglected. If, as some predict, solar energy will provide about 1 per cent of our total energy supply in 15 years, there could be up to $11 billion for the sectors involved. In the long run, the use of renewable energy resources is inevitable. Studies for the Science Council of Canada indicate that by the year 2000 renewable energy will contribute between 5 per cent and 10 per cent of Canada's energy requirements. If one includes hydroelectricity, which is in itself a renewable resource, this rises to 20 per cent. By 2025 it will probably have increased to some 30 per cent. Our only real choice is whether these technologies will be Canadian or imported. Peter Middleton, for example, in his report entitled "Canada's Renewable Energy Resources: An Assessment of Potential", has calculated that over a 25-year period starting in 1979 the total cost of heating a house with a solar system providing 70 per cent of space heating requirements would only be 13 per cent higher than an all oil-heated home, but some 30 per cent less than a totally electrically heated home. His assumption takes into account an annual inflation rate of 5 per cent, mortgage costs, and a 5 per cent annual rise in oil and electricity prices. Considering that oil has risen by 40 per cent in the last two years, his assumptions are conservative and suggest that solar energy may soon cross the threshold of economic competitiveness.

The establishment of the solar energy application act will provide a base from which to cast about for new opportunities to fill a real national need for the technologies and systems that will eventually permit us to enjoy stability and a balance in energy supply. Renewable energies will be an important component of the next cycle of industrial development. Canada has either missed previous opportunities or allowed markets to be served by subsidiaries of multinational corporations primarily headquartered in the United States. We are in a position now to determine how much industrial activity should be located in Canada and to preserve and protect ownership and technological sovereignty.

We must consider that one of our most basic needs and largest undertakings is energy. The objective of current energy policy in the industrialized countries has been characterized as "strength through exhaustion". We must move away from depleting our capital of non-renewable reserves toward devising ways to live off the income of the sustained energy flows from sunshine, wind, the tides and the waves. Canada is not alone in the world. We do not have the expertise developed here, but we have the opportunity to develop it so that those who have been successful in Canada do not find it necessary to import certain of their requirements.

I say this as one who is strongly of the belief that a focal point should be established to encourage and promote the establishment in Canada of an intensive research capability leading to the development of a technology that will permit the use of solar energy for domestic and industrial purposes as a viable alternative to non-renewable resources. I therefore look forward to this bill going to committee.

I would like to conclude by mentioning that the scientific community recognizes the importance of the energy crisis and has set about to make sure that parliamentarians are aware of the scientific facts in this and other important scientific areas. The vehicle for this communication is the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee whose second meeting next Tuesday, February 15, will be dealing in detail with the question of renewable energy resources as it applies to Canada. I urge all hon. members to attend this meeting in order to update their knowledge on this most important question which will so seriously affect all mankind.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the private member's bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is commendable in many ways. I hope it will not suffer the fate of most other private members' bills and be talked out. About ten minutes before the hon. member's bill was called this afternoon I decided to look at its subject matter and then, without the opportunity to prepare a speech, decided to speak on it. I have studied alternate forms of energy and will propose, before my remarks are concluded, that this bill should be sent to committee. I have some things I would like to say about it.

● (1720)

The hon. member named the institute of solar energy application. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) went quite a bit further. I do not think there is any reason for our restricting the institute, if that is what it is to be, strictly to solar energy. There is need for a good deal of research into the many other forms of energy which the hon. member for Wellington mentioned. They include tides, thermal, wind and perhaps others that do not come to mind. During the serious storm in Prince Edward county a week ago there was enough wind, if properly applied, to melt all the snow. The winds were 70 kilometres per hour. If that force had been properly harnessed, there would not have been that problem.

I have to ask the hon. member for Davenport: Why a new institute? He listed five or six agencies, I can recall a few that are now involved in looking at solar energy. I have a very strong suspicion that what we are getting into here might be just one more agency, as happened with Information Canada. When Information Canada was formed, it did not in any way reduce the public relations departments of any of the branches of government. In fact, there was just one more branch disseminating information, and not always in the most economical way.

I wonder why we need another institute. We already have the National Research Council. I have dealt with that institution in a number of capacities over the years. For a country as small as Canada, that council is exceptionally intelligent, well formed and capable of doing the job that is needed here. The one thing they frequently do not have is the financial support of the government. The last clause of the hon. member's bill reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to require an appropriation of public revenue or an expenditure—

This is a matter of the utmost priority, and we should not be afraid of spending some funds on it. If I had the time—and I do not, because some hon. members opposite are anxious to contribute to the debate—I would list all the things the government has spent money on which did not produce anything worth while. Surely, on a matter as important as this, we could spend a fair bit of money. The money that went into the Bonaventure would accomplish a lot with regard to solar energy. I had better not get carried away and list all the things on which the government has wasted money which would have been better spent on this project. Therefore, research without expenditure does not make sense: we should spend money on it.

What exactly does the hon. member for Davenport have in mind with this institute? There are a number of things that it or the National Research Council might do. One is to provide a forum for ideas. In the reading I have done, I have found all kinds of ideas for alternate forms of energy. I was recently at a gathering in the city of Belleville. A gentleman there indicated to me that he had what he felt was the finest idea to produce solar energy that anyone could think of. He wanted to know whether the government could provide him with some help to develop it. I had to tell him that no agency of government would give him any help to develop that sort of thing. That is perhaps not too bad because in a country of free enterprise it should be incumbent upon an inventor to get his first-off copy ready and ask for a patent.

If the institute suggested by the hon. member, or the National Research Council, were to function properly, this could provide a forum whereby this man could come to Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, or wherever, to meet people with considerable knowledge in the field. He could discuss his idea in complete confidence. If he had something different, or better, they would assist him to patent it, rather than steal his idea. They could encourage him, or perhaps show him that his idea had been tried before and found wanting. It is very difficult in this day and age to find a brand new idea, one that has not been thought of before. If this institute were funded, it could assist to the production stage, if necessary, of an invention that was worth while.

I was intrigued to read in this morning's Globe and Mail that four Australian physicists claim a solar energy breakthrough. They claim that they can collect over 2½ times and deliver 2 times the temperature of the collector plates. That is indeed a remarkable breakthrough. It is something for which anyone interested in solar energy has been looking. In a northern climate such as ours, with the conventional solar plates in a field or on the roof of a house you can collect temperatures of up to 75 degrees to 100 degrees Celsius. However, to produce and deliver heat beyond that point to where it does a reasonable job is not an easy task. That is something these physicists claim they can do; they claim they can deliver heat energy up to 250 degrees Celsius. With that kind of delivery they are capable of generating other forms of energy such as electricity. They could heat major commercial or industrial buildings, as well as residential. With that kind of energy they would be capable of producing enough heat to allow for storage to carry through cloud or non-sun cycles.

Perhaps this institute, or a branch of the National Research Council, might discuss with their colleagues in Australia the method they have come up with. As I have said, it could be a forum for ideas that would ultimately come up with something we could use. The hon. member's bill reads in part:

> —encourage and promote the establishment in Canada of an industry producing solar energy equipment and parts.

To a free enterprise Conservative, that sounds a little bit socialistic. I would prefer to think that the institute might bring the material to the design stage, patent it so that returns can be achieved for those who have created the design, and then leave it to private industry to take up the cudgel and do the job I know they can do. There are all kinds of innovative ideas. I recently talked with a firm in Georgia that is producing a black plastic pipe the interior surface of which is over twice the exterior surface. Its unique design permits the retention of the accumulated heat of the water in the pipe at a much greater rate than would a normal plastic pipe. This is something which has not yet been made in Canada but they have been using it to heat swimming pools from California to Florida, and up into the central states as well. It is a development the institute should examine.

• (1730)

The hon. member for Davenport mentioned the problems associated with nuclear energy. I am certainly deeply involved in that subject at the present moment. Nuclear energy has been an accepted alternative to fossil fuel and hydro energy, but the waste disposal problems arising from its use are, of course, tremendous. In recent weeks there has been a furore in the central part of my riding because Atomic Energy of Canada said they wanted to dispose of, or store, depending on which term is used, the waste from the nuclear energy generating plant in Ontario at a point near Mount Moriah in the central part of my constituency. The disturbance caused among the people who live in that area was profound. The scientists who advised such a move say they cannot understand why anyone should be so disturbed. Sitting classically in their laboratories they do not appreciate the concern, the understandable concern, felt by these people—their fear of what nuclear energy can do.

The fact is that this waste has to be stored for between 100,000 and 200,000 years. This is no insignificant period when one reflects that civilization today is in the year 1977 of our Lord, and that we can only look back some 3,000 or 4,000 years before that. When we are talking about 100,000 or 150,000 years we are dealing with a time span far beyond the conception of the average individual.

It is time we began to look into alternative forms of energy. Had we not started in the nuclear energy field we would not be facing these problems today. We would not have built on the waterfront of Lake Ontario a generating plant, 50 miles from Toronto, which, if anything was damaged, could destroy a big chunk of our civilization. These are the fears our people have, and I share those fears. I am hoping to pursue this subject in a great deal more depth before I agree, if indeed I have an opportunity to agree or disagree, to the disposal of nuclear waste in Hastings county. I intend to take a good long look at this before I go much further.

There are many other developments taking place. There are the new designs in heat pumps. Now there are heat pumps that go from air to water and from water to air. This ties in with the collection of solar energy and, perhaps, energy from the wind which would give us not only the heat but the cooling we have come to expect in summertime. The same pump would serve for both operations using amounts of energy considerably less than we use now.

I have discussed the problems as I see them. I will sit down now and remind hon. members across the way that this will be the third time this session I have risen in this Chamber and agreed to allow a private member's bill to go through. I want to make that point clearly because it is something which does not happen often. It is a little humorous to find that in one case it was the government side which decided to talk a bill out even though the opposition was agreeable to letting it go through. Although I disagree with some of the proposals in the bill before us I believe the subject matter should go to the committee, at which stage I shall take a further part in the discussion. My colleagues may well be bringing in private members' bills during the balance of the session and we look forward to the same kind of reciprocal courtesy from those on the benches opposite.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) for suggesting that the bill should be referred to committee. We on this side have the same intention, which is why I shall be brief in my remarks about the bill introduced by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

[Translation]

The bill, Mr. Speaker, is based on the premise which seemed quite valid to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources because some time ago the department recognized the significance of soft energy sources and entrusted with a section of the National Research Council a rather large budget to enable it to carry out some research on the so-called soft energy sources in the field of natural resources.

As indicated by the two previous speakers, the members for Wellington (Mr. Maine) and for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), I have the same reservation about excluding in Bill C-209 other energy sources, such as waves, tides, wind, geothermic power and so on. It was perhaps the idea of the sponsor of the bill to include other energy sources and to try to avoid that increasing dependency on an energy source which is not generally accepted and my colleague, the member for Hastings, referred once again to the facilities near his constituency in Pickering, Ontario.

Nor is it clear either, Mr. Speaker, that we can entrust to a Crown corporation the care of doing research in that field, or of setting up a corporation to develop nuclear energy. It might be that a branch of the National Research Council could more appropriately develop that energy and pursue research to that end.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that another aspect of the problem has yet to be mentioned. I listened closely to the remarks of my colleague for the riding of Davenport (Mr. Caccia). Now, that right to the sun has not been defined, has not been asserted, nor is it protected. For instance, if costly facilities are erected to channel solar energy and transform it into electriciy, if that right to the sun is jeopardized by the construction neighbouring buildings whose height exceeds that of the building collecting solar energy, then we will need an act to define solar energy, to proclaim the right to the sun and protect the owner of the first building so that he can heat or light it with solar energy; otherwise, his rights be hampered by the other building.

Like those who rose before me, Mr. Speaker, I too agree that this bill should be sent to the Committee on National Resources and Public Works rather than to the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates or any other which may have been mentioned. Once again I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport on his excellent initiative in introducing this bill and I trust, like my colleague for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), that the next time a private bill is sponsored by an opposition party, it will also be deferred to a committee.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we think that the idea contained in the bill presented by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is a good one. The reason we are not speaking on it is that we do not want to see it talked out. We support the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras), moves that Bill C-309, an act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy, be now read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Caccia: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary mentioned in his brief remarks a few moments ago, it might seem to be appropriate, and there might be a general disposition, to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent to change the committee and to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION PAYABLE TO PERSONS 65 YEARS OF AGE AND OVER CONTINGENT UPON RESIDENCE IN CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-35, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the minister for bringing in various amendments to Bill C-35. Those amendments are certainly likely to eliminate many shortcomings depriving senior citizens. I dare hope that the minister will continue to bring in amendments to eliminate other shortcomings that also exist for other categories of people under the age of 65.

So it gives me great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to participate in this debate, as I said earlier, the subject of which is Bill C-35 entitled "an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act" and to make my most sincere contribution to this important question affecting closely a very large number of Canadians.

As some of my colleagues I am convinced in advance that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who is in charge of the status of women, intends to bring about through the passage of this bill major improvements to the old age security program. Among those improvements are the changes to the provisions dealing with the period of residence in Canada and prorata pension payments. In addition, one can notice, Mr. Speaker, that the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act contains a provision dealing mainly with the inclusion of the old age security program in international agreements dealing with social security.

● (2010)

This provision will allow many people to keep their social security credits if they decide to move to one country rather than another.

I agree in principle with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who said the following, which I hope you will allow me to quote, Mr. Speaker:

> The aim of these amendments is to make the Old Age Security Plan fairer, to ensure coherence among the three levels of the Canadian retirement income system (that is, old age security, the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans, and private pension plans) and to facilitate international agreements.

There is no doubt that the provisions contained in this bill will bring great advantages to some people since these proposals will first provide more equality among recipients. However, we of the Social Credit Party of Canada would have wished the government to introduce in this bill or at least to reconsider seriously and responsibly the spouse's allowance mentioned in this bill, which was introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on January 31, and to replace it by the payment of old age security pensions to everyone between 60 and 65 who is no longer in the labour force, whatever his marital status or sex. Mr. Speaker, in a study published in the Canadian Review of Sociology and Anthropology of August 1976, we could read on page 321, and I quote:

> The decrease in fecundity which has characterized the industrialized world in this century is now causing those countries in general, and Canada in particular, to face a reality with many consequences: An aging population. In Canada, this phenomenon is recent, but it is on the increase, and this tendency will continue indefinitely: The percentage of the population 65 and over could go from 7.6 percent in 1961 to 11.8 percent in 2001. Present mortality rates mean not only that a greater proportion of the population now reaches an advanced age, but also that these people survive longer.

Indeed, people are living longer than ever.

> . . . Moreover, the equality of sexes as concerns mortality means that the greater number of aged people is characterized by an unbalance favouring women: thus, the deficit of old men could reach 700,000 in the year 2001.

And further on, Mr. Speaker:

> The financial situation of the elderly is precarious: the government old age pension offers an income of only $1,600 for a single person and $3,000 for a couple, and yet this pension represents the sole income for about half of the men and three-quarters of the women. Finally, we cannot neglect the added burden imposed on the economic life of society by such an increase in the number of older persons.

Mr. Speaker, as we can plainly see the situation in Canada is very alarming. In any case, as the final purpose of our economy is first and foremost to satisfy the needs of the population, we must get down to work and do our best to find new remedies, new ideas, new incentives for our economy to insure the happiness and well being of all Canadians. Once again, we can plainly see that the time has come for us to study more closely not only the whole system of social security as it pertains to underprivileged citizens such as the elderly, but also with regards to families who, even nowadays, especially when we have a hard time making ends meet, must make do with the salary of a single person.

On various occasions in the House, I have suggested to the government, which is introducing this bill today, to increase the old age security pension not only for single persons but for married men. Like many of my colleagues, I have received over the last few years many letters from persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who want me to defend their case before the federal government, which I have done as often as possible, in order to bring pressure to bear on the government to lower to 60 the age requirement for the old age security pension.

If I remember right, this government indeed promised Canadians that as of October 1975, that is 18 months ago, spouses of OAS pensioners would receive benefits between ages 60 and 65. Unfortunately and to my most sincere regret, the government once more did not adhere in any way to their commitment. They simply failed to make everyone eligible for OAS pension at retirement age.

Mr. Speaker, every day there is the realization that pensioners do not have the income needed to live decently. Sometimes they even have to do without the basic necessities of life. To illustrate, let me refer to the case of married women below 60 who suffered some misfortune and have no source of income. Clearly theirs is not an easy kind of situation.

Here is another example of the alarming circumstances facing elderly persons. Quoting from a letter from one Mr. Tremblay from Quebec City, which appeared in Le Soleil of January 14 last: "As of January 1, 1975, anyone aged 65 or over and living anywhere in Canada can receive the Canadian pension and go on working, except in Quebec."

"Because in La belle province an individual may get his pension provided he stops working. If I earn more than $100 a month, my pension is reduced 50 cents per dollar earned over and above that amount. For the privilege of being a Quebecer, one must therefore pay a tax on one's gains, a tax on one's pension, and suffer a 50 per cent reduction on that pension. What an incentive!" The letter went on: "Such discrimination that would be judged intolerable coming from a private employer or corporation is not any fairer when extended by the government." Mr. Speaker, that reader asks for only one thing, that the Quebec government amend such a restriction in the pensions legislation to give the people one more reason to feel as happy in Quebec as elsewhere in Canada.

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to the war veterans widows who should receive benefits commensurate with their husbands' compensation where the disability pension was below 48 per cent, as suggested by Dr. Hermann in his report. I agree with him that the former-prisoners of war were greatly heartened by the passing of Bill C-92, providing them with some compensation. The government should amend the act so that widows would be paid an amount proportionate to the compensation paid their husbands where the disability pension was below 48 per cent. Because if full compensation starts at 48 per cent, those having 47 per cent disability, a 1 per cent difference, get nothing. This in my view is unfair and should be amended with the utmost priority.

Before concluding, I would like to quote from the Canadian Review of Sociology and Anthropology of August 1976, to which I already referred to: "By the way, what do people do when they go on working after age 65? In the absence of published statistics from the 1971 census on that subject, we resorted to fiscal statistics for 1972 on those who filed an income tax return in 1970: almost 65 per cent of males and 40 per cent of females aged 65 or over. The majority of them are retired civil servants or others; most of those who have no other income than their government pension have not filed any income tax return since this pension is close to the minimum taxable income; next come investors and real estate owners, relatively much more numerous among women than men.

Therefore, it is quite clear that older people depend greatly on government assistance for a living. Still in the same book, one can read a little further: "If we were to accept the reasonable suggestion that the current activity rates after age 65 would be shifted by five years, lowering retirement age from 65 to 60 would result in opening more than 200,000 jobs now occupied by men and 87,000 occupied by women. This work force represented at the 1971 census nearly half of the male unemployed and nearly a third of the female unemployed."

I admit these figures should not be interpreted indiscriminately because the jobs which would become available through this process would be of a special nature, considering that they were held by older people. However, I think it would be in our interest and in the interest of the whole Canadian people to lower retirement age to 60.

As we are all bound to try to improve the programs, I shall venture to make a last remark in this brief speech, which hopefully will be considered very seriously. It is a controversial issue and I am confident that the minister will admit this. I refer to the spouse's allowance under its present form. Since 1972, when I first entered the House of Commons, I have had to deal with various cases in which the retired spouse died less than twelve months before the normal retirement age of the recipient of the spouse's allowance. Thus, the person concerned, apart from the misfortune affecting her, was all of a sudden deprived of any income because the allowance was automatically discontinued. I admit that the related problems were only temporary in some cases. This, of course, depends on what is left to the succession. But there are also cases where the recipient has to call upon provincial welfare. That is why I think we should possibly improve our income security plan while at the same time providing the anticipated basic pension which, in the final analysis, would be a first step towards optional retirement at the age of 60.

Therefore, although I agree that there is some improvement, I want to point out that the minister has just forgotten those Canadian citizens between 60 and 65 who do not have the means or the health to fend for themselves and who are silently suffering the total indifference of this government towards them. I will take the opportunity I have here tonight to say a few words about some cases of flagrant injustice, concerning particularly the widow of a pensioner who retired at 65. The spouse is suddenly without any income after having received a full allowance during a certain time. A veteran whose incapacity has been established at 48 per cent gets a full pension, but if his incapacity is only 1 per cent less, he gets nothing. That is a case of injustice which should be rectified as soon as possible. The situation is the same for all Canadian widows and people 60 to 65 years old who are suddenly deprived of all sources of income when their spouse dies. All these people should receive a pension after an investigation proving that they are eligible for the old age security plan.

If we in the Social Credit Party of Canada continually ask for and request pensions at age 60, it is because we often meet many people who constantly come to grips with this kind of problems peculiar to the elderly, those people between 60 and 65 years.

So, Mr. Speaker, we should not forget that people aged 65 have already given to their country from forty to forty-five years of hard work which were often very difficult. They also contributed to the expansion and development of Canada. We could, therefore, easily compare them to veterans. Our war veterans went overseas to fight for our liberties and our workers stayed here to defend our rights, to clear off the land and win from it the resources necessary for the development of our country.

Given all the automation we have these days, it is not easy for such people to find employment corresponding to their abilities. Therefore, 95 per cent of them are without work and without resources. Unfortunately, under the circumstances they have to go from one office to another and suffer the humiliation of investigations and other red tape before being told that they might receive a few crumbs within the next few months.

This is, Mr. Speaker, the situation of those Canadians aged 60 to 65 who certainly deserve more consideration from a government which boasts of advocating a "just society". If it were still seeking that just society Bill C-35 should have been the ideal opportunity to give justice to the veterans' widows and to all Canadians from 60 to 65 years of age.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself only briefly to Bill C-35 because I feel it speaks well for itself.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: I see the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is going to behave a little better tonight, Mr. Speaker.

On Friday last we had an opportunity to debate the age old proposal championed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—a young friend of ours who is not always easy to convince—to lower the age eligibility requirements and increase the benefits of our various pension schemes. On that occasion I outlined some of the reasons why I think Canadians have reason to be rather proud of our record of providing financial assistance to those truly in need of a pension. However, the story does not end with what has been done so far.

Basic inequities have arisen and shall continue to arise, as circumstances change. It is to these problems, therefore, that I believe our social security legislation should be addressed. Bill C-35, proposing some timely amendments to the Old Age Security Act, provides us with an excellent example of how the government wishes to incorporate contemporary needs into a fundamentally sound principle.

Under the present structure, the old age security payment is an "either/or" proposition; either one fulfils the stated age and residency requirements and receives a flat pension, or one does not, in which case he or she receives nothing. The underlying principle is that one's pension should reflect the contribution made to Canadian society during his or her active years.

This existing scheme—and I should like to define it in order to prelude what I am going to say afterwards—sets out three ways in which the residency requirement can be attained: (a) by residing in Canada for 40 years after age 18; (b), by residing in Canada during ten consecutive years from age 55 onward; or (c), by combining elements of each of these whereby any three years in Canada between 18 and 55 can be counted toward each year of absence after 55, provided the applicant resides in Canada during the year before pension payments begin.

In 1951, when the Old Age Security Act was first introduced, these requirements seemed adequate. Today, however, circumstances have changed more drastically than perhaps even the opposition would have dared to imagine at the time. Mobility and migration have become such common phenomena that today we have had to take a new look at the residency requirements of the act.

As I have said, the fundamental principle underlying our pension policy has been to ensure that all citizens enjoy the benefits of their contribution to society during their productive years. What is required today therefore is provision in the application of this principle for the increased mobility of individuals. It is no longer true, or at least as true as in 1951, that people necessarily spend their retirement years in the same country in which they contributed during their productive years. It is this fact of modern day life which is being accounted for in the proposed amendments to old age security legislation which we are debating here.

As a specific example, Mr. Speaker, the minister has pointed out that a large number of people, approximately one half million, are being disadvantaged by the legislation as it now stands. This figure is indeed impressive by itself, but it is nevertheless nothing more than an impersonal statistic. I should like to take this occasion to describe in greater detail the human side of this problem.

I have been corresponding regularly, ever since I was elected to this House two and a half years ago, with a couple from my riding who immigrated to Canada from Great Britain after their retirement—in fact several couples. They are, I believe, representative of the situation as it exists now.

When this particular couple left Britain to be near their family, their pension was frozen at the prevailing rate of the time. Although this, plus their life savings, appeared ample at the time of departure, the rising cost of living and the relative decline of the pound took care of that. Today, this couple receives a combined total of approximately $47 Canadian dollars per month as pension. This obviously is nowhere near enough to sustain an elderly couple—I sometimes wonder how they manage—much less allow them to enjoy their retirement in comfort.

What is the problem then? Why should they be subjected to such abject poverty after having contributed to the general prosperity of their society? And they are from Britain, no less. The reason is that the present legislation does not allow for reciprocal agreements with other countries with respect to the transfer of pension credits across international boundaries. In the cases of both Canada and Britain, each has followed a common policy of not paying pension increases unconditionally to pensioners living abroad, on the grounds that our social security systems are designed primarily for the people in their respective countries and that benefits are related to the specific social policy and economic conditions of each. When benefit rates increase, the cost of increasing pension payments falls primarily on contributors and employers in the respective countries. Under existing arrangements, therefore, these people could really be required to bear the cost of increases for pensioners who had gone to live permanently in another country. Only through a reciprocal agreement, therefore, whereby each country agrees to pay pension increases to its pensioners living in the other can this position be modified and those affected be helped. Bill C-35 paves the way to do this.

Let me say a word about the provisions of reciprocal arrangements. The case described a moment ago is typical, yet it reveals only one aspect of the various reciprocal arrangements to be encompassed in the legislation. Most basically, the removal of the all or nothing structure of our present pension system, and provision for the transfer of pension credits between countries will, in addition to the situation just described, safeguard the rights of Canadians who emigrate while in the process of acquiring their social security benefits. Effectively, what we shall be doing therefore, is co-ordinating our social security program with those of other countries. This means that current inequities, such as the duplicate social security coverage which is now required of most U.S. and Canadian citizens working in each other's countries, can be eliminated.

Moreover, under the proposed amendments pensioners would be allowed to claim benefits for contributions made to one country's social security program as periods of residence or contributions in the other. This would be done in conjunction with prorating arrangements worked out between Canada and each of the contracting countries, whereby each fraction of benefits payable under the legislation of each country is paid directly to the beneficiary by the particular country. Thus, the mechanism now exists; once it is put in place, hopefully as soon as possible, we can begin to provide all the benefits to which Canadian pensioners and others, most immediately those of Britain, the U.S. and Italy, are entitled.

What we must bear in mind at all times, however, is that we hold a dual obligation to the citizens of this country and, indeed of the world over. Every individual should be allowed to reap the benefits of his work. At the same time, every individual must be protected from supporting others who are not entitled to unearned benefits. In the context of old age security, therefore, we have had to overcome the intervening factor, personal mobility, which has disturbed the delicate balance between these two countervailing responsibilities. Through the arrangements provided for in this legislation, native Canadians and immigrants alike will be able to derive greater pension benefits while, at the same time, the cost to Canadians should not increase significantly.

The exchange of benefits between countries will depend on such factors as the number of beneficiaries from any one country who qualify; their age and extent of their contribution to the labour force; the immigrant population remaining in Canada; and the particular programs included in each of the individual agreements.

