Mr. Otto: I always speak for the government. The government does not always think so, but I do. The bill deals with the problem of takeovers. I heard speeches yesterday and today in which hon. members merge the three problems of existing foreign corporations, new takeovers and new investment all into one category. But you cannot do that; they are three completely separate problems. May I say, with great respect, to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) that if we chose to buy back foreign-owned industry which is already established, the cost would be colossal—somewhere in the vicinity of $27 billion. Indeed, the average lifetime of a business is only about 24 years. Many of these corporations are dying out and new ones are taking over. So to talk about taking over existing foreign-owned corporations just does not make economic sense.

The question arises as to new investments. We all know how important new investment is. There are areas in Canada that require new investments. Economic history has shown that Canadians are not exactly tickled pink to invest in many parts of this country. Our good old Toronto banks invest in Toronto. If you tell them about Calgary, Edmonton and other places they say that they are quite far away, why should they invest there when they can put it right in front of their noses? There is something to be said for that but I would put it this way: new investment takes new capital whereas takeovers take less capital.

[Mr. Caouette.]

This is why it is important to control takeovers because they involve corporations, companies and enterprises which have just started, which have just shown that they can make it. It is that type of corporation that is most susceptible to takeover and also which adds most to the economy of Canada. It is not a future dream; it is an existing enterprise. I think that is a good place to begin to control takeovers.

I will give the minister the good news first and the bad news later. I favour this bill because it gets away from the Walter Gordon concept of restrictions. We have two ways to look at the matter. Either we support our own industry or we take Mr. Gordon's point of view and say, "Down with Americans. Restrict everything"—though the shares of Canadian companies may be lying on the floors of Canadian stock exchanges, not being picked up by anybody even for just two cents. I do not think this makes much economic sense and I am glad to see we are getting away from it.

Mr. Speaker, I could not imagine such a bill put together by so many amateurs and naïve people. In fact, I would almost be willing to swear that not one of the people who worked on this bill, Mr. Joel Bell, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) or his parliamentary secretary, have ever had any experience even indirectly with takeovers because there are loopholes a mile wide in the bill and it does not answer the problem. There is an assumption among members in the Conservative party and in the New Democratic Party that when a foreign takeover takes place we import foreign capital. Anyone who has had any experience with takeovers in the last five or six years knows that Americans do not put in one nickel of their own capital.

Mr. Peters: They do it with our money.

Mr. Otto: What happens is this: a Canadian growth company needs money to expand and its head goes to our nice little banks and tells them, "We need half a million dollars to buy new equipment. Here are our sales figures and our potentials." But our bankers, being nice, cautious, Scottish gentlemen, very concerned about the reputation of their banks, reply, "You haven't got all the sales. These are not all A-1 customers. Do it in stages. Here is $25,000 instead of the $500,000 you are seeking." This is no good at all, Mr. Speaker. The head of the company then tries to find an American buyer. A prospective American buyer will ask, "How much money have you in the bank?" The Canadian will reply, "We have $100,000 in saved earnings." Then the American says, "Here is $100,000 for your company." He pays the $100,000 but takes the company's reserves, so he does not invest a nickel.

The head of the company still retains his position and after this has taken place he can go to our banks and they will talk to him. They will say, "Oh, you've been taken over by an American. How ducky! Have half a million dollars. In fact, have a million dollars." At this stage the Canadian bank doesn't know if the American parent company is broke. Of course, it is better still if it is a Swiss company that is involved. Mr. Speaker, to get a loan from a bank all you need is a telegram from Switzerland. A banker will look at it and assume that you must have money socked away in Switzerland.

What we really import is not money but confidence. In other words, our people and banking institutions do not have confidence in Canadians. I want to assure the minister and all hon. members that Americans are not carpetbaggers. They do not come flocking into this country looking for enterprises to buy. Right now they have strong incentives on their own side of the border for establishing industries in the United States. The DISC program is one such incentive; the U.S. tax structure is another. They do not come up here hoping to swamp us with their money.

We have many enterprising men in Canada who are in business, who run public corporations and private corporations. They know that their businesses cannot grow bit by bit as was the case 50 years ago. They have to take big jumps. If a company is manufacturing shoes and sells to Eaton's, it must be able to produce up to 100,000 pairs of shoes a year. This means buying expensive equipment and getting into a large production schedule. Our banks will not support such companies.

I would like to ask Walter Gordon, the owner of Canadian Management, how many risks he has taken in the last ten years. He will not look at a company unless it has $5 million in sales and a profit growth picture for the preceding five years. Mr. Speaker, if we could prevent all foreign takeovers then Walter Gordon and his kind would have a field day.

An hon. Member: He has a couple of duds on his hands now.

Mr. Otto: It is about time he had a dud or two on his hands. When the banks refuse to co-operate with Canadian business, the Canadian businessman may try the IDB. The hon. gentleman from Davenport (Mr. Caccia) spoke about the wonders of the IDB. Mr. Speaker, its loss ratio is one-seventh that of our banks. The IDB will not lend you any money unless you mortgage your plant, your house, your wife, your mother-in-law, and on top of that it will take your television set and you won't get it back until you repay the loan. It is a most farcical institution. Why will the IDB take no risks? Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a civil servant or a pseudo civil servant taking a risk? If you don't have a statement showing past profits and money in the bank, why should such a person take a risk?

After exhausting all approaches to the banks and the IDB, the businessman then becomes a beggar. He gets a broker and hopes to find an American buyer, but at that stage no American is exactly giving away money. The broker will find an American or a German investor. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, there was a very good series of articles recently on the International Telephone and Telegraph Company. The Canadian entrepreneur does not want to sell his business, but after finding an American buyer he will sign a tentative agreement to sell. Under the provisions of this bill the government will have 90 days in which to consider the matter. Can you imagine any German or American investor waiting 90 days? It is utter nonsense. Such a deal will never go through.

Mr. Pepin: It takes two years in some countries.

Mr. Otto: But other countries have financial institutions and governments which support their own industry. Who knows what will happen in 90 days? Our Canadian entrepreneur will go broke because he has exhausted every other source. I suggest that the minister revise this provision in the bill so that the businessman may obtain approval from the cabinet first and then try to make a deal with the American investor. That would not put the whole thing in jeopardy. Business is used to this—you either put up or shut up.

This bill says no, you cannot sell. But the government does not say it will buy the business. The government is really saying, "You have your deal and it has already been approved by the directors". But Mr. Speaker, are American directors going to approve something that still has to be approved by the government? It could happen that in the 90 days everything would die out.

Then there is the Canada Development Corporation which after two years is considering buying Connaught Laboratories, a non-profit organization.

An hon. Member: Did you vote against it?

Mr. Otto: I am all in favour of the Canada Development Corporation but, Mr. Speaker, do you recall that the present chairman of the corporation appeared on national television and said he would not invest a nickel in Canadian industry? Such dedication!

Mr. Woolliams: You will have to take this fellow to the woodshed.

Mr. Otto: This program was taped about a month before he was appointed chairman, so I admire the CBC for showing it. The Canadian Development Corporation has a great deal to do but it cannot continue to be as cautious as it has been; it must get into the commercial banking field and induce ordinary Canadians to buy shares in Canadian companies. It would be a good deal if they could guarantee the price of the shares. Once Canadians are confident that they are not going to lose their shirts—because our history of investment has been a shirt-losing proposition—I think they would be more willing to invest.

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say that Americans are buying up our industry, but have we ever asked why Canadians buy hundreds of millions of dollars worth of American stock every year? I suggest it is because the American government and American laws protect the small investor. In most states of the United States the stock exchange is much better, much cleaner than ours; you do not get "conned" every time you go on the stock market. What has been our history of stock markets? An elevator operator says, "Buy Moose Pasture No. 2 at 17 cents". You buy it and hope it goes to 70 cents. It goes to 80 cents, so you keep it. Then it goes to zero and you have lost your money. It is a giant hoopla.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't talk nonsense.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman opposite is so naïve that he does not know that in the resource industry only about 7 cents of every dollar goes into the business and the rest goes for promotion, and so on. Atlantic, Prudential—do you want more?—Revenue Properties; in all these corporations there is a history of losers.

Mr. Woolliams: Those are Ottawa statistics.

Mr. Otto: Before we can expect great things of this bill we must lay the groundwork and gain the confidence of the country. I think the Canada Development Corporation could be used to ensure the value of certain shares going on the market as is done by the banks. I think the government could have a great voice in tidying up some of the loose strings in our stock exchanges. There is no reason why it should cost $250,000 for a company to go on the public market here when it costs only $380 in the United States. There should be a review of regulations for all the provinces which have stock exchanges.

It is time that we set a pattern for proxy votes so that the shareholders would get a better break. If all this were done and we set up some sort of economic policy, I would be inclined to say that this bill would be very good for Canada. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for the bill—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: —because one thing that it will do when application forms come to the cabinet is to give the cabinet an inkling of how efficient is the Industrial Development Bank and our financial system. The cabinet will not be able to refuse a sale to an American concern when they see the result and the evidence before them that Canadians are doing nothing. In that way the government would finally have a direct link with the business community.

The bill is a good start, Mr. Speaker but it needs a reasonable and rational environment such as has been accepted by countries like Germany, Japan and the United States. I am sure the hon. gentleman opposite from Calgary is well acquainted with the American stock exchange and Moodies, the bible of all investors, knows how a company goes public in the United States and what the rules for minority shareholders are in that country. I am sure he knows, also, what happens here.

This bill will cause the government to give thought to instituting many reforms in our financial structures and institutions and I think that will be the beginning of Canadians investing in Canada.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the question of national control of the national economy is one that troubles every country in the world. It is the whole reason behind recent upheavals in former colonial countries in their drive for the elimination of foreigners running the country. This is what is behind the hankering of many people to run their own affairs; it is the dislike of those who occupy the land to see their resources exploited and removed with no real benefit to themselves. It has been the policy of those doing the exploiting for many years to pay off the exploited with a little of their own money while making off with most of it themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aiken: How does this apply in Canada, and how damaging is it? On the surface we feel that we are running our own country. We have our own Parliament, our own business institutions, banks, investment companies and industry. We find that in some cases when large foreign or international companies establish branch plants here, they send pleasant and accommodating personnel in the higher management and technically skilled categories. They employ a majority of local workmen when possible and train them when they have no trained personnel in this country. They pay good wages in most cases and maintain a high standard of living for their employees.

What is going on under the surface is what we must examine carefully. What is really happening is that hard businessmen are making hard decisions on where most money is to be made in the safest, long range way. It makes no difference whether they are American, Canadian, European or Asian; they operate aggressively to make a profit.

I think that is the point the government has missed in this bill. These people are bound by local rules and must abide by them. They adjust to local requirements. We need in this country firm guidelines, entrenched where possible in legislation, so that the rules may be well known. That is what Canadians want, that is what international business and finance would prefer not to see and that is something they can live with and do live with in many countries of the world. Once they know where they stand, they know how to deal with local situations.

Of course, we Canadians are partly to blame for the situation in which we find ourselves. As a people we have been savers, not investors. People in some other countries are much the same; they are thrifty and inclined to save more than to invest. I can think of several countries like that. The financiers and governments of those countries support a direct policy of investing the local people's money. It is an outgoing investment policy. In other words, the industrial, financial and governmental policy of those countries is directed to using the savings of their people to advance a national policy. I can think of several countries where this sort of policy is prevalent.

The Dutch are one people who are reasonably careful and thrifty, yet their financial institutions and governments are outgoing in carrying out a nationally developed policy of which everyone knows and which is beneficial for the nation as a whole and not just for those who are involved in investing. Canadian financial institutions, banks and governments have the ability to do the same for Canadians. They have not done this, generally speaking, because they were not directed to do it, forced to do it or asked to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aiken: Foreign investors are using the savings of Canadians, deposited in Canadian banks, to take over Canadian companies or to establish new industries in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aiken: That is what I object to most. I have heard much talk about preventing foreign capital from entering this country. I do not object to bringing in foreign capital when it is used to develop our country. As happens so often, the representatives of large financial institutions or international corporations bring no money at all to this country when they establish new plants or take over old ones. When they come, they bring with them nothing but their credit. They establish credit with local banks. They show that they possess sufficient collateral and deposit it often in the form of stock of their parent company.

On the strength of these securities they can borrow enough money from Canadian banks to carry on the business they want to take over. Following that, they use the savings that we Canadians are stupid enough to put into our banks and that national policy is stupid enough not to force into Canadian investment. This is not a case of bringing in foreign funds. In many takeovers not one cent of foreign money comes into this country and is used in the takeover. I do not think we ought to permit this situation. That is the sort of thing this bill might well have been directed against. As I said before, we welcome foreign capital that comes into our country to be used for development. In Ontario, where I come from, and in several other provinces this has been happening over the years.

Mr. Pepin: How could we incorporate the hon. member's suggestion in the bill?

Mr. Aiken: Money has come in from outside the country. It has entered the province and created a great deal of new industry. The province of Ontario has established guidelines which are reasonably well known to international business. Ontario has passed legislation which requires that resources taken from the province shall be processed in a primary and secondary way in the province before they are exported. Business people know this. When they come to this country and deal in Ontario, that is how they deal.

I think a good deal could be done in a bill like this to spell out to those who would invest in this country that they are welcome to come and use their knowledge and ability to develop Canadian industry, provided that the investing and the business enterprise is carried out in a way that we feel will be beneficial for this country. If we require secondary industries to be established in certain areas, as is the case in Ontario, I think that would be all to the good. I do not think the government is in any way dealing with the main problem in this bill. It is not letting people know that we welcome their money, welcome their know-how, welcome their ability to invest and create industry in this country, but that we welcome it on certain conditions and under certain firm rules which they should know about.

Foreign companies have moved into many other countries, accepted the rules of those countries and got along with them. That is the sort of thing that many of us felt should be included in this bill. The bill does not do that at all and is limited to preventing takeovers of existing businesses. Even there the bill is deficient. It does not make even a policy statement. For instance, if one looks at the title of the bill, one sees that it is a dead giveaway: it is, "An act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons." Those "certain persons" may be certain undesirable persons or others; the language is vague.

Mr. Woolliams: Ambiguous is the word.

Mr. Aiken: Ambiguous is a good word.

Mr. Pepin: Those persons are defined.

Mr. Aiken: In any event, I think those persons are not the ones we are concerned about. Let us consider clause 2 of the bill in which the purposes of the act are spelled out. The purposes of the act are not carried out in the bill itself. I will not read the clause because we are not supposed to do that during debate on second reading debate. Nevertheless, the clause reads that the general purpose of this act involves, "recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern", and so on. Certainly that is a matter of national concern and if the bill had dealt with it some of us would be happy. Having made these broad statements of purpose, the bill does little to carry them out.

• (2140)

This bill, in one limited sector, in one limited way, does something to tell the world that we want to control our own economy. For that reason one cannot be against it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aiken: I am somewhat embarrassed by the loud applause from my left for that statement. There must be something wrong. I thought I was developing a good Conservative policy. Maybe there are some Conservative members in the socialist party. I am afraid that I cannot agree with them when they adopt the attitude that they will vote against the bill, because it does something although in only one sector and only in a limited way.

The purpose of the bill is spelled out in clause 2. Perhaps the legislation will be improved in the future. I hope I will not find myself in the same position as the speaker who preceded me. He said that the reason he would vote for the bill was, in effect, that it was so bad that when the government puts it into effect and finds out how bad it is he will have done them a favour by voting for it. I cannot go that far.

The purpose of the bill as spelled out in clause 2 is notice to the world that we want to control our own economy, that Canadians in general want to develop guidelines and tell the world the basis on which we welcome their investment and participation in Canadian development. However, there are so many things it leaves undone and unsaid. I wish something more positive had been done. I do not necessarily mean that it should be more severe; I merely say something more positive should have been done so that foreign investors will know where they stand.

The bill has not been discussed at any great length. There are a few things that worry me, even in the limited fashion in which it deals with the question of foreign takeovers. It does it in a typical Liberal way, if I may put it that way; Liberal with a large "L", not a small one in this case. They have made very severe inroads into the Bill of Rights which Canadians hoped would be well recognized. The bill gives the minister powers of investigation. These provisions can be used in contravention of the liberties and freedoms of the citizen. Section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights requires the Minister of Justice to examine every bill introduced into the House of Commons to determine whether any of the bill's provisions are inconsistent with the Bill of Rights and to report any inconsistency to the House at the first convenient opportunity.

It should also be noted that a condition precedent to the exercise of certain of these investigative powers is that the minister upon ex parte application to a court may obtain an order authorizing that exercise. The superficiality of this requirement must be obvious. As an aside, but relevant to the conduct of the investigation with regard to the rights of the private citizen, I note that the structure of the investigative process does not set standards of qualification or at least provide for the acquisition of qualifications through experience. In other words, the minister may vary his position from order in council to order in council, from situation to situation. Where authority is delegated, the investigator may be changed at the whim of the government or a succeeding minister. Presumably, any appointed investigator will be a public servant in the employ of the government since there is no provision for remuneration.

I want to talk for a moment about ex parte application to a judge to turn the screws on certain people. An ex parte application is one in which one person goes before a judge without notice to the other party and without giving the other party a chance to deal with the matter before the judge. The judge must weigh the application in light of what he is told by the minister or his representative. The judge can only accept the evidence that is before him. I think the judge would have to assume that if a minister did not have a prima facie case, he would not be making the application. An order must therefore issue almost as a matter of course. The so-called protection of the court in allowing an ex parte application is not there.

The citizen who is called in question before the court has lost his case before he even begins. He has no right of cross-examination and no right of appeal. Even the provision of this bill that appears to operate in favour of the citizen, clause 13 which provides that information gained by the minister in the administration of the act is privileged, only serves to protect the minister behind a wall of secrecy as he conducts his investigation. Neither the courts nor Parliament can force the minister to disclose what he is doing. He is not compelled to keep a true record of his investigation, but he can disclose as much as he wants. He can disclose that which will enable him to obtain a conviction against a witness or any person the witness is forced to implicate.

Interrogation, whether secret or public, can only be justified in the public interest and when the interest of the citizen is safeguarded by due process of law. That principle was adopted by this House when it passed the Bill of Rights. The bill we are concerned with contravenes that principle in that the right of the citizen is abrogated. I do not want to go into this question at the moment; it is a matter for the committee. I say only that even in the area where the government decides to move, they move in abrogation of many of the civil rights of Canadians and people doing business in Canada.

Canadians have the ability to develop their own country, not to the exclusion of non-residents but in co-operation with them. I hope I have made that point. In conclusion, in my opinion it is not a case of eliminating foreign capital. Where foreign capital comes in for development, it should be welcomed. But where it comes in for exploitation—I use that in the worst sense of the word—it should not be welcomed. This bill has not even attempted to deal with the main issue of foreign control in Canada. I regret very much the shortcomings of the bill.

I only hope that the general intent set out in clause 2 will be followed up in the future by something more specific. I have no intention of voting against the measure on the ground that it does not go far enough, but I express disappointment that after all this time in which to prepare itself to tell foreign investors where they stand, the government should have failed to do so.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in this debate I should like to make a few general observations about the recent history and study of foreign ownership of our economy. In the last four years we have received three very good reports concerned with foreign ownership in Canada. First we had the Watkins report. There was also a report by a House of Commons committee which was referred to by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) earlier today. Then there was the report prepared by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) which has become known as the Gray report. All these reports tell us the same thing about our economy: they tell us that our economy is too great an extent owned by foreign corporations; they warn us very clearly that something must be done about this soon. The Watkins report said, in 1968 I believe, that we had 12 to 15 years to repatriate our economy and if we didn't start doing it at once it might be too late.

Out of the Gray report, which all of us in the House have now had a chance to study, has come the foreign ownership policy which is before us. I echo the words of my leader in this House when he said that the bill before us is a big zero. It is an absolute zero, Mr. Speaker. It is nothing but an economic eunuch delivered to us by the technocratic Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) who is so conservative and conscious of the status quo that I am sure he would make Spiro Agnew look like a moderate.

The bill before us today barely touches on the most important aspects of foreign ownership. Even some members of the Conservative party are saying that the bill does not go far enough. Many members of the minister's party are saying the same thing. I suggest that this bill was brought in for one reason only. The Liberal party examined the results of a recent public opinion poll and saw they were not doing very well. They had to do a bit of face-saving, Mr. Speaker, and this bill was brought in as a political move, a form of tokenism to the people of Canada who want action now in the area of foreign ownership.

The government knows that the majority of Canadians want action soon in repatriating their economy and their culture. The government did not intend to do anything about it until they saw that public opinion was catching up with them and they had to save face. So here we have the midwife assisting in the birth of the economic eunuch that will produce hardly anything at all in terms of meaningful action to repatriate the economy. It is a sell-out, I suggest, to the multinational corporations. It is a sell-out to the continentalists in the Conservative party, led of course by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who himself is a mouthpiece for many of these people.

I am sure that this minister, along with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will go down in history as being members of one of the most conservative governments this country has ever know. They are very oriented toward the status quo. Sometimes they put up a good fight, but they do not change the system. They do not change the system when it comes down to the real dollars and cents issues which affect the working people and the farmers of this land. Then we see all the sheep in the backbenches of the Liberal party getting up and bleating in agreement as they vote for this bill. Some of them, out of one side of their mouth, may say that the bill does not go far enough. One of them said this evening he would support the bill because it would then make the minister realize how ridiculous it is and that maybe he would then do something. That is the kind of logic the Liberals pursue.

The minister may know that his own backbenchers are sheep, but I assure him that the Canadian people will not be fooled by this type of legislation. The people of Canada want action now. I am sure all of us received a copy of the telegram from Mr. Edwin Goodman of the Committee for an Independent Canada. I shall read the telegram to the House:

> The Committee for an independent Canada urges you in the strongest terms to participate in debate on foreign investment bill. Essential to Canada's future that private members of all parties show inadequacy and weakness of government's bill. Respectfully suggest that pertinent recommendations of parliamentary committee and the Gray report be embodied in the bill and review process widened.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Goodman is no flaming revolutionary who is practising doctrinaire Marxist philosophy. I assure you that Mr. Goodman is not that type of Canadian. I assure hon. members, too, that other Canadians such as Mr. Walter Gordon, who the minister might be afraid of, are not that type of Canadian either. The bill falls far short of what it should do. It is doing nothing about direct foreign investment in our economy. It will do nothing at all about the expansion of United States firms or other foreign firms which are already operating in Canada. In fact, in touches very little upon foreign investment in this country.

In my constituency people are concerned about foreign investment. They want us to take action now. The government of Saskatchewan has introduced in the legislature a bill on foreign ownership which will prohibit the purchasing of farmland in that province by foreigners who live outside of Canada. It is a small step, Mr. Speaker. This principle should be applied to other industries if we want to build a Canada for Canadians.

The question of foreign ownership is one which causes many heated arguments. It is one which will polarize opinions as it obviously does in the House of Commons. I think it shows us whose side the people will take—the side of those who are interested in promoting the well-being of the multinational corporation or of those who are concerned about promoting the interests of the farmers and the small businessmen of Canada. I want to see much more done than is offered in the bill before us because our economy, much more than any other in the western world, is owned and controlled by foreign corporations. We lose more out of our country than comes in in terms of wealth. We are losing jobs, we are losing political autonomy, we are losing the right to make many of the decisions we should be making in this country.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps the minister can confirm whether we shall be continuing this debate tomorrow.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think so.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN HEALTH RESOURCES FUND TO ENABLE TRAINING OF MORE GENERAL MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, during the question period the other day I raised the problem of the acute shortage of general practitioners. This is becoming a very serious and grave situation, so grave that in another 20 years at the present rate we will be approximately 25,000 short. The minister inferred that the provinces were not taking up the health resources funds that were available. It was my understanding from the province of Ontario that they could not get sufficient money to provide the teacher scientists, the space or equipment necessary—in other words, the teaching complex.

I have talked to the deans of various universities about fully qualified students who year after year are refused entrance. Some of these boys worked as male nurses in hospitals, which proves their dedication. They hoped that by doing this they would be accepted. The deans of the universities for which I have high regard told me that without exception they felt very badly about the students whom they could not accept even though they were qualified. One university reported to me that they had 25 places left for students and that they had had over 1,400 applications for those 25 places.

At the same time, we imported in 1970 1,113 doctors and graduated 1,131. In 1969 we imported 1,347 and graduated 1,017. These figures are the most recent. We are, in effect, denying our own boys and girls who are fully qualified the chance to enter the medical profession. These young people are the sons and daughters of the taxpayers who pay around $50,000 for each medical student who graduates.

Does the minister think that it is fair that these young people should be denied entrance and the chance to enter the profession of their choice? Surely this illustrates beyond any reasonable doubt that if there was any money left in the health resources fund, and with the responsibility for medical manpower requirements that the government accepted when they brought in national medicare, it should be their co-responsibility with the provinces to provide the doctors required and the places to train them.

It is pretty bad when you reject your own boys and girls, the children of taxpayers because it is cheaper to import fully trained physicians than to train them in Canada, many of whose entrance qualifications would not be accepted here. Why should Canada be a parasite on the rest of the world when it comes to producing physicians? We get many physicians from the poorly developed countries whose needs are greater than ours. I hope this answers the minister's doubts—if he really had any—that we are short of doctors, particularly general practitioners, and places to train them.

I should now like to deal with the shortage of general practitioners. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has stated that it is easier to see a specialist in Vancouver—I hope I am quoting him accurately—than it is to see a general practitioner in Hamilton. A shortage of doctors leads to a shortage of interns and many hospitals which 40 years ago would have had interns have none at all today. Consequently, the emergency departments of hospitals are grossly overcrowded. People are seeking help from emergency departments when they are only moderately sick and should be seen at a general practitioner's office, and would if there were enough to go around.

A survey recently conducted and reported by Dr. Glen Sawyer, the secretary-treasurer of the Ontario Medical Association, indicated that people wanted to see the family doctor when they were sick. They were not particularly concerned with how many degrees he had; they just wanted a common sense, medically trained GP and they were willing to pay for his services. Every case where a general practitioner can look after a patient in his home represents a saving of $60 a day for a hospital bed. Taking this as a rough average, ten such cases a day in a city of 30,000 people would mean a saving of $600 per day in respect of health costs. Surely the minister is interested in this. I know every province, particularly the province of Ontario is interested in it. The outpatient departments and emergency rooms of our hospitals are substitutes of a kind for the family physician, but ambulatory care in these cases is largely impersonal and unco-ordinated.

As an example of how general practitioners have become scarce I will take one city, Windsor, which is supposed to have a fair average. In 1955 the population of the city was 188,614. There were 110 general practitioners and 78 specialists. In 1971 the population of the city was 220,088. There were 104 general practitioners and 144 specialists.

This in my opinion is a fair indication of what is going on in general in Ontario and in Canada. Surely the minister no longer can deny qualified medical students the right to enter their profession and be provided the necessary funds for training in conjunction with the provinces. The provision of more general practitioners to reduce galloping health care costs is a necessity which must be tackled from this angle. Actually Ontario, if it were keeping up with Alberta—if my figures are correct—should be graduating about 700 physicians. I hope the minister will realize that he must provide general practitioners as his first line of defence in lowering health costs. I hope that he will by persuation see that the health resource funds are used up. It is sad to boast or to have to admit that they are not being used completely.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I note that the hon. member for Simcoe-North (Mr. Rynard) is most tenacious in his remarks, since this is at least the second time that I am answering his question.

I could refer to the answer that I gave him previously, as well as to those that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has already made in this House.

Perhaps I might also use some notes which I have just received from the department. Unfortunately, they are in English and I would have preferred them to be drafted in French, in order to give a better answer to the hon. member. So, I shall make a few comments on the remarks of the hon. member and say that I personally endorse much of what he has just stated in this House.

I share his regrets when I realize that unfortunately not enough young Canadians can become doctors because they are denied access to our medical schools. These young people often achieve marks of 75, 78 or 80 per cent in their work, yet schools of medicine demand that they get 85 or even 90 per cent to accept them.

The shortage of doctors which worries the hon. member for Simcoe North is a problem which causes great concern to the Canadian government as well. We have told him repeatedly, and I fail to understand why he should insist on holding the federal government responsible for it. To my mind, the hon. member should spend the same energy not in making charges against the government but in suggesting to universities that they operate differently so that more young Canadians might enrol and get a degree in medicine. This would certainly help to alleviate the shortage of doctors in Canada.

In spite of everything, the hon. member for Simcoe North should know that in Canada the ratio of doctors per inhabitants is far superior to that in most developed countries of the world and in particular in Sweden, France, New Zealand, England and Japan.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—INCREASE IN COST OF FOOD—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions recently I have questioned the government about the matter of rising food prices and rising chain store profits around the central fact that between April 1, 1971, and April 1, 1972, the cost of food used in the home rose by nearly 7½ per cent, twice as much as the cost of living generally, while at the same time the profits of supermarket chains also rose in spectacular fashion. For example, Safeway's profits rose by 40 per cent in the first three months of this year, the profits of George Weston rose by nearly 50 per cent and the profits of Dominion stores by 300 per cent.

My first attempt, on May 10, was when I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> Will the government undertake to make an investigation to see whether this increase in the cost of food is due to inordinate mark-ups by supermarkets or excessive profit-taking by canners and processors of food?

The Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I will certainly see that the suggestion of the hon. member is studied. However, I might say that according to our statistics the gain was in line with the March-April changes in the past five years—

This answer certainly was very courteous but it did not satisfy me, nor did it satisfy the many people in Vancouver-Kingsway who have been having a desperately hard time to keep up with the cost of living in their food budget. So on May 17 I asked the Acting Prime Minister, who on that day happened to be the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), whether the government had measures in hand to help low income consumers, to which the Acting Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, the government has taken many measures of particular interest to low-income families, the aged and the disabled. I think the hon. lady will agree that this should be our first priority.

This, again, was a courteous but unsatisfactory answer. I pointed out that only two groups of people benefited from the budget—the elderly and full-time students. Again I asked whether the government would investigate immediately food prices in this country, and the reply of the Acting Prime Minister was a firm no. So the next day, May 18, I tried again. I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) if his attention had been drawn to a study by a professor at Simon Fraser University and his students which found that supermarket chains are masters of the illusionary pricing technique and often control products from farm to store shelf to the detriment of the consumer, and would he consider making a grant available so that this booklet could be widely distributed across Canada.

The minister promised to examine my remarks and the booklet with great interest. Again, this courteous reply was not helping families with their food budgets, so again I asked if the minister would conduct an investigation into the control by supermarkets of products from farm to grocery store shelf. At this point the Chair ruled that I was out of order. So on May 23 I made my fourth attempt by trying to secure the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion as follows:

> That the matter of food prices and supermarket profits be referred to a special committee of this House for investigation and report.

As Your Honour knows, I did not get unanimous consent; a chorus of "noe's" came from the other side of the House, the government side. So tonight I am asking the government once again to please answer my question favourably: Will they conduct an immediate inquiry into rising food costs and rising supermarket profits?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) both courteously and, I hope, satisfactorily on this occasion although I do not expect she would be in character if she were satisfied. I question her misreading of the budget, that it helped only the elderly and students. I think the hon. member would want to include veterans also and all those Canadians who will benefit from a growing, prosperous economy.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, the combines investigation branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is keeping a watching brief on the situation. There has been no evidence of violations under the Combines Investigation Act, but the branch is ready and has the powers to act, indeed is required by law to act, if there are reasonable grounds for suspicion that there is a violation under the combines act. I would urge the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to bring forth any evidence or indication of violations that she has, so that such action can be taken.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would help to put things in perspective if we were to look at the record. As the hon. member is well aware, in late 1970 and early 1971 there was a price war among supermarket chains, particularly in eastern Canada, with a consequent severe effect on the profit of the chains. The hon. member's party might not think that profits are a significant factor, but I do not consider them evil so long as they are in line.

In the first quarter of 1972 there was a substantial increase in profits simply because they had declined so much in the previous year, and we could find no evidence of profiteering. An example might be Dominion stores which the hon. minister said had a profit increase of some 300 per cent. Their year end, I believe, is mid-March and the figures I have would indicate that their percentage of profit on sales dropped from 1.4 per cent in 1970 to .4 per cent in 1971, and then rose to 1.0 per cent in 1972 according to their recent year end statement. In 1967-68 it was 1.7 per cent, so I hardly consider this an extravagant increase in view of the fact that it was lower than before the price war. They have just recovered to the previous level. Other supermarket chains have had a similar experience. Total dollar profits have increased, there is no question about that, but sales have increased substantially—

Mr. Bell: How about babysitting; has that gone up?

Mr. Danson: I would be delighted to continue because I think the hon. member deserves not only a courteous but a satisfactory answer. We would be more than pleased to initiate an investigation if the hon. member can present evidence of violations. We are waiting for that, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT—SUMMERSIDE P.E.I. AIR SERVICES—RESULT OF DISCUSSION WITH LOCAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this evening I am going to deal with a question which was raised some time ago following a visit by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to Prince Edward Island. It was a much delayed visit, one which was planned for late last year or early this year and had a number of aspects to it, including the imminent suspension of air service to Summerside, P.E.I. That suspension took place in January. Prior to that we had an assurance that the minister would consult with officials in P.E.I., with the premier, with responsible officials in Summerside, with representatives of the Board of Trade and of other important groups. Unfortunately, such consultation did not take place until March.

On March 14 I asked the minister directly whether there had been consultation concerning the adequacy of air service, particularly in view of the suspension of air service to Summerside, P.E.I. I pointed out that one of the most serious aspects following the suspension was the removal of the air terminal. In light of the fact that Eastern Provincial Airlines was granted a suspension for two years, not a termination of air service, this was more than a little disquieting to the citizens who thought that a permanent decision had been taken with regard to winding up the facilities at CFB Summerside. The minister said that it was for the airline to decide about disposing of its building and facilities, but I think the minister may recognize that more is at stake than the decision taken unilaterally by Eastern Provincial Airlines.

Following the suspension of air service a number of difficulties have arisen. Some loss of time has been encountered by the business community and there has been a definite increase in air freight costs to Summerside from other parts of Canada. This I have experienced myself. There is an additional tariff involved in moving goods from Charlottetown to Summerside. In addition, it costs $10 more for a person to land at Summerside than it did prior to the air service suspension in January. This does not please the people who live in Summerside and west of it.

Proposals have been advanced to the Canadian Transport Commission by Roberts Air Service which has indicated a willingness to provide service between Summerside and Moncton. I understand that this would be simple from the standpoint of the Canadian Transport Commission and the other competitor in the area, Eastern Provincial Airlines who operate out of Charlottetown. At the present time there may be a minor objection from EPA but not sufficient to prevent an air service to and from Summerside.

This is important for two basic reasons, Mr. Speaker. One is the importance of increased regional air service. We have seen some of this with EPA from Charlottetown to Halifax and Fredericton. Even more important is the situation with regard to Summerside because of the new lease of life given to it by the announcement of permanency. The business community and the citizens of Summerside believe that in light of these new circumstances a more adequate air service should originate there. I hope that the representative of the Minister of Transport can tonight give us an assurance that adequate air service will be restored to Summerside.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was meeting today with the members of the Atlantic Transport Commission in St. John, he cannot answer tonight the hon. member for Egmont.

However, I am aware of the discussions which have been held in Charlottetown on the need for air transportation in the Summerside area, in the hon. member's beautiful province where I stop when travelling to that beautiful part of my constituency located in the St. Lawrence and called the Magdalen Islands.

[English]

A number of proposals were discussed at that time, and on April 17 an application to the Canadian Transport Commission was filed by Roberts Air Service to provide service between Summerside and Moncton. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that this matter is now before the air transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission for consideration, and a decision is expected fairly soon.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

ORDERS AND DECORATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MODIFICATIONS AND ADDITIONS TO CANADIAN SYSTEM OF HONOURS—TABLING OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to announce certain modifications and additions to the Canadian system of Honours.

Of those many ingredients which, together, are nationhood, one of the most important is the voluntary desire on the part of citizens to contribute to national life. A grateful nation should be willing to recognize and honour those persons whose contributions are truly outstanding, and to this end the government has sought advice from many elements of our society.

It is my pleasure to announce that Her Majesty the Queen, on the advice of the government, has approved the issue of Letters Patent revising the Order of Canada, establishing a Canadian Order of Military Merit and creating three Canadian decorations for bravery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In the five years since the Order of Canada was created to recognize outstanding achievement and service it has done more than fulfil our expectations of it. It has been accepted and is respected throughout the country.

The new Letters Patent will increase the levels of membership to three, Companions of the Order, Officers of the Order—and this level will take in those who now hold the Medal of Service—and Members of the Order. As might be expected, existing Companions of the Order and holders of the Medal of Service are generally persons who have achieved prominence on the national scene. The new level, Member of the Order, has been designed to offer deserved recognition to those persons who have chosen to contribute their time and their talents to their own communities, professions or other groups. The importance of these contributions is often no less than those whose efforts have been directed on a broader scale and it is only appropriate that it be officially recognized.

[Translation]

The Order of Military Merit is established to honour professional excellence and exceptional devotion to duty on the part of members of the Canadian Armed Forces. To the honour our armed forces have won in war in Canada's defence we must now add the universal esteem in which our soldiers, sailors and airmen are held as the most experienced and best trained forces in the new, exacting and dangerous trade of peacekeeping and truce observation. To the military ideal of gallantry in the face of the foe must now be added patience and steadfastness in keeping the peace between factions in conflict, stamina and effectiveness in exercising Canadian sovereignty in distant parts of our country, courage and skill in support of the civil power whether it be in rescue operations, disaster relief or, for that matter, fighting forest fires.

The Order of Military Merit has three levels, Commander, Officer and Member. Every serviceman, irrespective of rank, may aspire to appointment to the Order at any of its three levels.

[English]

The Order of Canada, as originally constituted, provided for a Medal of Courage to be awarded in recognition of acts of conspicuous bravery. Although many Canadians have qualified for such a medal, and indeed been nominated for it, it has never been awarded in part because of the problems faced in trying to make one decoration cover a whole range of acts of courage. The government has concluded that what is required is a series of three decorations: The Cross of Valour, the Star of Courage and the Medal of Bravery. These awards will be granted to both civilian and military personnel. Members will remember the tragic events that took place on the destroyer Kootenay some years ago, when a number of our servicemen distinguished themselves by acts of bravery. They will now be recommended for Canadian bravery decorations, as will many other Canadians who have put their lives at risk for the safety of others. Preliminary work has been under way for some years, and I am confident that announcements of awards will be made in the near future.

In our constitutional system, the grant of honours is a prerogative of the Head of State, the Queen. As Her Majesty has been sovereign of the Order of Canada since its inception, so she is now also sovereign of the Order of Military Merit and it is by her, as sovereign, that bravery decorations are conferred. The Governor General, in his capacity as Chancellor of the Order of Canada, will continue as at present to receive recommendations for awards made by an adivisory council headed by the Chief Justice of Canada. In the case of the Order of Military Merit, of which the Governor General is also Chancellor, the names of the proposed recipients will be submitted by the Canadian Forces Decorations Committee through the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Minister of National Defence. In conferring the new decorations for heroism, the Governor General will be assisted by a bravery awards advisory committee. The high regard in which the Order of Canada is held derives from the high standards it sets and the impartiality of the selection process. The new arrangements will continue to insist upon high standards and impartiality. I should like to emphasize that, as with the Order of Canada up till now, any citizen has the right to nominate anyone he feels to be worthy for an honour in any of the classifications I have announced today.

[Translation]

In this symbolic fashion, the government seeks to create a means of expressing the gratitude of all Canadians to those of their fellows who have contributed to the quality of life in this country through acts of service, excellence and bravery.

Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2), I would like to table copies of the relevant Orders in Council, the text of the Letters Patent, the constitution of the Order of Canada and the Order of Military Merit and regulations governing the award of Canadian Bravery Decorations.

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the statement the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has just made is a very important one and I wish to thank him for giving us advance notice of its contents. This is not to say, however, that the notice was sufficient, in view of the importance of the matter, to enable me to deal with it comprehensively at this time.

The Prime Minister said in his statement:

> Of those many ingredients which, together, are nationhood, one of the most important is the voluntary desire on the part of citizens to contribute to national life. A grateful nation should be willing to recognize and honour those persons whose contributions are truly outstanding, and to this end the government has sought advice from many elements of our society.

He went on to say:

> In this symbolic fashion, the government seeks to create a means of expressing the gratitude of all Canadians to those of their fellows who have contributed to the quality of life in this country through acts of service, excellence and bravery.

I agree wholeheartedly with the sentiments expressed in these statements by the Prime Minister. I should like to point out, however, that the lack, for long periods, of recognition and honour due to those Canadians whose contributions have been truly outstanding has not been because of the absence of any mechanism for doing so but rather because of the fact that this and many other Canadian governments have refrained from making recommendations to Her Majesty in this regard, presumably because the decorations or orders that were provided for in the past were common to most or all of the Commonwealth. It is for that reason that the honours and awards now established have been created as a substitute to fill the void that was thus brought into being.

Turning now to the awards themselves, I believe that the creation of a third group, Members of the Order of Canada, is an improvement. I believe, too, that the establishment of a Canadian Order of Military Merit will fill a great need for our Canadian forces, especially in peacetime operations. The creation of three Canadian decorations for bravery, for which both military and civilian persons are eligible, is welcome.

The statement of the Prime Minister leaves two important questions unanswered. First, will the world-renowned, Commonwealth-wide decorations such as the Victoria Cross, the George Medal and the D.S.O. still be available to Canadian citizens as Canadian decorations in future? Second, what will be the order of precedence of the Commonwealth-wide decorations that have been conferred on Canadians in the past relative to these new decorations? I presume that the documents the Prime Minister has tabled will designate that. I would certainly hope that world-renowned decorations such as the Victoria Cross, the George Medal and many others will retain their pre-eminence and their precedence.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my comment will be brief. I am pleased, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to greet with pleasure the Prime Minister's announcement. We have, as is well known, always supported the idea that Canada should have its own program and procedures for recognizing outstanding achievement and service by Canadians in all fields. I am particularly pleased because the Prime Minister's announcement will enable a great many more Canadians to be involved in the program of recognition.

I readily agree, Sir, that the Order of Canada is highly respected and that the selection of Canadians for that order has been of a high and objective character. The addition of a level aimed to extend recognition to Canadians for services rendered at the local level deserves full support, since it will make possible a wider recognition of achievement and devoted service by Canadians.

We are also happy to welcome the establishment of an Order of Military Merit in recognition of outstanding bravery. I hope, as I am sure all Members of Parliament do, that our forces will never again have to defend our freedom and our country in war. It is, therefore, most fitting that we recognize their important services to Canada and to the world in peacetime.

The Prime Minister has so well and in so literate a way explained the reasons for the program of decorations he has announced that it would be superfluous for me to add anything more. I merely say that we warmly welcome his announcement.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we have heard with some satisfaction the announcement which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has just made concerning the creation of the Order of Military Merit.

This announcement which, I think, had been expected for quite some time will doubtless constitute an incentive for all members of our forces in addition to filling them with pride for receiving an award from their country.

Until now, the decoration which had been awarded came from a foreign country, and only a handfull of Canadian servicemen or civilians could hope for their galantry being recognized by their country.

We dare hope that this decoration which the right hon. Prime Minister has just announced will be awarded not only to servicemen who deserve it fairly often through their galantry on the line of service in time of war, but also to many deserving civilians in the accomplishment of their duties. I think particularly of policemen and firemen, as well as a number of persons who, at one time or another, are called by their duties to take actions which deserve to be recognized.

Given the decorations that our country proposes to grant, I hope that a greater number of worthy persons will see their heroic deeds recognized.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PAYMENT OF EXPENSES OF DELEGATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to move a motion because of urgent and pressing necessity. That necessity is occasioned by the arrival yesterday in Ottawa of a committee of native Indian people from Thunder Bay who came here at their own expense as a result of an agreement that they would be able to have a meeting yesterday afternoon at five o'clock with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). That meeting did not proceed because of an error on the part of the department. Therefore I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House hereby authorizes the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to reimburse the committee of Indian people under the joint leadership of Mrs. Monica Turner, chairman of the Ontario Native Women's Association and Mr. Bill Sault of the Treaty Research Department of the Union of Ontario Indians, who travelled from Thunder Bay to Ottawa to meet with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and who incurred expenses of a personal nature for that meeting which could not take place because of an error within the said department.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might recognize that this is a motion which should perhaps have been preceded by a Royal recommendation. In any event, so as not to get involved in this rather subtle aspect of the matter, I would invite hon. members to indicate whether there is unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in connection with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the desperate situation confronting firms in the Atlantic region as a result of inordinately high freight rates. In view of the fact that many regional economic development schemes are thwarted ultimately by these transportation costs, and in view of the fact that some maritime firms are being pushed to the brink of survival, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the entire matter of freight rates be referred to the Standing Committee on Transportation for immediate review.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Regional Development but I missed the call for presentation of reports. May I have permission to do so now?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is seeking the unanimous consent of the House to revert to the presentation of committee reports. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I recognized at least one "no". I thought it was the hon. member for St. Boniface. If there is not unanimous consent, we cannot revert to the presentation of committee reports.

An hon. Member: Stay awake!

BLACKOUT OF BUFFALO, NEW YORK TELEVISION STATION TO CANADIAN CABLE SUBSCRIBERS

Question No. 435—Mr. Robinson:

Will a Buffalo, New York television station be blacked out to Canadian cable subscribers and, if so, which one?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television commission as follows: The present CRTC policy on cable television establishes that cable companies in the Toronto area should carry the following stations as a priority in the Toronto area: CICA, channel 19; CBLT, channel 6; CFTO, channel 9; and CHCH, channel 11. The commission also encourages cable companies to provide community access programming through an additional "local origination" channel. Other stations carried by CATV systems are optional. It therefore rests with the individual cable system serving Toronto and the area to decide which of these option stations best suit the needs of their subscribers.

[English]

CRTC REGULATIONS REGARDING LOCAL TELEVISION STATIONS

Question No. 436—Mr. Robinson:

Do the existing regulations of the CRTC compel cable operators to give precedence to local television stations and, if so, will one Buffalo, New York television station be denied to Canadian viewers?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The Canadian Radio-Television Commission advises as follows: See answer to question No. 435 answered this day.

STUDIES IN REFERENCE TO ROUTES AND METHODS OF TRANSPORTATION OF PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS FROM THE NORTH

Question No. 521—Mr. Woolliams:

1. Under what department do the studies being made as to energy and as to the economics and ecology in reference to the two routes and methods of transportation of crude petroleum and natural gas from the North come and, what is the name of the person who heads the study committee?

2. How many members are on this committee?

3. What department is paying the total cost?

4. What is the estimated cost?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a four part question. The answer is as follows: 1. The studies do not come under any one department but rather under the general direction of the Task Force on Northern Oil Development which is chaired by the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

2. There are five members on the Task Force on Northern Oil Development.

3. Costs of the ecology and social studies are shared by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources, Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Environment, and costs of other studies are borne by the department concerned.

4. The costs of the ecology and social studies are estimated at up to $5 million annually over a four year period.

VISITS OF INDIAN CLAIMS COMMISSIONER OUTSIDE OF CANADA

Question No. 568—Mr. Nielsen:

1. Did Mr. Lloyd Barber, the Commissioner for Indian Claims, make any journeys outside of Canada in the past six months and, if so, to what places and for what purpose?

2. Did anyone accompany Mr. Barber on any such journeys outside of Canada on behalf of the Government of Canada?

3. If anyone did accompany Mr. Barber, what were their names and positions and for what purpose did they accompany him?

4. What was the cost, if any, to the government for such journeys?

5. What was the final result of Mr. Barber's journeys?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): I am informed by the Indian Claims Commissioner as follows: 1. Yes, to New Zealand and Australia; to gain first hand knowledge of the nature of Maori and Aboriginal claims, grievances, and approaches to settlement, for purposes of comparison to Canadian Indian claims and grievances.

2. and 3. Dr. Barber was not accompanied on this journey by anyone else travelling on behalf of the Government of Canada. However, the Commissioner's Director of Legal Research, Professor Ken Lysyk, travelled independently to Australia and New Zealand during the same period when Dr. Barber was in those countries. They were able to spend some time together in New Zealand.

4. The cost of these journeys is not available at this time as the accounting for them has not yet been completed.

5. The final result of Dr. Barber's journeys will, of course, not be known for some time. A report is in process.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BOARD

Question No. 581—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. What is the membership of the Agricultural Stabilization Board?

2. How often does it meet?

3. What are the responsibilities of its members and how are they selected?

4. Does the Board have a Secretariat and, if so, who are the staff members?

5. What is its budget?

6. What is the primary intent and purpose of the Board?

7. What are the rules and regulations which govern its activity?

8. When was it established and on what date was its last annual report published?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. According to section 3(1) of the Agricultural Stabilization Act the Board consists of three members.

2. In 1971-72, the Board held 32 official meetings plus numerous additional meetings with delegations, representatives of producer organizations and groups from the agricultural industry.

3. The Board is responsible for carrying out the purposes of the Act by taking such actions as are necessary to stabilize the prices of agricultural products. Members of the Board are appointed by the Governor in Council.

4. The Board employs a secretary-manager and a staff (Subsidy Processing Section) which has averaged approximately 85 in number over the past five years.

5. The 1972-73 budget: Operating—$541,000, grants to carry out programs under the Act—$111,400,000.

6. See item 3.

7. The Board is governed by the Agricultural Stabilization Act and Orders in Council passed pursuant to the Act.

8. The Act was assented to on January 31, 1958 and the last annual report tabled was for the 1970-71 fiscal year.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL COMMISSIONS

Question No. 86—Mr. Coates:

1. How many Royal Commissions or other bodies of inquiry have been instituted by the federal government since June 25, 1968?

2. In each instance (a) what was the date of the establishment of the commission (b) what were the names of the persons appointed in each instance (c) has the commission completed its work and, if not, on what date is its work to be completed (d) how much has each of the persons appointed received in salary and expenses?

3. In each instance, were federal government facilities and employees used for any part of the work of the commissions and, if so, how were they used?

4. Has each commission used the printing facilities of the federal government to carry out its responsibilities in that regard and, if not (a) which commissions did not use such facilities for all of their work (b) in each instance, how was a determination made as to what private printing firms should be used for such work?

Return tabled.

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TOWARD GENERAL MAINTENANCE OF UNITED NATIONS

Question No. 279—Mr. Robinson:

In each year since the United Nations was created (a) how much has Canada contributed as its designated share toward the general maintenance of the United Nations (b) how many special funds of the United Nations has Canada contributed to (c) what has been the amount of each such contribution (d) for what purpose was each contribution made?

Return tabled.

Question No. 503—Mr. Korchinski:

1. In each province in the past four years, how many post offices were built by the Department of Public Works?

2. What was the location and what were the revenues in each case?

3. In each province, how many post offices were there that had revenues greater than the revenues at offices where construction was undertaken?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 61 is acceptable to the government.

COPY OF REPORTS RESULTING FROM 1971 INFORMATION CANADA COMMUNICATIONS RESEARCH PROJECT

Motion No. 61—Mr. Rowland:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the eight reports resulting from Summer 71 Information Canada Communications Research Project.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 4, 11, 19 and 42?

COPY OF REPORTS CARRIED OUT UNDER AUSPICES OF CANADIAN COUNCIL ON ANIMAL CARE

Motion No. 4—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for Assessment Reports carried out under the auspices of the Canadian Council on Animal care (a) in Canadian universities for the fiscal year 1970-71 (b) in federal government departments for the use of animals for experimental purposes, that is, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the National Research Council and the Defence Research Board, such reports covering the fiscal year 1969-70 (c) in Canadian pharmaceutical houses for the fiscal year 1969-70.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Assessment reports under the auspices of the Canadian Council on Animal Care are confidential to the council and the particular bodies concerned. For this reason I would ask the hon. member to withdraw her motion.

Mrs. MacInnis: I do not believe that such reports should be kept secret and I therefore ask that this motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. JOHN CARSON AND HON. JOHN TURNER REGARDING BILINGUALISM IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Motion No. 11—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence between Mr. John Carson, Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Honourable John Turner, Minister of Justice, regarding bilingualism in the Public Service and its application under the terms of the Public Service Employment Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

COPY OF CONSULTANT REPORT FOR CMHC REGARDING LONG-TERM DEVELOPMENT STUDY OF CITÉ DU HAVRE

• (1430)

Motion No. 19—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report undertaken for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regarding the planning for a long-term development study of Cité du Havre in 1968, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this report has not yet been presented to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs nor to the Minister of Transport. Officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Harbours Board have been asked to study the report and make recommendations to the government. The report is, therefore, not available for tabling at this time. Under these circumstances, would the hon. member consider withdrawing his motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to withdraw it, subject to the member's right to put it on the order paper again.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

COPY OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN PANARCTIC OILS LTD. AND UNITED STATES COMPANIES WITH REFERENCE TO ARCTIC GAS

Motion No. 42—Mr. Douglas:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the agreement between Panarctic Oils Ltd. and a consortium of United States companies consisting of Tenneco Oils and Minerals Ltd., Columbia Gas Systems Inc., Texas Eastern Transmission Co., and Northern Natural Gas Co. with reference to the right of first refusal on Arctic gas supplies.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, tabling of this agreement without the written consent of both parties involved will constitute a breach of confidence on the part of the government. Since this consent cannot be obtained, this document must be considered as privileged information which cannot be tabled. Under the circumstances I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, since the government of Canada is the largest single shareholder in this company, I cannot accept the statement that consent cannot be given. Therefore I ask that the question be now put.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there stand in my name five notices of motions for production of papers, namely Nos. 52 to 56 inclusive, all relating to the same general subject, namely, correspondence and reports respecting the proposal that a cannery be built in the Prince Rupert area. I raised this matter some time ago with the parliamentary secretary and asked him to speed up the response to these motions in view of the urgent need on the part of the proponents of the cannery to have this information before the fishing season has progressed too far. Could the hon. gentleman provide a response to these motions by next Wednesday?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I have again made a note of the numbers. I looked into these motions on the hon. member's behalf. While some portions of the answers are under preparation, other portions present more difficulty. We are still working on the matter but we do hope to be able to provide a response to them soon.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NEW CANADIAN SYSTEM OF HONOURS—POSITION RESPECTING FUTURE AWARDS OF VICTORIA CROSS AND GEORGE MEDAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to one of the points that his statement on decorations did not cover. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is intended that Commonwealth decorations such as the Victoria Cross and the George Medal will continue to be available to Canadian citizens?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to those two decorations it has been determined that those Canadians who have been awarded them will continue to wear them and that they will be given precedence over the new Canadian awards. As to future awards and the problem raised by the hon. member, we will seek the advice of the advisory committee to the Governor General.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I correct in assuming that the government has taken no decision with regard to the future awarding of Commonwealth decorations such as the Victoria Cross and the George Medal? Is it the intention of the government to take a definitive decision on this matter following the consultation referred to by the right hon. gentleman, or is it the intention of the government to seek advice from time to time on individual cases?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there are some awards that the Sovereign makes in her own right, and of course these will continue to be awarded by her to citizens of the Commonwealth or the United Kingdom as she desires. Those that are made on the advice of Canadian governments will be subject to advice given from time to time by Canadian governments, and each government will be free to give what advice it finds desirable.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to be too persistent but I do want to make sure that I understand the government's position. I want to know what the position is of the existing government of Canada—and we will not speculate today on how long that will continue to be the case. Will the present government of Canada recommend the granting of any of these Commonwealth awards, or is it the policy of the present government of Canada not to make any such recommendation? For example, I am thinking of the George Medal which is associated not with wartime but with peacetime activity.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when this system was instituted in 1967 it was completely removed, I would say, from the government of the day's wills and whims and turned over to the Governor General and those named to advise him. I will continue to follow this practice, and that is why my first answer was that I would take advice from this advisory committee on awards. An expression of my own view would be that in the case of awards given by the Sovereign in her own right I would hope she would continue to want to give some to Canadians and to other citizens. But as a matter of preference I would hope that Canadian governments in the future would prefer to give some status to our own system of awards by placing emphasis on it and seeking to reward Canadians through a Canadian system of awards as an indication that we have reached full nationhood, rather than recommending a system of awards that is common to other countries. I would hope that the Leader of the Opposition would share this position.

NEW CANADIAN SYSTEM OF HONOURS—SUGGESTED RECOGNITION OF RIGHT HON. MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government sufficiently to broaden the basis of the awards so that a distinguished citizen who has made such an outstanding contribution to the building of this nation, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, is not precluded from being recognized because that great Canadian gentleman happens to be a member of the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe one of the rules—I am not sure whether it is written or unwritten or is a regulation of the order itself—provides that Orders of Canada awards are not given to, shall we say, politicians in active practice. Retired politicians—and this applies to several premiers of provinces whom I could name—have received the Order of Canada, but there has been a systematic avoidance of giving the award to politicians who are in good standing.

Mr. Coates: I asked the Prime Minister whether any consideration was being given to broadening these rules, and I should like to know whether it is going to be the intention of the government to continue to preclude the right hon. member for Prince Albert from being recognized for his contribution?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hope very much that after the next general election the committee will be able to consider making such an award to the former right hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NEW CANADIAN SYSTEM OF HONOURS—RETENTION OF PREROGATIVE TO RECOMMEND DECORATIONS COMMON TO COMMONWEALTH

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to retain the prerogative of Canadian governments to make recommendations? I am thinking now chiefly of peacetime decorations that are common to the Commonwealth, if a future government should see fit so to do?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would certainly want to go on record as stating that I hope that this government and also succeeding governments will not give up prerogatives that belong to the executive. Whether they would want to use it or not is a matter, as I mentioned to the Leader of the Opposition, of political expression. Certainly an example of this is the use of the appellation of "Right Honourable". The fact that I have not recommended to the Queen that any Canadians be given this title should not be taken as a suggestion that I have forgone this right as leader of the government.

NEW CANADIAN SYSTEM OF HONOURS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO VETERANS AND DEFENCE COMMITTEES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, since this intention of the government will affect Canadians for many years, will the Prime Minister direct that the whole matter of awards for bravery be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that there may be a proper delineation of the plans of the government to the benefit of all Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the aspect of awarding these decorations I would certainly not like to see them handled by a parliamentary committee. I would prefer to see them as detached as possible from political parties who happen to have been elected at a particular time, and that it should be done as it is now, as a prerogative exercise through and by the Governor General. If the House leaders want to get together and discuss the general subject, certainly the government will put no obstacles in their way.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister misinterpreted my question. Would he agree to bringing this matter before the standing committees so that veterans organizations could be heard in order that a proper plan could be devised which would be of benefit to all Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is not clear to me from the hon. member's question what it is about which he suggests these people be heard. If it is about the awarding of the decorations and honours, I have answered in the negative. I would hope it would not be for the standing committee or anyone in this House to decide who should receive awards. The advice of the veterans can and should be channelled through the Governor General and through the advisory board which has been set up. They have in the past and will continue to receive nominations for the various awards from all citizens.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Ontario on a supplementary question, but perhaps we might then go on to the next subject. If hon. members feel the matter is of such importance that it should be given further consideration, we might return to the subject later during the question period. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Ontario, to be followed by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Prime Minister on the subject of bravery awards. I wonder whether he would give consideration to giving such an award to the Leader of the Opposition for daring to sit with his back to the hon. member for Crowfoot?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Bell: Withdraw!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am unduly sensitive, and I do not want to adopt an attitude of undue propriety toward the hon. member, but with all due respect to him I think he is making light of a pretty important subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had the feeling that the moment had been reached when we should go on to the next subject. Perhaps I regret recognizing the hon. member for Ontario. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Horner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to prolong this issue, but I believe the hon. member's remarks cast a reflection upon me and actions I may or may not take. In all fairness to myself and the House, I suggest that his remarks are not parliamentary and the hon. member should be asked to withdraw them.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might say it was my impression that the hon. member for Ontario was smiling when he made those remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: The smile is not on the record.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member suggests that the smile is not on the record, and I agree with him. The question period is limited to 40 minutes and I suggest that hon. members should give serious thought to the questions they ask. I agree with the hon. member for Crowfoot that the hon. member for Ontario has no right to cast reflections on the actions of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: At the same time it is my impression that the hon. member did not intend to do so, and I would invite him to confirm that understanding.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly delighted to record the smile that was in fact on my face at that time. I certainly did not, nor have I ever since becoming a member of this House, intend to cast any reflection on either the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Crowfoot.

An hon. Member: You were caught in a cheap tactic.

Mr. Bell: There goes another riding. How many have you got left now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will go to the next subject. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I intend to fulfil your wish by going to another subject, but I cannot pass the opportunity without saying that apparently the smile on the face of the hon. member for Ontario does not improve his manners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South was recognized for the purpose of asking a question. He has passed this up in favour of a question of privilege by the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to what the leader of the NDP said provided it is understood he means that these manners could not be improved.

An hon. Member: You are getting in deeper and deeper.

Mr. Bell: I move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. Hees: There are some people you just can't teach.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if we might now return to the business of the House of Commons. The hon. member for York South.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS—INTERVENTION OF MEDIATOR

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State or the Minister of Labour—I do not know which one may be able to inform the House. Have negotiations between the CBC and NABET resumed, and is there any mediator or conciliator present during these negotiations?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago the corporation made a statement of its position. Earlier this week NABET put forward a statement of its position. A mediator is there to try to reconcile the differences that still exist.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not quite answer my question. This difficulty has gone on for many months and I should like to know from the minister whether the parties are now meeting with the mediator present, or are the talks still continuing at arms length?

Mr. O'Connell: The latter is the current situation, Mr. Speaker. The parties are meeting each other only through the mediator, not jointly.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will say this is a representation, but I will try to word it so it is not. May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to take steps now to request or require the parties to meet with the mediator present in continuing sessions, day and night, until they reach a settlement, before the CBC is done irreparable harm?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I think all of us share the concern about the length of the negotiations. At the same time, the two parties must show a will to negotiate before any useful measure of progress can be made.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continued disruption of CBC services as a result of the strike of its employees, and in view of the fact the president of the CBC seems unable to deal with the situation, is it the intention of the government to hasten the departure of the president of that corporation in order that new management may have an opportunity of attempting to negotiate a settlement?

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—MAXIMUM NUMBER OF PROJECTS TO BE APPROVED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Secretary of State.

In the last press release concerning Opportunities for Youth, it is stated that the number of approved projects has now reached 2,845. May I ask the minister whether the approved projects have now been selected to reach 3,000, as previously announced.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire to see whether there are still some projects to be announced but 3,000 has never been a mystic number and has never given rise to a profession of faith. We said that about 3,000 projects could be subsidized, according to the criteria and the available funds.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Bellechasse wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I heard the minister's reply and I presume that it is still possible for projects to be accepted and that the responsible persons will be notified without delay.

Mr. Pelletier: I think that the hon. member is indeed presumptuous, Mr. Speaker.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REJECTED APPLICATIONS—RESULTS OF SOLICITATION OF COMPANIES TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the government has had a team calling on businessmen during the month of May to solicit private support for the opportunities for youth project applications turned down by the government, would the minister inform the House when he will publish the list of corporations that have agreed to participate in this plan?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we consider it complete. For the time being, I regret to inform the hon. member that it is not a long list.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM BETWEEN WINDSOR AND QUEBEC CITY—POLICY RESPECTING FURTHER ATTEMPTS TO CURTAIL RAIL SERVICE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I had intended my question for the Minister of Transport who, according to the roster, was to be here, but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister or to the parliamentary secretary. My question is based on a public statement by the Minister of Transport that the government is looking into ways of introducing rapid transit between Windsor and Quebec City. May I ask whether it will be government policy to resist any attempt to further curtail the present rail service in this area until at least a feasible alternative can be provided?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS—MEASURES TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour with regard to a question asked yesterday dealing with the situation in the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec City and to which his colleague answered but not in a satisfactory way.