Since on balance more people immigrate to Canada than emigrate from here, more expenditures are likely to be paid into Canada than paid from here to other countries. Thus, both requirements are fulfilled and the balance is restored. At any rate, each country helps to look after its own better than in the past.

I congratulate the minister on bringing forward this legislation. I have enjoyed working with him on this long overdue area of progress on behalf of the citizens of Halton and of all Canadians.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in this House and talk on this bill; it is a double pleasure, I might say, since when I woke up this morning, I heard an announcement on the CBC saying that we should spend the rest of this day listening to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). We have not heard from him, and in that sense this is one of the happier days of my life, but not entirely because of the introduction of the bill we are now debating.

I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the lead-off speaker who spoke so capably for the opposition, and with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that parliament must explain this bill. In its present form the bill is confusing and I hope it will be improved in committee. I hope the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare will, across the country, explain the jargon in the bill. I hope the constituents of Victoria do not expect a simple country school teacher like myself to understand the meaning of sub-paragraph (c) on the top half of page 13 of the bill which reads:

> If the monthly family income of the pensioner and spouse is greater than four thirds of the rounded reduced pension equivalent, the amount remaining, if any, after deducting from the supplement equivalent one dollar for each full four dollars of the residual family income of the pensioner and spouse.

I hope the department can explain that language to people reaching pension age who ask for help.

The history of this bill is peculiar. It came to the attention of parliament last April; at least it was announced last April. One of the enchanting things about being in the House of Commons is that you get a glimpse into matters you do not fully understand. Last April 14 the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) rose on motions to announce that he intended to bring in the bill in a few months. I sat there rather open-mouthed, wondering why it was necessary to make a statement that day, and I still wonder why the minister did it. Perhaps, after the next election, the minister will write his memoirs and we shall then find out what he really intended to announce on April 14 and why, instead, he announced that he would introduce this bill in a few months.

This bill is in two main parts. One part deals with partial pensions, which are an innovation in Canada and I suppose almost everywhere else in the world. I have not before heard of partial pensions, but they are dealt with in the first part of the bill about which I want to speak. The second part of the bill has to do with reciprocal pension agreements with other countries.

I shall now deal with the first part of the bill, that part to do with partial pensions. Let no one think that this is not an important piece of legislation so far as pensions are concerned, because it certainly is. The rules and regulations set out under this bill will do much to discourage immigrants to Canada from expecting pension benefits. As is well known, at present people coming to Canada can qualify in ten years for a full pension. Under the new provision, one year's residence in this country will entitle you to one fortieth of the full pension. Let me illustrate what this provision will mean. According to my understanding of the bill, if a person at age 26 were to come to Canada and work here for the next 39 years, he still would not be entitled to a full pension at age 65. Compare that situation with the present situation. Clearly, there will be a substantial saving to the treasury and a corresponding substantial loss of benefits to those people who will have lived in Canada for 25 or 35 years before reaching retirement age.

The other point I wish to raise has to do with what happens if you can only draw about a quarter of a pension. You must have lived here ten years in order to draw ten fortieths of the full pension. That means that if you came here at age 55 and began drawing your pension at age 65, under present arrangements you would get a pension of about $35 a month. I cannot understand the philosophy behind the provision of the bill which says that from then on, no matter how much longer you reside in Canada, your pension will not increase, that is, your basic pension will not increase as you get older and spend more time in Canada.

Of course you will get the indexing increase, but on a prorata basis. This means that you will not get the same money increase as the person drawing the full pension. You will get about one quarter of the increase, to cope with the cost of living. It will be extremely difficult for people on partial pensions to keep up with the cost of living. The cost of living has gone up appreciably, and, God knows, the supplement or the indexing does not pay for that much of the increase. However, for a person who will only be getting one quarter of the indexing, it will be a very difficult time as he or she gets older.

● (2040)

A part of this system that was not mentioned by the minister will be the difficulty of choice for those coming here in late middle life. Take the case of a person who came to Canada at age 58, someone who had three years' residence in Canada previously. At age 65 he will have seven years plus the previous three. He will be entitled to $35 a month if he opts, and he will have a choice, to take the partial pension. The choice is that he could wait until age 98 and get a full pension. I doubt whether many people would wait the additional 34 years to get a full pension. They would almost inevitably be driven to accepting the partial pension. This ensures they will remain poverty stricken for the rest of their lives unless they have a private income.

No one can say this is a simple little act to help some people and not hurt anyone. It will make old age very difficult for some of these people. They will face an extremely difficult choice. I hope the Department of National Health and Welfare ensures that there are proper counsellors in branch offices across the country who will be able to talk to these people at age 65 wanting to know whether they should opt for the new plan and take a partial pension or hang in there and build up a few more years of pensionable time. They will have to estimate their longevity versus their present needs, which is not a particularly pleasant prospect at that age.

With regard to reciprocal pensions, it is very strange, and I am sure the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) agrees, and probably the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that in all the correspondence and in all the answers the minister gave with regard to why Canada and the United Kingdom could not have reciprocal pensions, we were given the impression on each and every occasion that the United Kingdom was holding up the passage of reciprocal pension legislation. When we wrote to the United Kingdom to ask why they were holding up the legislation, they said that Canada was holding it up. The bill before us, which puts us in a position to have a reciprocal agreement, gives the lie to the previous letters we have had on this subject. Indeed, it was Canada holding up the arrangements, and not the United Kingdom.

On page four of the minister's explanation of partial pensions and other matters, as pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West, there is a question. The minister supplied an information sheet, much of which consisted of questions and answers. I very much appreciate having it. It goes a long way toward answering some of our questions, but not all. In trying to determine whether reciprocal agreements will mesh with our partial pensions, we are left trying to find an answer. A question and answer on page four confuses me. It reads:

QUESTION: What is meant by totalizing and prorating and how do they work?

ANSWER: Totalizing is the combining together of periods of residence or contributions in each of the contracting states for the purpose of determining eligibility in one or both of them. In other words, periods of residence or contributions in each contracting state are considered as periods of residence or contributions in the other.

We go down to question 20 which reads as follows:

QUESTION: Under an agreement, could totalizing and prorating be applied to an OAS pension earned under the new rules?

ANSWER: Yes. The ten and 20-year minimum could be satisfied under an agreement, each country paying its share of benefit under its own rules. For example:

(i) One year of residence in Canada after age 18 plus nine years of residence or contributions in the other country = 1/40th of an OAS pension payable in Canada.

This rather puzzles me. I think what is meant is that one fortieth of the old age security pension payable in Canada means payable by Canada and that another nine fortieths of the pension will be payable by the other country but payable in Canada, although it does not say so.

I am puzzled by that part of the answer that speaks of the ten and 20 year part of the minimum being satisfied under the agreement. How about the 40 year minimum a person will need for the full pension? That is a noticeable omission which I hope the minister will clear up in the near future. The other part of the example in the answer reads:

(ii) Fifteen years of residence in Canada after age 18 plus five years of residence or contributions in the other country = 15/40ths of an OAS pension payable abroad.

It would appear that 15 years in Canada plus five years overseas, in this case the five years does not count as far as the pension is concerned. I hope the minister will be able to clarify whether 18 years in Italy, if we have an agreement with them at that time, plus two in Canada will give a person 20 years, or whether 36 years in Italy plus four in Canada equals 40 years and a full pension.

There are some other general matters which leave me somewhat curious. The 20 year requirement of residence in Canada before drawing pensions in other lands is a little difficult to understand. This will certainly be a telling factor in areas such as my own constituency which tends to attract old age pensioners. They spend the autumn of their lives in a salubrious climate such as we have in Victoria. Some like to go south to places such as Arizona in early spring. It would make a great deal of difference whether they have 20 years of living in Canada to count. If they do not have that, and if they subsist on their pension, I expect they will be required to remain in Canada throughout the entire calendar year for the rest of their lives.

The minister saw fit to introduce something in this bill with regard to spouses. I thought that if he could avoid it, he would never mention the subject again. There is a clause in this bill that refers to spouses in the context of family allowances. I wish to put on record once more what I consider to be the meanness of the former legislation brought in by the minister, which is not changed by this bill. It had the provision that a person at age 65 drawing a pension could, subject to a means test, draw a pension for a spouse under 65, but over age 60. The couple having two pensions could get by. However, if the older one died, the minister decreed that the widow or the widower would need no income at all. He or she would be able to live on nothing. When asked about this in the House, his unkind words were that they could always go on welfare. I have always considered that to be one of the meanest pieces of legislation, with the possible exception of one brought in by Veterans Affairs denying prisoner of war pension gratuities to World War I prisoners of war while paying them to those of World War II. I hope those two will both be changed. They represent a very black blot on the record of the government.

There is a question to which I would like to get an answer. I would appreciate if the minister could nod his head. Will the guaranteed income supplement apply in full to partial pension recipients? Can those persons not get any of the guaranteed income supplement or can they get it prorated to the amount of the partial pension they receive?

● (2050)

Mr. Lalonde: They can get the total GIS.

Mr. McKinnon: I thank the hon. gentleman. I am pleased to see it on the record in Hansard.

Mr. Lalonde: I said it in my speech this afternoon.

Mr. McKinnon: I did not hear it in the speech and I certainly cannot find it in the bill or in the notes. However, I am pleased the minister has now told us that a person receiving a partial pension can get the entire guaranteed income supplement.

Clause 1(2) on page two of the bill spells out that the amount of a partial monthly pension for any month shall bear the same relationship to the full monthly pension for that month as the aggregate period in which the applicant has resided in Canada after attaining the age of 18 prior to the day on which his application is approved, determined in accordance with subsection 1(3), bears to 40 years. That is, if a person is on a quarter pension and the indexing for pensioners for that quarter comes to an additional four dollars a month—and, mind you, this is to cover the cost of food, shelter and absolute necessities—if it comes to four dollars a month for a pensioner, a person on a partial pension will get one dollar per month, that is, if he is on a 10-year or one quarter pension.

I am puzzled about the need for one other provision in the bill. I am not a parliamentary legal expert but the parliamentary procedure spelled out on page 16 seems to my mind to anticipate a form of closure. I refer to the short length of time allowed for the consideration and disposition of motions concerning this legislation. We find such words as:

> Where a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons or Senate is filed as provided in subsection (2) with respect to a particular order referred to in subsection (1), that House shall, not later than the sixth sitting day of that House following the filing of the motion, in accordance with the rules of that House, unless a motion to a like effect has earlier been taken up and considered in the other House, take up and consider the motion.

In the next paragraph a time is set for the disposal of the motion. Such a motion—> —shall be debatable without interruption for not more than five hours and, on the conclusion of such debate, or at the expiry of the fifth such hour, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the motion.

I am puzzled as to the need for such a provision, bearing in mind the existence of guillotine procedures such as we see in operation every so often. I am surprised the minister would see a need to incorporate additional such measures in the Old Age Security Act.

In conclusion, I would like to express agreement with what other members of my party have said. We have no desire to hold up this legislation. The faster it goes through, the better we will like it. It has a number of good points in its favour. Any move toward the reciprocity of pensions as between Canada and the other countries mentioned will be welcomed. I hope we shall be given a clearer explanation of the choices which have to be made and the period of time in which people can make a choice between a full and a partial pension, and, if they have any real choice, which would be the soundest way of exercising that choice.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the measure which has been introduced today for second reading has evinced a wide measure of agreement. It is clear there is a broad measure of support for it in the House and I hope it will receive speedy passage.

I have only a few observations to make by way of general reflections on the bill and the changes it will mean in the administration of a program which had its beginnings in 1951 with the Old Age Security Act. In that year the residence requirements were very simple—20 years prior to retirement. There was no citizenship requirement. It was a very simple piece of legislation, one of a family of measures which Dr. George Davidson, then deputy minister of welfare, used to call universal benefits. Over the years, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, there have been a number of changes in the act. He went on to say that over a 40-year period, further changes must be anticipated. Consider the residence provisions alone. I believe that attached to the initial requirement for 20 years was a provision for make-up of periods of absence on a two to one basis.

In 1957, the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) reduced the period of residence qualification to ten years, again with a two for one make-up provision and the requirement that the year immediately preceding 65 must have been spent in Canada. The two for one provision proved to be excessively generous, and a three for one provision was subsequently introduced.

The residency requirement survived for a number of years—ten years prior to the age of 65, or one year immediately prior to 65 with make-up on a three for one basis. One further feature was introduced. Residence of 40 years would in any case permit an applicant to receive the pension and waived the "immediate preceding year" requirement prior to 65.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Forty years after the age of 18.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, we now see a change in the bill for good and sufficient reasons. Instead of those provisions we are moving to a year by year build up of residence, with a 40-year maximum over a period of time for full benefit.

The minister, in a clear and able statement to the House, and also in a statement he made on April 14 of last year, set out the intention of the government, and those proposals received broad support. What has happened is this: our legislation has been under increasing pressure as a result of the changing composition of Canada, the result of immigration, and of the employment of Canadians abroad during which periods they are subject to the social security legislation of other jurisdictions. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said the bill needed a good deal of explanation to make sure it is not misconstrued. That is true. I cannot but feel that the changes will be to the advantage of those newcomers who have come from countries with mature jurisdictions in social legislation. However, those who chose Canada and who come from countries without comparable standards of social legislation will not be able to take advantage of provisions for reciprocal arrangements which are made possible by the bill.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said there would be a number of newcomers to Canada, fathers and mothers who came in their late years, and who cannot now look forward to building up full pensions. This means that many of them will be seeking the benefit of future welfare programs in later years.

The changes in the bill will have an influence on the administration in another sense. Residence for each year will count now, instead of general proof of residence, such as was acceptable up to now. These changes will mean that much stricter proof of residence on a year-by-year basis will be required in relation to old age pension benefits.

I think another change in the bill now before us must inevitably raise another question which I am sure the minister will have to consider before too long. I refer to the relationship of the program as it is now put before us to the Canada Pension Plan. It seems to me that the justification for the continued existence of the two programs becomes more and more questionable when they require individual proof of residence in one case and contributions on a year-by-year basis in the other. Under the Canada Pension Plan, individual records must be kept, and thanks to modern computers this is possible.

It seems to me that the minister should consider a combination of old age security and the Canada Pension Plan benefit so that we have in Canada one combined administration, one set of cheques to be issued, one set of records to be kept. At the time the Canada Pension Plan was adopted, many of us felt that Canada had sufficient leverage with the Canada Pension Plan to bargain with jurisdictions in other parts of the world that had refused to extend reciprocal privileges to those who had left their original homelands and come to Canada.

I realize that making old age security relate to individual years of contributions, in the way the present bill proposes, does extend the bargaining position of the Government of Canada. But it seems to me that we have moved a considerable way from the original concept of a universal benefit, with the simplest possible test of eligibility, a type of benefit that Canada has pioneered. Such benefits included family allowances, old age security and the rest.

We are now being forced to recognize that in the interdependent world in which our citizens move our systems must be adapted to the systems of other countries, and in particular must be more closely related to those social insurance programs that exist in western Europe. These are, Mr. Speaker, the facts of life.

Every speaker who has preceded me has pointed out that the bill has been in response to a number of cases of hardship brought to the attention of members of the House. The government does not seek by this bill to incur a smaller burden of social welfare payments, a smaller burden of social security payments. The total charge to the treasury is going to be about the same even after maturity of the program, but a great deal more equity is brought into the picture. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the bill.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to take part in this debate. I want to thank the minister for having finally brought down some legislation for which we have long waited. I wish to comment on only three aspects of the bill, and on the first one I shall be short.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), who preceded me, mentioned the requirement of residence on a year-by-year basis. I think this is good and enables one to build up a yearly entitlement to the pension, whether it be two fortieths, three fortieths, four fortieths and so on. This involves residence.

As a former member of the Canadian foreign service, many years of a foreign service officer's life and the lives of other members of the foreign service are not spent in Canada. For some purposes—for example, income tax purposes—these years are counted as years of residence in Canada even though one is serving abroad. I am satisfied in my own mind that it is not the intention of this bill to exclude these particular members of our society and to disentitle them during the years they are serving abroad, but I do want to be absolutely clear beyond equivocation. If necessary, we will take this particular bill to court if we are not sure that a Canadian member of the foreign service who serves abroad for one, two or three years will have his service abroad counted as residence in Canada for pension purposes.

I hope that the minister or his staff will have made note of this point. If there is any possibility of those persons being excluded—I do not think there is, but if they could be excluded—then I think appropriate amendments should be brought forward so as to ensure they are recognized as residents of this country during the time they are serving abroad. They are serving Canada. They are residents of Canada for most purposes, but for some purposes they could be considered as non-residents. Whether these people are members of the Department of External Affairs, Manpower and Immigration, Trade and Commerce, the RCMP, CIDA or whatever service, we want to be absolutely sure that they get their full entitlement when the time comes.

As so many members have thus far said, one of the preoccupations of a member of the House is with immigrant families who come to this country to join their children who, as young folk, came to make their livelihoods in Canada. They come here to share their last years with their families and their grandchildren. Those who came from Britain have been in an unenviable position. British pensioners in Canada are what I would call an endangered species because of the deterioration in the value of the pensions that they are able to draw from Britain. Many of them have not been able to qualify for a pension yet in Canada, and I am delighted that they are going to be able to do so under this new legislation. I for one am certainly not going to delay the passage of this bill, because the sooner these people enjoy that to which they are entitled under this legislation and under any reciprocal agreement that is made, the better.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) cited the case of two couples with whom he has been in correspondence for a couple of years. I have been in correspondence with something in the order of 200 families of this sort who have written to me about their plight. I should like to cite a couple of examples of immigrants who came to this country at differing times. As has been said so often, but bears repeating, immigrants from Britain to this country draw the pension to which they were entitled on the date they left Britain. If they happen to go back for a prolonged visit of two or three months, they will enjoy the incremental benefits that have accrued to their pension during their absence; but as soon as they return to Canada to resume their landed immigrant status or their status as Canadian citizens, they go back to their original pension.

I know one lady who contributed toward her pension from 1918 to 1956. Then at the age of 63 she emigrated to Canada. At that time her pension was valued at three pounds, seven shillings and six pence, which today I suppose would be valued at three pounds and so many pence. I have made the calculation and it comes out to 13 pounds 50 pence a month which, at present sterling value, is $21.60 a month. That is the value of the pension to which that particular individual contributed from 1918 to 1956.

A couple came to this country in 1970, and a pension to the two of them stood at eight pounds 20 pence a week, or 32 pounds 80 pence per month, which works out to $52.48 per month. That was when I received a letter from them late in the fall. If that couple had stayed in their country, their pension would have been worth 22 pounds. It would have gone from eight pounds 20 pence in 1970 to 22 pounds on the basis of increments granted since that time. But they do not get that 22 pounds, they are getting only 8 pounds 20 pence, or $52.48 per month for the two of them.

Of course we also have to remember that there has been a considerable drop in the value of the pound over that period. For example, in 1970 the value of the pound stood at $2.40 Canadian. In 1976-77 it stands at about $1.60. Not only has the value of the pound dropped, but in terms of purchasing power the value of the dollar has also been considerably eroded, so that while $52.48 might have sounded pretty good in 1970, it does not mean very much today. Therefore the dual, triple or quadruple erosion of the value of those pensions has eaten considerably into the ability of those immigrants to live comfortably or to be supported by those whom they came to join.

My first intervention in this Chamber on this matter occurred almost on the first anniversary of my election to this House. In fact it was one day after that anniversary, on October 31, 1973. I had written many letters to the minister at about that time, and I was told that there were problems in concluding reciprocal agreements with Great Britain. Like my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), I was assured that the fault was on the side of Britain. When I wrote to Britain I got the same sort of answer, that the fault was on the side of Canada.

At one stage I learned that the British had submitted terms of an agreement. Unfortunately I could not get from the Canadian side any response to those terms either positive, negative or neutral. When I was in London a year later, in 1974, on a mission for the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in December of that year, I took it upon myself to recruit the assistance of a number of members of the British House of Commons. I recruited their assistance in order to get them to push this matter from their side, and I have been in continuous correspondence with these members ever since. I think my last letter to them was written this week.

In April of 1976, two and one half years after the original intervention I made in October of 1973, the minister announced his intention to introduce enabling legislation. Why enabling legislation? I was told in correspondence and in conversations I had with the minister that there was an incompatability between the social assistance programs in Britain and the social assistance programs on this side with regard to pensions for the elderly which was difficult to reconcile and which made it difficult to reach an agreement. I hope that this legislation, which in general terms is described as enabling legislation, will enable this government to reach a quick agreement with the British authorities in this connection.

There is a question in my mind which I would like to put on the record. Assuming that a reciprocal agreement with Britain is reached—and I hope it is soon—and assuming that the prorating formula applies, I would like to use the example of a British subject who has been resident here since 1963. What happens to that individual? We know what he was getting from Britain in 1963. I put that on the record just a few minutes ago. It was something in the order of three pounds a week, or $21 per month. He has 14 years' residence. Let us assume that we conclude an agreement this year and that it can be applied. He would therefore be entitled to 14/40 of the pension, if he reaches the age of 65 this year. That is clear; there is no problem there. However, what about the increments? What about that portion of the pension to which he is entitled as a result of his residence in Britain? Does he get those increments? Is this what the negotiations are going to be about? Will the government be able to negotiate into an agreement the increments which are due this particular pensioner so that he will get his full updated entitlement? This we do not know. We know simply that this legislation is intended to be enabling legislation.

There is still a mystery: why is this legislation necessary? How does it change the compatability or incompatability of the British pension and the Canadian pension formula in such a way as to enable these reciprocal agreements to be concluded? I am bound to say that I am a little suspicious that it is simply a delaying tactic, and I sincerely trust that the agreements will now be reached. I can assure the House that the government will be pressed from many quarters to conclude these reciprocal agreements. The government claims that this legislation enables it to do so. I cannot see what prevented it from doing so in the past. In any event, it was unable to do so. Now the government claims it can. All right, let the government get on with it. I am not at all clear as to how this legislation reduces or eradicates the incompatibilities which it is claimed existed at an earlier time. I am therefore just a trifle skeptical, because the government has given me very little cause to be otherwise. However, I hope I am wrong.

I have spoken about the need to include in the legislation, if it is not already fully and adequately covered—and legally covered so that a court will uphold it—provision for Canadians who are serving abroad in Canada's foreign service. I have covered the need for an early conclusion of agreements. The third matter I wanted to talk about was the consumer price index as it applies to pensions.

As was mentioned this afternoon in the opening statement by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), one of the things we discovered on our tour—and I accompanied the hon. member on part of his tour with regard to the quality of life of the elderly—was that the consumer price index as it applies to the elderly is really meaningless. It is not geared to the needs or the purchasing patterns of elderly people.

Why do I say that? I say it for two reasons. One of the reasons, I suggest, is the criteria on which the consumer price index is based, the population coverage or what is popularly called the target group. I think it is worth reading into the record. I am referring to the study of the consumer price index for Canada put out by Statistics Canada, catalogue No. 62-539. It reads:

> The population group to which the CPI refers, commonly called the target group, delimits the specific segment of the population whose spending pattern is used to derive the relative importance of goods and services in the market basket. In selecting the target group, the objective was to secure wide representation or urban families with reasonably similarity in spending patterns among various groupings of family types and incomes.
> Accordingly, the CPI population reference group for Canada has been updated in the present revisions according to the following criteria:
>
> (a) Those living in Canadian urban centres with metropolitan populations exceeding 30,000;

Do our elderly fit into that pattern? Not badly. Some of them may be out in the country. It goes on to read:

> (b) Those ranging in size from two to six persons, consisting of any combination of adults or of adults and children.

I wonder if this really fits those about whom we are concerned at the moment. It goes on to read:

> (c) Those with annual incomes in 1967 ranging from $4,000 to $12,000.

Here is where we must depart from many of those who are eligible for pension settlements. I suggest that this is one reason why the target group aimed at by the consumer price index which is used for indexing pensions is not really helpful as it refers to the elderly.

But there is another reason, and that is the breakdown of buying patterns. It is an interesting buying pattern developed with great care. I do not criticize it on the grounds of the care with which it was developed for the purposes for which it is intended, but I maintain that it cannot be applied with any degree of credibility to those who are engaging our attention tonight.

Is as much beef being brought by our elderly as dairy products? We are told that 3.2 per cent of the basket is supposed to be beef and 3.3 per cent dairy products. I suggest that this is not quite in balance for the elderly. As much as 5.9 per cent is allowed on red meat as against .9 per cent on chicken and only .39 per cent on fish. I suggest that this pattern of buying fails if one were to examine the basket brought home by the elderly. It is obviously designed for persons with adequate incomes, to select according to taste and the need to provide bodily warmth and growth.

The sort of selecting I have seen among the elderly is one that is closely regulated by the price of the product offered. I have seen constituents of mine pick up a single pork chop and put it down because it is too expensive. They looked at the unit price and found that a pair of herring is much cheaper than a pork chop, so they will buy the herring. You will remember that at one time pork was a very popular item because it was cheap, and at another time it was chicken. I am not sure which item is cheap now for this particular type of buyer.

To go back to buying patterns generally, there is a suggestion that .9 per cent of the buying is for sirloin and only .8 per cent for hamburger. Surely even the buying in my own family does not respond to that particular proportion. For fruits and vegetables we have 3.2 per cent and for dairy products 3.3 per cent. I suggest that these figures may not be arbitrary, but they are not geared to the elderly.

On drinks such as tea, coffee and soft drinks, tea and coffee account for 3.5 per cent and soft drinks account for .7 per cent. This is ludicrous. These figures apply better to teenagers. Imagine allowing as much on pop as on tea!

Something I do not understand is 17.8 per cent on housing but only 8 per cent on rented premises and 9.48 per cent on home ownership. I do not understand this particular aspect of the price index anyway because it deals with both home ownership and rented premises. Surely it is one or the other. If you are going to have it as a component, they should be weighted the same but broken down internally. But who in this particular class is both a home owner and rents premises?

Do senior citizens spend about the same proportion of their expenditures on telephone services as on childrens clothing? It states here that it is 1.49 per cent as against 1.45 per cent. They must have an awful lot of grandchildren because they are either talking to them or buying clothing for them. They are allowed a little more than that on footwear, that is 1.58 per cent. The whole thing is ludicrous.

Transportation is another matter. Transportation counts for 15 per cent, when in most urban areas senior citizens travel free on the bus, or at half price, or at least at some discount, and not all senior citizens can afford a car, whereas this index provides 13 per cent for the purchase, operation and upkeep of the car.

My argument, therefore, is that indexing of pensions on the basis of a completely inapplicable consumer price index is deceptive and could be wrong. They could be diddled, they could be done out of what is their due. It is suggested that persons benefiting from that indexing are keeping pace in their purchasing with the items that are mentioned, when usually they buy in a completely different pattern in order to provide the sustenance of life.

● (2130)

The old age security and all the indexed pensions should therefore be adjusted in accordance with an index which measures very accurately the changes in the cost to those to whom the pension applies—the cost to the senior citizens for the expenditures they make, properly weighted for food as against housing, and properly weighted between tea, coffee and pop, and for clothing and transportation. Then and then only will justice be more nearly done. As matters stand now, great injustices are probably being perpetrated.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has been considered by many people to be a Scrooge in many areas, but nowhere is he as much of a Scrooge as in dealing with services and pensions for the senior citizens of Canada.