Considering the national importance of the situation resulting from the dilemma in which the Maritime Employees and Longshoremen's Association in the abovementioned ports find themselves and which gives rise to a daily loss of $100,000 for the Canadian economy, can the Minister of Labour tell the House what action he himself and the government intend to take to solve this conflict? Could he also tell the House what the situation is presently between the two parties?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the collective agreement that is in dispute with respect to certain clauses itself provides the means for resolving the dispute, that is, the use of the arbitration procedure. Arbitrators are named in the agreement itself. Either or both parties should make use of the arbitration procedure to settle that dispute. At the same time, the senior officers of the department in Montreal have remained in close touch with both parties, urging them to this course or to any other useful negotiations that would bring an end to the dispute.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—RECOURSE TO ARBITRATION—INTERVENTION BY THE MINISTER

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour; can he say whether, as far as he knows, either party has actually called for arbitration in the present dispute?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, neither party has used the arbitration procedure.

[Mr. Danforth.]

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of this question which affects the whole Canadian economy, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour to say honestly to the House whether, before this situation which seems to become more and more tense between both parties involved, he intends to act and propose a settlement for this dispute?

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: We are making every effort available to the Department of Labour to urge the parties to make use of the process which the Labour Code requires and which the collective agreement provides to settle that dispute.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTED ACTION BY GOVERNMENT UNDER LABOUR CODE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the present Labour Code commands that the government intervene at this time because, as I understand it, the parties are contravening the law, will the minister step in now and advise the parties that they must come to arbitration?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I say with all due respect to the hon. member that I think he is misinterpreting sections 124 and 125 of the Labour Code. It is the parties themselves that go to arbitration.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—EFFECT ON GRAIN SHIPMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. It concerns the strike at the St. Lawrence ports and the effect on grain shipment. Since all the hopper cars in the world will not be any good if grain shipments are affected by this kind of strike, I should like to ask the minister how long the government plans to let the situation continue before doing something positive about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

OATS—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1970-71 CROP YEAR

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Is he in a position to advise the House whether a final payment will be made on deliveries of oats for the crop year 1970-71, and could he enlighten the House as to when we might expect an announcement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, progress is being made toward the closing of this pool. I do not have a specific date when the announcement might be made, but I will get it for the hon. member.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LEVELS TO BE HELD FOR DOMESTIC USE BEFORE ADDITIONAL EXPORT PERMITTED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his statement to the Canadian Gas Association annual meeting in which he indicated that Canada hoped soon to be able to prove up additional reserves so as to permit export of more gas to the United States. Would he be prepared to make a statement on motions outlining the government's position with respect to its gas policy and indicating in particular what levels of gas will be held for domestic consumption prior to any additional export of gas being permitted?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might remind the hon. member that under an act of this parliament the responsibility for determining reserves and passing on individual export permits has been given to the National Energy Board. Therefore it would not be appropriate for the minister to say at what particular levels an export permit would or would not be granted.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that gas sales in Canada have gone up only 10 per cent in the first quarter of this year and gas exports to the United States under existing contracts rose by 16 per cent, may I ask will the minister explain to the House why he rather than the National Energy Board was indicating to the gas association—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL DECISIONS TO FEDERAL COURT IN ADDITION TO CANADIAN PITTSBURGH GLASS CASE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The other day I asked him a question concerning the reference to the Federal Court of the Canadian Pittsburgh Glass anti-dumping decision. Would he now advise the House whether his department or the government has decided to refer any of the other 20 or so decisions of the anti-dumping tribunal for review by Federal Court authorities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the specific grounds for taking action in the Pittsburgh case are apparent in the material which is filed. It is the only one on which action has been taken, and I will certainly not speculate on what action might be taken in all sorts of different hypothetical situations.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not a question of hypothetical cases but a matter of policy to have other decisions reviewed in light of what has been disclosed in the Canadian Pittsburgh case.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lang: As I made it clear to the House before, it is not appropriate to speculate about what action might be taken. If action is taken, it will be known.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—SUGGESTED ENLARGEMENT OF COMMITTEE ON DEVELOPMENT TO INCLUDE INDIAN REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Does he intend to expand the number of people on the recently created three-man committee to work out a framework for discussion of the future development of the James Bay region in order that a member of the James Bay Indian community may take part in all decisions that will affect the native population in the area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the way in which the hon. member phrased his question does not do justice to the situation. This is not a negotiating committee, but only a group of officials who will meet in order to establish a procedure for everyone to sit at the same table and find a solution.

I talked with the president of the Association of Indians of Quebec yesterday and their lawyer and they are quite happy with these developments.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Oxford on a supplementary, but it is my duty at this point to bring to the attention of hon. members that there are perhaps fewer than ten minutes before the end of the question period and at least 20 members are rising to ask questions. We will have to attempt to limit the number of supplementaries because again today many members, particularly in the back rows, will not be given an opportunity to ask questions, and it seems to me that this happens too often from day to day.

Mr. Nesbitt: This is only a brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give the House the assurance that the views of the Indian and Eskimo people who live in the area will be given every consideration when this committee is set up, and also in regard to the functions which it will perform?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Of course, Mr. Speaker, and this is why I dealt with it myself. It was at the request of the Indians and Eskimoes of northern Quebec that I went to meet Premier Bourassa last week.

[Mr. Marshall.]

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO ASSURE INDIANS RIGHT TO LEGAL COUNSEL IN CRIMINAL CASES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the large number of Indians in penal institutions in relation to their percentage of the population, and in view of the convention held in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, last weekend at which it was indicated that a good number of them are not aware of their rights in regard to legal counsel and criminal court procedures, will the minister consider amending the Criminal Code to assure them the right to counsel in criminal cases?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of possible amendments to the Criminal Code is, of course, in the hands of researchers within the Law Reform Commission as well as within the department, and particular improvements are under consideration. More immediately, there are moves afoot to improve legal aid approaches across the country, which is the most effective way of assuring legal assistance to people who need it.

POLLUTION

OTTAWA RIVER—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REMEDY SITUATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. Has the minister noticed the massive pollution that is floating by on top of the Ottawa River only 100 yards from where we are sitting at this moment, and when may the country expect that this once beautiful river will be cleaned up?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member has seen the announcement that the federal government is buying out the mills on the other side of the river and that they will be shut down shortly.

Mr. Hees: I point out that the pollution to which I am referring comes from higher up the river; it is massive, and it is there for everybody to see. Will the minister please do something about it?

FISHERIES

ICNAF ANNUAL MEETING—REACTION OF OTHER COUNTRIES TO CANADIAN PROPOSALS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister been in touch with our representatives at the twenty-second annual meeting of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries in Washington and, if so, when will he be in a position to report to the House on the attitude of the delegates to this conference to Canada's proposals concerning conservation, special preference for coastal states, and the restriction of high seas salmon fishing by the Danes?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch daily with our delegation in Washington. These discussions are proceeding satisfactorily. It looks as though our basic proposal for over-all and national quotas will be accepted by the Commission.

ICNAF ANNUAL MEETING—POSSIBILITY OF COMPROMISE AGREEMENT IN LIGHT OF SUPPORT FOR DANISH POSITION ON HIGH SEAS SALMON FISHING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what are the chances for Canada achieving some kind of a compromise agreement in light of what appears to be unexpected support for the Danish position from other quarters apart from the United States and West Germany?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are still under way and I cannot anticipate their conclusion.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON WHICH ANSWERS BASED RESPECTING POSSIBILITY OF MEMBER FOR TRINITY HAVING BROKEN OATH OF OFFICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the matter of security and is addressed to the Prime Minister. In light of the answer to a question put by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, found at page 2629 of Hansard, in which the Solicitor General said, referring to the hon. member for Trinity, that if he "wants to break his oath or hide behind it to arouse suspicion, it is up to him", and the answer by the Prime Minister that "some of his allegations"—meaning the hon. member for Trinity—"are apparently based on some things he got from cabinet" and "these communications are certainly privileged and under oath of secrecy", what facts did the hon. member for Trinity, the former deputy prime minister of Canada in this government, disclose as alleged by the Prime Minister to suggest that the former deputy prime minister broke his oath of office as a Privy Councillor in the Canadian government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I used the word "apparently" in my answer because I had not looked too closely at the matter. I have a transcript of the remarks made in the CBC news interview and apparently the commentator himself, in introducing the hon. member for Trinity, said this: "He also"—meaning the hon. member for Trinity—"admitted he was making the statement at the risk of breaking his cabinet oath of secrecy."

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the Prime Minister about the commentator on the CBC. I am asking the Prime Minister about his statement and the statement of the Solicitor General that the hon. member for Trinity, the former deputy prime minister of this country, broke his oath of office as alleged by the Prime Minister yesterday. What particular facts did the hon. member for Trinity state, on the basis of which the Prime Minister said he broke his oath of office?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is misquoting me. I did not say he broke his oath of office, nor did the Solicitor General say that.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not want to get into an argument with the Prime Minister. The words speak for themselves. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to make the same statement outside the House as he made in the House yesterday so that the hon. member for Trinity would have the proper remedy in law with respect to that statement?

Mr. Benson: Is this a new recruit for Action Canada?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO RESOLUTION OF ABORIGINAL RIGHTS NOT COVERED BY TREATIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the matter of aboriginal rights outside areas covered by treaties. Has the minister taken any initiative with regard to the resolution of these claims, as distinct from any rights or controversies over rights arising out of treaties?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I already told the House, the question has been referred by the Indians of northern British Columbia, the Nishga Tribal Council. The question is now being dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada and only once that Court has passed judgment shall I be in a position to make comments.

• (1510)

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the position of the government that this is a matter to be resolved by the courts and that the government does not intend to adopt any other method to achieve the resolution of these claims?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is customary to avoid making any comments on such questions while they are being examined by the Supreme Court so as not to give the impression that we intend to influence the court.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: You can't get away with that.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

LAKE LOUISE PROJECT—OPPOSITION OF ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the Alberta government's recently announced opposition to the proposed $30 million Esso Village Lake Louise project in which five serious defects were listed, has the minister's department been officially informed by the Alberta government of its opposition to the plan and, if so, what is his reaction to it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter from the Alberta Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs in which he informs me of the position of his government. It is both a refusal and an acceptance; it is difficult to interpret. I think they are at the same time for and against it and the government will have to make the decision and to take into account their pros and cons.

[English]

LAKE LOUISE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR DELAY TO PERMIT ECOLOGICAL STUDY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Will the minister place a moratorium on the project until the issues raised by the Alberta government have been resolved and a thorough ecological impact study has been done by competent ecologists and evaluated at a future public hearing?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this project is being considered. No works were undertaken in the area of Lake Louise. It is out of the question to impose a moratorium because there are in fact no works. It is only a project which is being examined by the government.

BILINGUALISM

ARTICLE PUBLISHED IN "CANADA TODAY"—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Would he indicate whether he intends to make a statement concerning the article published in "Canada Today" which deals with the failure of the government policy on bilingualism?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly not make a statement, but I can definitely say that the hon. member's information is inaccurate, or that his reading of the article is extremely prejudiced.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATEMENT BY QUEBEC PREMIER ON FEDERAL POWERS—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Three days ago the Quebec premier, commenting on an interview report of a deputy minister of Governmental Affairs of that province, publicly acknowledged that it was imperative to attack the federal government's famous spending power. According to his statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please ask his question? The oral question period will soon be over. The hon. member should ask a question, not make a speech.

Mr. La Salle: I was coming to my question, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to ask, in view of this statement, whether the Prime Minister is prepared to reconsider his position in relation to this very important problem, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not usually make any comment on reports made by provincial public servants to their ministers, and moreover I have not heard about this report at all.

Mr. La Salle: I wish to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the statement of the Quebec premier to the effect that at the last federal-provincial conference that matter had not been discussed in depth, would the right hon. Prime Minister be prepared to invite provincial authorities to have another discussion on this matter?

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—SUGGESTED ENLARGEMENT OF COMMITTEE ON DEVELOPMENT TO INCLUDE INDIAN REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development pertains to Indian rights. Does the minister intend to expand the number of people on the recently formed three-man committee created to work out a framework for discussion of future development of the James Bay region in order that a member of the Indian community may take part in any and all discussions or decisions which will affect the native population of this area?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer that there is confusion in the opposition ranks because this is exactly the same question as that put by the hon. member for Oxford a few minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West had a supplementary to a previous question. If not, we will call orders of the day.

LAKE LOUISE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POSITION FOLLOWING PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this is a supplementary to my previous question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister's department evaluated the material gathered at the recent public hearings into the Village Lake Louise project, and when may we expect a decision or a statement on this matter by the minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have received representations from many representative bodies, some of which were in favour of it and others were not. The government of Alberta has finally let us know his position. We are making a review of all these recommendations, and I expect to be able to inform the House, before the summer recess, of the government's decision about this matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to hon. members for not having had an opportunity to recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, the hon. member for Simcoe North and others who perhaps should have been recognized today. I will try to give them priority tomorrow. I again apologize for the fact that I did not have an opportunity to call upon them. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin that Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had an opportunity to begin my speech on the foreign takeover bill. During the brief moments that I had, I made some serious charges, I used some tough words, and I did that quite intentionally. I did it because I think that this bill is far from adequate; it is not going to solve any of the problems connected with foreign ownership in this country. I think that the government has sold out, to a large extent, the continentalists' interest in their policy to the multinational corporations and to the status quo. According to public opinion polls, it seems that most Canadians expected a great deal more from this government and they expected it to act in a more conclusive and decisive manner.

The bill before us will deal with only a very small part of foreign ownership and it is a disappointment to me and most people in my constituency. I can say that most of the people in a constituency like Yorkton-Melville are becoming concerned about the general question of foreign ownership in our economy, and about Canada for Canadians. They are concerned when they realize that, because of our branch plant economy, we are starting to lose a great many jobs and that a lot of money is going out of the country, but most of all they want us to develop an economy that will be controlled by Canadians for their own use.

I do not want to leave the impression that the whole question of foreign ownership is a simple one. I realize that it is a complex problem and there is no simple solution; instead, there are many different solutions. All of us know the degree of foreign ownership in Canada. Approximately two-thirds of our economy is foreign controlled, and I have here some figures for 1970 dealing with American corporations alone, not touching on Japanese, British or French corporations. In 1970, 97 per cent of the automobile and parts industry was owned by American corporations; 91 per cent of the Canadian rubber industry was owned by American corporations; 66 per cent of the electrical apparatus industry in this country and 60 per cent of the petroleum and natural gas industry was owned by Americans. If corporations from other countries were added, most of these figures would go higher.

What we need is fairly obvious; we need laws to repatriate this country's economy and put it in the hands of Canadians. I think it can be done. The Watkins report and the Gray report not only analyse our problems but suggest many approaches we can use for solving them. For example, Sweden, in 1935, faced a similar difficulty. That economy was foreign-owned. Then, the Social Democratic party took power and, today, Sweden controls its own economy. They repatriated it. I point out, also, that 100 years ago the United States was being developed with foreign capital, mostly from the British Isles. Today, the United States controls its own economy. Other countries like Mexico are taking steps to repatriate their own economies. I suggest Canada can do that.

Let me make it clear that when I am talking about Canadianism and repatriating our own economy, I am not being anti-American. Being interested in repatriating our economy is not being anti-American, I suggest. I do not blame the Americans for owning so many of our key resources and industries. If I were the head of a huge American oil company, saw the tax laws of Canada and the resources waiting to be exploited in this country, I would do the same; therefore, I do not blame the Americans. As I remember, the leader of my party said in the House the other day, "We have not been raped by the Americans; we have invited seduction." It is not the fault of the American people or of American financial institutions that we are foreign-controlled in large part. It is the fault of successive Canadian governments which, for dozens of years, have allowed foreign corporations in, hampered them with few rules and limitations, and allowed them to make profits which they have taken across the border.

In my travels to the United States and across this country, I meet many Americans. They ask me, "Why do you not curtail the high incidence of foreign ownership in your country?" They say that they would not tolerate this in the United States and ask why we tolerate it in our country. I am angry at our tolerating it and that is why I and over half the Canadian people, I suggest, want us to do something about this question here and now. Doing that, I suggest, is not anti-American. Anyone who suggests it is drags a red herring across this debate and is not intellectually honest.

In my speech I shall touch on four important areas of concern to the Canadian people: First, the field of social culture; second, the number of jobs we lose because much of our economy is foreign owned; third, the wealth that goes out of our country because we are a branch plant economy; and fourth, our loss of political independence resulting from so much of our economy being foreign owned and controlled.

Returning to the area of social culture, I suggest that the government in the past few years has provided some leadership in this field, especially in the area of broadcasting. Now, laws and regulations govern Canadian content in broadcasting. Regulations governing radio and television broadcasting provide that Canadian radio and television stations must be 80 per cent Canadian-owned. That is a stringent provision. Moves like that are good, and I think they should be followed in many other sectors of the economy, if Canada is to be a country of which we are to be proud. Not enough has been done in other fields of social culture.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) suggested that the book publishing industry should be designated as a sensitive and important industry, important for the cultural development of Canada. I agree. I recall, as I went through the public school and high school system, that some of my fellow students were more aware of Lincoln than of Macdonald, of Jefferson than of Laurier, mainly because we used many American textbooks. Those books referred to American politicians and to important and prominent people of that country. The Canadian government must show much greater leadership in this field if it is serious about returning control of Canada to Canadians. Let us look for a moment at professional sports, and at hockey in particular. Look at the National Hockey League; that is controlled from the United States. True, many Canadian players are employed in hockey in the United States; nevertheless, the hockey league is dominated by American financial interests. I suggest that this is another area that has been completely ignored in the present debate. Apparently, foreign domination of our culture is overlooked.

There is one notable exception to this state of affairs in this country. French Canada is not dominated culturally by foreigners. In French Canada there is a specific culture; there, they speak their own language, watch their own television programs and their own movies, listen to their own songs and read their own writers. I am proud of this. I am happy that one part of Canada is distinctly Canadian and is not being swamped by American culture. I wish the same could be said of English speaking Canada, because if it could be, our country would be better and stronger. Fortunately or unfortunately, much depends on the laws our government will be prepared to pass.

Touching the second point, I want to refer to something of concern to many in my constituency, the question of jobs lost in the long run because of our dependence on foreign corporations. Several authorities have dealt with this subject. I am speaking of the Watkins report, the Gray report, and the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) who sat in cabinet for a number of months. These authorities talked of our dependence on American corporations. We are exporters of raw materials and importers of manufactured goods. The hon. member for Duvernay and others have told us of millions of dollars we lose every year in wages through our policies. For every $100 worth of raw materials we export to the United States, we provide our workers with about $6.50 in wages. For every $100 worth of manufactured goods we import in return for our raw materials, we provide American workers, depending on the goods we import, with between $30 and $35 in wages. In such exchanges, we lose between $20 and $30 in wages. For reasons like these, the people of my constituency and all across the country, are most concerned about the extent of foreign ownership of our country and the government's lackadaisical attitude.

What is the result of our being a branch plant economy. What happened when the Americans introduced their 10 per cent surtax last August and the DISC program. What did American corporations operating in this country do? In some instances in which American companies operated branch plants in this country, when it became necessary to curtail research, they curtailed it in Canada and not in the United States, with the result that Canadian workers were affected. I remember there was a toboggan firm which had one branch in southern Ontario and another in California. The imposition of the surtax resulted in cutting back operations in southern Ontario, with the consequent loss of jobs for Canadians, and the shifting of production to California. That was a natural thing to do, and I do not blame the American firm. I blame our own government. If our government had developed an industrial strategy for Canada which would protect our people in the long run, this would not have happened.

In my constituency is to be found an example of the consequences, for working people, of foreign ownership. In my constituency there is one of the largest potash mines in the world, operated by International Mineral Company, at the town of Esterhazy. International Mineral is American owned, the head offices of the company being in New Mexico. We know that there is an over-supply of potash and that production of potash has been cut back. But let us compare what was done in New Mexico and in Saskatchewan. It is interesting to note that production in New Mexico was cut back from 100 per cent to about 90 per cent, whereas in Esterhazy, in my constituency, production was cut back to less than 50 per cent of capacity, with serious consequences for Saskatchewan workers in my constituency. The impact of such moves has been felt in towns like Esterhazy, Longerburg and Churchbridge, towns with populations of between 1,500 and 3,500, where workers have had to sell their homes at prices considerably below building costs because they were thrown out of work, there being only one major industry in the town and few people to buy their homes. If the mines had been Canadian owned, perhaps it would not have been necessary to cut production from 100 per cent to 50 per cent of capacity. Perhaps Canadian workers would have been given the chance to retain their jobs. I may also add that there are chances of obtaining markets for potash in China and perhaps other Communist countries. Because such action would violate the Trading with the Enemy Act, we possibly cannot sell potash to some of these countries. That is another consequence of foreign ownership in our economy, and one that is real to the working people of this country.

There are many other specific cases where jobs in this country are lost because of the fact that so much of our economy is foreign owned. One is in the area of research and development. Many of our scientists must go to the United States and other countries to find jobs because not much research, study and development is done in Canada. Obviously it is done where the parent company is located. All too often that is not in our own country.

I now wish to move to another area I mentioned a few moments ago. I refer to the dollars that go out of our country as a result of foreign ownership in Canada. A report was issued a short time ago by the United States department of commerce. This report stated that between 1960 and 1967 parent companies took $2 billion more from their subsidiaries in this country than they contributed. In other words, $2 billion more went out of Canada than came into this country in terms of new investment.

I wish to refer to another study that was conducted by the United States department of commerce. I wish to quote from an article that appeared in a January 1971 issue of the Toronto Star. The headline is "U.S. economist admits Canada being bought out with her own money". I wish to quote a couple of paragraphs from that article which is datelined Washington:

> A United States government economist who took a survey of U.S. subsidiary companies' operations in Canada, yesterday said New Democratic Party Leader T. C. Douglas was probably right when he said that 94 per cent of U.S. subsidiaries' investment in Canada is effected with Canadian funds.
> Douglas told the Commons Tuesday he had seen the figure in the report of a survey undertaken by the U.S. Department of Commerce. The survey was done by department economist R. David Belli.
> Yesterday, Belli said in an interview that by a series of statistical deductions from charts he used in his survey, a figure of "something like 94 per cent" could be arrived at—
> The report of Belli's survey was published in the November issue of a commerce department magazine called Survey of Current Business—
> The survey was based on the annual reports of about 450 U.S. parent companies covering roughly 4,000 foreign affiliates, all over the world.

This report from the American department of commerce states that something like 94 per cent of the money invested in this country by American corporations is actually Canadian money. What does he mean by this? He means that the foreign companies come in, reinvest their profits from plants they already have here or invest money which they borrow from Canadian banks or financial institutions, the savings of individual Canadians, and expand their plants in that way. They are not really investing much new money in Canada. They are investing our money to expand their interests in our country. They are buying us out with our own money. This situation is like a Canadian inviting his neighbour into his house and, when he gets there, saying to him that there are no rules or regulations, take what you want, the television set, the car or the wife and do what you want with them. It is like telling him there are no regulations, to go ahead and do what he wants and we will pay him for it. In many ways, that is what this country is doing in terms of American investment.

The American corporations and government realize this. I suggest that many average Americans wonder why we are such fools, and why we have the wool pulled over our eyes without doing something about it. These are areas we should be acting on now, instead of trying to hide behind a bill like this that will not create a ripple in the ocean of problems that we have.

Another point I want to make in terms of the wealth that comes into this country is to distinguish between loan capital and equity capital. I believe the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and members of the Social Credit party the other day made reference to the fact that some NDP governments go to the United States to borrow money. In many cases this is true, but I suggest there is a difference between loan capital and equity capital. Once you pay off a loan, which is like paying off a mortgage on a house, you own the industry. Canada has not done this. Every country in the world, at some stage in its development, needs foreign capital. However, most countries borrow money and, after a certain period of time, pay off the loan and own the industry.

When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was the premier of my province, I believe the province borrowed foreign money for the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. If I am not mistaken, it was probably several hundred million dollars. After a period of time, that loan was paid off and the people of Saskatchewan now own the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. It serves them; they control it and any profits that are made are kept in Saskatchewan for the people of that province. The thing I would like to make very clear is that there is a difference between loan capital and equity capital.

Some members are deliberately trying to mislead the Canadian people when they say there is no difference and refuse to look at the facts. In years to come, it will be obvious that certain parts of this country will need foreign money. However, we should distinguish very clearly and carefully between loan capital and equity capital. After we have made a series of payments, we should own the industry. We do not want it to be owned by some wealthy American sitting in Florida, Los Angeles or wherever he may be.

I want to say that Canada does have the money. I have confidence in this country, even though the minister does not. We can develop our country. As the United States department of commerce pointed out, most of the money used by American corporations is ours anyway. Why can we not use the money ourselves? With leadership from this government, with its many recommendations, commission and task forces, that money can be put to use in Canada on behalf of the Canadian people. A lot of this country's wealth is invested in foreign Corporations on behalf of Canadians. Much of our money goes overseas to Europe, the Caribbean and the United States. A lot of this money, with proper planning, could be channeled into investment in our own country.

I recall picking up a newspaper when I was in Jamaica about a year and a half ago. I was startled by the headline. It said "Jamaicanize the economy; get rid of Canadian investment". In Jamaica, Trinidad, Tobago and countries like that, they are not as worried about American investment as Canadian investment. We, too, are guilty in terms of going into some countries and exploiting them because we can make a profit. You can stand on a street corner in London and see four Canadian corporations which are now multinational.

Mr. Pepin: How can they be multinational if they are Canadian?

Mr. Nystrom: We do have the funds. A lot of this could be channelled into Canada and it would be of benefit to Canadian people from coast to coast.

I think the policy of the New Democratic Party with regard to the Canada Development Corporation is very well known. This is one of the many instruments that could be used by the government if it were really serious about developing Canada for Canadians. I do not want to go into it at this time, but that is one instrument that could be used very effectively if we were serious about our economy.

The fourth area that I alluded to a few minutes ago was the general area of political independence. I believe that because of the degree of economic dependence we have on the United States in particular, in many cases our political independence is seriously threatened. I believe that if we were not so dependent upon United States corporations we would have a more independent foreign policy which would have a more positive impact on the world in general. I want to quote a short comment by John Foster Dulles when he talked about economic imperialism, if you want to use the word vis-à-vis the conquering of a country by force. Dulles said:

"There are two ways of conquering a foreign nation. One is to gain control of its people by force of arms and the other is to gain control of its economy by financial means."

I suggest that whether we like it or not, or whether we want to admit it or not, the fact that so much of our economy is foreign-owned, particularly by United States corporations, has to have a great deal of impact on Canadian political policy as far as being an independent nation is concerned. It also affects our trade in a real way. We have already pointed out that certain shipments of flour to Cuba were stopped because they violated the trading with the enemy act. The flour was to come from a subsidiary of a United States corporation. I have mentioned potash in my constituency where we have United States potash firms. Perhaps we could be selling potash to China and other countries within the Communist bloc, but this might violate the trading with the enemy act. There was the question of shipping trucks to China a few years ago. This had to be stopped because it violated the same American law.

I suggest that the laws of the United States should have no effect on the trade policy of this country. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) can make light of the subject if he likes.

Mr. Osler: I was not making light of the subject. I was making light of the way the hon. member was dealing with it.

Mr. Nystrom: Maybe he has some Canadians in his constituency who are better off than those elsewhere. I am concerned with Joe Citizen out there in Saskatchewan, the farmer, the worker, the small businessman who is not benefiting—

Mr. Pepin: Amen.

Mr. Nystrom: —who is not benefiting from a policy which gives handouts to large foreign-owned companies. I would refer the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) who could, maybe, give him a little political education. As was mentioned by my leader, and by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), we do have the funds in this country, we do have the technology, we do have the educated people, to enable us over a period of a certain number of years to repatriate the economy. It is not a simple task and there are many difficulties in the way, but we ought to make a start. There are many avenues open to us. Our party believes there should be more public investment in the economy. I do not think we should leave everything to the huge, private multinational corporations. There should be more public investment in this country through the CDC.

Another area which would help us repatriate the economy would be to change our taxation policy. Our taxation policy favours foreign extractive industries at the expense of the average guy or the expense of the small businessman in this country. We give huge incentives to the oil companies, the gas companies and the mining companies and these companies are all capital intensive in nature. They do not employ many Canadians. They are almost totally foreign owned. Then, we tax the manufacturing companies and the small businessmen.

Mr. Osler: Have you seen the last tax bill?

Mr. Nystrom: If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre wants to make a speech later, he can get up and speak on behalf of the multinational corporations and his friends.

An hon. Member: Cheap politics.

Mr. Nystrom: In the last 10 years the mining companies were taxed on only 13 per cent of their profits. How does that compare with the small businessmen? Gas and oil companies, which are owned almost entirely by foreign concerns, were taxed on only 5.7 per cent of their profits in the past 10 years. With these huge handouts to foreign extractive industries, is it any wonder they come in to invest money in these areas when they have these huge advantages that other countries do not give them? I remember the speech made some time ago by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans). He said the Minister of Finance came back happily from talking to the Americans. I believe he thought the Americans probably asked him one question: What are you doing about taxes on resource industries, and he said, "nothing". Of course, the Americans were very happy because here they had this tax holiday and all the handouts. The sooner Liberal party members and a few Conservatives take a stand on this issue, the sooner will the average Canadian have a better opportunity to get involved in the economy and start developing it for himself and his family.

A lot of politicians in the United States and other countries are taking a hard look at the handouts given to the multinational corporations. Look at all the things McGovern is saying in his campaign in the United States about the tax loopholes for the super-rich. If this country were to revise its taxation system, in particular its treatment of the resource industries, more funds would be available for the expansion of manufacturing industry and the service industries. The result would be more jobs for Canadians and an economy which was owned and controlled by Canadians rather than by foreign interests.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

Mr. Nystrom: May I have one more minute?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I could listen to the hon. member for one more minute, for five, for ten more even, if there were unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: There were many other things I was going to say, but I shall conclude by saying I think we have to act now if we are to repatriate our economy. I want to conclude by saying many people believe that if we had tougher laws, if we had more control, we would be scaring away some of the investment that is here. I should like to say that that is a lot of nonsense. There are rules and regulations in other countries. Why cannot there by any here?

I have here a clipping from the Leader-Post of March 31. The article refers to United States oil companies investing in Algeria. They are going to invest in Algeria. They are also talking about investing in the Soviet Union. So, I am sure they will invest in Canada. They expect us to have some rules and regulations. I do not think they will avoid us if we do lay down these rules. They should pay their fair share, and if they do things will be better for the average Canadian. This is the type of thing in which I am interested.

Foreign Takeovers Review Act

• (1550)

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to make a few remarks concerning Bill C-201, which provides for the review of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by foreign investors.

If I rise on this matter, it is because I feel that the Quebec people are very much concerned about the economic independence of Canada and the threat which foreign capital represents. Moreover, the people of my constituency of Saint-Jacques have every reason to be especially concerned about this. On the one hand, as many hon. members know, this constituency includes St. James St. and Dorchester Blvd, in Montreal, which are at the center of the economic activities of the whole of eastern Canada, and the officials of these firms are impatiently awaiting the decisions which the House will make in connection with this bill.

Similarly, most residents of Saint-Jacques who are in contact with financial circles earn a very modest salary. Quite a few are unemployed. Making allowance for the employment situation, they are very eager to know the decisions taken by the House concerning foreign investments.

This being said, I would like to comment on the decision of the government to deal with the foreign investment issue. As for me, the government's decision is realistic. Of course, some of my friends are already saying that I am not serious, but it is obvious that some people will accuse the government of being too weak in this respect whereas others will say that the government went too far. It is always easy to say such things when you just have to deliver a speech before the House and when you are not responsible for the administration of the country.

However, this government is responsible for the administration of the country and, when they make decisions, they have to consider the effects these decisions will have on the Canadian economy and on the standard of living in Canada. That is why I say the decision made by the government is realistic. In fact, the question is to proceed gradually rather than to take drastic steps that could harm the present state of the economy in Canada.

Obviously, according to our colleagues of the New Democratic Party, we are not going far enough. To them, there should be short term guarantees of complete economic independance for Canada. As the hon. member said who spoke before me, this is a policy for buying back foreign companies set up in Canada and we all recognize that this type of policy would be a waste of money. To my mind, we would be better off investing our money in new undertakings, instead of using it to buy companies already in operation and which create jobs, even though they belong to foreigners.

To my mind, economic independence, as some members of the Waffle group would have it, is an utopia, for our economy is no longer independent nor will it ever be. Like the economy of every country in the free world, ours is an international and interdependent economy. It is pointless to try to escape that reality.

As barriers fall between countries, the more the economy of each country is influenced by the economy, the economic activity of its neighbours. We all know that in the field of international trade, neither Canada nor the United States can do what they want. We realized it recently when the United States had to impose a 10 per cent surcharge to settle difficult economic conditions.

Even a country as powerful as the United States, a country which enjoys just the same a greater degree of economic independence than Canada, must legislate to try to protect themselves on the economic level against the trading activities of other countries.

This clearly indicates that all countries are subjected to an interdependent mechanism and that trying to give one complete economic independence is an utopia similar to a suggestion that Canada should be changed into an Eldorado.

We know that even the rates of exchange greatly influence the economy of the free world countries and those rates are not easily controllable. For example, as a result of the government's decisions, Canadian currency varies on the international money market.

Today, I am told that the Canadian dollar is worth $1.02 compared to the American dollar. Obviously, this does not favour our exports, but is one more proof that the thesis of economic independence is easily made.

Finally, I should like to say one word on the investment requirements of Canadians. No doubt, Canada needs now massive investments of capital.

That is obvious in Quebec and again recently Premier Robert Bourassa went to New York to try and get some capital investment in Quebec.

My colleagues who represent ridings in the Maritimes also know precisely what I mean.

We have an urgent need of capital; we need a massive injection to boost our economy which has been showing signs of recovery for some time now. We need them above all in order to reduce unemployment, particularly in the eastern provinces and in Manitoba. And we need capital to solve the problems resulting from unemployment.

When the Canadian government must make a decision with regard to foreign investments—it has had to do so recently and it is trying to have it ratified by the House—that is the dilemma in which it finds itself. On the one hand, the government must find solutions to an intolerable level of unemployment. On the other hand, some radicals ask us to prevent foreign capital from coming into Canada.

How can the two positions be reconciled? Obviously, that is impossible. And this permits our friends from the NDP to continue to preach the utopia that is economic independence and, at the same time, to accuse us of doing nothing to fight unemployment.

In my view, the Canadian electors will not be misled by such dramatic productions. They know that we need investments for economic development, to reduce unemployment, to ensure better social measures because, obviously, when our economy is in good shape it is easier to put such measures into application than it would be otherwise. Besides, economic independence in Canada is best assured if the economy is healthy.

• (1600)

I would now like to say a word about what I call the threat of foreign takeovers. In my opinion, such a threat to the Canadian economy, within a short, medium or even long period, is a myth.

First of all, capital, either foreign or Canadian, has no nationality. The foreign corporation investing in Canada has in mind one single and clear purpose, always the same: finding a market, a place to produce at reasonable costs and ultimately profits and dividends for the benefit of its shareholders.

Capital coming into Canada is neither Japanese, American nor Belgian. It is international and it seeks a good soil where to grow. Nobody comes to Canada to invest capital with the avowed purpose or even the consciousness that some day he will control the policy decisions that Canadians will have to take to fulfil their destiny.

Moreover—and this is related to what I said a few minutes ago—it is always foreign corporations that invest in Canada, never foreign governments. This is why the myth of control over our economy by foreign countries is a real myth.

It is never the United States of America that come here to invest capital, but independent corporations which, while they are American, do not necessarily have convergent interests. Most of the time, they are companies which do not care for the neighbouring society and which being in the same field, are often in competition and want to make higher profits than their competitive organisations which invest capital in Canada at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the provisions of this bill. First, generally speaking, this legislation seems to me particularly reasonable, given the set of circumstances Canada is in at present.

First of all, the legislation does have some scope, although opposition members have been trying to have us believe it is very limited. I suggest that at least concerning takeover of Canadian businesses by foreigners the legislation is quite adequate since it allows the government to screen all takeovers of companies with gross annual incomes of over $3 million. Everyone will agree with me that a company with a gross income of less than $3 million a year car hardly have detrimental effects on the Canadian economy in the near future.

Furthermore, the government will be able to assess takeovers of all companies with gross assets of over a quarter of million dollars and will exercise the right to look into their operations. There again, it will be admitted that a company with assets of less than a quarter of a million dollars has little chance of exercising an unfavourable influence on the Canadian economy.

Thus the legislation is adequate and covers all industries and all takeovers liable to affect substantially the course of Canadian economy, or at least the economy of the area where a foreign company plans to locate.

I suggest that the legislation, besides being adequate in the area it covers, seems reasonably flexible. In fact, the government retains the privilege of examining all projects of foreign takeovers. However, after assessment, the government retains the privilege of approving the request for purchase of a Canadian company by foreigners, or to reject it. And this looks like a good thing to me, because the Canadian government which must answer to the people has a responsibility to decide whether in its opinion the takeover of a Canadian company by foreigners might be beneficial or detrimental to the interests of Canadians.

As hon. members know, at the end of each year, the minister will be required to table before the House a comprehensive report of his department's activities in this field, which will provide the opposition with ample opportunity to comment on and even criticize the measures taken and decisions made by the government. I suggest that this provision is highly desirable.

Besides, I refuse to believe, as a certain party has been suggesting, that this measure is weak and will have no strength. The provisions contained in the last clauses of the bill are severe enough to potential offenders. In my opinion, this bill has teeth.

For instance, people who simply fail to give notice of their intention to sell their enterprise to foreign concerns will be liable to a $5,000 fine. We must admit that the government does not joke when it introduces a measure of this type. This is likely to make people who might have avowed intentions to transgress the law think twice.

Moreover, the bill provides that people who refuse to comply with the law will be liable to a $10,000 fine or six months in jail, or both. This shows that here again the penalties are very heavy, so we can hope that the law will be complied with; we can at least conclude that the government has made this legislation strict enough for it to be enforced.

Reading through the bill a moment ago, I even noticed that the mere fact of impeding a study or investigation being made of a foreign takeover makes the person guilty of this offence liable to a $5,000 fine. I would say this legislation has teeth and will be complied with.

I think this bill will be welcomed by the Canadian public. Of course, I already know that it will not be welcomed by the radicals, by those who would have liked the government to do nothing to prevent the foreign takeover of Canadian industries. On the other hand, this bill will not please those radicals who would want the Canadian government to buy back dollar for dollar every foreign-owned Canadian enterprise.

But I think that most Canadians will agree with this measure, in view of the circumstances we are experiencing in Canada—and it must be said that this is only one step taken by the government in this direction.

Over the last few years, the Canadian government has introduced several measures to give Canadians firm control over their economy. I do not want to detail them since the hon. minister has done it already when he tabled the bill. However, I would like to add that this legislation is another stone in the setting up of a reasonable system of controls by Canadians on their economy. I suggest it would have been ridiculous, at this time, to hurry things up and take drastic measures that could have affected or substantially reduced the inflow of foreign investment in Canada. It is enough for us to realize that some 1,300,000 Canadian students are on the eve of entering the labour market. This considerable number of students will add to that, already known, of the unemployed which we are reminded of every day by the opposition during the oral question period.

It is obvious that the principal concern of the government, at this stage, is the now intolerable unemployment situation and the creation, as soon as possible and by all means possible, of the necessary job opportunities. This is certainly not the best time to propose measures that could prejudice the attainment of the major objective that the government, I repeat, has set for himself, that is to try and guarantee to each Canadian the availability of a job.

That was the dilemma facing the government: on the one hand, to fight unemployment and, on the other, to secure a reasonable independence for our economy.

I believe that the government has efficiently solved this dilemma in submitting Bill C-201 and this is why, Mr. Speaker, I will support this bill when it comes to a vote. I urge my hon. friends to do likewise.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in considering foreign investment and Bill C-201, one has to determine what the government wants to do with this measure and in what direction they want Canada to go. In my estimation, the bill is perhaps more meaningful in its intent than in what it will actually accomplish. Most Canadians in every part of Canada want more control over the life around them and more involvement in their environment. In other words, they want more say in what affects their livelihood. This prompts one to say that we in Canada should control absolutely all the investment in industry and in business within Canada. Can we effectively bring this about and would it be beneficial to Canada if we did?

We just listened to the lengthy speech of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in which he gave potash mining as an example, and pointed out how employment in potash mines in Saskatchewan has been reduced to 50 per cent while in Mexico in the same industry, it had been reduced to 90 per cent. He said that if those were Canadian owned potash mines, that would not have happened. He fails to realize that Canada is a trading nation, that potash is used as a fertilizer in countries other than Canada and that what determines how much will be sold, in most cases, is the cost of the product. If they can mine it cheaper in Mexico, then a good international company, a good Canadian company, would do just that for its shareholders. The example he used was a poor one.

He want on at great length to point out the many problems relating to foreign investment in a country, but he gave the House the benefit of no solutions. He overlooked the fact that when the NDP government attempted to establish a steel mill in Regina they went south to the United States for foreign capital, and they went south for foreign know-how. They established their steel mill which is predominantly controlled by Americans, to use their words. They are searching persistently for a tractor manufacturing plant in either Moose Jaw or Saskatoon—I do not know which city has paid the most for it. Representatives of both cities have gone to Roumania to attempt to entice foreign capital from over there.

I would be the first to agree that Canada should become economically less dependent upon any other single economy and should therefore encourage a diversity of foreign investment here. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville made a speech which was totally rhetorical, of the kind which used to be made in Saskatchewan back in the 1940's. That party has not changed its approach very much. In fact, if one looks at the New Democratic Party closely, one finds that the Waffle group within that party is bringing to the forefront the very stuff that elected the first NDP government in Saskatchewan. So, I suppose it is correct to assume that many members of the NDP would be bringing back the same sort of rhetoric.

What does this bill attempt to do? To paraphrase the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), this bill presents, in essence, a political solution to the problem. Political solutions are never good solutions to economic problems. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected he said two things to the Canadian public: first, that nationalism was not the answer, and second, that he would determine what was good for Canada and not what was good for political parties; that he would not be swayed by partisan considerations and that he would act truthfully and correctly in his best judgment for the good of the country. Here we have a piece of legislation which is brought in mainly for political reasons, and for the good of the political party which finds itself confronted with an election and a public not too favourably disposed toward it. They are trying to enhance their political image, and while doing so they might very well harm Canada's chances for real growth.

We are a trading nation and we need foreign investment. This bill provides that where more than 5 per cent of the voting rights in a public company and over 20 per cent in a private company are held by foreigners any corporation, seeking to take over such a company would have to obtain cabinet approval. True, there is a screening agency, but how good is a screening agency which recommends to the minister, who in turn recommends to the cabinet, if the agency does not make public its basic findings so that we can judge whether the cabinet is acting for political reasons or for the good of the country? Lately much has been said about the government acting for political reasons, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has been accused of doing just that. The following statement appeared in an editorial in one of the leading daily newspapers of Canada:

> Although the cabinet is accountable to parliament and the electorate, there should be a link between it and the bidder, to prevent even the appearance of decisions based altogether on political rather than economic considerations.

That, too, is my fear, particularly if the agency does not make its findings public.

Another fact that has often been mentioned, and that is particularly true of this government, is that often it appears that its right hand does not know what its left hand is doing. We see legislation coming forward which in essence would limit, screen or control foreign investment—any of these adjectives could be applied—and, on the other hand, we see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion handing out all kinds of grants to foreign companies to establish in Canada or to switch their location from one region to another where unemployment may be greater. We heard the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) advocating the development of a tourist complex in our national park in Banff and giving the contract or the tender to what might be considered foreign owned companies. I know that 30 per cent of the tender was supposed to come from a Lake Louise consortium, but that consortium is owned mostly by a person in Great Britain. This makes me believe that here is another example of the right hand not knowing what the left hand is doing.

We have the government divorcing itself from provisions which many of the provinces have brought in under their estate tax acts which have caused much Canadian capital to leave this country. The NDP governments in Saskatchewan and Manitoba have brought in an estate tax act which will cause much of the money to leave those provinces for other parts of Canada or other countries. We see this government bringing in the capital gains tax which will discourage Canadians from investing in companies that are doing business in Canada. I think that we should adopt the key sector approach. We should agree, as we have in some cases, that the banking medium should be reserved for Canadians, that newspapers, television, radio and other communications media should be reserved for Canadians. Perhaps book publishing also should be maintained by and for Canadians. Certainly, textbooks in our schools and universities should be Canadian.

Another thought that has entered my mind concerns union money, and I heard no mention of it from the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville when he was speaking about money leaving this country. On May 24, as recorded in Hansard at page 2505 there was an interesting question put forward by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). The question was:

> To the government's knowledge, how much money did Canadians pay into international unions in each of the years 1965 to 1971 respectively?

The answer shows that in 1965, $28 million was paid into international unions and, without reading out all the figures, this had risen to $41 million in 1969. If payments have continued to grow since then they probably total $43 million or $44 million now.

The second question was:

> How much money was paid to Canadian union members belonging to international unions in each of the years 1965 to 1971 respectively?

This answer shows that strike benefits paid to Canadain union members totalled $8,755 in a year in which the unions took $28 million out of this country. All we got back was $8,000 in benefits. The answer outlines strike benefits all the way from 1965 to 1969, a year in which they either had more strikes or paid greater benefits. In that year $16,000 was paid in strike benefits, a year in which Canadian members paid out $41 million to international unions. The answer lists pension and welfare payments to beneficiaries in 1965 as $2,700, and over the years this continued to grow until it reached $33,000 in 1969. It also shows gross salaries, wages and other remuneration to officers and employees of international unions as increasing from $8,800 in 1965 to $11,462 in 1969. So, Mr. Speaker, in the year 1969, returns to Canadians totalled $16,000, $3,000 and $11,000, which looks like something in the neighbourhood of $30,000, yet in that same year moneys paid into international unions totalled $41 million.

At times I question whether international unions are as sensitive to the economic climate, to the conditions in which Canadians are working, as a Canadian union might be. Mr. Speaker, I remember a wildcat strike in which the railroad engineers engaged a number of years ago. The railroaders in my constituency called me up and wanted to meet with me. When I met them, I asked them what their union was doing about it. These men were expressing their opposition on the question of run-throughs and they told me, "Ours is an international union. It does not think the problem is big enough to worry about; that is why we are taking wildcat action." As a result of that situation, a royal commission was set up to study the question and the workers went back to work.

If we are going to look at the question of Canadians controlling the Canadian economy I think it is wrong to look at only one side of the ledger. We must also look at the other side of the ledger. If we are going to look at international companies as being the ultimate of all evil, then we must say that international unions must be categorized as part and parcel of that evil.

Mr. Pepin: Perfect logic.

Mr. Horner: Thank you. Trouble is developing in our economy which frightens me. Business has been frightened by the actions which the government has taken. One may ask to what action am I referring, and I point out that the white paper on taxation started this reaction. Business withdrew into its shell. It became hesitant about whether the government was creating the right climate in which business could operate. Then, we had the introduction of the labour bill with its technological change clause, which has now been moderated to some degree. We had the introduction of the competition bill, which has now been withdrawn but which may re-appear. A whole series of pieces of legislation has caused business to be rather hesitant about whether the government was creating the proper climate.

The hon. member who preceded me said that this bill was a first step, and that the government had other steps in mind. That is the reason the business community is worried. The business community was not particularly pleased with the Canada Development Corporation, but the bill establishing it was passed and it is now off the ground. One of the main criteria associated with it was that it was not to be used to buy back Canada, and it was to make a profit right from the beginning. Mr. Speaker, if we look at some examples in the province of Quebec, we can say that its Crown investment company has not been too successful.

This country is being confronted with another round of inflation, and the government is doing nothing about it. Inflation can be brought about by extensive government spending, and by putting more and more money into circulation. All this is taking place. We are back in the situation which we experienced in 1958 and 1959 when the Conservative party took office. Our dollar then was worth about $1.05 U.S., and we are facing the same situation today. Our dollar is increasing in value, and we have a great deal of unemployment brought about by mismanagement of our economy.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville says there is lots of money in Canada and that we can buy back Canada with Canadian money. Mr. Speaker, in the first four months of this year provincial governments have gone down to the United States and borrowed in the bond market to the tune of $1.5 billion. If there is this kind of money available in Canada, why do the NDP governments in Manitoba and Saskatchewan not float provincial bonds to attract Canadian money? It is all well and good to say that there is a difference between investment capital and equity capital, but if we have governments borrowing all this money, and doing all that spending, then we are just one step away from the socialism that the Waffle group wants; in fact, one step away from the socialism that I sometimes think the federal government wishes to create.

What will we have next winter, Mr. Speaker? We may not have this government, but in the economic sphere we will have high unemployment, and we may well be reaching the peak of inflation in January. The government will be faced with difficult decisions. It may then say that this piece of legislation which we are debating now is not effective, and it may move toward direct investment by government in business. We are only one step away from that.

It is often said that Canadians can buy back Canada with Canadian money. But there are difficulties, Mr. Speaker. If one looks at the recent budget, one sees that our biggest single expenditure goes to pay the interest on our national debt. If we were starting out with a completely brand new country, with no debts, but with our natural resources and human resources, we could probably borrow the money to expand our economy and create more jobs, but for the Canadian government and Canadian business to borrow money now, on top of the national debt which we have, is almost impossible.

In fact the federal government itself from time to time has difficulty peddling its debt, as an article in Executive magazine of May, 1972, pointed out. This article deals with Mr. Rasminsky, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and portrays some of the difficulties that Canada has had with high rates of inflation. On page 28 it points out that in 1968 during the exchange crisis, and again "when Ottawa was unable to peddle its debt," the bank had to reverse its policy. We have had some discussion with regard to managing our economy and managing the size of our debt. How will this bill affect this whole concept? I think it will cast a further shadow on business and I question whether it will accomplish the government's aims. Will it merely be used in once in a lifetime situations, such as the time the government stopped Home Oil from selling out to Ashland of the United States? I wonder whether even that was a wise move.

Mr. Woolliams: It was an ad hoc one.

Mr. Horner: That is true. The government bullied the people concerned to get on that decision. There was no legislation on the order paper to stop the sale. From an Albertan's point of view, it could be argued that Ashland of the United States might well be more willing to invest its profits in Alberta than consumers Gas of Toronto, the eventual buyer. sometimes we in the west are not convinced that eastern Canada is attempting to reinvest its profits in the west. I am not saying that Consumers Gas will act as a true eastern concern; I hope it will not, but we will have to wait and see.

In an article in the Montreal Gazette, John Meyer, the financial writer said:

> This, of course, is going well beyond the limited objective of making Canadian assets safe for Canada. It is by far the deepest penetration this government has made in the private sector.

Mr. Pepin: Some of your economists were saying that.

Mr. Horner: I agree. Our party is not in government, therefore we can enjoy the richness of diversity of opinion. When one is in the cabinet, there must appear to be responsibility. During the debate yesterday we heard varying opinions from backbenchers in the Liberal party.

I should like to recommend to the House that when this bill goes to committee, witnesses should be called from all parts of Canada because there is a great diversity of opinion in the country. We are a federal state comprising ten provinces and four or five regions, and we should hear from all those regions on how this bill may affect their development.

Mr. Pepin: On the philosophy of foreign investment or on the administration of the bill?

Mr. Horner: On the philosophy of the bill and, dealing with the administration, the screening agency should make its findings public. I do not think they should reveal the names of the individual firms, but they should make public the material on which their advice to the minister is based so that the action of the government can be judged. I should like to hear in the committee from business concerns about this aspect. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that the committee should travel across the country to hear witnesses. I think this is the deepest penetration by this government so far into the private sector. We pride ourselves on being a free enterprise country and we should take this initial step. Who knows, it might not be the last step.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member to clarify whether we are going to organize a road show to ask people to talk about the philosophy of foreign investment in Canada? Canadians have been talking about foreign investment for nearly a century now, and presumably will be talking about it for another few years. I would like the hon. member to tell me what kind of question he thinks should be discussed in committee. I suggest it should be of the type he indicated a moment ago such as what would be the criteria of screening, what publicity would be given to decisions and so on.

Mr. Horner: I could not agree more. Those are the types of questions and concerns that business has. I think government owes it to business to fairly and clearly explain the intent of this legislation so that the business community can feel secure, and then go forth and multiply. That is the only way we will employ the millions of Canadians who are still in their teens and who will be entering the labour force in the next couple of years.

Mr. Woolliams: The unions should have their say, too.

Mr. Horner: I should like an assurance from the minister that the committee will hear witnesses on this question. Is that implied? If the minister agrees that witnesses could appear to deal with the administrative side of the bill, I hope they can also deal with some of their other fears. I think it would be difficult for the business community to confine itself solely to the question of administration.

Mr. Pepin: A committee where one would study the taxation system and the effects of foreign investment—where one would study the quality of management in Canada? I suggest that if we put the whole debate on foreign investment again in committee, we will be still at it two years from now.

Mr. Woolliams: It would be better than killing off everything.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate the minister taking an interest in my remarks and the interchange that has taken place.

In an article by Harold Greer which appeared recently in the Ottawa Citizen, he said:

> One of the darker mysteries of the Foreign Takeovers Review Act is that the federal government, after agonizing so long over the problem of foreign investment in Canada, has brought in legislation which is probably unconstitutional.

This question has not been dealt with to any extent, but certainly provincial governments seeking foreign investment have made excursions throughout the world. British Columbia has gone to Japan to encourage foreign investment, and I think even the NDP government of Manitoba went to Japan. It is well known that Newfoundland has travelled the world over looking for foreign investment. It may turn out that the provinces will challenge the constitutionality of this legislation at some time. Some of them have said that it does not go far enough. This is another good reason for referring it to committee for broad discussion. The article continues:

> A federal law dealing with foreign takeovers could be framed on solid constitutional grounds, but this bill virtually invites challenge in the courts—
> The constitutionality of the legislation is hardly of academic interest, since it will be open to any provincial government or any Canadian company affected by it to challenge it on constitutional grounds.

The whole question of whether it is good for all parts of the country must be considered. In a different article in the Ottawa Citizen, Peter Calamai said:

> Science Council Chairman Dr. O. M. Solandt today warned that proposed federal laws on competition and foreign ownership could push more Canadians on welfare.

Surely, there are enough people on welfare and unemployed today. The article continues:

—Dr. Solandt also rebuked the cabinet for insisting that the Canada Development Corporation must make immediate profits—

But Dr. Solandt, a former vice-president of both Canadian National Railways and De Havilland Aircraft of Canada, cautioned that the manner of government intervention is crucial.

That is all the more reason for a thorough study of this piece of legislation. One could go through a list of articles which express the concern of financial writers in various provinces across the country.

It is interesting to consider a speech made recently by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). The background paper for discussion at a special meeting of the Capilano Liberal Association in North Vancouver was entitled "What do Western Liberals Want?" One subheading reads: "Less Protectionism in Canada". Under this government, we are slowly going toward an isolationist position and this in a country so dependent upon its ability to trade. Another heading is "Wanted: Less Protectionism in Canada", and another "Wanted: More Foreign Capital for Expansion" and that section goes on to cover the whole field.

I see the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski) agrees with me. I am pleased to see that although we do not agree politically, we agree in philosophy. I am always pleased to see that members from western Canada agree on certain matters. What do western people want, Mr. Speaker? According to paragraph 4 on page 6, they want more foreign capital for expansion. Canada, today, is in better shape to finance industrial expansion both at home and abroad. This is reflected in our current balance of payment surplus. The minister then outlined more of the things that western Liberals really want. I ask, where were the western Liberal members of cabinet when this subject was discussed.

Paragraph 5 reads, "Wanted: more projects and less red tape". Will this bill bring this about? I doubt it. Paragraph 6 reads, "Wanted: less government and more tax cuts". I doubt if we shall see less government and more tax cuts. Paragraph 7 tells us that western Liberals want "Decentralization of decision making". Will this government bring about decentralization of decision making? No. This matter will come under the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). What do western Liberals want from this government? Well, whatever they want, they are not getting it from this government. That should be clear to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski), who is paying attention to me, and to other western Liberals.

Mr. Woolliams: Even to Lang.

Mr. Horner: What sort of solution should we bring forward to permit greater ownership by Canadians of Canadian industry? I think wealth may be defined as the goods and services that people need or want. During the past 200 years, much of the toil associated with the production of wealth has gradually been shifted from men to machines by technical innovation, with the result that machines now produce most of the wealth in our economy and will continue to produce a progressively growing proportion of it as time goes on. The machines of production can be termed as the capital instruments of production. To buy capital instruments, a man needs money. We must then ask, do we want most of our capital to be owned by the state, which is what the socialists want, by a few individuals, or by many individuals.

Certainly, it is the philosophy of the Conservative party, which I support, that capital should be owned by as many individual Canadians as possible. What is the government doing to encourage Canadians to invest in Canada. I suggest it is discouraging such investing.

An hon. Member: Read the budget.

Mr. Horner: An hon. member says, read the budget.

Mr. Stanfield: It is too depressing.

Mr. Horner: I thank the constitution for providing for elections every four or five years, because near election time the Minister of Finance usually brings down a favourable budget. He is to allow accelerated write-offs for machinery purchases in certain industries. Yet, what about tax decreases? There is nothing in the budget for the farmer or for the manufacturing industry. Last year, 975 firms associated with the food processing industries went broke. There is nothing in the budget for them. Most of those companies were Canadian companies.

Mr. Woolliams: One egg never made a good omelette.

Mr. Horner: If the state owns most of the capital, then the state must decide how the wealth it produces should be distributed. That is happening in Russia and in China, and that is what the Waffle group and those truly espousing the NDP philosophy want. At their leadership convention their present leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), admitted he believes that but could not tell the people because they would not elect him if he did. So, there one sees his basic philosophy.

The leader of my party has said that we are not providing enough incentives for Canadians, and that we should.

Mr. Benjamin: All the dinosaurs come from Alberta.

Mr. Horner: If the dinosaurs could leave Saskatchewan, they would; everybody else has left.

Mr. Woolliams: That was very good, Jack. That boy married an Alberta girl, too.

Mr. Horner: We must encourage Canadians to invest in Canada. Instead of applying the capital gains tax across the board evenly, let it apply more severely to gains involving foreign companies in which Canadians invest. Let there be some differences in the application of that law, and let us produce incentive for Canadians to invest in Canadian companies. If we carry on the present system of giving huge grants to huge companies, we shall find that most of our economy is controlled by international corporations or by a huge Canadian corporation. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, all these corporations work for the good of their shareholders and are entirely motivated by the search for profits. Massey Ferguson may be a Canadian company, inasmuch as it operates in Canada, but it does its best to make money and to swallow up its competitors. It is trying to buy out Versatile. That process, of course, is natural, and governments should see to it that Canadian businesses can carry out business throughout Canada. Galbraith once said that it would not surprise him, when great corporations come to be more closely associated with the state, if the state were to turn such corporations into public bodies. I doubt if the NDP or the present government would reject that idea.

The bulwark of democracy and freedom lies in the middle class, in the middle income groups and in the blue collar worker. This is the group we must expand. What has the government done through its budgets and tax measures? It has repeatedly placed too great a burden on the middle income workers and blue collar workers of Canada. They are repeatedly overtaxed by this government and their numbers are shrinking. The group that is on welfare and unemployed has become enlarged; there are more rich, but the middle income group is shrinking. Canadians must be induced to invest in Canada. How can this be done? I suggest, it can be done through a tax credit system under which Canadians investing in Canadian companies would be allowed tax exemptions of so much per year, up to a maximum of $10,000, say. That is how we can encourage Canadians to invest in Canada, particularly in industries that bring the greatest benefits to particular regions.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the minister that, in view of the controversy surrounding this bill, I hope it will be studied exhaustively in committee. I hope witnesses will be called and that those witnesses will be given ample time to prepare briefs on this legislation. This step is an initial step; let us make it a correct step, because governments rarely go back after that first step. If we are to build on this legislation, let us build something which will create the climate for putting more Canadians back in the work force.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a consensus in this House to the effect that the problem of foreign direct investment in Canada is and should be a matter of vital national concern.

Mr. Woolliams: Better watch those car factories.

Mr. MacGuigan: In a situation in which nearly 60 per cent of manufacturing industry in Canada is foreign controlled, a percentage which, according to the group headed by my Windsor colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), is the highest among industrialized nations of the world, I do not think I need to document the reasons for this concern. Although I regret that my colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) yesterday placed himself outside this consensus, it nevertheless exists in this House.

The present consensus in this House is not necessarily indicative of the general attitude of Canadians. I want to refer briefly to a poll which was conducted by Omnifax in Toronto for the CTV network last fall and released on the program "The Canadian Dilemma" on December 5, 1971. The question asked was the following:

• (1650)

Do you feel that the current level of American investment is too high, too low, or about right?

The percentage of people across Canada who felt that American investment was too high was 62.2 per cent. The percentages ranged from 47.5 per cent in Quebec to 58.3 per cent in the Atlantic provinces to 66.1 per cent in Ontario to 74.8 per cent in the west. These were the percentages of people who thought that the current level of American investment in Canada was too high. These results do not quite square with those which the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) presented to us yesterday as the result of his questionnaire. He found that his people were evenly divided. However, the question which was posed in his questionnaire had to do with foreign investment in general, and not just American investment. It also referred to action rather than a mere expression of feeling.

Following the precedent of the hon. member for Palliser, I want to refer briefly to a questionnaire which I sent out this spring. I am just going to give the percentages on one side because that gives the picture of the result.

Do you feel that the present level of American investment in Canada is too high?

Sixty-eight point nine per cent said yes.

Do you feel that the Federal Government should establish a screening agency to regulate the level and conditions of foreign investment in Canada?

Eight-four point eight per cent said yes.

Do you feel that there is too much American influence in labour unions in Canada?

Seventy-six point six per cent said yes.

Would you favour Federal Government action to control this problem that is, the problem of American influence in labour unions?

Sixty-seven point one per cent said yes.

Do you feel that there should be further financial incentives (loans, tax incentives) to encourage Canadians to invest in their economy?

Eighty-nine point five per cent said yes.

I think these figures show that the problem of foreign investment in Canada is generally recognized. The disagreement, of course, is over the solution to the problem. If this bill were intended to be a complete solution to the problem of foreign investment in Canada, it would be completely inadequate. Fortunately, it is not being presented in this light by the government, but rather is one in a continuing series of steps, and focuses on the particular problem of takeovers.

Others have reviewed the steps which the government has taken in the past few years. I do not propose to review all of them, but I will mention several. First, I refer to the recent budget in which there was a reduction of taxation beginning on January 1 of next year for manufacturing businesses, thereby giving an advantage to manufacturing businesses over extractive industries. The figures presented by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), that $1 billion of exports of manufactured goods contains $230 million in salaries and wages while $1 billion in exports of resources pays only $68 million in salaries and wages are,

I think, a very good substantiation of the wisdom of moves in the direction of favouring the manufacturing over the extractive industries in Canada.