This bill is supposedly designed to make old age security residence requirements a little better. I have some doubts about the proposed new rules and whether they will accomplish the corrective action required to treat our senior citizens in a more fair and equitable manner.

The bill deals with certain specific subjects. I think one of the most significant things about it is that it does not deal with certain subjects. A couple of years ago I wrote to the minister about a particular problem that is faced by widows, and I am sure he has received representations from other sources as well. There is in this country something known as a spouses allowance where a pension is paid to a spouse who reaches age 60 when the other spouse reaches age 65 and becomes pensionable. That was a progressive step. In most cases the one who reaches age 65 first is the male, who is normally considered to be the breadwinner. In the past he had the problem of retiring at age 65 and supporting his spouse, who is normally not working at that age, on the one pension.

The allowance was a step forward to provide relief to the man who wanted to retire, or to the woman who if she happened to be the breadwinner who wanted to retire and along with her spouse live off the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement. There is also the situation of the widow whose husband had been eligible for old age pension and who now has no pension available to her. If the husband had not died, the woman would have drawn the pension at age 60, but now since she is a widow she gets no pension at all. In a letter to me the minister promised to bring in legislation to deal with this problem and I had hoped he would have taken advantage of the legislation before us to do so, but unfortunately that is not the case. I think he is to be severely castigated for that glaring omission.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Another aspect of old age pensions is the guaranteed income supplement. I can understand the theory behind it—that it is given only to those in greatest need or those who have no other source of income. I suppose there are two sides to the argument for supporting or not supporting that approach, but it strikes me as being rather unfair to senior citizens who have made provision for their old age and have struggled to save money for it. They are being penalized by not being eligible for the guaranteed income supplement. This is discouraging people from saving for their old age and has the effect of increasing greater dependency on government handouts.

I would be inclined to suggest that the guaranteed income supplement should be reassessed to reward those who have been responsible and made provision for their old age to ensure they get whatever is available from the public purse on the same basis as those who had been less responsible or less fortunate. Perhaps the most glaring complaint is that the combined old age pension and guaranteed income supplement are too low.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Except for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has just interjected, and who happens to be collecting another income. The old age pension is probably adequate for him, and of course he does not collect the guaranteed income supplement. Not all senior citizens are in his fortunate position. Perhaps that might be changed some day although that is not to suggest that this place should consist only of senior citizens, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not?

Mr. Yewchuk: I would not object if this place consisted only of senior citizens except that it would be a rather uneven representation of the population as a whole. I think we have followed the tradition of this institution being more or less representative of the population at large.

Mr. Alexander: That is why I am here.

Mr. Yewchuk: I think we have enough senior citizens to represent the ratio of the population and others to represent other age groups and segments of Canadian life.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On that basis, there should be a lot more of us here.

Mr. Yewchuk: There should be a lot more of them particularly in this party, and not the one to my left which seems to have a preponderance of senior citizens.

I want to comment on the proposal the minister is putting forward. I think there is something wrong with a system in which an immigrant who becomes a Canadian citizen earns one fortieth of full pension per year only until age 65. On the surface it may sound fair enough, but what if this person is self-employed and continues to be an economically productive member of society until age 70 or 75? If he arrived in Canada at age 55 the most his pension could amount to would be ten fortieths of the full pension because he would no longer qualify even if working after age 65. He might decide to defer applying for old age security beyond age 65 if he knew that by doing so he would be earning a larger share of the full pension when he stopped working. It seems to me it would be quite logical to introduce this kind of flexibility.

If an individual at age 65 felt strong and healthy, he should not be penalized for that but should be able to continue earning some "pension points", so to speak, so that when he stopped working he would be entitled to a slightly better pension than if he had stopped at age 65 as the present proposal assumes he would. Even if he did stop working at age 65 he might be just as productive as a man who had been collecting welfare or unemployment insurance almost from the day he came to Canada. These comments have been by way of preliminary introduction to the key issue I want to discuss. It has to do with the fact that the government has been negligent in areas in which more progress for the elderly in our society could be made.

• (2140)

In my view the government has been slow to develop other services for the elderly. For some strange reason, for the past couple of decades we have thought that you need only provide the elderly with a small pension and put them in an institution, and that would be enough. I take issue with that approach; it is not right. First, that approach is much too costly, and I think particularly of the cost of institutions. Second, the elderly do not want it. In my view, and I have talked with many elderly people, they would far prefer to stay in their own residence, if possible, or perhaps with their families, than be placed in an institution as soon as they reach retirement age.

Mr. Alexander: They don't like being put out to pasture.

Mr. Yewchuk: Basically, we need to readjust our philosophy underlying the treatment of our senior citizens. Instead of giving them a little pension and putting them into an institution, we could perhaps give them a better pension and keep them at home a lot longer. As well, we ought to provide those services which will make it possible for them to stay home longer.

At present 8 per cent, or almost two million individuals, of the Canadian population consists of people 65 years old or more. By the turn of the century there will be approximately 3.4 million Canadians in this category. That figure represents a 250 per cent increase in the aged population at the turn of the century, as compared with an estimated total population increase of 75 per cent for the same period.

The elderly, it is clear, are now major users of the health care system and will become increasingly so in the future, as the proportion of the aged in our population increases. Hospital utilization, measured by patient days used by the elderly in general and allied special hospitals, will increase from 35 per cent in 1971 to over 42 per cent by the year 2001. Based on current practice, it is estimated that by the turn of the century we shall need an additional 166 hospitals, each with 300 beds, to accommodate the predicted increase in the aged population. The hospitals it is predicted we shall need will be provided at staggering cost. For this reason alone we ought to consider alternatives to institutions.

Canadians tend to resort to institutionalization more than is altogether necessary. If this trend could be reversed and the taxpayers saved the cost of these institutions, governments would be in a better position to increase old age pensions. The result would be that senior citizens could be more self-reliant, and would be better able to provide for their own care.

The Canadian Senate Committee on Aging estimated that, in the period 1962-63, 8.5 per cent of the Ontario population 65 and over was in some kind of institution on any one day, compared with less than 5 per cent in the United Kingdom. Clearly the province of Ontario puts a proportionately larger number into institutions than does the United Kingdom. More recently it was estimated that in 1972-73 9 per cent of the population of Ontario aged 65 and over was or is in an institution of some sort. As one can see, relevant figures rose from 8.5 per cent in 1962-63 to over 9 per cent in 1972-73. One reason for this rise, I suggest, is that there is little or no alternative to institutional care.

The provision of more beds is not a solution to the health problems of the elderly. In Winnipeg, between 1966 and 1974, while the population of those 65 years old and over increased by 17 per cent, the number of nursing home beds increased by 91 per cent. Some may think that these figures reflect to the credit of the government, something to be proud of; I suggest that the opposite is true. We should be ashamed of them.

The elderly also use non-institutional health services in greater measure than their share of the population would lead one to expect. According to 1971 figures, in Quebec 14.5 per cent of medical services rendered by doctors was for those 65 years old and over; 37 per cent of home visits was for persons 65 and over; the number of services per person aged 65 years and over was 11, compared with 4.8 for those under 65 years; the number of examinations per person 65 years and over was 6.9, compared with 2.9 for those under 65 years. It is therefore apparent that the increase in the aged population associated with the increase in utilization of health services will be one of the major problems in the health care field in the future. Moreover, I point out that most elderly Canadians wish to remain in their homes and communities; indeed, it is healthier to keep them there and much less costly.

The elderly have many health problems associated with their condition. They have diminished reserves, and the functions of various organs are altered. Their medical problems are complicated by the presence of multiple diseases, different presentation and response to disease and differing response to drug therapy. Also, the difficulty to ascertain disease is widespread, and nutritional deficiencies are common. That is to say, one finds among the elderly nutritional deficiencies which are not common to the general population. This perhaps shows that pensions are too low and senior citizens cannot afford to buy proper nourishment, or that we lack proper services with which to keep a close eye on senior citizens and make sure they are properly nourished and looked after. Senior citizens take longer to recover from disease, and treatment must be aimed more at overcoming disabilities and improving function than at obtaining absolute cure.

The elderly are subject to complicating social problems which include loneliness, isolation, financial difficulties, bereavement, loss of status, and poor accommodation, that is to say, poor shelter.

There has been little formal undergraduate education in geriatrics and gerontology in Canada, which highlights one of our important deficiencies in terms of our ability to care for senior citizens. The fact is that there are too few specialists in geriatrics in this country and not enough training facilities to train those who would work in the fields of geriatrics and gerontology in this country. This state of affairs reflects shamefully on the minister, who has been responsible for his present portfolio for a number of years, and on the government, which has been in power now some 14 or 15 years. If our people cannot change these conditions and correct the problems I have outlined, their only obvious alternative is to change the government which has resisted taking progressive action of the sort which other governments, of other countries, have taken, to show that they appreciate what those who built up their countries did.

● (2150)

The World Health Organization has recommended the initiation of geriatric services as a solution to the health problems of the aging. The aims of such preventive geriatric services should be to keep the elderly in their homes within the local community for as long as they are able and desire to remain there, and to train all those who work with the elderly in the special ways in which disease presents itself in the aged, and how to detect illness in the early stages.

Britain has six chairs of geriatric medicine. In Canada there is a well developed geriatric department at Deer Lodge Hospital in Winnipeg, and recently a demonstration model for a community geriatric service based at St. Boniface Hospital has been recommended.

In Ontario, apart from Sunnybrook, the University of Western Ontario has appointed a co-ordinator of geriatric care in the Department of Medicine; Queen's University has instituted a division of geriatric and continuing care medicine, and McMaster has a consultant gerontologist for the health science faculty. This represents only a very small segment of Canada's population that is being served.

I believe it would be useful to outline the services offered by the Sunnybrook Medical Centre in Toronto as a good example of a pattern that might be used in other places to establish services which are required, and to which I have been making reference in the past few minutes.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

There is an assessment unit which assesses the mental and physical condition of an elderly patient. There is a rehabilitation unit which provides many forms of rehabilitation to people who require it. There is a psychiatric unit especially designed to deal with the special psychiatric problems which senior citizens face. They are different from those faced by Canadians in other age groups.

There are long term wards for those who must be kept there on a long-term basis. There are domiciliary and self-care units which provide service on a shorter term basis to people who require less attention by others.

They have a community care program which includes daytime admissions only, a day hospital. There is a home care program which provides various services to people while at home. This home care program is administered from the hospital. It follows up patients who have come and gone, providing services which enable them to remain at home and yet receive the appropriate care.

They have a geriatric assessment and consultation clinic as well as follow-up clinics. They also have a program of education of medical people. First year family practice residents rotate through the department for a couple of months at a time in order to increase the knowledge and ability of general practitioners to deal with special problems of the aged.

There are some particular proposals for further development of preventive geriatric services. Perhaps that kind of service could do more to ease the burden of life for senior citizens than many of the others. It would do a lot to ease the burden of costs for treating patients who have been neglected. They may come in with one kind of an illness or another which, if it had been dealt with earlier, could have been prevented.

Special in-patient units are being considered in an intermittent re-admission program. Under this program a patient is admitted for six weeks and returns home for six weeks. This pattern is continued on an alternating basis. It allows the patient to spend half of his time at home while providing his family with a six week break during which time his physical health can be brought to an optimal level while he is in hospital.

Essentially what you have here is one bed being used for two patients simultaneously but alternately. That is an obvious reduction in the cost of an institution. You have two patients being cared for out of one bed.

There is a proposal for a palliative care unit, something that does not exist in many places in this country. It should be established in many areas. Work in various institutions in various parts of the world has shown the value of these kinds of units. They deal with those who are terminally ill or in severe pain for which there is no cure. They require hospitalization measures to ease the pain or to be ensured greater comfort during their last few days or weeks. This is something which governments throughout this country should examine.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—SUGGESTED REDUCTION TO 60 OF ELIGIBLE AGE FOR RETIREMENT TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I do not have many opportunities to rise in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Welcome!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you. Since I feel the question I raised with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) on February 2 is extremely important but the minister did not share this view, I thought I should clarify the matter and urge the minister to reconsider his answer.

Be that as it may, I asked the minister whether he would suggest to his cabinet colleagues that the eligible age for voluntary retirement be reduced to 60 in order that those who so wish could retire from the labour market and provide jobs for a number of other people. In answer, the minister indicated that according to studies prepared by him or by others such a move would not create that many jobs. It would be preferable if the minister told the House which agencies prepared those studies and stated their findings so the House could peruse them.

It is quite evident that, assuming we had a plant employing 100 people and 20 workers retired voluntarily to receive voluntary retirement pension at 60, there would be no job openings if the employer forced the 80 remaining workers to increase their effort and put out the same volume of production. Such however would be an exceptional case, and the labour unions would see to it that things back were put back in order, to end the agony of remaining workers.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I know a great many people between 60 and 65 who would be anxious to retire for various reasons. They would like to be able to travel when they are still physically fit to do so and they tell me it is much nicer to travel when both spouses are in good physical condition. It would be more pleasant to travel and to enjoy the few good years of their life.

There are 896,000 persons of both sexes between 60 and 65, and it is believed that at least 40 per cent of them, or 358,000, belong to the labour force. Let us suppose that 50 per cent of them would volunteer to retire, this would mean 179,000 job openings. If these were filled by young people between 19 and 30 years of age, we would hope that a number of them who wish to get married would be able to realize their dream. At least it would help them do so and they might even wish to buy their own house. Eventually, this would stimulate the building trades and give jobs to the workers of this industry.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our society would stand to gain if we were to facilitate the access of young people to the labour market. This could also contribute to increasing the birth rate to ensure a natural and normal growth in the Canadian population. All those reasons favour lowering the age for voluntary retirement to 60. For the good of older people, they should be allowed to spend their energy in doing something worthwhile, because otherwise, if they are not given this opportunity—and they say that idleness is the root of all evil—they will do something else.

For my part, I know very well that it would not have been a good thing to let me spend too long with nothing to do when I was very young. I would have found ways to use up my energies. When we get older and more mature and have gained much experience of life, we can remain idle with not much danger, and society will not be any the worse for it. This is another advantage that we must consider. I know many people of 60, 62 or 64 who live comfortably and who have already retired. They take better care of their property because they have more time than when they had to go to work. This improves their environment and encourages the young people to better appreciate their environment and their country. This is another factor that we must consider. Many of those people grow a garden and this shows the young people that the earth has some use and that we must take advantage of it.

There are also people who do odd jobs, who do all kinds of things to keep busy, useful things for their neighbourhood and their family. I know some of these people who belong to golden age clubs. I congratulate the minister for implementing the New Horizons program. These are properly managed funds.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I urge again the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to reconsider this matter and these suggestions from hon. members in order to put forward as soon as possible a legislation which would allow people to retire when they are 60 on a voluntary basis, and I emphasize the word "voluntary".

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult within a three minute time limit to answer the various arguments put forward by the hon. member, who speaks with so much conviction and sincerity.

The problem he raises I think is of concern to many members and citizens in this country. Unhappily, the points he made, although valid in many respects, contain as well other aspects on which he did not have time to elaborate and which I will not be able to cover either within the short time at my disposal. For instance, he speaks about voluntary retirement. I simply wish to ask him what will he do about spouses at home? A woman who has worked in her home, who has brought up a family during all her life, would be as much entitled as her husband who has worked in a plant, on a farm or elsewhere, to say she wants voluntary retirement at 60. And I do not see how, when he talked about some 900,000 people, he could cut that figure in half by saying half of them are working and then again cutting it in half when he added maybe half of that half will want to retire. I regret but he left out the 450,000 spouses who would not hesitate to ask for benefits, and rightly so, if ever such an idea were carried out and people started to demand early retirement under the old age security program in those terms . . .

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Man and wife!

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member says man and wife. So right then the figures he mentioned should be twice what he had forecast. I would probably say more than twice those figures. Our computation was made within the department. It shows that if all people between 60 and 65 could benefit from that program, it would cost us more than $2 billion in 1977, supposing that only one half of that total figure—and, once again, we should take the spouses into account—would benefit from early retirement. So we would already have more than an additional $1 billion in outlays.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left, I would like to raise the problem of those who find it too soon to retire at 65 and who would like to go on working, to have a job. They protest because, in many cases, in their factories they are obliged to retire at 65. This is something new, due mainly to an increased life expectancy and we can see this phenomenon in various countries, particularly in the Scandinavian countries and also in the United States. New pressures are brought to bear that people can have the right to work after 65. As we can see, many people are concerned by this problem but, unfortunately, I do not think that we can seriously deal with it tonight. However, I would be pleased to discuss it with the hon. member on another occasion.

CUSTOMS—PURCHASING OF GROCERIES IN UNITED STATES BY RESIDENTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on November 15 last I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) a question regarding the shopping practices of Canadians in British Columbia, for example, why they go south of the border to Bellingham, Washington, to do their shopping. First of all I want to make it clear that I am thankful for some of the work that the minister has done. She is the first minister in that department, among the parade of three or four ministers that we have already had over the last three or four years, who is doing something for the customs officers in that area. One thing she has done is to add four more man-years to the present staff there on a casual basis.

I should just like to interject at this point that although these man-years are casual at the present time, they ought to be permanent man-years. I say this because the traffic is going to increase and the staff at the customs post are already overworked. Therefore I ask the minister to reconsider the present casual classification of the men working there and to place them on a permanent basis.

The minister herself wondered why people shop south of the border. I do not go grocery shopping very often, but when I do I am shocked at the way the price of food commodities goes up every time. I certainly do not go shopping in the United States. I am not an authority on this, so I went to the best Canadian authority on the price of groceries there is, the ordinary housewife.

I went to a young mother with three children who does her shopping in the United States because she saves money by going there. I learned that she saves $20 every two weeks, which is something like $40 a month. That is nothing to sneeze at when you are trying to raise a young family. I would like to tell the House about the things she buys there, and the amount she saves by doing so.

The American price of Sugar Crisp, a cereal, is $1.02 and the Canadian price is $1.51, 50 per cent higher in Canada. Rolled oats, good Canadian food, costs 98 cents in the United States and $1.13 in Canada. Frosted flakes cost $1.01 in the United States and $1.30 in Canada. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is always bragging about what a great thing he is doing for Canadian farmers, but here is the way it turns out with regard to the price of corn. In the United States corn costs 28 cents per tin, and in Canada it is 51 cents a tin.

A shopper in the United States pays $1.68 for six tins of corn, and in Canada that shopper pays $3.06. Beans cost 24 cents in the United States and 41 cents in Canada. If four cans are bought in the United States, the cost is 96 cents, and in Canada the cost is $1.64. Weiners cost 48 cents in the United States and 89 cents in Canada, and we wonder why shoppers go south of the border. The Canadian price is double that of the United States. The price of bacon in the United States is 89 cents, and in Canada it is 99 cents. Cheese in the United States costs 89 cents and in Canada $1.27.

Mr. McKinley: How about cars?

Mr. Friesen: Cars are cheaper by a long shot. Ham costs 82 cents in the United States and 97 cents in Canada. Meat pies—packaged food—cost 24 cents in the United States and 38 cents in Canada. Let us consider one more item, tuna fish; it costs 44 cents in the United States and 71 cents in Canada. If a shopper buys four tins, he pays $1.76 in the United States and $2.84 in Canada.

The crowning example is Dare cookies, and the bag says "Head Office, Kitchener, Ontario". There is a plant in Surrey-White Rock, 20 miles from the border. As a matter of fact, that plant is 40 or 50 miles from Bellingham, where the shopping is done. Dare cookies cost 88 cents in the United States and $1.09 in Canada, where they are made. Pray tell, is there somebody on the government benches who can tell me why a Canadian product, made of Canadian agricultural products, costs more in Canada than it does when it is shipped across the border to the United States? I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) that question a week ago, but I received no answer.

Some may say that it does not pay to go across the border to shop because there is gas and wear and tear to be paid for, but gas is 10 cents or 12 cents a gallon cheaper there. People go down with an empty tank, fill it up there and save money on gas. It is one thing for a couple to raise a young family with the prices we have in Canada. They have a hard enough time, but what is it for people on fixed incomes who get, for example, $3 added to their pensions every three months because of the cost-of-living index? Is it any wonder that they pool their resources and go to the United States? We may think they are being disloyal to Canada, but all they are doing is trying to keep body and soul together. I would like to have an answer from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate)) as to why it is we have this kind of price differential.

The minister was a little catty in her answer when she said "I am anxious to hear his exact views as to what he wishes us to do". Pray tell, that is not my job. If the minister and the rest of her colleagues want to move over, we would gladly take that mandate and offer a few alternatives to the Canadian people. It is her job to look at the mess in which the government has put the country, and to give us the kind of economic policies that would deal with rising prices, prices that prevent people from being able to afford to shop in our own stores and buy our own products. It is cheaper to buy our own products in the United States. I am awaiting the reply of the parliamentary secretary on this.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to thank the hon. gentleman and concur in his remarks about our excellent minister. I also want to thank him for his rundown of all the cheap prices in the United States. However, I think his question is misdirected when he asks it of this department. We have nothing to do with setting prices in the United States or with setting customs tariffs. Setting customs tariffs is the responsibility of the Department of Finance.

We have brought the matter of the tariffs to the attention of the Department of Finance. The hon. gentleman knowns that; he was told that in writing as well as in this House. Our position is that we do not attempt either to encourage or discourage grocery shopping in the United States because we cannot, but as a department of the government we do not want to act in a way to harm Canadian businessmen, manufacturers or producers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED DELAY IN MOVEMENT OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT FROM EDMONTON PENDING COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because the Department of National Defence has not given a reason for the forthcoming move of the Canadian Airborne Regiment out of Edmonton, and because the city of Edmonton has requested an "impartial study" of the financial impact of the transfer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the House refer this matter to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and that the airborne regiment move be halted until the committee has presented its report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACT WITH MR. EISENBERG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Auditor General has expressed dissatisfaction with the terms of the option given to Mr. Shaul Eisenberg as an exclusive agent in the event of the sale of a second CANDU reactor to South Korea, and in light of the fact that he has expressed similar dissatisfaction with the terms of the post-contract services documentation under which Mr. Eisenberg would be paid a yearly sum for the next six years, and has suggested that he may be forced to make similar comments in his next report about the arrangements between Mr. Eisenberg and AECL as he made about the original agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government instruct AECL to renegotiate the present arrangement between AECL and Mr. Eisenberg, and instruct the management of AECL to ensure that the accounting standards and level of documentation in this and all future agency agreements, are acceptable to the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF REGULATIONS TO INCLUDE FARM LABOURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important and urgent matter.

As the April, 1976 dairy policy of the Minister of Agriculture led to an income loss of roughly 20 per cent for milk producers and the lay-off of many farm labourers; as agricultural producers must now bear the attacks, wrong-doings and iniquities of the Department of National Revenue and the Unemployment Insurance Commission; as civil servants would seem to have decided to do away with that agricultural sector by refusing to insure that type of work, which could lead to its complete disappearance while depriving it of the assistance required for its development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House order the Minister of National Revenue and the head of the Unemployment Insurance Commission respectively to take all necessary steps, as soon as possible, to remedy the many weaknesses that exist with regard to unemployment insurance in the case of farm labourers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

PLANS TO COVER OPERATING LOSS AT MIRABEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of reports of an anticipated loss of nearly $50 million at Mirabel Airport for the current fiscal year and bearing in mind the announced intention of the Minister of Transport to impose a user-pay policy in connection with transportation facilities in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions outlining the exact amount of the loss suffered by the Mirabel Airport this year, the precise basis of compensation for the loss, the measures, if any, anticipated to meet this substantial loss, including any plans for diverting business from Dorval Airport and exactly who will be absorbing the substantial loss referred to.

PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE STUDY NATURE AND LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that since the present administration took power in 1968, unemployment levels in Quebec have been approximately one third higher than the national rate while in the Atlantic provinces the unemployment level has been 50 per cent higher than the national average, and since, to judge from an answer to a question put to him yesterday the Minister of Finance is apparently unaware of these facts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That there be an immediate reference of the question of the level and nature of unemployment in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which has been sitting idle and not reviewing economic matters for months.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That parliament express to the government of the U.S.S.R. its concern about the arrest and imprisonment of Soviet citizens, including the two members of the Helsinki monitoring group in Kiev who worked for the release of Valentyn Moroz, Mykola Rudenko and Oleksii Tykhyi; Alexander Ginzburg who dispenses aid to political prisoners and their families, and Amnur Zavurov, tried and imprisoned for his attempts on behalf of Alexander Solzenhytsyn to leave Russia, and that the U.S.S.R. be urged to live up to the commitments it made when it signed the Helsinki agreement which would guarantee freedom of movement to all citizens.

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF NEW FACILITIES IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of pressing necessity.

Since tension is constantly increasing in Quebec penitentiaries, especially at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul and at the CDC, and since that condition has reached its climax and we can no longer tolerate the fact that prisoners are kept in their cells 23½ hours out of 24, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That this House unanimously recommend to the Solicitor General: first, the construction in the shortest possible time of a penitentiary in Quebec to prevent crowding of inmates in existing penitentiaries; second, the establishment in that new institution of an adequate rehabilitation program; third, the use of available premises in existing penitentiaries for preliminary rehabilitation programs; and finally, the setting up of a mechanism enabling inmates to receive visitors.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

POLYSAR

ALLEGATIONS IN JUDGE AYLESWORTH'S REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INFORM OTHER COUNTRIES OF ALLEGEDLY IMPROPER PROCEDURES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It arises from the report today by Judge Aylesworth to the Board of Directors of Polysar in which he says the corporation's Swiss subsidiary took action which included aiding unnamed companies to evade taxes, defraud minority shareholders and break currency regulations. Does the right hon. gentleman believe that the action he took in 1973, almost four years ago, when this matter was first brought to his attention, was at all adequate? Can the Prime Minister also say whether or not we in the House can believe that the sort of thing that he did then is indicative of the way that allegations which are brought to the attention of the government are now handled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to read the allegations made by the hon. member. I am sorry that they have not been brought to my attention before now but I will look into them.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as in those allegations made in the report it is suggested that through the action of a Crown corporation, wholly owned by the government, companies in other countries were permitted and able to avoid taxes and break currency laws, is it the policy of the government to inform other countries of the names of such companies with which a Crown corporation in Canada was involved, so that those countries can take appropriate action against those companies?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the question, and I repeat that I do not know on what it is founded. From the way the question was phrased, it appears that foreign companies have broken laws in foreign lands. So far as Canadian companies are concerned, if they did not act illegally or improperly I fail to see the connection with this allegation about what would happen in foreign countries and what Canadians might do about it.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The only way that the foreign companies were able to break the law in their own land was through the co-operation of a Canadian company, a Crown corporation which was wholly owned by the government. Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister whether he feels that the government has the responsibility of telling those foreign countries the names of the companies which broke the law with the co-operation of a Canadian Crown corporation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to be sympathetic to the wave of purity which is apparent on the other side, but I would still prefer to look at the facts before giving an answer to what to me, at this stage, is just a hypothetical question.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF REBATES OR DEALS MADE BY CROWN AGENCIES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. In spite of the fact that this important report was hand-delivered to the Prime Minister's office at nine o'clock this morning and he still does not know anything about it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What were you people up there in the gallery doing?