I want to refer briefly to the two part program of financial and advisory assistance for improved management in industry which was announced several months ago by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). The first part deals with development of management courses and is designed to encourage the improvement of managerial competence in industry by helping professional, industry, business or management associations to develop or revise management training courses. The second part of the program is called, Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises. This will be developed in close co-operation with the Canadian Executive Service Overseas. Moves of this kind by the government, large or small, are to be greatly welcomed. In fact, to my mind no solution to the problem of foreign investment can be found in isolation from a general industrial policy. I believe that our present industrial policy is no longer entirely satisfactory. It is still too close to the traditional policy of keeping our tariffs high and encouraging foreign businesses to locate here without requiring other qualifications and protections.

In addition, there should be tremendous emphasis on science and technology, a move toward rationalization of our industries, a tax policy which favours even more the manufacturing over the extractive industries, and, something which is particularly important, further capital assistance to small businesses in Canada which wish to expand, especially small businesses which are capable of technological development. I believe this industrial policy should be worked out with business and labour leaders and with the provinces, and not represent a policy merely imposed by the government of Canada. In a matter as complicated as this, and in a society which has become as democratic as ours, it is no longer enough to impose industrial policy from above. Not only must it be worked out carefully, but it must be worked out along with those involved in it.

I personally believe that a general industrial policy will require some further negative measures by way of control of foreign investment, such as the measure in Bill C-201, but the over-all emphasis of the policy should rather be a positive one, to encourage the development of Canadian and Canadian-owned industry. The difficulties of formulating a total policy all at once are indicated by the flounderings of the official opposition on this subject. The New Democratic Party may be misguided, and in my opinion it is, but at least its answer is unambiguous. Because the bill is not everything they want, they are against it. The official opposition is ambiguous all the way through. On one hand, they say that the bill does not go far enough. On the other hand, they say it should not go anywhere because it does not have the agreement of the provinces or for one of several other reasons.

The last paragraph of the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and I regret the fact that he is not in the House at the moment, is a masterpiece obfuscation. It does give credit to his ingenuity, but not much credit to his convictions.

I will pause for just a moment to find the text of the hon. member for Palliser. In his address to the House yesterday, the hon. member spoke of this bill as another addition to the long list of power grabs—some defeated, some successful—by this government from the provinces. He seems to imply in the context that this bill has something to do with the spending power. If I had the time, I would be happy to indulge in a learned disquisition on the spending power of the federal government, a power which does not seem to be accepted by the hon. member for Palliser. Members of his party can say whether they share his view. I am sure that all members are aware that the government of Canada has proposed limitations on its spending power which could be adopted if there were a general constitutional settlement with the provinces. The fact is that this bill is not linked to the spending power at all. It could easily be defended under section 91(25) of the British North America Act, which gives power over aliens. It is this power over aliens which gives the government the right to legislate on matters such as this, along with other powers which can be used for the same purpose. The constitutional power of the federal government is not at issue. What is ultimately at stake is whether or not the federal government should proceed without the participation of the provinces, and that is quite a different matter.

I am not able to decide whether the proposal made by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) is a red herring or whether it is meant to be taken seriously. I refer to his proposal that a super review body should be set up consisting of nominees of the federal government and of provincial governments. I find it hard to believe he is seriously suggesting that the whole direction of the Canadian economy should be dictated by a group of appointees.

Opposition arguments with respect to the details of the bill were best presented in the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). One of the arguments put forward was that the screening agency to be set up is not an independent agency. My reply would be similar to that of the hon. member for Egmont. The power to control the Canadian economy in this way would be, in my view, too great a power to be placed in the hands of an independent agency. Such a power, with all the responsibilities it involves, should be placed in the hands of the elected representatives of the people. I might recall at this point that the attack directed by the NDP toward the Canadian Development Corporation was precisely on the grounds that the Corporation was too independent. The same kind of argument would apply a fortiori to what is, implicitly, their proposal here.

Mr. Rowland: Would the hon. member not agree with my assertion, not so much that it should be an independent screening agency as that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is the wrong organization to perform the screening function, because of a conflict of interests in its necessary duties?

Mr. MacGuigan: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree. It seems to me the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has available to it the expertise necessary to deal with the complicated type of administration which will result from the legislation before us.

The other argument advanced by the hon. member for Selkirk, with respect to what he called the bill's errors of commission was that the purpose of the bill was not to prevent takeovers as such but to ensure that any takeover which did occur would be to the benefit of Canada. It seems obvious to me that there would be fewer takeovers under this legislation than now occur. Business decisions are often sufficiently marginal that the imposition of a great many added requirements by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would make them uneconomic. I can reach no other conclusion than that there will be fewer takeovers in the future. Tangentially, it is not always recognized that the legislation would apply not only to takeovers of businesses which are presently owned by Canadians but also to businesses owned by foreigners if they should change hands.

Granting that there will be fewer takeovers under this legislation, I cannot see how the hon. member and his friends can reject legislation which moves in that direction, especially since the only alternative would seem to be a policy of no takeovers, one of complete prohibition. The first criterion to be borne in mind by the minister in determining whether or not a takeover is to be permitted is the effect on the entire level of economic activity in Canada, including employment. In these circumstances, I find it hard to see how the hon. member can reach the conclusion he does.

There is one area of concern to which I should like to refer. Is there adequate provision to safeguard the civil liberties of subjects? Even people involved in business are entitled to respect for their civil liberties, and some hon. members have expressed concern about this question. The only way in which it can be dealt with satisfactorily is by consideration at the committee level. It will be necessary to examine all the protections and safeguards afforded before deciding whether there is sufficient assurance against arbitrary action.

Then again, the very complexity of the mechanism raises considerable problems having to do with efficiency. This is something which I suppose one has to expect, but here again I am reassured by my belief that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce possesses sufficient expertise to be able to handle the situation satisfactorily. I agree that the bill does not respond except in a small way to the general problem engendered by foreign investment. It does, however, respond to the problem to which it is addressed, that of foreign takeovers, which is the most acute problem concerning foreign investment.

The hon. member for Selkirk asked what would happen with respect to takeovers in the interval before this legislation is passed, and criticized the bill because it made no provision for the waiting period. If the opposition is genuinely concerned about this question they could co-operate in getting the bill through the rest of its stages quickly; that would be the best protection we could afford, the best way of showing the concern we feel about foreign takeovers. I have kept my own remarks short so as to contribute to this end.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to join in this debate on the government's so-called, foreign takeovers review act. I say "so-called" but perhaps the word "alleged" would do as well.

The lead paragraph of this bill reads as follows—and I invite hon. members to follow it with me and share my bewilderment over the assumption contained in this preamble:

An Act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisition of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons.

I think I could be forgiven if I were to assume from this that the government has assessed the problem—if there is a problem—arising out of investment in Canadian enterprise by foreign interests. I think I could be forgiven if I were to make the assumption that the government had pinpointed specific dangers to our economy and to our sovereignty as a result of such investment, and, more particularly, as a result of foreign investors having a majority interest in Canadian enterprises.

However, this is not the case. The government has not isolated any specific areas of danger, nor has it made any assessment of the true effects of the ownership of Canadian businesses and industries by anyone, foreign or Canadian. In effect, therefore, the bill is another example of the age-old adage about placing the cart before the horse. It is a classic example of the penchant of this government for launching upon attempted massive corrective action without first identifying and defining the problem it seeks to correct.

Unfortunately, the New Democratic Party has been working overtime trying to alarm the Canadian people to the dangers of an economic and political takeover by United States interests unless we buy Canada back from the foreigners. We hear the same gobbledygook from the ultranationalists led by the Liberal party's economic mixmaster, Walter Gordon. We all know the story of Walter Gordon. We see his ghost floating around the benches across the way now and again, influencing the present government's economic policies in spite of the fact that he has long since been banished from his former place in the Liberal party. His infamous 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, which was bought lock, stock and barrel by the previous Liberal government and preserved religiously by the present Liberal government, put adequate housing effectively beyond the reach of the vast majority of Canadians and put the housing industry in the hands of promoters and speculators. I should like to hear some heckling from my left about that point.

The only attempt by the present government to give an identity to what is called the foreign investment problem was made recently by the very capable Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) in the form of the Gray report. Unfortunately, like his colleagues, the revenue minister is on a short leash and he could not address himself to a definitive study of the problem. Judging from the failure of the Gray report to identify the problem, the minister was obviously directed to prepare an innocuous document that could be used to pave the way for this bill. I agree with my colleague who spoke earlier who said that this bill should go to committee as soon as possible so that it may be examined more thoroughly and amended where necessary.

The Gray report does not provide any evidence that ownership of Canadian enterprises by foreign interests works against the interests of Canadians in general or against Canada as a nation. Nor does the report provide any evidence that any benefit would accrue from the mere fact of buying control of any business or industry owned by foreign entrepreneurs who established such enterprises. This is very disappointing to me because, like most Canadians who have been subjected to a barrage of criticism and alarmist viewpoints about the danger of foreign takeovers, I should very much like to know just what is the true situation and whether or not there is in fact a danger that we will lose control of our economy.

There is not one iota of truth in the claim that we, as a nation, do not have effective control over our economy—and I will give the government and previous governments credit for this—if we take the evidence available to us, evidence that can be taken seriously. In the absence of any clear-cut evidence of control, I must accept the preponderance of opinion expressed by most of our bankers and industrialists that Canada is in control of every area of its national economy and that we are in no immediate or long-term danger of losing that control.

There is evidence that foreign-owned or controlled businesses and industries are as good corporate citizens as are Canadian-owned enterprises. There is ample evidence that without the influx of foreign capital and expertise of the past 50 years many areas of our economy would be lagging behind acceptable norms. I say that from my own business experience, because I found this to be true in the 25 years that I was in business before coming to this chamber. Our mining and smelting industry, lumber, pulp and paper and automotive industries, as well as a large percentage of our labour intensive industries were established initially, or have been since established, by capital brought in by foreign entrepreneurs. This has been the case ever since confederation. One notable example of this was the influx of British capital which, in the main, built the Canadian Pacific Railway, the very instrument of confederation.

At this point I would like to use an example that is familiar to all of us to point up the jaundiced view of many of our so-called economic nationalists. I refer to the plant operated by the Canadian International Paper Company in Temiscaming, Quebec. All of us mourn the closing of the plant, and the loss of jobs by hundreds of people in that town. Canadian International Paper Company has always been a good corporate citizen. For the past 52 years the company has spent tens of billions of dollars in capital equipment and improvements, taxes, salaries and in other ways, in fulfiling its obligations to the community, to the country and to its shareholders. It has been the town's major employer and it has been a good employer. We are now informed that the plant is being closed down because the market for the company's product has changed to the extent that the plant is no longer economically viable. Understandably, the company's workers are stunned and afraid. They are concerned about their future prospects of employment, and they are concerned about their families.

Since the news of the closing of the Temiscaming plant, it has been touted around by the economic nationalists that the company's head office is in New York and that therefore the company is owned by a United States parent. This good corporate citizen has suddenly become a culprit. We are told now that this is one of the dangers of having major industries owned or controlled by outsiders, and that the company would continue in operation if it had been Canadian-owned.

We have another example of this, the case of a company well known to all of us, one of the largest in the world, and vital to Canada International Nickel of Sudbury. Although all of the physical work of mining and smelting takes place in Canada, its administrative headquarters is in New York city. I have no objection to that so long as the company remains, as it always has been, a good corporate citizen of Canada. It has a world wide market as well as world wide respect. Falconbridge is another company that also enjoys such respect.

Let us look at two fundamental facts about the operation of this company in Temiscaming. Canadian International Paper Company did not wait until the last minute before trying to take corrective action. For the past few years, the company has been seeking alternative measures to stave off the effects of a failing market for its product. It has tried to find ways of adapting the plant's facilities to production of more viable products, but could not find such a solution. Now that closing of the plant has been forced upon them, the company has arranged to assist any government agency or private interests in utilizing the plant's facilities for the production of any marketable product in an effort to minimize the impact on the local citizens. This does not indicate that industrial giants are unfeeling, or that they are not interested in the welfare and well being of the citizens of the host country.

I regret to say that Ottawa has become such a bureaucratic jungle in the four years of the present government's term of office that I shudder at the implications of this bill. The fact that a group of bureaucrats are to be put in the position of passing judgment on the acceptability of an investor in Canada and assessing such investor's net advantage or disadvantage to the Canadian economy bodes no future good. In my opinion, the part of the bill which gives all power to the minister, and then in turn to the Cabinet, is inadvisable. How in the name of reason could such people be expected to know more about a particular enterprise than those people who have spent their lives learning their industrial crafts, and who know not only the ins and outs of the business but the workings of the world markets?

Mr. Pepin: We have some businessmen, don't worry.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I hope you do, Mr. Minister. The minister says he will have some businessmen to advise on these questions. I hope that is so, and will always be the case without exception after this bill comes into force. If this is the answer to the particular problem the government has defined, then I am more than ever determined to learn the nature and the extent of that problem.

We have a situation in Napanee I wish to air before the House.

Mr. Pepin: Please don't; please don't.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The minister says "please don't". I am sure he would be interested in listening to this because the jobs of 400 men are at stake.

Mr. Pepin: You write me a letter.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Napanee Industries, the successor to the old Napanee Iron Works, is a good-size firm in Napanee which manufactures the famous and nationally accepted Napanee automatic boiler. It also makes a line of railway equipment including flatcars, hoppers and railway cars. This firm is owned by Mr. Walter Gordon's firm, known as Corporate Management Limited. Due to a recent lack of orders for railway equipment and cars this firm is now for sale, and it is common knowledge that Mr. Gordon's firm is very anxious to sell it. I hope the minister is still interested in listening to this information.

Napanee Industries has for some time been the victim of unfair competition, especially from Montreal and Quebec firms, which I am told are subsidized by the Quebec government as a result of being the successful low bidders on railway equipment orders. Due to this competition, and because of the limited market in Canada for this product, it is plain to me, as I am sure it is plain to the minister, that any potential buyer of this firm must be one enjoying a wide international or continental market. Therefore, Corporate Management Limited is not apt to be able to sell this firm to any but a non-Canadian firm. In other words, the chances are that the bidders will be from the United States. Will the government, in the interests of preserving jobs for 400 men, allow the sale of this firm to an American buyer? Will Mr. Walter Gordon, who is head of the committee for an Independent Canada, still be willing to sell it to a United States firm? That is the present question around Napanee.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was reported the other day as having announced in Winnipeg that there would be a purchase of 2400 hopper cars to move western grain. He is reported to have said they would be purchased from two sources in Quebec or in Hamilton. Let me suggest to the Prime Minister that he investigate the possibility of having some of these hopper cars made in Napanee by Napanee Industries Ltd. where we need the work, thus forestalling the layoff of men at the present time. I trust the minister is more concerned with this problem now than when I first brought it up. I thank him for listening.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure what the hon. member is saying now is of interest to many members of the House, perhaps all members, but as the hon. member suggests, he is taking advantage of having the floor to air a situation which is obviously of local interest. The hon. member must appreciate that there is a specific bill before the House. I assume what he is saying now is relevant to Bill C-201. Perhaps he might indicate to the Chair how this principle of relevancy is being observed at this time.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With due respect, that is exactly why I brought this matter up, because it pertains to the possible sale of this company to a company other than a Canadian one, and this is directly related to the purpose of Bill C-201. This firm has been the victim of unfair competition, and I have stated the source of this in the past. The firm has other opposition as well, in Hamilton, where they too, apparently, can bid lower prices in tendering on this equipment.

There has long been a fallacy in the thinking of some of our people that anti-Americanism is proof that one is pro-Canadian. Nothing could be further from the truth. To be against something simply means that you are against it. The same fallacy seems to be apparent in this legislation, and the government is proving to us that it is pro-Canadian industry by showing it is against someone else. If the government is determined to promote Canadian business and interests, it can count on my wholehearted support. I am all for such a policy, but I am afraid the present government is just against someone and not for anyone. I point to the recent tax reform package that was railroaded through this House by closure. This is an administrative nightmare for Canadian entrepreneurship, and has already discouraged businesses of long-standing to remain active. The tax legislation has already encouraged Canadian-owned businesses to sell out to anyone who has the cash and the willingness to buy. There is no longer a challenge to Canadians to embark on new business ventures with their own capital because the risk is too great and they have no protection.

Multinational corporations have been singled out by the NDP and nationalists as the great culprits. We are led to believe that these corporations are going to swallow up our country, bleed us dry, throw us aside and abandon us. This sounds very menacing and frightening unless you take a closer look at the situation, and especially if you consider the multinational corporations which are Canadian owned, and we have some of them. Our chartered banks were among the first multinational corporations in the world, and they have a good record in almost every country of the world. In almost every corner of the world you can find a branch of a Canadian bank, and these banks are among the most stable and respected banks you will find. The multinational character of our banks has been good for our country, and good for the Canadians who own stock in them.

Our banks and financial institutions have a virtual monopoly in our country. Efforts of foreign banking and investment houses to establish in Canada have been resisted firmly and decisively by our governments. Many of our top bankers believe we are running a great risk in adhering to such a policy. We want to locate and do locate in other countries, yet deny the same right to other countries here. It is said we want our bread buttered on both sides, and that we could be excluded from countries we exclude from Canada. This example is only to show that foreign investment is a two-sided coin, and that while we tend to over-react whenever someone shouts the alarm that we are being taken over, we do not hear such alarms expressed by countries where we have Canadian-owned and controlled corporations.

There is another thing about this bill which gives me reason for concern, and that is clause 3. We find that by definition, a Canadian branch business is one that is incorporated elsewhere than in Canada and that operates from premises to which persons employed in connection with that business report for work. This is either a further example of the fuzzy headedness that exists in the present government's approach to legislative writing or it is an attempt to convey an impression that is completely false.

Any company or business that operates in Canada must be incorporated under the laws of our country and under the laws of the provinces in which such a company maintains premises. An example is the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited. This company is a limited company incorporated in Canada under both federal and provincial statutes, and is subject to the same laws and regulations as any other limited company in Canada, whether the investment capital comes from Canadian or foreign sources. The stock in Ford of Canada Limited can be purchased by anyone who wants to buy it, whether he is Canadian, Japanese, German or of any other nationality. All anyone has to do, if he feels that stock in a particular company should be owned by Canadians, is to call his broker. I offer this advice to everyone who feels strongly about ownership of companies operating in our country. Do as people do in every other country, call your stockbroker and place your order. I am not advertising Ford shares because I do not have any of that stock, but those shares can be purchased by anyone who wants to buy them.

If Canadian banks and insurance companies, as well as Canadian individuals, had been willing to invest in the high risk ventures in our resource and manufacturing sectors, there would not have been so many opportunities for such investments by foreigners. It would serve us ill at this point to lump them now in a general grouping, label them culprits and castigate them for investing in our country. At least let us make a proper assessment of the situation and determine whether or not they represent an undesirable situation. Before we launch ourselves along the path of precipitate corrective action, let us first identify the problem. That will be the job of this House through its committee work in the days immediately ahead so that we may come up with something that will be good for Canada and her economy.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the opinion expressed by the previous speaker, it is my view that the erosion of our national independence has reached alarming proportions. Canada has become an economic satellite. It has allowed itself to drift into a position of military, economic and cultural dependence upon the United States. In this situation political absorption becomes irrelevant. I say that the Canadian public have become acutely conscious of the danger and realize that unless effective and decisive measures are taken immediately to reverse the trend of the foreign control of our economic life, the consequent loss of meaningful independence will soon reach the point of no return. To this crisis of Canada's sovereignty and independence and to the growing public demand for action the government has reacted with Bill C-201 providing for a screening process of certain takeovers by foreign interests. This is a feeble and inadequate response. It is less than half a measure. It is the very minimum. It is a gesture which tackles a small fraction of the problem and tackles it inadequately.

However, we ought not to be surprised by this. It is consistent with the whole record and philosophy of the party in government at the present moment. The economic independence of Canada is closely linked with the political independence of our country. The government has clearly indicated this philosophy which inevitably leads to the continentalism which has brought about the present situation.

In "Foreign Police for Canadians", a series of statements issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in 1970, the government spelled out its approach and its priorities in the field of international affairs. It set out six themes of national policy and amongst these it gave priority to economic growth.

On page 32 of the first main pamphlet on foreign policy, the following statement appears:

> After considering these and other alternatives, and having in mind its determination to emphasize what Canada can do best in order to promote its objectives abroad, the government is of the view that the foreign policy pattern for the 70's should be based on a ranking of six policy themes which gives highest priorities to economic growth, social justice and quality of life policies. Peace and security, sovereignty and independence will be placed "in a new pattern of emphasis".

We in this party do not accept these priorities. Of course, economic growth is a desirable objective, but in our view the sovereignty and independence of Canada come first and peace and security in a nuclear world should rank ahead of economic growth. As we are guided by this philosophy, we are not prepared to sacrifice the sovereignty and independence of Canada in the hope of promoting economic growth. Indeed, we believe that it is not necessary to surrender to foreign control of our economy to promote the economic expansion of Canada. In our view, Canada has the resources and the means of financing her own expansion.

Our attitude is not based upon any narrow nationalism, chauvinism or anti-Americanism. I, for one, consider myself an internationalist, but I believe that Canada's distinct contribution to peace and security, and the building of a world community, depends upon her maintaining her sovereignty and independence and, above all, independence of mind. I believe this sovereignty and independence cannot be preserved unless vigorous steps are taken to control the Canadian economy.

The facts as to foreign ownership are well known and have been set out in a number of authoritative reports, namely, the Watkins report on foreign ownership, the Gray report, and the report of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on Canadian-American relations. Numerous books have spelled out the problem in all its gravity. One of the best of these is called "Silent Surrender" by Professor Kari Levitt of McGill University.

As has been made clear in this debate, the present legislation deals only with a limited number of takeovers and deals with them in an ineffective manner. Mr. Wilson of the Montreal Star wrote:

> Takeovers are by far the smallest part of the whole issue presented by foreign control of very large segments of Canadian industry. The takeovers have clearly been chosen by the government for this very limited step towards a policy because it is the part least sensitive to Canadians, least likely to provoke controversy.

Foreign takeovers, according to government estimates, represent just 10 per cent of foreign investment activities in Canada. The other 90 per cent represents new investments by foreign owned corporations already operating here or new investments by foreign corporations investing in Canada for the first time. Neither of these areas is affected by the proposed measure we are discussing, so we are dealing with 10 per cent of the problem which we are facing.

Professor Paul Halpern, Associate Professor in the faculty of management studies at the University of Toronto, commenting on the government's new policy on foreign takeovers, says this:

• (1740)

> Since foreign takeovers of large firms have been estimated to constitute approximately 10 per cent of foreign investment activities in Canada, the impact of the screening agency will be minimal.

I thoroughly approve of, and am glad to repeat, that statement.

Dr. Levitt in the book to which I have referred called "Silent Surrender" says this:

> The brutal fact is that the acquisition of control by U.S. companies over the commodity-producing sectors of the Canadian economy has largely been financed from corporate savings deriving from the sale of Canadian resources, extracted and processed by Canadian labour ... Thus, over the period 1957 to 1964 U.S. direct investment in manufacturing, mining and petroleum secured 73 per cent of their funds from retained earnings and depreciation reserves, a further 12 per cent from Canadian banks and other intermediaries and only 15 per cent in the form of new funds from the United States.
> Furthermore, throughout the period the pay out of dividends, interest, royalties and management fees exceeded the flow of new capital ... In other words, America is using our own money to take over the Canadian economy—and skimming off a tidy profit at the same time.

In the past, Canadians have had to admit that we are selling our freedom. Now, it is apparent that we are actually buying our servitude. I should add a note to that, Mr. Speaker, to point out that the figures given by Dr. Levitt are now outdated. She says that 85 per cent of the funds used to acquire American control of our economy come from Canadian sources. I believe the Gray Report indicates the figure is now 93 per cent or 94 per cent.

The approach of the government, as Mr. Wilson, whom I quoted before, pointed out, is so loose and flexible that it tells almost nothing of what will actually happen in the future. Very general criteria, rather than precise limitations, have been given to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to guide him in his recommendations to the cabinet. The policy is likely to vary from minister to minister, from government to government. The concept of "significant benefit to Canada" is a vague and uncertain concept. I question whether the task of determining what takeovers are of significant benefit to Canada should be a purely governmental responsibility.

The Committee on External Affairs in its report on this subject, after extensive investigation, proposed a Canadian Ownership and Control Bureau, which in turn had been recommended in the Watkins Report which spelled out in detail the function of this bureau. It is no wonder that the chairman of this committee, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn), in the eloquent speech he made yesterday acknowledged this bill was a baby step forward and, in his words, ineffective. However, he took refuge in the proposition that it was a first step. I wonder if he pays no attention to the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself, because the Prime Minister has clearly pronounced that he has nothing up his sleeve to add to this particular measure.

In an interview with the Toronto Daily Star, the Prime Minister is quoted as saying:

> It might be tempting to tell the readers of the Star that this is only a first step and we're going to take another one soon, but that would not be so. If we had another step to take we would have announced it.
> At this time it is the step we are taking and we are prepared to be judged by it.

Mr. Pepin: He was talking about screening only.

Mr. Brewin: Well, he was being quoted in the context of dealing with this whole aspect of foreign control.

Mr. Pepin: He was talking about screening.

Mr. Brewin: If that is the minister's explanation, it is not an explanation that satisfies me because I think the words in the article are perfectly clear. I will reread them, and I invite the minister to read what was said. The Prime Minister said:

> At this time it is the step we are taking and we are prepared to be judged by it.

I say he will be judged by it. It is no use for the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacQuigan) to say that this is not enough, that we know it is not enough, but we have other steps, and that this is only a start. The Prime Minister has made it clear that he has nothing else up his sleeve. He spoke with his usual clarity, and he cannot get away from his words.

Another, and even more serious aspect of this matter, is that the Prime Minister in other interviews has made it clear that he is handing responsibility over to the provinces, to the provincial governments, after this first futile gesture. I quote again from an editorial in the Toronto Daily Star on the 8th of this month as follows:

> The worst part of Mr. Trudeau's performance (in dealing with the issue of foreign ownership on a CTV program) was his evasion of responsibility. He said provinces that criticized his government's lack of policy should go ahead and control foreign investment on their own. It is true that there are things the provinces can do independently to screen foreign investment and get better value from foreign-owned enterprises. But, Mr. Trudeau knows perfectly well that it is not practical for a province acting alone to make comprehensive policy in this field. The leadership in this field should come from Ottawa.
> Mr. Trudeau has now abdicated from that leadership role and he cuts a poor figure—

I am glad to quote the Toronto Daily Star because it has so often supported the Prime Minister. Possibly hon. members opposite did not catch what I said. I will be glad to repeat it.

> Mr. Trudeau has now abdicated from that leadership role and he cuts a poor figure, as a man whose government was elected to defend Canadian federalism, when he invites provinces to take the lead on what is clearly a matter of national scope and importance.

There is another report of a parliamentary committee which has been completely ignored by the government. It is the report of the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Constitution. As hon. members well know, this all party committee travelled all the way across Canada and received submissions from many experts and witnesses in every section of the country. I want to quote one of its recommendations, No. 103, which reads:

> The power of the federal parliament with respect to aliens should be clarified to ensure that parliament has paramount power to deal with problems of foreign ownership.

I want to read part of the body of that report because it is very relevant to this whole debate.

> Throughout the hearings of the committee there was a recurring concern for Canadian independence, sovereignty, unity and identity. Certain witnesses expressed their alarm over the large percentage of Canadian land, resources and industry owned by non-Canadians and especially by Americans. They referred to our recreation land, our mining, oil and gas industries, our publishing and text-book industries, etc. It was established that American investment is 80 per cent of the total foreign investment in Canada and that 76 per cent of all companies in Canada with assets over $25 million are foreign owned. Fears were expressed that Canadian citizens might lose political as well as economic control of their own country; that they would be barred from the best jobs and the best land; that they would be run by absentee landlords; and that Canadian people and resources would be working for the enrichment of other peoples and other lands.
> This concern over the economic domination of our country can be closely related to other concerns expressed before the committee, such as the lack of national unity and a vigorous national purpose, the tendency to regionalism, the proliferation of hyphenated Canadians who cling to the nationality or symbols of their mother countries, misunderstanding and differences between French speaking and English speaking Canadians, old and new Canadians, older and younger Canadians, native born Canadians and immigrants. As a multicultural country it is all the more important for Canada to insist on a substratum of national unity. Unless Canadians do develop a definite solidarity among themselves and a conscious attachment to their country, territory and resources, they will not be able to deal with the threat of foreign economic domination and may not survive as a nation. There must be not only a regional solidarity and attachment, but a national one. All Canadians must consider themselves undivided owners of all Canadian territory and partners or trustees in its management. There should be no second-class citizens and all must feel at home in every part of the land. To develop a positive nationalism we must know more about our country and each other. We must take more interest in our history, our music, our arts, our national institutions and associations. On our success in these things our independence, our sovereignty and our unity will depend. We shall become "masters of our own house" in Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, these are the words of an all-party committee which agreed upon them, so they have relevance to this debate. How can we have that unity if we throw away the control of our resources and give them into alien hands? The committee points out that the constitutional right to deal with the subject of foreign ownership may perhaps be uncertain. However, section 91 of the British North America Act gives exclusive control over aliens. It is my own conviction that this paramount power of the federal government gives basic responsibility for dealing with the problem of foreign ownership to the federal Parliament. I am not suggesting that the federal Parliament should interfere in questions of property and civil rights without consultation with the provinces, but I am suggesting that the obligation of leadership in this field to prevent alien domination clearly lies, under our present constitution, with the federal government. The abdication of the Prime Minister and his government in this field not only indicates a lack of leadership, it presents a threat to the unity of Canada. What hope is there of maintaining the unity of Canada if we are not going to be masters of our own house and if our independence and sovereignty are eroded by alien control?

There are many reasons for my belief that in the forthcoming election this government will suffer a resounding defeat. There can be no better reason than this feeble response to the grave threat to Canada's existence as a nation represented by this proposal to deal with foreign ownership of the Canadian economy. If Canadians desire to encourage continentalism and be absorbed by our neighbours in all but form, they will support this measure and this government. I believe, however, that Canada's independence can only be assured if this government is defeated, and a government capable of protecting Canada elected in its place.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that we have to discuss foreign investment in Canada, in particular American ones, indicates that we have problems to which we have not found yet real solutions, because we do not try to make a profitable and efficient analysis of the causes of such problems.

We shall never settle this foreign investment problem by passing ordinary or timid legislation, nor without dealing with the genuine causes of the problem.

I find it curious to see the hon. minister, as well as many of his colleagues, come and tell us the same old story namely that we need foreign investments and that we are helpless without them.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is giving us very little importance and annihilating our own potential. In effect, as long as we judge financial problems on the basis of prejudices such as, for instance, believing that it is impossible today for a country such as ours to grow and live adequately without being alienated by American high finance, we will be going the wrong way.

We should simply destroy this prejudice. We should stop entertaining it because—as I have said repeatedly in the House—what matters for any individual, wherever he lives, it is to be able to buy the consumer goods he needs to live adequately.

In such a rich country as Canada which has the potential required to provide food, clothing and shelter to the whole population without outside help, it is stupid to talk about the absolute need for foreign capital. We only have to rely on our own potential and we will not need foreign authorization to keep on developing.

Once such principles are applied, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. minister would have many more solutions to propose than those to be found in this bill.

May I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being six o'clock, the House will adjourn until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON COMMENTS IN 1971 ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSION CONCERNING APPOINTMENT BY MERIT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the annual report of the Public Service Commission for 1971, which was tabled in the House as a routine matter yesterday, has this morning, received interpretation and comment in the press which is causing some concern, possibly based on misunderstanding. The basis of appointment to the public service, which is the question involved, is a matter of very real importance to the public and to this House. In all the circumstances, the government is of the opinion that the report should be referred to a committee of the House where the matter can be discussed with the chairman of the commission and where clarification can be secured.

It is not, I think, generally realized that the Public Service Commission is, by law, an independent agency responsible to Parliament, not to the government. It is independent by reason of the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act, as are some other public servants who are directly responsible to Parliament.

Since the press reports of this morning, I have looked at the relevant paragraphs of the annual report and I must say it appears to me that the report had been misinterpreted. Newspaper accounts refer to it as indicating that the merit system "is being abandoned" or is "on the way out". I have been able to find no statements of that kind in the report. What the report does is refer to what it says is a problem with regard to "equality of opportunity" for certain groups in the community to be fully represented in the public service. It suggests that the answer to this problem "may be found in a dynamic concept of merit". As I read the report, it is not suggesting that merit be abandoned but rather that means be found of providing full and equal access for people in all groups to be considered for appointment on the basis of merit. In any event, it is apparent that there is some confusion and misunderstanding and it is important that this should be removed.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that whatever the explanation or interpretation of the report may be, there is no doubt about the position of this government. It has stood squarely for the merit principle for appointment to the public service and that is the principle for which it continues to stand.

If it can be arranged among House leaders to have the report sent to a committee of the House for discussion without delay, the government is prepared to provide the necessary reference.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the Prime Minister's statement was hastily prepared as he has not followed his usual courteous practice of supplying the leaders of the opposition parties with copies before delivery. I must say that I welcome the statement which deals with an important subject. It is important to clarify the report of the Public Service Commission and to reassure the Canadian people as to the concepts the public service commissioners have in mind. I also welcome the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon that the government stands squarely behind the merit system in terms of appointments to and promotions within the public service. I believe that if confusion exists following the report of the Public Service Commission, and I believe it does, it was justified in view of the confusing rhetoric in the opening sections of the Public Service Commission report. For example—I will not take long—there is this statement:

> Because the merit concept was originally designed to eliminate patronage, it has tended to develop a sacred cowishness of its own.

That statement of itself would tend to suggest to some people, at least, that the principle to some extent is being abandoned. Farther on the report says:

> But the commission has been taking a longer look at the concept of merit in recent years.

It then talks about the excellent improvement in the public service that the application of the merit system has produced. The last statement I have quoted would also create the impression in the minds of many people that the concept of merit was in the process of substantial modification. Later the report says:

> A growing feeling has been that the merit system in the past has been applied too narrowly and that equality of opportunity for these groups has been lacking.

That is open to the interpretation the Prime Minister has placed on it, but it is also open to other interpretations.

Therefore I agree it is highly important that this whole subject be clarified and I support a reference to the committee where the Public Service Commission can be questioned and can clarify its position and make it very clear to the country exactly what it has in mind. I do not think there will be any question, if the Public Service Commission stays within the authority granted to it by statute of this Parliament, that it has no alternative but to support the merit system in the public service. Any possible doubts in that regard should be removed because it is very clear that the opening pages of the report in particular have caused great unease in this city and probably throughout the land.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I too regret, although I do not blame the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the fact that we were not able to see a copy of his statement before he made it.

I will not read the parts of the first page of the report which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) quoted. But I wonder whether the commission would have written that page if it did not have something in mind that suggests erosion of the merit system. I cannot understand or imagine the commissioners writing some of the sentences and paragraphs at the beginning of this report, some of which the Leader of the Opposition has quoted, without there being something in their minds having to do with the merit system and an intention to erode it. I do not understand how the Prime Minister can read these passages and say that the commission is still standing by the merit system. Obviously it is not. There may be useful and socially desirable ways in which the merit system may be applied somewhat differently than it has been in the past, but I have read the section very carefully and it is not what this section of the report says. The press is not to be blamed and nobody else is to be blamed for feeling uneasy that these statements have found their way into the report.

I think it is important to state now that what we are dealing with is not merely a matter of policy. We are dealing with a statutory requirement. I remind hon. members that section 10 of the Public Service Employment Act specifically states that appointments to the public service shall be made on merit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It is not merely a matter of policy of the commission; it is a matter of a statutory requirement for the commission to act in a certain way.

I must also mention—I remember it very vividly—that during the discussions of the special committee on the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1966, of which I was a member, as was my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I argued with the then secretary of the Treasury Board, Mr. George Davidson, against the provisions in those acts which retained in the Public Service Commission exclusive rights with regard to appointment, promotion, classification, reclassification and all the other areas of job security. They took those areas out of the ordinary collective bargaining process. Your Honour will see in a moment why this is relevant. The reason they gave for taking those areas of job security out of the collective bargaining process was that they could not leave them to negotiation. Appointment promotions and classifications had to be done on the merit system. That was the reason they gave us for taking out of the collective bargaining process what is normally the most important area in it.

• (1420)

I am also pleased the Prime Minister agrees that this report, and particularly this part of it, should go to a committee for consideration. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has a motion precisely on this point, under Standing Order 43 which he intended to move and which, with Your Honour's permission, he will move. He has given the government House leader notice of his motion and I hope, therefore, that it will be unanimously accepted. We are ready to have it accepted without debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, let us call a spade a spade. The controversy over the merit system as applied in the public service is not new. In fact, we often hear that, at the present time, if a candidate does not speak one of the two official languages, he cannot get a job.

There is in the civil service as elswwhere prejudice with regard to hiring. I feel that the criterion of competence should have priority over all others with regard to employment in the public service.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is absolutely unfair to tell a unilingual civil servant of 50, for instance: If you fail to learn the other official language, you will lose your job within a year or two. This is not the way to correct the situation.

If we really wish to respect both official languages, I think that the best way to do it, as far as the government and civil service are concerned, is to encourage the provinces which have jurisdiction over education to teach in both official languages as early as grade 1. Thus, within five years, we could remove the misunderstandings and we could surely progress, through the qualifications of bilingual public servants.

COMMISSION COMMENTS CONCERNING MERIT SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, had the Prime Minister been able to give us notice of his intention to make the statement he has just made we might have saved a certain amount of time. Nevertheless, I rise to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. The matter concerns, as Your Honour might suspect, the declaration by the Public Service Commission in its annual report that the commission intends to interpret unilaterally the principle of appointment by merit contained in the Public Service Employment Act. I therefore propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

That this House, for the preservation of the morale of the public service and the rights of the bargaining agents and the employee organizations of the public service, and the supremacy of Parliament to interpret its own statutes, is of the opinion that the Prime Minister should forthwith publicly announce the government's policy relating to this matter and assure the House that the merit principle in the public service will be changed only by a law of this Parliament and not by any philosophy on the part of the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has proposed this motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. The motion can be put only with the consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

REFERENCE OF 1971 ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSION TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could make another try with respect to this matter. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indicated, I gave notice earlier to the government House leader of a motion that I should like to make under Standing Order 43. I have left out of my motion any debate or argument; all I should like is to see this matter referred. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the annual report of the Public Service Commission of Canada for 1971, tabled in the House of Commons yesterday by the Secretary of State, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for a study of the changes in the application of the merit system referred to therein.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is the hon. gentleman rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in order to facilitate, if possible, what I believe we all want, which is to have the matter studied by a committee. Speaking for myself, I would agree that this motion be put and accepted without debate if the last part were deleted; it seems to me to prejudge slightly the issue that will be examined by the committee. I refer to that part that makes reference to "changes in the application of the merit system referred to therein". If that were removed I could accept the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, while I would rather have the entire motion put, if the first part were put it would still include everything contained in the report and that covers the part about which we are concerned. For the sake of getting this matter dealt with today, I would agree to terminate the motion after the words "miscellaneous estimates".

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blair: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is extremely important at this time to be precise, clear and unambiguous in the instructions that we give the committee. I have a vivid recollection of what happened last year when important matters pertaining to the public service were referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee, matters involving, among other things, the question of appointments, promotions and the application of the merit system. My recollection is very vivid indeed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose on a point of order and he will appreciate that a motion has now been proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It seems to me that essentially the hon. member is debating the terms of the motion. If he is not satisfied with the terms of the motion, I think his recourse is to vote against it, not debate it.

Mr. Blair: Then may I rephrase my point of order and ask for an assurance from the House that this committee will not in any way be inhibited, as was the committee last year, in reporting on the matters referred to it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Hees: Who was it who inhibited the committee last time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the Standing Order provides for what the hon. member is suggesting. The motion now proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the following:

That the annual report of the Public Service Commission of Canada for 1971, tabled in the House of Commons yesterday by the Secretary of State, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

This motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there is unanimous consent. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC—INCREASE IN COST OF BOARD FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like, under Standing Order 43, to propose a motion on an urgent matter.

Pensions for Quebec Old People's Homes

The pensioners of my constituency living in old people's homes are asking the government to take specific steps, in order to cope with the decision of the Quebec government concerning the $15 per month increase of the old age security pension.

From July 1, 1972 the cost of board will be raised to $110 per month, which means that they will really only get $9 out of the $15 raise, as mentioned in a letter which has been sent to me by Mr. Philippe Hinse, on behalf of all boarders at the Foyer Sainte-Anne-Marie, in Danville—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should move his motion immediately.

Mr. Beaudoin: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

I request the unanimous consent of the House so that this urgent matter be debated and so that the pensioners receive what the House has voted. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the government take appropriate steps to ensure that the Quebec pensioners actually draw the full amount granted by the government under Bill C-207.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion moved by the hon. member is not in order, because he moves it under the provisions of Standing Order 43, whereas this is actually a motion which should be moved under Standing Order 26. The hon. member requests the unanimous consent of the House to discuss this urgent matter, so that pensioners will actually draw the amount that the House has voted. In other words, he requests the holding of an emergency debate, and such a motion must be moved under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

ORDERS AND DECORATIONS

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING PROTOCOL FOR WEARING INSIGNIA

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2), I should like to table Orders in Council in both languages respecting protocol for wearing insignia for Canadian orders and Canadian decorations.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had intended at this stage of the proceedings to request permission to move a resolution for the adjournment of the House to discuss the matter raised by the Public Service Commission report, but in view of the agreement to refer this matter to a committee I should like to have permission to withdraw this proposal for the time being.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

CANADIAN DOLLAR—MAINTENANCE OF FREE FLOAT—GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION IN EXCHANGE FUND—ACCEPTANCE BY OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the government of Canada and the Bank of Canada are still maintaining a clean, free float of the Canadian dollar as the minister assured us recently had been maintained at least since the commencement of the year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has intervened in the exchange fund only to maintain an orderly market.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether he has had any consultations with his counterparts in other countries in order to ascertain what their reactions will be to this movement by the government of Canada to intervene from day to day in the exchange fund? Has the hon. gentleman consulted his counterparts and can he assure us that this will be acceptable to them?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the countries represented in OECD understand Canada's position. As a matter of fact, when I was in Paris last week I chatted with the managing director of the International Monetary Fund who also has an awareness of Canada's position and why we are floating our dollar. A special auditing team of the International Monetary Fund, as is customary, visited Ottawa two weeks ago and had interviews with the governor of the Bank of Canada and its senior officers and with senior officials of the Department of Finance, the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and myself, and expressed understanding of Canada's position in this respect.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I point out to the minister that he did not answer my question. I should like to ask him how far the government of Canada would consider it appropriate to go in ironing out day to day fluctuations of the sort he has in mind? Would the minister indicate to what extent he would consider it appropriate for Canada to increase its holdings of foreign exchange within the doctrine he has announced in the House this afternoon?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing new in the doctrine in the terms in which I have replied to Leader of the Opposition. I would not want to speculate by way of an answer to him, except to say that the problems encountered by Canada in respect of the exchange rate are in no way unique. They are shared by other countries in the world as a result of the current weaker position of the U.S. dollar.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at the time the Minister of Finance held his discussions with the manager of the International Monetary Fund, did he or officials of the Bank of Canada disclose to the manager that Canada intended to conduct these, shall we say, evening-out operations, and what was the reaction of the manager of the International Monetary Fund to such information?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the manager of the International Monetary Fund and, indeed, all our trading partners in the world, are aware of the figures as they are published monthly, and no comment was made.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated that Canada's position was understood and approved. My question is, was the information disclosed to the manager of the International Monetary Fund that Canada would conduct these, shall we say, day to day evening-out operations to maintain a relatively grey float rather than a clean float?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that the figures are published every month and we put those figures directly into the hands of the International Monetary Fund.

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is he studying the high Canadian interest rates which undoubtedly are having the effect of attracting short-term foreign capital and thereby pushing up the price of the Canadian dollar? Is he looking into this question, and does the government propose to take any action in respect of the high interest rates in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if one were to look at the complete picture for an explanation of the current rate of the Canadian dollar as against other currencies, particularly the United States dollar, one would have to examine some of the underlying bases for the current weakness of the U.S. dollar, and also examine some of the counter factors that might be affecting the value of our dollar in the future, including the deficit on current account, both visible and invisible transactions, and the shortening of the capital account in terms of the influx of foreign investment in Canada.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands for one last supplementary question on this subject and then return to the matter later if necessary. We must try to make better progress today than we made yesterday. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has the floor for a last supplementary question, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Canadian interest rates are and have been for some time higher than interest rates in the United States, and therefore attractive to short-term United States capital, is the government doing anything about reducing Canadian interest rates as one means of keeping the Canadian dollar from going above the U.S. dollar?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, Canadian interest rates are responding in part to a very strong demand for credit against all the chartered banks and other financial institutions, which is a reflection of the active expansion in our economy compared with some of the economies in Europe and the United States.

MASSACRE AT TEL AVIV AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would he consider making a statement in the House on motions expressing the horror of Canadians at the atrocious, carefully planned, indiscriminate acts of terror and massacre against innocent civilians which took place at the Tel Aviv airport on Tuesday last?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is presently attending meetings of NATO in Europe. I will consider the suggestion made by the hon. member.

• (1440)

Mr. Brewin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister also consider looking into the question of tighter regulations in respect of more effective checking on the use of aeroplanes for the carriage of concealed arms? Perhaps that should be directed to the Minister of Transport but I direct it now to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has commented on this and answered questions on other occasions. If there is cause, I am sure he will be prepared to answer again a like question.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does he intend to make a statement on motions following the action taken recently by the Quebec government with regard to its intention of using part of the increase in the old age pensions which was granted through passage of Bill C-207?

FINANCE

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—PLANS TO CONTROL INCREASE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As housing mortgage rates have increased by half of one per cent since early March, give every indication of continuing to go up, and are considerably slowing down housing starts, has the government any plans to stop or slow down this dangerous rise or does it intend to let these rates continue to rise unchecked?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a good part of the question is hypothetical, but the government has introduced measures to increase the availability of funds in the residential mortgage market.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I still say to the Minister of Finance that what he is doing is obviously ineffective. Is he planning to take another look at this matter and take effective steps?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair indicated yesterday it would recognize certain hon. members early in the question period. The hon. member for Simcoe North.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED USE OF HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ALLOTMENTS AS INCENTIVE TO INCREASE NUMBER OF MEDICAL STUDENTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the increasing shortage of general practitioners in Canada, is the minister considering taking steps to ensure that the funds allotted by the health resources fund to medical schools are used more specifically as incentives to increase the number of medical students and are not merely used at the discretion of the board?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the funds are not allocated at the discretion of the board. The act is quite specific about the manner in which these funds are allocated. However, I would say the idea behind the hon. member's question is certainly worthy of consideration.

Have negotiations broken down between the parks branch and the residents of Kouchibouguac where a new national park is to be located? FINANCE

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—ACTION TO PREVENT INCREASE AND RETAIN PRESENT LEVEL UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I return to questions which were asked of the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the legislation announced with regard to some kind of a flow of mortgage money for housing does not necessarily guarantee a lowering of the mortgage rate, and in view of the fact that everybody expects mortgage rates to go up, would the minister be good enough to tell us whether the government is at all concerned about the increasing cost to home owners and home renters and whether or not he will deal with the matter in some way?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government's concern was reflected in the legislation just introduced to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. Lewis: I think the Minister of Finance ought to know better than to suggest that the legislation deals with the matter. May I ask the minister responsible for housing whether it is his intention to make certain, even though conventional mortgages in the private market may go up, that the mortgage rate under the National Housing Act through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be kept at least at its present high level and will not be permitted to go up?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the interest rate under the National Housing Act will be set in accordance with the law passed by Parliament.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, in view of the fact that his answer gives no assurance to anyone in the House or any home buyer or renter in the country—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that that is debate. He has sought and been granted the floor for a supplementary, not for debate.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister make certain that the law of Parliament will be so applied that the present high level of the mortgage interest rate under the National Housing Act will not go up further?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Has he been in touch with the Quebec government regarding the increase in the old age security pension of $15 a month? Recently, I told the minister that Quebec was getting ready to tamper with that increase, and the fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I would like the minister to be well aware of the facts.

Has the minister been in touch with the Quebec authorities and is he well aware that this province is getting ready to use these amounts paid by the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must ask a question and not make allegations. In any case, I would say that the question has now been asked and the minister could try to reply to it.

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Social Affairs in Quebec has made no representations to me directly concerning old age pensions. I have read in the press certain expressions alleged to have been made by him, and that is all.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO IMPROVE SERVICE IN RURAL MANITOBA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct a question to the Postmaster General but in his absence I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary or to an acting minister. Since postal services in the rural areas of Manitoba leave much to be desired in terms of efficiency, I should like to know whether any action has been taken on a letter I sent the department on May 5 in which I urged the government to look into rural postal services. If the government has done so, what steps is it prepared to take in order to speed up postal services to rural points in Manitoba?

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the question may I say I will look into the matter. I have not been informed of the letter being received but I will check into it and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Murta: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since it appears, at least to a great many people, that any efficiency that has been gained in city postal service has been gained at the expense of the rural areas—

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot make a statement; he can ask a question. All hon. members, I suggest, should look at the precedents and citations on the matter of questions. There are many things that cannot be included in questions. One of them is allegations or statements of alleged fact. The hon. member should ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Murta: Since it takes between six and eight days for letters to travel 40 or 50 miles, would the minister instruct his departmental officials in Winnipeg to look into this very important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question as asked is not in order.

USE TO BE MADE BY WHEAT BOARD OF HOPPER CARS TO BE PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT— POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASE OF OTHER TYPES OF FREIGHT CARS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the government's announcement that is going to purchase 2,000 hopper cars, is it the intention of the Wheat Board to use those cars mostly on unit trains from inland terminals or will they be used to carry grain from individual shipping points?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there will be no limitation upon the use which the Board, in consultation with the railroads may choose to make of these cars. I would expect them to be used more in the movement from individual shipping points than from inland terminals, but I do not exclude either.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my next question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact there is a chronic shortage of railroad equipment not only to haul grain but other commodities, and in light of the government's announcement of its intention to purchase 2,000 hopper cars, is it considering the purchase of refrigerator cars for potato movement in the Maritimes and livestock cars for the movement of livestock in western Canada in view of the inability of the railways to meet their responsibilities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look at the question of whether any further move on our part is required. I should think not.

Mr. Woolliams: Since the Minister of Justice said he plans to take a look at it, will he then make a further report to the House in reference thereto?

CELEBRATION OF HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY—INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO QUEEN OR OTHER MEMBER OF ROYAL FAMILY TO PARTICIPATE

In view of the 100th anniversary of the RCMP can he say whether or not an invitation has been issued to the Queen or to any other member of the Royal Family to participate in these celebrations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked a supplementary and the Prime Minister, of course, will have an opportunity to reply, but I take exception to hon. members asking supplementaries which I believe they themselves suspect are not true supplementaries. We have to try to recognize members in some order. One question could always be linked with another, and we could go through 35 supplementaries during a question period. That is not a proper way to proceed, but in this case the question has been asked and as it is important the Prime Minister may reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General held a press conference to indicate the arrangements that would be made to celebrate appropriately the 100th anniversary of the RCMP. I might add that as head of the government I frequently receive requests from provincial governments, municipal governments and other organizations to have the Queen present in Canada. Due to the fact that the longshoremen's strike has stopped every activity in Quebec harbours for several weeks now, could the minister inform us of the progress of the negotiations being carried out at present and when we can expect the end of this dispute since it is hurting trade as a whole in Quebec.

QUEBEC LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—TELEGRAM FROM QUEBEC TRUCKERS ASSOCIATION—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Labour.

Is he aware of a telegram sent to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada yesterday or this morning by the Quebec Association of Teamsters, expressing concern over the situation which may jeopardize the 1,000 jobs of those involved with the trucking industry? If so, what reply does the hon. Prime Minister intend to give the association, or what action does he intend to take to prevent such an eventuality?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet personally seen that telegram. I could reiterate that there is a procedure available to both parties, jointly or singly, to have this dispute between them settled. That procedure is laid out in the Labour Code and is provided for in the collective agreement which was signed six or eight weeks ago.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POLICY RESPECTING PREVENTIVE MEDIATION—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION BY MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that the situation is reaching chronic proportions, in view of the fact that the public interest is now being adversely affected, and in view of the fact that the minister's predecessor started preventive mediation, is this still the present minister's policy, and can he assure the House that in view of the catastrophic disturbance now going on he will attend on the parties personally and use his personal influence in order to get these people back to the bargaining table?

• (1500)

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure hon. members that it is our intention to continue and to reinforce and expand preventive mediation. I might point out that it was that very process which brought this model agreement into being which is now in such jeopardy. I want to reiterate that the procedure is there to be used, and that the two parties should make use of it. Mediation at this point simply takes them off the hook for failing to use the procedures they both agreed to use.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the fact that the minister does not believe that the public interest is being adversely affected yet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot make that kind of statement. He was recognized again for the purpose of asking a supplementary question, but it seems to me that the preliminary statement is debate. I suggest to the hon. member that this is not procedurally correct. He can ask a supplementary question, of course.

Mr. Alexander: I accept your admonition, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he is in receipt of a telegram from the employers dated around May 15 seeking arbitration and also seeking permission to prosecute under the law for violation of the terms of the agreement? If so, what has he done about it?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I did receive such a telegram but to the best of my memory it did not seek arbitration. Arbitration can be sought without asking the minister to provide it. The procedures are already there and both parties can agree to it. Arbitrators are designated in the agreement, they are available and they ought to be used. With respect to the second question on consent to prosecute, we have looked into that and declined because procedures are available other than prosecution which would not do the job.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—TELEGRAM FROM QUEBEC TRUCKERS ASSOCIATION—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

For further clarification, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he did in fact receive a telegram from the Quebec Association of Teamsters this morning or yesterday, and whether he has communicated the contents to the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did receive such a telegram, signed by . . . I do not have the text in hand but I remember receiving a telegram and in the normal course of events the text will be forwarded to the minister, if this has not already been done.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member for Sainte-Marie to ask a last supplementary question for very soon we shall be running short of time, unless we let other hon. members ask their questions.

Mr. Valade: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask a question—

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the attention of the Minister of the Environment regarding press reports which appeared today on the rising flood potential in several British Columbia river areas. I have particular reference to the situation in the Fraser River Valley. Can the minister say what preventive steps are being taken at senior government level? I understand the river gauge at Mission rose by one foot in the past 24 hours.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the situation is that while water levels are indeed high, they are not exceptionally high for this time of year. There is also a cooling trend which could moderate the flood threat. The hon. member asks what levels of government are in close contact. Our water management service is in hourly contact with the provincial department of water, lands and resources.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLEGED PROMISE TO REFER PENSION RATES TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand. In view of the fact that the minister made a commitment in the House on May 5 that the whole question of basic rates of pension would be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and in view of the fact that the Dominion Command convention passed a priority resolution to this effect, would he remind the minister to take action to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs before the end of this session?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that is a representation, a suggestion or a reminder. I would think the hon. member's representation must be deemed to have been noted. The hon. member for Meadow Lake.

INDUSTRY

SALT—POSSIBLE PURCHASES FROM UNITED STATES BY PFRA—ACTION TO ENSURE CONTRACTS FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister aware of the intention of the PFRA division to purchase salt from an American company in North Dakota, U.S.A. and, if so, is he going to take any action to rectify this situation so that Canadian salt producers can receive such valuable contracts?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and make a report to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Cadieu: In light of this recent situation, is the government going to review its purchasing policies generally and make a statement to the House on where potential Canadian suppliers stand?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I will answer this question after I have made an inquiry about the first one.

FISHERIES

LOBSTER—REQUEST FROM FISHERMEN IN DISTRICT NO. 4 FOR EXTENSION OF SEASON

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the low lobster catches in district No. 4 and the heavy investment of fishermen in that area in boats and equipment, has the minister given any consideration to requests forwarded to him by the fishermen to extend the season which closed on May 31 to a later date in the month of June?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly giving serious consideration to that submission, but I cannot personally guarantee at this moment that the season will be extended.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH DENMARK

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. On May 26 the minister indicated his willingness to make available to members the correspondence with Denmark on the Atlantic salmon issue. Can he now tell the House specifically when he will table that correspondence?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker. I thought it had already been made available to the hon. member, but I will check it out.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REFERENCE TO MERIT PRINCIPLE IN ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CERTAIN CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of his statement today and the reference to a committee of the annual report of the Public Service Commission with its comments on the merit principle in employment, would the Prime Minister agree to table the correspondence between the Minister of Finance and the Chairman of the Public Service Commission that deals with this question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the correspondence to which the hon. member refers. Perhaps he could let me know what he is referring to and I could consider the question.

Mr. Orlikow: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will discuss the matter with his colleague? That would be much easier.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN VOTE ON APPLICATION OF GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC FOR ADMISSION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if he could advise how the Canadian delegation to the World Health Organization voted on the application for admission from the German Democratic Republic, and could he indicate the reason or reasons for the stand taken?

CRIMINAL CODE

ALLEGED DEVELOPMENT OF SUITABLE BREATH CONTAINER FOR INDEPENDENT TESTING—POSSIBLE PROCLAMATION OF ALL BREATHALYZER SECTIONS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. As a breath sample container for independent testing of suspected impaired drivers is now on the market, will the government be proclaiming the unproclaimed parts of the breathalyzer law and, if so, when?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the news report to which I am sure the hon. member is referring. There is work going on as a result of the department's interest in a breath container, and several possible containers are being examined. There have been some optimistic forecasts about this equipment being available. It is our intention, as soon as the equipment is available in a way which is practical and workable, to proclaim the section.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY PAYMENTS TO PORK PRODUCERS—TIME LIMIT FOR APPLICATIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Following the statement made yesterday concerning deficiency payments to hog producers, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether a time limit has been set so that producers who have sold their hogs at public auctions may receive this grant?

• (1510)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about the receipt of applications by the Stabilization Board, may I say we certainly would like to have them as quickly as possible and in fact encouraged them to be submitted by a date several weeks ago. If he is talking about the processing of the applications after they have been received, we cannot give a set date because we must audit those applications against the receipts by plants and auction markets, and I cannot predict how long that will take.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a supplementary.

Would the Minister of Agriculture indicate whether producers must forward their applications in a specific period of time, because his statement could prompt many producers to apply. So, are they going to be considered late—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked his question, and there are only a few minutes left before the end of the oral questions period.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we take the position that those applications should be in now, but the more precise answer is no, there has not been an official cut-off date for receipt of applications.

DOMINION DAY

ALLEGED INTENTION TO CHANGE TO CANADA DAY—NUMBER OF LETTERS PRO AND CON

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the government's intention to change Dominion Day to Canada Day. I wonder, for the edification of the people, if the Prime Minister can indicate how many letters he has received pro and con? If he does not have that information, would he make inquiries?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is obviously asking for statistical information. The question ought to be placed on the order paper. If the matter is urgent, it can be raised at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me there is a sense of urgency about this matter in view of a question that was asked this afternoon and the statement made by the Prime Minister earlier. I believe that the Prime Minister could give some indication whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. The hon. member is questioning the judgment of the Chair. I suggest that the hon. member's question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Trudeau: Ask the question some other way.

ST. JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY—REQUEST THAT HOUSE NOT SIT ON MONDAY, JUNE 26

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Privy Council whether in the timetable of the business of the House, June 26 could not be considered a holiday to celebrate one of the two founding nations of Canada?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. McCutcheon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader what the business of the House will be tomorrow, and how far into the future a look into his crystal ball takes him as to the business for next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is another opposition day. Next week, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday will be opposition days. On Monday, we will resume the adjourned debate on the foreign takeover legislation, to be followed by the Wheat Board Act, the financial mechanisms legislation and the representation commissioner legislation. On Wednesday, we will begin with the election expenses bill and complete the uncompleted business of Monday.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, this point of order could perhaps take the form of a question to the President of the Privy Council on the statement he has just made.

Yesterday, agreement seemed to have been reached on the opposition day reserved for the Social Credit, namely next Thursday, but the minister has just said that the scheduled three days of opposition would be Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. Am I wrong, and if yes, will someone correct me?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest there be consultations between the hon. member and the parliamentary leader of the government.

[English]

I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on his own point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me to rise on a point of order in a way which may clear matters. There has been agreement among the opposition parties that Tuesday will be allotted to the Progressive Conservatives, Thursday to the Créditiste party and Friday to the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. I think Your Honour will find that there has been agreement among the four parties of this House to fix certain time limits on the speeches in today's debate. Since there is great interest in this debate and since so many speakers want to take part, we propose, on behalf of the four parties in this House, that the lead-off spokesman of each party shall be governed by Standing Order 58(13). This will provide 30 minutes for the mover and 30 minutes for the government spokesman, and 20 minutes each for the other two principal spokesmen. We propose, however, that all other speeches be limited to 15 minutes and that no one is to be granted overtime.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion made by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO COPE WITH INCREASING FOOD PRICES—NEED FOR COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards, or with the fact that supermarket profits have increased simultaneously at an unprecedented rate, and because these matters are of nation-wide concern they should be referred immediately to a Special Committee of this House for investigation and report by June 26, 1972.

She said: Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago Abraham Lincoln, the great liberator declared that the legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done but cannot do for themselves. At that time, the community's need was for roads, railways, the links of trade and commerce and for the productive machinery of the country. And, the government provided these things, or saw that they were provided by offering incentives and assistance to those who could provide them. Today, our Canadian community of people needs new forms of help, and it is about one of these that our motion today is concerned.

During the second World War, the leaders of the western world promulgated the Atlantic Charter. There was much interest in that charter. It refers to the four freedoms, the freedom of speech, the freedom of religion, the freedom from hunger and the freedom from fear. At that time we were somewhat complacent about freedom from hunger and freedom from fear. Particularly, freedom from hunger was far from our minds. We thought it concerned only those countries on the other side of the world which were undeveloped and not experiencing the benefits of the most abundant economy imaginable. Expressing this positively, let me say that the right to enough good food, which is necessary for proper health and energy, is a right which thousands and thousands of our Canadian people are still denied. So, they are denied the third freedom, the freedom from hunger, in the sense that they cannot afford a diet which will bring about proper health and energy. This freedom has still to be won for thousands of people in our country.

The government has now embarked on a survey of nutrition across Canada. That is an excellent idea. May I point out that the survey will not be completed until near the end of this year and will not be available until some time in 1973. I predict that the findings of this survey, when published, will be very similar to the findings of a similar, American survey. In this connection may I quote from the White House conference on Food, Nutrition and Health, Summary Report of January, 1971:

> One of the basic causes of malnutrition and hunger in the United States is poverty. Millions of Americans of all ages and in all parts of the nation simply do not have enough money to buy what they need in order to live healthy, productive lives.

• (1520)

If you doubt whether that also applies to Canada on the scale which Canada bears to the United States, let me remind you of the 1970 submission to the Senate Committee on Poverty by the Quebec Corporation of Professional Workers which found infant mortality in the poverty stricken areas of Montreal 35.1 per 1,000, twice that of other areas. It found one third of grade one poor children undernourished and one half suffering from emotional problems. It found three times as many of them with intelligence quotients under 80. Low intelligence, as explained in another 1970 report, can be accounted for by undernourishment. A child who is undernourished in his first months of life or whose mother is undernourished during pregnancy has less than the normal rate of cell division and ends up with fewer brain cells.