Mr. Lawrence: In any event, the Prime Minister will remember the allegations which were placed in his hands at the end of 1973 in a letter from the then auditor general. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell the House whether he has knowledge of any other allegations that have been made to him in respect of any other Crown agency, Crown corporation or subsidiary which relate to a similar rebate, deal or transaction with customers, which has now been amply proved by the report that was delivered to the Prime Minister this morning at nine o'clock?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen the report, I am sorry. Possibly it did arrive at my office at nine o'clock but I spent most of the morning in caucus. I probably will not be able to read it this afternoon because I have to go to the Governor General's for an outstanding achievement award.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Is the award to Polysar?

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Trudeau: I may have time to read it, but I am not certain because I have a cabinet meeting tomorrow morning and I have a lot of cabinet documents to look at of more urgent priority, dealing with such things as provincial needs. So, perhaps tomorrow when the House meets again I will not have read the report, but I will do my best.

● (1420)

AUDITING OF CROWN CORPORATIONS BY AUDITOR GENERAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the award is obviously not for speed reading I wonder if the Prime Minister could inform the House if the government is giving consideration to this obvious need for all Crown corporations, all Crown agencies and all subsidiaries of those agencies and corporations to be audited by the Auditor General instead of an outside auditing firm? Is the government giving any consideration to that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that is being considered. On the conduct of Crown corporations, we issued guidelines a little less than two months ago and these certainly would apply to the cases which are alleged by hon. members opposite.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED STIMULUS OF INDEXING OF INCOME TAX—SUGGESTED TAX CREDIT FOR LOW AND MIDDLE INCOMES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister referred with a sense of self-satisfaction to the billion dollars transferred disproportionately to upper-income Canadians as a result of the indexation of our tax system. He suggested this would be an added stimulus to the economy to create jobs. Since this billion dollars relates precisely to a change in the cost of living and was designed to do so, would the Prime Minister now admit his error and acknowledge that there is no new stimulus to the economy in this at all, precisely because there is no change in purchasing power. If he makes such a rare acknowledgement of error, would he agree that such stimulus is now required?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the allegations of the hon. member about this being payments to upper-income Canadians. In the $1,700 million which were enumerated by the Minister of Finance a very large part is for family allowances, another part is for old age pensions and a third part for unemployment insurance deductions. On that basis, I think it would apply to lower-income Canadians.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, even the Prime Minister should know that when the Minister of Finance used the billion dollar figure which the Prime Minister picked up, he was referring to the effects of indexation. I should like to get back to that point. Would the Prime Minister agree that because of that change there is really no new stimulus to the economy coming from it. Even so, accepting his own implied argument yesterday that some stimulus is required, would he take steps to ensure that a tax credit applied to the 1976 tax returns which are now coming in, would be made available to middle and low-income Canadians so that we can get the required stimulus?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the four items that I enumerated again today. I think I see the economic point that the hon. member is trying to make. I suggest it would depend on the propensity to save and the propensity to spend of the various people receiving these funds. Until one can ascertain that one cannot draw the conclusion advanced by the hon. member.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTION MINISTER MEET WITH MEMBER FOR OSHAWA-WHITBY TO DISCUSS PROPOSALS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. On Monday in the House the minister said that he would "welcome input" from myself and my party dealing with unemployment and said that he had not heard from us on "how things might be improved." Notwithstanding the point that we have been presenting precisely such detailed proposals since last October, I should like to ask the minister if he would follow up his suggestion of Monday and agree to meet with me tomorrow morning or next day at his convenience to discuss in detail the kind of information he allegedly wants?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I commend once again to the hon. member that he read the answer to the question. I indicated in my letter to all members in dealing with allocation criteria under the Young Canada Works and Canada Works programs, the procedures we had used. If the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party had a better method or something he felt to be more equitable, I would be prepared to listen and take this to my officials. It was to that I was referring. I have not had one letter from the New Democratic Party on that particular subject.

SUGGESTION THAT CIDA BE MADE A DEPARTMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Notwithstanding the appointment of Mr. Michel Dupuy as head of CIDA, thus replacing Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, and considering the huge budget of this agency, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he will introduce legislation to make this agency into distinct department?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, the government does not intend to do so.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Since the Speech from the Throne made such an allusion, does this mean that the government changed its mind or is it simply for later?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I do not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question might seem a little ambiguous, but in any event I understood that this matter had been dealt with in the Speech from the Throne. Has this scheme of making CIDA a separate department just been delayed or is it completely abandoned?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows how much respect I have for monarchy. I would not want to say that what he thinks was said in the Speech from the Throne was not in it but, if I am not mistaken, this point was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, with all due respect to Her Majesty.

POLYSAR

ALLEGATIONS IN JUDGE AYLESWORTH'S REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DISCIPLINE COMPANY OFFICIALS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I hope that he has had a chance to read the Aylesworth report concerning Polysar. Since the minister told the House in November when the matter was first raised that in his opinion there was no impropriety in the actions of Polysar, will he now reconsider and withdraw that remark and admit to the House that behaviour based on what you can get away with is not propriety?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not quite right. I was quoting the statement of the auditors and legal counsel of Polysar.

Mr. Clarke: What action will Canada, as the largest shareholder in CDC which controls Polysar, take to discipline the officials responsible for the behaviour complained of?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the board is responsible for this and we have nominees on the board. I received the report just before coming into the House. I would have to look very fully at the allegations. It may well be that the officers in question of the company will have to be subject to censure or other action by the board, but I reserve my opinion on that question until I have had a chance to examine the document.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Since all of us are conscious of the six vacancies to be filled in this House, six ridings not being represented at the present time, and in view of the recent visit of the Prime Minister to Quebec City where he probably got some pertinent information, could the Prime Minister tell the House, in the interest of the people who are not represented, whether he will soon announce the by-elections and, if so, does he intend to announce by-elections in the six ridings involved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, my intention is to stick to the official regulations and to announce the date of the by-elections within the time requirement provided by the legislation, but if I have delayed this announcement, it was to give the hon. member for Joliette and the leader of his party the opportunity to strengthen their relations with the PQ.

CUBA—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF RELATIONSHIP IN VIEW OF SUPPORT OF RHODESIAN GUERRILLAS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. In view of the massacre of missionaries in Rhodesia by guerrillas, and in view of the admission by Cuban officials that their Montreal offices are used for training guerrillas and the fact that these guerrillas are destined for Rhodesia and carry on continuing murder and harassment of missionaries, will the Prime Minister reconsider Canada's relationship to Cuba as well as its generous financial and material aid to that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I believe that the question is based on a non sequitur. He might just as well ask if we are going to reinforce our delegation to the Vatican and help from that side.

RHODESIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTEST SLAUGHTER OF MISSIONARIES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the government is not willing at least to reassess our aid program to Cuba in light of the fact that that country is training guerrillas in Rhodesia, will the minister at least tell this House and the Canadian people what steps the Canadian government is taking to express the outrage of Canadians at the slaughter of missionaries in Rhodesia?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most appropriate place in which to do that is here, and I am perfectly delighted to say at this time that I find the conduct shocking, reprehensible and every other condemnatory adjective one could imagine. In so far as what action we can take I will examine the appropriate avenues through which we can make representations, but whether these will be conveyed directly to those responsible it is difficult to say. However, certainly there is no question about our attitude.

POSSIBILITY OF LABOUR, BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT DISCUSSING ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House whether it is still government policy to establish a national forum including labour, business and government, which definite proposal was put forward by the Minister of Labour on October 28 last?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman might look at my answers of last week to his leader, and he will see that we have active negotiations under way for a multipartite meeting with business, labour and provincial representatives.

Mr. Fraser: I asked that question because I looked at the minister's answers, and on January 28 the minister said that there was no definite proposal in this regard. Perhaps the minister could explain that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are in the process of discussions with the various groups, and we have recommended to them that they should be prepared to meet at such a generalized meeting. As I said on the 28th, we have not insisted on a single formula in this regard, and we have sought from them some response as to the manner in which they feel they can most effectively represent the various viewpoints they do. The objective remains, however, to try to bring about a substantial consultation of all the economic decision makers.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACT WITH MR. EISENBERG AND WITH MERUBENI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Press reports indicate that the Auditor General has expressed dissatisfaction with the accounting procedures in that part of the agreement between Mr. Shaul Eisenberg and AECL with respect to the yearly payments to be made to Mr. Eisenberg during the post-contract period. Objections have also been made by the Auditor General with respect to the reporting of expenditures by Mr. Eisenberg in the event of a second CANDU reactor being sold to South Korea, in which case Mr. Eisenberg would be the sole and exclusive agent of AECL.

Is the minister prepared to urge AECL to renegotiate these two aspects of the agreement with Mr. Eisenberg, and will he guarantee that in such a renegotiated agreement there will be complete provision for the accounting standards and the levels of documentation to be acceptable to the Auditor General?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between myself and senior officers of the corporation, just as there have been discussions between senior officers of the corporation and Mr. Eisenberg with respect to this matter. I believe there will also be discussions between the senior officers at AECL and the Auditor General's department, and that is for two reasons: he is the Auditor General of Canada, and he has reported on these questions—indeed, before the committee he made certain comments, to which the hon. member has referred—and the second reason is that he is the auditor of the corporation.

Miss MacDonald: Have minutes been kept?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, reports indicate that the agreement between AECL and AECL's agent in Japan, the Merubeni Company, are being renegotiated with respect to that company's role as an agent for AECL. In view of the Prime Minister's statement on December 2 that the guidelines enunciated by the President of the Treasury Board merely formalized the existing conditions, why was it necessary to renegotiate the agreement? What are the changes which have been made in the agreement, and would the minister assure us that in that negotiated agreement with Merubeni the accounting procedures and the documentation levels will be discussed with the Auditor General in order to ensure that they are acceptable to him?

Mr. Gillespie: On the last point I think it would be premature to seek that kind of assurance from the Auditor General. In fact, I am not sure whether the nature of the agreement provides for detailed documentation. I have had an opportunity—although, regrettably, only a rather brief one—to read the transcript of the hearings of the Public Accounts Committee earlier this week. As I recall, there was a good deal of questioning on the part of members to the senior officer, Mr. Campbell, the chairman of AECL, seeking an understanding of why there was a renegotiation of the Merubeni agreement, and I believe that Mr. Campbell provided his reasons in some considerable detail. However, if they are not as detailed as the hon. member would like them to be, I will seek further explanations from Mr. Campbell.

REASON FOR RENEGOTIATING CONTRACTS WITH AGENTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wonder if the minister would clarify the point. Since the Prime Minister said on December 2 that the guidelines which had been laid down for Crown corporations merely formalized existing conditions, why was it necessary to renegotiate the agreement, and in what respect was the agreement renegotiated? Surely the minister can give us a clear statement on that.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): There is an obvious inference in the premise of the hon. member's question that this was formalizing the status quo. Quite clearly, the guidelines which the Prime Minister tabled in the House were to do a lot more than formalize the status quo. They were a new set of guidelines which would apply to Crown corporations in their appointments of agents and the process of appointing agents.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

COMMUTER SERVICE IN MONTREAL AREA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. He will recall the motion proposed last Thursday, which received the support of all hon. members on this side of the House, that he intercede with the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway in an effort to prevent or at least delay the implementation of cuts in commuter passenger train service west of Montreal. Has the minister been in contact with CPR company officers, and if the answer is in the affirmative, can he report to the House the results of his conversations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Following the strong expression of opinion, certainly from this side, but generally from all parts of the House, I made contact with Canadian Pacific, as indeed did the provincial minister. I am now informed that Canadian Pacific will retain three trains on the run beyond Vaudreuil and not cut the number to one as was previously announced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—SUGGESTED PROTEST OF ACTION IN UNDERMINING GOVERNMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it has to do with the outrageous conduct of Cuba in mobilizing insurgents in various countries and thereby contravening fundamental canons of international relationships. Apparently canoodling with Castro has produced no results, and I ask the minister therefore whether he will not, on behalf of Canada, send a protest regarding Cuba against this type of conduct in which Cuba acts as a puppet of the U.S.S.R. in undermining governments all over the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1440)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members on the opposite side for that splendid round of applause when I rose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: It is not often that I can tell the right hon. gentleman that I have anticipated him, but I can assure him that on at least two separate occasions recently I have made the strongest possible representation—

An hon. Member: In public?

Mr. Jamieson: Is anything more public than the House of Commons in which I am giving the right hon. gentleman my answer? I believe I answered the question during what I may call the unavoidable absence from the House of the right hon. gentleman. I believe I answered it before. I made it perfectly clear to the Cuban authorities that Canada wishes to be clearly on record as opposing their intervention in Angola—

Mr. Rodriguez: What about the intervention of the CIA in Chile?

Mr. Jamieson: —and has indicated to them, as well, that their troops should be withdrawn from Angola as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have not been here, for a very good reason.

Mr. Jamieson: I said, unavoidable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have read every line of Hansard and I have yet to read an answer by the minister that there has been a protest made to the government of the U.S.S.R., and also to Cuba, over this kind of working together to undermine responsible governments all over the world. Is Canada going to protest or are we still canoodling with Castro?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood the right hon. gentleman. I thought what he asked me in the first instance was whether representations had been made to Cuba. I do not know what the date was and I would be glad, if he wishes, to look it up in Hansard. I said, in connection with the reply, that I had given it in the House some weeks ago. However, I did not—

An hon. Member: What about more recently?

An hon. Member: You covered up.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about the CIA intervention in Chile?

Mr. Jamieson: With the greatest of respect to the right hon. gentleman, if not to me, he at least deserves a full reply to his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: When some hon. gentlemen have been around here as long as the right hon. gentleman has been, they will learn that the advice he gave me was very good. It was, not to speak unless I had something worthwhile to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Sit down then.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, to answer the right hon. gentleman, I have not made direct representations to the U.S.S.R. I thought his question was about Cuba, and in the case of Cuba I have done so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When?

Mr. Jamieson: Within the last three or four weeks, certainly, and prior to that on another occasion, and I will be pleased to find the date. In so far as the U.S.S.R. is concerned I am sure, from other conversations I have had, that they are perfectly well aware of our position and I will be glad to make it more emphatic to them, if that is desirable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have been here a long while, and watched the minister for whom I have great respect. This was the first time he completely lost his equilibrium.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that it has been restored, I ask him, what did Cuba say? What was the report and what was the summary of Cuba's reaction to this protest on the part of the minister?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Silence.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the kind of answer I can give in the question period. Incidentally, if I have lost my equilibrium, I can only say that if the right hon. gentleman has read every word of Hansard this last little while, perhaps he has, too. I have the same problem, because I have been reading his books.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I will concede that the books are substantially more interesting than Hansard. In any event, as the right hon. gentleman knows from his long experience, these matters are delivered and presented to the emissaries of the foreign country. There is not at that time anything other than an acknowledgement of receipt of the protest. I will have to inquire, to see whether within recent days there has been any written response.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED PURCHASE OF STEEL RAILS FROM SYDNEY STEEL PLANT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport who reports for Canadian National Railways has to do with the purchase of steel rails by Canadian National Railways from Sydney Steel Corporation, a matter which I have raised previously and which, apparently on one occasion, the Prime Minister considered with favour. Since we have had massive lay-offs of steelworkers from the Sydney steel plant, would the minister investigate the report that Canadian National is purchasing rails from Colorado Fuel and Iron in Pueblo, Colorado? If this report is correct could he, as minister responsible, try to have these rails purchased from SYSCO, in order that we can get our steelworkers back to work?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course I will investigate the report, but I ought to say right now, in order to meet the suggestion that there may be truth to the report, that I am convinced the report is completely untrue. Following meetings I had with my colleague, the government House leader, and meetings I had with people from the Sydney area, I held discussions with Dr. Bandeen. He was very much concerned about the position of SYSCO and the employees of that region, and he entered into immediate discussions with SYSCO. I have not had a detailed report about the complete conclusions of those discussions but look forward to receiving it soon.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his reply. It is true that there have been discussions. Indeed, an order was placed for slightly more than 79,000 tons of rail, which is trivial. If we are purchasing rails from American firms and our steelworkers are walking the streets, indeed, some of them losing their homes, would the minister and the government not impress on Canadian National Railways that we should "buy in Canada first" on this occasion when over one million of our people are unemployed?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it was obvious from my answer that that, certainly, is my view as well. I really think it would be better not to found questions and answers on a rumour about a certain action until we have checked the facts, otherwise we may unnecessarily concern people and influence unfavourably their attitudes toward the railway.

Mr. Muir: The situation could hardly be worse. Workers are losing their homes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CADET UNIFORMS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister, instead of referring outside the House to a program which repudiates an undertaking given by his predecessor, would be prepared to make a statement on motions about the government's policy relating to cadet uniforms?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any need for a statement on motions. The decision has been made. It was pending for some time. It caused some people concern; however, in general I am certain that it will be to the benefit of all the cadet forces and the armed forces with which they are identified.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I echo the comment, that it is nonsense. In light of the serious unemployment facing Canada and the crisis through which the Canadian fibre and textile industry is going, is the minister not prepared to review this undertaking and live up to his predecessor's undertaking, in order that naval and air cadets may go on wearing the uniform they prefer?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to review the matter. I have had discussions with leaders of cadet leagues. All are not happy with the decision. But I am sure our youth will be challenged more by meaningful, exciting programs than by the uniform. I think they want to be more in line with the thinking of the twentieth century, and how the armed forces are conducted today rather than how they have been conducted.

Mr. Hees: You mean, they will forget the old uniform.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL—PLAN TO COVER OPERATIONAL LOSS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the reports of senior airline officials saying that Mirabel airport will lose nearly $50 million in the year ending March 31, 1977, because of the federal government's faulty planning with regard to the number of passengers who would use the airport, and since the ministry of transport is now considering who should absorb the loss, can the minister say if he agrees with the estimate, with the figure I mentioned, and indicate what party or parties will be absorbing the losses incurred as a result of his own department's error with respect to this éléphant blanc?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, passenger arrivals at Mirabel did not reach the levels which it had been thought might have been reached, for several reasons, including the general drop in air travel in North America as compared with trend line projections. The reason also has to do with certain local transportation difficulties and inconveniences.

Mr. Hees: It's too far from Mirabel.

Mr. Lang: I am referring to connecting services to the west to Montreal from Mirabel. The result is a figure carried, you might say, as an actual accounting figure of a total loss in the area of perhaps $47 million. I should emphasize that of that amount, $43 million is an item carried as the interest charge on the construction costs. It is carried as part of the full analysis of our major airports and air costs. The amounts involved are related directly to the airport revolving fund against the principle that we generally should be very clear about the cost of maintaining these major airports as a facility for air travel.

● (1450)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not address himself to the part of the question as to who will be paying for this very substantial loss, including the interest carry over. Will the minister indicate what plans he or the department have to bring this up to a break-even proposition at least, if he is in fact introducing a user-pay concept? Is he going to move more flights from Dorval? Is that his plan?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the use of Mirabel is under examination in terms of the speed with which various flights should be brought into that airport in order to give the best service to people and, indeed, to add more connecting flights at Mirabel to encourage its use, thereby avoiding an overloading of other airports such as Malton and Dorval. The accounting figure, which this year shows as a loss, is really based on the difference between costs and revenues, including the total interest charge on the original construction. That was balanced in the same way in other years in other airports where a net figure is shown and where there is a surplus. The total of these amounts in the airport revolving fund approach is, of course, carried and progressively in due course will more closely be charged to those who use airport facilities where there is high capacity. That is the plan. That is the intention. Frankly, the total airport service is best paid for in that manner rather then put upon the backs of those who may choose to ride the bus and who may indeed be your average Canadian.

THE ESTIMATES

DATE OF TABLING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister give a more precise indication today as to when he expects to table the main estimates because as time goes on, we run into a much shorter season. May 31, which is the date the guillotine falls, is not that far away.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my present plans are to table the estimates on February 16.

Oral Questions

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION FORM IMPORT QUOTAS ON TEXTILES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State responsible for small businesses. In view of the fact that thousands of small and specialty import shops, who by the way are in no way attempting to compete with the large textile industry, are in fact on the verge of extinction as a result of having to comply with the government's new import quotas on textiles, can the minister advise whether he has made any representations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to have these quotas exempt for the small businessman in order to allow this large group to survive.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. We have been extremely concerned about the effects of this policy on the small business community. With regard to the allocation of the quotas and the treatment of the so-called hardship cases, I think we have treated them very well. In the short time available to me I cannot give the hon. member a complete rundown. However, I would be happy to do so later if he wishes. If he knows of any particular cases or groups of cases he would like me to look into, I would be happy to help him.

Mr. Jelinek: Being responsible for small businesses, surely the minister must know there are thousands of companies across the country that are on the verge of dropping out. Has the minister asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to exempt these companies from the quotas, whether these exemptions will in fact take place and when can the small businesses which are hanging on expect these exemptions to take place? They cannot last much longer and the minister knows that.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to give the hon. member a detailed rundown later. However, I am satisfied that the small business people who are involved as a result of this new policy are being treated as fairly as possible. I am advised that there is undoubtedly some hardship, but it is being kept to a minimum.

FISHERIES

ALLEGATION FOREIGN DRAGGERS WITHIN TWELVE-MILE LIMIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. The ever-recurring epidemic of foreign draggers is again in evidence on the southwest and west coasts of Newfoundland. I would point out that some nations that will not honour any agreement are fishing within the 12-mile limit. Has this been brought to the attention of the minister and, if so, what action has he taken?

[Mr. Andras.]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his courtesy in sending me a note at the beginning of the question period. I asked my parliamentary secretary to look into this question. He informs me that one of our patrol vessels is in the area indicated by the hon. member. One of our planes has flown over it. At this point they have not located any foreign vessel in the zone mentioned.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF FISHERIES PATROLS IN NEWFOUNDLAND AREA

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. There was no reaction to a statement by the fishermen which points out the fact that in deploying surveillance and patrol capability to Newfoundland, the minister left the widest area of Newfoundland without protection. Will the minister reconsider his decision and extend the surveillance and patrol capability to include the west and southwest coasts which is the largest area?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if there are any situations that have not been covered, we would certainly like to know about it. Our patrols go where they are requested to go by the Department of Fisheries. That area is not left uncovered. Indeed, it is well covered from Summerside, P.E.I. as well as from other operations. If I recall correctly, basically it is within the jurisdiction of our patrol aircraft from Summerside, P.E.I. when it is requested.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF OPPOSITION TO NOMINATION OF MARIO ARNELLO AS CHILEAN AMBASSADOR TO CANADA

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister tell the House whether the government intends to oppose the nomination of Mr. Mario Arnello as Chilean ambassador to Canada because of his alleged fascist background and his admitted activities in the secret police of General Pinochet?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had this question called to my attention. To date, however, there is no official action that has been taken because to the best of my knowledge no formal request for accreditation has taken place. I will make further inquiries and advise the hon. member.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice yesterday of my intention to propose a motion under Standing Order 75C for the purpose of allocating time on Bill C-22, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. As the House knows, this bill has now been under debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister, having given notice yesterday in accordance with the Standing Order is, of course, at liberty to move the motion today, but I wonder whether the House would agree that before he proceeds we should dispose of questions on the order paper and notices of motions for the production of papers. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA MANPOWER CENTRES—REGISTERED CLIENTS

Question No. 1,024—Mr. Howie:

As of November 1, 1976, how many persons in the Constituency of York-Sunbury were registered for employment with local Canada manpower offices?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Approximately 5,600. Because the area served by the Fredericton Canada Manpower Centre does not include all of the Constituency of York-Sunbury, registered clients residing in Sugar Brook, McAdam and Ste. Croix are excluded from this figure. Conversely, the Canada Manpower Centre serves a portion of the constituency of Fundy-Royal and the above figure includes registered residents of Bronson, Chipman, Newcastle Creek, Cumberland Bay, Newcastle Bridge and Minto.

RESEARCH ON THE EFFECTS OF CARBON BLACK ON HUMAN HEALTH

Question No. 1,125—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the effects of Carbon Black (food grade) on human health?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At present, the Department of National Health and Welfare has underway studies to assess the polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbon (PAH) content of samples of food grade carbon black presently used in Canada. Results of this study are not yet available. Recently, the U.S. has placed restrictions on the most common methods of producing food grade carbon black. There is evidence in the literature to suggest that the carbon black may actually protect experimental animals from the effects of PAH impurities. The Department of National Health and Welfare, in addition to conducting studies, is continuously surveying world literature on carbon black.

STUDIES ON CO-CARCINOGENS IN CANADIAN FOOD SUPPLY

Question No. 1,126—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the possible existence of co-carcinogens in the Canadian food supply?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare has ongoing research programs to identify co-carcinogens in the food supply. These programs involve testing of food additives, environmental contaminants, pesticides and natural toxins, for potential mutagenic (carcinogenic) effects both singly and in combination with known carcinogens or mutagens. Analytical methods are being used in an attempt to identify suspect co-carcinogens in foods and food additives. These research programs also involve extensive review and evaluation of world literature on co-carcinogenesis on a continuous basis. This includes maintaining liaison with experts in the WHO and FAO, U.S. National Cancer Institute and the International Agency for Research on Cancer in Lyon, France. Scientists of the Department serve as advisors and consultants to these groups with respect to carcinogenesis in general.

[Mr. Cullen.]

RESEARCH ON COMBINATORY EFFECTS OF ADDITIVES IN THE CANADIAN FOOD SUPPLY

Question No. 1,127—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the combinatory effects of additives in the Canadian food supply?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare does not have a research program specifically on the combinatory effects of food additives in the Canadian food supply. To be effective, such a program would require massive concentration of resources and is feasible only on an international scale. Attempts are being made by Canada and other countries, to initiate international collaboration on such research. However, the department tests many food additive combinations as part of the research programs on co-carcinogens in the food supply (See Parliamentary Inquiry No. 1126). In addition, departmental scientists continuously monitor world literature to obtain all available information on the combinatory effects of food additives.

RESEARCH ON THE EFFECTS WHICH ARTIFICIAL FOOD ADDITIVES MAY HAVE ON HUMAN MOODS AND EMOTIONS

Question No. 1,129—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the effects which artificial food additives may have on human moods and human emotions?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Changes in human moods or emotions may be associated with allergenicity and/or hyperkinesis and behavioral problems. The Department of National Health and Welfare, in conjunction with an outside agency through a health grant, is sponsoring a research program to identify food constituents which may be responsible for the induction of hyperkinetic states or learning difficulties in children. Children are being tested for allergies to certain food components, and will be tested for allergies to food additives when adequate analytical methods are available. Such methods are currently being developed by departmental scientists. The Department is fully aware of world research on the possible relationship between food additives and mood changes, including mood changes associated with hyperactivity. The matter of artificial food additives and the effects they may have on human moods and emotions has previously been discussed in the House of Commons during private member's hour, October 29, 1976. At that time, a summary of information currently available was outlined.

COSTS ON DEPORTATION

Question No. 1,136—Mr. Robinson:

What amount has the government spent on effecting deportation cases in the years 1974 to date?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration):

Costs on:	Transportation	Detention
for 1974-75	$ 984,713	$ 562,802
1975-76	$1,383,923	$ 900,666
1976-77	$1,675,000	$1,238,200

Total costs $6,745,304

ADMINISTRATIVE COST OF THE FAMILY ALLOWANCES PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,271—Mr. Herbert:

What is the administrative cost of the Family Allowances Programme?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The approximate administrative cost of the Family Allowances Programme for the fiscal year 1975-76 is $11,343,000.

ADMINISTRATIVE COST OF OLD AGE

Question No. 1,272—Mr. Herbert:

What is the administrative cost of the Old Age Security Programme and of this amount, how much is estimated to be the cost of the administration of the supplementary payments?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The approximate administrative cost of the Old Age Security Programme for the fiscal year 1975-76 is $18,167,000. The estimated cost of the administration of the supplementary payments (the Guaranteed Income Supplement and the Spouse's Allowance) is $9,759,000 of the previous total.

SITE UTILITIES AT ENVIRONMENT CENTRE IN ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,290—Mr. McKinley:

What was the final cost and the completion date for the contract awarded on October 2, 1975 to McNamara Corporation of Newfoundland Ltd. to provide site utilities at the Environment Centre in St. John's?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Estimated final contract cost, $2,260,000. Anticipated completion date, March 31, 1977. The actual date of contract award was September 17, 1975.

Order Paper Questions

PHILOSOPHICAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE LIFESTYLE PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,305—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What extramural studies were commissioned by the Department of National Health and Welfare on the philosophical implications of the Lifestyle Programme?

2. What were the titles and authors of papers produced as a result of such studies?

3. What was the cost of such studies?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1 and 2. A report entitled "The Ethical Aspects of Government Intervention Into Individual Behaviour" was prepared by Professor Rodrigue Johnson while under contract to the Department. The report was produced within the context of Professor Johnson's over-all responsibility to provide advice on various social dimensions and implications of departmental programs aimed at preserving or improving the health of Canadians through changes in their lifestyle and environment.

3. It is not possible to isolate the cost of Professor Johnson's work on the report from the other activities he undertook while under contract.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, several public statements describe the results of the negotiations in which the government of Canada has participated in this field. The requested documents deal with discussions between Canada and foreign governments. Their publication would be detrimental to the position held by Canada during those negotiations, which are still going on. It is therefore with the deepest regret that I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Crouse: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved:

That in relation to Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, one sitting day shall be allotted to the further consideration and third reading and passage stage of the bill; that at the end of the said sitting day any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted if required for the purpose of this order, and any question then necessary in order to dispose of the third reading and passage stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-22 and the budget proposals which that bill contains have been before the House since May 25, and in addition to the nine sitting days on which the bill has been under debate in the House during the current session the proposals which the bill embodies were the subject matter of six days' debate during the course of consideration of the budget last spring. In the circumstances, I think one can fairly say that this period of time, including the day involved in the order now before the House, will amount to a full two weeks of House sittings and that this is more than ample time for the House to consider and debate these proposals.

It has, however, ceased to be a question of debate at this point. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has indicated an intention to take all the future time of the House in debating this particular matter: I would refer hon. members to his speech in the course of the debate on Monday last. So we are no longer to have any debate on this question but are to be treated to a monologue by the hon. gentleman for the balance of this week. In these circumstances, it seems to me unreasonable to other members, to our conduct of the business of the House and, indeed, to the hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Canadians who are waiting to complete their income tax returns to further prolong the period during which the measure would be under debate. It is for these reasons I seek the support of the House to bring to an end the third reading and final stage after one further full sitting day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister trying to justify the motion today by saying, first, that this matter had been before the House since the budget speech in May of 1976, and I began to wonder why we have waited from the first part of the session to bring it on. That is the first question in my mind. I do not want to defend the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), but I think that what really happened in terms of the planning of the House is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has been caught with his pants down. That is really the difficulty in which the government finds itself. Of course there have been six days of debate on the budget speech. That is not unusual. It is hardly justification for a closure motion by the government. The rules of the House call for that, and I do not know how the minister can use that as justification for bringing in a closure motion.

If there is a filibuster—and I think there is a filibuster by the NDP, in particular by the hon. member for Nickel Belt—then the blame for that filibuster lies in the hands of the government. The government made the difficulty. I assume the Minister of Finance, who is a former House leader—in fact, he was the House leader who pushed through the rules and Standing Orders of this House under which we are operating and which he is now seeking our permission to use—would have known that the first opposition speaker would have the right of unlimited debate under Standing Order 31. I would therefore have assumed he would have planted a speaker—they plant questions from time to time, Mr. Speaker—who could justify the beginning of the proceedings.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That would have to be an opposition speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In any event, he knew full well, from the way the debate had been handled by the official opposition, that we had no intention of prolonging the matter. As he reviews the course of the debate, he will see that our party had taken the position that the matters contained in the bill, the help it gives to business, the parts dealing with changes for day care, and other things the minister referred to the first time he asked for closure with respect to this matter, are of some importance to this party. What we have is the Minister of Finance coming before the House of Commons as the victim of the failure to give priority to certain government business, the victim of the time devoted to government business being really a wasteland in terms of the pre-Christmas era, the victim of the stubbornness of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who refused to pull out of Bill C-19 certain clauses until he was beaten into the ground by the opposition, withdrew the clauses and the bill passed. He is the victim—in fact, he is the epitome—of the mismanagement of the business of this House. He then comes to the House and asks its members to bail him out of his dilemma. That is exactly where he stands, Mr. Speaker.

● (1510)

I am interested in seeing government business go through the House, but I am not going to suggest to my colleagues in the official opposition that they ought to become the "fall guys" for mismanagement. They would not get the credit for it, in any event, and the precedent would be used against them in view of the attitude of the government with respect to the rules.

Mr. Railton: Don't belabour the point. You are wasting time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) tells me not to belabour the point. There is a reason we ought not to belabour the point so far as the hon. member is concerned: he is ashamed of the way the government has handled the business of the House, and he has every reason to be ashamed.

Mr. Railton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Railton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to take that kind of nonsense from the opposition House leader. He has made his point many times in the last ten minutes, so why does he not sit down and be satisfied? He is wasting the time of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): That is a point for debate, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is evident from the interjection just made that the point is worthy of being made in the House over and over again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he should get back to the bill under discussion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So, Mr. Speaker, the situation is this. The Minister of Finance finds himself in a parliamentary bind in terms of the length of time he has had to debate the bill and the time during which he could have brought forward the bill had he wanted to do so. There is absolutely no reason why the official opposition ought to be party to this kind of thing. But this is not to say that we can condone a filibuster. I am not condoning a filibuster; I am putting the case as best I can, as I did the other day, in parliamentary terms. I think the case that the NDP are making in terms of pension is a bad one. I think it is a bad case they are making in terms of resisting the bill, which is of benefit to day care centres. I think they are going to carry a large can around their necks for holding up the rebates. But that is their choice, Mr. Speaker: they have made their bed and they can lie on it.

From the case the Minister of Finance has put—and I listened to him carefully—we cannot honestly support the idea that closure, or the guillotine rule, which is really what it is, will be used by a government because it has failed so to manage its affairs and has left an important piece of legislation, which in itself is important to Canadians, to the last minute. He then tried to foist the responsibility for this on the opposition. I do not think that we as a party can stand for that, and we are not going to.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Perhaps this is a lesson for the government that there is a case to be made for giving priority to certain legislation. There is a case for not jumping from bill to bill during the course of debate. Even during the course of the committee proceedings we suddenly found ourselves faced with the necessity of reorganizing the Department of Manpower and Immigration. There is a case to be made for some sense of order and planning to be given government business. If the fact that there must be two motions under Standing Order 75C to guillotine debate is any indication, it is an indication of only one thing: in terms of planning, in terms of setting forth its legislative priorities, particularly during the first part of the session when a great amount of time was wasted, not through the fault of the opposition but because of the stubbornness of the Minister of Transport in relation to Bill C-19, there is no case for supporting this motion and we do not intend to do so.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, except for his failure to appreciate the good case that we in this party have for an extended debate on Bill C-22, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) stated the situation clearly and exactly as it is. The government is in the mess in which it finds itself today because it has failed completely to plan the business of the House and because it has dilly-dallied with respect to the income tax legislation.

In the attempt today of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to justify in some way this motion, he had to remind us that what we are dealing with is a bill that came out of the budget of last May, which was presented during the last session of parliament. Even though the government failed to get the bill before us in that session, and brought it in only early in November of this new session, we still did not start to debate it until December and the government made no serious effort to get it through before the Christmas break. Now, to come along and use closure for the second time on the same piece of legislation, we suggest—as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has put it—is an indication of complete lack of management, complete failure to give any scale of priority to the business of this House.

Mr. Railton: You are wasting time again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall have something to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Railton) in a moment. I have seen a good many uses of closure. There have been far more of them in the last number of years than there were in the first 75 years of the business of this House.

An hon. Member: This is not closure; it is allocation of time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Call it what you will, it is closure. I think this is the most ridiculous application of closure that parliament has ever seen. What this minister is doing is rising, with all the authority of the cabinet and the majority that the government has, to stop one member who happens to be a teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario, as he described himself the other day, from speaking.

Mr. Goodale: Poor little Johnny.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was his own description—a poor little school teacher from the backwoods of Ontario. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, bringing in closure to stop one member from making a speech! When the Minister of Finance, in defence of what he is doing, said that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) had said that he would speak for all of the future time, that is quite a phrase. I did not know that my hon. friend for Nickel Belt had been given immortality in this House so that he could speak forever. I think even that member has to terminate at some point.

But let me get to the interjection of my hon. friend from Welland, who said that we were wasting the time of the House by having this debate. I am very serious when I stress the point that if there is anything that we have to stick to in this place, it is the rule of law. Standing Order 31 of the rules of this House gives to the first opposition member replying to a minister who has moved a government order the right to speak without time limit. No member of the official opposition rose to speak in reply. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) says he rose. But he did not speak. I had been trying to persuade my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, to speak. At any rate, as it worked out the hon. member for Nickel Belt was the first member to speak in reply to the moving of the third reading, and under Standing Order 31 he has the right to speak without time limit.

If rules mean anything, Mr. Speaker, they should stand. For the government to come along and say it does not want this particular member exercising a right set out in Standing Order 31, and that they are going to use their majority in the middle of the game to change the rule is, I suggest, most unfair.

I am not surprised that some of my hon. friends to the right and across the way did not like the kind of speech the hon. member for Nickel Belt was making the other night and they did not like the prospect that he might speak for some considerable time yet. My friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), says it was the reading of the Bible that bothered them.

An hon. Member: As long as he believes it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is happening now is not just an attempt by the government to cut off debate, but the government is using the weight of its power and authority to stop one little member from exercising his rights.

An hon. Member: An insignificant little member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is not insignificant; to use his own description, he is a little school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario. I enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) last night when he said it was the happiest day of his life because he did not have to listen to the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Then about three minutes later he complained that the bill before us was too complicated for him to understand because he was just a simple school teacher. The hon. member for Victoria may not like the hon. member for Nickel Belt, but they are brothers; they are both simple—

Mr. Rodriguez: Not simple.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —little school teachers. All these things aside, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is a very serious matter to use the authority of the majority to deny a right that is in the rules and that the hon. member for Nickel Belt was exercising. I also think it is a very serious thing to deny further debate on this important bill. We had just reached clause 65 in committee of the whole when the last guillotine fell. Clause 65 deals with the question of a surtax which the government is continuing for the year 1976 at too low a rate, and is not continuing for the year 1977. We think that is a very important matter, yet there was no opportunity to discuss it in committee of the whole but for about a minute and a half, and that was hardly discussion.

If debate on third reading is not allowed to continue, there will be no opportunity to discuss it at this stage. As a matter of fact it is no secret that the hon. member for Nickel Belt at the end of his speech intends to move that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 65. That is an issue of substance, and if the debate is cut off by this motion there will be no chance to refer back to committee of the whole or to give further consideration to that clause or the many other clauses that the committee did not reach.

Because I think it is unfair to use the big weight of the government to crush—

Mr. Goodale: A week-long speech is unfair. Do you think it is fair to make a week-long speech?

Mr. Epp: It was a weak speech, if that is what you mean.

Mr. Rodriguez: Who made the rules?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has the floor, and I would suggest that he get back to the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what I want to do. I say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) that the length of a speech does not matter. A ten-minute speech can be too long, and a week-long speech can be short.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): How do you spell "week"?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The point is, Mr. Speaker, that there are rules in this place and the hon. member for Nickel Belt was simply exercising his right under those rules. For the government to come in now and use another rule to deny the rights under the earlier rule is completely unfair, I suggest, and is another example of its dictatorial, authoritarian attitude. It is a disservice to parliament that the government has brought this motion before us today, and we shall oppose it as strongly as we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, there being so much talk about saving time, I shall therefore save time and express briefly my viewpoint.

I feel it is absolutely deplorable to waste time debating a motion of closure when criticizing an hon. member's intentions. When the Chair hears an hon. member asking questions criticizing a minister's intentions during the oral questions period, he is told that he is out of order. I cannot see how the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) can move a motion of closure in criticizing a member's intentions, because the latter allegedly said that if need be he would talk till the end of time, or something to this effect.

I think it would be helpful to wait a little to find out whether we are overdoing it. The principle is at stake and I think we have here another proof that we would be well advised to urge the Committee on Procedure and Organization to spell out conditions, in agreement with the cabinet, setting precisely a calendar of sitting days; with the help of this calendar, the House leaders could come to an agreement on the debates that should take place on substantive legislation that the government has to introduce.

And if we all act in good faith, I think we shall not have to complain about situations like this one. I understand that the majority of members in the House are indeed in favour of such a procedure to make our proceedings more efficient and rapid. If some days are left to discuss very secondary matters, when we have more time to discuss, then we can use them.

I was a farmer for a long time and when the time came to make hay, I did not waste my time on ploughing. I made the hay, and then, if there was time left after that, I went to take the plough out. That is how I organized my personal life. I think we would be able, if we really wanted to be objective, to organize our proceedings so that we could pass the legislation presented to us by the government, even if we need not always agree with them. But after all, we must be reasonable. So I think that in the circumstances—

An hon. Member: I agree with that!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): —given the circumstances, it has been decided that discussions be limited on second reading in the committee of the whole. Everything went smoothly and we are now at the outset of third reading. We did not even wait for the statement of the hon. member who rose the day before yesterday. Therefore, I think we should not presume of his intention to speak for one, two or three weeks. The same situation might happen to a government member who could find himself in the opposition seats one day. He would not then appreciate being penalized in such a way. Do as you would be done by.

I think that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) should give second thoughts to the matter and if, one day, I realized that we are making fun in the House by unduly prolonging debates with all kinds of nonsense, I would then propose to strengthen the rules so we are not forced to use this famous closure. I do not like it because it smacks of dictatorship. I prefer democracy.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words concerning the motion proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I think it is important that we acknowledge the point that has been made, that the rule is very clear that the first speaker on this side of the House to respond has unlimited time. Frankly, I am a little surprised that government members have reacted so violently to the huffing and puffing of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) the other evening. We who have lived with the hon. member in committee understand that he puffs and blows quite a bit in committee, but generally, he quietens down and that is the end of him. For some reason the Minister of Finance seemed to get over exercised, and before anyone in the House was properly aware of it he was talking closure, "Shut him up," and the rest of it.

The reason I am very much opposed to the approach of the Minister of Finance is that I think this is a very dangerous precedent. The rules state very clearly that there is unlimited time for the first speaker on this side of the House. When are we going to find that closure will be used on a speaker who has only 30, 40 or 50 minutes just because the Minister of Finance does not like to hear what that hon. member is saying?

The fact is that the Minister of Finance does not seem to have the clout on his side of the House to get priority for his legislation to pass through the House. Various bills—I will not recite them—have received priority in debate, but for some reason the Minister of Finance has not been able to secure the time to get, for example, Bill C-22 before the House in adequate time to have a full discussion including committee of the whole stage and a full debate. Why is that? If the Minister of Finance is in that position, why should we on this side of the House be expected to bail him out? I suggest that not only with respect to Bill C-22 has he been most reluctant to advance his legislation. There is a long list of bills which I believe should be given priority, yet for reasons only known to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance and the government House leader, they are not getting priority.

I have often raised the question in the House as to why the minister, for example, does not come before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to deal with Bill C-5 which has been referred to that committee. For reasons that are not clear to me, he has categorically refused to give us in committee the benefit of his evidence on Bill C-5.

We are told we must wait until the Bretton Woods Agreement comes up along with Bill C-5. That is not good enough. Why have we not had some type of economic review in the committee? Why have we not had, for example, a review on the question of the de-control and post-control period with respect to the AIB? For reasons that are not understandable to me, the minister seems to have become the most secretive Minister of Finance who has been in office, certainly for decades—and that is saying a lot.

Mr. Rodriguez: He is not more secret than Turner was.

Mr. Stevens: Whatever happened to the Bank Act? Last fall we had a paper on the Bank Act and we understood that some priority was given to get the Bank Act moving. In the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs we even suggested to the Minister of Finance that he refer that paper to the committee so we could start in a preliminary way hearing witnesses in anticipation of the Bank Act being introduced. But nothing more was heard. I can only presume that the Bank Act will be hoisted and some time in 1978 or 1979 the parliament of the day may have to consider what changes may or may not be needed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Under closure.

Mr. Stevens: In short, it is the Minister of Finance who seems to have bungled. I believe that we on this side would be most ill-advised to support his closure motion when something has gone wrong. Basically, it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and we should not be called upon to bail him out.

I have no idea why the Minister of Finance changed his mind with respect to speaking on Bill C-22 on third reading. Initially he indicated to me that he intended to speak. I welcomed that because I felt there were a large number of very pertinent questions raised on second reading and in committee of the whole stage and if, in fact, we were faced with closure—which we were—I felt that the least the Minister of Finance could do after closure was to rise in his place and extend to the House the courtesy of some remarks on the points raised in committee of the whole and second reading. But for reasons known only to the Minister of Finance he decided not to give the House any information whatsoever on third reading: he chose not to speak.

I fully intended to respond to the Minister of Finance when he indicated to me that he intended to speak. I believe that perhaps that was the initial mistake made by the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Finance indicated that he would not be speaking to the House—I only got that second-hand—it was decided that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) would speak for five or ten minutes, touching particularly on some of the more technical aspects of the legislation. We wanted to make it clear that we did not propose to delay the bill unduly, closure having taken place, that we would make a few more points and then allow third reading. But, as we know and as the hon. member for Edmonton-West indicated, he was not recognized when he attempted to rise and the floor was given to the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

That being the case, and the Minister of Finance having set the stage by not speaking himself, it ill behooves him to bring in a measure such as the one before us today, the guillotine, to cut off the speaker who had the opportunity to speak as the result of the bill going into third reading stage. Surely what we have to ask ourselves, with the problems that are facing this nation, the economic slump, the overtaxation and the overspending at the federal government level, why is the Minister of Finance so reluctant to allow debate in the House touching on economic subjects and, in particular, so reluctant to give us some insight as to what is happening or is not happening in the Department of Finance?

The time has come for a few explanations, and I hope on opposition day tomorrow we will have the benefit of some insight that we have not received to date from the government as to what they intend to do to rectify the slump in which the nation finds itself, to make the necessary tax cuts and to give incentives to business to allow it to create some of the jobs that are needed, especially in the five eastern provinces.

In short, now is not the time for closure; it is the time for further debate in this House on the serious economic condition of this country. It is time to learn what measures, if any, the government proposed in order to rectify some of the problems we are now living with and which, I suggest, the government went a long way toward creating.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity today to take part in this debate, because it is high time the work of this House was speeded up beyond the snail's pace at which it has been moving since I have been here. In my view, we would be doing the nation a great service if we brought the rules of this institution into the twentieth century. Obviously, the tactic of the opposition is to castigate the government for trying to destroy parliament. That is pious tripe, and that tactic is used only to cover its own tracks. It has been my observation that in this House government proposes but the opposition disposes. Many of the opposition tactics are designed and executed not in the interests of the public but in an attempt to score cheap partisan points in order to embarrass the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am getting tired of the way the opposition stalls and delays and then makes sanctimonious speeches blaming the government for not proceeding with its legislative proposals. So is the public, and this reflects on the opposition. If the government is to proceed with the mandate it received at the last election, it must use the rules which exist to keep legislation moving through the various stages of the legislative process, just as the opposition has been consistently using the rules of the House to delay the passage of legislation. The vehicle available to the government is Standing Order 75C.

Mr. Epp: Are you reading?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Are you listening?

Mr. Epp: No.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is typical of members of the opposition; they never listen to anything except their own hollow sounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Can anyone who has watched the performance of this sanctimonious bunch in condemning the government for trying to get on with its legislative package suggest that the government is not more than justified in applying Standing Order 75C in this debate? During the last few days we have witnessed in this House what I would say is not only an irresponsible but a disgraceful abuse of the rules of this House, and the sole purpose of that charade has been to delay the legislation. Not only has there been repetition piled upon repetition, piled upon nonsense, but the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) in particular had the barefaced gall to abuse the patience of other hon. members with a 2½-hour diatribe of irrelevant and inconsequential blather which only came to an end when the clock mercifully moved to ten o'clock. This from a member of a party which applies to itself the entire litany of benevolent titles found in Holy Writ and the Lives of the Saints.

Members of the NDP seem to think that because they have canonized themselves as the saviours of the poor in this country, they have a right to delay any legislation they wish, any time they wish, even when, as in this case, their tactics deny to many of our citizens the tax rebates to which they are entitled and which in many cases they need. Sir, the dim lights of their self-imposed halos have grown dimmer, to the point of being extinguished, and their feet of clay have become as obvious as the hollowness of their arguments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It was interesting to see the House leader of the official opposition trying this afternoon to redeem his party from its alliance with the socialists. He talked about a parliamentary bind. Indeed they are in a parliamentary bind, and they are now trying to extricate themselves from the unholy alliance they made—which they would now have us believe they made unwittingly—to delay this legislation. It was interesting, also, to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) talk about respect for the rules. I know of no member of this House who can use the rules of this House for more delaying tactics than that hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Shame!

Mr. Broadbent: That is no way to talk about a "saint".

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member talks about the right of the first speaker under Standing Order 31, but he seems to forget that other members also have rights. We have the right to drive cars, for instance, but we do not have the right to hog the road. When any right impinges upon the rights of others, it is no longer a right but an abuse. Having to listen to the hon. member for Nickel Belt for 2½ minutes, let alone anything approaching 2½ hours, is an abuse to every listener.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: His voice is like yours.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The only abuse which could be worse than that would be to have to listen to the opposition member who is now chirping and who probably will not have the guts to get up and make a speech. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—

Mr. Peters: You are not making a speech now; you are reading the damn thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for York-Simcoe also decried the fact that we do not have the Bank Act before parliament. If the opposition is going to continue to delay and filibuster, what is the point of introducing more legislation? Let us clear up some of the legislation that is now on the order paper. Then the government will introduce additional legislation. The government will then bring forward the Bank Act, if there is any disposition in this House objectively and positively to debate the legislation the government does propose. As far as the rules of this House are concerned, Standing Order 75C is one of them and it is my hope that the government will continue to use it whenever it becomes obvious that the opposition is filibustering the attempts of the government which was elected by a majority of the people to govern this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, after that rather emotional and timely speech, I think I will take a somewhat more legalistic approach, even at the risk of sapping the emotion which pervades every debate on the allocation of time. Some call it closure but I refuse to do so. Let us try to make a collective reflection effort and consider the nature of that rule allowing the government, when consensus among the various parties is not forthcoming, to move a motion so as to allocate the time which it considers the House should use to study a part of a bill or a bill as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, that is nothing new: that rule has been included in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons for quite a while but it was not used on a regular basis for many reasons. It is indeed only recently that we realized we might better steady the course the House is taking while studying pieces of legislation.

● (1550)

Let us say at once that it is absolutely not a question of silencing the opposition or limiting debates as such but rather we want to avoid repetitions and improve the proceedings in the House, and this goes for both sides of the House. I would like to return more especially to the application of S.O. 75C. We all know that there are two other means to achieve the same result. At present, we have S.O. 75A and 75B. In S.O. 75A, when there is agreement among all parties, the government House leader rises and may propose a motion which is passed without debate and it is also a matter of time allotment, but merely as a result of an agreement between parties.

In S.O. 75B, the government is allowed to do the same when a majority of parties feel that the time has come to set a limit for those proceedings although a party or a group of members may disagree. Finally, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, when the various parties can not reach agreement, the government may act on its own and propose a motion. Then we have a debate. The same thing happens over and over again during each debate, the government tries to muzzle the opposition, it tries to ram it through.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time once and for all to put some order in this situation and I must say that this work has already been done by the members of all parties in the Committee on Procedure and Organization. Maybe hon. members recall that this committee sat in September and October last year to make a thorough review of the Standing Orders of the House. This matter of time allocation had been discussed by the subcommittees of that very committee. At that time, it had been decided to give each caucus of each party the possibility of making a study and giving its conclusions to the committee to find a way to avoid in the future such emotional discussions as we have when a motion asking for time allocation is proposed.

Mr. Speaker, as a matter of reference it would be useful to study the contents of the rules that the committee proposed and about which the caucuses have not given reports. In this second session, the committee has still not been allowed to resume the study where it had left off in October of last year.

The problem of Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C is a lack of flexibility because, when the government brings them forward, there is an automatic outcry from the opposition, sometimes because of their rigidity. We had provided for two means of action. The first one was . . . incidentally, Mr. Speaker, this is a document of the House. I am going to quote directly from the minutes of the Committee on Procedure and Organization and in particular, from the schedules of issue No. 20 of Thursday September 30, 1976.

Two solutions were then suggested and the leader of the opposition was in the House at the time. He will surely remember the discussion among committee members. Two possibilities were being studied. First, assembling rules 75A, 75B and 75C as well as rule 33 in one group. If all the parties agreed, we would then have proceeded somewhat like we are now doing while allowing the debate to proceed on a bill as a whole, and not simply as we now do at one stage or during study in committee. In other words, this aimed at allowing the time required for committee study at all stages.

Secondly, if all parties were not in agreement, the government could allocate a period of time, as now under rule 75C, while ensuring the protection of the rights of the opposition and especially as concerns allocated time, since it has been established that this time allowance could be made at all stages of the debate on the bill. The restrictions were as follows: There must not be more than one day of debate at each stage. Then, existing rules had to be clarified and somewhat simplified, while still keeping the present structure of rules 75A, 75B and 75C by allowing once again the government to move such a motion, but which would cover all stages.

What is the problem that we are now facing? Mr. Speaker, it is the second time in ten days that such a motion is moved for the same bill. All this could have been prevented if this rule had been accepted. A motion would be discussed for two hours, and then some time would be allocated for the debate on the bill as a whole. The problem is as follows: the government must propose a motion on two different occasions; both times, two hours are, if not lost, spent in discussing the value of such a motion which, to some extent, is a loss of time when this happens twice.