As the Castonguay report of 1970 put it, and I quote:

> A great lack of food during the first 18 months of a child's life prevents a normal cerebral development.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

That, Mr. Speaker, means for life. Montreal is the largest city in Canada. The second largest is Toronto. A study in 1969-70 by Dr. Ursula Anderson of the Hospital for Sick Children disclosed that children in the poorest areas of Toronto were three times more likely to die in infancy than those in the richest areas. Vancouver is the third largest city in Canada. Last August the Vancouver Sun ran a series of articles on the welfare system in British Columbia. A reporter asked one mother and I quote:

> How do you make do with four growing boys and a welfare cheque of $257 a month?

She replied:

> Towards the end of the month we cut down on food. We eat mostly soup and potatoes—we eat a lot of potatoes. We eat meat—oh, sometimes once a week. It is hard to make the food budget stretch—especially when you have boys.

Her boys were aged 10, 13, 15 and 16. What that kind of diet will do to their health in future years does not bear thinking about. When we consider that the farmers of this country are today getting less than half of the consumer dollar for food, we begin to realize that there are forces at work, forces that would not have been at work in the old days when farmers grew the food and sold it directly to the stores. Nor are people in dire poverty and on social assistance the only ones to suffer now. Large sections of elderly people on low fixed incomes and handicapped people like the blind, thousands of ordinary families from the Atlantic to the Pacific, simply cannot stretch their budgets to provide enough good food for health and energy. The job is getting harder and harder.

The government recognized that budgets were not enough for a decent life when, in their own budget this year, they provided some stretching for the old age pensioners and full time students. They then went on with a separate measure to assist in some way the veterans of this country. They knew perfectly well that many people's budgets will not stretch to provide a proper standard of living in this country. They knew that when they gave those tiny bits of relief in the tax bill last fall. But they are not prepared to come to grips with what is really going on in the undermining of the food and living standards of the Canadian homes across this country.

Economists generally agree that prices should not rise more than 2 per cent a year in order to have relatively stable prices. However, from February, 1971 to February, 1972, they rose almost two and one half times that desirable figure. Food prices rose by nearly 7.5 per cent from April, 1971 to April 1972, more than twice as much as the cost of living generally. Why is that important? It is important because food is the rock-bottom element in the living standard for people.

When we realize that people do not have enough to buy the proper food they need for health, nourishment and proper nutrition, we see that there is something very rotten, not in the state of Denmark in this instance, but in Canada. This steady and stealthy advance in food costs represents a direct assault on the living standards of the Canadian people. We are not doing a thing about it in this House. I am not crying about the rising cost of caviar, pickled snails or truffles. People who like these things are well able to take care of them in their budgets. People who ordinarily buy these things have the money to cover their rising costs. What I am assailing is the attitude of comfortable, well-fed people in authority who simply do not realize what so many Canadian families are going through and could not care less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about the cake?

Mrs. MacInnis: I will get to the cake in a minute. On how many days in this House has the government introduced discussions on the Canadian family, the conditions of living for future Canadian citizens and how Canadians are getting on with regard to food, clothing, rent and other such things? In this day and age, such problems should be central to our work in the House of Commons. The wellbeing of the Canadian family ought to be the central core of the planning of this government, if indeed it is prepared to do any planning at all. We remember the story of Marie Antoinette. When she was told the people had no bread to eat, she said "Let them eat cake." People in authority now are saying, when told about people who cannot afford steak, "Let them eat hamburger." But what happens when the price of hamburger goes up as well as all the other precious proteins which are essential for body building? When food prices rise, as they have in recent months, they rise most rapidly and to the greatest heights for items such as meat, fish and fresh produce, that is, fruit and vegetables. These are the proteins, minerals, vitamins and body building foods. If they are neglected in early childhood, and during the critical periods of life, such as illness, people can never really fully recover from what has happened to them.

To quote Canada's official food rules at this point is to rub salt in wounds that are deep and sore. The food rules of Canada are in this very colourful chart which has been widely published. This is a good thing. These foods are good to eat. They should be eaten for the three meals every day for good health. It states the quantity of milk children should have each day, as well as adolescents, adults and expectant and nursing mothers. However, as one authority in Quebec said a few years ago, what is the use of telling an expectant mother how much milk she needs to provide calcium in her bones and teeth while carrying the child when she does not have enough milk for the children already here? Such a mother will give that milk to the children who are already living and take her chances on the future.

Two servings of fruit or juice make a satisfactory source of vitamin C, ascorbic acid, such as oranges, apples, vitaminized apple or tomato juice. I have seen mothers look at fresh produce, wonder which is the cheapest and how they can make a little orange juice stretch, sometimes reconstituted orange juice or orange drink, hoping there are some vitamins in it. They cannot afford the real thing. These people have to rely on the staff of life, bread, with some vegetables and cereals. When you see people in the poorer districts of town walking around grossly overweight, you know why. In most cases it is a combination of not enough of the protein foods and proper foods. They have to depend on the fattening foods. On top of that is the frustration and misery that sends them nibbling on whatever they can get to try and still the pangs of frustration as well as the pangs of appetite. Telling the Canadian people they should have meat and fish and fresh produce when they cannot possibly afford them is simply adding insult to injury and rubbing salt into wounds that are already very deep and very sore.

What hurts and angers people at this point is to learn that at this time, when the protective foods have been going up in price so steadily and so stealthily, at this very time the profits of the chain stores, the supermarkets, have been going up. When they learn and read in the papers, for it is no secret, that in the first quarter of this year the profits of Safeway went up by 40 per cent, those of George Weston by nearly 50 per cent, and those of Dominion Stores by 300 per cent—yes, 300 per cent, Mr. Speaker—they feel they are being betrayed not only by the supermarkets and the chains but by this government which has allowed that to happen without lifting a finger to help them.

An hon. Member: The Department of Consumer Affairs.

Mrs. MacInnis: The minister is evidently not sufficiently interested to be here. Under this government it has become fashionable to draw red herrings across the trail when such delicate matters as supermarket profits are mentioned. I suggest to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) that this is one species of fish we need have no worry about conserving. The supply of red herrings is abundant and they are being used with great frequency. Someone says the supply of suckers, too. Yes, but the suckers are beginning to learn.

For example, the other evening when I was urging an investigation into supermarket prices, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) drew quite a few of these red herrings across the trail for my benefit. Very delicately and courteously he drew them across, and I noticed these red herrings as they passed by slowly. First, he told me that there had been no violations of the Combines Investigation Act on the part of the supermarkets. He added that if I had proof of any such violations, or a deep suspicion that any were taking place, the Combines people would be pleased to hear about them. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the use of a Combines Investigation Act if it is not to investigate? Instead, it would seem, the investigation is being left to others, though Heaven knows what those administering the Act would do with such evidence once it was to hand. I believe it is the duty of those administering the Combines Investigation Act to investigate situations of the kind my hon. friends and I have been bringing to their notice. Administration of the Combines Investigation Act is the responsibility of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and if the department is not prepared to protect the living standards of consumers, what is the use of it? What is the use of concentrating on such things as packaging, labelling, and minor annoyances though I will, of course, give the minister credit for what he is doing in this direction. What is worrying consumers is that they are being gouged more and more deeply for the food they have to buy. This is what the department and those responsible for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act should be looking into.

The parliamentary secretary then told me that because of the price war among the supermarkets last fall, prices had fallen so low that the supermarkets had only just been able to raise their heads again and show the sort of profits I have mentioned. He did not deal with the prediction by the President of George Weston that 1972 was going to be the best year ever in sales and profits. So, if they are going on to even greater heights, maybe the parliamentary secretary will discover some profits he will consider to be not in line. He said he had no objection to profits as long as they were in line. In line with what? That is what I should like to ask him.

From the standpoint of the consumer, these supermarket wars are phoney wars. They result only in being wars between competing great powers in the marketplace. The consumer is on the battlefield and the casualties on that battlefield are becoming increasingly numerous and severe, as the government sits idly by and refuses to inquire into the reason for them.

I referred the other day to a study recently made by an associate professor in the political science department at Simon Fraser University, Gary Rush, together with some students. In this study they found that a few major food chains, including those whose profit figures I referred to earlier, control the whole grocery selling business and often control a product from farm to store shelves. They are in the agro business just as they are in the business of selling groceries. They are in the business of mulcting the farmer just as they are in the business of cheating the consumer out of the value of his dollar. They have become masters in covering up their real price structure behind a façade of what appears to be competitive pricing. With the market controlled by a few giant chains, the few independent chains are so intimidated that it is not considered in their interests to risk profits at the expense of ensuring real competition. A few great food chains have the consumer by the throat and the phoney wars are carried on to decide which should survive among the chains. But they are all warring against the consumer.

Lest the government be inclined to dismiss the study carried out at Simon Fraser as arrant academic nonsense, I wish to refer to another report. In 1966, a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was established to examine credit buying. Later in its work the Committee addressed its attention to prices and the cost of living. At that stage of the proceedings I happened to be a member of the committee. On April 25, 1967, after months of hearings and deliberations—this was before the government became shy of witnesses appearing before committees as it is today—the committee tabled its report on prices and the cost of living. One of the concluding sections read in this fashion:

> Your Committee uncovered specific evidence of great concentration of market power. It came to public attention as a result of questions by your Committee and disclosed more particularly the so-called Weston Empire.
> This disclosure was an astonishing revelation and the enormity of the Weston complex surprised even the sophisticated. The far-reaching implications will take some time to assess. The Weston Empire reveals for the first time vast holdings and control over food and other related aspects of the economy which will need further investigation to reveal all the implications and to do this, more specific information will of course be required.
> The detergents and soap industry, it appears from the evidence, is controlled by three giants which among them have between 85 and 90 per cent of the total business.

We all know their names—Lever Brothers, Colgate-Palmolive and Proctor and Gamble.

> The five great corporate food chains and the voluntary chains control more than 75 per cent of the grocery business in urban areas and their percentage is increasing.
> In one part of the food processing industry, one firm controls 100 per cent of the market in the Maritimes and Western Canada—

Incidentally, the cost of living is up by 9 per cent in the Maritimes, now, as compared with the cost of living in Winnipeg, and that may have something to do with it. To return to the committee's report:

> —one firm controls 100 per cent of the market in the Maritimes and Western Canada and at least 80 per cent of the market in Ontario and Quebec.

• (1540)

> The domination of a few large corporations in some sectors of the Canadian economy is clearly evident and gives rise to the question, "Is this in the public interest?" Your Committee feels that the implications of this question must be fully examined.
> In view of this, your Committee recommends that a thorough assessment should be made of the organization of the food industry with the object of publicizing any monopolistic tendencies which may exist, of determining whether the market power of any group or groups is sufficient to impair the workings of a competitive market and whether there are any undue barriers to entry.

The recommendation is:

> That the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit (Prices) continue with its investigation of concentration in the food industry.

The date of this report is April 25, 1967. We are now five years further along toward monopoly. In addition to all these other chains which are referred to, the giants have emerged even larger than before, with wider and wider extensions. No longer are they merely concerned with food and allied businesses. They stretch their long octopus tentacles into every sector of Canadian business today, everywhere that the consumer goes to draw sustenance and support, to obtain nourishment or to buy clothing and other needs for living. The farmer is as much a victim as the city consumer. People living in the rural districts are also under the dominance and power of the chain stores.

In light of this sort of evidence which is five years updated, the New Democratic Party is moving this motion today. However, may I go back for a moment to this study at Simon Fraser, the little "Grocery Store Storybook", as it is called. Talking about the major food chains the study says:

> The price structure, the most vital element to the customer, is professionally hidden in a façade of competitive pricing. The major food chains cover up the real nature of their operations through fanfare marketing aimed at brainwashing the consumer into believing that products are priced competitively—
> Rather than price-takers, these corporate giants are price-makers, with each chain acting to maintain artificial prices. Except for minor differences (such as the "loss leader" items deliberately priced low to attract customers), prices on similar items do not vary much from one major chain to another. The result is a market that operates in the grip of the chains. Although very real and basic, the industry works hard at keeping this aspect of its merchandising from the public.

The time has come when this aspect of chain store control should no longer be kept from the public. This government should make up its mind once and for all on which side of the fence it is. Is it on the side of the 95 corporations that have so far been trying to keep it in office? Or is it going henceforth to be on the side of the people who for five years have been pleading with the government to launch an investigation into the operations of food chains, with the hold that they have on food prices and on the lives of people across this country?

This is one of the major problems with which the government should be grappling, and it must launch such an investigation if it is to show any concern at all for families, elderly people, people who are sick as well as ordinary people on low and moderate incomes in this country. It is for this reason that we move this want of confidence motion today, at a time when it is still not too late for the government to act. Let me tell the government that if it is at all interested in coming back in any strength after the forthcoming election, and before it has managed to alienate the consumer who is still so completely influenced by chain store brainwashing, it had better pay heed to what we request in the following motion:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards, or with the fact that supermarket profits have increased simultaneously at an unprecedented rate, and because these matters are of nation-wide concern they should be referred immediately to a Special Committee of this House for investigation and report by June 26, 1972.

My colleagues will follow up with other aspects of this control over our lives on the part of the supermarkets, but in closing may I make one final plea on behalf of those people of this country who are so defenceless, those who feel they are up against a faceless government that does not care and will do nothing to help them in their great need. I urge the government, if for no reason other than to show that they do have some humanity, to do what we request and send this question to a special committee that will hear witnesses, so that there can be full disclosure of the facts before Parliament adjourns.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we have no difficulty supporting the motion before the House, though we do have some difficulty trying to reconcile the method employed by the hon. member to give effect to her motion. I shall have more to say about that later on.

I should like to express my concern at the outset at the absence from the House of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) and his Parliamentary Secretary. The minister was here during the course of the oral question period, and I assume that it must be business of a most urgent nature to cause him to be absent from the House during this debate, the subject matter of which goes right to the root of the minister's portfolio.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is nothing more urgent that this.

Mr. McGrath: As my hon. friend has just said, we can imagine nothing more urgent that the subject matter of the motion that is now before the House. Having commented that the minister is absent and that he probably has an excuse for his absence, one wonders where his parliamentary secretary is since he, too, is absent today. Surely, his function should be to represent the minister in a debate of this nature if, in the course of pursuing his responsibilities, the minister himself must be absent.

I notice too that the former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, now Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), is also absent. I find this difficult to understand since I know of his great and continuing interest in the consumer and the subject before the House today. I understand that the Minister of State who speaks on financial matters will be replying on behalf of the government, so we shall listen to what he has to say with a great deal of interest. I do hope that the absence today from the debate of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has nothing to do with his new responsibility as co-chairman of the national Liberal campaign. One wonders just exactly where the interest of the present minister lies, whether in the cause of the consumer and the responsibilities that he has as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or whether in attending to the national campaign responsibilities of the Liberal party. We hope that the minister will honour us with his presence today and, perhaps will condescend to make a contribution to the debate on a matter that is of great concern to Canadians in all parts of the country.

The hon. member who introduced the motion referred to the report of the joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which was set up in 1966 and made its report in 1967. I am sure other hon. members will have more to say about that, but I think it is important to note that it was as a consequence of the report of that joint committee the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs came into existence and some of the consumer legislation we now have on the books materialized. Reference has also been made to the report of the Batten royal commission on the cost of food in the three prairie provinces. This royal commission also took a considerable amount of time to arrive at its conclusions and recommendations. I think it took almost two years to conduct its study of food prices in the three prairie provinces.

It is in this regard that we have some difficulty with the motion now before the House, the spirit of which we are in total agreement. It calls for setting up a special committee of the House of Commons to examine into and report by June 26 upon the subject of increased food prices and increases in supermarket profits. Assuming this motion were to be accepted and the government agreed to set up such a committee of the House, the provisions of Standing Order 42(1) would have to come into effect, which would mean another delay of 48 hours or two full sitting days. Even at that, the motion would be a debatable one, so presumably there would be a full day's debate before setting up the committee. This would not leave much more than two weeks for the committee to examine into the whole subject of increases in the cost of food and an alleged corresponding increase in supermarket profits.

If this motion were accepted by the House, during those two weeks this special committee would have to hear witnesses from all across the country, because this problem is national in scope. Consequently, we find it a little difficult to understand how the hon. member hopes to achieve all this in the space of two weeks. We feel the matter is an important one, and that a case has been made for such a study. The hon. member has made a case quite well, and recent statistics underline the need for such a study. However, could this House, through the vehicle of a special committee, do justice to that kind of study in just two short weeks?

The motion before the House is two-pronged. On the one hand, we have the subject of increased food prices and, on the other, we have the subject of substantial increases in supermarket profits. I suggest that both subjects could be dealt with separately. Indeed, perhaps a case could be made for dealing with them in that way. There is no doubt about the fact that increases in supermarket profits represent a contributing factor, probably a substantial one, to the increase in the cost of food in Canada, but this is only one factor, although perhaps a substantial one. I believe there are other factors equally important which contribute to the increase in the cost of food in Canada, which is taking such a toll and exerting such hardship on Canadians, especially those in the lower and middle income groups.

One of these factors which contributes substantially to the cost of food is the over-all cost of distribution. Connected very closely with the cost of distribution is the cost of transportation. When we think in terms of transportation we immediately begin to think in terms of Canadians who live furthest from the major producing and manufacturing centres of Canada. In other words, we think of the people who live in the extremities of our country, and the people who come under programs administered by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), whom I am very pleased to see in the House today for this debate.

I submit this is one of the major factors, and to substantiate that it might be worthwhile putting on the record the statistics referred to in a brief way by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). Taking the comparison of food retail prices, using Winnipeg prices in May, 1971 as the comparison point, we find that as of May, 1972, St. John's, Newfoundland had an increase of 9 per cent; Charlottetown, an increase of 9 per cent; Halifax, Nova Scotia, an increase of 3 per cent and Saint John, New Brunswick, an increase of 5 per cent. We are now getting closer to the major producing and manufacturing points in the country and find that the rate goes down accordingly. In Montreal, there was a decrease of 1 per cent; in Ottawa, an increase of 1 per cent, in Toronto a decrease of 1 per cent; in Regina, Saskatchewan, an increase of 4 per cent and in Edmonton, Alberta, an increase of 3 per cent. As we go further west, the increases rise. When we get to the city of Vancouver we find an increase of 7 per cent. Here again we are using figures based on Winnipeg, Manitoba prices for May, 1971.

I maintain there is a direct relationship between increasing costs of transportation and distribution and the increase in the cost of food in Canada. For example, in my own part of the country, the Atlantic provinces, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in one of its recent reports stated:

> For the eighth time in the past twenty-nine months, rail rates will increase on February 14, 1972. The increase announced by the Railway Association of Canada on behalf of the Canadian railways, will range from 4 to 8 per cent.
> The latest increase is another in what has become a pattern of an increase every six months since the lifting of the rail freight rate freeze on September 23, 1969. This succession of rail rate increases now stands at a cumulative total of 35 to 68 per cent (depending upon the rate level) for non-competitive rail rates and 19 to 40 per cent on competitive rail rates.

According to these statistics, I have placed before the House the Atlantic provinces experienced the sharpest increase in the cost of food for the year beginning May, 1971, using Winnipeg figures as the base. Perhaps it might be worthwhile to continue quoting from this Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission report as follows:

> While it may be argued that the railway rates were frozen for almost ten years prior to September 23, 1969, the accumulative increase enacted during the years immediately followed the lifting of the wartime prices and income freeze. In fact, for the lower rated traffic, the increase since September 23, 1969, exceeds the increase in any similar period since World War II.

Something must be done to curb this increase in freight rates. Not only is it contributing substantially to the cost of food prices in the Atlantic provinces and in western provinces, it is also substantially undermining the regional economic expansion policies for this government, because unfortunately these regional economic expansion policies are not programmed to government transportation policies. In regions such as the Atlantic provinces we find they are running at cross-purposes, one cancelling out the other. You cannot have a regional development policy without having a complementary national transportation policy. As I have just indicated, we do not have that by reason of the increases in freight rates in the Atlantic provinces since the freeze was lifted on September 23, 1969.

There is another factor which comes into play which I believe is very important. I refer to the direct influence the cost of living, particularly in increases in food prices, has on low-income families. The fact is that low-income families live in the areas on the periphery of Canada, such as the Atlantic provinces, eastern Quebec, northern Ontario, the western provinces and the northwest. It is really interesting to note that the latest figures I have indicate that the low-income families, the families with the largest number of children which are to be found in places like the Atlantic provinces and Quebec and whose earnings are in the $3,000 bracket, spend 27.9 per cent of the total family income on food. The percentage goes down as the income goes up. At the level between $9,000 and $10,000, the middle level, they spend 18.8 per cent of their income on food. Those at the level of $15,000 and over, the highest income bracket, spent only 13.4 per cent of their income on food.

Again there is a relationship between families living in the regions of Canada directly influenced by government transportation policies as a consequence of the increased freight rates. The people in these areas of the country have the largest families. This is the reason I find difficulty in agreeing with the methodology, if you like, adopted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway while at the same time making very clear that we agree with and intend to support the motion put forward by the hon. lady. We feel, however, there is another vehicle which can be used quite effectively. I will grant, Mr. Speaker, that this has not been successful in the past. Its record, as a matter of fact, has not been very impressive and it is about to die a natural death. I refer to the Prices and Incomes Commission.

This commission was established in June 1969. Its terms of reference were to inquire into, and report upon the causes, processes and consequences of inflation and to inform those making current price and income decisions, the general public and the government, on how price stability may best be achieved. Clearly the responsibility lies with this commission which is still in existence, although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated in a reply to a question that the Prices and Incomes Commission will go out of existence as of the end of June 1972. That answer may be found at page 1264 of Hansard for the present session. We have seen that the Prices and Incomes Commission, under its terms of reference, is in a position to give us the kind of national study a parliamentary committee would take at least a year or two to give us. A Joint Committee of the House of Commons and Senate spent a full year travelling across the country and making its recommendations. We have the report of the Batten royal commission in respect of three prairie provinces which is the result of almost two years of deliberations, hearing witnesses and making recommendations. We believe this is an urgent problem. Because of the urgency of the problem we believe the Prices and Incomes Commission could deal with the matter very quickly under its present structure and organizational set-up.

Therefore, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after 'standards' and substituting the following:

"and because the Prices and Incomes Commission has failed to inform the general public on how food price stability may best be achieved, should forthwith amend the terms of reference of the commission to require it to investigate and report thereon before September 1, 1972."

The motion as amended would then read:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards, and because the Prices and Incomes Commission has failed to inform the general public on how food price stability may best be achieved, should forthwith amend the terms of reference of the commission to require it to investigate and report thereon before September 1, 1972.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East has proposed an amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I have some reservations concerning the procedural acceptability of the amendment. I will hear hon. members if they wish to assist the Chair. I would invite them to direct their remarks particularly to what seems to me to be the situation. If the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East were accepted, it would seem we would in effect have a new question in that we would then be dealing with a reference to the Prices and Incomes Commission whereas the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway refers to a reference to a special committee of the House. This concerns me from a procedural standpoint. I think it is a new question. However, I would like to hear hon. members if they wish to assist the Chair.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this matter. The point is that the amendment is relevant to the main motion and is actually on the same subject matter. It is merely the latter portion of the amendment which would provide a different remedy. I think this is perfectly consistent. The main part of the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway remains in the motion. The amendment merely alters the general procedure in dealing with the problem. I believe it is certainly relevant to the original motion. I do not think I need refer to Beauchesne in too much detail. Citation 203, however, states:

The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto.

I think that is a clear and straightforward answer to the question which arises in Your Honour's mind. It is relevant. It is on the same subject matter as the original motion. That leaves it fairly broad. I believe that if one were restricted narrowly in respect of amendments, one would find difficulty in moving amendments. The hon. member who has just moved the amendment has not changed the subject matter of the original motion. His motion would merely alter the means by which the problem of the steadily rising food prices can be met. I think this is such a minor change in the nature of the motion, that it does not substantially affect it. I really cannot see any difficulty which would arise.

If the amendment were accepted and voted upon, it would merely mean that there would be concurrence in the motion has introduced and in her general statement. However the remedy would be slightly different. Instead of the subject matter being referred to a special committee for investigation, it would be referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission. I cannot see any real difficulty here.

• (1610)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me fairly clear that your concern about the amendment is justified. I am a little at a loss to understand why the mover of the amendment—although perhaps I am not at such a loss—left out the reference to the excessive profits of the supermarkets, something which in our view is relevant to the question of food prices. Perhaps the hon. member is not concerned about those profits as they relate to food prices. That is his business, not mine. This amendment entirely changes the thrust of the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). What she is seeking is an investigation by a committee of this parliament into the question of both steadily rising food prices and excessive supermarket profits. She is seeking to involve Parliament in the inquiry, and for Parliament to report before we rise for the summer recess, on the basis that no one can be certain we will be back next fall.

Because the matter of the rise in food prices is of such immense importance to the families of Canada, she wants the investigation to take place quickly, and the committee to report back by June 26 in order that some action can be taken, if action is found to be necessary by the committee. Without taking up any more of your time, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) was not right in saying that the amendment did not deal with the principle of the motion but merely the means. That is a brief and accurate way of saying the amendment does not do what he was arguing at all. The amendment changes the entire thrust of the motion which is for an inquiry by a committee of this parliament into rising prices and the profits of supermarkets, and not by some agency set up by the government somewhere. The two things are entirely different in principle, and I respectfully suggest that the doubts which you had were fully justified.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, as I read the motion it says:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices—

That seems to be the main thrust of the motion, the increase in the cost of food. One may blame it on the supermarkets or co-ops which handle food stuffs, or on anybody else, but the real thrust of the motion, as I see it, is to deal with rising food prices. What remedy have we got? The remedy the NDP recommend, and it has some merit, is that the matter be referred to a standing committee of this House. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has suggested that the matter be referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission. It is just a case of which remedy to adopt. In other words, Mr. Speaker, let us put it on a legal basis. It is a question of whether to refer a matter to the district court or to the Supreme Court trial division. It is only a matter of remedies. I would therefore ask you to consider the amendment in order. It does not change the substance of the motion at all. It only deals with the remedy, with how to arrive at a solution of the problem which has been placed before the House today by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on the observations of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). With respect, as one says here, I think he has misinterpreted the essence of the motion. The motion is not, as he would suggest, simply intended to deal with the problem of steadily rising food prices, but rather makes the specific suggestion that this problem is directly connected in some way with the simultaneous rise in supermarket profits. In other words, in the judgment of the mover of the motion these are not two separate factors. The mover obviously intended that the subject matters be combined, the matter of rising food prices and the related fact of increased supermarket profits. it would be incorrect to suggest that the motion only accidentally combines these two ideas. The one is inextricably linked with the other.

The second suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is that it does not matter which body looks into the situation, the Prices and Incomes Commission or a special committee of the House of Commons. I suggest that there is a world of difference. For many months, members of the NDP have made it abundantly clear that we hold the operations of the Prices and Incomes Commission to be of considerably low repute. We would not recommend to the House that that body look into food prices, or indeed into the prices of any other commodity. Therefore the mover of the motion decided that it would be much more appropriate to have a committee composed of the elected representatives of the people of Canada look at this question, and not the Prices and Incomes Commission. That is a fundamental difference which is overlooked by the hon. member for Calgary North.

There is a third area of difference between the original motion and the proposed amendment. The original motion calls for a report to the House, perhaps not a definitive, all inclusive report, but some kind of report, by the end of June. The amendment, completely contrary to that, calls for a report much later in the year. Therefore, I respectfully suggest that the amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the arguments, and I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I can only conclude that he was not present in the House or, if he was present, that he was not listening when I made my speech, because I made it very clear that we were concerned with the rising profits of supermarkets. However, I said that was only a factor. It may be a substantial factor, but there are other factors as well which the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) excludes. We were merely trying to make this motion a serious one because, as it is now worded, it is a two-pronged motion attempting to do two different things. It is concerned with the rise in food prices, and it expresses concern at rising supermarket profits. They are two different things, although related, and probably one contributes to the other.

The key word in the motion is the word "or" where it says:

—in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards, or with the fact that supermarket profits have increased simultaneously—

I maintained in my argument that the increase in profits was a contributing factor to the rise in food prices but that there were other contributing factors also, such as those I stated in my speech, for example, transportation.

The other point I would respectfully draw to your attention is the argument I used in my speech that this matter has already been studied by a joint committee of the two houses of Parliament, which took a year in its deliberations, and it was studied by a royal commission, which took two years in its deliberations. We question the seriousness of what the hon. member hopes to achieve when she says that she hopes to have this study completed in two weeks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect, the hon. member was arguing the substance of the matter. Are there any other hon. members who would like to assist the Chair?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the point of order in respect of this motion, I might say that I suppose any motion is amendable. The point to keep in mind in respect of a motion on an opposition day is that such motions come from one opposition party on one day and on another day from another opposition party, they are divided equitably amongst parties. On a day when one party moves a motion and a member from another party proposes an amendment to it, the effect of a vote on the amendment would be that the original motion would be pre-empted by another party. The government ought not to be in a position of interfering in such motions by the casting of its vote, if a vote had to be brought on the amendment. I would conceive the position of the government to be that we are here to listen on the days on which—

Mr. Woolliams: There are not many listening.

Mr. Deachman: —to listen to propositions—

Mr. McGrath: Where is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras)?

Mr. Deachman: —put forward by the member of the party that moved the motion. In the event that the amendment were brought to a vote at this time, the effect would be that the government would be able to choose the motion of one party or the motion as amended by another party, and thereby interfere in a debate essentially reserved for the purpose of the opposition.

Mr. McGrath: It is a non-confidence motion.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I just say what I think Your Honour has to decide. Having said that the NDP motion is in order, one must admit that there are two separate motions, food prices and supermarket profits. If it is in order to make two-pronged motions of this nature in the House, then we can put them forward with three, five, six, seven or eight prongs and we in the opposition are entitled to amend one of the those prongs. We were amending the second prong, the one on supermarket profits. It is that simple as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, the Chair is ready to make a decision. I really feel that my first thoughts, from a procedural standpoint, were correct. With respect to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), I will hear her if she insists, but I think we are on the same side in the procedural argument. I have indicated the ruling I would make, but if the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) would like to persuade the Chair of his view in the matter I will hear him.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to take part in this preliminary discussion until I heard the official whip of the government intervene a moment ago. He seemed to be suggesting that on an opposition day it would not be proper for any of the opposition parties, other than the one making the motion, to introduce amendments to it. I think that suggestion is completely off base. I want to reiterate what has already been said on this side of the House, that the amendment being moved by the official opposition is precisely on the subject matter chosen by the NDP for today's debate which is to the effect:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards,

During the course of debate there will be all kinds of suggestions, other than the profits of the food chains, why this situation has occurred. We feel that the Prices and Incomes Commission has a major responsibility in this matter, and we feel that along with the main subject of the motion we should stress, in an amendment, the basic responsibility of the Prices and Incomes Commission in this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I should like to thank hon. members who assisted the Chair on the procedural aspect. Initially, I indicated my doubts about whether the amendment could be accepted procedurally, and I have to confirm my original thoughts.

First of all, I want to deal briefly with the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Deachman) whose views were clarified and narrowed by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). Certainly, there are times and circumstances when a motion on an opposition day is amendable. Indeed, the Chair has allowed amendments, if not in this session, in the last session of this Parliament. On opposition days, however, we must look very carefully at amendments and the circumstances surrounding them, because if they change the direction or the impact of the motion, they are not acceptable. I think it would be unfair to opposition parties if such amendments were acceptable. This is, of course, in the interests of all opposition parties and the interests of fairness.

I think this amendment does change the substance of the motion on two points. In her motion the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has requested reference to a special committee of the House. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who proposed the amendment, would have the reference made to the Prices and Incomes Commission. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) argued fairly, and with some force, that the hon. member who moved the motion has a right to put her question before the House and have the matter determined by the forum or tribunal that she chooses. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has argued that it is really a case of one tribunal compared to another, as one would compare one court to another, but with respect I cannot agree that such is the case. I think we are talking about very different tribunals and that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has the right to choose the one she would like to suggest to the chamber for its consideration.

Hon. members have referred to the fact that if the amendment were accepted the reference to the question of profits of supermarkets would be removed from the consideration of the House. I think that is important and is a substantive part of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It seems to me that we would be changing it substantially, and much more than we are entitled to do if the amendment were allowed. The hon.

member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) referred to citation 203 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition and I would like to refer to paragraph (3) of that, which reads:

An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Some hon. members have argued that the motion and the amendment deal with the question of food prices, but where I feel the amendment is irrelevant and why I cannot accept it, is that the change of tribunal which I have referred to and the removal of the question of supermarket profits would both be substantive changes.

• (1630)

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us refers to something everybody knows.

The problem of steadily rising food prices is seriously affecting the standard of living in Canada. We all regret the fact, but nobody will do anything, and especially not this government whose inconsistent policy makes the situation even more complicated.

Food is an essential need. Rich or poor, whether living in a city or in the country, we always have to eat in order to survive. Therefore, a so-called just society must make food products readily accessible to all people.

All individuals take part in some way or another in production. They are fully entitled to get food at reasonable prices. Systematic exploitation on the part of unscrupulous dealers cannot be tolerated in that field. In a country such as ours, where food resources are inexhaustible, it is inconceivable that thousands of citizens should find it so hard to eat adequately.

What is lacking? Meat, cereals, vegetables, fruit, in short all foodstuffs are in plentiful supply. Instead of letting taxpayers enjoy the generosity of Divine Providence, we think up all kinds of ways to give producers a bad time, allegedly to reduce production and maintain prices. Western grain producers as well as Quebec milk producers could say much about that. To pay the farmers of an area so that they will not grow wheat and penalize others for producing too much milk, that is a policy both wrong and stupid.

Before talking about real surplus, let us begin by providing all Canadians with good food in abundance. Then, should there be a surplus, let's share it with the have-not countries where thousands of human beings die from starvation every day.

We say again and again that the problem in this country is not one of production but rather of purchasing power. We could even state that the cost of food products would be immaterial if every family had the necessary income to buy them. In other words, the minute we understand that an adequate economic policy must be directed towards perfect balance between production and consumption, the problem will be settled.

In this intricate and artificial system to which we are now subjected, unfortunately there is room for all kinds of abuses. As pointed out in the motion introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), "supermarket profits have increased simultaneously at an unprecedented rate". Everywhere swindlers are at work. Under any pretence, the prices will be boosted. And all that, mainly in order to boost profits.

Those are not gratuitous arguments. Just analyze the huge difference between the producer's cost and the consumer's price. For example, pork producers get about 30 cents a pound whereas consumers pay from $1 to $1.70. This difference is much too considerable: it means a gross profit of about 500 per cent to the middlemen. So no wonder pork producers are subsidized while corporations such as Canada Packers, for instance, are making net annual profits of $15-odd million.

I quite agree that these matters are of nation-wide concern and should be referred immediately to a special committee of this House for investigation and report by June 26, 1972, as suggested in the motion. But we will meet with very little success unless we define more precisely the actual reasons for current problems.

All kinds of reasons are used to oppose our suggestion of balancing production and consumption by increasing the purchasing power. Some horrified people even tell us: This would mean inflation! For goodness sake, let us agree on the meaning of words and let us know what we are talking about.

During a television program a dogmatic economist defined inflation as an immoderate increase in prices caused by disproportionate supply and demand, the former being unable to meet the latter. In other words, too much money chasing after too few goods.

Well, a representative of the Quebec Department of Industry and Commerce—the same thing could probably have been seen in the federal government—replied to the traditional economist that his definition did not correspond to reality. Tradesmen do all they can to try and sell; manufacturers have to curtail production; they devise programs to keep their employees, who are threatened with unemployment and who rely on their unions for protection through a guaranteed pay.

There is no inflation in Canada. The economist, who has both feet in business, proves it. However, effects similar to traditional inflation—rising prices—are partly imported from other countries and partly due to a pyramid of interest which citizens have been paying for 20, 30, and 50 years on public development, a pyramid made of taxes which are included in the price of goods. The result is a rise reflected in salary increases, and it is still a vicious circle.

• (1640)

On the other hand, the living-room economist, sitting with his feet up on his desk, doctus cum libro, reasons on the basis of principles developed centuries ago while the economy was one of deprivation, when everybody had to work for 10 or 12 hours a day. Every craftsman or professional had to get part of his food or his clothing out of the earth himself. In order to reduce inflation, such economists only create unemployment, which gradually forces people to go on welfare. An increase in taxes and salaries then follows, and the same vicious circle starts again.

The undue increase in food prices is a crime, especially as our society, by accepting the present economic system, tolerates poverty in the midst of affluence.

Let an investigation be made in order to eliminate exploiters, trusts, and finance sharks. This would certainly be a good thing, but as I have said before, it is absolutely necessary to go further and to find a permanent remedy.

The government alleges that there is sufficient purchasing power to buy any product at the market price and that if some people have not enough money, it is because others have too much of it and the problem is that of uneven distribution which should simply be straightened out.

That was the theme of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was speaking to us in 1968 about the just society. I will not dwell on the results achieved in 1972. We are well aware that the Canadian people is still awaiting the birth of that just society.

We of the Social Credit party do not accept that. There is a serious deficiency in the system of distribution of wealth which should be weeded out. We have already suggested a formula providing more benefits to the people from the abundant riches that are produced and available, without depriving anyone of anything.

We must at all costs remember some day to give the people, in addition to the legislative, executive and judiciary powers, the monetary power which has been described thus:

> A monetary power vested in an agency similar to the judiciary apparatus. But it would include qualified accountants instead of judges. Accountants who, like judges, would be independent from politicians in power in the performance of their duties. Additions, subtractions or rules of three would be based on statistics that are not within their control; on production returns and on the consumption of the country resulting from free activities of free producers to meet the needs freely expressed by free consumers.
> This means that money and credit would only be a reflection in numbers of economic realities. The act creating such a monetary power would assign that purpose to the body thus set up. The agency would have to supply the financial credit required to enable the people to order the goods they need on the basis of the national production capacity.

Mr. Speaker, when we have managed to solve the real causes of the problem, as I have just explained, we will have contributed to freeing the Canadian taxpayer, and we will no longer witness the type of situation we are now subjected to, that is having to face outrageous increases in prices when Canadians can hardly manage to make ends meet, and this, because of the negligence of our leaders.

[English]

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend the regrets of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras), at his inability to be present in the House this afternoon. Unfortunately, he is required to be elsewhere on an urgent matter of government business.

I rise to speak to probably one of the more cleverly worded motions that has been put to the House in a long time. This is almost like being asked whether you have quit beating your wife. Under the terms of Standing Order 58(9), we have, of course, a no-confidence motion. The government must oppose it. Superficially, it would appear that this presents the sort of thing that members of Parliament, whatever their party, would have a great deal of difficulty in opposing. However, it actually has to be opposed because of its premises, as well as the fact that the conclusions it reaches do not stand up to factual examination.

Supermarket prices have not been rising steadily and chain store profits have not increased at an unprecedented rate. It is true that supermarket profits and food prices have recently been going up, but an analysis of the matter does not indicate that the supermarket chains are either profiteering or are solely responsible for the increase in food prices.

Let me first deal with profits. During late 1970 and continuing to about mid-1971, a supermarket price war was in progress in central Canada. That had severe effects on the profits realized by supermarket chains. Dominion stores, for example, had their net income per sales dollar for the year 1971 drop to four tenths of one per cent in 1971 from 1.4 per cent in 1970. It rose back to 1 per cent of sales in 1972. In 1967 and 1968, this figure was 1.7 per cent. It was obviously as the result of the price war that Dominion Stores profit margin dropped substantially. They have since recovered somewhat, but have not approached the profit margins of the pre-price war period.

Similar results are found in analysing the financial statements of other supermarket chains. Of course, if one compares, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) does, the difference between the better profits in 1972 and the very low profits in 1971 while the price war was in progress and expresses the increase as a percentage, it appears very substantial. In addition, this is contributed to by a very substantial increase in total sales. The present government holds no particular brief for supermarkets or their policies. On the other hand, it has no reason to believe that they are treating the consuming public unfairly in terms of prices. Until there is some reason to do so, the government is strongly opposed to singling out one particular sector of the business world and making it a scapegoat.

The Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act has had a watching brief over the behaviour of the retail food industry for years, particularly in the years since the 1959 report of the Royal Commission on Price Spreads headed by Andrew Stewart. This report found that the outstanding development in food retailing during the period which was surveyed was the growth of the large voluntary chains. These voluntary chains are operations like IGA in which independents join together to get the advantages of mass buying. The royal commission reported that the growth of these voluntary chains had been greater proportionally than the growth of the corporate chains which threatened to put the independents out of business. Contrary to the impression left by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the voluntary chain movement has grown apace and constitutes a very strong competitive restraint upon the power of the corporate chains to raise prices unduly and, even more important, provides a positive impetus for competitive pricing in the industry.

I should also note the valuable work done by the Batten commission which reported to the premiers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba just a few years ago on the food industry in those provinces.

The Combines Director is required by the statute to commence an inquiry whenever he has reason to believe that the Combines Investigation Act has been, or is about to be, violated. Two types of offences under the act are particularly to be watched for in an industry of this kind: the companies might enter into agreements with their competitors to fix prices or otherwise to present or lessen competition unduly, or one or more of them might by acquiring competitors reach a dominant position in the industry so that competition would be lessened to the detriment of the public. The Director of Investigation and Research is aware of these possibilities and if he has reason to believe that any such offences have taken place, is required by law to commence an investigation.

Canadian policy toward prices in general, except during the second world war, has been to avoid any system of government control in the private sector, leaving competition itself to safeguard the interests of the public. Two royal commissions on prices and price spreads—the Curtis commission in 1949 and the Stewart commission in 1959—gave us no reason for departing from this policy. The Combines Investigation Act has been in existence throughout to ensure that any undue interference with the public interest in free competition could be dealt with by the courts after administrative investigation through the wide powers given to the Combines Director by Parliament.

In his last annual report, that for the year ended March 31, 1971, the Director reported at length upon a study made in his Research Branch into Concentration in the Canadian Food Retailing industry, and the changes which took place in the decade 1958 to 1968, that is the period covered by the Stewart Commission. Hon. members would do well to consult this thorough analysis, which is found at pages 16 to 20 of the report, and which includes a number of comprehensive statistical tables, made public for the first time. The conclusion of this study was that the structure of food retailing in 1968, the last year for which full statistics were available, was more conducive to competition than it had been ten years earlier. The corporate chains as a whole had somewhat improved their position in the market, but the largest ones had a slightly smaller share than they had enjoyed in 1958. Although unaffiliated independents had lost considerable ground, independents affiliated into voluntary chains as well as small corporate chains had markedly improved their positions during the 10-year period.

The structural conditions described in the study were considered to be consistent with the existence of the "price war" which was raging between the chains in late 1970 and the first five months of 1971. The study nevertheless concluded that the director should continue his vigilance because in some cities a few chains had a large share of the market. To give the leading examples, it was found that the three largest chain stores had 60 per cent of the total retail food sales in Edmonton, 49 per cent in Halifax, 37 per cent in Montreal, 26 per cent in Ottawa, 64 per cent in Saskatoon, 41 per cent in Toronto, 47 per cent in Vancouver and 44 per cent in Winnipeg. All chain stores combined did 63 per cent of the Edmonton business, 57 per cent in Halifax, 42 per cent in Montreal, 35 per cent in Ottawa, 59 per cent in each of Saskatoon and Toronto, 55 per cent in each of Vancouver and Winnipeg. For the whole Canadian retail food market, the three largest chains did only 21 per cent of the total business in 1968, and all chain stores accounted for less than 43 per cent. The largest 15 chains did 37½ per cent of the total retail food store sales in Canada. I am sure these figures are much lower than many people have been led to believe and that many will be surprised to know how much competition there is in this industry outside of the corporate chains.

With a structural picture such as I have described, moreover, it is not surprising that there has been sharp competition among the food chains. On several occasions price competition has become so strong as to be labelled by the public and the press as "price wars". As I have already intimated, in the fall of 1970 and for the first five months of 1971, such a price war was under way. It was quite prolonged, and much discussed in the press and in the trade journals. Prices become so low that many of the retaining grocery independents were writing to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs complaining that the independents were in imminent danger of bankruptcy.

Many Members of Parliament, including prominent NDP members, were forwarding these complaints to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs advancing in the strongest language the view that the food chains were engaged in a policy of selling groceries at prices unreasonably low. They represented this as a conspiracy to drive the independent grocers out of business. It was a very difficult period for the minister and the combines director, both of whom were deluged by these complaints yet had to turn them aside because there was no evidence of anything except sharp price competition in which individual chains were trying to increase their share of the market by outdoing each other in their low price appeal to the consumer. The minister was very sympathetic to the plight of the small retailer, but had to recognize that the greater efficiency of the chains made it possible for them to buy at lower prices, to minimize their costs, and this to provide needed food to the consumer at low competitive prices.

As I have already indicated, however, this prolonged price war cut sharply into the profits of the corporate chains. There was a large drop in the ratio of net profit to sales for the 1970-71 period, and even though the 1971-72 figures recently announced show considerable improvement, the ratio is still far below the average for the last several years.

Moreover, there is still more recent evidence that there has been a resumption of the price war. Early this year A & P test-ran a discounting program in Southwestern Ontario and by May of this year put it into effect in all major centres in Ontario and in Montreal. Since A & P began this program Dominion Stores, Steinberg's and Loblaws have indicated that we may be in for another supermarket price war similar to the one in late 1970 and early 1971. At the annual meeting of George Weston Limited on May 25, 1972, the Chairman predicted that food price wars and other fights between supermarket chains are going to last for some time. He is quoted as saying:

—these scrappy days in this particular industry are apt to last for a long time to come—

—I say to you and I say it with some thought that this fight in supermarket business is going to go on for a long, long time.

I would now like to take a close look at what has been happening to food prices. I feel it is important that I do this because there does seem to be a good deal of confusion about food price trends. Food prices in Canada are measured from month to month by Statistics Canada in assembling the Consumer Price Index. The most recent reading on our consumer price levels is for April, 1972. We have comparable data going back many years.

Looking at the most recent changes in the food component of the consumer price index in a suitable historical perspective one cannot help but notice the extreme volatility in the month to month movement of the food index. During 1971 we experienced monthly increases of as high as 2.2 per cent and monthly decreases of as much as 1.6 per cent. One cannot talk about food price trends on the basis of individual monthly movements.

Mr. Benjamin: What about yearly?

Mr. Mahoney: I am coming to the annual figures. Our data are not unique in this respect. Food prices in the United States have also exhibited substantial volatility in their month-to-month movement.

Looking back over the record of food prices changes in Canada one cannot help but notice as well the regular seasonal patterns in the change in food prices. In the most recent month available, April, the index for food was up 0.9 per cent from March. This change was about the same as that recorded on average in the same month over the past four years. In the cycle of pricing of different food items it turns out that the food index in April typically rises and we should not be surprised by this. Last September the food price index dropped 1.6 per cent but that, too, was a seasonal change. Over the preceding four years it had declined in that month by an average of some 1¼ per cent. As a result of both the volatile month-to-month changes in food prices and also as a result of the regular seasonal pattern of food price change, one has to be extremely careful about inferring trends in food prices from data for individual months. One has to look at the food price index in a longer term perspective.

What is a suitable perspective for looking at food prices? Usually, the per cent change from the same month a year earlier provides an adequate perspective and avoids the problems I have just mentioned. But this is not so at this time. Between August and December of 1970, at the time of the supermarket price war, there was a precipitous drop in food prices in Canada: the food price index fell 4.8 per cent in only four months or at an annual rate of 15 per cent.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, could we have the author of this speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Mahoney: This brought food prices to an unsustainable low level by the end of 1970. But they did not rebound to their mid-1970 levels overnight. By April of 1971 the food price index was still well below its peak of the preceding year. The effects of non-sustainable special factors were still being felt and further increases were bound to come, and they have. Because of that situation a year ago, the year-to-year per cent changes in current food prices can be very misleading as an indicator of food price trends.

What are the facts? While food prices were up 7.1 per cent over the past 12 months, if we look back to April of 1970, the increase was 5.2 per cent—an average annual rate of increase over the past 24 months of only 2.6 per cent. This is a full percentage point below the average annual rate of increase in food prices in the last half of the decade of the sixties. Viewed in the right perspective, so as not to be confused by the volatile month-to-month movements in food prices, by the recurring seasonal patterns of food price change, or by the special temporary effects on food prices of the supermarket price war, we see that food price trends have in fact been better on average over the past two years than they had been for a number of years before that.

With food having such an important place in the spending pattern of consumers, lower average rates of food price increase over the past two years have benefitted all Canadians. After tax incomes of persons in Canada have increased by almost 9 per cent per year, on average, over the past two years. After allowing for the average increase in food prices of only 2.6 per cent over the past two years, it is quite clear that average living standards of Canadians have indeed improved markedly.

In conclusion, my submission is that the motion should not be supported. Opposition members who propose such motions keep vacillating between two untenable positions. When the price war is on and prices and profits are low, they are beseeching us to get prices up for the sake of small independent grocers whose livelihood is threatened. Then as soon as a period of stability causes some recovery in prices and profits, they call stridently for prices to be reduced in the interests of the consumer. Naturally, in their irresponsibility they listen to whoever is being hurt by current conditions and they call for the best of both worlds.

For our part the government earnestly requests all corporations and individuals concerned in the production and distribution of food for domestic consumption to do everything they can to make themselves more efficient, to cut costs, and to provide the necessities of life to the consumer at the lowest possible prices. We do not expect them to forgo their legitimate profits. If they do this, if they do it within the law, and especially if they do it in a spirit of enlightened competition, the structure of the industry will take care of itself. If the most efficient organization of the industry requires it, the chains will be able to continue and to flourish without government interference under our free enterprise system. We call upon them to do all in their power to keep their prices low. We do not want to see them harassed by unnecessary investigations, whether by parliamentary committees or other bodies.

On the other hand, if persuasive information can be sent to the Combines Director to lead him to think there has been any violation of the Combines Investigation Act, he will immediately commence an investigation as required by the law. In any event, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will continue to be vigilant in maintaining the fullest information about the industry, so that if there should develop any detrimental trends they will be quickly identified and necessary corrective measures proposed to safeguard the public interest.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member sits down would he give us the author of the speech he has just delivered?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, one of the great weaknesses of this "just society" government that is temporarily in power today has been its failure to deal with the problem of the rising cost of living. In 1967 and 1968 inflation and the effect upon the consumers of Canada of its growing intensity was felt for the first time. Let me quote some figures as I begin my brief remarks this afternoon, which will demonstrate that the present government has completely failed to cope with this problem.

In the 1968-71 period, the increase in the cost of living was 3.9 per cent per year. In the most recent year, 1971-72, the consumer price index increased by 4.6 per cent. Just by way of comparison, I would point out to hon. gentlemen that in the period 1960-63 the increase in the consumer price index was 1.3 per cent—

Mr. Olson: 1963 was the most disastrous year in the history of Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: —which is a percentage that is possible under sound and stable administration. I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) referring to that period as the most disastrous period in the history of Canada for the farmers.

Mr. Horner: Tell him about the 1970 net figures.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would think that the record speaks for itself, and the farmers will answer that query in no uncertain terms when they have the opportunity at the polls in the not too distant future. The Minister of Agriculture was speaking for a different party in those days—

Mr. Olson: And he will be speaking later today, too.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and he was of much the same opinion then as we are at the present time. Admittedly, the government has tried to cope with this problem, as it is still trying to cope. It introduced a new Department of Consumer Affairs early in the present regime. It introduced the Prices and Incomes Commission in 1969. But we must conclude that both of these organizations have failed dismally to deal with the problem that we are debating this afternoon, which is the soaring cost of living particularly as it affects such basic commodities as food and housing.

We are especially concerned this afternoon with the rising cost of food, but by the by it appears that the cost of housing is going to increase significantly because it has been indicated that the mortgage rate in the next few weeks will rise to the unprecedented height of 10 per cent. It is a strange paradox that while the cost of living has been increasing during the present regime, the cost of government has been going up enormously in proportion. Another part of the paradox is that while the cost of government has been going up with the addition of new departments, boards and so forth, the effectiveness and efficiency of government has gone down in proportion. The government has blown hot and cold in dealing with this issue.

I am going to deal briefly with the role the Prices and Incomes Commission has played in this matter; but first of all I want to point out that the first minister of this House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has spoken with an uncertain voice during the past four years of the rising cost of living. In 1969, we heard this from the right hon. gentleman:

> The government has done beautifully in fighting inflation

On November 11, 1971, speaking in London on the question of inflation he said:

> —we haven't licked it and we said we would.

On January 9, 1972 the Prime Minister said:

> I think we tackled the problem of inflation in a serious way . . . almost too much determination.

In December 1969, he said:

> Inflation could destroy the Canadian middle class, which I regard as the basis of a lot of stability in our society.

The villain of the piece is not necessarily related to the increase in profits of chainstore markets, nor the increase in wages of the labour sector of the economy, although this has been the scapegoat selected by the Prices and Incomes Commission over the years. The villain is not necessarily the middleman involved in the food production process, although this is an area that could stand some scrutiny, as could others in the complex production process with which we are faced today. The villain is not the farmer, although he sometimes gets the blame for the increase in the cost of food. Under this administration, the farmers have been getting a lesser share of the food dollar. Farmers have had the worst bargaining position and the least support from this government. Instead of helping to improve the position of farmers in the food production chain, this government of the just society has completely neglected their position, and I think that could be demonstrated if I had the time this afternoon.

The most vulnerable is the commission set up by the government to deal with this matter, the Prices and Incomes Commission. As pointed out by my colleague, who endeavoured to introduce an amendment this afternoon, this commission was instructed to deal in a forthright manner with the problem of increasing cost of living brought about by runaway inflation. It was instructed to bring in reports from time to time which would make it possible for Members of Parliament and the people of Canada generally to determine who were the villains of the piece. Recently John Meyers, writing in his financial column, pointed out that there is such a report available but it is sitting on the desks of the ministers of the government, and that every attempt to have a look at it has been refuted and turned back by this just society government. Let me give you a few of the facts contained in that report which indicate precisely where the villain is.

This afternoon the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), the Minister of State with some responsibility for financial affairs, took great pains to exonerate the chain stores, and well he might for this unpublished report of the Prices and Incomes Commission points out that the blame lies squarely on the government for its failure to come to grips with the increase in the cost of living. It says this increase is due to the rapid acceleration of government spending at an annual average rate of 14 per cent during the years 1965 to 1970. That is precisely the period of time when inflation has tended to get out of control. Let me present some further information from that unpublished report. It suggests there has been an increase in the weight of taxes over that period, an increase of an average 7.3 per cent per year per unit of real national output, reaching a peak of almost 10 per cent in 1969 when taxes accounted for more than the total inflation experienced during that year. The difference was made up by a sharp decline in corporate profits.

This report contains valuable information that should be made available to hon. members of the House. If we had that information before us this afternoon we would obviously have a much more realistic discussion. Under its terms of reference, the Prices and Incomes Commission has the responsibility of tabling that report, because that commission was not set up to protect the government from findings that are politically embarassing. Obviously, the words I have referred to this afternoon indicate that if the report become available it would be embarrassing to the government. Before the Prices and Incomes Commission completes its lack-lustre career, it is on the way out and has overstayed its welcome now by several months, and is due to expire at the end of June—it should be allowed to make the report available to the people of Canada in order that we might have a reasonable appreciation of the real villain in respect of rising costs to consumers of basic products such as food.

There is one other point I should like to bring before the House before concluding my remarks this afternoon, and that is the failure of the government to bring a competition act before Parliament which would be acceptable to the people of Canada. Bill C-256 has had a checkered career. It has not yet reappeared on the order paper during the current session of Parliament. If we could get a competition act which would deal with the villains behind the scenes, causing outrageous increases in the price of food, we would not have to call together a special committee of the House of Commons, as this motion suggests. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) has promised a competition act which would help to keep the economy of Canada on a stable basis. The sooner the government moves to deal with this problem, the sooner we will have the fires of inflation under control and the sooner the people of Canada will have an assurance that the value of their dollar will be maintained at a reasonable level for a reasonably long period of time.

With the addition of commissions and administrations designed to deal with rising costs, and the creation of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the government promised to take care of the interests of the consumer. This produced a psychological attitude towards buying on the part of the public of Canada, which I think has helped to aggravate the problem rather than resolve it. Private consumer groups in this country are doing a good job in attempting to protect the rights of consumers. I should like therefore to put before this House a few suggestions the government might consider in respect of this consumer philosophy. I think the adoption of these suggestions would prove effective.

The government should consult with all groups and associations interested in consumer affairs. It should assist the Consumer Council of Canada to become a truly effective advisory body to the government. It should publish reports of the Consumer Council and make them readily available to the public. The government should more clearly define the role of the Consumer Council to make it more active in establishing the rights of the consumer and in recommending specific ways the government could act to establish these rights. It should make more use of the mass media in making the Canadian consumer aware of consumer laws and regulations. It should establish national standards of safety and ensure that all products for sale in Canada meet these standards. If the government would use the Consumer Affairs Department, which it has established at such exorbitant expense, then perhaps we could come to grips with some of the problems which have been outlined here today.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex): Mr. Speaker, both as a producer and a consumer, I thought I should take part in the debate today. I believe one of the greatest misunderstandings Canadians have is that they spend too much of their earnings on food. Great emphasis is placed on this portion of their cost of living. Every time Statistics Canada releases figures, the news media are quick to point out how much the index has risen in respect of food prices. I have in my hand a recent United States publication. It is headed "What Farmers want you to know about" and explains the cost to the consuming public as well as how much the producers receive for producing tremendously high quality food. It reads:

> Is your family eating meals that rate fair to poor by government nutritional standards? One out of two consumers does every day. And high-income families average less food value for their money than low-income families.

One of the greatest misconceptions people have is that the people who earn the most money have the most nutritious and healthy diet. It has been proven by studies that this is not true. The publication continues:

> Half of the people in the U.S. are getting diets that are rated fair or poor by the National Research Council. A USDA survey shows the U.S. family diets aren't even as good as they were 15 years ago!
> Why? There's a variety of reasons. It may be due to dieting; or snacking; or eating out more. But you can do any or all of these things and still have a nutritious diet by making a balanced selection from America's abundant supply of food.
> Calcium, iron, thiamin, riboflavin and vitamin A are the nutrients which most often fall below the recommended level. Except possibly for iron, all are readily available in a balanced diet of meats, milk, vegetables, fruits, eggs and cereal products.

As producers of these foods, farmers, and the people who work with them in government, know a lot about food that they wish every consumer knew.

You've got 85 delicious ways of balancing your family's nutritional needs at the red meat counter. That's how many different cuts of beef, pork and lamb there are today in the typical food market.

And if you have enough spirit of adventure to ring or call the meat man and ask about cuts you've never tried—and how to fix them—you'll be surprised at how much enjoyment, variety and nutritive value you can add to your meals.

Actually meat is a better buy than it was 10 years ago. For example, beef prices have risen only 20 per cent since 1960, compared with around 30 per cent for all consumer items. Yet during that time, the proportion that gets an expensive grain finish has doubled. Practically all pork is grain fed; almost all lamb is milk fed or grain fed.

Also the price has not increased as much to the consumer as the price of other items. The publication further states:

Virtually every piece of meat you serve can be tender and tasty if you know its quality grade.

Then, it mentions the tremendous values one can get and the amount of nutrition that is in these products. There is another article which mentions our affluent society and the person who stops at a hotel on the way home for a few bottles of beer instead of having supper. There is a reference to fortifying beer to ensure that a person who consumes it will get the proper nourishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Perhaps this is a good idea. I do not know why members of the New Democratic Party applauded this. Their economists will tell them that people in organized labour have always been able to keep ahead of the cost of living. I might say that I am sure members of the New Democratic Party are aware that they receive most of their support from organized labour. I want to point out that the amount of money a person spends or earns does not necessarily mean that the nutrition he obtains from the food he buys or the beer he drinks will be such that he will be a healthy person. We hear much about what we should be doing and what is being done in some other countries.

Let me compare the cost of food in some of the other countries which have a standard of living similar to ours, and one or two with a standard of living much less than ours. In the United Kingdom, about 28 cents out of every dollar is spent on food. In the United States, about 19 cents out of every dollar is spent on food. The situation here is similar to the situation in the United States. I am told that at the present time the cost of food to the Canadian consumer is a little lower than it is to the consumer in the United States. In a country such as India, 60 cents out of every dollar is spent on food. Then, we might consider the situation in Sweden, a country to which many people like to refer as an example when suggesting how people should live and drink. They always point out that it is Utopia.

Mr. Benjamin: Whoever said that?

Mr. Whelan: It used to be quite popular for members of your party to point out that Sweden had the type of environment every man should have.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Benjamin: How does that make it a Utopia?

Mr. Whelan: Well, I did not know the hon. member would admit he was not speaking of a Utopia when he mentioned the philosophy of his party. Let us make a few comparisons with Sweden and the way of life in that country. Dealing first with food prices for their standard of living, they are among the highest in the world.

• (1730)

An hon. Member: It must be the highest standard of living in the world.

Mr. Whelan: It is not any higher than ours. I quote from this article in the Globe and Mail of Thursday, May 25, as follows:

Food prices being the world's highest, it is all they can afford—especially since Swedes drink more hard liquor (at $12 a fifth for Scotch) than anyone else in the world.

The heading of the article is "Price of affluence is mental illness, Sweden told" and it has a subheading "Achievements in welfare, chilling aspects of 1984." It continues:

This is the reality of modern Sweden, Europe's most affluent country, where a recent psychiatric report commissioned by the government confirms the image of a harsh and ruthless society which asks its citizens to sacrifice their mental well being by working ever harder to pay for exorbitantly priced apartments, a car, television repairs and two weeks on a packaged holiday if they can afford it—and many can't.

The sombre study was prepared by Dr. Hans Lohman, one of Sweden's top experts in psychiatry. It was commissioned by parliament because of spiralling health costs as the number of in-patients admitted to mental hospitals spiralled from 73,000 in 1969 to 83,000 in 1970.

They could not stand the high cost of their high standard of living.

The report stated that the number of out-patients was considerably higher in a country with only 8,000,000 inhabitants.

In his effort to maintain Sweden's high living standards, the worker is called upon by the country's technocrats to be competitive; and feels ashamed if he cannot keep up and "do his duty," Dr. Lohman said.

More and more citizens in fact cannot keep up as the planners demand even higher economic growth to pay the cost of looking after those who faltered along the way. But as the dropouts increase, more growth is needed, which results in more dropouts—and so on, the report stated.

The role of the Swedish woman is far more difficult—

I am sure the hon. member who proposed the motion will be interested in this article.

Mrs. MacInnis: I am listening.

Mr. Whelan: It continues:

—is far more difficult than her husband's and probably impossible, the report continued. Many urban women have fulltime jobs in Sweden because their husbands' pay cannot meet prices in the world's second most expensive and heavily taxed country.

But at the same time she is expected to comfort cranky children when she comes home from work, provide tasty meals, clean the house and then be a good bedtime partner. Experts believe the typical young married couple make love as seldom as twice a month, if the statistics are to be believed. They think it is because the women are simply too tired, and perhaps the men, too.