I wanted to speak not about the substance of the motion, its contents and the reasons which have brought the government to make use of this rule today, but rather to try to cause hon. members to reflect collectively on the matter so that we may once and for all settle the issue of time allowance in the House and that we may take into account the fact that in other jurisdictions it is regular, it is accepted, provided for every day of the week, everybody is aware of that and it has become a custom. Perhaps this House should realize that times are changing and that we should take this into account and because of the number and the substance of the bills, the government will have to make more and more use of amended rules because those we now have are clearly inadequate. That was the committee's conclusion last September, but we should set up a system which in addition to protecting the oppositions's rights, and that is essential, would allow the government to work in an effective way.

My point is the following: The motion under study today is the same we discussed last week. We are now simply at another stage and, had the Standing Orders been more flexible, again we would have avoided all this emotion surrounding the two hour debate on allocation of time. I would urge all parties in the House to renew the mandate of the Committee on Procedure and Organization in this second session so that it might resume the discussion of the already exhaustive document on parliamentary reform. That is simply one aspect, because many others had been reviewed at that time. The committee should bring forward to the House precise recommendations to update the procedures which are in many ways archaic and inadequate for 1977.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record immediately as saying that I will vote against the closure motion. The government has used closure too often. It is well to remind the House that when the new income tax legislation originally came before the House, it was piloted through this House, I am sorry to say, by Mr. Pat Mahoney who was then the member representing Calgary South. He did not return to the House in the next election. Hon. members who were here will remember that the new income tax bill was an enormously thick document, easily twice as thick as this bill which I am now holding up. That bill was rammed through the House by closure. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) was so disgusted with that procedure—and I will let hon. members in on a little secret; the hon. member is an ex-football player—that he picked up that bill and tore it in half.

Mr. Goodale: That was a demonstration of amateur sport.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) suggesting that the hon. member was involved in amateur sport. He earned a big salary playing football—$3,800! In his day that was a great deal of money.

Once more the government is imposing taxation by closure. The Liberal party set the precedent. It is giving the Canadian people the castor oil treatment. It is treating them like children, saying, "You are not well; you need the castor oil treatment." The government does not respect people's rights. By imposing closure it is saying to the people, "You are not well. Open your mouth and we will give you castor oil and make you better." That is exactly what the government is doing. As I say, the government is treating us like children. It is saying, "We do not want all this talk on the bill. Parliament is in the way." It thinks the executive is strong. It thinks that because it has the backing of all its seals.

Mr. Broadbent: Principal seals.

Mr. Woolliams: It has the backing of its principal seals, as the leader of the NDP says. It does not surprise me to see the government once more imposing taxation with closure. It has done it before, but if the recent Gallup poll is any guide it will not do it much more in future. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked about the Governor General's award of merit, I am sure nobody thought for a moment that he intended to go to the country. That, I suggest, is what the Canadian people would like. An election would be a good test. The parliamentary secretary talked about a majority, meaning the government's majority. I point out that the government received only about 40 per cent of the votes and they do not constitute a majority. I should like to see the government test the political water now, put its toe in the water to see what would happen.

Mr. Abbott: It will test the water in six by-elections.

[Mr. Lachance.]

• (1600)

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott). He has his problems. I do not want to worry him or cause him any great anxiety: he is trying to get a bill through the committee; he does not know what is in it and nobody else understands it.

I agree that the rules are to serve parliament and are not to be abused. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) got carried away a bit in his oratory. I was rather refreshed by his debate. After reading the Old Testament he started to read the New Testament. It is a long time since I reviewed many of those chapters. I am sure it was very relevant to this debate on taxation.

The real problem is that we again have the guillotine rule. We know what the government would really like to do. When you carry it right to the end, you might as well lock and chain the door of parliament and just let the executive run it. That is what they would like. They do not like to be prodded into action, if you can ever get them to act. They do not like constructive and responsible criticism of the measures they are trying to force on the Canadian people. I am not excusing the NDP member for abusing the rule. As our House leader said today, and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), if we allow this to be established as a precedent, the Liberal party, knowing the history and traditions of that party, and as the Prime Minister said when he belonged to the NDP—

Mr. Broadbent: He was never a member, so watch it.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, there has been a rumour to that effect.

Mr. Broadbent: I am denying it now.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Nobody in Quebec is a member of that party.

Mr. Woolliams: If you read the article which he wrote about 1960, you will see that the Prime Minister said that the name of the game is power. He said, "Give the Liberals power". They maintain power by handing out the plums, the parliamentary secretaryships, the judgeships, the whole thing. That is how they maintain power. It does not matter about principle; just get into office. That is why they use this method to ram through what they want. That is why I will not endorse by my vote this kind of procedure and this kind of tradition of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a gentleman for whom I have very high personal regard. His knowledge of the rules of this House is perhaps unequalled. He did, however, use the rules in a way which I am sure he will not be proud of when he sits back and thinks of what took place today. He cited Standing Order 31 of this House. It reads as follows:

Unless otherwise provided in these Standing Orders, when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, no member, except the prime minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member . . . shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

It is negative wording. By virtue of this rule, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), whose smile is nothing less than that of a Cheshire cat, and has been ever since he started this debate, is very proud of his contribution. However, I wonder if on reflection the members of his party will share the same pride in that contribution. This is the filibuster rule, according to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It so happened that a member of a minority group on that side was recognized by the Speaker. A member of the official opposition would in most circumstances be recognized. That particular member happened to catch Mr. Speaker's eye. He now demands the right to filibuster just as long as he sees fit.

When I came to my place of work in this House yesterday morning, I listened to the radio. I learned to my chagrin the debate was to go on and that the hon. member for Nickel Belt was going to speak day after day after day. That was, of course, a deliberate, provocative invitation to the government to do something to stop it. We are told by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the government is interfering with the democratic right of the hon. member for Nickel Belt to go on forever, day after day after day, citing the Bible to us and other great moral readings. We do not live in never-never land. There has been a good, adequate, thorough and complete debate on an essential measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members opposite may find it difficult to accept the principle of a majority deciding. They want to fall back on the filibuster rule and prevent the majority of the members of this House coming to a decision on an important matter of government business. What are the items in the bill? It imposes a surtax on incomes over $30,000. Members opposite try to leave us with the impression the bill takes away the surtax. Without this bill or an equivalent there will not be a surtax. The bill would provide increased allowances for child care. It recognizes the fact of inflation with regard to pension plans and registered retirement savings plans. These are alleged to be iniquitous things, just helping the rich, but they help many members of the unions in this country as well as many in small businesses. Members opposite know that.

There are many people who normally vote for the party which is responsible for this filibuster. They want to see this measure pass. They would certainly file their income tax returns with a great deal more confidence if parliament had completed its business in the orderly way in which a democratic institution should normally be permitted to operate.

I have listened to many acts of sophistry in this House since I have been here. I seem to win every second election, and that is all right. However, never in my career have I heard greater sophistry than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising with a straight face and telling us it is a democratic right of the hon. member for Nickel Belt to go on day after day after day reading the Bible to us, and that we should content ourselves with such a procedure. He indicated it was a dastardly thing to deprive the hon. member of his democratic right; that the government should not stop him. Who in his right mind could accept that as a version which should guide us in this place? We would be held up to ridicule all across this nation.

I believe that parliament has a responsibility to decide. The government was given no choice but to invoke the rule. The government's action was deliberately provoked by some members of the NDP. I predict they will not be proud of their action when they read the record.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I know how anxious the members of the New Democratic Party are to address themselves to this debate. I will take very little time because it is nice to see such a large turnout for a change. I rise because of the opposition being put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his motion. It causes me serious concern. I wish to address some very serious remarks to the House in light of the fact it has been admitted by a number of speakers, including the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Dionne), that this procedure will be used more and more in the course of the life of this parliament. I recall seeing statements to that effect by the government House leader indicating that they were going to introduce closure under rule 75C on various occasions in order to complete the legislative program.

I have spoken, in the debates with respect to closure, with apprehension and concern in opposition to this tactic because I think it is a reflection not of the interest of the government in giving us legislation which is worthwhile and defendable in debate but, rather, an indication that the government is now panicking with regard to its legislative function because it is afraid to listen to the speeches and criticism of the opposition. It is afraid to let its own members stand up and debate meaningfully the legislation presented to the House. Rather, hon. members opposite want to ram through, with a limited amount of debate, each and every piece of legislation that comes forward. I think this is what they would do if they had the opportunity.

If the members on the government side stopped to think about the position they are taking and what they are doing to what I consider to be the Liberal tradition, the attitude the Liberals have taken over the years—and I am no defender of the Liberal party—the attitude which Mr. St. Laurent took toward the House of Commons and which, indeed, Mackenzie King took toward the House of Commons, the importance they placed on full and unrestricted debate, I believe they would petition the members on the treasury benches not to move a motion to restrict debate. In saying this, I am not suggesting that on the occasions when the Liberal party deviated from what I consider to be the traditional Liberal position they were not punished very severely for their actions.

I would remind members supporting the government of what transpired when closure was introduced concerning important items of legislation such as the pipeline bill in 1956 and what the result was of such an approach to parliamentary discussion. The people of Canada are watching what is going on here, although there is not the most terrific number of copies of Hansard read or subscribed to each day. The fact is that people are following what is going on here and have a perception of what the government is doing.

I suggest very strongly that each time the government has to resort to closure, to this particular rule, the people of Canada will be getting the message that either the government is arrogant and refuses to have a forum of open discussion with respect to legislation before parliament, or it is incompetent and cannot get its legislation through in any reasonable or rational way.

Consider the history of what has happened in this particular parliament. What are we talking about now? This is the second closure motion brought forward on the income tax bill, a bill which flows from the budget of last May. I think that illustrates the incompetence we have seen in the management of the House on the part of the government. What of its priorities? One would have thought that if they were so anxious to get this bill through and enable rebates to be given to those who were entitled to them, they would have come back from the Christmas recess resolved that the first item of business would be the Income Tax Act. They would have challenged us to debate it and get our points of view across, and they would have made it a first item of priority.

But no: the government decided, in its wisdom, to bring in such items of legislation as the resolution on television being allowed in the House. They thought, I think, that bringing this measure forward would show how progressive they were and improve the public impression of the government. I think they wanted to show the people they had visited over the course of the Christmas recess that they were not the kind of government that everyone now is beginning to suspect and understand they are, a government without imagination, one which has not retained the will to govern but only the will to stay in power.

As far as the question of filibuster is concerned on the part of any member, I simply want to say this. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has spoken for 2½ or 3 hours. He has had a lot of fun, but even the hon. member for Nickel Belt, though he would not admit it, I am sure, is human.

An hon. Member: You go too far.

Mr. Rodriguez: Semi-human; sub-human.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is not going to carry on indefinitely. He is going to recognize his responsibility to this House, and I suggest that until otherwise is demonstrated it would be premature for the Minister of Finance to panic and to bring in this motion. As far as I am concerned, each time the government decides to bring in a closure motion to carry out its announced program of imposing restriction on debate it is the responsibility of every self-respecting parliamentarian, regardless of the party to which he belongs, to oppose it. What is parliament all about? Parliament is a forum to discuss legislation. Each of us represents a different area of Canada, a different consensus, a different point of view possibly. Our responsibility here is not to facilitate the onward march of the Liberal government in Ottawa. It is to let the Liberal government know what the people in our constituencies think.

An hon. Member: What about reading from the Bible?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact is, I speak not of biblical matters because I realize that the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt both accept that responsibility. I would say to them: Let he who casts the first stone, etc.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): "Let him", surely.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The suggestion made by the supporters of the government is that we should not talk too much about government legislation, and that we are somehow holding up the whole governmental process. But anyone who is on the government side will appreciate the fact that the day-to-day governing of the country does not stop because of discussion in the House of Commons. The executive carries on the day-to-day operations of government. The bills are being paid. The administration is carried on. We are addressing ourselves purely and simply to items of legislation and changes to legislation which the government is bringing forward.

I agree with the speech made recently by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the former leader of our party. Quite frankly, one wonders whether the government is preoccupied with the idea of bringing forward so many items of legislation simply to give the appearance of activity, as opposed to really thinking things out in terms of the legislation we really need. Every minister is competing to bring in a bill to show that his department is active and has new ideas.

I am reminded of a friend who told me that one of the legislatures—I think it was the Newfoundland legislature—went through one whole session, and maybe we should all be sent to St. John's to observe the legislature there to see how they did it, without introducing a single government bill. They dealt with estimates; they dealt with government spending and programs. I am not suggesting we should go as far as that, but it might be therapeutic for members of this House to go to that legislature where they are not preoccupied with bringing in one, two or three items of legislation for every minister to show how creative he is. Such bills serve no purpose except to clutter up the time available for debate in the House.

We have important things to do here. One of our functions is to examine the planning and the estimates of the government. Another important function, I suggest, is to examine tax bills put forward by the government. These two things go hand in hand. If the Minister of Finance and those who support him had their thinking caps on, they would understand that one of the last bills on which they should attempt to impose closure is a measure dealing with taxes, something which affects every person in the country. It is not a relatively unimportant bill about national monuments. If we were taking up many days talking about historic sites, I could understand the agitation of members of the government and their anxiety about holding up the House for that type of measure.

• (1620)

This is a substantial tax measure arising from the last budget. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what kind of motion is this, in view of the important legislation that is now before us? If the government is so anxious to get this bill through, where was the bill at the beginning of this session? Where was the income tax bill before the end of the last session? What was the government doing all last summer? Sitting contemplating the televising of the proceedings of the House, national historic sites, or what?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The bill was on the order paper.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister of Finance says the bill was on the order paper. That solves the whole problem! By some process of osmosis, every member of parliament was supposed to absorb the bill and then give the minister his thoughts and observations. I do not want to carry these remarks any further: the proposition is so preposterous. The position that the government and those who support it are taking is so outrageous that any self-respecting member who votes in favour of closure in respect of this bill had better be prepared to explain his action to his constituents.

Mr. Goodale: Mine are asking about their RRSPs. They want their RRSPs.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I was about to sit down, but the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) has asked me a question. He is a student of parliament, and has been for at least three years.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You mean at least three months.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He knows that parliament and parliamentarians have the right to know. He knows that totalitarian government is more efficient. If you start imposing restrictions on the right to speak, especially of parliamentarians, then parliament is far more efficient. I know it causes some difficulty for government members when they see members of parliament wanting to address themselves to particular pieces of legislation. We all know that Adolf Hitler saw it was far more efficient to have a "Führer", someone who would dictate the best wishes and interests of the people of his country. That is not the kind of parliament that I want to see in Canada, and it is not the kind of government that I want to see, either.

The government has a responsibility to be on guard, ready to answer. That is one of the responsibilities of government. It is an obligation which members who accept cabinet portfolios must carry. They should be prepared to answer to their peers in the House of Commons for any legislation that is put forward. Restriction of debate should not be used as some kind of program so they can proudly say to themselves that they are showing how efficient they are. If the members who are going to support the government will give consideration to what they are doing, to the position they are taking on this important piece of legislation and to the position they are taking with respect to this institution, then if they vote in favour of the motion they are doing a disservice not only to their party but to themselves.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best evidence of the cynical attitude that the government has toward parliament is to be found in counting the members on the government side who are in the House today. Here is an occasion when the government is imposing closure on parliament, an important procedural measure, and the government does not have enough members on its side of the House to maintain a quorum.

Mr. Lalonde: Watch out.

Mr. Broadbent: Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the government is concerned at all about parliament, and if it is concerned about the rights of members of parliament, then a basic obligation on the part of the government is at least to have sufficient members in the House to maintain a quorum.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Here they are now. Watch them coming in.

Mr. Broadbent: There are only eight or nine Liberals in the House at a time when closure is being imposed, though they are crawling out of the woodwork now, staggering out from behind the curtains.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And from the coffee bars.

Mr. Peters: If we walked out, they still would not have a quorum.

Mr. Broadbent: Perhaps I might take a couple of minutes to deal with the substance of the closure motion. Let me say at the outset that I agree with the government's right to impose closure. I agree that a government which has a majority in the House of Commons—whether or not it represents the majority of the voters—must have the right to exercise and implement the collective will of the government after a reasonable amount of time in debate has elapsed. So, unlike some members of the House who argue that closure is inappropriate in principle, I do not take that view; I think it is appropriate.

The question, then, is: At what point is it justified? I think it is extraordinarily important in this debate to remember that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) first spoke to closure, which he applied after only 4½ days of debate on a finance measure which goes to the root of the justification of parliamentary democracy in the first place—because parliaments were first formed to justify spending by the monarch—the minister did not even attempt to justify closure. Nowhere in his speech did he allude to the need for invoking closure on parliament, for cutting off discussion of this important matter after only 4½ days. He spoke only to the finance measures that we were considering. Not once did he offer any argument to justify closure.

Liberal members have again spoken in the House today, but there has been no justification put forward for bringing in closure on a finance measure after very limited debate. The most important clause, I would argue, or one of the most important, one that certainly reflects the generosity of Liberals toward the rich, imposes a surtax only for 1976 on those earning $30,000 a year or more, but removes it for this year, while the government maintains a controls program on ordinary wage and salary earners. Yet we did not even debate that clause, Mr. Speaker. No debate was possible on that crucial clause during committee stage of the bill before closure was applied and debate was cut off. Although I accept the principle of closure, that at some time the government must have the right to invoke closure if in the governments' view the opposition over a prolonged period of time is holding up a measure, I regard it as totally unjustified and absurd to apply the rule on this particular measure at this time.

As for the substance of the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Dionne) who is from New Brunswick, and an earlier speaker on the Liberal side from Montreal, I would have thought, particularly in the case of the latter speaker, that they had enough concern for the poor of this country and for the unemployed to see what a meretricious piece of nonsense this bill really is. The hon. member for Ottawa West said that all kinds of people benefit from the RRSP provisions; that all kinds of people benefit from the day care provisions; that all kinds of people—presumably he would have said, though he didn't—benefit from the removal of the $30,000 surtax.

I would say to the hon. member that that is only ritualistically true, that all citizens are open to benefits. This is like saying, as was said in the eighteenth century in opposition to the French aristocracy, that rich man and poor man alike have the right to sleep on a bridge over the Seine. But is it only coincidence that the poor have this experience? The point is that every one of the provisions that are open to the rich and the poor in this bill are overwhelmingly used by the rich because they provide overwhelming tax benefits for the rich. When they save on their taxes, it has to be made up by other taxpayers in this country.

If you want to extend pension benefits to the people of Canada, you should not do it by providing a tax rip-off for the majority of those in the upper income brackets. You should extend the benefits that are provided under the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act. They way to do it is to deal directly with the matter, not through some indirect tax benefit. Or if you are interested in improving day care, you do not do so by lifting disproportionately the tax burden on the rich. You do it by providing a direct grant, a demogrant, a cash payment with the same cash value for rich and poor alike, so that everyone can pay for day care. You do not give a tax benefit worth several hundred dollars to the rich and perhaps give nothing at all to a man or woman who is out working, has kids at home but is not in a position to pay any taxes at all. I repeat: if you are interested in day care, deal with it directly and make payments to those who need them.

I defend my colleague's right to oppose this bill in the way he has. How can we, when we are retaining controls on the income of ordinary people—I am thinking particularly of the organized workers who are still subject to controls—call for the removal of a surtax applied to people earning $30,000 or more in 1976? It boggles the mind, for anyone who has a remote sense of equity, to be able simultaneously to lift the burden off the rich and keep it on the poor.

As leader of my party I was delighted with the opposition mobilized by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) against this piece of iniquitous legislation. Parliament has not been abused up to this point in terms of the duration of the debate on the tax measure. The hon. member for Nickel Belt made a good case. It was suggested his biblical references were not pertinent to the bill. That might suggest that the whole Judeo-Christian tradition in both the Old Testament and the New Testament has nothing to do with the performance of the Liberal party. With that I would agree, but it has everything to do with the actions of men and women in this country who are concerned with fairness.

The final point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is about the talk of people waiting for tax returns. Government members should know that only about 3 per cent of Canadian taxpayers file returns before the middle of March; 97 per cent do not. We are talking about a very small group indeed. Beyond that we are talking in a very serious way about an important principle of tax fairness. I, for one, have been very proud of the action taken by the hon. member for Nickel belt who is concerned about equity, who is concerned about fairness and therefore could have nothing to do with this legislation.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to rise for a few moments. I am sorry to hear that the leader of the New Democratic Party has so little to be proud of that he can be proud of the shameful performance of his colleague the other day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I think it should be a matter of considerable shame to him that this House was so abused by that speech, by that misuse of time and by many of the things he said today. I thought it was particularly offensive that he should refer to the question of the number of members on this side of the House. It is a very rare day, and this happens to be one, when that party can muster more than a corporal's guard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: If it were not for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) they would frequently find their benches empty. I think that was a cheap shot and unworthy of the leader of the New Democratic Party. I can well remember an opposition day about a year ago, one that he sponsored, when after making a speech on the economy he saw fit to walk out of the House and leave his benches denuded so that he might go on television for the rest of the afternoon. Why does he insult members of this party who always have a quorum, when he knows that full well?

On the question of the allocation of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, many of those of us who came here in 1974 are amazed that this rule is not used more frequently. It seems an outrage to those members who have come here to try to do a reasonable job that there should be nine days debate on this bill. A rule that is in the book should be used or should be removed. If hon. members want to see the rule removed, they have never proposed that although, perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has. The leader of the New Democratic Party says it is a good rule but it should not be used in this case. He says this is an important bill—a bill that has received very little debate. Mr. Speaker, it has received nine days' debate, plus whatever time is allocated under this restraint.

The question is: When should the rule be used? A budget is delivered in the spring. Hon. members opposite are crabbing because a budget is not to be brought in sooner than next spring, yet they refuse to allow the government to pass legislation under the last budget. Either pass it or defeat it. Some hon. members opposite are ready to resign because they are so frustrated. What is the purpose of parliament? Surely it is not, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatsyhyn) says, simply to sit here and deal with estimates. Surely there are occasions when the government must introduce legislation with a reasonable expectation of having it passed.

The hon. member quoted his former leader who is so admired by all of us in contrast to some other one might mention. He resents the fact that legislation comes before the House and is eventually voted upon. Surely there has to be some termination. If the opposition is just going to misuse the rules as the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has, surely it is open to the government to use the rule lawfully passed by this House for this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I remember standing in the hall of the mother of parliaments with a member of the Conservative party whose name I shall not mention. I said, "You are a great expert on the rules. Why is it that the mother of parliaments"—that parliament which the Tory party so reveres—"uses closure with such frequency, and we hardly use it at all?" He said that in his judgment it was probably because the opposition party in Britain expected some day to form the government, whereas in this country they sometimes lose sight of that possibility and they therefore resent the use of closure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I thought that was typical of the wisdom that this hon. member frequently displays. It is all right to stand up, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar did, and try to fool those who may read his speech, or the newspaper report of it, but I hope he is not trying to fool himself. If that is the case, he is in real trouble. We know that in the eyes of the general public the parliament of Canada is not relevant to their concerns mainly because it appears to be a time-wasting institution incapable of doing business. I suggest that when we attempt to bring in legislation relative to a budget introduced last spring, after nine sitting days of debate, and then bring in a motion under a rule to be used by parliament, and hon. members stand up and suggest we are attempting to throttle parliament, they are either fooling themselves or trying to fool Canadians.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I was reluctant to enter the debate, but I must respond to the call to arms when my rights as a member of parliament are attacked, even though I may be the least ranking on the opposition side, tucked up here in this corner. I used to sit in another corner, a border guard to the socialists, but it was felt that it was perhaps more in keeping with my philosophy to have me over here on the right.

I have two regrets, Mr. Speaker, besides the government's introduction of this motion for closure. One is that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) did not have the opportunity to read the whole of the New Testament, and the second is that he did not believe what he read. I wish, in all seriousness, that he believed the things he read. I wish, for instance, that he believed there is a separation and an alienation between God and man. The Scriptures refer to it as sin. I wish that he believed there was a way for reconciliation to the person of Christ.

• (1640)

An hon. Member: The whole NDP is in hell.

Mr. Whiteway: I hear some comments from hon. members. I do not know whether they will appear in Hansard, but I hope hon. members will take some of these things seriously, not what I say but what I refer to in the Scriptures read by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

An hon. Member: Andy Hogan reads them every day.

Mr. Whiteway: May I say to the leader of the NDP that I wish that some hon. members, whether in his party or in mine, would listen and believe the things that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) reads every day. I also wish this House had listened more attentively to what was read by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, because I think much wisdom can be gained from that ancient book referred to as the Bible. I would simply say that if justice is to prevail and this motion of closure is to be passed, and the hon. member for Nickel Belt were to resume his reading, I hope that this House might be filled with members listening attentively to the reading of all 27 books of the New Testament.

I want to make a few remarks about the government. I do not deny that the government has the absolute right to govern. They have that right by reason of winning the election and having a majority in the House of Commons. They have the absolute right to set priorities, to set tax levels, to bring in fiscal and monetary policies, to bring in legislation, to give direction to the country in domestic and external affairs, to run parliament and to make sure that the legislative process runs smoothly and efficiently. I admit that they have the absolute right to govern; but if that is true, it is also true that the opposition has the absolute right to scrutinize the decisions of the government and to criticize them. We have the absolute right to bring forth amendments and suggestions to try to persuade the government, by sound judgment and reasonable argument, to the point of view that we hold.

One of my colleagues pointed out that the government so often does not realize that it does not represent the majority view of Canadians. To be sure it represents the majority of members of this House, but not the majority view of Canadians. Perhaps we should allow a transferable ballot so we could ensure that the members elected here are elected by a true majority. Having said that, I wish to point out that it is at the very least a confrontation of my right as a backbench member of the opposition to scrutinize the activities of the government. I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), who seldom listens to anybody on this side of the House, "Bring in closure, sir, if you will. But in my remarks I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; and I shall be heard."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jones: —but not too brief. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a great deal of overreaction both on that side and on this side.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That condemns all of us.

Mr. Jones: This is a serious day in the second session of this thirtieth parliament when we see closure being brought upon us. It is a sad day. I do not think the point is whether the government has the right to do so. It is one of those rules of procedure which can be overused. It is like one of those situations we have at home sometimes. We overuse our rights and sometimes we abuse our obligations. Mr. Speaker, each member of the House—you, I, and all of us—was elected to preserve freedom. Also, we were elected with a freedom, the freedom of choice. In the constituency from which I come, freedom is sacred and it shall persevere. The freedom of choice is very important. But the freedom of which we are speaking today is the freedom of speech. Many of my friends, most of them men and women from my community, fought for this country and fought hard, and many of them lost their lives to protect the freedom of democracy that we hold so dear to our hearts in the democratic system.

[Mr. Whiteway.]

Mr. Harquail: Shame. You speak of freedom, yet when you were mayor of Moncton you refused to allow the French to place a plaque which had French on it on the city hall building in Moncton, New Brunswick.

Mr. Jones: The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) talks about frivolous things.

Mr. Harquail: It was not a frivolous statement. You speak about freedom.

Mr. Jones: If the hon. member wants to speak about the motion, he can; otherwise, he should shut up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) has the floor.

Mr. Peters: If he does not shut up, perhaps the hon. member should.