I suggest it may be because they are eating food that does not have the proper nutrition to overcome their fatigue. Mr. Speaker, I will give a few more figures on the high standard of living in Sweden. Incidentally, considering the cost of Scotch there, I could easily become a prohibitionist if it cost that much in Canada. Another report reads:

> The rising taxes to support all this, however, have most Swedes wobbling. For example, the value-added tax, which is piled on top of all other taxes, was recently increased by four percentage points to 17.65 per cent. Partly because of this cost prices of most goods and services are soaring. Some cigarettes cost $1.40 a pack, eggs $1.20 a dozen, hamburger $0.99 per pound and filet mignon $5 per pound. Increasingly Swedes are making do with items at the lowest end of the price scale: potatoes, carrots, cabbage and spaghetti.

I could read further from this article, but it seems clear that the price of affluence in Sweden is too expensive for many people. More and more of them are filling mental institutions.

Let us compare food costs in Canada with costs elsewhere. I have made comparisons with other countries. Many people say they would like the standard of living they have in Sweden, but just compare the prices quoted in that article, Mr. Speaker. You can see that Canadian consumers are the luckiest in the world, and I say this with full knowledge of the cost of food in the United States which is slightly below ours. But it must not be forgotten that the United States treasury in many cases contributes to producers over 25 per cent of what they receive for their produce. This comes out of the tax dollar. Add all that up and it is clear that consumers in the United States are not getting as good a break as consumers in Canada. Our producers are producing without as much aid.

Canadian producers are among the most efficient in the world; they are more efficient than any other part of our society no matter what kind of production they are involved in, be it government administration, automobile production or whatever else you want to mention. No group has become more efficient and productive than the group which is producing food for human and animal consumption in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian of Swedish ancestry it gives me a great deal of pleasure to follow the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan), the twice-a-month man who was concerned about sex and whisky in that country. I remind the House that the Swedes still have by far the highest standard of living for the working man of any country in the world.

Mr. Olson: That is not right.

Mr. Nystrom: In rising to participate in this debate I support wholeheartedly the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) dealing with the high cost of food and the excessive profits being made by chain stores. I note with a great deal of concern, but not surprise, the apologetic speech of the minister from Calgary. He apologized for the chain stores with crocodile tears in his eyes, saying that their profits were by no means excessive, that they were indeed small, that we should not attack these people in our society but should leave them as they are.

I shall spend a few minutes speaking about the interests of other people. I will let government members talk about their friends, the corporations and the chain store people. I want to talk about the consumers and farmers because they are on the short end of the stick. I grew up on a farm. I remember wondering, as a small child, why the farmer received such a low price for his product, whether it was bacon, eggs or wheat, and why he had to pay such a high price when he bought the same product in a store. Despite the fact that food prices have been rising, it is not the farmer who has been getting more money. Indeed, over the last number of years the farmer has been receiving less while the price of food has increased.

I should like to put on the record some statistics to illustrate my point. According to the Department of Agriculture, in 1949 $1.5 billion was spent by consumers on food; of that the farmer received 57 per cent and the marketing share was 43 per cent. Twenty years later, in 1969, the consumer spent $6.2 billion on food and the farmers' share was 45 per cent. I am told by agricultural economists that in 1971 the farmers' share was probably closer to 40 per cent of the consumer dollar. So it is certainly not the farmer who is getting the money. It is obviously going to the middleman and the food companies for advertising, promotion and profit.

I should like to give a few specific examples of what the farmer receives for certain products. For the wheat that goes into bread, from 1950 to 1959 the farmer received 15 per cent and the marketing companies 85 per cent. From 1960 to 1969 the farmer received only 13 per cent. In other words, if the consumer paid 30 cents for a loaf of bread the farmer received 3.9 cents. For fluid milk, from 1950 to 1959 the farmer received 55 per cent of the consumer food dollar, and from 1960 to 1969 his share had decreased to 52 per cent. For potatoes, from 1950 to 1959 the farmer's share was 52 per cent and for 1960-69 it had decreased to 41 per cent. For canned tomatoes, for 1950-59 his share was 20 per cent and for 1960-69 it decreased to 19 per cent. In 1971 farmers received 25 per cent of the money spent on fruits and vegetables. For bakery and cereal goods his share was 21 per cent of what the consumer paid.

In the May, 1972, edition of Reader's Digest some figures were published which had been compiled from the consumer price index, the Ontario region of the National Farmers Union and farm marketing boards. They show that in 1971, if a customer paid 21 cents for a 16-ounce loaf of bread the farmer's share was two cents, the remaining 19 cents going to the food company, the food processors or manufacturers. For a pound of pork which sold in the supermarket for 59 cents to 65 cents, the farmer received 22 cents. For a dozen eggs sold at 47 cents a dozen, his share was 25 cents. On a 48-ounce can of apple juice selling for 40 cents, the farmer's share was seven cents. For a quart of milk sold at 35 cents, the farmer's share was 17 cents. You can see, Mr. Speaker, that it is certainly not the farmer who is benefiting from the sharp increase in the price of food.

This morning when I was doing some research I phoned one of my constituents who is in the poultry and egg business. I was told that grade A large eggs cost about 25 cents a dozen to produce on the farm. This farmer does the grading, etc., and receives only 17 cents a dozen for them, while in a shopping centre in Yorkton the price is 54 cents. If the farmer were to sell the eggs without grading he would receive about 12 cents a dozen, and that is an increase over last year when he got eight cents. This constituent told me that chickens, for which he receives 22½ cents per pound, are sold in the store at 89 cents a pound. This, again, points out who is making the money.

I would now like to deal with the income of the farmer and illustrate what has happened over the last few years. The price the farmer receives today for a bushel of wheat is less than he received in 1949, despite the fact that the cost of a loaf of bread has skyrocketed in the same period. According to statistics from the Department of Agriculture and Statistics Canada, in 1950-51 the farmer received $1.80 per bushel for corn and in 1971 he received $1.33. A bushel of turnips in 1950-51 brought him $1.75 and today he gets 35 cents, five times less than 20 years ago. For 75 pounds of potatoes he received $2.75 in 1950-1951 and today he receives $1.50. Twenty years ago he received 34 cents a pound for hogs and in 1971 he received 22 cents.

It can be seen that what the farmer receives for almost any commodity has decreased drastically over the last 20 years, though as all of us know the dollar today buys less than it did then. We find that total farm income in this country in 1970 was less than it was in 1968, when it was about $1,710 million. Three years later, in 1971, it was $1,573 million, this despite the fact that food prices increased by about 7.4 per cent last year alone.

When I telephoned the Department of Agriculture this afternoon I was told that according to a study made in Saskatchewan in 1966, which was a fairly good year for grain, the farmer cleared $8 an acre after expenses. Four years later, in 1970, he lost $4 an acre. Over five crop years this means that the farmer averaged 44 cents an acre despite the fact that food prices had skyrocketed.

While the farmer has been receiving less for his product, production costs have been increasing. According to the Barber commission report, the price of farm machinery increased by 85 per cent from 1949 to 1971 while the price received for the produce increased by only 3 per cent in the same period. As I said earlier, the price received for a bushel of wheat in 1971 was lower than in 1949. According to the Department of Agriculture, farm food production costs doubled between 1949 and 1969 while farm income from food in the same period increased by only 20 per cent. As a result, there has been a drastic drop in farm population from three million to two million people in 20 years. In the last five years the number of farms has decreased by 15 per cent in Canada.

Some hon. members from the cities might ask about productivity and suggest that the farmer is inefficient and deserves what is happening to him. That is not true. In this regard I should like to quote figures from Statistics Canada and other institutions to show that farm productivity is greater than in most other industries in this country. Using 1961 as the basic year with an index of 100, we find that in 1972 farm productivity had increased to 165.2.

In non-agricultural industries for the same period, productivity had only increased to 123.5. For farmers the rate has averaged 4.8 per cent per year, whereas for the non-agricultural industry it has averaged only 2.6 per cent per year. We must therefore contrast 4.8 per cent with 2.6 per cent.

The farmer is most efficient, yet his income from farm commodities is proportionately lower now than it was many years ago. For instance, we find that in the period 1960-62 one farmer supported 30 other people with the food he produced; in the period 1968-70 he supported 42 people. This represents an increase in efficiency; he supports 12 more people. Again, if I may refer to the Barber commission report to show that the farmer's productivity is greater now than it was a few years ago, it will be seen that in the period 1910-14 it took the farmer 15.2 hours to produce a bushel of wheat, in the period 1935-39 it took him only 8.8 hours and in the period 1963-67, 2.9 hours.

Clearly the productivity of the farmer has increased. He has become more efficient in food production. This is shown if one studies all other farm commodities. For example, with regard to milk, in the period 1935-39 it took the farmer 148 hours to produce the same amount of milk that in the period 1963-67 took only 84 hours. The farmer has become most productive. On the other hand, his costs have sky-rocketed and his returns have gone down. He receives a lesser proportion of the consumer food dollar now than he did a few years ago, yet food prices have gone up dramatically.

I say that the farmer has put in his work and the consumer must pay the bill. Yet it is the food conglomerates and chains which are reaping all the profit. The Garfield Weston Company controls or has interests in over 60 companies in this country. These are the people who make the decisions. There is not competition, Mr. Speaker; there is a near corporate monopoly in this field. The Weston company has interests in Dominion Food, Loblaws, Lucky Dollar stores, E.B. Eddy, Weston Foods, Westfield-Foods, and on and on it goes. One could hardly begin listing the companies with which the firm is involved.

I say on behalf of our farmers and consumers, let us investigate this state of affairs. If the minister suggests there is nothing to hide, why is he afraid of an investigation? I maintain he is sticking up for his friends, the corporate elite of this country and the Conservative party is shyly on the side, behind the curtains, approving and saying, "We, too, are more interested in the food company than in the consumer or the farmer."

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I find it a real pleasure this afternoon to take part in this crucial and important debate that touches two segments of our society in whom I believe the House is vitally interested. I am referring to the consuming public on the one hand and to the farmers, the producers of food, on the other.

I think this debate has fastened with the strength of a vice-grip, so to speak, on one of the most crucial problems of our culture, a problem to which the government and other agencies are addressing themselves with a high degree of priority, namely, how to serve the best interests of Canadians by producing wholesome, properly balanced diets and crucial foods and at the same time keep a sizeable segment of our population in the primary business of food production so that we may retain our national independence and autonomy in the field of food production. I shall make a few general statements and go into more detail later.

First may I underscore a conviction I have voiced in this chamber on numerous occasions. The higher cost of food in Canada is not reflected directly in higher incomes for farmers. May I put some statistics on the record to demonstrate this. At present, 41 cents of every dollar spent on food in Canada finds its way into the pocket of the farmer. He gets 41 per cent of our food dollar; the other 59 per cent, or 59 cents, more than half the food dollar, goes into the pockets of other middlemen or "in between" individuals. The farmer's income is declining; that is the present trend. That is to say, the proportion of the food dollar entering his pocket is declining. In 1950, 22 years ago, approximately 58 cents of each food dollar went to the farmer. Today, 41 cents is paid to the farmer. There has been a decline in 22 years of 17 cents per dollar paid to the farmer.

Two causes, among others, must be considered when dealing with this fact. First, more and more Canadians are eating out, thus pushing up the retail price of food. That has been the significant trend in our culture. I will not give details of what I mean at present. Second, many Canadians buy what are known as convenience foods. So in a very real sense their ability to pay for services rendered in preparing the food so that it is ready for serving on the table or for placing in the oven results in food prices being increased without comparable increases finding their way into the pockets of the farmer.

In a real sense, the affluence of our society is driving up the price of prepared food, without helping the producers of food. That is one of the questions to which we must address ourselves. As more and more foods are sold in advantageous, pre-cooked and packaged forms, the selection of wholesome foods in the non-prepared state is diminished. Those in our culture who earn the lowest incomes can least afford the luxury of paying for their kitchen work to be done in a factory; they cannot afford to purchase prepared foods. Since they cannot pay for work done in factories in preparing the food, and since this work drives up food prices, the poorest strata of society is victimized by the affluence of our society. This has affected the eating habits of those who are poorest in our nation. So in a real sense, two seemingly disparate segments of our society are affected. The poorer consumer is being victimized by increasing prices, and the farmer is carrying on his shoulders an undue proportion of the burden of our cheap food policy, if one can call it that, a policy aimed at the economical production of food in Canada.

May I continue at eight o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the fact that several different trends have converged and all bear some influence on food prices. As Your Honour will recall, earlier in my speech I referred to the increased productivity of farmers. For example, in 1955 one farmer produced enough food to feed 33 people. If my figures are accurate, in 1971 one farmer produced enough food to feed 42 people.

For a long time there has been a remarkable trend toward greater efficiency in food production on the part of farmers and primary producers. At the same time and concurrent with that increase, income in Canada and the very modest price of food have resulted in another very interesting trend. For example, in 1948 it took 40 per cent of the average Canadian's budget to put food on the table. That has now dropped to 18 per cent. Less than half the proportion of money is needed out of the take-home pay of Canadian people to put food on the table today than was needed in 1948. This means that Canadians have an increasingly larger segment of their income to spend on other goods and services.

There is a real sense in which food is not a major cost to many Canadians—this is the point I was coming to when we rose at six o'clock—but if you happen to be a Canadian with a fairly low or very low income, food is an important budgetary item. Although it may only take 18 per cent of the budget of the average Canadian, there are a large number of Canadians for whom it takes a much larger slice. It is these other Canadians, not the affluent or the average but the lower income Canadians, about whom we must be most concerned when considering the motion before us today.

The report of the Senate Special Committee on Poverty has some interesting things to say. I want to quote a few sentences which bear directly on the point I am making. This passage deals with poorer Canadians.

Consumers today face a bewildering array of choices. Consumer-durable goods in particular have become complex, and many of the once-simple food products come now in various stages of processing, in different packages, flavours, and quality.

• (2010)

That is the point I was making earlier in my speech. I continue to quote from this report at page 106.

The poor are often handicapped with respect to purchasing power by lack of education, experience, information, training, and opportunity as well as by lack of ready cash. "Best-buy" decisions depend not only on information about quality and performance, but also on a comparison of prices in different kinds of stores in different locations. To get this information takes time, effort and money. Because of transportation expenses or credit difficulties, the poor cannot shop around. As a result, they shop in small neighbourhood stores where prices are higher, and selection is limited—but where delivery service and credit are available.

The elderly poor, unable to walk far or carry bundles or afford a bus would be an outstanding example of this group. They are truly trapped.

The report continues:

The elderly poor find it difficult even to buy small portions of food suitable for one or two persons. Alarming numbers of the elderly are poor, and their problems are special. Some have always been poor, and advancing age magnifies their problems because they are less able to support themselves adequately. There is an increase in the need for such services as taxis, drugs, medical and dental care, and hospitalization or home nursing care. As consumers, the elderly are further crippled by these extra demands on their already inadequate incomes.

Buying food is the major difficulty faced by the poor. This is their largest and most regular outlay. The object should be to buy economical foods which will provide a reasonably balanced and nutritious diet. But, handicapped by the lack of information and mobility, the poor tend to concentrate too heavily on cheaper, starchy foods to the neglect of protein and vitamin-enriched foods; or they may buy the more easily accessible, expensively processed and packaged foods.

This, again, underscores the dilemma of our times. While we are putting a larger portion of the food dollar into the packaging and marketing of foods, the advantage goes to the better-to-do and those who wish to have more free time in which to enjoy the pleasures of our society and culture. It means there are fewer economically priced food products on the market.

Turning to another aspect, I think it should be pointed out that the low prices received by farmers in this whole food production and consumption cycle are sometimes, to a great extent, the fault of farmers themselves.

Egg producers, for example, have been getting an extremely low income lately and many of them, especially in Ontario, have suffered severe financial loss. However, the problem has arisen partly because the egg producers themselves have been unable to get together. Every other segment of our society organizes itself and is thereby able to lay claim to a larger slice of the economic pie. This has not been true of farmers; farmers have not organized themselves as well as they ought. I again make an appeal which I have made many times in this House before, for farmers to organize themselves and get the larger portion of the Canadian dollar which is their due.

The question which really ought to be before us this afternoon is: Should Canada have low-priced food? If the answer is yes, we must then ask ourselves on whose shoulders the effect of these low prices rest; should it be on the shoulders of the farmers only, or should it be spread more generally throughout the community?

I ask myself whether it would not be better to establish a minimum income level for all Canadians, thus avoiding the situation in which too many food producers are forced to accept a sub-minimal or mini-income. Many farmers speak to me in somewhat bitter tones. They feel governments are more interested in the large segments of voters who are located in the cities and towns—that they are not prepared to listen to farmers. Yet the record of legislation of governments, certainly the present one, would refute that contention.

I believe the government must avoid getting into the position of being either for the farmers or for the consumers. It is not a question of farmers versus consumers. Farmers must be in a position where they can expect a reasonable income from an occupation which is honourable and valuable. The government should be concerned that there are not two victims here—those who are poor and who suffer because of high food prices, and farmers who are not getting a proper return for their labour. It seems to me the best advice I could give, since food is already being produced very economically, would be that farmers organize themselves to take a better place in the marketplace, thereby ensuring themselves of a fairer return.

[Mr. McBride.]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, this motion in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has resulted in an interesting debate on an important subject; but the motion has been spoiled, for me, in at least two ways. I do not think it is really within the realm of practicality to expect that a special committee could report on this issue in a useful way by June 26. It is not in the nature of the study which would have to be made. In the second place, it is not the supermarkets which are responsible for this entire problem—I admit the resolution does not say they are—although they are, perhaps, a convenient whipping-boy.

In my opinion, the remarks of some of my colleagues who have taken part in the debate were spoiled, if I may say so, by a convenient and lazy resort to slogans. In a way, slogans spice the language of debate but they do not make for clarity of discussion. I really do get tired of hearing terms such as "corporate elite", "big business" and other hackneyed shibboleths which really throw no light on the difficulty we are facing.

The issue we are discussing here is, surely, the cost of food. Another area of concern is the small share of the price which accrues to the primary producer. We have heard some interesting comments from both sides of the House about the increase in productivity of the farmer. A further consideration is the disparity between food costs in various parts of Canada. I shall discuss this aspect in a minute or so. Then there is a subsidiary issue which is very much in the minds of some of us lately, the attempt on the part of the government to negotiate wage contracts on the basis of regional rather than national wage scales.

I should like to call attention to an interesting juxtaposition of articles which comment on this trend. In today's Globe and Mail appears a news story that has already been alluded to. A special survey has been conducted showing a wide spread in prices between the Atlantic area and Ontario. The Canadian Press report reads as follows:

• (2020)

Montreal and Toronto, Canada's largest urban centres, have the lowest retail food prices in the country—

The basis for this statement is the annual special survey of retail prices conducted by Statistics Canada. The article continues:

The survey found that food prices in Montreal and Toronto were one per cent less than in Winnipeg. But food prices in St. John's, Newfoundland and in Halifax were 9 per cent more, making for a 10 per cent spread over Montreal and Toronto prices.

Then follows some additional interesting data to be found in the special survey on retail prices. Curiously enough, in today's Ottawa Journal we find an article headed "Reversing an old trend; civil service moving toward regional salary rate system". The article reads in part:

More and more, the trend in public service pay is away from a flat national scale to regional rates.—

Then follows a report of a discussion with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in which he makes what I think is an unpleasant reference to the difference in rates of pay between a postal worker in high-pay British Columbia and what he calls the "mailman in low-pay Buctouche, New Brunswick, doing the same job", and who was just about "the highest-paid guy in town". I have just quoted some figures relating to the highest paid guy in town, the town being Buctouche, New Brunswick, and I must say it is somewhat discouraging to hear these most disparaging remarks about those who for one reason or another choose to live in Atlantic Canada. The story in today's paper clearly points out that there is a 10 per cent differential in the rate of pay of that highest paid guy in Buctouche and his brother worker and fellow Canadian in Montreal or Toronto.

A most interesting paper on the subject of national rates of pay for employees of the government of Canada has been prepared by Mr. T. J. Dooling, a service officer of the Department of Public Works component of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. The paper is dated November 30, 1971. Although I do not have much time left, I should like to make a couple of references to it. On page 2 of the paper Mr. Dooling states:

> According to "Interregional Disparities in Income" prepared by S. E. Chernick for the Economic Council of Canada, time has had little or no effect on the actual increase or decrease in disparities. To quote from the conclusion of this study: "Taken as a whole, the analysis emphasizes the significant disparity in per capita income levels from the various regions and sub-regions in Canada. The disparity is somewhat greater in terms of real income comparison. While the degree of income disparity in relative terms has varied with changing levels of economic activity, the longer-run tendency, over a period of roughly 40 years, has been one of little or no change.

On page 6 appears a quotation from the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts):

> After a century of growth, almost one quarter of our families in Canada are living at or under the poverty level. Our past programs have treated the symptoms of poverty rather than the disease.

Lastly, a quotation from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield):

> Virtually every department in the federal government is involved in the problem of regional disparity.

The point, surely, is that virtually every department is engaged in tackling this problem, but one that is not is obviously Treasury Board which is busily negotiating staff salaries on the basis of institutionalizing by contract the disparity in wages that DREE and other departments of government are trying so hard to end.

It is a little unfair to get away from the main thrust of the hon. lady's motion, which relates to the high cost of food, but I did think it relevant at this stage to mention the continuing disparity not only in the cost of food but in incomes in the Atlantic provinces that are available to buy this food. I often think that we in this country are in danger of what one of my friends has called galloping provincialism, which is a subject perhaps for another debate. In view of the evidence presented by government departments, cabinet ministers and members of the House, I think it is wrong for one department of the government to try to ignore that evidence and build into contract negotiations a continuation of some of the very disparities that so many segments of the government are trying very hard to bring to an end.

Increasing Food Prices

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I intervene in the debate only briefly this evening in view of what I think is really a hypocritical position that is taken by the New Democratic Party in the way it has put this motion together. This motion says nothing about other components in the cost of living index, and this in spite of the fact that since 1961, the year upon which the cost of living index is based, in some cases food has gone up by less than two-thirds as much as some other component parts of the cost of living index.

I believe that it is a disservice to Canadian farmers and other food producers to single out food as the major culprit in the increase in the cost of living. This is especially so when we are just coming through a period when for severals year the primary producers of food have been having far too low a return for their products.

Mr. Woolliams: Nobody has said anything to contradict that.

Mr. Olson: The motion alleges that the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who spoke earlier today apparently set out the position of the Conservative party and exonerated everybody in the food processing and distribution chain. So what does it come down to? It must mean that that party believes the increase the primary producers have received during the last few months is the cause of this increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Fairweather: You know that is not true.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member can read his argument tomorrow. He exonerated the retailer, he exonerated the processors and he exonerated a lot of other people. He said the increase was all because of taxes.

Mr. Woolliams: Do not misquote him.

Mr. Olson: That was the major thrust of his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. So far I think we have had a very interesting debate.

Mr. Fairweather: The minister is not quoting accurately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. We have had a very good debate so far and I ask hon. members to allow the minister who has the floor to continue his speech.

• (2030)

Mr. Olson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I remind hon. gentlemen opposite that I sat very quietly while their speeches were being made, even though I disagreed with them. It might be interesting to point out that I was sitting in my seat when the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was making his speech. Neither of the hon. members opposite who are complaining now were in their seats, so how do they know what was in that speech? They were not in the House.

Food prices in retail stores have advanced about as much as the general average price increase to consumers for goods and services. Up to March, 1972, the food component of the consumer price index was 137.1 based on 100 for 1961, as compared with 137.4 for all items in the index. In other words, the food component in the cost of living index was slightly less than the average of all components. So now the NDP single out food as the culprit when there were such things as that part of the index defined as services, which stood at 148.5. Why do they not mention the real culprits of the piece instead of singling out farmers every time?

We heard the same kind of unfair argument back in 1965 when food, based on 1949, showed the lowest increase of any major component in the cost of living index. Yet these members spend all their time singling out food as the culprit. It should also be drawn to their attention that the average for the year 1971 food price index was 131.4 on the basis of 100 in 1961, but the index for prices received by farmers in that year was 112.5. Now hon. members complain because farmers are getting a little better deal as a result of action taken by this government, and complaining about it since it is reflected in prices, when in the kind of economy we have it obviously has to finally find its way into the price of food.

An hon. Member: You are building up straw men.

Mr. Olson: I am not building up straw men; I am destroying some, or at least that is what I am trying to do. I have not heard the hon. member for Saint John's East (Mr. McGrath) defend the fishermen, because since this government came to office, for the first time in history fishermen have had some justice in the returns for their products; and that is also included in the food component of the cost of living index. I should think the fishermen would want that position defended rather than have this kind of thing going on.

It has been well established by some hon. members on this side that the portion of the disposable income of Canadians spent on food is the lowest in the world. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) only a few minutes ago, it is down to around 17 per cent or 18 per cent in this ratio. What is more important is that it takes less time today for a Canadian, in terms of hours of work, to buy the weekly food basket than for anyone anywhere else in the world.

A comparison can be made as to the number of hours of work in the industrial sector required to buy a basket of mixed foods in various countries. This study has been made. A food basket that contains a wide range of commodities which go into the weekly shopping list can be bought in Canada, on the average, from the proceeds of five hours labour in the industrial sector. That is the lowest number of working hours of any country—and the study included Belgium, Denmark, Italy, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and West Germany, the most advanced industrial countries in the world. In Canada it was five hours; in other countries it was much higher. Even in the United States it was 5.9 hours, and it went up to a high of 24 hours in Italy.

This is the kind of contribution the farmers and the food processing industry have made to Canadian society. In spite of all this, farmers are singled out as being the culprits in the situation we have today. This is dishonest and does a disservice to the farmers of this country, and I believe this kind of hypocrisy ought to be exposed from time to time.

Let me point out what I mean by hypocrisy. I would not be surprised at all that if the opposition had an opportunity next week to move another motion they would say something to the effect that in the opinion of this House the government had failed to cope with the problem of farmers receiving adequate prices for what they produce. The opposition has already done that once or twice. To make things even more confusing, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris exonerated everybody in the processing and distribution chain. There are very expressive words for that kind of stand taken on both sides of the fence, right, left and in the middle all at the same time. The farmers of Canada will understand this because they now have received some justice.

Mr. Woolliams: They will love you.

Mr. Olson: In the last few months there have been increases in the price of some commodities to the farmers of this country. Pork is a good example, as are milk products and fish. If political parties opposite are going to draw public attention to this fact and complain because these people are getting a little more justice in the prices they receive, it is time we exposed this type of hypocrisy.

They complain because there are some people in Canada who have an inadequate diet. Studies have been made from time to time which indicate this is true. What hon. members fail to say is that the inadequacies of a balanced diet, according to experts on nutrition, has very little or nothing to do with the level of income. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) pointed out that there are very serious inadequacies in the balanced nutritional diet of many people who can afford to buy all the food they need and, indeed, eat far more than they ought to in total.

That happens to be the fact, but hon. members opposite do not mention it. They weep alligator tears and argue that this is something which must be corrected. We know that hundreds of thousands of Canadians do not eat properly balanced diets, according to nutritional experts, but this is certainly not because the price of food is too high. There is good, wholesome food in Canada in adequate quantities for anybody who chooses to use his disposable income to buy that food.

An hon. Member: What happens to the money?

Mr. Olson: Some of the money goes in some of these other cost of living factors which members across the way do not have the decency to mention. Some of these cost of living factors have gone up 150 per cent.

An hon. Member: Such as government spending.

Mr. Olson: Members of this government recognized long ago that there were some people caught on fixed incomes and that any change in the cost of living had an adverse effect on them in that it lowered their standard of living. That is why in the budget which was brought down a few days ago some very important steps were taken to correct this situation for a large number of Canadians on fixed incomes. This was done by increasing pensions. Many things have been done for the farmer to increase the price he receives and thus his income. I certainly hope this government will not take steps which will in fact reduce the return to our primary producers, namely, the farmers and fishermen.

• (2040)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) seeking the floor on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, would the minister entertain a question?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. There is not sufficient time. Our time is limited. However, if I have finished before my time is up, I will entertain a question by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Chicken.

Mr. Olson: No, it is not chicken. These hon. members are not only interested in using their own time to spread this unfair kind of information they put forward; they want to pirate my time as well. Let us consider very briefly some of the commodities. What are they complaining about? Are they complaining about the price of pork? Are they complaining about the price of potatoes or the price of grain, fish, fruits and vegetables? If that is what they are complaining about I would remind them that all through 1971 the producers of pork in Canada received for it less than the cost of production. The government recognized this and made an offer of $24 million in deficiency payments to make up the difference. Now these producers are getting some justice from the marketplace. Some members try to downgrade the fact that they are entitled to this.

Are they talking about poultry? The poultry producers of this country in my opinion are still receiving far too low a price for the eggs, broilers and turkeys they produce. Within the next few days we will be assisting them to correct this situation. I hope no one will come into this House and complain about the fact that they are finally receiving some justice from the marketplace. For far too long the primary producers, both farmers and fishermen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has another 30 seconds or so before the expiration of his allowed time. The Chair, and perhaps some hon. members, would like the opportunity to hear what he is saying.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I say that the primary producers, both farmers and fishermen, of this country for far too long have been receiving an income which is less than the national average. It is substantially less than that which other sectors of the economy have received. The government will continue its efforts to improve this situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) who has just told us that primary producers in Canada do not receive the income which they deserve. This is not the purpose of this motion at all, but I noticed in passing that the minister said farmers would remember what the government had done. It is precisely because farmers remember that the government is afraid to call an election at this time.

Mr. Speaker, this does not mean that I support the motion presented by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards—

It has been said before that the high cost of living was not due only to the rise in food prices.

I quote again:

—or with the fact that supermarket profits have increased simultaneously at an unprecedented rate—

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the profits of supermarkets have risen considerably. However, it is also true that ten years ago, the total sales of supermarkets came up to $100,000 per year, and that their profits were in the order of 10 per cent. In fact, it was rather millions of dollars, but let us only take as an example a figure of $100,000.

Today, the sales of supermarkets are more than five times as much. This means that the sales of supermarkets come to over $500,000, and even if the percentage of profits has diminished by about 3 per cent, they are nevertheless making higher profits, namely $35,000,—that is 7 per cent of $500,000—as compared with $10,000. It is clear that profits have gone up because sales have been larger.

Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway contends that food prices have drastically increased; they have not increased more than in other sectors, a fact that the New Democrats are presumably prepared to acknowledge. However, I would have liked to find a concrete proposal in the motion. What to do then? Control prices? Nationalize supermarkets, as the New Democrats seem to suggest in their platform? Many countries have proceeded with the nationalization not only of supermarkets but also of flourishing industries which took nothing away from anybody but which allowed everybody to get something.

When I went to Czechoslovakia, I had the opportunity of visiting ghost plants—

An hon. Member: Here we go again!

Mr. Caouette: —the BATA plants, that used to manufacture footwear. I remember that in 1934, when BATA was a private enterprise, those plants could have supplied the whole world with shoes. But today those plants are closed down. The company no longer exists and the government was unable to keep up their production.

Mr. Speaker, there is an example of nationalization. Private enterprise was abolished and in so doing the wings of private personal initiative were clipped because, without ambition the individual dies—there is no doubt about that—and if hon. members of the New Democratic Party do not know that, let them look at what goes on in those countries they so often like to quote as examples; they will see exactly what happens.

However, are we going to suggest price controls? If we set up price controls, we might as well control wages—

Mr. Benjamin: Whose wages?

Mr. Caouette: —and prevent all salary increases. Let's freeze all wages including those of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, we have known price controls during the war when the government had frozen wages, retail prices, and so on. We even gave out ration coupons at the same time we set up price controls. With ration coupons you could get butter, coffee, jam, tires, cars, clothes and what have you. According to the value of the coupons you could get the commodities at prices set by the government, through the price board.

• (2050)

But, Mr. Speaker, while you could not get more than what your coupon allowed, at a controlled retail price, you could obtain anything on the black market, either sugar, coffee, or any other good item which was subject to restrictions. You could not get more goods than the number of coupons you had. Although sugar sold then for 8 cents a pound, you were able to get as much as you wanted at 20 cents a pound on the black market.

The same rule applied as regards cars and tires, as well as every item that was government-controlled. Should we go back to this price and trade control in peacetime? This would cause the black market to reappear, and the situation would be a hundred times worse than it is at the present time. An evil cannot be cured with a remedy which is worse than the evil itself.

Then, what do we say? It is quite easy to blame the giants, the supermarkets, as I said earlier. These supermarkets have increased their prices, just like in any other economic or business area. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) was saying earlier that in 1961, an average Canadian spent 41 per cent of his income on food, while in 1971, he spent only 18 per cent for the same purpose. By the way, the hon. Minister of Agriculture has just stated that perhaps it was only 17 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe at all in these statistics. If average Canadians really spend only 17 or 18 per cent of their income on food, this means that they only eat sausages or hamburgers all year long, because no one could, at the present time, buy enough food with 17 or 18 per cent of one's income.

Take the typical case of a citizen who earns $60 a week for instance and who has two or three children at home. In cities like Montreal and Quebec we still find people who earn starvation wages of $60 a week. But 18 per cent of $60 is $10.80 exactly. What five-member family can live on $10.80 a week? We should not mock people in their faces, and I think this is what the hon. Minister of Agriculture did—

Mr. L'Heureux: We take the average.

Mr. Caouette: You take the average, yes, but some people must spend 50 per cent of their salary on food. You talk about the average, but some other people spend only 8 or 10 per cent of their income on food. These people cannot even buy the cloth around the bologna. These are facts. So, what are we going to propose?

It is all very well to submit notices of motions, with no solution. Let us carry out an inquiry, they say. I have no objection to inquiries, but not to control prices, salaries, even incomes of farmers, retailers, wholesalers, of all citizens in short.

What we suggest is payment of a compensated discount on retail prices which would increase the purchasing power of the consumer without taking anything away from him or increasing prices.

For instance, the federal government should pay a general discount on retail prices of food, clothing and all other products.

Let us take food for an example, since that is what is being discussed, and suppose a payment of 30 per cent discount. A family spending $30 a week for food, with a 30 per cent discount would save $9, therefore paying only $21, and the federal government would pay $9 to the retailer, representing compensated discount on the retail price. At that time, Mr. speaker, it would work out much cheaper for the Canadian government to grant such a compensated discount than to set up sundry commissions throughout the country and to appoint other agencies for the marketing of products.

It would then cost much less for the federal government, and consumers would pay less than what they are now paying.

I repeat that the average Canadian family only spends 18 per cent of its income on food. The man who earns $100 a week, for instance,—a minimum salary the establishment of which the three labour leaders of the province of Quebec are calling for—and who must feed five persons, will spend $18. With $18 a week, to pay for milk, bread, in short, for all the food needed by a family of five, it is impossible for any hon. member or anybody else to eat decently.

The Minister of Agriculture knows it as the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton who quoted statistics a while ago. Statistics are more or less valid. They seldom are correctly interpreted.

Mr. Speaker, we have already suggested the payment of a discount on retail prices. It was done in wartime for milk. As the retail price of that product was then 14 cents a quart, the federal government granted a discount of 2 cents a quart, so that the consumer only paid 12 cents. The 2 cents were paid to the dairyman.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the Social Credit party's proposal is relevant in any area, whether it be for instance, the clothing industry, the farm implement industry, the primary industry or the distribution industry. What we need is a compensated discount on retail prices which would permit the consumer to buy more and obtain better services. This would certainly encourage the primary producer who would increase his income by selling his goods more easily than at the present time.

This appears to me to be a logical solution; and, since it proved quite useful in time of war, I wonder why it could not also be used in time of peace as well.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is willing to propose solutions, if ever a special committee of the House is established to investigate this situation, before June 26, 1972. It may seem somewhat early but, in any case, it is the most adequate solution which is likely to help all at once the consumers, the producers, the distributors, the manufacturers and the people as a whole who contribute to the economy of our country.

If we could find this solution, I think we should have done a lot to help mankind.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, anyone who knows the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) cannot in any way doubt the sincerity she has displayed on many occasions in this House in endeavouring to bring forth for solution problems which affect our less fortunate people. But I am disappointed in this motion and could not support it for the very reason that it cannot be supported by the facts. In other words, what is contained in the motion simply cannot be substantiated. The motion reads in part:

—in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices—

What about steadily rising costs? Has anybody ever mentioned steadily rising costs? We hear members of the NDP promoting steadily rising costs in many areas. Increases in costs which are not matched by productivity are inflationary. The money has to come from somewhere; the consumer is the only source and consequently we must have rising prices.

It is unfair to select food as a target, Mr. Speaker. I have been involved in the production of food most of my life and I know how tough it is to sell to the supermarkets which of course try to buy at the lowest possible price. I know the extent of their mark-up because I know what they have paid for the product. I carry no brief for the supermarkets, Mr. Speaker; indeed, I have bruises to show from my dealings with them over the years. But I think we should be fair.

A group supported by the NDP has published some vicious material attacking the Kraft Company in Ontario. It would be difficult to substantiate their allegations which could seriously affect the income of farmers in that area. The milk board is not an appointed body but is elected by the dairymen of Ontario to establish a price for their product which is sold to companies to make cheese. This group is supported by the NDP and—

Mr. Benjamin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) on a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) just referred to a document which he inferred was promoted or supported by the NDP. Would he please identify that document, who put it out and what it is?

Mr. Pringle: I will be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker. It is issued by "The men and women of the National Farmers Union" and it reads:

Boycott all Kraft products: Don't buy products sold under the Kraft brand name.

It begins with these words:

As members of the National Farmers Union, the largest direct-membership farm policy group in Canada—

That statement would be questioned in some areas, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be a good idea if it were read at the next NDP caucus. We cannot help but become alarmed when we read statements in Hansard such as that made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway on May 30. At page 2711 she is reported to have said:

For example, Safeway's profits rose by 40 per cent in the first three months of this year, the profits of George Weston rose by nearly 50 per cent and the profits of Dominion Stores by 300 per cent.

Three hundred per cent of what?

An hon. Member: Over the previous year.

Mr. Pringle: This is an unfair and vicious manner in which to attack people who are doing their best to distribute wholesome food, not brown sugar kept in an open drawer as I used to keep it, or raisins, figs or dried fruits, but properly packaged wholesome food. They operate under strict regulations laid down by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, in the first 12 weeks of this year the profit on the sales dollar in Canada Safeway Ltd. was 2.11 cents. Last year, which was a poor one because of price wars, the profit was 1.75 cents. This company has extended its operations to Europe and Australia. They do not say that their sales increased by $30 million, but anyone who knows about unit costs will realize that with an increase of $30 million the slightest increase in prices will realize more profit.

I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will be glad to hear that just this week the company introduced a computer system and now all items in their stores in Vancouver will be priced on a unit basis. They were asked last year to do this by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and they have complied. I refer to this particular chain because its name has been mentioned, but I am confident that what I say is true of all other chains.

These companies have been investigated again and again. I have been very glad to participate in the investigations at times because I have been unhappy about the price they paid for the products I sold them. However, after every investigation they have been given a clean sheet because the unit profit on food in Canada is so disgustingly low. Of course, when you get into millions and millions of dollars in sales it does not take very much unit profit to make what appears to be a considerable amount of money. But, Mr. Speaker, wavering of only half a cent or one cent in the other direction will mean that the same amount of money is lost. I know of chain stores which lost $100,000 when they opened a new store before they started to make a profit.

Another point is that supermarkets have to reserve a very large amount of money because when they contract with labour they often are faced with retroactive payments. But of course they never get a retroactive price increase. I think this is very unfair and I wanted to clear it for the record.

I appreciate that many speakers today have come to the aid of the farmer. I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), but I think he was not quite correct. He kept saying, "This is all that the farmer has left" and seemed to neglect the fact that the farmer has to meet all his expenses from the money he receives. The margin is not money in his pocket.

I should like to examine a few more facts, Mr. Speaker, though I have had to throw away most of my statistics because they have already been used. The average disposable income in Canada almost tripled between 1949 and 1959. According to the food policy booklet issued by the Department of Agriculture, it rose from $884 to $1,416 per person in ten years and to $2,398 per person by 1969. In contrast to income, food prices increased only by slightly more than half during the same 20-year period. The cost of meat, vegetables, fruit, milk, bread and other foods needed to feed a family of four for one week was $20 in 1949 and $24 in 1959.

In 1949 a man worked, on the average, 20 hours to feed a family of four for one week. In 1969, according to the latest figures, he had to work only 11 hours for the same end. So he now has to work 11 hours as opposed to 20 to feed a family of four for one week.

An hon. Member: How is the farmer benefiting?

Mr. Pringle: Like most consumers, our housewives have probably found that there is more income available to spend on food. One may assume that they buy more food, but this is not necessarily true since high income families usually buy more expensive foods such as tender steaks, greens and berries out of season, and so on. However, even though the housewife spends more on higher priced foods, the proportion of average disposable income spent on food in retail stores is smaller than ever. For example, in 1949 about 22 per cent of disposable income was spent on food and now only about 15 per cent is so spent.

Where does the money go? We know that some of it must go to the farmer who must be paid for growing food and raising livestock. We know that some of it goes to the man who sells the food, or to the chain store. What happens in between? Let us consider that labour costs have been increasing, and still are going up, up and up. They are not accelerating on a true percentage basis, since the latest increase is based on a percentage of the former wage which itself was based on a former increase. Also, transportation costs are increasing.

In addition to labour costs and other costs, raw material costs used for packaging are going up. The housewife today buys more so-called packaged foods or convenience foods. Hon. members can check this. More convenience foods than ever are being sold. I am talking of heat-and-eat items, TV dinners and prepared pies. The housewife at one time worked in the garden. She was the food processor in the home; she stayed at home and bottled and processed. Now she does other things. Now housewives eat lunch at the club and think of things to do in the afternoon. They do not process foods as they once did.

[Mr. Pringle.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) would be in his place to listen to the very thoughtful speech of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) who I thought was fair in his summing up. Having listened to the debate today which involved members on all sides of the House, I think it can be said that nobody—I include the NDP particularly, my party and hon. members opposite—attacked the primary producer, the farmer, for what he is getting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: We are saying that food costs in Canada are high; that veterans, for example, whose benefits were recently increased by 3.6 per cent, are still struggling to make ends meet; that old age pensioners, whose pensions were increased by $2.88 a month, are still finding it difficult to pay food bills and live at standards we think are acceptable for Canadians; and that those on the guaranteed income supplement, whose maximum benefits increased from $137.70 to $150—about $13—still find it difficult to meet expenses. That is what we are saying.

I congratulate, at the outset, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) for bringing this matter before the House, because the cost of food to consumers, particularly those on fixed incomes, is probably the most serious question facing Canadians today. We have heard much this week about foreign takeovers. Perhaps it is time to examine some chain stores. If the government is serious in its takeover policy and if it is not mere window-dressing, this would be a good area to examine. Perhaps a former Liberal, now a judge in Saskatchewan, Mary Batten, would conduct an investigation in this field. I think such an investigation would be worth while for Canadians.

An hon. Member: Now tell us about increased legal fees.

Mr. Woolliams: One of our difficulties in dealing with the situation is that the primary producer, the farmer, is not making enough income. Let us talk about the return he receives for his work.

An hon. Member: Tell us about increased legal fees.

Mr. Woolliams: I wish the hon. member would get off the pot. It seems that he has been on marijuana for so long that his head has gone funny.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Corbin: That was a most responsible statement, I must say.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is always talking. Let us consider the price of beef. The price to the farmer is between 31 cents and 38 cents per pound in the stockyards. And what does the consumer pay for beef?

An hon. Member: And for legal fees?

Mr. Woolliams: The price of hamburger ranges between 65 and 75 cents a pound. Liver costs between 80 and 90 cents a pound; roasting beef costs $1.20 a pound and more; even beef for boiling costs between 90 cents and $1 per pound. That is what we are talking about. We are concerned about food costs which the consumer, the man on fixed income, must bear. We are not saying that the farmer, the primary producer, is getting enough. Although we pay 90 cents per pound or more for liver, the top price for steers in this country—I checked this today—ranges between 34 and 38 cents a pound. If you compare the price of the steer per pound with the price of liver, hamburger or steak, you will find that there is a large difference. That is the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, many of our difficulties stem from the government's decision to allow our dollar to float. We export many agricultural commodities. The government, by allowing our dollar to float, has not diminished the difficulties faced by our agricultural producers. With the floating of our dollar the agricultural producer receives less in the export market for his commodity. He gets less for his grain and for his beef because of our floating dollar. Yet the government has done nothing.

We are also concerned about the health and welfare of our senior citizens, veterans and others. The government has been so preoccupied with curbing inflation that it has created unemployment; people have lost their jobs. The kind of inflation which began under this government is continuing. Our people must pay high taxes in addition to high costs occasioned by inflation. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East touched on this subject. Let us consider for a moment—

An hon. Member: And legal fees.

Mr. Woolliams: —how this government has been spending our money. For 1970-71 the government budgeted for expenditures of $13,182 million, compared with $11,921 million for 1969-70. The increase is in the order of $1,260 million. Estimates for the various departments increased by between 23 per cent and 38 per cent. So government spending has been increased. We know that the cabinet was warned by Mr. Young that the real cause of inflation, or a major cause, is overspending by the government. That spending is driving up costs, increasing living costs and affecting food costs which the consumer must meet. That is what we ought to examine at this time.

Let us see how our tax dollar is spent. Since this government took office, it has financed its operations with deficits. Today 14 cents of every tax dollar collected from the Canadian taxpayer goes to pay interest on the national debt; 13 cents of every tax dollar goes on defence; 7 cents on transportation and communications; and on health and welfare, the biggest single item, the government spends 25 cents out of every tax dollar. What really concerns Canadians is the high cost of government.

An hon. Member: The hon. member speaks as a Conservative.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, I don't know. Let us wait for the election. I think hon. members will find, when the election rolls around, that the people know that the number one enemy they must turn out of office is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) along with the puppets who follow him. That is what they will decide at the polls.

An hon. Member: The people will not go for puppeteers.

Mr. Woolliams: Hon. members talk about the high cost of living and the high cost of food. Well, let us examine this government's dairy policy and see what has been the result of the kind of quotas it has imposed on the dairy industry in western Canada. Today there is a shortage of butter. We are importing butter fron New Zealand and Australia. These are some of the problems. Not only has the government driven people out of the dairy industry but it has increased the price of butter and other dairy products to the consumer. This affects the people I mentioned in opening my remarks. These are the facts.

The real enemy of the consumer is the increase in government expenditures. This government has spent itself right out of the Gallup poll. That is what worried the Minister of Agriculture this evening. It was not that he was upset about the debate, or got sunstroke when he went to Medicine Hat last week and found things operating well. The real reason is that the Gallup poll shows that the Liberals are slipping because they have not come to grips with any of our problems. Nothing has been done with regard to the high cost of food and the high cost of living.

I want to turn now to another subject. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East talked about transportation costs. Ever since the Railway Act was amended by the Liberal government and the new transportation commission was set up which enabled the railways, except for the Crowsnest Pass freight rates, to increase freight rates from eastern to western Canada, and from eastern Canada to the Maritimes and vice versa, the cost of living has spiralled in all areas.

A former minister of transport, Hon. Jack Pickersgill, has not done anything to stop the increase, nor has the federal Liberal cabinet stepped in to prevent this discrimination in freight rates for the west and the Maritimes. It has been said that Canada is held together by its transportation system. It is one of the cornerstones of confederation at which this government has chipped away until we can now see that the whole question of freight rates is in a chaotic state, even beyond the repair of Mr. Pickersgill who set himself up as the czar of transportation. Freight rates have increased on some commodities from the west to the east, and vice versa, between 40 and 60 per cent.

The government should be concerned about the control of inflation, but it has done nothing. The cabinet will not give leadership in this field and the transport commission has not done anything but allow freight rates to spiral. This has affected the cost of food and the cost of living of every Canadian.

I repeat that the real enemy, the cause of inflation and the real heel crushing down on the pensioner, the veteran and those on fixed income, is excessive government spending. Therefore, it is my intention to move an amendment. I will read it now because I may make some remarks on it. I wish to move the following amendment to the motion, pursuant to Standing Order 58(4)(a):

Adding after the word rate, in the said motion:

"and/or with the fact that transportation costs have increased substantially and at an uncontrolled, unprecedented rate,"

and the remainder of the motion shall remain the same.

The motion, therefore, would read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government has failed to cope with the problem of steadily rising food prices, which seriously affect Canadian living standards, or with the fact that supermarket profits have increased simultaneously at an unprecedented rate, and/or with the fact that transportation costs have increased substantially and at an uncontrolled, unprecedented rate, and because these matters are of nationwide concern they should be referred immediately to a special committee of this House for investigation and report by June 26, 1972.

This afternoon the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) moved a motion. It was pointed out that there are two prongs to the main motion. It was set out in the ruling that another prong could be added to the motion, although it could not substantially change the wording from "the standing committee" to "the Prices and Incomes Commission". I listened to the ruling this afternoon. One of the ingredients which must be taken into consideration by anyone studying the high cost of food is the high cost of transportation. I now ask that this third prong be put into the motion. I trust that my friends in the New Democratic Party will see their way clear not only to support us on the procedure but on the specifics of the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Reading the amendment, I have some reservation about accepting it. At first glance it seems to bring in a completely new matter. Because we have had already a procedural debate on a previous amendment, and because of the time element, without creating any precedent I will accept the amendment at this time. I could not make a decision to disallow the amendment without allowing hon. members to comment from a procedural point of view. This would deny an hon. member from the party which moved the motion the opportunity to close the debate, because there are only 15 minutes remaining. I will put the motion if the hon. member will inform the Chair who is the seconder.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for St. John's East.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for St. John's East, having spoken, cannot second the motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Then the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) will second the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon), moves the following amendment:

Adding after the word rate, in the said motion:

[Mr. Woolliams.]

"and/or with the fact that transportation costs have increased substantially and at an uncontrolled, unprecedented rate,"

and the remainder of the motion shall remain the same.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to wind up the debate on this very important motion. After listening to government spokesmen today it would be almost impossible for someone who did not know the topic in advance to know what we were supposed to be debating. At different times they talked about labour costs and the nutritional habits of Canadians. Indeed, one member on the government side spent all his time talking about food costs in Sweden. This either illustrates the stupidity of the Liberal party of Canada or merely their incompetence to interpret a motion. I ask Your Honour to judge which is worse for a party that claims to have the right to govern this country. It was an incredible performance.

• (2130)

I have before me the final report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Consumer Credit, dated April 25, 1967, signed by the co-chairmen, Senator David A. Croll and the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford). In that report the hon. gentlemen have something to say about the food processing industry and the supermarkets which in our humble way we thought merited serious analysis today in terms of their effect on food prices in this country. In the concluding statement of the report the committee says:

The domination of a few large corporations in some sectors of the Canadian economy is clearly evident and gives rise to the question, "Is this in the public interest?" Your committee feels that the implications of this question must be fully examined.

This followed an analysis of the way in which relatively few companies in this country dominate the food industry. The report is an expression of concern by the committee, one dominated, I stress, by Liberals. The committee goes on to recommend a continuing investigation into the monopolistic practices of the food industry in Canada. Needless to say, this recommendation has not been adopted in the slightest way by the government. Indeed, the government never had any serious intention of dealing with the issue.

Reflect on the speeches we have heard today from the other side. Has one Liberal member risen and said he is seriously concerned about the market power of the supermarkets? They have managed to talk about everything but the subject before the House for debate. In the time available to me I should like to say something about the motion before us. First I should like to say something about supermarket profits. I shall name the companies and put on record their profits from 1968. Take Steinberg's. In 1968 its profits were $6.4 million; in 1969, $5 million; in 1970, $9.3 million and in 1971, $9.5 million.

Mr. Stafford: How much did they have invested?

Mr. Broadbent: I will deal later with that question. The net income of this firm for a 24-week period ending January 15, 1971, was $3.7 million. One year later, for the same period ending January 15, 1972, net income amounted to $7.6 million. There had been a 100 per cent increase in the profit picture.

An hon. Member: Give the 1969 profits.

Mr. Broadbent: I should like, now, to deal with the George Weston corporation, that "tiny" concern which has some 120 enterprises under its control.

Mr. Stafford: Tell us about their gross as well.

Mr. Broadbent: Wait a moment.

An hon. Member: Arrogance.

Mr. Broadbent: In 1967 their profits were $13 million; in 1968, $13.6 million; in 1969, $15.4 million; in 1970, $14.4 million and in 1971, $15.1 million.

Mr. Stafford: What were their gross sales each year?

Mr. Broadbent: I will deal with that later.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Now look at the Dominion stores situation. The profit for the 39 weeks ending December 31, 1970, amounted to $1.9 million. The profit for the same period ending December 31, 1971, was $5.8 million. That is an increase of about 300 per cent in one year.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I should like to ask the hon. member if he would permit a question.

Mr. Broadbent: No; I do not have the time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Hon. members should not use points of order for the purpose of seeking to ask questions.

Mr. Broadbent: I thought it would be appropriate for one speaker today to deal with the subject, Mr. Speaker. Now I should like to come to the rate of return on the investment dollar. If the hon. member had done his research he would have found today on his desk a report from Statistics Canada on the subject of industrial corporations.

Mr. Stafford: I have read it.

Mr. Broadbent: It was released today and it refers to the rate of return on the investment dollar for the past year in a variety of sectors of the economy, particularly in the industrial and corporate sectors. The figures are interesting. If you take all industry in Canada over the past year, the rate of return for the first quarter was 5.3 per cent, in the second quarter it was 5.93 per cent, in the third it was 6.35 per cent, and in the fourth quarter it was 6.44 per cent. If you take manufacturing, the return for the first quarter last year was 5.2 per cent, for the second quarter 6.54 per cent, for the third 6.97 per cent, and for the fourth 6.69 per cent.

Now let us look at the food industry. Look at what poor Steinberg's, Dominion stores, Westons and Loblaws did—those firms for which the Liberal party shows such sympathy as expressed today in the speeches we have heard. For the first quarter of last year the rate of return was 8.02 per cent compared with the over-all average of 5.36 per cent, in the second quarter 9.13 per cent compared with the average in industry as a whole of 5.93 per cent, in the third quarter 8.05 per cent compared with 6.35 per cent in industry as a whole, and in the last quarter 7.87 per cent compared with 6.44 per cent.

There is the answer to the hon. member's question. That is the rate of return per investment dollar. This, I suggest, constitutes a prima facie case for our motion. Remember our motion does not say that supermarkets are totally responsible for increasing costs. Conservative members have correctly pointed out that one has to take into account transportation costs and other factors. That is obvious. We are not denying it in any way. What we are saying is that the profits of supermarket companies have been rising at an astronomical rate in the past year and must be regarded by any impartial observer to be in large measure responsible for the high cost of food which the people of Canada have to bear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What are the pricing policies of these corporations? I refer supporters of the government to the same committee report of 1967. That committee, dominated by government members, pointed out that in many cases, if not in most, the firms set the prices. They dominate the market. They do not respond to market conditions. I quote from the report:

> The five great corporate food chains and the voluntary chains control more than 75 per cent of the grocery business in urban areas and their percentage is increasing.
> In one part of the food processing industry, one firm controls 100 per cent of the market in the Maritimes and western Canada and at least 80 per cent of the market in Ontario and Quebec.

I also have before me a report prepared this year in British Columbia by a professor at Simon Fraser University who examined food pricing policies of companies in the province as well as the structure of the industry as a whole. What does he conclude? He concludes what the special joint committee concluded in 1967, namely, that the big corporations do not respond to market conditions in the main but, rather, set those conditions because they control most of the factors which influence production of food products in the first instance.

• (2140)

What did he discover in addition to that? I suggest this must also be of concern to us. He discovered that in Vancouver one of the major chains charges higher prices in the poorer parts of the city than it does in the richer parts. This duplicates studies conducted in the United States where it was discovered that in the Negro ghettos the big food chains charge the unfortunate, poor people higher prices than they charge people who live in the more affluent parts of the city.

It appears the reason for this sort of conduct is that the poor people living in the heart of Vancouver, or in the heart of Toronto or Montreal, do not have automobiles, or many do not, and consequently cannot compare prices charged by the different chains. As a result, the local store downtown charges what the market will bear and all too frequently prices are higher than prices charged elsewhere by other firms. This is what the motion asks us to investigate by setting up a special committee.

In the time I have left I should like to suggest that one of the reasons firms like Weston, Loblaws, Dominion stores, Safeway and Steinberg's are in their present position is that they have branched out into all sectors of the food processing industry. These firms are in the picture right from the time the seed is planted in the soil until the product is sold in the stores. They are in no sense of the word in a state of competition but, rather, are in a position of being able to impose their own price on the Canadian consumer.

May I again refer hon. members to a document called "The Grocery Store Storybook," put out by Professor G. B. Rush in 1972, which I shall be only too pleased to pass to hon. members who wish to examine it. Professor Rush documents with great care the conglomerate power of these enterprises. In the minute remaining may I deal with but one of these, the Weston corporation. I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker, but may I take another 30 seconds?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section (9) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question to dispose of the motion now before the House. The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Woolliams) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Before leaving the chair I think it is my duty to remind hon. members that it is long established practice for hon. members to come into the chamber wearing a jacket, shirt and tie. I am not prepared to encourage hon. members to depart from that practice. I would seek their co-operation in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: On that point, Mr. Speaker, I would think it appropriate to mention that all members on this side of the House are properly dressed, and the bad example is being set by government members.

At 10.19 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CANADA AT UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, next week the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment is convening in Stockholm. I would like, briefly, to outline the position which Canada will be taking at this important gathering.

Canadians have already had a large input. We are responsible in large measure for the resolution within the draft Declaration on the Human Environment which states, in effect, that no nation should pollute the environment of its neighbour or contaminate the world's oceans or the atmosphere.

Our proposal met some resistance at the outset. But most U.N. member countries now agree that this principle is fundamental to the development of a body of international law which can deal with pollution on a global scale.

We have a big stake in international arrangements of this kind. As a nation with a vast territory, with the largest continental shelf and one of the longest coastlines in the world, we have much to gain from the enunciation of a universal good neighbour policy—a global environmental ethic—by the United Nations.

Mr. Stanfield: What about governmental pollution.

Mr. Davis: There are those who argue that international standards are undesirable. We do not agree. We say that nature's laws, themselves, are universal. They are all-embracing. Man breaks them at his peril. He breaks them and succeeding generations are the poorer for his lack of foresight, his lack of sensitivity, his lack of discipline on the biological front.

Biology, as a science, is still in its infancy. But we already know enough about nature to lay down certain tests. These tests involve life itself. We must not kill fish, destroy vegetation or wipe out wildlife. The preservation of a healthy environment for wild living things, in other words, is a prior condition to a high quality of life for us all. These simple biological tests, these simple standards, should not be confined to any one country. They are valid everywhere. They should be applied the world over, not in Canada, or in Canada and the United States, alone.

There will be frequent reference at the Stockholm conference, I expect, to economic growth and the impact which it is likely to have on all living things. I believe we can have both economic growth and a clean environment too. But having both calls for economic statesmanship of the highest order. We have to look ahead—a long way ahead. We have to operate our forest industries and our fisheries on a sustained yield basis. We will have to plan our cities better, arrange for industry to recycle its wastes, use the right kinds of energy, and so on.

There are many facets to the question of environmental control. We will be touching on at least 30 of them at Stockholm. Here are a few commitments which we are prepared to make now: Construct three out of ten of the world's base line stations for determining the quality of the atmosphere; improve the quality of our rivers discharging into the sea; sponsor a world-wide conference on the conservation of the living resources of the sea in Vancouver in February of next year; oppose ocean dumping of pollutants; propose that big tankers be confined to routes which avoid ecologically sensitive areas not only along our own coasts but the world over; and step up our research in the field of marine science.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that one of the steps the minister would announce as being taken within Canada would be the reduction of pollution by the government of Canada.

There is no question that this conference is important. I agree with the minister it is important that we try to achieve international standards and an international approach to preserving a healthy and proper environment for living creatures.

The international aspects of this problem are very clear. For example, Canada is faced with the problem of pollution of the Great Lakes and the Pacific, while to people living in Europe the need for cleaning up the Rhine River is obvious. This presumably explains the interest NATO has been taking in recent times in problems of the environment. It is obvious that the concern is world-wide. It is not only confined to our relations with our neighbours, to our polluting our neighbours or our neighbours polluting us. It is obviously a world-wide problem.

The minister did not say anything about what he hopes will come out of the conference by way of an ongoing institution, if anything. Will this conference be the end of the matter so far as a global effort is concerned, or does the government of Canada have some other expectation? Is Canada going to push for a continuing institutional arrangement? The minister did not mention this.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You tell us.

Mr. Stanfield: With all due respect to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), I have not yet got myself into the position where I can speak for the government, although I expect to be able to do so very shortly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Are you planning on crossing the floor?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I promise you I will not touch on any other sensitive areas. The minister did not say anything about the make-up of the Canadian delegation. I have heard reports about this. I will be disappointed if the Canadian delegation does not contain some representatives of the various parties in the House. I think it is of considerable importance that the Canadian delegation include some all-party representation.

The minister expressed hope that we can achieve both economic growth and preservation of our environment. I accept that. I believe we must have both if we are going to make any meaningful attack on poverty in our country and in the rest of the world. It does not really take us very far simply to say this because, as the years go by, we will have to ask ourselves increasingly how much growth there should be and what balance we want to have.

The minister mentioned some problems that are difficult enough themselves but are relatively simple, such as the management of forests on the basis of continuing yield and so on. These are goals which we have not yet achieved. They are important but relatively they are child's play compared with some of the world-wide problems relating to economic growth and preservation of the environment that we will have to face more and more in the future.

There have been suggestions that the conference in Stockholm may be disrupted, either by some of those in attendance or by others visiting Stockholm at the time. I express the hope that this will not take place and that the conference will proceed in a very constructive way.

In addition to expressing the hope, as the minister has, and that we can make progress in achieving international standards, it is important we recognize what we can do on our own by way of setting standards. In this respect I think we might make a much more determined effort than the government has made to achieve, determine and announce national standards with regard to air and water in our own country. When we do that our words will carry a little more conviction when we talk about international standards.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, having read the minister's statement at about the same time as he was making it here, I came to the immediate conclusion that the hon. gentleman, representing the government of Canada, is really engaged in the practice of establishing double standards in relation to the environment. He talks in glowing terms about hopes for the future, but when one weighs these words against the abysmal record of his own department in its activities here in Canada, they sound pretty hollow.

I am sure we all hope that valuable results will flow from the Stockholm conference next week. I do not decry it in any way. But I point out that concern about the environment is not the monopoly of any one group in this House, and some provision should be made for representatives from all parties in this chamber to attend, if not as participants, then as observers at that conference.

Regrettably, in Canada—this is why the minister's words ring hollow—we approach this subject on the basis of how much pollution the environment can stand instead of determining to control and restrict pollution to as great an extent as possible. The government establishes standards, to the extent it has established them, and then says: let us pollute as much as we possibly can up to that limit.

Mr. Davis: That is not our approach.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): During the question period the minister can ask me questions about anything I have to say and I will be glad reply to him.

The minister says it is necessary to argue strongly in favour of international standards while at the same time rejecting the concept of national standards within Canada, as he did vehemently when, for example, the Canada Water Act was being debated in the House. He says, for example, that we must not kill fish or destroy vegetation or wildlife. That is good propaganda. But on November 3 of last year the same minister put into effect pulp and paper mill effluent regulations which permit a kill of fish in waters into which pulp mills pump their effluent up to 20 per cent. How can one hold such a concept here at home while expecting people on the international scene to endorse the programs the minister is advocating?