An hon. Member: But he's a Liberal.

An hon. Member: I doubt he is a Liberal.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to be very serious about this. It is quite obvious that the Liberals and the hecklers over there cannot be serious, and never have been. The discussions and debates in the House are based on freedom of speech, and we must preserve it. Whether you like it or not, a closure motion takes away that freedom. Many have said that the government has that right under Standing Order 75C. I suggest that they have that right but there are certain common law rules with which they have to comply before that right is applicable. I do not agree with the filibuster, but I totally disagree with any attempt to take away one's right to speak.

The whole thing is a good lesson for this government and for governments of the future to set up their priorities and their goals in order to mobilize their forces properly and try to obtain the co-operation of the House. We have many things to do in this country, and we cannot do them entirely under the adversary system. Every member of parliament has rights and obligations in the House, and we should have the freedom to protect those rights and obligations. Surely taxation by closure is not proper, and surely taxation without representation is not proper. I suggest that the effect of this closure motion, if it is passed, might be to take away a person's right to representation. If so, it would result in taxation without representation. Closure is a brutal and hateful procedure which should either be deleted from the rules or used very infrequently. There should be more provisions and conditions before rule 75C can be used.

I agree, and I think members on both sides of the House will agree, that a great deal of time has been wasted in the House in the last 2½ years; there has been a great deal of inefficency, bungling and blundering. No one can take the blame for that but the government. The government sets the agenda; it decides what takes place from day to day. I suggest that the government is totally and ultimately to blame for what is happening here today. Today, on this motion, we have to wait at least two hours. I cannot support a motion for closure. It is too dictatorial and too arbitrary, but if closure is going to be the procedure which is in vogue for this government, God help us. We are God-fearing people, but if things like this take place we should fear the results. Surely this House is intended for honest and decent debate, but honest and decent debate can be foiled by closure motions.

Those who are interested in televising the procedures of this House will find that there is a real problem, because if closure is invoked time after time there will be nothing to televise but closure debates. I suggest that the mover of this motion consider, right now, the possibility of withdrawing his motion and meeting with the House leaders and others in this House who are concerned, to see if this procedure can be stopped and if we can get on with the business of the House in a more amicable and proper way.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and the rather eloquent plea he put on the record of this House today for sweet reason to prevail in all the deliberations in this place. I am sure it is the wish of all of us, particularly those who sit on this side of the aisle, that that in fact could be the rule of the day and the way that all things in this House could proceed. Unfortunately, that does not seem to be the prevailing disposition, particularly across the way.

I point simply to the fact that under the procedures set out in Standing Order 75C, as the minister indicated in the House yesterday, it was in fact impossible to get the co-operation of hon. gentlemen opposite, at least of those in the New Democratic Party, to facilitate the work of this House and to proceed expeditiously with this debate. Their agreement and their willingness to proceed in an effective fashion to deal with the business of the country was not forthcoming. That is the very basis upon which this motion was moved. If that agreement had been forthcoming, we could have proceeded in a fashion which would be more acceptable to all hon. members, but that sweet reason was not present amongst members of the New Democratic Party.

I am happy to have this opportunity to speak in support of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I suggest that this motion does not impose unreasonably upon any member of this House. It does not treat anyone unfairly. It is not the cruel guillotine about which hon. members opposite complain. In the first place, it is an effort to bring an end to the ludicrous and irresponsible abuse of our rules by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I refer to Hansard of earlier this week, page 2813, where the hon. member indicated to the House and to the country that he—one member, all by himself—intended to speak until Friday on the measure which was then before the House, the measure with regard to the Income Tax Act. He hoped to take up a full week—and he is one single member. The hon. member gave a clear warning to this House and to the country that he intended to misuse and abuse the rules which are there to ensure the effective functioning of this parliament. We have moved responsibly to stop that abuse.

I cannot entirely blame the hon. member for Nickel Belt. He may well be merely the poor, uninformed, backwoods school teacher he has described himself to be. However, I suspect that the real source of the difficulty this House is in at this moment lies with the House leader for the New Democratic Party. I think that is where the responsibility for this kind of abuse must lie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: With that gentleman lies the responsibility for obstructing the progress of this bill for many months. I point out that last week the Minister of Finance moved a motion under Standing Order 75C to allocate eight additional hours of debate to the committee stage of the bill. At that time the proposals in the bill, as the minister pointed out, had already been debated in principle for six days during the budget debate, and the bill itself had been before the House five additional days and had received more than 14 hours of detailed consideration. Since the motion moved by the minister last week was adopted, we have spent eight hours at the committee stage and an additional full day at third reading stage, with the hon. member for Nickel Belt taking up virtually all of the latter time.

Mr. Rodriguez: Why didn't you stand up and speak?

Mr. Goodale: Surely this House has been more than lenient with the hon. member and with other hon. members opposite. It is instructive that when this measure was debated last week, one third of the members of the New Democratic Party were missing. It is instructive that only 64 members of the opposition turned up to vote against what they so pompously tried to describe as a "stifling of parliament". Only half of them bothered to vote.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Goodale: That is a demonstration of the shallowness of their concern and of the transparency of the phony facade which we have seen them try to put up today. Even some hon. members opposite have seen what I have just tried to point out to the House. When the Minister of Finance rose in his place yesterday to indicate his intention to put this motion today under the provisions of Standing Order 75C, even the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), a member of the New Democratic Party, pounded his desk in support. I think that indicates that there are a few gentlemen opposite who can see through the facade to what they are trying to do.

In addition to avoiding the abuse and misuse of our rules which we have seen by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, it is important also to assure and reassure the people of Canada that this institution is capable of conducting the business of the country. What we have seen is not constructive debate aimed at improving the legislation.

Mr. Peters: How would you know; you weren't even here?

Mr. Goodale: We have not seen a detailed plan of action coming from across the way to try to correct what hon. members opposite see as defects in this bill. What we have had is pure and simple obstruction for the sake of obstruction itself. What is the result of that? What are the consequences of the House being misused and abused in this way? It is not simply a matter of abuse; let us remember that the business of the country has to be set aside, postponed and delayed because of this tactic. At present there are 26 government bills before the House, including such important measures as the employment and immigration bill, the Air Canada bill, the immigration policy bill, the National Transportation Act amendments, and the human rights and interests bill. We will soon have the main estimates before us. We will soon have legislation dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and we will have legislation and proposals dealing with social services, telecommunications and the independence of parliament to be debated. One can see that the House has a heavy legislative program to be completed.

The House is scheduled to sit 47 more days from now until April 6, which is the usual date for beginning the Easter adjournment. There are seven allotted days, which reduces the number of days available for government business to 40. If the work of this session is to be completed by a reasonable time this summer, we must operate in the way in which the people of Canada expect us to operate, in an effective and business-like fashion.

What we have seen from hon. members opposite, particularly from members of the New Democratic Party in the present context, is an effort to try to bring this institution to a grinding halt. They may see some political advantage in that. It may be in relation to the present measure which is before the House, the Income Tax Act. However, I suspect it is broader than that, because they feel it might well be in their political interest to try to bring this institution to a halt, to make it inefficient, to obstruct it and to keep it from doing the business of the country so that they can then heap abuse or discredit on the government when they themselves are the authors and architects of that inefficiency and inability to do business.

I think the Minister of Finance deserves the credit of this House for taking the step he has taken to bring this debate to an end and to establish a measure of efficiency here so that we can do what we have been elected to do, and that is to consider the business of the country and to do so efficiently.

● (1700)

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak for a few minutes in order to register my displeasure with the motion brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I noticed that when the parliamentary secretary who just resumed his seat complimented the minister for what he had done, he turned pink. I understand why—obviously he is ashamed of this action.

Mr. Goodale: Nonsense.

[Mr. Goodale.]

Mr. Yewchuk: And so he ought to be.

Mr. Goodale: Nonsense. Do not attribute motives.

Mr. Yewchuk: I wonder how hon. gentlemen opposite will face their constituents and tell them that within the past seven days they have twice invoked closure.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Goodale: Our constituents are asking about their RRSPs. They want to know what is to happen.

Mr. Yewchuk: I object to the government's ramming the bill through the House without allowing sufficient debate. I am not here to defend the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I know his speeches are full of paranoia, stridency, perhaps even hysterical whining. Nevertheless, even though I often find his comments irritating and do not agree with them, I am willing to defend his right to put forward his views.

Mr. Epp: Send him a bill for your diagnosis.

Mr. Yewchuk: That was a diagnosis without fee, Mr. Speaker. If we believe in democracy, if we believe in freedom, then we as members of parliament must in good conscience object strenuously to the bullying tactics of the Minister of Finance. The members of this House are men and women from all parts of Canada. They have been sent here to speak on behalf of the people of Canada, to express in parliament their views on behalf of their constituents. In this chamber the expression of such views is supposed to carry weight; it is supposed to leave some impression with policy-makers. Unfortunately, it is obvious that policy-makers are not interested in the representations members of this House make on behalf of their constituents.

One hon. member opposite said that the government is not trying to muzzle parliament. But look at the record. We have witnessed increasingly frequent attempts to muzzle parliament and ever greater restrictions placed on the ability of members to express their views. We are close to the situation in which perhaps one minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will say, "Why leave the running of the country to the politicians when we can do it so much better ourselves? We do not have to listen to parliament." Mr. Speaker, I have heard a comment of that kind; it was made by a representative of a totalitarian state who tried to justify a dictatorial form of government. Dictators say, "Why should we let politicians decide the policies of our country and what the government ought to do?" In the present instance we see an example of exactly that kind of thinking.

Hon. members opposite have repeatedly said that Standing Order 75C is not the guillotine or closure rule. If it is not the closure rule, what is it? What does it do to debate?

An hon. Member: It kills debate.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is right, it kills debate. If that is not closure, I do not know what is. I suggest that it is closure, no matter what you call it. I remind the House that in 1969 Standing Order 75C was forced through the House with the use of closure, by the very same government which is now again attempting to muzzle the opposition. It is doing this because it cannot stand criticism. The government used closure to bring in the closure rule and it is now imposing closure once more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 5.06 o'clock p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA—MESSAGE FROM HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received, which is as follows:

Government House

Ottawa, February 9, 1977

Sir:

The Governor General has asked me to transmit to you the text of the message he received this morning from Her Majesty the Queen:

[English]

I am most grateful to the Senate and House of Commons of Canada for their kind and loyal joint address on the 25th anniversary of my accession as Queen of Canada. I shall be most grateful if you will convey to both Houses an expression of my gratitude and appreciation for this address which I deeply value.

Elizabeth R.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière, Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION PAYABLE TO PERSONS SIXTY-FIVE YEARS OF AGE AND OVER CONTINGENT UPON RESIDENCE IN CANADA

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-35, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I will wait a few moments until everyone settles down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Any discussions, I suggest, should be held behind the curtains. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has the floor.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, when we were on the subject of Bill C-35 yesterday I was in the process of outlining the fact that while the bill may have the effect of correcting certain inequities in our pension system, it also has a very substantial amount of material missing, such as proposals which are required in order to facilitate care of the elderly in this country. I was indicating that in my view the practice of the last two decades, which has been based largely on institutionalizing our elderly citizens, was probably not the right approach, besides being a little too costly. I was in the process of making a plea to the government, for as long as it has the responsibility of government, to take the action necessary to provide alternative services for elderly citizens.

I think we would all agree that institutions of various types which are dedicated to the care of the elderly are necessary for our senior citizens. But we also know that keeping the elderly at home in their own environment for as long as they wish is far more desirable than simply throwing them into an institution and forgetting about them until they are dead. However, the situation in Canada is such that services which are required to achieve this aim are very sadly lacking, and I wanted to conclude my comments by outlining some of the measures that need to be taken if, indeed, we are to create an environment which would allow our elderly citizens to remain in their own homes or in the homes of their families to the maximum extent possible.

First of all, there should be a larger number of the day hospital type of institution. It is suggested that patients would be admitted only in the day time. That would certainly help to decrease the number of admissions and facilitate earlier discharge. It is also suggested that an emergency care "flying squad" would be very useful. The experience of a hospital in England has shown the value of a geriatric flying squad which consists of a multi-disciplinary team comprising a physician, public health nurse and social worker, and can respond to emergency situations developing in the community by giving advice, or a visit being made by one of the team. This team would be based in the day hospital and would consist of day hospital personnel responding to telephone requests for assistance from patients on the day hospital roster.

There is also need for a large number of geriatric consultation clinics. It would be useful to increase the number of these clinics to provide for increased referrals from family practitioners and health centres. There is also need for early diagnostic health examinations to be carried out on a greater scale and to be more readily available. Here, assessments of the elderly would provide early diagnosis of treatable conditions, with the assessment of social circumstances aimed at improving the home environment and utilizing community resources, working in close liaison with other departments such as departments of ophthalmology and otolaryngology, podiatry and orthopedics.

There is also a need for follow-up clinics. An enlargement of these services would be necessary for the continuing care of elderly patients who have been discharged and do not have their own family practitioner. This would have obvious possibilities in regard to education for undergraduates, resident physicians and other health professionals. It would also increase opportunities for research projects in the area of geriatrics.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is greater need for a larger number of community care facilities to establish liaison among various health centres, family practitioners and public health nurses. There is also need for provision of certain services, one of which is ascertainment services. Patients at home or in other health centres who are over 70 years of age would be visited by public health nurses and referred for any necessary examinations or services. Regular visits would be continued as a preventive measure. The value of such visits has been well demonstrated in other countries and in some areas in our country where these visits are made. Consultation services would see referrals and would provide information regarding health services and developments in geriatrics. Domiciliary visits would be made at the request of the family physician, or when the patient has no doctor, at the request of the public health nurse. This would allow the patient's social environment to be assessed, as well as his or her health.

● (1740)

Mr. Speaker, I could go on a little longer, but I want to give my friend, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), a chance to say a few words. I will conclude by saying it is time we looked seriously at providing alternative services which are less costly and which would enable elderly citizens to keep their rightful place in the general community environment which is far more pleasant to them than has been the case in institutions up to now.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I intend to end my remarks at six o'clock in order that the bill can go to committee, as is the wish of members on this side at least. I think this is another example that if the government brings forward legislation that makes sense and is favourable, it receives speedy passage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: There are a few points I want to make about Bill C-35, and I am pleased that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) is in the House. I wish the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) were also with us, because the bill has very serious implications for immigrants to Canada. The long-term effects of the bill will be felt more by immigrants than any other group in our society.

I do not want to go over ground that has been covered already, but I welcome the provision that will allow Canadians to collect a partial pension. That is an improvement over the "all or nothing" rule that is presently the case. I welcome this in view of the fact that for health reasons many Canadians are forced to relocate, and if they do not return to Canada prior to becoming eligible for the old age pension at age 65 they lose any pension benefits they might have earned.

One might say it is not a contributory plan as is the Canada Pension, but as one of my colleagues has stated, it is contributory through the tax system. Everyone who has paid taxes in Canada in one form or another has contributed to the old age pension fund. Now the 1-40 rule will allow Canadians to collect at least a portion of the pension relative to the number of years they have been in Canada after the age of 18. I welcome that change.

I want to speak specifically about immigrants, however, and how the bill will affect them. The advantage for the immigrant community is that the bill will allow persons to receive pensions earned in the country of origin. In the case of residents from the United Kingdom, this has been well documented by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). These immigrants will now see an escalation of their pensions. The pensions they receive today have been frozen and bear no relationship to the contribution they made or the years they worked and absolutely no relationship to the present cost of living. That aspect of Bill C-35 is very welcome and those members should be commended for mentioning these provisions at second reading. Not only that, but members have spoken time and time again, as well as corresponding with the minister, in an attempt to have pensions earned by former residents of the United Kingdom bear some resemblance to the cost of living here.

I should like to urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and any others involved to negotiate agreements with countries that have indicated a willingness to sign a formal pension arrangement with Canada. This bill will allow for such negotiations and arrangements, and I urge that they take place as quickly as possible.

There is a caveat, however, and I want to mention it to the minister. When speaking on the bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated he was in favour of it because it would place everyone on an equal basis. I am not one to second-guess the hon. member on his knowledge of pension rights. In theory, he is correct. But, Mr. Speaker, he is not totally correct when you consider immigrants coming to Canada and you look ahead over the next 40 years.

While passage of Bill C-35 will facilitate receipt of pension benefits earned in countries of former residents, the provision relates only to immigrants from countries with social security plans. For example, the United Kingdom, Italy, France and the United States have been mentioned as wanting a formal arrangement. What happens to immigrants from, for lack of a better word, developing countries? What happens when they come to Canada because there is no social security system in the country of origin?

In the last few years immigration has gone down from 200,000 to approximately 150,000. The figures are not entirely accurate, but if we take the most educated guess that we can of an annual immigration of 50,000 our net immigration at the present time is in the neighbourhood of 100,000 persons per year. What is happening is that an ever-increasing number of immigrants are coming from the developing world. Not only is that the case, but if you look at the applications you find an ever-increasing number from these countries. In fact, the pressure is so heavy at our immigration offices in some of these countries that applications are not even encouraged; the potential applicant is told he will not be accorded an interview for eight or 12 months. So the number of applications we might have were it not for the backlog cannot be assessed.

What happens to these immigrants who will become Canadians? After February 15 they will have that opportunity after three years' residence in this country. What happens to an immigrant from a developing country who is not even an elderly immigrant? Under the point system now, any immigrant having attained his thirty-fifth birthday or less is given ten points. For every year over the age of 35 they lose one point of those ten points. Let us consider an immigrant aged 35 who gets ten points. By awarding those ten points the department does not regard him or her as an elderly immigrant, if I can use that term. If this person then comes to Canada and works for 30 years until the age of 65, the normal retirement age, that person has worked in Canada for the majority of his or her adult life but will only be accorded three-quarters of a pension. Let us say, for example, that that person has contributed to society, as opposed to someone who has contributed very little either through work or through the tax system. I question whether that is a very responsible manner of looking at this matter. I admit that I do not have a better solution, but I wonder what will happen when we look at this regulation in the future.

● (1750)

What we must do as a partial solution—this is why I wish the Minister of Manpower and Immigration were here—is reassess the whole concept of sponsorship and nomination. Under the concept of sponsorship, in the new regulations, if the bill is passed, sponsorship will be allowed for parents and grandparents of any age. I am sure most members of the House have had people come to them saying they would like to sponsor their parents who are of such and such an age, and asking when they will get their old age pension. I think it is to the credit of immigrants and their concept of the extended family that they accept their responsibility toward elderly parents and grandparents.

The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) in his closing remarks stated that we have transferred the care for the elderly to institutions. Surveys show very clearly that the greatest problem of the elderly is not health care, but loneliness. The fact is that the immigrant communities have had a keener awareness of their responsibility to older family members. I believe the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will have to look seriously at the whole question of sponsorship, in view of the fact that immigrants now coming to Canada at the age of 65, let us say, and normally receiving the old age pension at that age, will not be entitled to any more than one-quarter of the pension. The reason this is important is that if you look at demographic studies in Canada you will find that we have an aging population. This is of concern to many of us who have studied the statistics of Canada's population in the last few months, because with an aging population you also have an increased dependence factor.

So I suggest to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, as well as to the minister in whose name this bill stands, that we will need a well defined publicity campaign to explain not only to potential immigrants, but to people who will sponsor immigrants, what the changes will be. I would like to stress to the minister that it is of utmost importance that persons who apply to come to Canada as immigrants under the sponsored or nominated categories will have their benefits reduced if Bill C-35 passes.

In the remaining minutes before six o'clock I want to present one matter to the minister which is related directly to the old age pension, even though not specifically to the bill. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will give me the latitude to present the case. I have already said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others have welcomed Bill C-35 because of the equality it gives to the pension scheme. But there is one form of pension that is not equal, other than the one I have mentioned already, and that is the matter of the spouse's allowance. I must say to the minister that spouse's allowance as it exists at present in the act is not equal and is not fair.

The minister might say that that question is not before us, but I believe that the entire pension plan and benefits to the elderly are open for discussion. Let us consider a case, because I believe that when we look at cases we understand a little better. Let us consider a husband who is older than his wife, which I believe is the case most often, and is receiving old age security as well as a partial or total guaranteed income supplement. His spouse is between the age of 60 and 65 and is therefore entitled to a spouse's allowance on the basis that she is married to a pensioner receiving a part or total guaranteed income supplement.

When the pensioner dies, not only does the surviving spouse lose the pension as well as the supplement, but she also loses the spouse's allowance. The majority of these unfortunate people between the age of 60 and 65 cannot go back to the labour market. Not only are they faced with personal loss and loss of pension; they are also faced with loss of this picayune spouse's allowance which they were receiving. One might say that that is the regulation, that is the way the bill was passed by the House and there is no further argument. But the total unfairness is that there is a way out, and that is a common law relationship. The government, for purposes of spouses' allowance, accepts a common law relationship.

I say that is totally and absolutely wrong. We are saying to a widow, "No, you are not entitled to anything. You lose everything". But if I can be crude about it, we are also saying to her, "If you are shacked up with somebody, we will give you the spouse's allowance." That is totally wrong. If we could poll members on the government side, we would find that many of them would agree it is wrong because what it does is give official recognition to an illegal arrangement. In conclusion, I want to say to the minister again, even though it hits a sensitive nerve, that this is wrong and I for one want to see it changed. Let us be fair not only to immigrants under Bill C-35 but also to surviving spouses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the consent of the House to revert to motions?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR AID IN PROTECTING SEAL HUNTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The announced threat of the Greenpeace organization to deliberately interfere with the seal hunt in northern Newfoundland and Labrador is contrary to Section 381 (paragraphs (a) to (g)) of the Criminal Code, particularly the part relating to wrongfully and without lawful authority causing persons to abstain from anything they have a lawful right to do, in addition to constituting criminal interference, intimidation, phony pretensions of being humane, and being without regard for Newfoundland Canadians who are trying to earn a livelihood in the traditional way of life in Newfoundland and Labrador. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House orders that the Department of National Defence, under its responsibility for co-ordinating surveillance and patrol and aid to the civil powers and also the RCMP, devise a plan directed to supplementing fishery official strength to protect the landsmen's traditional rights and that until the appeal against Brian Davies comes to court that he be placed in a straightjacket—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No!

POLYSAR

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF CONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN WRONGFUL PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that an internal report prepared by Polysar Limited and dated January 31 of this year contends that practices which can only be termed "kick-backs" were engaged in by that company's Swiss subsidiary, PISA, up to at least September, 1976, and considering that the Prime Minister said in the House on December 2, 1976 that guidelines covering such behaviour existed for ministers who have Crown corporations under their command, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Prime Minister explain by means of a statement on motions why the nefarious practices of the Polysar subsidiary were permitted to continue at least to the last quarter of 1976 and quite conceivably beyond that point.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion cannot be put without unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTION MEDIA CLARIFY POSITION OF CERTAIN GROUPS UNDER NEW OLD AGE PENSION RULES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a motion which I have shown to Liberals, Conservatives, Social Crediters and the hon. member for Moncton—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: What about the NDP?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My colleagues trust me, Mr. Speaker. It is a motion which I am sure all of us agree should be passed in the hope that the media will take notice of it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

● (1410)

That this House urges the media to make it clear to the people of Canada that anyone now in Canada who is 25 years of age or over will not be affected by the new rules regarding old age security but will, on reaching age 65, be able to qualify under the residence rules now in effect for the full amount of the basic pension.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. It is moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

CORPORATIONS

PROPOSAL TO APPOINT TRUSTEE FOR CANADIAN JAVELIN LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canadian Javelin Limited, a public Canadian company, again has a board of directors controlled by John C. Doyle, a fugitive from justice in Canada and the United States, and that the Doyle-controlled board now threatens to drop court actions commenced by the company against Doyle and others for alleged frauds against the company, that the company has not had an annual meeting since June 30, 1975 or issued audited financial statements since 1974, and that the company's auditors have resigned, and in view of the fact that despite revenues of $7 million a year it has not paid a cash dividend to its registered and unregistered shareholders for ten years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House direct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) to act immediately under the provisions of the Canadian Corporations Act, or other relevant legislation, to appoint a trustee to assume control of Canadian Javelin Limited to ensure the proper administration of the company for the benefit of its shareholders and creditors and that a complete investigation be made of all aspects of the operation of the company since its inception.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some concern about the jurisdiction of the House of Commons as it relates to the subject matter of the motion, but in any case I will ask whether or not there is unanimous consent. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TOTAL PENSION PACKAGE GRANTED TO MR. PRATTE AND MR. CHARTRAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House concerning an important matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House directs the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to table the pension, gratuities and fringe benefits granted by Air Canada to former chairman of the board, Yves Pratte, and former vice-president, P. ENERGY

KITIMAT PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY PROPOSAL DISCUSSED AT CABINET MEETING ON AUGUST 12, 1976

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, may I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. To the minister's recollection, was the Kitimat port and pipeline proposal discussed at a federal cabinet meeting on or about August 12, 1976?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that that is the kind of question that the hon. member can be serious about asking.

KITIMAT PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY BRITISH COLUMBIA ADVISED CONCEPT OF PIPELINE ACCEPTABLE TO CABINET

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Subsequent to August 12 and before September 17, were provincial officials of British Columbia informed that the concept of a Kitimat pipeline was acceptable to the federal cabinet.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the proponents of the Kitimat pipeline have received no assurance from the federal government that their particular application will receive favourable consideration. They came to see me; it may well have been in the early summer, if I recall correctly. They were told that their application would have to be prepared and submitted to the National Energy Board and that it ought to be prepared carefully because the National Energy Board would want to ask searching questions.

Mr. Hees: How does that sound, Iona?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question. Will the minister explain or repudiate a confidential report of the B.C. Energy Commission dated September 17, 1976, in which the following statements appear. First, I quote from page 5:

It appears that the concept of a Kitimat pipeline is acceptable to the federal cabinet.

The second statement is on page 9, and reads:

We understand that the federal cabinet considered the Kitimat proposal on August 12, 1976 and were generally receptive.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can comment on what is, from my point of view, a most speculative story. I do not know anything about the particular story to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Send the minister a copy.

Mr. Gillespie: I did not in any way participate in the talks to which the hon. member referred in the first place, and I have already answered the question in the second place.

An hon. Member: Repudiate it.

Mr. Gillespie: I have already indicated that I know nothing about that particular story.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Apparently the minister knows little about anything.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY ON TANKER TRAFFIC ON WEST COAST—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the House whether, in the ongoing discussions with United States authorities, the Canadian government has stated what its policy is regarding oil tanker traffic on the west coast and whether that policy is to try to obtain U.S. agreement on a single oil port consistent with the most satisfactory environmental safeguards.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be quite as specific about the last part of the hon. member's question as I should like to be. I would need to look at the record, to see what representations have been made to date with regard to a single port. If I may answer the broader aspects of the question, a number of representations have been made in several different discussions, the most recent of which is going on at present with regard to fisheries jurisdiction and a delineation of the boundary, as I answered a few days ago. In that connection one item we have included for discussion along with fisheries, hydrocarbons and related questions is the matter of joint management, or a joint agreement with regard to fisheries pollution control measures. Those are the most active negotiations.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise the House whether it is Canadian policy to accept an oil tanker port at Kitimat in addition to an oil port in the Straits of Juan de Fuca or the Puget Sound area? What is the proposal in that regard?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly honest with the hon. member, I repeat, I have not seen a document and I would not want to mislead him about what has been said formally in statements to the United States. Since I do not know the answer, the hon. member would be doing me a favour, and I would be doing him one, if I could have a day to look into the matter in more detail.