An hon. Member: Stick to the facts.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Hon. members may not like what I am saying, but please listen. I am trying to reflect the concern of many Canadians about the environment, a concern which seems to escape hon. gentlemen opposite.

The minister talks of economic growth and environmental control at the same time; yet a very different attitude has been taken by the government toward the James Bay project and the pipelines which are to run down the Mackenzie Valley. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said he would be glad to accept applications to construct pipelines in that valley before the environmental studies had been completed. Again, this is evidence of a double standard.

The minister spoke of two or three things he hopes to do. One of them is the sponsoring of a conference on the conservation of the living resources of the sea in Vancouver in February of next year. I submit that the government should be moving in this direction right now, without waiting for a conference, by extending the provisions of the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act to cover the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Even beyond that, I suggest that the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, which this Parliament passed two or three years ago but which the government has not seen fit to proclaim, be implemented.

Further, it is proposed that big tankers be confined to routes which avoid ecologically sensitive areas—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind all hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Skeena who now has the floor, that under the Standing Order comments made at this time are to be brief. The Standing Order specifically provides that comments are to be brief. Hon. members are required not to make comments of a nature that would provoke debate; they should be limited specifically and clearly to the statement made by the minister. I am particularly referring to the requirement that comments be brief. When a three-minute statement is made by the minister and ten-minute comments are made by members representing parties in opposition, I think that is perhaps not respecting the spirit of the Standing Order. I hope the hon. member for Skeena and other hon. members will keep that in mind.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I quite agree, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize to you and to the House for having gone a little beyond the prescription of the rule. But so much is inaccurate in what is contained in the statement that it necessitated that sort of commentary.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wanted to congratulate the hon. minister for having supplied us this time with a good French text of his statement.

I also congratulate the hon. minister on the colour of the tie he is wearing this morning, which will certainly contribute to improve the environment in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister has informed us of the position Canada is to adopt at the United Nations Conference on the Environment in Stockholm next week.

Actually, in the second paragraph, he says:

—no nation should pollute the environment or its neighbour or contaminate the world's ocean or the atmosphere.

We are 100 per cent in agreement with this principle but on the other hand it should also be applied in Canada. We should, in fact, be able to say that no one should pollute his neighbour's environment or knowingly contaminate the atmosphere.

If this principle is valid on the international scene, it should first of all be applied in our own country, because we cannot require that other nations, do what we do not do in our country.

The hon. minister would definitely have more authority at the Stockholm conference if he could say this principle has been applied in Canada for a long time.

Mr. Speaker, the minister also stated, at page 2 of his statement, and I quote:

—We must not kill fish, destroy vegetation or wipe out wildlife.

Once again, these are good wishes, and we congratulate the minister for that. However, we should have preferred hearing him announce a new measure not only to prevent the killing of fish but to protect the environment.

We know quite well that the minister is aware of all the problems of pollution but that lack of funds cripple the efforts we could make to fight them.

In fact, improving the environment would cost billions of dollars, funds which the government lacks.

For many, many years, we have been denouncing the worst pollution there is in Canada, namely the financial pollution which prevents the minister from carrying out his projects. By way of a conclusion, may I say that finance has corrupted the economic atmosphere in Canada and, therefore—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITIONAL SALE OF WHEAT TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wanted at the earliest possible moment to bring some information of interest to the House. I say that because I was only able to put draft copies of an announcement into the hands of hon. members opposite.

The House has shown its interest recently in the use of hopper cars for the movement of grain, and also in the matter of the movement of grain out of the west coast. I am happy to inform the House that this morning the Canadian Wheat Board is announcing another sale of wheat to China in the amount of up to 58.8 million bushels.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, this indicates an acceleration rather than a delay in shipments of wheat to China, and beginning in July there will be an accelerated movement because of this new sale. About half of the grain involved is expected to be shipped to China in the calendar year 1972, for which a contract was announced previously. With this sale, the total amount of wheat going to China in 1972 will reach about 145 million bushels which, of course, will be an all-time high.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The sale is in the usual terms in cases of sales to China, with 25 per cent cash at the time of loading and the balance on credit in 18 months. As the Wheat Board release indicates, the credit terms are made possible under a guarantee to the Canadian Wheat Board by the federal government.

At this time I should like to take the opportunity of paying tribute to the Wheat Board commissioners, particularly the ones who negotiated this contract but to all of them as well, and a tribute to their staff who do a tremendous amount of work both in the selling of grain and assuring it moves to market on time, as well as assuring that so far as possible there is equity of opportunity for delivery among farmers in the region. We sometimes neglect to pay attention to the hard work done by people within a board like this, the commissioners and their staffs, and I want to take this opportunity to congratulate them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will be very conscious about your admonition about being brief, although a lot of platitudinous pap comes from the other side. I will simply say we are very glad to note this sale and to see that the government, prodded and pushed by the opposition over the past two or three years, has finally come to realize what can be done and should have been done. If the government will listen to us more often it will be a better government.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, one thing the minister will not lack is advice. We are pleased that sales are being made. This announcement indicates that the policy of formally recognizing China has been well worth while. This party was in the forefront in suggesting we ought to take a realistic attitude toward that country.

I am happy to hear the minister say he is confident our transportation facilities will be able to deliver the product. As to the hopper cars mentioned by the minister, I understand from his own statement that they are still at the order stage. As someone has said, the youngster is so far only a gleam in the eye.

• (1130)

The minister has said that the Wheat Board has finally proven to him and to his party that it is an efficient sales organization. He will have an opportunity when a bill comes before the House in a few days to include under the operations of the Wheat Board the other grains that western farmers are marketing. I say to the minister—and I think he must recognize it—that sales of the grains the Wheat Board has not marketed have not been as good. So I urge the minister to give the farmers a break by taking advantage of the opportunity to bring other grains within the ambit of the board.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself are also pleased to hear the minister say that a new wheat sale contract has been passed between China and Canada. This sale will certainly help the wheat producers of western Canada.

The minister announced that this sale of 1.5 million tons of wheat has been negotiated according to the following terms: 25 per cent cash and the balance to be paid in 18 months, the credit being guaranteed by the federal government to the Wheat Board. I would have liked to hear the minister say, for example, at which interest rate the sale has been made and with what money the Republic of China will pay the 25 per cent cash.

Mr. Speaker, the minister told us that the federal government will guarantee this loan or this credit to the Canadian Wheat Board. This is another occasion where Canadians provide nearly everything, but there is a lack of information. Canadians are deeply interested in the interest rate and in the amount which will be paid cash, and I feel that China will certainly not pay us with Canadian money because she has none. Will she pay us with American money? We do not know.

At all events, there was a wheat sale. The farmers of western Canada want to sell their wheat and we must sell it, but on terms that it will not be a burden for the Canadian people who, I think, bear enough at present in all fields of economic activity.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED REFERENCE BY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN TO SOME EMPLOYEES AS BEING CORRUPTIBLE SLOBS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. The Ottawa Journal of June 1 carries an account of a speech by the chairman of the Public Service Commission in which he is reported as describing some public servants as being "corruptible slobs". I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

That the subject matter of the chairman's speech be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates which yesterday had referred to it the annual report of the Public Service Commission for 1971.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. This motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Bell: The "no" was on the government side. Let that be recorded in Hansard.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the motion speaks for itself I do not think I need take any time to explain it. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House is of the opinion that the government should use the powers it has under section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act to rescind immediately the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission granting a rate increase to Bell Canada since such increase is not justified and is really a tax on the consumers by the corporation to provide it with interest-free capital for expansion.

Mr. Speaker: This motion moved under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED REFERENCE BY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN TO SOME EMPLOYEES AS BEING CORRUPTIBLE SLOBS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister concerning comments attributed in the press to the chairman of the Public Service Commission and the alleged reference by the chairman to members of the public service as "corruptible slobs". Will the Acting Prime Minister say whether he has made any inquiries or checked into these comments in order to ascertain whether Mr. Carson has any explanation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer that question. The alleged remark apparently occurred during the course of a speech made to members of the personnel association yesterday. I understand Mr. Carson has protested to the editor of the newspaper that carried the report and has provided an explanation of the context in which certain words were used. A motion has just been made to refer the subject matter of this particular speech to the committee. It is my understanding that Mr. Carson will appear as a witness before this committee shortly and perhaps that occasion might be used to clarify this matter.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that this is quite a different subject matter from the annual report of the commission which was referred to the committee yesterday, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether it is not the view of the government that an alleged statement of this sort is sufficiently serious that the government, in this case perhaps the President of the Treasury Board, ought to conduct an inquiry to satisfy itself concerning the nature of these remarks in view of their effect upon the public service and its morale?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. gentleman that the chairman of the Public Service Commission should have an opportunity to explain the circumstances about which the report has arisen. Hopefully this could be done on the occasion of his appearance before the committee.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Can we, therefore, be assured that the terms of reference which were agreed to yesterday by the House in regard to the Public Service Commission's annual report are sufficiently broad to permit us to question the chairman on the remarks he has made about corruptible slobs?

Mr. Drury: I do not want to speak for the chairman of the committee, but I will undertake to have a word with him to make sure that the assumption the hon. gentleman has just made is in fact verified.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTED REFERENCE BY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN TO SOME EMPLOYEES AS BEING CORRUPTIBLE SLOBS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it may be a few days before that committee meets, will the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of the government disown forthwith this reference to public servants as corruptible slobs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that it is not the view of the government that the public service is composed of corruptible slobs.

Mr. Baldwin: We had better stop him from reading the Prime Minister's speeches.

An hon. Member: How about the minister being one?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: I do not have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, who has a supplementary question, might be given the floor now and then I will recognize the hon. member for York South.

REPORTED REFERENCE BY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN TO SOME EMPLOYEES AS BEING CORRUPTIBLE SLOBS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT COMMITTEE WILL NOT BE INHIBITED

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister assure the House that the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates will be free of the interference and inhibition implied yesterday by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to have been the case last year in regard to that committee?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I think that the assumption on which the question is based is not justified; consequently the question becomes hypothetical.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESCIND

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications on a subject on which I have asked him questions formerly. In view of the fact that the increase in Bell Telephone rates came into force today, I want to ask the minister whether he has completed the study of this matter which was considered by the Canadian Transport Commission—he said he was making a study some time ago—and whether he has made a report to the cabinet asking for action to be taken to stop this totally unjustified gouging of the public?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I could not reach a conclusion as readily as the hon. member seems to be able to. I am still awaiting the report to which he refers. He may have heard the same news report as I did, that a citizen has apparently taken steps to obtain a judicial review of this decision, as is the right of any citizen, including the hon. member.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Or the responsibility of the government.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a citizen taking an appeal to a court, with all the steps and all the financial costs that are involved, is not likely to end this unfair increase for a long time, may I ask the minister whether he would undertake to give serious consideration to acting on his own motion or to the government acting on its own motion, as it has the authority to do under a section of the National Transportation Act, to rescind the decision of the commission?

Mr. Stanbury: I have said that I am doing exactly that, but I will not jump to a conclusion without analysis as the hon. member has.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if the minister was as concerned about the customers of Bell as he is to be smart he would do something.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: I have analysed the situation.

Mr. Stanbury: I hope I will have the opportunity to be as smart as the hon. member after the study has been completed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am hoping that both the minister and the hon. member will return to questions and answers.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—REQUEST THAT APPELLANT, DR. LLOYD BROWN-JOHN, BE PROVIDED WITH COPY OF TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Communications a question arising out of the fact that Dr. Lloyd Brown-John of the University of Windsor has in fact taken an appeal which has already cost him personally $250 to launch. Would the minister consider obtaining for Dr. Brown-John a copy of the transcript of the proceedings before the commission which would otherwise cost him $1,750?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): I will be glad to give consideration to that. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that this Parliament has provided procedures for the consideration of appropriate rates, and I do not think that a minister should abruptly come to a conclusion to interfere with the decisions of the commission without thorough consideration. I am quite willing to consider all the suggestions the hon. member has made, and I will be in a position to make a statement about the matter shortly.

Mr. Lewis: I would remind the minister that Parliament has given him the authority to rescind the decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South has had his turn. It is now the turn of the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

WHEAT—INQUIRY RESPECTING INTEREST RATE TO BE PAID BY CHINA ON ADDITIONAL PURCHASE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Would he tell this House what interest rate China will be paying on its recent purchase of wheat from Canada?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, both the price and the interest rate in a contract like this are confidential commercial matters between the buyer and the Wheat Board, but I would emphasize that the question of the interest rate is relevant really to the Wheat Board and to the farmers and not to the government because the government is not assisting in connection with the interest.

ALLEGED RESTRICTION ON USE OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY BY VESSELS OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question with respect to grain shipment is directed to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It is my understanding that vessels of the People's Republic of China are prevented from using the facilities of the St. Lawrence Seaway because of United States law. Is this the case and, if so, in order to speed future grain shipments to that country is the government considering making representations to the United States to alter that law?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I have never heard of any impediment of that sort to the movement of our grain out of eastern ports; I know that some of the Chinese wheat does in fact move out of eastern ports.

ADDITIONAL SALE OF WHEAT TO CHINA—EFFORTS TO RE-ESTABLISH PRICING UNDER INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in view of the price which was achieved for this sale to China, is the minister making renewed efforts to re-establish pricing under the International Grains Arrangement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Our efforts in that regard are constantly going forward.

POWER

AGREEMENT BETWEEN U.S. CONSORTIUM AND NOVA SCOTIA FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF NUCLEAR PLANT—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. An announcement has been made in Halifax that an American consortium has reached broad agreement with the provincial government of Nova Scotia for the establishment of a giant nuclear power plant in that province on Stoddart Island near Barrington Passage costing about $200 million for the purpose of distributing power to the northwestern United States by means of an undersea cable. Since this will be a large development, will the minister inform the House whether negotiations or discussions have been held between the federal government and the provincial government of Nova Scotia on this matter and, if so, when we can anticipate a report in the House on this development?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this in the past. I think that the best thing would be to get a comprehensive report and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has a supplementary to the previous question.

SUGGESTED INCLUSION OF OTHER GRAINS UNDER JURISDICTION OF WHEAT BOARD

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the very good record of the Wheat Board in marketing the grains under its jurisdiction and the difficulty we are having at present in marketing the volume of rapeseed we produce, would the minister consider bringing the marketing of other grains, or giving the producers an opportunity to do so, under the jurisdiction of the board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows from many exchanges in the past, I am prepared at a reasonable time to have a full assessment of the opinion of producers about the appropriate method of marketing such grains as rapeseed and to act upon the wishes of the producers.

ADDITIONAL SALE OF WHEAT TO CHINA—ASSURANCE BY RAILWAYS OF ABILITY TO MOVE PRODUCT—AVAILABILITY OF NEW HOPPER CARS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the questions asked about the sale of wheat to China. Can the minister in charge of the Wheat Board inform the House what assurances the railways have given about the movement of grain to the west coast in order to fill the new wheat order by China? Can he also indicate whether any of the hopper cars which are to be ordered for grain movement will be in service in time to assist in this movement of grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the second part of the question is yes. It is our hope that all the hopper cars will be in service before the end of 1972 and therefore they will clearly be available to help with the movement of this grain. The Wheat Board and the railways are in conversation from time to time about maximum capacities, both west and east, and I know that the Wheat Board is confident that this movement of grain can be accomplished.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST THAT REVISED INFORMATION BOOKLET BE PROVIDED BEFORE DEBATE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the House will probably be involved in a debate on the question of capital punishment before the end of the year, would the minister take steps to revise and bring up to date the very useful and objective booklet which a former minister of justice, the late Guy Favreau, put out with the assistance of an all-party group in the House and which contained statistical and philosophical memoranda in both directions?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has work hand in hand along these lines and he may well have information available for hon. members.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the minister discuss with his colleague the use of the practice that was followed last time when the booklet was exposed to members of all parties and was made available as soon as it was completed?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT MOTION SEEKING AMENDMENT OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask my question either of the Minister of Transport or the government House leader but as neither is present I shall ask it of the acting House leader. The question concerns item No. 25 on the order paper which stands in the name of the Minister of Transport. On behalf of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland and in view of the fact that this sizeable group of loyal Canadian citizens is being denied equal rights in matters of education with other religious denominations, may I ask the acting government House leader when item No. 25 on the order paper, a measure to amend the British North America Act, will be brought before the House for consideration?

[Mr. Burton.]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport will be in the House on Monday, and I shall bring this matter to his attention.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

REPORTED REPRINTING OF 1968 REPORT BEFORE TABLING TO DELETE CERTAIN REFERENCES TO INTERNATIONAL UNIONS

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the House whether the 1968 Calura report was destroyed after it had been prepared for tabling in Parliament and then reprinted in order to delete critical references to international unions, as is alleged in a newspaper called New Canada dated May, 1972?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister might reply to this question briefly but in the way it is phrased the hon. member is asking the minister to confirm or deny a report. If the question had been asked directly it would have been more in order. Perhaps we might assume it has been asked directly.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated this question and I sought the views of the statistician for Canada. He says that the allegation is false. No report was reprinted or altered due to pressures from international unions. The report on labour unions prepared under Calura is not designed to suit special interests and remains the responsibility of the Chief Statistician of Canada. One more line, Mr. Speaker please.

I am informed by Statistics Canada that in an effort to improve timeliness, the draft report was printed without the approval of the Chief Statistician who was out of the country for an extended period. His judgment upon review of the report—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister's lines are always long lines.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF URBAN RENEWAL GRANTS—PRIORITY OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and arises out of his announcement to the annual meeting of mayors and municipalities in Quebec City last week that he would be resuming urban renewal grants. Can the minister inform the House when this program will be resumed and can he also confirm that applications pending will be given priority consideration?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not what I announced. What I said was that we will be introducing legislation at a very early date to replace the present urban renewal sections of the National Housing Act. Of course the debate in the House today will be related to housing and we will be dealing with the government's progressive and forward-looking housing policy.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the minister confirm whether there has been consultation with communities that have had applications pending since 1968 before making his final decision on a suitable program?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, in terms of the suggested amendments that we have been considering within the government, the policies have been outlined to provincial ministers and, at my suggestion, in most cases municipalities have been involved in these discussions.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact a freight rate increase on potash went into effect yesterday and in view of the fact the minister is involved in that area, is it his intention to appeal the rate increase and ask the railways to rescind it?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that as notice.

TRADE

TRADING ACCOUNT FIGURES—PLANS TO ASSIST EXPORT INDUSTRIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of the deficit on trading account for the month of April because of the lack of exports and rising imports. I should like to ask the minister whether his policy planning with regard to Canadian industry in his department is based on the expectation that this will be a continuing situation or that this trade deficit is purely a temporary condition confined to one month?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the information provided in this morning's paper is wrong. It refers to a deficit of $35 million and it should be a surplus of $2.2 million.

Mr. Stanfield: It was what?

Mr. Pepin: It refers to a deficit of $35 million and it should have been a surplus of $2.2 million for the month of April. The difference is that they did not include re-exports in the export figures. The real figure is a surplus of $2.2 million. On the basis of the first four months of 1972 the seasonalized annual rate at the moment is about $600 million surplus in the trade balance for the full year. If you look at the last three months it is $900 million. That is the picture.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope this does not reflect any complacency on the part of the minister.

Mr. Pepin: No, far from it.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is not a deficit—it is not heavy water.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to ask the minister whether the government has any specific plans in mind to assist Canadian export industries which are not making any significant profits and are therefore not being helped by the budget. Has the minister any specific plans to help other Canadian exports which are suffering difficulties as a result of the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar, for example, about which the former minister of finance took a rather complacent attitude several months ago?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the minister any specific plans?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts as to the question. The hon. Leader of the Opposition is inviting the minister to make a statement which normally ought to be made on motions. He is inviting the minister to indicate what specific plans his department or the government may have under consideration in view of certain circumstances. That information should be given on motions.

• (1200)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for the length of my question, which was almost as long as the minister's answers. May I ask the minister whether he has any specific plans or whether he will make a statement at an early date, with regard to any specific plans to help industries that are not being helped by the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I keep pouring out communiqués; unfortunately, my hon. friend does not seem to read them. In the last four months we have created, in my department, four new ways of helping Canadian exporters. We are contributing 50 per cent of the cost of bidding abroad on capital projects; we contribute 50 per cent toward bringing potential buyers to Canada; we are contributing 50 per cent toward market analysis round the world and we are contributing 50 per cent toward participation in international fairs. We brought in a number of people from big trading companies in Japan to buy in Canada. Three of them have already bought more than $70 million worth of goods in Canada. We keep pouring these communiqués out every day. I regret that the hon. member does not read them.

ENERGY

PROPOSED GAS PIPELINES FROM ARCTIC TO HAMILTON AND MONTREAL—ABILITY OF INDUSTRY TO SUPPLY PIPE

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the new gas strike in the Arctic and in view of the suggestion regarding pipeline routes to Hamilton and Montreal, would the minister say if studies are being made to determine whether Canada's pipeline manufacturing capacity will be adequate to supply pipe for any such lines?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I could not answer that question on the spur of the moment. I will look into it and try to provide an analysis.

PROPOSED GAS PIPELINES FROM ARCTIC TO HAMILTON AND MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT ROLE IN RECONNAISSANCE AND ECOLOGICAL STUDIES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he say briefly in what manner his department is involved in the reconnaissance study that is being carried out, what efforts will be made to undertake ecological studies and what other involvement there will be?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that it is Panarctic that is involved in this matter and it falls under the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who also has responsibility north of the 60th degree of latitude for the area over which the pipeline would pass. I suggest that the hon. member might direct this question to the minister when he returns to the House next week.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF ICNAF MEETING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. As the annual meeting of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries is to conclude today, is the minister able to tell the House what success Canada has had in getting its position adopted? If not, can the minister tell the House when he will make a statement on the outcome of the conference?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have had considerable success in Washington. We have managed to get the principle of sustained yield management endorsed by all 15 nations. Quotas are being established. Canada's special coastal state position will also be recognized. The details will be announced this afternoon, I expect, in Washington at the conclusion of the annual meeting of ICNAF.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister say what happened to our proposal to ban salmon fishing on the high seas?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, we were unable to obtain the necessary 10 votes out of 15. We will, of course, continue to press for our policy involving a total ban on the high seas fishing for salmon.

POSSIBILITY OF LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE IN 1973 AND RESOLUTION OF DIFFICULTY RESPECTING ATLANTIC SALMON

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Since persistent, deep differences among some 91 nations preparing for a 1973 Conference on the Law of the Sea to rewrite imprecise and outmoded laws has threatened to delay action that is urgently needed to prevent serious international conflict over the uses of the ocean and the ocean floor, has any indication emanated from the recent conference, or from any discussion in which the minister may have taken part, that there will be a Conference on the Law of the Sea in 1973 to help to resolve these difficulties and, hopefully, to encourage the Danes to realize that conservation measures must be adopted to preserve our Atlantic salmon?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Law of the Sea Conference is still scheduled to be held in 1973. I hope it will be held next year. In preparation for this conference we are hosting an international conference of all those nations interested in conserving the living resources of the sea in Vancouver next February to help reinforce Canada's position by explaining it to other fishing nations which we hope adopt our policy for the Law of the Sea conference itself.

REQUEST THAT BAN ON ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY BE REMOVED IN LIGHT OF INABILITY TO ACHIEVE AGREEMENT WITH DENMARK

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of our inability to achieve a ban on salmon fishing on the high seas, is the minister now prepared to end what amounts to discrimination against Canadian commercial salmon fishermen and permit them to catch salmon until the Danes are prepared to cease catching salmon on the high seas?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): No, Mr. Speaker. I think that would be suicidal so far as the large salmon are concerned. We are offering our fishermen a formula, which most have already accepted, under which they will enjoy an income equivalent to that of their three best years in the 60's. Remember also that they will not have the expenses of going out to fish.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE MARKUPS ON SCOTCH WHISKY BY LIQUOR CONTROL BOARDS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Friday, as recorded on page 2592 of Hansard, I asked about the excessive markup on imported scotch whisky sold in Canada and whether this constituted a possible infringement of GATT. Has the minister any information for us, before we buy our bottle for the weekend.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, some countries of the world have protested to GATT that we in Canada, have a higher markup on imported whiskey than on Canadian-made whiskey. The government will be taking the matter up with the provinces concerned as part of the preparations for the general round of trade negotiations to be held under GATT auspices in 1973.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would the minister suggest that we switch to rum for the time being?

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—SUBMISSION OF HOWARD PAISH STUDY TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. Now that Secretary of the Interior, Rogers Morton, has approved the trans-Alaska pipeline system involving the shipment of oil from Valdez to Cherry Point by tanker, may I ask whether or not the report of Howard Paish and Associates, which was prepared for the government under contract, has been given to Mr. Morton and his department in order that they might study the recommendations made therein to deal with this situation?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. We are also hopeful that interested parties on the United States side, particularly in the Puget Sound area, will recognize the danger to recreation, real estate values and tourism in that area and join forces with Canadians in order to bring this threat to an end.

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—DISCUSSION OF PAISH REPORT WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement today that Mr. Richard Nehring, economic analyst for the Department of the Interior of the United States, has resigned because the investigation into the ecological effects of the proposed route has been completely inadequate, may I ask if the minister is planning any meetings with Secretary of the Interior Rogers Morton, or if any officials of the ministers's department are holding meetings, with a view to discussing the recommendations of the Paish report?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are currently engaged in meetings at the official level relative to the problem of tankers entering the Puget Sound area. Hopefully, these discussions at the official level will lead to fruitful discussions at the cabinet level.

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the pipeline-tanker route is implemented, has the minister any contingency plans for dealing with this, if all else fails?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, contingency plans are being developed, with the Department of Transport playing the leading role. These are necessary, in any case, because there are shipments of chemical and oil products in that area now. It is our expectation, of course, that if the trans-Alaska pipeline is built, 80 per cent or more of the oil will go direct by tanker to California. It is not essential that the oil be brought into the Puget Sound area even if the Alaskan pipeline is built, because Washington State refineries can be supplied by pipeline from Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We must make headway. I will return to the hon. member for Skeena in a moment, In the meantime the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

TAXATION

INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR DELAY IN MAKING INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister investigate and report to the House why income tax refunds to individual taxpayers whose returns are simple and uncomplicated are in many cases taking three months or longer to process?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into that question for the hon. member.

SALES TAX—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION ON ARTICLES MANUFACTURED BY THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may i direct my question to the Minister of State. Can he advise the House if any consideration is being given to extending the elimination of the federal sales tax to articles manufactured in institutions employing physically handicapped persons, in addition to the elimination provided in the budget, which affects articles manufactured by the deaf, mentally retarded, and so on?

• (1210)

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, the elimination of the sales tax on articles manufactured by deaf and blind people was provided for in the recent budget. Representations to the effect that this should be extended to the physically handicapped have been received. Any indication of a decision by the government will, of course, be a budgetary matter, and the hon. member will have to wait for a budget statement.

TRADE

TOBACCO—PROMOTION OF EXPORTS—STUDY OF UNITED STATES PLAN

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question refers to an answer given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wherein he recited several ways in which Canadian exports are being promoted. Has the government studied the plan of the United States government to promote sales of tobacco abroad with a view to applying it to assist in the export of Canadian leaf tobacco?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think you will find many people in the tobacco industry in Canada who will say that they have not been fully supported by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The recent sale to China which I announced was a direct result of the efforts of the department. If my friend knows of other ways in which we can support the tobacco industry, I will be glad to look into them.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I specifically asked the minister if he will study the means by which the United States government supports their tobacco industry with subsidies and still gets around the GATT—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously a suggestion by the hon. member.

POLLUTION

MEASURES TO PREVENT CONTAMINATION OF LAKES AND RIVERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries.

Since the minister stated a moment ago that town planning methods will have to be improved and that industry will have to recycle its waste, does he intend to bring in some amendments to Bill C-144 under which action could be taken against the polluters of our lakes and rivers?

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the legislation already on the statute books of Canada is sufficient to carry out the federal obligation in this connection.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RECENT MEETING

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has returned from high level meetings of the NATO alliance but has not deigned to come into the House and report on these deliberations, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if this casual attitude reveals a further dimunition of this government's interest in NATO?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION ORDER AGAINST TUAN VU—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT AID IN COURT ACTION TO SET ASIDE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Although he may already be aware of it, I draw to his attention the deportation order which was upheld by the Immigration Appeal Board involving Tuan Vu, a South Vietnamese deserter, and the fact that if the deportation order is carried out he will almost certainly be executed on his return to Viet Nam. Will the minister give consideration to appearing as an amicus curiae, I believe it is called, a friend of the court, in any action in a federal court to have this deportation order set aside?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in any action which is taken in connection with deportation orders it is the function of the Minister of Justice to act for his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, not for other parties to the proceedings. The Immigration Appeal Board, of course, takes into consideration fully all factors of possible danger to persons involved before arriving at conclusions.

Mr. Benjamin: Since the members of the Immigration Appeal Board have hearts of stone, may I ask the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. Will the Minister of Justice use his good offices to advise the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that a deserter from another country such as South Viet Nam should surely have just as much right as a deserter from the United States? In dealing with this situation there is some element—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation rather than asking a question.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO LEGAL AID PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Is the government going to respond to the plea of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association for more financial assistance to legal aid programs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it may not have been brought to the attention of the Civil Liberties Association but I thought it would have come to the attention of the hon. member that in the Speech from the Throne we indicated our intention to take certain steps to assist in the development of legal aid programs in Canada.

ALLEGED NEED FOR POLICE WARNING OF ACCUSED ON RIGHT TO SILENCE AND TO COUNSEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a supplementary question with regard to another request from the association. Is the association's request that police be required to inform an accused of his right to silence, counsel or subsidized legal aid going to be granted and, if so, when may we expect legislation to be introduced?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I answered to a very similar question in the House yesterday, the question of any changes in our criminal procedures is one which is being examined by the Law Reform Commission as well as within the Department of Justice. I foresee changes in the criminal law on a fairly frequent basis in the future. As I indicated to the House, questions like this will be considered by the commission, the department and the government.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SAILORS' MEMORIAL, HALIFAX—POSSIBILITY OF SECURING NATIONAL FINANCING

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will the minister again look into the question whether the sailors memorial in south-end Halifax can be considered a national monument and given national financing since that memorial represents the sacrifice of a country rather than the sacrifice of a community?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these monuments are not the responsibility of my department, but I will certainly take the hon. member's representations into account.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN DISABILITY PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE FOR RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to a question which I directed to his parliamentary secretary yesterday. It is recorded on page 2754 of yesterday's Hansard. Can the minister give me an answer before the question period is over?

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact the Minister of Agriculture has introduced a bill to amend the Farm Credit Act which will increase the limit on loans, can the minister inform the House whether he will be proposing any amendments or changes to the Veterans Land Act?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been a disinclination on the part of the Department of Veterans Affairs to extend and expand the opportunity for veterans to go into farming. It has been regarded as a phase-out operation. If there are amendments to the Farm Credit Act, there will probably be some parallel legislation required in our field.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to the response I received from the minister responsible for the wheat board to my earlier question. In relation to that, I wish to refer to the reply to order paper question No. 397 of the last session of Parliament, dated November 9, 1970. In answer to a similar question I received the following answer from the Department of Transport:

> The U.S. Code of Federal Regulations (specifically Section 207.441 of Title 33) covering security regulations for the St. Marys Falls canal and locks prohibits passage of "vessels of the Sino-Soviet block countries" through the Soo locks. This would appear to prevent passages of vessels from these countries via U.S. waters to all Canadian ports on Lake Superior.

In light of that response, I think the minister should reconsider his reply.

Mr. Speaker: That is possible, but it cannot be brought to the attention of the House by way of a question of privilege. Is the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe rising on a question of privilege?

• (1220)

Mr. Marshall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Veterans Affairs was aware of the question asked by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) in connection with basic rates of pension. I wonder why he did not answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has ended. I assume that the question can be asked again and answered at the beginning of next week.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ENACT MEASURES TO PROVIDE HOUSING AT REASONABLE PRICES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

This House regrets that the government has failed to take measures which would provide all citizens with decent housing at reasonable prices.

He said: Mr. Speaker, housing debates always offer members an opportunity to quote statistics, and I shall begin by citing one which I think illustrates the housing problem as well as any. The average family head buying a house this year will be approximately 72 years old before he has paid for his $30,000 bungalow. At the age of 72 he will have actually paid $103,939.20 for that bungalow if he has been able to arrange his payments at a rate of 8½ per cent over 40 years. He would undoubtedly be able to arrange a direct mortgage over that length of time, but 8½ per cent is an interest rate which belongs to a more golden age.

The figures show the staggering totality of the difficulty Canadians are up against in providing themselves with one of the elementary needs of living. I shall not try to cover all the aspects of housing in my speech. It would not be possible in 30 minutes. Anyway, my hon. friends will be making points in addition to those I make. Before I get into the burden of my speech, I should like to thank the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) for his courtesy. I advised him yesterday I would be proposing this motion today. He did have a meeting actually scheduled today on the west coast, but this he cancelled in order that he might be here for the debate. Perhaps we could work out a procedure whereby longer notice is given to the spokesmen for the ministry and for the other parties. This is something to which I would certainly give attention. I do thank the minister for his courtesy in this direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: This having been said, I would hope that the minister, when his turn comes to take part in the debate, will state the objectives of any changes in the National Housing Act affecting the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which will be proposed before the House rises for the summer recess. There has been considerable talk about legislation being just around the corner, but some of us expect that this corner may be at the end of a complicated maze and that we are not likely to see anything except the act which is currently before us and which will be before us some time next week concerning the details of the mechanism of mortgage finance. In particular, I hope the minister will state his objectives with respect to the housing of people in the low income groups, a largely neglected part of the population when it comes to housing.

We should also be given a clear indication by the minister of any measures designed to deal with the rehabilitation of older neighbourhoods. At one time it was fashionable to uproot them and substitute expensive urban renewal. We may have lost sight of the fact that much of the housing in Canada is old, and that a good deal of this old housing is occupied by the poor. By uprooting the poor we do not necessarily solve our problems; we may be substituting new ones. The rehabilitation of old housing is one of the priorities to which any government or parliament should pay attention.

In making some recommendations and setting forth a few suggestions for solving some of our present housing problems, I should like to begin with one we have sought to hammer home from time to time, and will continue to do so until the present situation is corrected. I refer to the sales tax on building materials. We have urged, sometimes by motion, and invariably during these debates on housing, that this tax is iniquitous, that it bears no relevancy to proper aspects of taxation and that it should be removed.

I should like to follow a somewhat different approach in presenting this argument today. A study by the technical research committee of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada estimated that on-site labour now represents 24 per cent of the cost of construction, whereas 15 years ago it represented 45 per cent of the cost of construction of a home. Building materials represent 74 per cent of the cost of a home—perhaps more, now, since those figures were compiled a number of years ago, and presumably the trend upwards has continued. Equipment rental accounts for 2 per cent. So, 76 per cent of the cost of the construction of a home involves building materials or equipment rental, both subject to the sales tax I have mentioned. The remainder is made up of labour costs. If we take between 6 and 7 per cent off that figure of 76 per cent, substantial savings can be achieved. For example, on the cost of a $30,000 home one could achieve savings in the neighbourhood of $1,000. This is not pin money; it is a substantial part of the cost of that house. This reinforces the argument which has been made in many other ways that the sales tax on building materials simply has to go. In the name of equity, common sense, and as a substantial way of getting housing costs within the reach of those for whom housing costs are just beyond reach at the present time, this is nothing short of a necessity.

The second point I should like to make has to do with land costs. These are particularly high around Toronto. Part of the difficulty is that the servicing of land by the municipalities always tends to lag behind the need for that land. There are always customers ready to buy serviced land. They have to wait their turn, and while doing so they keep bidding each other up. In the course of another study, made by the same HUDAC group in April, 1969, it was estimated that the cost of land of a 50 ft. lot in Toronto was in the neighbourhood of $13,000. This was the most substantial raw land cost of the cities surveyed. The other cities were Halifax, Montreal, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. It was so substantially different that it was obvious the Toronto area and that part of Ontario was being subjected to processes of urbanization that were much more advanced than those in any other part of Canada.

I have referred to this process before. I think this is about the fourth time I have told the House that the megalopolis is coming to this area of Canada along the St. Lawrence system between Montreal stretching down to Windsor, into Detroit and going into the United States as far as Milwaukee. All the expert studies conducted by the Doxiadis group, one of the world's leading authorities in this field, have shown that that area's population is developing at a faster rate than any other area in North America. The population growth will be greater than the population growth in the existing megalopolis on the eastern seaboard between Boston and Baltimore. We all know the severe problems that have been created along this particular corridor, such as transportation, pollution, socio-economic problems, crime and so on, by this one continuous strip of humanity. That is bad enough, but it can not only happen here, it is going to happen here. Many Members of Parliament, particularly the younger members, are going to be seized of this problem and perhaps overwhelmed by it unless something is done about it now.

In any event, I suggest this illustrates that land costs in Toronto are under particular pressure since Toronto is at the heart of this megalopitan development to which I have referred. It illustrates to me that several things are involved in land development and land costs. First of all, there is a need for an urgency in planning, certainly a much greater urgency than that shown at the present time. We need a planning that involves the cities and the metropolis of Toronto, the governments of Ontario and Quebec and every municipality in this particular corridor. Planning must also involve the new airport near Toronto, for example. Since three levels of government are desperately involved—and I use the word "desperately" advisedly—all the more reason for those governments to get together and tackle the problem of the St. Lawrence megalopolis. If this problem is not tackled now, then this generation which can see the problem coming will forever be reviled for having done very little about it. Therefore, it would be Conservative party policy to establish a national urban council of Canada representative of all levels of government to tackle this and the general problem of growing urbanization in Canada.

Another way to deal with land costs is to adopt the land bank proposal presented, and presented vigorously, by my leader. I suggest that in addition one consider the early provision of local services, sewage and water systems, for developments. The quicker these are tackled, particularly in high cost areas, the more the chance of keeping down costs. It is the land that lies dormant that attracts the high interest rates which are paid to the banks by the owner of the land, and we all know that the burden of these high interest rates ultimately falls upon the purchaser of the land. So there are at least three suggestions for dealing with some of the very aggravated problems that now exist, particularly in Toronto and in other parts of Canada.

Another point I should like to make flows out of a recent study presented by the Canadian Council on Social Development in Ottawa. This study has gone to every M.P.'s desk and I should like to deal with a point made at page 69 and with a recommendation that appears at page 74 which commend themselves to me. In talking of studies of housing requirements the report says:

On the whole, studies tend to be more concerned with housing demand (as a classical economic concept) than with determining the dimensions of effective demand and unmet housing needs and spelling these out in terms of both subsidized and unsubsidized new construction and rehabilitation goals.

This is the recommendation to be found at page 74:

We consider the development of as accurate estimates as possible of future housing requirements to be a prerequisite for an intelligent and purposeful deployment of resources in the housing field. Without a better appreciation of the dimensions of future effective and non-effective demand for housing, public interventions in the housing market can be likened to building a dam across a river without taking the trouble to measure the water's depth. It is unlikely we will ever devise comprehensive policies capable of providing decent and reasonably priced housing for all Canadians as a right until we learn a great deal more about the extent of our present housing shortcomings and the likely effect of future social and economic trends.

I should now like to go to a point that I made on March 13 when housing was being considered by this House. As reported at page 783 of Hansard I had this to say on the subject of housing for people of low income, and I think it illustrates the problem we are facing:

In 1968, the lower income third of the population of this country took 6.5 per cent of the money available for housing, the middle income third took 49.4 per cent and the upper income third took 44.1 per cent. Two years later the figures in those three respective categories were 5.3 per cent, 54.2 per cent and 40.5 per cent.

If you want to show how rapidly the position of lower income Canadians has deteriorated in almost the last decade, note that in 1965 the lower income third share of the borrowings was 17.9 per cent, which shrunk to 5.4 per cent in 1970—an almost incredible statistic—

Yes, an almost incredible statistic that shows a deficiency in government planning but, even more than that, an almost incredible indictment of the so-called just society. As the columnist Dian Cohen wrote in the Toronto Star, in a paragraph headed "Pitifully inadequate":

In the past 25 years, CMHC programs have produced about 250,000 housing units for the estimated 1,500,000 low income families in Canada. Simple arithmetic shows this number to be pitifully inadequate.

In the same article she went on to say:

The Charney report to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on low cost housing states that "the housing available at present for low income families is found for the most part in older existing stock. While only 41.3 per cent of the Canadian population lives in accommodations that were constructed prior to 1940, on the average 54.4 per cent of those with incomes less than $5,000 occupy such dwellings—in the Atlantic provinces and in Ontario the figures are 61.4 per cent and 60.0 per cent respectively.

• (1240)

I think we should investigate ways to permit low and middle income families to borrow up to 100 per cent of their property costs. At one time this would be considered heresy, but we have helped in other directions; industry has been helped in many ways, and this would have been unbelievable to Members of Parliament 30 or 40 years ago. I suggest these low and middle income families should be subsidized by the government to help pay for their homes. If we did this through the medium of public housing, which has to be subsidized as far as rental payments are concerned, we could somehow extend the concept and give the man or woman of humble means the ability to own a piece of the action in Canada. I find nothing distasteful in that kind of an approach. By low income, I do not mean only families or five or six living on $4,000 to $7,000 a year, I also mean families of 10 living on an income of $10,000 a year, because I think that such a family can also be considered to be low income.

Under Sections 15 and 40 of the National Housing Act, money is available to non-profit groups and municipalities to purchase existing property and to rehabilitate them for renting or selling. In my opinion this section of the act has not gone far enough. My party recommends that the federal government extend the National Housing Act provision to make federal grants and loans available for rehabilitation of existing dwellings. Financial assistance should be on the basis of individual need. There are 250,000 homes in Canada in serious disrepair, and about one million substandard homes. Something should be done in this regard. I suppose the difference between the minister and myself is that I would get these things done, and I am wondering when he is going to try to do something.

Another problem in the cost of residential rehabilitation results from—

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister may ask a question if the hon. member consents.

Mr. Basford: I was wondering whether the hon. member would permit a question? Does his last remark mean that he is calling for an immediate introduction of amendments to the National Housing Act?

Mr. McCleave: Yes. Another problem in the cost of residential rehabilitation results from the high proportion of elderly people who find themselves in this particular situation. Toronto studies have revealed that a high proportion of residents, living in housing which does not meet minimum city standards, are over the age of 65. Of the 1.7 million Canadians over 65, the income of one million of them consists only of the old age security and guaranteed income supplement. In their declining years our elderly citizens living on fixed incomes have enough difficulty maintaining a subsistent way of life without contemplating unbearable costs in the form of shelter maintenance.

I know, as I am sure other Members of Parliament do, of many families of old people who are scrimping on their diets and on almost everything in order to somehow scrape together enough money for taxes, heat and light bills and the like, simply to keep that house over their heads in which they have lived for so long.

Mr. Stanfield: The government is giving them almost 10 cents a day more.

Mr. McCleave: May I point out that the Dennis Task Force on Low-Income Housing in 1971 recommended that the federal government should undertake an aggressive land assembly program to stem the most inflationary factor in the housing cost; the price of land. However, the federal loan provision for the acquisition of servicing of land for housing purposes expired March 31, 1972. This is an indictment in itself. There should be better provision for earlier servicing of land. That is an important element.

Finally, I should like to refer to a point made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. This point naturally arose as a result of the obligations of these municipalities to raise the wherewithal for developing sewer and water services. Let me quote from this statement:

> The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities believes that the present system of sharing revenues among the three levels of government is out of balance. We feel that this imbalance is leading to a growing gap between needed and actual expenditures at the local level with a consequently detrimental impact on the quality of life in our communities. Moreoever, we feel that this imbalance promotes a deterioration in the independence and vitality of the municipal level.

I suppose some of them feel that way since they have very difficult negotiations with provincial governments. This federation then said in its statement:

> The solution lies, at least in part, in righting the imbalance with the introduction of a new source of revenue for local government. We therefore offer the following proposal:
> That the Federal and Provincial Governments agree to share with local government a portion of their proceeds from personal and corporate taxes;
> That the portion to be shared be decided upon by a tri-level conference;
> That the municipal share of personal income tax proceeds be distributed on the basis of place of residence;
> That the municipal share of corporate income tax proceeds be distributed on the basis of an equalization formula devised by a tri-level conference.

Later on in the statement, we find the following:

> The transformation of the revenue-sharing system in the last decade has not been of great benefit to the local level. Municipalities have been left to rely on a highly regressive, inelastic tax as their principle source of tax revenue. Moreoever, the present system leaves the local level at the end of expensive and costly conditional transfer programs. These programs, often initiated by other levels of government without consulting the local level, must be delivered by local government sometimes at the expense of their own responsibilities. The present system, in other words, not only fails to alleviate fiscal squeeze at the local level, it actively promotes it.

Let me give you another example. A poor individual might be left a Rolls-Royce by rich Aunt Emma, but may find the upkeep almost more than he can bear. I have mentioned the plight of older people again and again. Their housing needs are substantial. I use that argument to show why a new tax base is needed and why there has to be meaningful negotiation among the three levels of government in order to assist municipalities faced with staggering changes in the Canadian way of life, namely the rush toward urbanization. There must be a new tax base in order to tackle the problems of urbanization.

Frequently, older homeowners take the view that their homes will, with a minimum upkeep in expenditures, provide for their diminishing needs for the remainder of their days. Many are not interested in, or unable to undertake repairs. Improved property attracts increased property taxes, as an added price for keeping up the fabric and appearance of a dwelling. This is my point and it is particularly true of those people who are the greatest victims of inflation in Canada today. I would not, and cannot say when inflation is going to stop. If 18 per cent more money every year is to be printed on the presses of the Bank of Canada, costs will continue to go up and up, and most people will feel utterly helpless in the face of such a method of financing.

These are some of the ills and some of the solutions I would suggest. Above all, I suggest there is a need for greater action by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford). As I have said, he needs greater powers, and this has been argued by others including my leader. That gives me hope the day will come when we will have a federal department that will not only pay lip service to the idea that Canada is rapidly becoming urbanized, that the rural pleasantry of the Canada of Sir John A. Macdonald is giving way to the vast conglomeration in our cities, but will introduce policies that will be wise and sensible enough to provide a more stable and more meaningful way of life for the people living in the cities. I have presented some of my suggestions. My colleagues will follow with others. The matter is really too important to be simply a matter of presenting ideas over and over again in Parliament. This is a time for action. It is a time for action now.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party agree with the substance of the motion brought forward by the Progressive Conservative party. We say the government has failed to take measures which would provide all citizens with decent housing at reasonable prices. If a vote were to be taken on the motion we would add two amendments. The first amendment would be to the effect that the government has failed to provide decent housing at reasonable cost and also at reasonable interest rates. The second amendment would be to the effect that the government has failed to give any protection to purchasers of new homes against home builders who perform shoddy and defective workmanship and supply inferior materials in the construction of new homes. Those are the two amendments we would move.

I am sure most Canadians agree with the principle set forth in the task force report on housing back in 1969 when it declared that all Canadians should be entitled to clean, warm shelter as a matter of a basic human right. We in the New Democratic Party, and many others, would adopt the stronger and more forceful approach that was set forth by the Canadian Social Development Council when it said that all Canadians should be guaranteed the right to decent housing, whether or not they can afford it. The government has failed to implement either of these two principles. I agonize when I recall the performance of the ministers since I came into the House of Commons in 1965.

First, we have had five ministers in eight years. I am sure the officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation cannot sing the familiar song "I am getting to know you" because having five ministers in eight years does not give leadership for the development of firm policies under the National Housing Act we have today. I recall, first of all, when John Nicholson and the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson) took the approach of acting as friendly bankers and just supplying the money without giving leadership. In the period 1965-68, we had a tremendous shortfall in housing construction units across the country.

Then we had the present member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who set up a task force to study the problems of Housing. That task force reached certain conclusions. First of all, it said that the private sector could take care of the housing needs. It is obvious that the private sector has failed to achieve this objective. Second, the then minister said we should take the ceiling off interest rates and then the interest rates in all probability would drop. The government failed to adopt that approach. The minister at that time then suggested that a damper be placed on public housing. The result was that public housing was set back and the need for public housing across the country has intensified. Finally, he said we should deal directly with the municipalities in respect of purchasing land. He presented this proposal to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who rejected it. The result was that the present member for Trinity resigned as minister.

Then we had the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras), who brought to the housing portfolio the compassion and sincerity he acquired when dealing with the Indians. He became overwhelmed with the problem of housing and said that we must take the research approach. He hired Harvey Lithwick who brought forth a report. No action was taken on the report and Mr. Lithwick had to resign. He said the whole department is just an empire-building bureaucracy. Then, we had Michael Dennis, because the minister said we should have a report on research and planning in respect of housing. This report has been concealed. We have a concealment of reports by the present minister, especially those which would be embarassing to the government. The minister refuses to table them and make them public. He keeps us all in the dark in respect of their comments and recommendations.

Then, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said we must have innovative housing and undertake a new approach. The government set aside $200 million to take care of that. The housing committee of the Canadian Social Development Council put the situation quite well when, in its report, it said that there was nothing innovative with regard to the houses built and that in fact if there was any result it was smaller homes on smaller lots. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs then decided that a new department should be set up and that he should be made the Minister of Urban Affairs. This was what he did. Perhaps he was embarassed in respect of his other position as Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. He was probably charged with being the minister without housing in charge of portfolios. As a result, we have the present minister who this morning said we would have progressive and forward-looking proposals from this government.

I have seen nothing new, nothing bold, nothing courageous and nothing aggressive undertaken by the present minister. In fact, he has presented one bill, Bill C-209, which really constitutes a financial rip-off with regard to the financial institutions which have persuaded him to give them certain tax concessions provided they place their money in mortgages. When that bill comes forward I shall deal with it in more detail. All the minister has done has been to present four proposals to the provinces in respect of public housing. For the low income people, he introduced mortgages over a 40-year period and introduced certain amendments in respect of home improvements. All he is doing is tinkering with the National Housing Act. He is not bringing forward any serious proposals to deal with the housing problems we have in Canada. The result of this attitude and the non-performance I will deal with in more detail at two o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, before the luncheon adjournment, I said that by reason of the multiplicity of ministers in charge of housing in the last eight years, and by reason of their attitudes with regard to policies as well as by reason of their non-performance, there have been certain results with regard to housing in Canada. I should like to set forth those results to you, Mr. Speaker.

First of all, we have had a serious housing shortage, more especially for senior citizens and persons of low or modest incomes. The total housing stock in Canada is disgraceful, and less than 2 per cent of housing consists of public housing. That is the first result. The second is that we have the highest housing costs in the world. For example, in the city of Toronto the average cost of a house is $32,000. Third, we have the highest interest rates in the world, and they are still going up. The newspapers indicated yesterday that the interest rates will probably exceed 10 per cent again and that NHA mortgages will probably be around 9¼ per cent in the very near future.

Let us consider, for example, a young couple 30 years of age buying a home on a 40 year mortgage at the interest rate of 10 per cent. They will finish paying for it at the age of 70, and by that time they will have paid at least three to four times the original cost of the house which they purchased by reason of the high interest rates. Fourth, we have the highest rents in the world. One does not have to go beyond Ottawa to realize how high the rents are. Fifth, we have the highest land prices in the world. Sixth, we have the highest legal costs for home buyers in the world. Is it any wonder that the present minister has earned the title of minister of the most expensive housing in the world?

In addition, we have no integrated national housing policy whereby we would have national consultation among the three levels of government. Thus, the needs for housing would be determined, the proper mix of housing would be determined, the financing needs for housing would be determined, and new building techniques would be incorporated in a national housing policy. The present minister has given us nothing of this nature, and I am sure he will promise us nothing this afternoon. The last result has been that we have no laws to protect home buyers against builders who perform shoddy and defective workmanship and who supply inferior materials in the construction of houses. It is bad enough to be aggravated by the high cost of a home, but to have the further aggravation of no protection against shoddy construction of that house adds real insult to injury for people who buy houses in Canada.

We in the NDP have set forth in the past our approach to these problems, and this afternoon some of my colleagues will deal with some of the areas that I have mentioned this afternoon. I want to dwell on the last point I made with regard to the lack of protection for home owners against defective workmanship and inferior materials. In the April issue of Canadian Homes, Professor William A. W. Neilson, who is a professor at Osgoode Hall attached to York University, set forth in an article what happens when people have no protection with regard to homes that they buy. He said that people who buy television sets and vacuum cleaners have more protection than a purchaser buying a home in Canada today. He mentioned a case in Burnaby, British Columbia, where purchasers of condominium town houses were complaining of seepage in the basements, lack of promised sound proofing, wet crawlspaces, and unfinished landscaping. They appealed to the Attorney General of British Columbia and also to the minister of municipal affairs, but were told that they could do nothing about it. One of the purchasers said that he realized at that time what the Latin words "caveat emptor" meant—"Let the buyer beware" because of the sad experience they had.

In the city of Sudbury, Mr. Speaker, 20 owners of new homes had to abandon them because the plumbing and sewage facilities were condemned and nothing was done about it. People in Deep River, Ontario, were having trouble with a builder on the same problems of construction and materials defects, so they thought they would go to the source of supply. The mortgages on these homes had been arranged by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the owners thought that they would be interested in their problems. The attitude expressed by CMHC was that the inspections made on their behalf were just to protect the security of the mortgage loan that they had placed on the property and that the purchaser had no protection as far as CMHC was concerned. This is the attitude of CMHC with regard to guarantees. This problem has been repeated across Canada. There are many instances in Quebec and I am sure members of the Social Credit party and the Liberal party will set forth some of the agonies that purchasers there have experienced. Mr. Speaker, I have had some contact with people in the Talvin housing project in Hull, Quebec and one of the purchasers gave me a list of 30 items that were defective in construction and materials. Very little or nothing has been done, and many of the purchasers have had to go to court in an attempt to set aside the contracts they had entered into with the builders.

What is the answer, Mr. Speaker? The Ontario Law Reform Commission said in 1968 that we should place the whole responsibility for supplying reasonable workmanship and good materials on the builder for at least six years. In other words, Mr. Speaker, there should be a guarantee that the home is fit for habitation, built of proper materials, constructed in a proper and workmanlike manner and free from defects of construction. I would remind the minister that in England there is a two-year guarantee and an arbitration system to settle disputes. They have also imposed a ten-year coverage against major structural damage and there is insurance to protect the buyer if the builder should go bankrupt.

What does the government of Canada do through CMHC? Nothing. What is the practice in the United States, Mr. Speaker? Under HUD, the Housing and Urban Development Program, guarantees are built into the federal housing act whereby the government has power to pay for repairs if they are necessary because of defective work and materials and to deduct those moneys or recover those moneys from the builder. In Canada, there is the Housing and Urban Development Association which is comprised of the builders. The best they can do is to give a one-year contract which is worded in a manner which makes it virtually impossible to take them to court.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when the CMHC should give leadership with regard to this important problem. May I remind you that for years CMHC has insured the loans given out by them. They have insured them with regard to any default by the purchaser and if a financial institution suffers a loss as a result, it can be reimbursed out of the fund. It is really the purchaser who reimburses them, Mr. Speaker, because he has to pay one per cent of the loan by way of an insurance fee. At the moment, there are over $300 million in the reserve fund of CMHC to cover this. Surely, they could set up an insurance scheme whereby prospective purchasers would be protected against defective workmanship and material in cases of loans given by approved lenders and direct loans by CMHC. This is the least they could do. This is the leadership they must give and I would ask the minister this afternoon to assure the home purchasers in Canada that they have some protection.

We have dealt many times with the question of high interest rates. In the New Democratic Party we feel that the highest interest rate that should be charged on a mortgage in Canada at the moment is 6 per cent. The financial institutions of this country have a social responsibility to meet this requirement. Under the financing mechanism of the bill that is expected in the near future, an adequate flow of money will only be assured if the insurance companies and financial institutions receive at least 10 per cent.

We have said many times that the land bank assembly plan is necessary. When we were discussing estimates, I asked the minister how much money CMHC had set aside for this proposal and he said not one cent. This is one of the main problems involved in the high cost of land today. Is it any wonder that most of us have become disgusted with the performance of this government? I hope that the people of Canada in the next election will see clearly the extent of—

Mr. Basford: Thirty million.

Mr. Gilbert: —their non-performance and throw the rascals out.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscaminque): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today has been moved by a member of the official opposition, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and it reads as follows:

Housing Prices

This House regrets that the government has failed to take measures which would provide all citizens with decent housing at reasonable prices.

It contains, as usual, pious wishes. The present housing situation did not arise yesterday; actually, it has always existed.

• (1420)

Thirty years ago, we were faced with a housing problem in Canada. Such problems existed during the economic crisis that raged from 1929 to 1939. Indeed, some people were living in shacks. This means therefore that the housing problem is not new.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants stated that the only difference between him and the minister was that if he were in his place, the situation would be improved forthwith. And yet, he does not know precisely the minister's intentions in this respect. He also said he was very much concerned to note that the Bank of Canada was easing credit more than usual which could pave the way for more inflation.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that if we want to guarantee a house to every citizen, it will be necessary to turn to some form of credits. At the moment, we make use of the credit facilities of finance companies, of insurance companies, of the CMHC, of chartered banks and, often enough, of Caisses Populaires and Credit Unions. And we complain that there are not enough dwellings for the very reason that there is not yet enough credit available.

In order to show that the situation referred to is not new, may I recall that when I was first elected to the House in 1946, the Prime Minister was the right hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, to whom the right hon. Louis St-Laurent succeeded. We had as leader of the opposition Mr. Bracken, whose successor was Mr. Drew. Thereafter, we had the right hon. Lester B. Pearson as Prime Minister of Canada. Today, we have as Prime Minister the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau). As leader of the opposition we have had the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who was replaced by the present leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield). And in 1962, when we entered the House, the Housing problem existed already. Please note that from 1958 to 1962, the country was administered by the strongest government ever in office in Canada after Confederation. In fact, the Progressive Conservative party elected 208 members out of a total of 264. At the time, nevertheless, we had to struggle with housing problems.

I remember having heard the Liberal Party, on the opposition side with us, request from the Progressive Conservative ministers remedies to the housing problems. However, despite the overwhelming power of the government at the time, it was unable to solve those problems, with the result that today we still have to face them.

After 10 years of administration and research dissension can be found almost everywhere across Canada. One province wants one plan and another province wants another plan. The province of Quebec has intervened directly in the housing field because it wanted to have its own housing department and to finance construction.

This led to direct confrontation between the different levels of government instead of an understanding to solve once and for all the housing problem in Canada. There are various points to which we could refer regarding this problem.

For instance, my distinguished friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), was saying that at the present rate of interest, a 30-year old family man who contemplates buying a house on a 40-year instalment plan will have to pay three or four times the value of his house. It is true, as is evidenced by the fact that according to statistics or accountants' studies, a $25,000 house built this year will cost $94,000—almost four times the value—40 years from now. If the man who borrows and spreads his payments over 40 years is now 30 or 40 years old, this means he will finally own his house when he is 70 or 80 years old. Who is going to become a home owner at that time? Do you think that people can afford to go on making monthly payments of $150, $160, or $175 after they have reached the age of 60 or 65? It is inconceivable! When will Canadians become homeowners?

Under the present system it is a physical and mathematical impossibility. It would be possible physically, considering the availability of materials, of labour, and of engineering. We know we have all that, but what we lack is credit, which is not adapted to physical possibilities.

The hon. member for Broadview suggested earlier that the interest rate should never exceed 6 per cent. But even at 6 per cent, a person will still pay twice as much as his house is worth. It is intolerable to have to pay double the value of one's house; at 6 per cent interest, a $25,000 house will have cost $55,000 after 40 years—$30,000 in interest and $25,000 in capital. The borrower will make payments which he may not be able to keep up from the time he reaches 55 years of age, not 60 or 65.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that to encourage people to become owners at the age of 75 or 80 is to fool Canadian consumers, those very people who need housing, who do not ask for a lot, who do not ask for the impossible, but who quite simply ask that the huge resources of Canada be used to serve Canadians.

Many factors contribute to the high price of housing as well as the high monthly instalments. The famous 11 per cent sales tax on building materials whose removal has been advocated for many years is not likely to help the buyer of a new home. The provincial tax is added to the federal tax because nowadays taxes are taxed; the 11 per cent federal tax in Quebec is taxed at an 8 per cent rate by the province of Quebec. Therefore, we have reached a point where we have to pay taxes on taxes. That surely does not help lower the excessive cost of building materials and housing. All companies are quite aware of such things.

I shall deal now with another aspect: building defects in houses, as mentioned a while ago. They are so obvious that we often wonder whether the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the department officials are not more interested in granting contracts to housing contractors than in providing homes for those who need them. That is quite true.

We know that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has paid in full contractors who had built houses, and barely three or four months later the foundations became defective, walls begin to sag and floors to warp. That happens everywhere, and the minister is aware of it. Are the inspectors not discharging their duties? Are they waiting for the contractors to tell them? Do builders contribute to the party's electoral fund? I do not know, but something is wrong, Mr. Speaker, because some houses are really in very poor condition after two or three years of occupancy.

In my opinion, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the department should take the necessary steps to ensure that serious inspections are being made during the construction of houses. I congratulate the minister on that score. Last year, for instance, more attention was paid than usual to single-unit dwellings. That pleases me tremendously because, we, of the Social Credit party, feel that there is enough space in Canada for every family to live in its own home, instead of 30-floor buildings, where families with five, six or seven children live on the 30th floor, go up and down elevators, deprived of their own yard in which to play, in a complex of hundreds of dwellings. Those buildings resemble chicken coops more than healthy dwellings.

In the Laurentians, the Eastern townships, barely 20 miles out of Quebec, Toronto, Montreal and Hull, vast expanses of land could be used to build nice little homes for Canadian families.

Recently, I was in the Dehli, St. Thomas and St. Catherines area in Ontario; I saw vast stretches of land where the construction of single-family dwellings could be promoted.

The conditions are the same in western Canada; when you arrive in the Prairies you realize that there is no lack of land. It is therefore not a question of space. We have enough space in Canada to accommodate 500 million people and we only have 21 million inhabitants; that means that we have ample space to provide housing for everybody.

I am really sorry to see people who would rather live outside large cities, because it is healthier and promotes social life, stuck in chicken coops along St. Catherine and Ontario streets, in the south or east end of Montreal, while there are numerous places where these people could settle, till a garden, raise their children in peace, what they cannot do in large cities.

Mr. Speaker, I may not be there anymore, but I know that in a few years, an honest and enterprising government will have to face this task of clearing the big cities a little bit, so as to enable people to live, not in polluted but clean air, in areas where pollution has not yet caused any damage as in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Edmonton, etc. Let us call it a kind of return to the countryside, not as in Vautrin's days—a kind of return to an acceptable life, close to nature. Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), who must indeed be happy to go home to the Gaspé peninsula for the weekend and breathe the sea air whereas in Ottawa, if I am driving behind him I have to breathe the carbon monox-yde released from the exhaust of his car, which is distasteful to me.

If I followed the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to Drummondville, it would be the same, and I am sure the minister has managed to find himself a little lake near Drummondville.

Whether it is in the direction of Sherbrooke or elsewhere, everyone is seeking nature, which is quite normal.

As for town living, why does one do it? To get employment, security of some sort. But if such security were available away from the cities, I can guarantee, Mr. Speaker, that they would not be crowding two million strong as, for example, in the city of Montreal, but there would be decentralization so that human beings could breathe, not merely with the permission of finance, but breathe freely the air with which the Creator filled the world so that we could live decently.

Mr. Speaker, in the field of housing, there is ample space for improvement. Above all we ought to try to reduce the sales tax which contributes to increase construction costs. It would also be necessary to reduce interest rates; not long ago, we were mentioning interest rates of 6 per cent. The minister might very soon announce that we will have to pay an interest rate of 10 per cent. I say that Canadians should not pay one cent more than the actual administration cost for building houses. What would that mean? That we would only have to pay an interest rate of 1 3/4 or 2 per cent to offer the directors a decent salary. On the other hand, we should stop paying a tribute to those who only provide credits for the construction of houses.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes hope that we will succeed one day in providing all Canadian families with wholesome housing instead of letting a good number of them suffer, as we do now. If we took every necessary step to build new homes perhaps we would not have any unemployment this summer in Canada, because there is an urgent need for housing. We could give a job to university students as well as to thousands of unemployed. So we could provide Canada with new riches, consisting of wholesome one-family dwellings for all families in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has chosen to use one of their opposition days to debate housing and urban affairs. It gives me a chance to discuss some of the government's thinking in terms of a housing policy and, hopefully, to get some ideas from the opposition as to what they think the housing policy should be.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I listened to his very thoughtful speech on the question of housing. I am delighted to learn that his thinking and ideas follow closely along the lines of what was predicted in the Speech from the Throne issued by the government at the beginning of this session and follows closely the line adopted in my own speeches on the subject of housing. I am glad that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants agrees with me that we should introduce the amendments to the National Housing Act, which the government wants to introduce and wants to introduce forthwith. On learning the thinking of the opposition which obviously agrees with the government's proposals, I hope that the legislation will have very easy passage through this House in the next few weeks.

The hon. member speaking for the Conservative party also talked about repair and rehabilitation, land costs, servicing costs, the process of urbanization, land banking, the Audain report, the comprehensive demand for housing and a program to assist in home ownership. Some of those points will be dealt with by me today. Many are dealt with in legislation before the House or which will be introduced very shortly. Other points will be dealt with by other speakers this afternoon. I do want to thank the hon. member for a thoughtful and comprehensive speech on the subject of housing. He covered so many subjects on the cost of housing, he illustrated far more effectively than I can that the cost of housing is made up of many factors. There are many things responsible for these costs and many policies responsible for keeping these costs down. There is no one easy, simple answer to the question of providing reasonable housing at a reasonable cost.

I listened with amazement to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party. I always do. He seems to think houses can be built or other policies solved by engaging in sarcasm, clichés, catchwords and smart-alec expressions. I have never found that that builds many houses. Canadians have a housing need but it will not be solved by acting in a partisan way. The hon. member for Broadview is in the habit of making a series of unsupported assertions but they are really no substitute for concrete policies and proposals. For example, I was amused to hear him describe the government's amendments to the Housing Act as "tinkering with the National Housing Act". These amendments have not even been introduced yet, so how he could describe them as tinkering is beyond me. Such a criticism can only come from a man who is reckless with his words, and reckless with the House of Commons.

The debate this afternoon gives me an opportunity to put on record briefly and quickly what has been done in the last four years during the life of this government. Listening to opposition speakers one gets the idea that nothing has been done, though, in fact, houses have been built in Canada over the last four years in record numbers and at record levels.

Mr. Orlikow: For whom?

Mr. Basford: For the low income people and the senior citizens. I shall come to that. The number of housing starts in 1971 reached an all-time record of 233,653, a total of more than 830,000 starts over the last four years. The opposition says numbers are not important in housing, but it seems to me an essential element in housing policy is to build houses. That is what we have been doing, and we have been doing it at a record pace. All the indications are that even this record will be surpassed in 1972, with more than 240,000 starts. This is a tribute to my predecessor, it is a tribute to the government's housing policies and it is a good basis from which to begin improving our policies.

During this period, the government's efforts have been directed not simply to creating numbers of dwelling units but to ensuring that housing is available to those who need it most. Policies have been deliberately aimed at providing for those who need financial assistance in getting housing. Through its agency, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, more than 140,000 housing units have been created in the past four years under programs designed to help people with low incomes—more than twice as many low income units as were built in the previous 22 years. Therefore more has been done in the last four years than in the previous 22 years, including the five years in which the Conservatives were in office. I have not included in those figures some 50,000 hostel units built with CMHC financing.

In dollar terms, more than $2 billion in loans at favourable interest rates have been made available for low income housing in the past four years as compared with less than a billion dollars back to the end of the second world war. By far the largest proportion of CMHC loan and capital commitments for housing over the last four years has been directed to housing for people in the low income group. In 1971 this proportion amounted to 83.2 per cent. In 1972, more than $500 million is allocated for this purpose. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) a few moments ago, asked "For whom?" I answer him by saying the efforts of the government have been devoted almost exclusively to providing homes for those who do not have the financial resources which enable them to acquire homes in other ways.

Our policy in this regard is clear. These programs have been carried out and have achieved their outstanding success through the co-operation of the provincial governments and their housing agencies which are active and enthusiastic partners in helping to meet the housing needs of Canadians. I do not wish to imply that all the solutions have been found. Much yet remains to be done in developing new techniques, new mechanisms for co-operation, new policies. Over the last few years we have carried out a number of studies and appointed a number of task forces. Some reference has been made to this today. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) that the time for new legislation is here. Already one piece of legislation has been introduced—Bill C-209 which is presently before the House. The time has come, now, for changes to be made in the National Housing Act, and I am glad that hon. members opposite agree with me. The record in housing achievement is more than satisfactory and we are also putting before the House and the country new, bold and imaginative policies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What are they?

Mr. Basford: I wish to mention three aspects this afternoon—the legislation relating to mortgage financing, the National Housing Act amendments and the process of tri-level discussion and consultation with the provinces and municipalities. I refer, first of all, to Bill C-209, the residential mortgage financing act which I had the honour to introduce a few days ago and which is on the House leader's agenda for business. I hope it can be dealt with next week, be given second reading and sent to committee for study as soon as possible. There will, I hope, be opportunities before the end of June for members to deal with this bill, give it third reading and see it proclaimed. The measures contained in the residential mortgage financing act represent the latest in a series of initiatives by the government to bring more private capital into the residential mortgage market. Our purpose in doing so is to ensure that financing is available at the most reasonable cost possible to people in the middle income group and for those who cannot obtain financing in the usual way. The two institutions to be created through this legislation are the Residential Mortgage Market Corporation and the mortgage investment corporations. These institutions will eliminate some of the difficulties which institutions and individuals have found in investing in residential mortgages, and will make these mortgages more nearly as attractive and convenient as are other kinds of investment. Even a small shift in the investment policies of the banks and financial institutions could lead to huge injections of capital into the residential mortgage field and cause a depressing effect on interest rates, making access available to greater amounts of money.

I should like to turn, now, to consider a piece of legislation which the opposition wants me to introduce forthwith. I can undertake, on behalf of the government, that the bill amending the National Housing Act will be introduced shortly. I do not want to anticipate the business of the House, but since the subject is relevant to this debate I believe I would be in order in speaking briefly on the government's intentions with regard to the National Housing Act. The amendments which will be introduced fall into a number of categories. There are amendments relating to the repair and rehabilitation of existing housing stock. There are proposals for neighbourhood improvement programs to replace the old urban renewal provisions under the National Housing Act. There are provisions designed to assist people with low incomes to buy their own homes. There are provisions relating to non-profit housing to accommodate elderly people and people with low incomes.

There are new and important provisions relating to the co-operative movement, and I shall be particularly happy to introduce these because I shall be the only minister in 70 years to bring forward federal co-operatives legislation.

The amendments which we will propose are intended to modify and strengthen the act, and to make it a more precise and effective instrument for dealing with the most pressing and significant housing and community building tasks. They will provide the federal, provincial and municipal governments with a greater flexibility and permit different approaches, in different parts of Canada, to different kinds of problems. The amendments will also be a response to the growing concern throughout the country, not only with houses but with the neighbourhood environment. They will support provincial and municipal initiatives to preserve the neighbourhood as a living community and where possible to improve and enhance it—instead of destroying it by bulldozing it away.

The amendments will also give expression to the government's policy of conserving and rehabilitating good usable housing, consistent with our view that the public concern must be for the entire housing stock—the old, as well as the new. We have heard discussed today the need to keep in our housing stock old housing and to make it good housing. The act's provisions for assistance in the public assembly of land will be extended and strengthened to make this program more useful to provinces and municipalities for land development and the creation of new communities. I observe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in the House and I am complimented by his presence. The other day he was speaking in Toronto to the Urban Development Institute, but I had some difficulty following his speech. He spoke of the need for land assembly. Our amendments will go far beyond what he was proposing in speaking to the Urban Development Institute.

Specifically, the amendments will increase the range of choice available to low income people with regard to the kind of home they live in and the kind of tenure by which they occupy it. The non-profit housing provisions of the act will be made more generous to encourage the church groups, service clubs and similar organizations who sponsor this kind of accommodation. New measures will be proposed to provide financial assistance in the form of loans and matching federal-provincial subsidies for low income people who wish to own their own homes. We intend to give these people the opportunity of purchasing their own homes and having that pride of ownership that goes with the purchase of a home.

Other assistance in a similar form will be available to help rehabilitate housing for people of low and moderate incomes. The neighbourhood improvement program arises out of the need to replace the urban renewal program which is being phased out. The new program, with its emphasis on conservation, improvement, repair and rehabilitation, is also directed mainly at low income and moderate income people and the neighbourhoods in which they live. Subject to an agreement with each participating province, the federal government will share the cost of acquiring land for open space, community facilities, low income housing, providing day care centres, drop-in centres and similar community services. We will also pay half the cost of conducting meetings, surveys and other ways of ensuring the participation of the residents themselves in these proposals of conservation and neighbourhood improvement. This legislation is in its final drafting stages. I am happy that the opposition wants the legislation immediately and I shall be delighted, of course, to listen this afternoon to the suggestions hon. members make with regard to what should be in the legislation. I hope ideas will be forthcoming.

I have mentioned the provincial and municipal governments as important partners in our housing enterprises. We are not going to solve the housing problems of Canada unless there is complete co-operation and co-ordination between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. For this reason, senior officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs have visited every province and the territories, meeting with ministers and their officials, to outline the proposed amendments and to invite their views. In most cases, municipal officials also attended, with the concurrence of the provincial governments. So far their response has been encouraging and I feel there is a sufficient degree of understanding to warrant my bringing legislation before the House very soon. I think it is also the right of Members of Parliament to see these proposals and to know what the government is planning at a very early date.

I should emphasize, however, that these meetings are only the first in a continuing exchange of views which will permit us jointly to deal with all of the necessary regulations and administrative details which will ensure that the programs are delivered efficiently and effectively. The objective of this series of meetings with the provinces must be to try and agree, if need be, on dealing with the nature of the regulations made under the act, the implementation process and the administrative process of the federal government's housing program. I assure the provinces that this kind of discussion will be had on such matters. What we are seeking to develop as a result of this legislation is a flexible range of instruments so that the provinces and their housing agencies as well as the municipalities will have a choice of housing instruments to pick from in order to solve their particular housing problems.

As I have suggested to the provincial ministers, these meetings are more than just an opportunity to discuss important legislation of mutual concern. We see them also as a commitment on our part to a long-range process of tri-level consultation between governments, not just about housing but about the whole range of urban affairs. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants discussed this when he talked of the whole process of urbanization and many of the matters mentioned by Professor Lithwick in his report on urban Canada.

This is a policy to which my ministry has been committed since its inception and one which I heartily endorse. One of the roles for which my ministry was instituted, and one which I have been energetically pursuing since I was appointed, is to create the mechanisms, and the atmosphere, within which all levels of government in Canada and the private sector can work together in the interests of achieving a healthy and satisfying urban life. It is evident that the scope and complexity of urban problems are beyond the capacity of any one level of government, federal, provincial or municipal, and, indeed, beyond the capacity of government alone.

This is why I was gratified two weeks ago to be able to announce preliminary agreement on the first national conference of the three levels of government on urban issues, to be held in mid-November. I was also able to announce agreement between the preliminary spending committee composed of myself, the Treasurer of Ontario on behalf of all provinces and the mayor of Hull on behalf of the municipalities of Canada in which we agreed that such a tri-level conference should be held. This process of a tri-level conference is the first step of a procedure by which I confidently expect we will provide a way for all governments whose decisions affect the urban environment to talk to each other, to compare policies and programs, and to begin to define common goals for urban Canada. In a speech the other day the Leader of the Opposition said that we had a tendency to play the game of blaming the constitution. With this agreement between the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities I am confident we will find a process by which we will ensure that the constitution is working for us rather than hindering us in co-ordinating policies among all levels of government.

There will be many opportunities during the next little while to debate housing and urban affairs policy, both in connection with Bill C-209 and in connection with the amendments to the housing act that I shall be introducing. There will be many opportunities to discuss the policies which we have now or will be applying during the tenure of office of this government as revealed in legislation offered to Parliament. This legislation is in terms of financial mechanisms to assure an adequate supply of capital for mortgage moneys, amendments to the National Housing Act and the progress made in terms of the tri-level consultative process, all of which are very important initiatives taken by this government and by myself during the short time I have been the minister responsible. I think this brief summary and forecast is a sufficient response to the resolution before the House. Other points which have been raised will be answered by other speakers during debate on specific legislation.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to outline the government's achievements and policies in the housing field and to allow them to be compared with the alternatives offered recently in a public statement in Toronto by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I did not find much in that address, but one thing that startled me was his statement regarding the federal role. The Leader of the Opposition said the federal government's role was one of co-ordination and support. I agree with that statement, so far as it goes. We have a new tri-level process for co-ordination and we are now suggesting amendments to the National Housing Act designed to provide support to the provinces in their housing programs. It seems to me that the federal government has not only a co-ordinating and supporting role but also a leadership role.

It is the purpose of CMHC to introduce policies of imagination in a few days, and it is the purpose of my ministry of state for urban affairs to show leadership to the people of Canada in solving housing and urban affairs problems. It is a far greater role and purpose which we see for ourselves than that envisaged by the Leader of the Opposition. I can only say I am disappointed at the role picked out for the federal government by that hon. gentleman.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the introduction of this motion caused the minister responsible for housing to react by making a statement in this House. It is pleasing to know he is now telling us about legislation to be introduced in respect of mortgage financing. He did not say when the amendments to the National Housing Act would be coming forward, but I hope we can deal with those at the same time. The opposition showed its co-operation two or three weeks ago when we passed within seven days two bills for the benefit of our senior citizens and veterans. If the bill to be introduced is good, I am sure it will receive early passage.

My main concern is for the low-income and no-income people. I am also concerned about the hundreds of millions of dollars produced by the government for housing. I agree that many houses are being built for the rich, but nothing is being done about housing for the poor and needy. It is necessary to recognize that housing is a primary social, economic and physical need, yet there persistently prevails all across Canada a severe shortage of family housing at reasonable prices. Thus the choice for large, low-income families is limited, causing them either to reduce spending on other needs or to accept housing well below normally accepted standards. As a rule, they cannot afford to become homeowners.

To alleviate this situation the federal government provides funds for low-income housing programs in distant and isolated areas. The provincial and municipal governments are establishing subsidized housing programs which more often than not produce social ghettos. As to private enterprise, it is continuing to serve mainly the socio-economic class which is least affected by the housing situation. A lasting improvement of the current housing situation requires a corresponding improvement of the social conditions which cause the situation.

I realize this is a long-term goal, but the housing of many Canadians is still below minimum acceptable standards. It is little wonder that there exist so many substandard houses in Canada. Sophisticated studies are not necessary to discover that there are still thousands of ill-housed Canadians. This Liberal government persists in one study after another. I will deal with this matter a little later.

There is one basic fact. Housing that is substandard, usually occupied by low-income families, should be improved or removed, with new homes built. The government in power must provide the funds and the direction to reach those people who are not being reached by present housing programs. Strangely enough, a quick perusal of the intentions of the government indicates much the same situation as that leaked in respect of the Charney report. These leaks were not as bad as many of the leaks I have seen in homes in my constituency, where people are living in embarrassing conditions of which we in Canada should be ashamed.

Public housing authorities now face larger problems than the straight provision of adequate physical structures. A social environment less damaged by noise, pollution and social stigma must also be provided. These problems can only be solved with greater understanding and participation by the three levels of government. Experimentation with such techniques as variable interest rates and terms, deferred equities and varying degrees of ownership should be used to encourage the private market to move into low-income housing. At the same time, this should provide encouragement to low-income families to purchase their own homes. Government plans in this regard have revealed only tokenism in the area of low-income families working toward home ownership.

We should investigate ways to permit low and middle-income families to borrow up to 100 per cent of the property cost and, where needed, they should be subsidized by the government to help pay for housing. By low income I do not mean a family of five or six living on $4,000 to $7,000 a year; I also mean a family of ten living on an income of $10,000 a year. Surely one cannot disagree that such a family is in the low income bracket.

Let us consider some of the studies that have been carried out over the years. Just yesterday I was looking at a six-volume study on urban Canada by Mr. L. B. Smith. We also have the study by the Senate committee and its report on poverty, as well as the Dennis commission report. The minister has refused to table that report but there are 50 copies over in the offices of CMHC.

One of these books on urban Canada is called "Research Monograph 2," whatever that means. It is on housing and it reaches several conclusions. The first conclusion in this book is that to the extent our nation is better housed than ever in terms of number and basic facilities, there is no immediate housing problem. It refers to 1970. The second conclusion is that to the extent our construction industry has averaged approximately 200,000 dwelling starts per year and can provide sufficient dwellings for our population, there is no housing crisis.

The third conclusion is that to the extent shelter costs are not outpacing and are probably lagging behind income income increases, so that housing accommodations are generally more affordable, there is no housing problem. The fourth conclusion is that to the extent there are few doubled families—180,000, or 4 per cent of all families in Canada in 1966—and a considerable number of non-family households, there is probably no housing problem. We find that first of all there is no housing problem, and when there is a problem it is not serious.

The report also suggests that to the extent there is a group of low-income families living or who were previously living in soon-to-be-demolished or previously demolished housing, there is a housing problem or, more properly, an income or poverty problem. Now we find an admission of the existence of a housing problem.

These are fine conclusions, but I suggest they are conclusions from a computer. In this case the author, Mr. L. B. Smith, suggests his conclusions are drawn from equations and variables and that people should look at the graphs and charts. They do not indicate how to build houses for the poor people. I am wondering about the source of Mr. Smith's conclusions, because the hundreds of letters I receive from poverty stricken Canadians cry out in simple language the fact that they need homes but cannot afford them.

I wonder what conclusions can be drawn from letters such as these? I quoted one in the House some time ago which is worth repeating. It is one of many hundreds I have received. This gentleman wrote:

> My concern is about the shack we have to live in. It is infested with rats which have chewed large holes in the walls. I have to live on welfare because of a sick wife who is mentally ill and has an epileptic condition. And the doctor confirms this, indicating that the home is unfit for human habitation.

The hundreds of millions of dollars which are being directed into housing are going into areas in which the big builders want to build; they are not going into areas where they are needed. Just last weekend I visited one of the communities in my riding and saw a man, his wife and four children living in a deserted school bus set up on the side of the road. If this is the type of housing involved in the wonderful plans of the government, then I wonder what is wrong.

I could quote many hundreds of examples such as these where Canadians are crying out for help. I wonder why there is nothing in "Research Monograph 2" to solve this type of problem. I also wonder if Mr. Smith could figure out by his ingenious methods of calculation how these people could get a decent home. I wonder if he could explain his conclusion that our nation is better housed than others in terms of numbers and basic facilities, and that there is no immediate housing problem.

I should like Mr. Smith to accompany me when I tour my district this summer and see the embarrassing and distressing situation which exists with regard to substandard housing, and then tell me that Canada does not have a housing problem. Everyone knows the government has been pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into housing in Canada. For one reason or another, much of this money is not being directed into areas where the need is greatest nor to those people who have the greatest need, the poverty stricken and lowest income families.

In the Throne Speech the government, as usual, told the people of Canada of its new approach to supplying lower income housing. This occurred around the first of the year. I was very optimistic about this, particularly the announcement that $100 million or more would be directed toward providing ownership and rental housing for families earning less than $6,000 a year. Funds would be made available for projects sponsored by non-profit community organizations and co-operatives, and for continuation of present assisted ownership programs. Funds would be made available for a program to enable low-income families to renovate or rehabilitate their substandard properties without an increase in their monthly cost of ownership or rent, and for a multimillion dollar neighbourhood improvement program focusing on rehabilitation and renovation of blighted areas.

This sounds fine and wonderful in a Throne Speech. It builds up the hope of Canadians. All I have seen, however, arising out of the Throne Speech is a bill in respect of residential mortgage financing which will provide more money through more agencies, which in fact is being done now by CMHC. The family with little or no income is still restricted in respect of assistance to improve existing deteriorated homes or to build something better for themselves, while the extra millions of dollars will still go to the speculative, big builders who will continue to locate massive housing units where the price is right for themselves.

In this regard, I should like to see the minister today table the Charney report which evidently ridicules the present direction of our national housing programs. Why does the Charney report state that housing is a by-product in an agglomeration of builders, developers and financial institutions committed to the routine of making money? Why does the report say that CMHC is oriented to market interest rather than to consumer interest? The private sector is involved in low-income housing only in so far as the delivery of this type of housing corresponds to the objectives of the influential members of the industry. I think it is worth while to quote from an editorial written as a result of a leakage of the report. It reads:

> The pertinent question on a national level is not whether rehabilitation programs are needed, but whether scattered rehabilitation that does exist now, and will increase in the future, will be given its proper place in a policy framework.
> CMHC has systematically neglected to gather and organize data on rehabilitation. The formation of local groups came about not only because of a concern for rehabilitation of all too visibly deteriorating housing, but primarily in resistance to the urban renewal policies of government and to private developers' bulldozers.
> While government talks about the involvement and participation of people to determine the kind of housing they would like to have, local groups involved with rehabilitation have simply been doing it.
>
> Few large builders are willing to become involved in rehabilitation because they feel they can make larger profits in new construction. This top-down view of the larger builder-developer tends to dominate policy at federal government and CMHC levels.
> Only 10 per cent of the builders consider rehabilitation an important part of their business. These builders, according to the report, are the small firms that construct fewer than 25 housing units a year.
> Rehabilitation builds on the resources available to low-income families and does not cause the disruption of a family or a neighbourhood like urban renewal schemes, the report said.
> The over-all costs are generally less than new construction, especially when evaluated in terms of social costs. It serves to upgrade the general adequacy of housing at the neighbourhood level—one of the initial objectives of urban revitalization.
> The report said there should be grants available, without a means test, for improving the structure, exterior, electrical and mechanical services, for conversions and for revitalizing neighbourhood and community services. It also suggested that technical assistance be offered by the government.

It is easy to see that many of the things the minister said are taken directly from the Charney report.

> There are virtually no programs aimed at revitalizing the neighbourhood and social development at present, the report said.

The report continues on and on. I do not wish to take up too much time because I know other members wish to speak on this subject.

> It should be the first priority of housing policy to reverse the further deterioration of existing housing through maintenance incentives and assistance programs.
> Low-income housing, because the rents are often not as high as other units, often falls into the abandonment spiral. In many cases the housing stock is purposely run-down by owners who see little economic potential in the house, but keep the land for speculative purposes.

Other failures of the builders, CMHC and the government are referred to. One of the things which I think should be done—this is a recommendation of either the Charney report or the Dennis report—is that a national inventory should be taken. The task force recommended that a national housing inventory and building code be implemented as quickly as possible. With the need for employment I cannot understand why we are unable to find people who are interested and who could take an inventory of substandard housing and do something about it.

Just the other day in the House the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) welcomed a suggestion of mine that programs similar to the Local Initiatives Program be initiated to help fishermen provide through, their own initiative, the facilities they require in order to provide employment and give them the base for a better livelihood in an industry which is fast deteriorating. The minister thought this was a good idea and said he would discuss it with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) for future planning. Perhaps the minister responsible for housing will take a similar step with regard to housing.

Since it is obvious that eventually a program for rehabilitating homes will be introduced, and I hope soon, why not direct some of the moneys that will be available into a type of local initiatives program to allow municipalities and small communities to take an inventory of all substandard housing and submit projects to improve these homes for the benefit of people who cannot afford to do the work themselves or are not capable? This could also be done, based on need, for a community even before it has a housing program.

At the same time, this type of program would bring out the initiative of Canadians and satisfy a critical need which could be relieved by providing the materials and labour under technical leadership. Such an idea would provide employment and avoid duplication of spending with co-operation among departments of the federal government and the two other levels of government. This is one idea on which I could elaborate if the minister is anxious to listen.

My main concern—I say this again—is that regardless of the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent, there are still people living in homes which have been condemned. There are still families like the one I described who are living in an old, abandoned bus at the side of the road. This is the area to which we should direct our programs, and I hope the minister will bring in legislation soon to this end.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising to speak in the debate on the motion which was introduced by the official opposition and which reads as follows:

> This House regrets that the government has failed to take measures which would provide all citizens with decent housing at reasonable prices.

I have spent quite some time objectively studying this situation. When one considers the accomplishments of the National Housing Act in Quebec, one cannot help being proud. Of course, we do not pretend that everything has been done nor that the various acts have been perfectly administered. Much remains to be done, but achievements over the past few years indicate that the government has given priority to the housing problem and approached it with determination. We shall continue to give evidence of this interest and determination during the next few years, and with an increasing measure of success ensured by the amendments to the National Housing Act that will be submitted to the approval of the House during the next few days by the hon. minister responsible for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford).

During the four-year period 1968 to 1971, there were nearly 190,000 housing starts, of which 5,800 took place in 1971, which represents a production rate that few industrial countries have been able to match. These achievements were the results of co-operation between private industry, financial institutions of all kinds and the implementation of the National Housing Act, which made an important, indeed an essential contribution.

Of the 190,000 housing units which were started during this period in Quebec, 113,500 represented a value of $1,540 million and were made through the provisions of the National Housing Act; 62,500 represented a value of $900 million in loans granted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under agreements with the Quebec Housing Corporation.

As a member from Quebec and from a city ranking second in size and population, this is my opinion on the government's achievements. It seems to me that the federal government and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation contributions to the Quebec Housing Corporation are unfortunately not well enough known and this is why I shall later bring up this subject again.

This figure applies only to housing units. We must add 22,500 hostel units mostly for the elderly and students. If the problem boiled down to housing starts and financing, our industry's capacity and our means would soon solve the issue—if it did exist as such. We do not intend to present it only as a matter of dimension.

The basic problem of housing in Canada stems from geographic and social distribution, so that low income people may benefit from proper housing to the same extent as those in higher brackets. One must also consider the capacity to pay. The National Housing Act and the activities of the CMHC were all directed toward correcting distribution disparities at all levels and in order to minimize the geographic and social disavantages.

I find it very strange, Mr. Speaker, that this motion has been moved by a member of the official opposition, when one considers the present situation in the field of housing for low income people. As a matter of fact, the sum of $306 million was made available to the provinces for public housing in 1971, compared with $7.5 billion a year under the Progressive Conservative government from 1957 to 1963.

Let me correct that, Mr. Speaker, it was $306 million made available to the provinces in 1971 by the present government and only $7½ million a year by the Progressive Conservatives from 1957 to 1963.

So this government's performance is better than that of the previous one.

At the regional level, to the extent that, during some years, the activity of conventional lenders or lenders approved under the National Housing Act has decreased, that of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been greatest. During that period, the percentage of all housing starts financed in Quebec by the CMHC, either directly or under agreement with the Quebec Housing Corporation, was 30 per cent, which is higher than the national average.

In the developing regions which are of great importance, as far as the province's future is concerned, the part played by the Corporation, as regards mortgage loans, has been even more important. There are a few places—I am referring to Sept-Iles—where the only available loans are those granted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Another problem even more complicated than the matter of regional distribution is that of the social distribution of housing. The free market operations were leading us to a surplus of housing units for upper income citizens, and a serious shortage of housing for families in the middle or low-income brackets, in different parts of Canada, in particular in the province of Quebec.

As I said earlier, I do not intend to say that this problem no longer exists, but there is one field in which we are entitled to be proud of the government record, under the National Housing Act, namely, the building of lwo income housing.

Between 1968 and 1971, the orientation of the National Housing Act underwent an overall change. Between 1957 and 1967, commitments in the field of social housing loans and other programs designed for low income families amounted to an average of $50 million, for a total investment of $377 million; in 1971, the funds spent under these budget items totalled $622 million, compared to a total investment of $748 million This means that the proportion of budgetary expenses allotted to social housing, as well as that of low income families, increased from 14 to 80 per cent.

Such a new orientation was not achieved only through instructions. In the field of housing, where the co-operation of all government levels as well as of industry is necessary, it could only be achieved through initiatives and experiences to which all of them took part. Under the federal program of $200 million for the development of low income housing, $72 million are paid to the province of Quebec.

In that respect, I had in my capacity as member for Laval to criticize some projects endorsed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and I refer to the famous project Les Abeilles. I also refer to the case of the Résidences Richelieu Inc.

But it is my duty today to point out the beneficial achievements of the CMHC in Laval, and on behalf of all those who were victim of Les Abeilles project I wish to thank the government authorities for having considered that problem and having understood the situation by providing the promoters of the project with an adequate solution which met their needs. Actually they were victim of unfortunate circumstances, When we considered the estimates referred to the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, I raised that question and the minister assured me that such situations will never arise again owing to implementation of different and much better controlled overseeing mechanisms.

In the field of family housing, the Corporation invested, either directly or under agreements with the Quebec Housing Corporation, $153 million for senior citizen housing or special projects. I should like to point out the co-operation of the CMHC with the Quebec Housing Corporation at Ville de Laval where a home for the aged is now under construction; it will cost $2,250,000. The contribution of the federal government will amount to $2,137,-500. The building will contain 210 beds.

Next Monday, a ceremony will be held to turn the first sod for the construction of the Centre de séjour de Laval, a 332-bed complex that will cost $3,185,350. There again, the federal government will contribute about 90 per cent.

Some situations come to my mind which I should like to mention to the minister, not as criticisms but rather as suggestions. But before making my suggestions, here is the situation in which we live. As for the Quebec Housing Corporation, Mr. Speaker, I must point out that we might have to review the situation.

I have in mind the building of Co-op Habitat, a 352-unit project built with CMHC funds, but through a loan of some $4,589,820 granted by the QHC. These apartments, built in 1958, are still unoccupied.

Here is another very typical case: l'Office d'habitation de Montréal-Nord. Here again, the funds came from the CMHC, but were administered by the Quebec Housing Corporation and the apartments are still unoccupied.

I see that an agreement has been entered into with the provincial government whereby rents for people on welfare, are fixed at special rates. I am referring to the Office d'habitation de Montréal-Nord project, involving 168 units of 3½, 4½ or 5½ rooms. They are meant for people on welfare, and the rents are according to the monthly income of the head of the family. As an example, if the monthly income is $303 to $406, the rent will be $60 a month.

The minimum rent is $41 a month, including various services. It includes electricity, heating, hot water, water tax, the supply of a stove, a refrigerator, a washer and a dryer.

I believe that this measure meets the needs of welfare recipients. The provincial government will contribute 25 per cent of the deficit while the municipality will pay 25 per cent and the federal government 50 per cent.

I suggest therefore that if such a formula were applied to the Co-op Habitat project, at Ville de Laval, we could house families which surely need it.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by making a few suggestions regarding transfers of funds from the CMHC to the province of Quebec whose housing funds are administered by the Quebec Housing Corporation. I would point out to the minister that we should review the administrative set-up governing relations between the CMHC and the Quebec Housing Corporation.

The supervision and control should be proportionate to the lender's responsibility, or else, to the monetary contribution. The building of shelters and the loans made by the Quebec Housing Corporation are administered in Quebec by non-profit organizations.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this type of administration by non-profit organizations might lead to some patronage hotbeds that are not always conducive to the best interest of the community. I believe that this honorary type of administration is now obsolete.

It has not always been the most effective, precisely because of lack of interest and motivation, and I would even go as far as to say that the interests at which this policy is directed are not the same.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

It seems to me, therefore, that the transfer of funds from the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation to the Quebec Housing Corporation should be reviewed. Mr. Speaker, in the coming days, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will be introducing in this House amendments to the National Housing Act. They are the result of in-depth studies made in the past few years and which drew on all the government's resources, as well as researchers from outside. Those amendments have been under constant review, and the initiatives and experiences of the past few years have been assessed. The amendments are designed to facilitate the solving of urban problems, as well as access to homeownership for the class of citizens who are deprived of it.

As a representative from Quebec and from the metropolitan area of that province, I am particularly glad to see that there will be, amongst others, amendments providing for a preferential rate loan system for low-income families, as well as valid tools likely to facilitate the rehabilitation of downtown areas for municipalities, which will represent, for provincial and municipal undertakings, a valuable contribution in this area. There will also be mechanisms for citizens' participation, which will be a first in housing legislation, in Canada as well as in other countries. We have to go further and to provide all the services and equipment which give the community a soul.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) sing the praises of the Liberal government's record in the field of housing I could not help thinking of the saying, "There are none so blind as those who will not see". In criticizing my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), supposedly because he was partisan, the minister said—I am not sure that I have the words exactly, but I think basically I paraphrase correctly—"The major concern of this government has been to provide housing for people in the low income bracket".

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The minister applauds, so I must be quoting him correctly. He said that in the last four years the government has built 135,000 housing units for people in the low income bracket. I presume that means public housing and limited dividend housing, Mr. Speaker. Let us assume that the minister's figure is correct. In the last four years we have built close to 850,000 housing units and my rough arithmetic tells me, if the minister's figures are correct, that we have built between 15 per cent and 17 per cent of those housing units for people in the low income bracket. If that is how the government shows major concern, I hate to think how it would act if it were to show no concern at all.

• (1540)

Mr. Basford: The hon. member is all mixed up.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if the minister thinks I am being purely politically partisan, let me refer him to a report—one of six submissions to a task force on low-income housing set up by the former minister—written by a group headed by Professor Melvin Charney, professor of architecture at the University of Montreal. The minister has consistently refused to make public that report.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Orlikow: I am not surprised. Never have I seen a report commissioned by a government which is so critical or so hostile to a government or to the agencies of government responsible for housing as the report submitted by Professor Charney. Of course, the minister would like to hide it but he has not been successful. Professor Charney says that nearly half of Canada's people cannot afford decent housing and the situation could get worse.

In the report, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the federal government's housing agency, is accused of spending the bulk of its annual $1 billion budget on new construction and of almost ignoring renovation of houses for the poor. I will return to the report later. I challenge the minister to table the report so that we can see whether I have summarized it correctly. If the minister is afraid to table the report, as he has been until now, let me summarize—

Mr. Basford: It is not ready.

Mr. Orlikow: The minister says it is not ready. I have it here on my desk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: Let me refer to a speech made on December 8, 1971, by W. H. Hignett, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. According to a report before me, Mr. Hignett, speaking to the Toronto Housebuilders Association, said that about 95 per cent of families in metropolitan Toronto cannot afford a new house in spite of record production that probably will top $1 billion in 1971. The report then reads:

> To support his contention that builders were not providing enough inexpensive housing, Mr. Hignett noted that in 1962 and 1963 less than 10 per cent of the units produced in Toronto cost more than $20,000.
> In 1970, only 10 per cent sold for less than $26,000. About 45 per cent of the houses for sale in that year went for $30,000 or more.

That was said two years ago. I am certain that housing costs in Toronto have risen by at least 15 per cent in the last two years. So the head of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has disproved the minister's contention that we are doing well and meeting the housing needs of the Canadian people.

I now want to deal with specific aspects of housing policy in which the government has failed dismally. First, the government suggests that land assembly will be easier when the magic amendments to the housing legislation are brought forward. Mr. Speaker, not a single dollar in the estimates or in capital expenditures relating to Central Mortgage and Housing is set aside for land assembly. Actually, the biggest newspaper in Toronto that has never failed to support the Liberal party during elections—although it may not have done so between elections—the Toronto Star, has called for tri-government co-operation in the field of land assembly and has said that this government has shown absolutely no leadership in the field.

Why did it say that? In every major city of Canada the development of land is under the virtual control of two or three major developers who work in our cities. For instance, in Toronto the big developers are Greenwin, Cadillac and Meridian; in Ottawa, Minto, Campeau and probably another; in Winnipeg there are three developers, and I am sure this is true in Vancouver.

Since these developers own the major parcels of land which can be developed, they can control the price of land. And land prices are skyrocketing. These developers are making tremendous profits. Increased land prices, of course, are affecting tremendously the cost of potential homes and finished homes. That is one effect. The other effect is this: since large developers control most of the land available for home building, the smaller builders who could compete with them and build homes at better prices are being frozen out.

This has resulted from the government's refusal to heed the appeals of all sorts of people, including the Toronto Star, and make the lead in assembling land for the poor so that the housing needs of people living in our cities can be met. Why does not the minister, who in his previous portfolio was head of the anti-trust division of government, do something? Why does he not consider how these corporations control land prices and housing? Why does he not look at the practices of these developers—practices which have enabled them to eliminate real competition in the building industry? Does the government not care? Or does the minister think that if he does something the developers and builders in question will not contribute to the campaign funds of the Liberal party in the next election?

An hon. Member: Here we go again.

Mr. Orlikow: Professor Charney's report shows in detail that if people on low or moderate incomes want houses, they are better off if they do not buy new houses. The report shows that the program of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has encouraged builders and developers to build new homes. Professor Charney makes crystal clear what the government ought to do, namely, institute programs that will make sure older parts of cities are not destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, as one drives through Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver or Winnipeg one sees some of the best homes—old, established homes—being torn down and replaced by cracker-box, high-rise apartments. Why do we not prevent this? Why force people in the moderate income brackets to go 20 or 30 miles from the central part of the city and live in a new development where there are no trees, shrubs or grass? Why not help to preserve the central parts of our cities?

If you go to the Glebe area of Ottawa or to the central part of Toronto, you will see that most houses are still structurally sound. True, they do not meet modern standards in all respects: there is not a bathroom on every floor, and the kitchens lack the number of cupboards that wives want nowadays. There is not room for a dishwasher. Nevertheless, most of these homes could be renovated and remodelled for a moderate amount of money. Why does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation say to mortgage companies, "If a citizen wants to buy a new house in the suburbs, let him make a small down payment and assume a mortgage of $18,000 or $20,000"? Why does the government, or Central Mortgage and Housing not stand behind the person who wants to remodel and modernize his home? That man's house may still be sound. Why can he not borrow, say, $6,000, probably all that is required, and modernize the home in which he is living in the downtown area?

Why does the government not do that? There is no indication in anything the minister has said to indicate that they propose to do it. It would be possible to borrow $5,000 or $6,000 at a reasonable rate of interest if there were some kind of free grant program for families with a low income. Then we would not see the bulldozing and destruction of some of the finest homes in the cities of Canada.

About a year and a half ago I had an opportunity to attend a parliamentary conference in Holland. I was impressed by the housing in the city of Amsterdam. Houses which are several hundred years old are still being lived in; they are being remodelled, refurbished and very adequately meet the needs of the people. The government of this country has the view, and CMHC agrees, that if a house is 35 years old the best thing to do is bring in a bulldozer and demolish it. I completely reject that kind of approach.

I urge the minister and the government to pay attention to the very moderate recommendations in the Charney report so that the central parts of our cities will not be gutted and replaced by high-rise apartments. They are very expensive to rent and are really only adequate for single persons or young, married couples: they do not provide sufficient space or facilities for family life.

There is one more point I wish to deal with in the few moments remaining at my disposal. This government has adopted a principle which is not only impractical but immoral. I refer to the principle they have fostered that every person in Canada should own his own house. The fact is that the majority of people in Canada cannot afford to own their own homes, regardless of which government is in office and what it does to make it attractive to buy your own home.

The majority of people in Canada have an income of less than $6,000 a year. There is no way they can afford to buy their own homes. Therefore, we ought to be seriously thinking about policies which encourage rental housing. I am not talking about apartments in every city of Canada where a one-bedroom apartment rents for $225 a month and a two-bedroom apartment for between $275 and $300. That may be adequate for a businessman, and a Member of Parliament may be able to afford it. But those earning $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 a year certainly cannot afford to pay that kind of rent.

When you consider that the average family moves between five and seven times in a lifetime, it is idiotic not to have a national policy to encourage rental accommodation. Our encouragement of individual home ownership has made people who rent accommodation second-class citizens. We have no effective policy for rental housing, not just for those with low incomes but for those with moderate incomes who badly need housing.

The only program which this government has proposed for people with moderate incomes is the program of rental housing under section 15 of the act, namely, limited dividend housing. That program is a complete failure. There are not enough units, the standards are poor, the community facilities are badly located, there are little or no on-site facilities, the on-site planning is atrocious and the rents being charged are exorbitant. The only people who benefit are the builders.

An hon. Member: What city are you talking about?

Mr. Orlikow: I am talking about Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver or any other city. I invite the minister to come with me and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) to look at the limited dividend housing projects that have been built in the St. Boniface constituency. They are a disgrace.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where is Joe?

Mr. Orlikow: The builders are making a fortune out of these projects. CMHC has no real policy of policing site planning, the design and building standards of limited dividend housing. While designed for moderate income families, this program is so disastrous that it is a bad influence on public housing. People confuse what they see in limited dividend housing projects with low-income housing. Let us do something for people with moderate incomes.

Mr. Mahoney: Vote Liberal.

Mr. Orlikow: The minister says "Vote Liberal". I think people have a good deal more sense, now they have seen what the Liberal government has done.

Mr. Mahoney: It was just a suggestion.

Mr. Orlikow: I advise this government to step up a program to encourage public housing. In the past 2½ years the government of my province, with the co-operation and financial assistance of the federal government, has built 8,000 public housing units, half of them for senior citizens. It is now possible for an old age pensioner with only his old age pension to get a bachelor apartment in a modern apartment building for as low as $32.50 a month. This is what can be done when governments get into the field of public housing.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to answer one or two of the comments made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) earlier in the debate. As a lawyer who used to do considerable work in the real estate field, I know from experience how important is the question of warranties that the member raised. He mentioned particular problems in Ontario, Sudbury and Deep River.

I asked the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to check into these problems and see if we could get an answer before the debate closed today. I have been informed by them that in Sudbury, where the problem involves only 20 houses or thereabouts, CMHC has met with the builder and that considerable improvements have been made as a result of this intervention. As far as we know, the people there are satisfied with the improvements made by the builder. With regard to Deep River, to the knowledge of CMHC there was only one complaint. Here again, CMHC has intervened and the builder has done additional work.

• (1600)

I think we should debate the question of high interest rates at some other time, perhaps when we consider Bill C-209 in the next week or so. We could then consider the idea of the hon. member for Broadview that the interest rate should be 6 per cent. I believe every member of the House would agree it is desirable that the rate should be 6 per cent or less, as long as we can be sure that sufficient money would be going into the investment market from the private sector to enable the houses we need to be built.

The hon. member for Broadview did not tell us how much he thought it would cost in subsidies to reduce the rate to 6 per cent, nor did he give us his ideas as to the way in which sufficient moneys could be secured from the private market if the rate were 6 per cent. Perhaps he will do so when the bill to which I have referred comes up for consideration.

No member of the government or no member of the House need apologize for the extent to which the National Housing Act has served the people of Ontario during the past four years in which this government has been in office. The National Housing Act during this period has financed and made possible the construction of more than 200,000 homes and more than 20,000 hostel beds for the elderly and students, for a total investment of more than $3,100 million. People in all parts of Ontario in all income ranges, both young and old, have been given the opportunity as never before to provide themselves or be provided with decent housing accommodation.

Of this total investment, more than $1 billion was made available by the federal government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to provide 70,000 homes for families of low income and other disadvantaged people, together with 16,500 hostel beds for our elderly people and our students. In the field of subsidized public housing alone, funds have been provided for nearly 40,000 deserving families in 73 Ontario communities, requiring an investment of $500 million and continuing support for subsidy payments in the amount of $20 million a year.

The needy of my province have been served to an extent never before though possible, and may I remind hon. members that more housing has been built for low-income families in Ontario during the past four years than in the whole of Canada for the previous quarter-century. The housing record of this government is one of which I am very proud and this pride is shared by all members on this side of the House. This is by no means the full story. The federal government has provided through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation $150 million in 74 Ontario communities for new sewage treatment facilities, the assembly of land for housing purposes and the implementation or urban renewal programs.

Let me return to the subject of public housing. We are not only concerned about the rapid expansion of the public housing program to meet the needs of the elderly and families who through no fault of their own do not have access to the products of private enterprise; we are equally concerned about the nature of the housing provided and about its integration into the total community. We are not only concerned about new housing, as important as this may be; we are also concerned about the proper use of the existing housing stock.

In Ontario we provide to the province financial support for the payment of rent supplement subsidies to families to allow them to gain access to private accommodation suitable for their needs. We have shown, and will continue to demonstrate, our willingness to provide every possible opportunity for our needy families to secure good housing. Only yesterday it was announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) that a rent supplement program for Ontario for 1972 has been approved which will provide assistance to 1,100 Ontario families to be placed in privately-owned rental accommodation. This is another example of three levels of government working closely with the private sector to provide accommodation for those in desperate need.

There has been much talk in some quarters about the so-called abandonment of the urban renewal program. May I remind hon. members that during the last two years the federal government has made contributions to urban renewal programs at a higher level than in any preceding years. This has meant that in my province grants of more than $26 million have been made. A good example of the changing atmosphere of urban renewal is the Trafann Court project in Toronto where the citizens of the area have worked jointly with the city of Toronto to achieve a project acceptable to both the residents of the area and the city.

In general, however, urban renewal as it has been practiced in Canada has been less than perfect. Too often urban renewal meant the destruction of housing occupied by low-income families, to be replaced by large public or private commercial enterprises. Too often have the people who live in urban renewal areas suffered hardship because of the nature of the urban renewal process, and not often enough have the people directly affected by urban renewal had anything to say about the process that affects their daily life in such an important way. Far from abandoning the inner cities, we have been striving to find ways of improving the circumstances of those who live there, without the distortion, degradation and hardship of urban renewal.

As the minister has stated, there will be introduced into this House very soon a proposal relating to the improvement of residential neighbourhoods. This program will provide assistance for homeowners and tenants alike to bring substandard housing in residential neighbourhoods up to a decent, safe and adequate standard. Assistance will be provided in respect of sites for housing for those of low and moderate income and for the provision of open space and land for a wide variety of community facilities. A substantial portion of the capital cost of neighbourhood, recreation and social facilities such as day-care centres, drop-in centres and multi-service centres, will be provided by the federal government. Assistance will also be provided for the improvement of normal municipal services and the removal of noxious uses in residential areas.

Perhaps just as important as the improvements that will take place in housing and all other facilities in neighbourhood improvement areas will be the part that the citizens themselves will play. The residents of such areas will be involved in the identification of neighbourhoods, the planning for action and the implementation of the plan. This, we believe, is the proper way to deal with our cities.

It is our intention to conserve the residential neighbourhoods which play an important part in the lives of our citizens. It is our intention to upgrade substandard housing to decent, adequate levels, and I for one am confident that this kind of action will halt the deterioration of residential neighbourhoods into the slum conditions which plague urban places. So let us not talk about urban renewal in old and outdated terms; let us talk about the things we can and will do to improve the lives of our inner city residents.

A great many concerned Canadians, both inside and outside this House, are worried about the rapidly increasing cost of residential land in many communities. The National Housing Act has for many years provided assistance to provinces and municipalities for the assembly of land for residential purposes—indeed, the federal government has provided more than $30 million for this purpose in Ontario during the past four years, which has met every request that the province has made for such funds.

We recognize that public intervention in land banking and the assembly of land may well have a beneficial effect on residential land cost. We shall be introducing legislation to broaden the provisions of the act to make it possible for provinces and municipalities to play an active part in providing land, not only for our growing urban areas but for new communities. We are not naïve enough to think that this can be done with a revolving fund of $100 million as was stated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in a recent speech in Toronto. I assure him that much more is needed and much more will be provided than a revolving fund of $100 million for land banking purposes. I can assure the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan), who may be speaking next, that there will be lots of money in the fund.

All members know that the Canadian portion of the Great Lakes and the international section of the St. Lawrence River are in Ontario. Members know, as well, that this government has entered into an agreement with the province of Ontario which will provide for a concerted effort to eliminate the pollution in the lower Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River. This Canada-Ontario agreement is part of a larger Canada-United States agreement whereby the province of Ontario, the government of Canada, the states bordering the Great Lakes and the United States government can jointly eliminate pollution from this great asset.

It has been agreed that the government of Canada will provide during the next five years $165 million in loans to the province of Ontario and Ontario communities bordering these waters, of which $42 million will be forgiven as soon as the work is completed. This, of course, is in addition to the work being done in other Ontario communities for which loans of more than $90 million have been made under the National Housing Act by this government during the last four years, and of which $22.5 million was forgiven.

Despite the record—for which no apology is needed—this government is not afraid of innovation. During the past three years the federal government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has invested more than $300 million in innovative projects to find new ways of serving Canadians better. We have experimented on a large scale with assisting lower income people to become homeowners, and we have found ways of providing home ownership to thousands of Canadian families who had no hope of finding housing through the private market mechanism. We will be hearing more about this program as the days go by.

We have found ways to serve old and unattached men and others who require rooming-house accommodation in urban areas. The Braida high-rise rooming-house project on Sherbrooke Street, Toronto, is an example of this. We have worked diligently with native groups, both Métis and Indians, to seek ways of assisting them to solve their housing problems. We have supported co-operative housing societies and will continue to seek new ways of making these more effective. We have worked with citizen groups, non-profit housing corporations and the building industry to examine every possible proposal that holds promise of serving Canadians better.

Some of these activities have involved risks that private enterprise simply cannot take and because of this not all experimentation has been successful: experimentation involves risk. But as a result of this experience and far reaching studies into the housing problems of the defenseless will come the most enlightened proposals for amendment to the National Housing Act that have been seen in this House for a generation.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the past 25 years Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation programs have built about 250,000 housing units for the 1,500,000 low-income families in this country. It has therefore met less than one-sixth of the need, and some of the units were not well conceived nor well built.

The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker), who although not in his seat may be behind the curtains, mentioned earlier in this debate that nowhere in Toronto had he seen any limited dividend housing projects that were not satisfactory in every respect. I should like to direct to his attention the Richmond Square project which lies between Richmond Street West and Queen Street West at Niagara, in my riding. There is a $2 million complex standing idle since last April when it sank about a foot into the ground, causing a depression 13 storeys high which the local people call the "Trudeau depression". That is just one example of what limited dividend housing has done for the landscape in Toronto.

I understand that Professor Charney in his report says something to the effect that the Main Square project at Danforth and Main Street, which is close to the riding of the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead), consists of units so small that they are something in the nature of cages. These are the kind of results government programs are producing and which are being eulogized today by the hon. member for York Centre and the parliamentary secretary. However, I do want to say that I believe the parliamentary secretary made a much better speech today than did the minister.

We are told that since the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has proposed a $100 million revolving land bank fund for the country, the amount has been upped by the government and that will probably make the fund $500 million. I do not know the precise amount, but apparently it will be sizeable. I wonder how responsible the government is being in this respect, in view of the fact that its estimated budget for the current year is over $16 billion without supplementaries. I do not think there is any provision made in the estimates at the moment for these hundreds of millions of dollars. However, the government must take responsibility for this, as it will have to take responsibility for the consequences of its poor financial management of the affairs of this country.

There is no denying the fact that ours is materially one of the richest countries of the world. We enjoy one of the highest standards of living and although we are not self-sufficient in every respect we are becoming increasingly so. Yet strangely enough we have a dire shortage of decent housing for the low-income and poor people of this country. As former speakers have made clear today, people in all parts of Canada are living in substandard housing. Many still live in log cabins, tarpaper shacks, former streetcars, buses and the like. This type of substandard housing is a disgrace and many people who are in this situation have little hope for the future. In general, their income is not sufficient to permit them to make a large down payment on a home and to assume heavy mortgage payments.

Since the need for housing is not decreasing but increasing, something must be done to alleviate this situation. I hope that the puffing by the minister this afternoon means that his amendments will cover the whole problem, not just another fraction of it. I also hope that the amendments will deal substantially with the rehabilitation of homes. In this respect I should like to draw to the attention of the minister an excerpt from an article that appeared in the Toronto Star of Monday, May 29 last by the well known columnist and able panelist, Miss Dian Cohen. She writes the following under the heading "Several questions":

> The decision to recognize the need for rehabilitation as well as for new construction is long overdue. So-called "low-cost" housing projects have cost the public purse as much as $15,000 a unit in past years. Restoration costs run around $2,500 to $3,000 a unit.
> But if the new policy is to succeed in producing more, higher quality housing for the poor, several questions have still to be answered.
> First, will rehabilitation of existing housing be accompanied by rent controls, a freeze on assessment rates and a guarantee of purchasing adjacent land to prevent speculation? Will landlords be compelled to take advantage of government subsidized loans in order to restore their property?
>
> Second, will low cost housing—like the unemployed—continue to be the unfortunate side effect of restrictive economic policies?

• (1620)

> As long as the housing industry is at the mercy of government whim, there can be no lasting solution to the problem of adequate housing for low-income groups.

To these two questions I should like to add a third. Will the size of the units of low-cost housing be increased so they will be reasonably large enough to satisfy the needs of human beings? It is not only the people in the low-income brackets who are feeling the income pinch; more and more people are finding that housing is taking an ever increasing share of their income. Young married couples working as professionals are also finding it difficult to purchase and set up new homes.

By the year 2000 it is expected that 94 per cent of Canada's population will live in urban areas. In view of this, the comment in the Speech from the Throne of February 17, 1972, that "One essential is the provision of adequate housing of high standards to all Canadians" becomes all the more imperative; yet the government has failed to do anything about that situation up to now. It promises to do it tomorrow, but from what we have seen of this government, much of the time tomorrow never comes.

In 1969 the average cost in Canada of a detached, three-bedroom bungalow was $20,831. By 1970 this has risen to $22,422. These figures conceal a great deal, for they are averages and as such conceal, even though they are appalling enough, the inordinately high cost of homes in areas such as Toronto where an average home costs considerably more than $22,422. In Toronto, which is perhaps the most expensive place in Canada to buy a house, the average price for new and resale houses is now in the $32,000 range. This is an increase of 5 per cent over the 1971 average.

Home buyers are facing higher borrowing costs as well as higher prices for houses. Right now, prime conventional house loans on good urban properties carry interest rates of 9 per cent to 9.5 per cent. In addition, National Housing Act mortgages generally cost 9¼ per cent. It is the responsibility of this government to lower these interest rates.

During the 1968 election campaign a great deal was said about urban affairs. The leaders of the Liberal party poured forth many commitments in this respect. Interest rates were to be kept reasonably low, land costs were to be kept as low as possible and a concerted effort would be made to attract more investment in mortgages. What we have in 1972, after four years of non-government, is ridiculously high land costs, mortgage interest rates which are unacceptably high, close to 10 per cent, and a desperate need for investment in the mortgage field.

This House has been constantly told that dynamic new policies are under consideration, but I recall that after one of its former cabinet ministers completed his task force study on housing the entire matter was more or less shelved. I suggest it is time for members opposite to take concrete and dynamic initiatives with regard to housing and urban affairs.

There are three main avenues which the government may follow to reach the goal of giving some relief to homeowners and potential homeowners. The first of these is the tax system, the second is actual expenditure of federal funds and the third is new legislation dealing with building codes. It is possible for the government to give a great deal of relief to homeowners and would-be homeowners through the tax system. Parliament might, for example, grant homeowners a tax credit on their personal income taxes equal to their property taxes, or a portion thereof if the government wants to be miserly about it. Also worthy of consideration is the idea of granting homeowners a tax credit equal to the sum of their mortgage interest or, again, a portion of it. Home improvements might also be considered as being an alternative tax deductible expense.

New tax sharing agreements might also be considered. Under our constitution, the federal government has almost unlimited taxing powers and they certainly know how to use them. The federal-provincial tax sharing agreements are signs that the federal power has responded to the obvious need for sharing its funds. Perhaps it is time this sharing was extended to include municipalities across Canada. At the present time municipalities are the poor boys of the three levels of government. The taxes available to them are highly inelastic and completely inadequate for their needs. I would suggest to this House it is time for us to seriously consider the possibility of direct federal-municipal tax sharing agreements with the consent of the provinces. I admit there are numerous constitutional difficulties, but if the problem is approached with common sense and good will I am sure these difficulties could be resolved.

Mr. Bell: Where are they going to get the common sense?

Mr. Ryan: The minister seems to think he would be able to persuade Mr. Bourassa to keep the conference in November at the three-level rather than the two-level which Mr. Bourassa apparently prefers at this time. Perhaps there is some hope. The second avenue of federal expenditure involves the actual expenditure of federal funds. A great deal of research needs to be done in the area of building techniques in this country. I believe the federal government should provide more funds for research and facilities in this field. It is just not good enough to have a National Builders' Association subsidized to build a few experimental homes in places it selects. What is required is a new federal program designed to experiment with many new innovative building techniques for homes and apartments, better control over prime and subcontractors, with better inspection and soil testing.

The third avenue I mentioned is that of new legislation dealing with building codes. An obvious need exists for a new, modern national building code which while taking into account climatic and other differences among the various regions of Canada will standardize building codes across the country. It is only in this way that the Canadian housing industry will be able to take the fullest and most complete advantage of modern industrial techniques of manufacture and assembly.

As well as the three major avenues of development which I have mentioned there are numerous other matters the government should be examining. Recently the government introduced Bill C-209, the residential mortgage financing bill, which it feels will work some type of miracle cure for the maladies presently being suffered by our housing industry. I do not think it will achieve this. However, I do not intend to fully criticize the bill at this time because I will probably speak in the debate when the legislation is before the House.

I believe that before the government involves itself in the setting up of new financial institutions, it should fully investigate, evaluate and assist in the rehabilitation of existing housing, the maintenance of existing housing, neighbourhood improvement and setting up of serviced and unserviced land banks.

Mr. Basford: You are stealing my speech.

Mr. Ryan: We hope this will all come to pass, but after four years we are a little skeptical and have to take some of these things with a grain of salt. We will know after the amendments have been introduced by the minister whether they will cover the whole picture or whether they will be just a fractional solution.

• (1630)

The combination of down payment, monthly mortgage payment, upkeep and service payments and tax payments has greatly increased over the past decade and this has sufficed to place the cost of new housing far beyond the reach of many. Why, then, is there little rehabilitation of our existing stock of housing? There are numerous reasons for this. I hope the rehabilitation provisions will be used to a far greater extent and prove of more utility than the existing situation under the National Housing Act.

Frequently, older homeowners take the view that their homes will, with a minimum of upkeep, satisfy them for the remainder of their days. Home improvement is not attractive to them. Improved property attracts increased property taxes, as an added price for keeping up the fabric and appearance of a dwelling. It is in this area that the federal government could do much by allowing tax credits on net personal income for either the cost of home improvements or the net increase in property taxes resulting from home improvements.

As well, the government should extend National Housing Act provisions to make federal grants and loans available for rehabilitation of existing dwellings. Financial assistance should be on an individual basis according to the income of the family or landlord and the condition of the house to be rehabilitated. The government should also be taking concrete steps with regard to neighbourhood improvement. For almost four years now the government has been dilly-dallying with programs which would best aid municipalities to improve the environment. I hope it has now solved the problem. The previous urban renewal program was prematurely curtailed. At that time it was indicated that a new form of urban assistance directed mainly at the improvement of housing and living conditions would be brought in shortly. As yet we have seen nothing. Once again the efficiency and sincerity of this government is questioned.

Not only does the government desperately need to introduce programs aimed at housing and living conditions, but it must also introduce a program of priorities to tackle such problems as improper land use, inadequate street patterns and shopping facilities, transportation, poor government housekeeping and social services. The federal and provincial governments are responsible for setting proper priorities within their fiscal resource plans. Where are these plans? Every year the estimates increase and each year there are the same complaints of the inadequate social programs of this government. Adequate resources should be provided by this government, available to municipalities on a continuing basis for conservation, improvement and redevelopment of existing neighbourhoods and newly created ones. This should be done in a way that would protect our past and prevent slums.

Conservation and improvement of neighbourhoods for low and moderate income residential neighbourhoods is especially important in facilitating the involvement of neighbourhood residents to plan and implement. The present government thus far has failed to introduce a social plan that would preserve neighbourhoods. It is time a program was introduced to make grants and loans available, within a ceiling, to local neighbourhoods.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth).

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I express my thanks for your allowing me to take part in this debate because I have looked forward to it for some time. In bringing this matter before Parliament for public debate through an opposition motion, we hoped we would receive constructive help from the government and a constructive indication of what the program would be. As usual and as might have been anticipated, government members, the minister included, have dwelt on their accomplishments in this field. They indicated, as usual, that Canadians have never had it so good. Also as is usual with an upcoming election, they promise tremendous amendments in respect of this very serious problem. This is not good enough. This is not the type of action the people of Canada want from this or any other government so far as housing is concerned.

Listening to speakers from the government benches, one would almost believe they do not realize how serious this problem is and how many Canadians it affects at all levels, low-income, middle-income and even upper-income. Something must be radically wrong with the economic environment of a country when the government calmly assumes that a person earning under $8,000 a year has no business attempting to own his own home and, calmly assumes that young people should be tied up financially for 40 years in an attempt to pay for a home.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you were as impressed and awed by the figures put on the record as I was. They indicated that people who buy and attempt to pay for their homes will pay four times over before they have met their obligation. This situation will not be tolerated in Canada. We will have more improvisations which will cause more difficulty than we have at the present time.

I was not at all impressed when the minister told us the number of homes which have been constructed. If I heard him correctly, he said that this year 230,000 starts would be made. He did not indicate how many units the department and the people of Canada decree as the absolute minimum which must be built every year. He did not say that in the last four years we have fallen behind the 100,000 starts which is the minimum needed. This is why the type of facts and figures placed on the record by government members can be misleading: they do not tell the story.

When they talk about accomplishments, the accomplishments are not enough when people cannot have a place to live in this country of ours. When my associates talk about the necessity for further construction and meaningful consultation among the three levels of government, this certainly is what is needed. What we see now is the development of land for mobile homes. We see trailers being set up in the back yards of existing homes and alongside existing houses. This compounds the problem in respect of sewage disposal, ecology, schools and so on.

Some of these houses are actually in gravel pits. As my colleague, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan), pointed out, some people actually live in converted buses, trailers and in even worse conditions. When we tolerate such a situation in Canada something is totally wrong and must be corrected. We cannot wait for amendments which may come some time in the future. This is not good enough. This government has been in office through two Parliaments and has had an opportunity to improve the housing situation in Canada. It has not done so. What is the alternative?

Mr. Basford: Not you.

Mr. Danforth: The minister says it is not me. I assume he means my party.

Mr. Basford: Nothing personal.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, my party and my colleagues feel that the approaches taken by this government are no different than those taken through the years which have proven to be ineffective. That is our objection. We feel there should be a brand new approach. If this government can allocate up to $1,000 million for the creation of a new international airport, with all it means to the environment and the surrounding country, the small municipalities and towns and everything that goes with it, is it not true that we could spend the same amount of money on creating new municipalities where they are needed?