Mr. Fraser: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the ongoing discussions, what is the response of the United States to the Kitimat proposal for, if accepted, it makes Canadian protests over Alaska tanker traffic appear somewhat ridiculous.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, that, again, is part of what I should like to investigate. To the best of my knowledge, and I ask the hon. member to appreciate that I am speaking from memory, I do not think there has been any formal statement with regard to that particular proposal involving Kitimat. However, I am not absolutely certain; therefore, I would rather reserve my answer until tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, but what is your policy?

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENFORCE GUIDELINES FOR CONDUCT OF POLYSAR AND OTHER CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On December 2, when replying to a question asking whether guidelines for Canadian Crown corporations and other corporations owned by the government exist, the Prime Minister said such guidelines do exist. He went on to say that they contained instructions from ministers to the corporations under their responsibility. Considering that, according to the Polysar report of January 31, of this year, PISA, the subsidiary of Polysar, continued with kickback practices at least until September 1976 and conceivably beyond that point, would the Prime Minister explain what steps were taken to enforce the guidelines to which he referred on December 2?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not have before me that text of the exchanges between the hon. member and myself, but I have quite an accurate memory of the exchange and I remember indicating that there were corporations and departments which did have guidelines. I certainly did not say they all had. I had in mind certain Crown corporations and agencies. One example I had in mind was the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I went on to say that we were going to issue over-all guidelines which would apply to all departments, agencies and Crown corporations, and we did that a couple of weeks later. Until then there had been no formal guidelines applying to all.

I did indicate that it was the duty of every government agent and corporation to act within the law and the confines of morality. But the precise guidelines spelling that out in detail and applicable to all were made public by the President of the Treasury Board around mid-December.

Mr. Broadbent: Since in his answer of December 2 the Prime Minister did make specific reference to the fact that ministers who had Crown corporations under their jurisdiction did in fact have such guidelines and did in fact pass them on to the corporations under their reponsibility, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has confirmed that such specific guidelines did apply and were made clear to the Polymer corporation, which was the name by which it was known at the time of the Auditor General's report of 1973, and subsequent to that time, particularly since the matter was raised in the House last fall. Did the Prime Minister take steps to ensure that all Crown corporations received very explicit guidelines that covered these matters?

Mr. Trudeau: The answer to the final part of the question is very clear. We did take such steps and we enunciated the guidelines in the House in mid-December. As far as the first part of the question is concerned, it repeats the earlier one and I repeat my earlier reply. This whole matter of guidelines for the conduct of Crown corporations was discussed by me with certain of the ministers and some of them said that they followed some practices of having guidelines within the departments, and that is what I said.

I did not indicate that every department, agency and Crown corporation was submitted to them. If that had been the case, indeed there would have been no need in mid-December to issue general guidelines. The Minister of Supply and Services, following this exchange or perhaps even preceding it, asked a group of cabinet ministers to put these guidelines in shape and he and the President of the Treasury Board co-operated in establishing guidelines which would apply to all. Those were the ones that were enunciated in the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Since this matter was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister in 1973, did he not think it appropriate that very specific guidelines be established for ministers of the Crown and with instructions for those ministers to pass them all on to all the corporations for which they had responsibility at that time? Related to that, could he tell us what specific steps enforcing the newly announced guidelines last December 16 have been taken by the government in addition to the general statement which was made in the House by the minister responsible at the time?

Mr. Trudeau: The question of the hon. member stretches over a period of four years. To start at the beginning of that period, I answered this ad nauseum a few months ago in the House, but I will repeat it for the benefit of the hon. member.

As soon as that letter of the Auditor General was shown to me, within days of its writing I had the then president of the treasury board deal with the matter. He dealt with it—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, with one phone call and a little note.

Mr. Trudeau: —with one phone call. That is how efficient the government is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It was so well dealt with by one phone call that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —some three years later the auditors of the corporation, Peat Marwick, issued a statement denying the allegations of the Auditor General and saying that the matter had been settled to their satisfaction, and that is fact which I quoted in this House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED REFUSAL TO PAY BENEFITS TO PERSONS SIXTY-FIVE OR OVER

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

On December 20, 1975, the House passed Bill C-69 concerning the eligibility for benefits of persons aged 65 and more. Considering that the basic principle of acquired right was recognized by the board of referee, the umpire and the Federal Court, considering that 14,085 Canadians are in this situation, including 6,508 in Quebec, and that despite favourable decisions by the Department of Justice, the Unemployment Insurance Commission was still refusing, last November 13, to pay such benefits based on the principle of acquired right, does the minister intend not only to closely consider this matter, which he should already have done, but also to order that these benefits be paid immediately, as required by the Department of Justice's decisions?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with what the hon. member says, following that decision being handed down, I looked at the facts and realized that we did not have a right of appeal. I therefore sought authority, and received it, to make the necessary payments to those who received the acquired rights. The individuals concerned will be notified, and if they qualify as indicated in the judgment, the payments will be made. We are now in the process of doing that. It may require a minor amendment to the bill which is presently before the House.

Mr. Alexander: Oh!

Mr. Cullen: If that is necessary, it will be done, but I am satisfied from the information I have received from the Department of Justice that in all probability it will not be required.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Does the minister's answer mean that he ordered the immediate withdrawal of an internal directive which was sent directly to the district office on January 25, 1977 and in which Mr. Robert Sanschagrin, the head of the insurance service, says that the first directives issued on that subject recommended the recognition of those appeals? But according to the brief submitted last December 22, those appeals are no longer receivable as from November 13, 1976, that is exactly 24 hours after the last judgments handed down by the Federal Court, the umpire and the board of referees. Does the minister intend to withdraw that directive immediately and thus authorize those 14,084 Canadians to receive their due?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: I am not familiar with the directive the hon. member has mentioned, but he was in fact spelling out the law as we understood it to be at that time. It was not until the judgment was handed down that it was discovered that these particular acquired rights had not been covered in the legislation, and on that basis the 600 or so who had launched their appeals were successful, but we feel that whether an individual did or did not file his appeal in that instance, in the interests of equity that individual should have the same entitlement, and I am taking the administrative actions which are necessary to see to it that that is done.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT AUDIT OF CROWN AGENCIES AND INVESTIGATION OF MANAGEMENT STRUCTURE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is somewhat supplementary to the questions raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Given the fact that the Crown corporations are running into such difficulty and the fact that the problems in Polysar were drawn to the Prime Minister's attention four years ago and nothing was effectively done about them, may I ask if he has any plans to put in place some type of system which will audit or check what is being done to correct abuses in the operation of Crown corporations which are officially being drawn to the attention of the government?

Mr. Broadbent: Make a phone call.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in order to take effective corrective action, we would first have to know there was something untoward in the operations of the company. I must preface my answer by indicating to the hon. member that when he put the question to me yesterday I did not know of the results of the inquiry. I have now learned that this has come to light, and to that extent I apologize to the hon. member for not being able to answer his question. I see it has come to light through an independent inquiry that indeed there were some practices that were more than questionable, practices which I would say are dismaying.

An hon. Member: Illegal.

Mr. Trudeau: We are therefore faced with a statement which I made in this House based on a press release of Polysar quoting Polysar auditors, Peat, Marwick Mitchell & Co. saying there was no contingent liability, that they had asked their lawyers and there was no question of illegalities and so on. That is the information on which I based my answer in the House and that is the information on which this file was closed four years ago when we were told by a responsible outsider that there were no questionable practices.

Since the hon. member asked me the question yesterday, this whole matter is in doubt and indeed I hope that my statement to the House on December 2 that the parliamentary committee would look very deeply into that matter—I renew that suggestion today.

In so far as our corrective action is concerned, let me say that Polysar of course is not a Crown corporation. It is held by CDC of which the government is a majority shareholder. To the extent that our representatives on the board of directors are able, I will enjoin them to make sure that corrective action is taken and that the guidelines which we issued in December and which were applied to this particular case by the CDC itself—by the Polysar company in a statement they made recently—that application of them will be very strictly followed by all concerned. I rely on the government's representatives on the board to report to the ministers if there is any breach of the guidelines.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that it seems that Crown corporations having considerable difficulty are coming to the attention of parliamentary committees, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is contemplating an investigation of the management structure of Crown corporations? I ask this in view of the fact that the Auditor General has specifically limited his operations to financial management and has not looked at how thoroughly boards of directors, for example, representing the principal shareholder—the taxpayers of Canada—are fulfilling their function. Is the government contemplating looking at this whole question of whether this is an effective vehicle for conducting business which may be of interest to the people of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. For the past few years ministers have been asking this type of question about Crown corporations, not so much relating to the legality or morality of their actions but to the degree of control the government has over every aspect of their actions. It has been a dilemma which comes up under many circumstances. For example, when a Crown corporation does not carry out the objectives of the people of Canada what can we do about it? When a Crown corporation has budgets which are very often approved by the government but we are without the ability to go into the details of the management, what can we do about it? We have studied various possible answers to these questions, one of them being to give the government the power of direction—either broad direction to the Crown corporation or specific direction.

This whole matter has been before us and even though we have studied the practices in other countries, we find it difficult to arrive at a solution which would be entirely acceptable to the House of Commons and to the traditions in Canada where Crown corporations are indeed at arm's length and where the "politicians" should not be giving specific direction and intervening in the operation.

This is the dilemma we are struggling with, and I think in the Air Canada Act which is before the House now we have indicated some of the directions in which we are trying to solve this by giving the government specific authority to issue directives of a general nature to Crown corporations. I have no clear statement or final statement, however, in answer to the hon. member's preoccupation which we share on this side.

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF OTHER CROWN CORPORATIONS WITH SAME TYPE OF REBATE OR FEE SYSTEM AS POLYSAR AND ATOMIC ENERGY CORPORATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the same subject for the Prime Minister. It is a repetition of the question he was unable to answer yesterday because he had not read the report at that time. Does the Prime Minister himself have any knowledge of any other Crown agency, Crown corporation or subsidiary thereof that has the same type of rebate system as Polysar or agency fee system as AECL?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not know of any but certainly since the enunciation of the guidelines in mid-December, any doubt that might be in anyone's mind that the government will not put up with or accept any illegality by government agencies whether in Canada or abroad—I hope that doubt no longer exists. There is a very clear indication in the guidelines that this must cease, if in fact it does exist.

ABORTION

CONCLUSION OF MINISTER AFTER READING BADGLEY REPORT—COST OF REPORT—AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION FROM OTHER SOURCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. The terms of reference set out for the Badgley committee stated:

> . . . to conduct a study to determine whether the procedure provided in the Criminal Code for obtaining therapeutic abortions is operating equitably across Canada.

From a reading of the report did the minister and the Department of Justice come to the conclusion that the law as set out in the Criminal Code of Canada as to abortion was operating equitably with one exception: that there appeared to be no uniformity in reference to the therapeutic abortion committee decision-making in accredited hospitals?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I read the report, it came to the conclusion that the procedures provided for under the law were resulting in inequities in the application of the procedures, but that those inequities were not caused by the law itself as written but rather by provincial regulations and hospital regulations and the procedures and practices of the medical profession under the law.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. Was this information not known to the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Justice long before the Badgley report was issued? In other words, was that report necessary to give the minister this information? I have previously asked what this report cost. What was the actual cost considering that they used Gallup to secure certain statistics? What was the cost of printing and translation? What did this report cost when that information was available to the government through the two departments?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the budget for the committee was $727,000. The total cost as of today is $679,000. I suspect this is something of a first for a committee or task force to report under budget. With regard to the hon. member's question, I suggest that even a cursory reading of the report would indicate that while there was in places such as Statistics Canada, the Department of National Health and Welfare and other agencies, some information on this situation the report makes it very clear it was not available in the complete and comprehensive way that the Badgley report has put it together.

REASON LARGE NUMBER OF CANADIANS WENT TO UNITED STATES FOR ABORTIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's answer on the workings of the Act and whether it would treat Canadians equitably. On page 35 of the report the committee estimated that in 1975 9,627 Canadians went to the United States to obtain a therapeutic abortion. That is a little more than one fifth of the abortions obtained in Canada. If the law was working equitably, can the minister advise why one fifth of all therapeutic abortions were done outside the country?

● (1440)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I assume from reading the report that the committee attributed the bulk of that number to a lack of knowledge of the law and rights within Canada; the lack of facilities in accredited or approved hospitals; the absence of procedures in certain parts of the country and a number of other factors which are listed in the report.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON ENDING CONTROLS AND FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Was Mr. Reid Scowen, Director General of the Prices and Profits Branch of the Anti-Inflation Board, expressing government policy this morning when he said on the CTV program "Canada AM" that this Sunday he will climb aboard a plane with others and commence meeting with provincial representatives to tell them what the federal government intends to do with regard to controls, namely that controls will continue until next year at which time they will end; in the case of wage contracts, at the expiration of such contracts and, in the case of prices, at the termination of each fiscal year of the company involved, but in any event there will be a continuing AIB-like agency after 1978?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not government policy.

Mr. Stevens: Will the minister assure the House there will not, in fact, be a continuing AIB-like agency after 1978?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that mandatory controls will end in December 1978, if not before. We have, of course, proposed a monitoring agency without mandatory powers which may well be in existence after that time.

THE BUDGET

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCTION PRIOR TO EASTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question with regard to the budget. The minister having indicated the problems that now exist with the Anti-Inflation Board, will he now advise whether he has ruled out the introduction of a budget before the Easter break? The latest statistics have indicated to the minister and the people of Canada that in terms of unemployment, we are in trouble, and in terms of growth of productivity, we are in a mess. Has the minister ruled out the introduction of a budget prior to the Easter break?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

ABORTION

POSSIBILITY OF GETTING OPPOSITION GROUPS TO ENCOURAGE FAMILY PLANNING

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In relation to the new government report on therapeutic abortions, the minister was recently quoted as saying that the government intends to encourage family planning in the belief that it is "the only real hope for a reduction in the number of abortions", a point with which many of us agree heartily. Will the minister consider encouraging participation in increased family planning by those groups which are most actively opposed to therapeutic abortion?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, even some of the groups which are opposed to any form of induced abortion agree that family planning is a choice that people should be able to exercise. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I will be meeting with provincial ministers and authorities on this report and will be urging upon them a number of measures with regard to family planning and contraception. My colleague, who is not available in the House today because he is on government business elsewhere, will, in a matter of days, be making a number of announcements as to what we will be putting to the provinces.

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN LAW IF HOSPITAL COMMITTEES NOT ESTABLISHED—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATING ISSUE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice on the Badgley report. The law at the present time does not require provincial authorities to set up therapeutic abortion committees. The minister has indicated he intends to consult with his counterparts in the provinces with regard to that area. Given the fact that since the amendments to the Criminal Code it has been the experience that some of these therapeutic abortion committees have not been set up, is it the minister's intention when dealing with his provincial counterparts to point out that in the event these committees are not established, he will have no alternative but to change the law at the federal level so that there is some fairness and equity in the way abortions are granted in this country?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the more desirable course would be to encourage provincial health authorities to ensure there is an equitable distribution of abortion committees.

Mr. Leggatt: When the minister assumed his present responsibilities, he indicated very clearly to a number of groups and the media that we would have a full debate in the House of Commons on the subject of abortions. Will the minister now announce to the House whether that debate will be based on legislation or a motion of reference from the government to a standing committee? Which device is the minister intending to use?

Mr. Basford: At the moment, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting either course. It would be desirable for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I to have the opportunity of raising some of these issues with the provinces before there is such a debate.

MANPOWER

CRITERIA USED IN ESTABLISHING JOB CREATION BRANCH IN KELOWNA, BRITISH COLUMBIA—COST OF BRANCH

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the very limited amount of funds allocated to the Canada Works Program for the central interior of British Columbia, and in view of the satellite department of the Vancouver job creation branch recently set up in Kelowna, British Columbia, will the minister advise what criteria he used to create this additional bureaucracy? Was it the same criteria used to allocate the Canada Works funds?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I could best answer that question if the hon. member were to put it in a letter to me. I would then spell it out for him. I do not accept the premise of his question.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister advise whether this bureaucratic department, in addition to his well staffed and well run Manpower offices, will cost more than the allocation of Canada Works funds in Okanagan Boundary?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants service in his particular area, he should be supporting this rather than taking every opportunity to denigrate every effort that is made to serve that area.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

MOTOR VEHICLES

FAILURE OF FORD TO MEET UNITED STATES STANDARDS—PROHIBITION OF PRODUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Federal authorities in the United States took unprecedented action this week in ordering the Ford Motor Company to stop production because their motor vehicles coming from production were not up to federal standards. Will the minister advise whether Canadian federal authorities have made a similar investigation and, if so, have there been any directives or actions carried out in Canada as has been done in the United States?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a report on the procedures we adopt in relation to this particular kind of case. I will inform the hon. member as soon as I receive this.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DRAW ATTENTION TO COUNTRIES BREAKING HELSINKI AGREEMENT—RESULTS OF MONITORING AGREEMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister intend to use every public opportunity to draw the attention of Canadians to infractions of the human rights part of the Helsinki accord by countries, and I have in mind in particular the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia, which deal with dissidents by locking them up?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have done this on occasion and I will certainly continue to do so. As I have said to the House on previous occasions, and I think the hon. member will appreciate this, there is a thin line between how far one goes in terms of public denunciation of specific individuals and the likely treatment that is meted out to them as a result. We will certainly continue to make public declarations whenever it is considered to be desirable.

Mr. Fairweather: Accepting what the minister says, although those countries are, of course, signatories to a declaration which involves human rights, will the hon. gentleman be able to announce the results of his own department's monitoring system which is in place now to delineate these infractions which are evident in other areas of the public media?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I can tell the House and the hon. member that such monitoring as we have been able to carry out shows, in our judgment, that a great deal is to be desired on the part of the countries to which he has referred and, specifically, of the U.S.S.R. I do not think there is any question on that point. Perhaps the most important activity in this connection now is the preparation of our case, and that of other countries in the west, for presentation at the Belgrade conference later this year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED INCREASE IN RENT OF MARRIED QUARTERS—SUGGESTION INCREASE BE LIMITED TO AMOUNT ALLOWED UNDER RENT CONTROL

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister confirm or deny reports that there is to be a rent raise of between 20 per cent and 40 per cent for occupants of married quarters. Bearing in mind the age of the houses which indicates the amortization or near-amortization of most of them, can the minister explain the new-found role of the government as a rapacious landlord?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, no firm decision has been made on this question yet. Rentals of married quarters generally reflect the rents in the local community as the forces are put on to special pay rather than special privileges. Some 52 per cent of personnel live outside married quarters and are paying a much higher rent than those living in married quarters. There is a need to bring some measure of equity into this situation but no final figures have yet been determined.

Mr. McKinnon: The minister says he intends to hold the rent rises to their equivalent in the local communities. Can he therefore assure the House that in the provinces where provincial governments have instituted rent controls there will be no raise exceeding the amount permissible under such controls?

Mr. Danson: While the Crown is not subject to those controls, that is my intention.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGATION TORONTO OFFICERS WORKING WITHOUT PROPER TRAINING OR CO-OPERATION FROM POLICE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In a departmental memorandum dated December 1, 1976 and marked confidential, Mr. C. J. Dagg, Chief Investigation Officer for Immigration Department headquarters in Ottawa and his deputy, Mr. T. Moses, wrote to Mr. R. J. Curry, director of the department's facilitation and control division stating that immigration officers in Toronto were working without proper training, adequate protection or co-operation from local police. Can the minister tell us whether he has seen this report and, if so, what specific steps has he taken to correct the glaring deficiencies in the operations of the department in Toronto as outlined by his own officers?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): First of all, Mr. Speaker, we shall confirm the authenticity of the "confidential document" referred to. I might say it was the responsibility of these officers to attend in Toronto to look into our immigration enforcement activities. They contacted several of the enforcement officers and part of the information they received indicated the officers in the front line felt they were not properly trained, that they did not have adequate resources and so on—there were some other concerns expressed. They have made their views known through the proper channels and I intend to look into these complaints to determine whether they have merit, in which case corrective action will be taken. Prior to receiving this report I did, in fact, look into other areas where I thought moves needed to be made, and they will be made in the very near future.

ALLEGATION POLICE FEEL IMMIGRATION CASES SUSCEPTIBLE TO POLITICAL INTERFERENCE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): One supplementary. Messrs. Dagg and Moses, officers who have had 28 years and 23 years experience respectively in immigration enforcement, state:

> There is some indication that the police, both city and RCMP, do not want to become involved in immigration work as they feel it is too susceptible to political interference.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Epp: Can the minister tell us whether political interference, either from Canadian or foreign sources, has resulted in arrests not being made or in detained illegal immigrants being allowed to leave detention centres without deportation proceedings being completed?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The hon. member is implying that this was the experience of the officers who filed the report, but in fact they were commenting on information they had received from officers in the front line. This was information they had gathered. Our experience is that we have received absolutely first class co-operation from both the Metropolitan Toronto Police and the RCMP. But, as I said, without prejudging these matters I think I should first check into them before taking any action. We have received first class, splendid co-operation from both police forces and I think it has worked very well for the department.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTION MINISTER MEET WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am informed today by the Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce that three of the governments in the Atlantic provinces are now prepared to meet with the minister and that a favourable reply is expected from the fourth. Since the minister plans to make a trip to the Atlantic provinces later this month, is he now prepared to give a favourable reply to the effeot that he will meet with the governments of the four provinces when he visits the region, either in St. John's or in Halifax?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am going to Newfoundland and I plan to speak with business community leaders in St. John's for starters. I did receive a request from the Executive Director, or President, of the Chamber of Commerce, and I indicated in reply that if they wished to co-ordinate a meeting, I was prepared to meet with them. I do not know whether this is in the same vein, but I will check this question out and see what my schedule down there permits.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF POTATOES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I welcome very much the minister's announcement earlier this week that he had revised his previous position with respect to the user-pay situation as it applies to the Atlantic provinces. Would the minister state, in specific terms, his intentions with respect to a continuing problem, that of the transportation equipment for the movement of potatoes? This is a subject we have discussed on other occasions in this House. Has the minister received assurances from the government of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick that the equipment would be adequate for this winter? In addition, did the hon. gentleman make any determination with these governments as to whether a decision will be taken by the federal government for replacement equipment, taking into account the studies which the minister indicated last fall were taking place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that what was accomplished in Charlottetown was full agreement between the provinces and the federal government on quite a number of matters and included not so much a change in philosophy but, rather, the addition of words which would emphasize that our philosophy in favour of development of the Atlantic accorded very fully with the desires and aspirations of the people of that region. The question of facilities for the handling of potatoes was discussed, particularly in private meetings with representatives of the Province of Prince Edward Island, and they had current figures on shortages which exist at this time. As I said in the House earlier, one of the questions which still remains to be finally resolved before steps can be taken to correct the situation is the kind of equipment which ought to be provided for the hauling of potatoes in the future.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With respect to these important studies which are going on, and the deadline, I am sure the minister was able to give some indication to the government of Prime Edward Island when a decision will be taken, especially in view of the lead time which is involved if the equipment is to be in place for next season.

Mr. Lang: I rather agree with the representatives in Prince Edward Island—the premier and the minister of transport there—that we had to be very conscious of the timetable in looking at questions such as facilities as well as the equipment.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the rather short lead time with respect to Canada Works and Young Canada Works, I wonder if the minister would be disposed to inform the House as to the possibility of extending the time limit regarding the applications for Young Canada Works.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated this publicly and I was hoping to receive a question about it on Monday or Tuesday last. However, for the Canada Works program I have given instructions that all applications received before the end of this week should be accepted. In the case of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon applications will be accepted if they are postmarked up to midnight, February 11. For Young Canada Works we will continue to accept applications provided they are postmarked before midnight, February 18, 1977.

REASON FOR LOCKING OFFICES IN NORTHERN ONTARIO AND PREVENTING APPLICANTS FROM MEETING FEBRUARY 15 DEADLINE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to ask a question since I am neither on your regular list of customers nor on the official list.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

● (1500)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State related to his responsibility for citizenship. In light of the February 15 deadline, I should like to know why it was necessary to use the RCMP to lock the citizenship offices in northern Ontario, which had the effect of preventing British subjects from making citizenship applications before the February 15 deadline, knowing full well the Prime Minister's desire to make the announcement on the fifteenth when everyone will have to go through the court?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the specific incident to which the hon. member refers, but I will, of course, investigate the matter and report to him.

Mr. Peters: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister give some consideration to providing extra people to serve the needs of British subjects in northern Ontario desirous of making application, or use some influence with other members of the cabinet to extend the deadline for British subjects who are making application for Canadian citizenship?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, plans and training programs under way so that when the new act is proclaimed greater assistance will be provided to a variety of groups in their application for citizenship under the new act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, might I ask the government House leader his proposals for House business for the balance of this week and into next week, and because of discussions we have had and, with his answer, would he designate next Tuesday, February 15, 1977, as an allotted day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, today is an allotted day. Tomorrow we will begin second reading discussion of the legislation in the name of the Minister of Justice having to do with human rights. On Monday we will deal with the third reading of the income tax bill, and I hereby designate Tuesday as an allotted day. With respect to the remaining days of next week, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, the business will be announced following further consultation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton further on the same point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): One further matter, Mr. Speaker. For the purpose of the consultations that we are going to have, I wonder whether the government House leader might consider bringing forward Bill C-17, to reorganize Air Canada, which I understand is of some importance within the organization. Perhaps he might consult with them. Would he also consider designating a day, or some period of time, for a debate on the report of the joint committee on regulations and other statutory instruments, which is quite an important report for both Houses?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have also had a suggestion from my parliamentary secretary regarding a possible period for the debate of that report and I will consider it. In addition, I realize that the Air Canada bill has some urgency, and certainly I would be delighted if we could arrange to have second reading given to that bill in a relatively short period of time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You can always use 75C.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the business of the House, may I tell the government House leader that I have here two buttons, or badges, which I should like to present to him. One says "Heritage has its day"; the other says "Le patrimoine ça se fête". Would the minister bring in Bill C-30 fairly soon so that he will have the right to wear these badges on Monday, February 21?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member provides the badge in Gaelic, I will consider bringing it in.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I wonder whether I could ask the government House leader when he will bring in Bill C-2 which has passed committee and is waiting for third reading. This is the bill having to do with the agreement on the storage of crops.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this bill is on my priority list and I would be ready to bring it forward under some assurance that it would pass without prolonged debate; indeed, after very short debate.

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY DOCUMENT "THE WAY AHEAD"

On the order: Government notices of motions.

February 9, 1977—The Minister of Finance:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled The Way Ahead;

That fifteen Members, to be named at a later date, act as Members on the part of this House on the said Committee;

That the said Committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House; to report from time to time; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; and to delegate to sub-committees all or any of its powers except the power to report directly to the House; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section (2) of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.