• (1640)

When we think that today we are creating uranium factories and plants for the creation of energy in the form of electricity, and that these plants must be built on the side of large bodies of water to get rid of excess energy in the form of heat, does it not seem logical, plausible and practical to build such plants as the source and centre of a municipality and to use all this extra energy to provide heat and energy for our housing developments? Does it not seem plausible that when we have to construct networks of roads and railroads and services for these types of plants, they should be utilized also for the development of municipalities?

Does it not seem plausible and practical that we should take some of our submarginal land for this type of establishment and create the services necessary to develop satellite cities or communities where people could live, instead of using arable land which is and will be so necessary for the production of food in the future?

We have to look at new policies and new ways of construction. We cannot forever put people in high-rise apartments, because they cannot stand this type of living: it does not appeal to all people. We are running into problems when we talk of land banks. We must have land to create the necessary space for building because we cannot have people living elbow to elbow without trouble. We can no longer tolerate the program that has been followed, where valuable farmlands surrounding existing municipalities have been tied up by local provincial and federal regulations, land which the owners cannot develop, land which is held in limbo and which could be utilized for agricultural purposes until such time as it may be designated for domestic or industrial use.

The answer lies in the creation of a land bank over which we would have absolute control and for which we would be responsible. This government proposes to tie up this land, the value of which is increasing every year because of the necessity of expanding our housing. Its present owners, the farmers, will have to pay a tremendous amount of income tax or capital gains tax and will not be able to profit from the development of their own land. The speculators will profit from it, not the owners.

Does it not seem right and justified that we should have a government department take possession of this land and do two things: guarantee a fair price for the land to the householder and a fair profit to the original owner of the land? We need an ordinary, common sense approach to housing, but we are not getting it. There is something wrong.

Some weeks ago I visited a new housing development because I was interested. I walked into the office where they were offering new houses for sale. There was a young couple in front of me. They were asking for reassessment of their payments. They were paying $186 a month on their house and after three years of this they had paid only $69 on the principal—all the rest of it had been taken up in expenses, insurance and interest. How would they ever be able to afford a house? This is what is wrong with the housing program of this government and I cannot understand why they cannot see it.

Mr. Gilbert: These are your financial mechanisms.

Mr. Danforth: What concerns me is that the minister seems more interested in asking people to read his speeches than in directing a policy of his party that will solve this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: The finest speech in the world will not solve this problem. We must have a policy, and we cannot have policies that follow the same old line because they do not work. This has been proved. We must go out in new directions, and I say that the time to do so is now. Is it not a strange country in which we live, where people are desperate for houses and are living in tents while under the agricultural policy of the government farmhouses are being abandoned and are falling into decay because there is no one to use them?

The taxes on farm property are so high that the farmers cannot afford to maintain their dwellings. Houses are being torn down, burned down or they fall down at a time when they are desperately needed in Canada. And the government is not even aware of this fact! My colleague has brought my attention to instances in Canada of property owners taking the roofs off their houses so they will not have to pay taxes on them. This is the situation when people are in desperate need of houses.

An hon. Member: Don't believe everything he says.

Mr. Danforth: It is not a question of believing, it is a question of grieving and this government does not see it. You cannot be proud of a record when people are without houses in Canada. We are talking about an affluent society, yet people live in garrets where normally you would not even keep an animal. Out of desperation people live there because they have to have a roof over their heads. This is what is going on in Canada today, and yet you talk about the record of this government. I would like to have time to talk about the record of the government.

An hon. Member: Go ahead; you have ten more minutes.

Mr. Danforth: We could get right back to a request that has been made by my party and by other parties on this side of the House, for the government to relieve the costs borne by householders directly by removing the sales tax on building materials. This action would make it possible immediately for householders at any level to buy a house at a cheaper price. But the government will not even consider this.

We have heard them speak about putting millions of dollars into a land bank, yet they tell us they cannot remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials because it might cost a few million dollars. Legislation is needed immediately to help these people. It will be a crying shame and a scandal if the government has held off this necessary legislation simply in a desperate attempt to win the next election. This is contemptible, but it is what we have to expect. There has been lots of time to bring in legislation. The government sets up the legislative program for Parliament; it is the government that brings in measures, not the opposition. Why have we not dealt with this problem until now?

• (1650)

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak on this subject today because I think it is time the public of Canada knew who is at fault. This government talks about leadership.

Mr. Dinsdale: What a joke.

Mr. Danforth: They cannot even make a speech unless it is written by someone in the department. What kind of leadership is this?

Mr. Basford: How is your research staff?

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, our research staff is just dandy. They were able to prove to us that the situation is far worse than we even suspected. I am delighted to find this out, but I feel sorry for the householders of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister's staff tells him the same thing.

Mr. Danforth: It is time we had a government in Canada that brought in policies. They talk about something that is new, something that is daring, something that is invigorating, something that is a challenge—but if they brought one new policy into this Parliament it would be a first for them. They talk about their record. They had an opportunity to run on their record, and they have not done it.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the problems of the people of Canada. Members on the government benches may laugh, but among the citizens of this country the matter is most serious. The idea that a young couple has to postpone marriage because there is no place to live, the idea that people cannot afford a home even though they may earn $6,000 a year, is a tragedy in Canada. The idea that old age pensioners cannot find a home at any price because there is no low-cost housing available to them, is criminal.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we like to feel we can be proud of Canada and the way Canadians are treated. This is the way we should feel. But no member in this House on either side can justifiably feel proud of our housing policy. It is criminal, it is tragic, it does not meet the needs of the people and the really sad thing is that every month the situation grows worse. We are producing less units every year than the minimum needed, and the cost is increasing as is the interest rate. It is a tragedy that is growing even more tragic, and I think we will all rue the day when the government brought in what they consider to be their housing policy.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that remain this afternoon I would urge the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) to assume, in his new capacity, the activist role that he played so well in his other responsibilities.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope he will do better than he did on the price of drugs.

Mr. Watson: The activist role I would urge for the minister, Mr. Speaker, would have the CMHC play a role not simply of a passive lender, which appears to have been its role so far in the province of Quebec, but a role where it would use its power as a lender to force upon municipalities the kind of reform that I feel is essential if we are to protect our local municipal taxpayers.

In my constituency there is a rising population. It is now the second largest in the province of Quebec, with a population of 131,000. This has meant a tremendous expansion in housing in the last few years. This expansion along the south shore of the St. Lawrence opposite Montreal has been as a result of direct CMHC loans and NHA guarantees and, more recently, the CMHC sponsored low and moderate cost housing. But this federal input has not been reflected in any visible improvement in local planning or in the amount of space set aside for green areas, recreation areas or park areas. On the municipal financing side, Mr. Speaker, this growth has been accompanied by a disastrous deterioration in the finances of most of the local municipalities, with the result that in one or two communities which I represent, taxes on a $12,000 or $14,000 house are in the $800, $900 per year range.

What is happening now is that because of this chaotic and terrible local municipal financing, the low-cost and direct loan housing which formerly was within reach of a very large segment of the population, is being forced out of the reach of the very people it was designed to help. The major cause of this poor municipal financing is the practice which is still tolerated by the Quebec department of municipal affairs of allowing municipalities to not incorporate into the cost of house lots all municipal costs associated with such lots. I mean not only roads, sidewalks, water and sewage costs but also lighting, police, fire, recreation and administrative services. In most parts of North America and in Ontario I understand the practice is followed of capitalizing all costs into housing. The cost of all these services, actual and anticipated, is capitalized and forms part of the cost of the lot. Although the lot costs more initially if it is financed by CMHC, it is spread over the loan period and municipal taxpayers do not end up having taxes increased to pay for the cost, largely hidden, of every new subdivision and housing development.

The minister indicated today that he is proposing to bring in some NHA changes soon. But I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that these changes will not benefit the people they should help, the long suffering municipal taxpayers, unless—in my province at least—the condition is attached for CMHC loans and NHA guarantees that would require intelligent municipal financing for new development. This must include the capitalization of all costs associated with new development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have now expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENTS ON MASSACRE AT TEL AVIV AIRPORT AND MEETING OF NATO FOREIGN MINISTERS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make two statements today, a very short statement that I have been asked to give on the events at the Tel Aviv airport and also a statement on the meetings of the NATO Council in Bonn. I have discussed this with the opposition parties who are agreeable that I give the two statements together and comments can be made on both at the same time.

I am sure all members of the House shared my feelings of shock and horror when they heard the news of the shooting incident at Tel Aviv airport on May 30. Such acts of senseless violence directed against innocent civilians can only be deplored by reasonable people everywhere. In my absence from Canada, Senator Martin on May 31 conveyed to the Israeli Ambassador in Ottawa the government's feelings and expressions of sympathy to the bereaved families of the victims of this horrible crime. I know the House would wish to join me in expressing sincere condolences to the family of Mrs. Subach of Montreal, who was killed, and to her daughter, Miss Mimi Subach, who was wounded, our wishes for an early recovery.

The ambassadors of Israel and Lebanon have made known to us the views of their governments on this episode. We have taken note of a number of public statements, among them one by the president of Lebanon last Friday condemning the Tel Aviv airport incident. In addition, our ambassador in Beirut has been instructed to convey our views on the incident to the Lebanese government.

This tragic episode is another instance of acts of violence by extremist groups which are unfortunately becoming all too common in various parts of the world. Such acts are particularly dangerous in the Middle East, and I hope that this one will not lead to an escalation of violence there.

Since the incident, new security measures have been put into effect in Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), would be glad to give information to the House on these measures.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to give a report on the NATO Foreign Ministers meeting, from which I have just returned, in the capital of the Federal Republic of Germany, situated at the crossroads of Europe. In terms of time, too, the Bonn meeting took place at a crossroads in the evolution of East-West relations.

The NATO meeting coincided with the completion of President Nixon's talks with Soviet leaders. Secretary of State Rogers reported to his colleagues in Bonn on this historic visit and, in particular, on the strategic arms limitation agreements. We all welcomed these agreements as an important turning point in efforts to curb the nuclear arms race and enhance international security through nuclear arms control. Along with other ministers, I welcomed the commitment of the United States and the Soviet Union actively to continue negotiations on further limitations. I also expressed particular appreciation to the United States for having regularly consulted its allies in the North Atlantic council throughout the negotiating process.

On June 3, shortly after the NATO meeting, the Foreign Ministers of the four powers signed a final protocol bringing the Berlin Agreement into force. At the same time, representatives of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Soviet Union and Poland exchanged instruments of ratification concluding their non-aggression treaties. The Canadian government welcomes these agreements as major steps forward in relations between East and West. The Berlin Agreement hopefully marks the end of the recurring tension and instability in and around Berlin that have frequently envenomed East-West relations since the blockade in 1948. The non-aggression treaties should remove another source of tension, allowing the Federal German Republic to put its relations with Eastern Europe on a more normal basis.

Together these developments open the way for the Alliance to take part in multilateral preparatory talks on a conference on security and co-operation in Europe and for the two German states to begin negotiations on a modus vivendi. Such an accommodation is necessary for the success of the Berlin agreement and for the maintenance of stability in Central Europe. If the two German states can agree on a modus vivendi, it will pave the way for their entry into the United Nations and a general recognition of the German Democratic Republic.

When one looks back at the many years of stagnant East-West relations, the conclusion of the Berlin agreement and the non-aggression treaties represents remarkable progress. It vindicates the Alliance's policy of making a Berlin settlement the pre-condition for progress on preparation for a conference and demonstrates that the Alliance, through its solid support for Chancellor Brandt's "ostpolitik", is a positive instrument for détente.

NATO Ministers agreed in Bonn to accept the invitation of the Finnish government to hold multilateral preparatory talks in Helsinki to prepare for a conference on security and co-operation. The exact date on which the European countries, the United States and Canada will sit down to talk about a conference will have to be set by mutual agreement among the potential participants. With other NATO members, Canada will now move to engage other interested countries in planning for this phase.

I should emphasize that a decision to convoke a formal conference has not yet been taken. That decision will depend on the outcome of the preparatory talks. The aim of NATO countries at these talks will be to ensure that our proposals are fully considered and to establish that enough common ground exists among participants to warrant reasonable expectations that a conference will produce satisfactory results.

For example, we want to see more normal contacts and exchanges between countries of different political and social systems in Europe. To achieve this end, the conference should deal in a practical way with measures designed to contribute to the freer movement of people, information and ideas. I was not alone in underlining the importance of this consideration at our meeting last week.

On the military side, NATO Ministers were agreed that certain stabilization measures could usefully be discussed at a conference in order to create confidence on both sides.

In addition to a conference on security and co-operation in Europe, NATO Ministers devoted considerable attention to the question of mutual and balanced force reductions. Just as we have always considered that progress in East-West political détente must be measured in terms of practical results, especially on the Berlin problem, so we believe that any real improvement in security in Europe will remain illusory unless it is accompanied by some reduction in the concentration of military power in the area.

This is not to say that force reductions should be negotiated at a conference. It would be impossible in practical terms to carry out negotiations on such a complex matter among the 35 participants in a conference. Preparations for a conference and for mutual and balanced force reduction negotiations should, however, proceed as far as possible in parallel. In order that force reductions complement the political achievements of a security conference, talks on the two subjects should be concurrent but separate.

Unfortunately the explorations on mutual and balanced force reductions have not yet begun because of soviet unwillingness to receive Manlio Brosio, former Secretary General of NATO, as an explorer. More recently, however, the Soviet Union has expressed its willingness to explore procedures for negotiations on mutual and balanced force reductions. At the Bonn meeting NATO Ministers affirmed their support for multilateral explorations. The next step will be to find means of translating this idea into action. I suggested in Bonn that a group should be selected among NATO members to engage the Soviet Union and other interested countries in preliminary talks to seek sufficient agreement to bring about negotiations. Considerable interest was shown in the Canadian idea at the meeting and we hope Alliance members can reach accord on some form of group approach in the near future.

The atmosphere in Bonn was very much influenced by the promising progress recently made in the broad negotiating process by which we hope to resolve the underlying causes of tension, including the division of Germany. NATO countries responded by expressing their intention to pursue the opportunities for progress on both preparations for a conference and explorations for mutual and balanced force reductions. We should have no illusions about the difficulties that lie ahead. In many ways the task which now faces us is the most difficult of all. We shall have to combine continued defence preparedness with pursuit of détente, Alliance solidarity with willingness to seek accommodation with the other side, and firmness on basic principles with flexibility on means.

Canada has direct and identifiable interests in both security and co-operation in Europe. That is why we have supported Alliance policies in defence and détente in the past and why we intend to work with our NATO allies in the continued search for improved East-West relations through mutual and balanced force reductions and a conference on security and co-operation in Europe.

I should now like to table the communiqué issued after the meeting of the North Atlantic Alliance, and suggest, if the House agrees, that it be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For communiqué referred to above, see appendix].

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister speaks for all of us when he underlines the horror we felt on learning of the senseless violence at the Tel Aviv airport. We share in his expression of sympathy to the family of Mrs. Subach. Surely it is not too much to ask in 1972 that innocent people be free to travel the world. Surely it is also obvious that violent acts of this sort only make the problems in the Middle East more difficult of solution.

I thank the minister for making available a copy of his statement on the meetings of the NATO council that he attended. He spoke about being at the geographic crossroads of Europe and at a crossroads in the evolution of East-West relations. I am sure we would agree that this is an important juncture. Indeed, President Nixon's visit to Moscow must have been underlined by the NATO council meeting, the SALT talks and so on. I am sure we are interested in the development of plans for a European security conference, although I suppose it is not too unfair to say that no one can accuse NATO or the Warsaw pact countries of moving with undue haste, since this has been very much an international topic for some years now.

The minister also mentioned the success that President Nixon had in achieving an agreement to curb the nuclear arms race. Here I was struck by the irony of the fact that France will later this year be testing nuclear devices in the Pacific area. Presumably France is now attending and participating in the meetings being held by the United Nations at Stockholm, but I suppose it is also true to say that irony is not an unknown concept in international issues.

I am sure it is important for the European community and for NATO to be at the stage now where they are co-ordinating their international policies. We must remember that NATO is not the same thing as the European community. The communiqué the minister has tabled concerning the ministerial sessions of NATO contains the words "freedom and security" and refers to the need to preserve freedom and security on the part of all members of NATO. I hope that as we preserve these concepts internationally member nations, such as the military regime of Greece, will live up domestically to the ideals that undoubtedly she espouses if she is a signatory to this communiqué internationally.

• (1420)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I join, as do all members of my party, in the feelings of shock and horror expressed by the minister at the senseless massacre at the Tel Aviv airport. We also join him in the messages of sympathy to the families of the victims. There are two features of this appalling outrage I want to note. First, it was fully premeditated and fully planned and, second, it was aimed at entirely innocent civilians. It marks a new high in barbarism. One of the most regrettable features is that certain spokesmen for some governments in the Middle East condone this act of terrorism. All the more credit to King Hussein of Jordan who described it as a product of sick minds. There is no doubt of the revulsion of the whole civilized world at such acts of violence. Surely it is up to governments to co-operate more effectively in limiting and preventing the preparation of these deeds of terrorism within their own territories.

The general statement of the minister on the NATO ministerial meeting was most welcome to us and I think to men and women of good will throughout the world. Although much remains to be done to end confrontation in Central Europe, most striking and encouraging progress has been made.

The Moscow communiqué, setting out the results of the meeting between President Nixon and leaders of the U.S.S.R. indicates that the two superpowers have set their faces toward a more co-operative relationship. The SALT talks resulting in the signing of a treaty on the limitation of ABM systems and the further agreement on the limitation of strategic offensive arms mark a slackening of what has been called the mad momentum of the nuclear arms race.

The Berlin agreement removes a source of tension in Central Europe. Non-aggression treaties between the Federal Republic of Germany, the U.S.S.R. and Poland have opened the way to a reduction of fear and suspicion in that part of the world, and also opened the way to the proposed European security conference. I suggest we should now be ready to welcome both Germanys into the United Nations.

I pay tribute to Chancellor Brandt. In my view his statesmanlike initiatives have had a lot to do with the far better climate of affairs in Europe at the present time.

We acknowledge that preparatory talks are necessary before the European security conference proceeds, but we hope that the NATO countries do not drag their feet on the ground of need for preparation. We think that the momentum of recent events should be followed by action.

The subject of mutual and balanced force reductions is a complex subject, but this is absolutely essential if there is to be reality in the reduction of tension in that part of the world. I have never been quite sure that Mr. Brosio, the former Secretary General of NATO, was the right person to send to deal with mutual and balanced force reductions. However that may be, I am glad to see this communiqué indicates that multilateral discussions will take place.

I would end by saying that the test of all these useful developments will be the momentum with which the nations use the favourable atmosphere and for positive and definite moves toward a more co-operative world community.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I share the regrets and concern expressed by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in regard to the recent massacre at the Tel Aviv airport which was no doubt organized and planned by criminal lunatics. We deplore such acts, whether they occur in Tel Aviv or elsewhere. We regret this escalation of reprovable acts by notorious criminals seeking to create panic wherever they go.

Such acts have been committed in Tel Aviv, and even here in Canada. Some are occurring now in Latin America, in Mexico and other countries.

We therefore join the representative of the government in expressing our most sincere condolences to the bereaved families.

Concerning the other subject dealt with by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, the NATO meeting, I should say that negotiations between the Soviet authorities and the President of the United States have resulted in agreements on arms limitation, on the use and testing of nuclear arms. We suggest that it is not through arms that peace can be achieved in the world, but rather through understanding, charity and co-operation whether between Russia and the United States or any country, including Canada. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion it is through dialogue and understanding that a just and durable peace can be established in the world.

Now, even though people or representatives of government may say efforts are being made to achieve peace, we must recognize that the more peace is discussed the greater disagreement and bickering because between the various countries of the world. And it is certainly not through arms or criminal acts such as we have been witnessing recently that a just and durable peace can be established.

My colleagues and I are happy with the talks the President of the United States has held and we hope they will have favourable consequences, which might renew the hopes of the population as to the establishment of a just and durable peace throughout the world.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN ONTARIO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion in the following case of urgent and pressing necessity. Last week the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications held hearings in western Ontario to ascertain whether alternate, efficient comfortable bus service had been provided as promised at the Canadian Transport Commission hearings in Owen Sound in March, 1970. In view of the fact that these services are far from being as promised, bringing untold hardship to thousands of citizens both young and old, with consent I intend to move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley):

That the government immediately issue instructions to the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway to re-establish the passenger rail services which were discontinued in November, 1970, in western Ontario.

Federal authorities in conjunction with the province of Ontario and the municipalities involved immediately undertake studies which would involve public hearings with a view to determining a minimum railway passenger train network as defined in relationship to the most economic, efficient and adequate transportation system required.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The motion cannot be put.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns reports which indicate that the railroads are about to seek further increases in freight rates in the maritime region. In view of the fact that this represents the ninth increase in freight rates in 30 months, and in view of the crippling effect that such additional increase would have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now arguing the case. I suggest to the hon. member that the motion should be put without argument.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the Minister of Transport impose a moratorium on freight rate increases until the government announces its over-all transportation policy for this region.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—OPERATIONS BY DENMARK—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I too seek unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency, namely, the failure at the conference of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries to agree on the Canadian proposal for an immediate ban on high seas fishing for salmon. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House urges the government to immediately restrict all fish imports to Canada from Denmark, as a protest toward the Danish refusal to conserve the Canadian spawned North Atlantic salmon, and furthermore, if bilateral negotiations between Denmark and Canada fail to achieve a ban on salmon fishing off Greenland within the next six months, that the government undertake further economic measures against the Danes.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SOLICITOR GENERAL BILL

MEASURE RESPECTING CORRECTIONAL SERVICE PROGRAM

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

June 2, 1972—Mr. Howard (Skeena)—Bill intituled: "An Act respecting the Department of the Solicitor General (correctional service program).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has given notice of his intention to propose this motion. The Chair has had an opportunity to study the hon. member's proposed bill and I have extremely serious reservations about the bill from a procedural standpoint. Generally speaking, it seems to me that the hon. member is clearly attempting by the bill to circumvent the normal supply procedures. If the hon. member thinks he can convince the Chair that this is the kind of bill which should be allowed to be proposed, I will hear him, but after giving the matter serious thought I am sure he will appreciate that this would be a very novel way of considering supply proposals in the House if this bill were submitted for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is certainly not to circumvent anything. As presented the purpose would be clearly to deal with a limitation upon otherwise wasteful expenditures on the part of the government. In light of the fact you have raised a question about the bill, I wonder whether we might let it stand and consider it on another day?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might want to reflect on the suggestion I have made. I will hear him if he wants to submit a procedural argument tomorrow, and I will make my ruling at that time. For the moment, the bill will not put for first reading.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

UIC INTERVIEWERS

Question No. 14—Mr. Marshall:

1. Are all UIC offices in Canada now manned by skilled, trained interviewers and, if so, how many of these interviewers are allocated to various offices?

2. How is it intended to service remote and isolated areas where unemployed are removed by long distances from UIC offices?

3. Will the trained interviewers be available to counsel the unemployed employables in order to assist them to fit into society?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. All UIC District Offices and Service Centres are manned with Claimant Assistance guidance officers. The number in each office varies from 1 to 12, dependent upon the estimated claim load.

2. It is intended to service remote areas by means of itinerant visits by guidance officers from District Offices and Service Centres. The frequency of these visits will be determined by the number of claimants requesting Claimant Assistance interviews.

3. The Claimant Assistance Program was established to provide assistance to U.I. claimants, however, guidance is made available to individual on a request basis from either Canada Manpower Centre or social welfare agencies.

UIC—WORK INDUSTRY RECORDS

Question No. 16—Mr. Marshall:

What records are now to be kept at UIC offices on the work history and educational and training qualifications of the unemployed?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Information kept by UIC offices on the work history and educational and training qualifications of the unemployed consist of that listed on the "Application for Benefit", and "Employment Status Questionnaire" completed by each claimant when requesting U.I. benefits.

UIC—CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION ON CLAIMANTS

Question No. 17—Mr. Marshall:

Is the confidential information on claimants made available to other branches of the UIC and, if not (a) for what reason (b) in what way may a claimant be assisted if jobs meeting his or her qualifications are available in another city?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The only confidential information available under the Claimant Assistance Program is that provided to the guidance officers by claimants during CAP interviews. This information is not made available to any other branch of UIC. (a) In order that a realistic appraisal of a claimant's employment and related problems can be made, it is essential that the claimant be put at ease and have the utmost confidence in the guidance officer. To achieve this, he is assured that anything he may say will be held in the strictest confidence within the Claimant Assistance Branch. (b) By referral to a Canada Manpower Centre.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 29—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What was the total amount of money in the Public Service Superannuation Account as at (a) March 31, 1969 (b) March 31, 1970 (c) March 31, 1971?

2. What rate of interest has the government paid for the use of this money during the fiscal years ending on the dates noted above?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the Public Service Superannuation Account during the fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1969 (b) March 31, 1970 (c) March 31, 1971?

4. What was the total amount paid out of the Public Service Superannuation Account during the fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1969 (b) March 31, 1970 (c) March 31, 1971?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The amount credited to the Public Service Superannuation Account as of: (a) March 31, 1969, $3,178,376,807; (b) March 31, 1970, $3,695,308,333; (c) March 31, 1971, $4,097,595,197.

2. Interest was paid on this account at the rate of 1.0000 per cent per quarter up until the quarter ending June 30, 1969. T.B. Minute 692055 dated September 25, 1969 amended section 35 of the Public Service Superannuation Regulations, and the actual interest rates subsequent to this date were as follows: Quarter ending September 30, 1969, 1.2416 per cent; quarter ending December 31, 1969, 1.2575 per cent; quarter ending March 31, 1970, 1.2868 per cent; quarter ending June 30, 1970, 1.3174 per cent; quarter ending September 30, 1970, 1.3262 per cent; quarter ending December 31, 1970, 1.3427 per cent; quarter ending March 31, 1971, 1.3597 per cent.

3. The total amount of interest credited to the Public Service Superannuation Account during the fiscal year ending: (a) March 31, 1969, $117,950,358; (b) March 31, 1970, $130,993,152; (c) March 31, 1971, $147,693,942.

4. The total amount paid out of the Public Service Superannuation Fund during the fiscal year ending: (a) March 31, 1969, $86,964,343; (b) March 31, 1970, $95,880,827; (c) March 31, 1971, $107,680,817.

Note: The total annual amounts being credited to the Account which include interest are set to be just sufficient to meet estimated future obligations under the Act.

Questions

MORTGAGE LOAN TO PESTALOZZI COLLEGE

Question No. 45—Mr. Ryan:

Is Pestalozzi College meeting its mortgage payments and, if not, by how many payments is it in arrears and what is the total amount of the arrears?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The date for adjustment of interest on this mortgage was set for May 1, 1972. The first monthly payment will become due and payable on June 1, 1972.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF BENEFITS

Question No. 187—Mr. Marshall:

Has the government requested provincial welfare departments to contact claimants to have them assign their right to unemployment insurance benefits to welfare authorities to grant relief and recovery of these payments and, if so, by what method?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No. Section 48(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, provides that Unemployment Insurance benefits may be assigned to a province or municipal authority in order to reimburse that province or municipal authority for the amount of welfare payments it makes to a person, which welfare payments would not have been made if the Unemployment Insurance benefits to which he is entitled were then in pay.

A number of provinces are completing assignments as authorized by Section 48(2), and the Unemployment Insurance Commission is presently working with the remaining provinces in developing the procedures that will facilitate the extension of the assignment of benefits to all provinces wishing to participate in the program. However, the government has definitely not requested provincial welfare departments to contact claimants to have them assign their Unemployment Insurance benefits.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 223—Mr. Burton:

What is the salary of the Chief Commissioner and each of the Commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Chief Commissioner, $37,500-$42,000; Assistant Chief Commissioner and Commissioners, $31,500-$37,500.

TORONTO—REHABILITATION OF EXISTING SUBSTANDARD HOUSING

Question No. 473—Mr. McCleave:

Has the government or any agency thereof entered into an agreement with the city of Toronto to provide loans on a sliding scale for the rehabilitation of existing substandard housing in that city and, if so (a) how much was the ceiling of the total of the loans (b) how many loans have been made and what do they total (c) what interest rate is charged on these loans (d) are these loans available to property owners who rent their properties and what restrictions, if any, are placed on the size of rental increases for such improved properties?

[Mr. Drury.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has entered into an agreement with the City of Toronto to provide loans on a sliding interest scale for the rehabilitation of existing housing and, where necessary, upgrading them to meet city standards. (a) The aggregate amount for lending under this agreement is $1.5 million. (b) While no loans have been approved as of May 15th, 1972, there are 40 applications in various stages of processing which will likely result in approvals. (c) The interest rate on these loans will be on a sliding scale geared to income, from 0 per cent for incomes under $3,000 per year up to 7 7/8 per cent for incomes of $7,000 a year and over. The cost of the interest subsidy will be shared between the city and CMHC. (d) These loans are available to property owners who rent their properties, providing the owner agrees to maintain the low rental scale of the dwelling and not to raise rents without first proving to the city that increases in such costs as taxes, maintenance and financing make higher rents necessary.

OPERATION LIFT

Question No. 522—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many applications under Operation Lift were received from producers from each of the three prairie provinces?

2. How many producer applications were approved, and entitled to payment in each of the three prairie provinces?

3. What was the total amount paid to producers in each of the three provinces?

4. Are all applications finalized and funds distributed?

5. How many producer applications received over-payment and what were the major reasons for over-payment?

6. Has legal action been taken to recover these funds and, if so, in how many cases?

7. As of this date, is any amount outstanding as a result of over-payment and, if so, in how many cases and what is the amount?

8. What was the total amount of money distributed under Operation Lift, including administrative operations?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. Number of applications received by provinces: Manitoba, 16,941; Saskatchewan, 64,304; Alberta, 29,457; British Columbia, 755; Total, 111,457.

2. Number of applications: Manitoba, 15,093; Saskatchewan, 60,013; Alberta, 25,228; British Columbia, 704; Total, 101,038.

3. Amount paid: Manitoba, $6,115,350.00; Saskatchewan, $42,106,406.00; Alberta, $14,396,440.00; British Columbia, $574,219.00; Total, $63,192,415.00.

4. No.

5. (i) 4,053 producers. (ii) Major reasons for overpayments: (a) Corrections in acreages reported by producers which were made necessary following aerial surveys and "on the farm" inspections. (b) Many producers who originally seeded cover crops on summerfallow and nurse crops with perennial forage changed their plans and harvested the cover and nurse crops.

6. No legal action has been taken to recover these funds.

7. As at May 5, 1972, 2,497 overpayments totalling $364,-572.80 were still outstanding.

8. Lift Payments, $63,192,415.00; Administrative Costs, $2,211,745.38; Total, $65,404,160.38.

GRASSLAND INCENTIVES PROGRAM—THREE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Question No. 523—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many applications have been received from each of the three prairie provinces under the Grassland Incentive Program?

2. How many applications have been approved entitling producers to receive payment under the program, in each of the three prairie provinces?

3. (a) How much has been paid out in each of the three prairie provinces (b) how much is scheduled to be paid on applications received last year?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. Applications received Manitoba, 4,245; Saskatchewan, 7,683; Alberta, 12,738; British Columbia, 620; Total, 25,286.

2. Number of applications approved by provinces: Manitoba, 3,525; Saskatchewan, 6,632; Alberta, 10,885; British Columbia, 497; Total, 21,539.

3. (a) Payments by provinces: Manitoba, $1,273,544.00; Saskatchewan, $2,545,236.00; Alberta, $5,596,661.00; British Columbia, $444,609.00; Total, $9,860,050.00. (b) Estimated $9,860,050, subject to field inspection.

AUSTRALIAN CATTLE IMPORT PERMITS

Question No. 601—Mr. Downey:

1. What are the names of those who were awarded import permits for Australian cattle as indicated in a recent press release by the Minister of Agriculture?

2. How many permits, for how many animals did each one receive?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. The names of individuals receiving import permits for livestock are not made public until after the animals have entered Canada.

2. A total of 76 permits were issued for a total of 254 animals.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE PENSIONS ADJUSTMENT ACT

Question No. 30—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. In each year since the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act of 1959 was passed, how many persons have received payments thereunder?

2. In each of the above years, what was the total amount paid out under the said act?

3. In each of the above years, what was the average amount paid under the said act (a) to retired public servants (b) to widows (c) to others?

4. In each of the last five years, either calendar or financial, for which statistics are available, how many pensions under the Public Service Superannuation Act (a) to retired public servants (b) to widows of public servants or widows of retired public servants, have been discontinued because of the death of the superannuate?

Return tabled.

Orders for Returns

CANADA'S MEMBERSHIP IN LATIN AMERICAN ORGANIZATIONS

Question No. 345—Mr. Robinson:

1. Of how many Latin American organizations is Canada a member and what are the organizations?

2. What is the annual cost of membership in each of the organizations?

3. What benefits does Canada derive from each of the Latin American organizations to which it belongs?

Return tabled.

LOTBINIÈRE CONSTITUENCY—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Question No. 489—Mr. Fortin:

Under the Local Initiatives Program and since its inception, were funds invested by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the constituency of Lotbinière and, if so (a) what was the total amount (b) what is the complete list of groups who benefited from the program (c) what are the details of the agreements reached in the constituency?

Return tabled.

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 564—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. Was a survey conducted by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in 1971, of 20,000 students at 58 Canadian universities and community colleges and, if so (a) what percentage of these found work for 16 weeks, 12 weeks, 8 weeks, 4 weeks, 2 weeks and no work (b) when were the students surveyed, under what circumstances and by whom (c) what were the questions asked?

2. Of the 20,000 students, how many were in their first post-secondary year?

3. How many of these students did not return to post-secondary training?

4. How do these figures compare with those obtained by Statistics Canada?

5. What explanations are there for any major differences in findings for these two surveys?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF TREATY CLAIMS AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS IN RELATION TO POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who has stated that he is not pressing for any early settlement of treaty claims by the native people. He has also said that the government is ready to accept at any time applications for the building of pipelines in the north. Is it his view and that of the government that these two questions are entirely distinct and that the question of treaty claims in the north has no connection at all with permission to build pipelines in the north?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have already outlined the government's position regarding treaties signed with Northwest Territories Indians. We are aware of our obligations under such treaties and we would like to fulfil them as soon as possible but it would not be quite fair to compel Indians to accept a settlement sooner than they want it. Nevertheless, we must go on with our projects regarding northern development and I think that most Indians are wishing for as much progress as possible and this as soon as possible in the Northwest Territories.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: I take it the minister is saying there is no connection between the two. With regard to the question of aboriginal rights as distinct from treaty rights, the minister has said that these rights are before the courts. Is it the minister's position that there is no connection between these rights and any application for the building of a pipeline through the north? Is this the position he takes at this stage when these rights have not been determined by the courts?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have already said in the House.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, in order to remove any doubts in anybody's mind with regard to this matter, whether it is truly the position of the minister that he is prepared to receive applications for pipelines without any effort on his part to settle any questions with regard to aboriginal rights?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed the government's position. We intend to proceed with the development of the North. Should the Supreme Court give a ruling directly with regard to aboriginal rights, the government would take the situation in hand and decide what ought to be done.

YOUTH

POSSIBLE PROVISION OF SPECIAL MANPOWER CENTRES TO PROVIDE COUNSELLING AND OTHER SERVICES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—I am sure for good reason, although he was scheduled to be here—may I direct a question to the acting minister arising out of a special report concerning young people on welfare issued by the Social Development Council. In view of the evidence in the report that the young people are very much discouraged about the services they receive from the Canada manpower centres, is the minister studying the situation for the purpose of establishing special counselling and other services directed to young people through a network of manpower centres for youth?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I understand that several meetings have been taking place between various departments of the government on questions related to the one asked by the hon. member. I suggest to him that he might wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will do so with pleasure. The pleasure of addressing a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is no greater than that of addressing one to the Minister of Labour. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the question of special centres directed to meeting the needs of young people is being discussed by a committee at the present time and being favourably considered?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Officials of my department met last week with officials of some of the provinces to discuss this general area, and we are giving the matter serious consideration. I would also like to indicate that the officials discussed with the provincial officials the work activity aspects of the Canada Assistance Plan. The hon. member may be aware that we made the criteria more generous in terms of cost-sharing for projects initiated under the work activity provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan in the hope that more projects could be submitted, and these of course would involve youth. It was the subject matter of the study to which the hon. member referred.

SUGGESTED TRI-LEVEL GOVERNMENT CONFERENCE TO DEVELOP POLICIES TO MEET NEEDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare another question along the same lines arising out of the allegations or evidence in the report—whichever word one may wish to use—that the overwhelming majority of young people on welfare are in need of work, would rather work than be on welfare, and are finding considerable difficulty and considerable humiliation in obtaining welfare. In view of this fact, are the minister or his officials considering initiating a national conference of all three levels of government to develop policies and a more decent attitude toward the young with a view to meeting their needs?

• (1440)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member did point out, because it was not given too much note, that the study declares they do want to work. That bears out our own studies within the department. As to the suggestion of a national conference, Mr. Speaker, we are giving that some study right now, and we may be prepared to talk further about it with the provinces. I might indicate that we have had several discussions with the provinces already on this whole field. I might also indicate that we have set aside a fund to give us a more accurate analysis of exactly those in this country who are on social assistance, and for what reasons. We have set this money aside in order to give us the statistical data to which the study also referred.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask one final supplementary on this subject. In view of the fact the overwhelming majority of these young people are anxious to work, and in view of the proportion of unemployed in the age group of 14 to 20 years, may I ask the minister whether the government and the committee, if he can speak for the committee, are considering some ongoing program, following up the Local Initiatives Program and opportunities for youth, of permanent training and actual jobs for the young people?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance to study the report in detail. The local initiatives program and the Opportunities for Youth program have gone a long way in this direction. Whether they are to be complemented by something permanent would involve discussions with the provinces. I think a major area for examination here, in terms of a permanent mechanism, is greater accessability by the provinces to the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan. I have already mentioned one, work activity. I think this could be of considerable help in terms of involving the young.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—EXTENSION TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL JOBS FOR THOSE BETWEEN AGES OF 16 AND 24

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact the report referred to by the hon. member for York South indicates that the population increase of Canadians aged 16 to 24 years outstrips our ability to provide jobs, would the minister indicate what action he is going to take to expand the Opportunities for Youth program to take care of all the needs in the future?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the budget relating to this program has been increased twice between last year and this year. The government will have to see if this program should be pursued next summer, but, as I have already told the House, there are other youth employment programs that are not designed for students only. Those programs are now under consideration within the Department of Manpower and Immigration and that of the Secretary of State and will be discussed in due course.

INQUIRY RESPECTING GRANT TO HOSTELS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary?

With respect to young people who prefer to live as parasites instead of looking for a job and who, as I saw in Regina, presently live in youth hostels, does the government grant any money for their maintenance, be it in Regina or elsewhere in Canada?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that there exists a certain number of hostels that are set up by private organizations. They are subsidized by the federal government and the Department of the Secretary of State in its summer activities program when they comply with certain criteria.

However, as to the hon. member's reference to young people staying idle in hostels for long periods, I must say that this would not involve a hostel that would be financed by the federal government, because the maximum period that young people are allowed to spend in these is two days.

SPORTS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NAMES OF RECIPIENTS OF SPORTS CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a related question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When will the minister be announcing the names of the 500 recipients of Sports Canada Scholarships, in view of the fact that there must be at least 1,000 of the 3,200 applicants still up in the air about what they are going to do this summer?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the latter part of last week—I stand to be corrected as to the precise day—letters went out to all the successful applicants for scholarships, together with a press release formally announcing them. The press release may not have gone out until today, but certainly letters were mailed to all the applicants.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood for a last supplementary on this subject, and then the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED USE OF MISLEADING ADVERTISING TO LURE IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question, I think, should be addressed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises out of the report entitled "Riverdale," which I think is the same report referred to by the hon. member for York South; it is published by the Minister of Labour. Has the government seen the allegation in that report that misleading advertising and an unsuitable and dishonest sales campaign are still being used to lure immigrants to Canada? Would the minister look into this part of the report and take whatever action is required to end this sort of activity?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have at the present time no advertising sales campaign abroad as such, nor has there been a campaign of this type for quite some time. A report received by our research branch shows that out of 3,500 immigrants who arrived in 1969 and who were surveyed fairly recently, only 4 per cent of those who received counselling abroad reported subsequently that this counselling was inadequate in any way. Moreover, two out of three persons in this small group indicated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Perrault: I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that we could provide a full and complete answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood and to the parliamentary secretary that that question really was not supplementary. It might have been related to the first question, but we seem to have drifted away little by little from the original question asked 15 minutes ago. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Perrault: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon. member schedule this for ten o'clock because we would like to provide him with the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the House would be glad to revert to motions so that those facts can be given to us now.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is opposition to the suggestion that we return to motions for the purpose of hearing the parliamentary secretary on this matter. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

NATIONAL PARKS

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERPROVINCIAL PARK IN TÉMISCAMINGUE—REPRESENTATIONS FROM CITIZENS' GROUPS—DISCUSSIONS WITH ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in charge of national parks.

On many occasions when I asked him questions about the Témiscamingue national park, the minister replied that he was to discuss the matter with the premier of Quebec. Is the minister aware that people are now talking about an interprovincial park that would include the Mattawa area in Ontario and that of Témiscamingue? If so, could he tell us about the progress of the discussions?

[Mr. Perrault.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the new proposal to the effect that citizens from Ontario would like the park to include areas on both sides of the frontier. We also discussed the matter with the Ontario government but have not received any answer yet.

Mr. Caouette: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Did the hon. minister receive representations from the council of Témiscamingue county to the effect that it would be preferable to create a national park in Témiscamingue without any areas from another province?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is not in order. The hon. member is asking the minister whether he received representations to that effect.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase my question.

As regards that interprovincial park, is there any opposition from the citizens of Témiscamingue? If so, what has the minister told them?

Mr. Chrétien: Citizens on the Quebec side would like the park on their side alone, people from Ontario would also like to have it on their side alone; as a good federalist, I think it might be wise to set it up on both sides.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert. May we have order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue has a supplementary, after which I will recognize the right hon. gentleman.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—RATIFICATION OF CERTAIN TREATIES—PROVISION OF EFFECTIVE SCREENING OF PASSENGERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my questions have to do with the statement made at the beginning of today's sitting by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, particularly with the diabolical events that took place in Tel Aviv and the need for action being taken to control hijackings of airplanes which have reached epidemic proportions. Are discussions now going on between the countries which have airways operating in their respective territories to ratify the treaties entered into in 1963 at Tokyo, in 1970 at The Hague and in 1971 at Montreal? This is a matter that particularly affects the foreign relations of our country and the question is therefore directed to the minister responsible. What is being done in this connection?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the necessary legislation that would give us authority to ratify or, at least authority to carry out the undertakings is now, I understand, before the other place. I hope it will be passed soon. We will then proceed to ratify these agreements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Am I to understand that ratification will take place following the conclusion of deliberations in the other place?

Mr. Sharp: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has been agreed to in discussions with nations connected with the assurance that there will be effective screening of passengers getting on aircraft?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to encroach on the responsibilities of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, but I have had a detailed discussion of measures under way, and they are very thorough. We are subjecting all passengers going to Tel Aviv, for example, to very special screening and very special inspection. Of course, the problem is greater than one of passengers going in that direction, because at any time some madman may decide to blow up an airport anywhere in the world. We are grappling with this problem, I think, at least as effectively as any other country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the apparent results, no country is doing very effective work. May I ask the minister whether Canada is installing screening apparatus to prevent persons getting on board aircraft with substances in their possession that can be used for explosion purposes?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, even if very special precautions had been taken before the Japanese who blew up the airport at Tel Aviv boarded the aricraft, those precautions would have been ineffective because the apparatus and the guns were to be found in their baggage and not on their persons. I think that these questions ought to be directed, for more detailed information, to the Minister of Transport who, I think, will be able to satisfy the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister took it upon himself in his opening statement to explain the situation. I thought he knew something about the subject and did not need the assistance of another minister. I ask him particularly whether, in Canada, there is full and effective screening of international flights today?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think those questions ought to be directed to the Minister of Transport. In our cabinet we work co-operatively; perhaps in the right hon. gentleman's cabinet it was not the same.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to learn whether the minister knew anything about the situation of which he spoke.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST BY PROVINCE FOR ASSISTANCE—IMPROVEMENT OF PERMANENT CONTROL FACILITIES

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the federal government received any request from the province of British Columbia to provide any assistance in connection with the serious flood conditions in the Similkameen, Okanagan and Kamloops areas of British Columbia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I received a report on the situation from the Minister of Veterans Affairs and from the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo. They were in the area over the weekend. After that report I checked and, to my knowledge at this time, we have not yet received any request from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Baldwin: The hotline between Victoria and Ottawa is disconnected at present.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Has the government of Canada any plans to join with the province of British Columbia in upgrading permanent flood control facilities in those areas?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if such a request were made by the province we would certainly give it most serious consideration, as we have in other cases.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUTTING OF SEISMIC CABLE AND DAMAGE TO FISHING GEAR BY RUSSIAN VESSELS—REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET UNION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The crew of a Canadian survey ship, the J. E. Jonsson, reports that sophisticated underwater equipment it was hauling was cut after it was crossed over by a Russian fishing vessel off Sable Island, and on the same day the Canadian ship detected a submarine of unknown origin. My question is this: Since a Canadian Armed Forces aircraft was pressed into service to hunt for the $50,000 seismic cable, has the minister registered a complaint with the Russians over this matter? If so, what was the official response?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no. I have not yet registered a complaint and, indeed, I was unaware of the facts until the hon. gentleman drew them to my attention. I have been away for a few days and perhaps have not caught up with the news.

Mr. Crouse: As Canadian fishermen have complained many times that the Russians have damaged their fishing gear by cutting through it, would the minister request the Russian fishing fleet to pay greater attention to the rules of the road when fishing on Canada's continental shelf?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have made representations along those lines to several countries. I think the situation is better than it was and I hope it will continue to improve to an even greater extent.

DAMAGE TO FISHING GEAR BY RUSSIAN VESSELS—CONSIDERATION AT ICNAF CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as after the last series of incidents off the east coast involving Russian ships it was suggested by the Russians to our fisheries inspection people at the time that this matter should be taken up at the next meeting of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries may I ask the minister if Canada pursued this matter at the recently concluded ICNAF meeting in Washington and if any agreement was arrived at with the Soviet Union on rules of the road in fishing on the Grand Banks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire from the members of the delegation and answer that question when I have the information.

PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT GUERILLA SCHOOL—INQUIRY AS TO TRAINING OF CANADIANS OR CANADIAN RESIDENTS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the House whether or not there are any Canadians or Canadian residents who have been trained by the Palestinian Liberation Front at the guerilla school in Lebanon, the school where those persons responsible for the terrible tragedy at Tel Aviv airport were trained?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the answer to that question, and I do not know whether I will be able to get the information because I do not think those people publicize their activities.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister inquire of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and advise the House whether they have any knowledge of Canadians or Canadian residents who were trained in Lebanon in that school?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to give that undertaking because it may be that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will consider that it is not in the public interest nor in the interest of the security of Canada to reveal any information that they possess.

DRUGS

LE DAIN REPORT ON MARIJUANA—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When does he expect to make an announcement with respect to the report of the Le Dain Commission on marijuana?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot announce a specific time except to advise the hon. member that we are studying the report and rushing the matter as quickly as possible. I hope to be in a position soon to make recommendations to my colleagues in the government. However, I cannot say precisely when that will be.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Is the minister aware that every day's delay is instrumental in attracting more and more young people to attempt to use marijuana because of the semi-endorsement that was given by the Le Dain Commission when it suggested that use of marijuana be permitted by law and that there is great need to clear up the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member has made a representation. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS IN MAIL DELIVERY IN LIGHT OF PRIVATE SERVICE BETWEEN CALGARY AND EDMONTON

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General and arises from the setting up of the special mail service between Calgary and Edmonton by the province of Alberta with a resultant annual saving of $100,000 compared with the cost of the service formerly provided by the Post Office Department. When will the minister announce to the House the improvements in service that he referred to in his recent speech at Vancouver?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, following the press release put out by the government of Alberta regarding savings of up to $100,000 a year by using a courier service, we made inquiries and found that our postal service between Edmonton and Calgary is excellent. Assured mail delivery works at 98 per cent efficiency. We have four trucks that travel daily between the two cities. The facts are that the different Alberta government departments were hiring different couriers to transport their mail between the two cities. The government has now decided to reorganize and hire the services of only one courier. Therefore we will not lose any business. It is just a matter of reorganization within the Alberta government.

Mr. Dinsdale: Has the Postmaster General approached the province of Alberta offering improved service to the province between Calgary and Edmonton and, in particular, has he offered the restoration of the six days a week mail delivery service?

Mr. Coté (Longueuil): No, Mr. Speaker, but I know the service provided by the courier is only a four days a week service. Our officials have met with the Alberta government and it is true, it is a four days a week service they now have. My officials met with the Alberta government officials to determine ways in which the Post Office can help them meet their actual and future requirements. The Alberta officials have shown interest in the service we can offer them.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF EXTRADITION AGREEMENT ON AIRCRAFT HIJACKERS BETWEEN CANADA AND CUBA

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What progress is being made as far as extradition arrangements between Canada and Cuba are concerned relative to aircraft hijackers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are still under way. It had been our hope that they would be concluded shortly. I will have to find out just what their state is at the moment. I know that an official draft is in the course of negotiation between the two countries.

AGRICULTURE

CATTLE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LOSS OF ANIMALS IN TRANSIT LAST WINTER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that approximately 1,400 cattle died in transit on the railways from the western provinces to Ontario last fall, has the minister investigated the matter and has he anything to offer by way of a solution to what the cattle breeders describe as a national disgrace?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we looked into this some weeks ago, in fact, some months ago. It is true that last winter was an unusually difficult winter with regard to the incidence of certain diseases and climatic conditions. We hope we can find a basis on which the shippers, the transportation companies and, indeed, the government regulations can be reconciled to improve the situation in the coming year.

Mr. Noble: Will the minister take the necessary measures to avoid a repetition of these extensive losses of valuable livestock in the approaching shipping season?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we are now working on an urgent basis in that regard, but no one can guarantee that we will not have severe weather next winter or that there will not be another outbreak of some of the diseases.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ONE-CORRIDOR CONCEPT FOR HIGHWAY AND PIPELINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION—APPROVAL OF HIGHWAY ROUTE BY ENERGY BOARD FOR PIPELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Do the minister and the government still favour the concept of pipelines and highways through the north using one corridor and that authorizations relating to pipelines will be determined by the National Energy Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Naturally, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact the government has decided to proceed post-haste with the construction of a highway through the north, I wish to ask the minister whether the National Energy Board and, in fact, the government, have approved the route as suitable for a pipeline corridor?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the construction of highways, there is no need to ask the advice of the National Energy Board. The construction of highways in the north is the responsibility of my department, just as the choice of the corridor will be.

As for granting the permit for building the pipeline, the choice of the company or the group that will perform the work will be made by the National Energy Board.

With regard to the northern territories, they are the responsibility of my department.

POLLUTION

ACTION TO LIMIT CONTAMINATION RESULTING FROM SHIP COLLISION ON ST. CLAIR RIVER

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. What action is being taken by the Department of Transport to assist the United States Coastguard in limiting pollution of the St. Clair River and shoreline as a result of a collision between two ships early this morning?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department are already on the scene of that unfortunate accident to look into the various aspects of the matter. Having occurred in American waters, the accident as such will require an inquiry; there is also the matter of pollution. Those two aspects are now being studied by the people who are on the spot.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask a supplementary and the Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Cullen: Have officials of the United States Coastguard and/or the Department of Transport determined the extent of the threat posed by 40,000 plus gallons of bunker fuel carried by one of the ships?

Mr. Duquet: Mr. Speaker, I shall not be in a position to answer that question until we have received the reports of the investigators.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING POSSIBLE DAMAGE TO CANADIAN PROPERTY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of statements the minister has made in this House and elsewhere that he would hold the government of the United States responsible for the results of any oil spills in the transport of oil on the Pacific coast, has the minister received any report of a spill of oil from a tanker at Cherry Point, Washington, moving toward or into Canadian waters and, if so, has he taken this matter up with the appropriate authorities of the United States government?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have not heard this report. I will look into the matter and see whether we have a case to take up with the United States.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SASKATCHEWAN BILL RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF FARM LAND

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the unCanadian, if not unconstitutional, course of action being taken by the government of Saskatchewan under what is called the foreign ownership of land bill whereby Canadians outside the province of Saskatchewan are denied the right to inherit or own land in Saskatchewan. The government of that province is now receiving representations in this connection. Has the government of Canada communicated with the government of Saskatchewan and pointed out the danger of legislation that denies Canadians equality in the holding of land?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has not formally communicated its view to the government of Saskatchewan at this point in time, but I think the government of Saskatchewan knows this government's views.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether that government is composed of mindreaders. Instead of relying on them having that capacity, will the minister inform that government that this kind of legislation is a denial of Canadianism?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

• (1510)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am trying to get an answer to a very simple question, but the minister, who is usually vociferous in his answers, seems to be disregarding a situation which is causing deep unrest in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: I have to suggest to both the right hon. member for Prince Albert and the minister that the supplementary was rather in the form of a representation.

EXTENSION OF VISITOR'S STATUS OF HOWARD HUGHES FOR ONE YEAR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but since he is not here may I direct it to his vociferous parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact

Howard Hughes has been given a further ministerial stay, allowing him to extend his visit to Canada, and in view of the fact that a member of the Department of Immigration has personally looked after this procedure, would the parliamentary secretary advise the House, the country and the world whether "H.H." is alive and well?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am glad to rise and reassure the hon. member. On Friday last Mr. Howard Hughes was granted a one-year extension of his non-immigrant status. He is reported as being indisposed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question could very well have been placed on the order paper, or it might be considered at the time of adjournment.

Hon. Martin P. LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—RESPONSE TO REQUESTS FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since many local initiative projects are being stultified by lack of funds, can the hon. gentleman say what action the government intends to take in response to the many requests which have been made for the allocation of additional funds and the extension of the time within which projects can be completed?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member from Newfoundland that 11 extensions have been granted in his own province alone with a total value of $217,928. Can he also say whether alternative shipping facilities are available should the work stoppage be prolonged?

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF FUNCTIONS AND RESPONSIBILITIES TO DETERMINE IF BEING FULFILLED

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the widespread concern about reduced rail passenger services, escalating rail and truck freight rates and dissatisfaction with air carrier services, is the government considering a review of the responsibilities and powers of the Canadian Transport Commission to determine whether this body is performing the functions envisaged for it by Parliament when the National Transportation Act was passed?

Foreign Takeovers Review Act

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot point to any specific review being carried out at this time with the intent the hon. member has mentioned, but all governmental bodies and agencies are, of course, under constant survey by the government to make sure that they act within the terms of the relevant statutes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the time allotted to the question period. If there are supplementaries on this matter, so wide in its connotations, they could be put tomorrow. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Eric Kierans (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to say a few words in this debate on Bill C-201.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

I might start off on an informal note by relating an experience I had three weeks ago today at New York University when I was one of a group of 25 economists discussing the rising tide of nationalism throughout the world and the growing opposition to the activities and expansion of multinational corporations. I think we saw some of the results of this opposition in two countries just last week in the shape of expropriations and takeovers in Syria and Iraq. Included in the group were senior representatives of two of the largest multinational corporations, IBM and Standard Oil of New Jersey, neither of whom had found anything in our legislation to disturb them. They said we had adopted in Canada a very moderate and liberal policy which did, indeed, surprise them. But what surprised me most was that many economists there, Japanese, European, Latin American and Indian, did not really want to discuss the Canadian case. The Canadian case, to most of them, was not one which would provide them with indications of what they themselves could do by way of policy to prevent the growth of foreign investment on such a scale in their own countries. To them, the experience in Canada, where United States manufacturing and resource development activities have taken over to such an enormous extent, is, indeed, a horrible example, but what they were really concerned about finding was some hint of a policy which might prevent such a situation ever arising in their own countries. In other words, we are a special case.

I might say I agree with those who have expressed the view that the bill before us does nothing, really, to come to grips with the overwhelming problem which faces Canada. The reason for this, to a large extent, is that it attempts to provide solutions to a general, or national problem, by the taking of ad hoc decisions. In other words, each particular takeover is to be examined on its own merits, and if it is found to be in the general Canadian interest it will be approved, otherwise it will not be approved. But I submit to Your Honour that there is no takeover which could not, in a sense, be proven to be an advantage in particular situations. However, this is not where the problem lies. It matters not in whose riding this takes place. On examining a takeover, one looks at the reasons for the takeover. Let us say one finds on the side of the seller, or the Canadian, that he is a man who has grown old and tired, having developed his business. There is no continuity of management. He is responsible for an operation that employs 50 or 160 people, but his sons are not interested in entering the business. Therefore, he has to look around for management.

If it is not accepted that there should be this kind of takeover or sale of assets, then this whole enterprise is going to place in jeopardy the livelihood, the salaries and wages, of the existing employees of the firm. I do not think there is any member of this House who, if he were to act on behalf of such a buyer, could fail to prove that the buyer of such an enterprise could provide more research and development, as well as more capital, than existing entrepreneurs. By providing more employment and more products, he could prove that that particular takeover would be in the interests of that particular locality or region. As I say, that is not the problem that is facing Canada. Our problem is related to what I suppose could be called, not only in the discipline of economics but in other disciplines as well, the fallacy of composition. In other words, you cannot extend from the examination of a particular case a generalization to arrive at a general or national policy.

Let me give the House a simple example. A wheat farmer in the west could decide of his own accord to double the acreage he sows, in which case obviously he would reap tremendous advantages. On the other hand, if all wheat farmers in the west decided at the same time to double their acreage, the disadvantages, the catastrophes and the chaos could be monumental to the industry as a whole. This is what we face in this particular situation. It is not merely a given takeover that is at stake here, but rather the volume and amount of the takeovers that are taking place and indeed are a fact of life in this country that we call Canada.

Let me give the House another example. None of the problems that the United States has had with its balance of payments recently can be attributed to the developing nations. Indeed, the developing nations of this world have helped and saved the United States from having a very much worse balance of payments problem. In each of the last three years the United States drained from its operations in the developing nations in the world more than $4 billion a year. Approximately one-third of this $4 billion was accounted for in an export surplus that the United States had with the developing nations. The other two-thirds was the return on capital, royalty fees, research fees, management fees, and profits pulled out of the developing nations and back into the United States.

Again let me give an example. In the year 1971 United States oil companies invested in Libya $1.8 billion. The profits of those companies amounted approximately to $1.6 billion. What they withdrew was $1.5 billion.

In the over-all structure of relations between the United States and the developing countries, the following summary can be made. Their balance of payments improved initially on merchandise trade and current account by $4 billion. But obviously, the developing countries needed the money to pay for the deficit in their current account so there had to be a capital outflow. What was the composition of that capital outflow from the United States to the developing nations? The United States—and we are just as guilty of this sort of thing—declare that they want to help the developing nations of the world in their current accounts, and they pull out $4 billion. Then, these nations say that somehow this has to be equalized because they have to pay their bills. Therefore the United States replies that it will give them grants in aid totalling approximately half that amount, which is $2 billion. We all know that these grants in aid are tied. What is exported is really equipment and also technology, though technology that is suitable in the United States may not necessarily be suitable in each of the recipient underdeveloped nations. The other $2 billion, to equalize accounts from the point of view of the developing nations of the world, is an increasing outflow of private investment from the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this investment do? It can only do one thing: it searches out the ownership of, and title and proprietary rights to, even more resources than the United States already has in each developing country. As a result, the problem accelerates. We can all see that there is a political limit to this which will very shortly be reached in most countries and has already been reached in others—long ago in Cuba, and now in Chile, Peru and the Middle East. So I say that the problem for Canada is not that we should be worrying about a particular takeover, but rather the whole problem of the amount of takeovers and the amount of foreign investment that we have permitted in this country, indeed, that we have encouraged and are still encouraging.

The fallacy of composition is, perhaps, a simple error in logic. Sometimes it can be called sophistry and sometimes deception, though certainly there is no implication of deception here or intention to delude people. However, the problem cannot be solved on this basis. What it demands is an over-all attack on the entire problem of just what Canada's economic objectives are, and how we can best attain them. It is also an examination of the results of a continuation down this particular road and whether it is going to lead us, as indeed it already has to a very great extent, to the position where we can only pay our deficit on merchandise trade and capital account by selling off more and more of our own property. As I say, there is a limit, and in the case of Canada I am sure we will be smart enough to reverse this pattern, even though for most other countries it would already have been well past the point of return.

I ask, is there a policy that we can develop, an over-all policy rather than a policy directed to the examination of a particular merger or takeover between two particular firms? I say that there is such a policy, an over-all policy that demands the integration of all our policies. It demands the integration of our fiscal policy, our monetary policy, our commercial trade policy, our exchange rate policy. We should find this policy and seek the solution to reversing this kind of trend, though not without putting some burdens, stresses and strains on the economy.

I do not think anyone can rightfully claim that this bill comes even close to approaching the real problem. It comes close to discouraging new foreign investment, but it does not discourage new investment of its own accord. Any firm not presently in Canada can invest, which is what the United States wanted to be made quite clear. They said it was fine, that they would not have to buy anyone out, but that they could start up all the subsidiaries they wanted. In fact, the United States goes even further and, by giving all sorts of grants, encourages companies to enter Canada and provide further competition to a manufacturing industry that is already far too heavily concentrated.

With regard to existing investment in Canada, we have already taken other measures to permit expansion at a faster rate than hitherto. There is already more than sufficient foreign investment here in Canada for them in their own innerdynamic way to progress far more rapidly than the gross national product does. In other words, by the proportion by which they do expand more rapidly than the economy as a whole expands, they will acquire increasing control. Some of these measures have even been sanctified in the most recent budget in the granting of two-year writeoffs to firms. The firms who are getting the best of such a thing are the large firms.

In the population of firms in Canada we may say we control 50 per cent of manufacturing, but the 50 per cent we control are the small and medium-size firms. The 50 per cent controlled largely by foreign capital are part of the largest sector, and these are the firms that can invest $10 million or $20 million and can writeoff such expenditures from capital equipment rather than the profits they make on the Canadian consumer market. In other words, we are digging the pit deeper and nothing in this legislation is in any way going to reverse that.

What we have to come to grips with, and this was quite clear at New York University, is the fact that there are a great many people in this world, including those in Japan and the Common Market, and obviously in the United States, who are convinced that the only way in which a nation can obtain growth is by the use and encouragement of multi-national corporations. They recognize there is growing resentment around the world to activities of such giants. Who do they blame? They blame the people who feel insecure and disturbed because of this.

We hear from distinguished economists such as Charles P. Kindleberger of MIT who says:

> International firms stimulate the development of international policies. They leave less room for the independent, idiosyncratic, law-unto-itself national state.

That is what this House is all about.

Raymond Vernon, the distinguished Harvard professor, states:

> The basic asymmetry between multinational enterprises and national governments may be tolerable up to a point, but beyond that point there is a need to re-establish balance through accountability to a governing body multinational in scope.

This is what this bill talks about, multinational enterprise being a firm which operates in one country and wants to cross over into your country. Here we have a law for corporations that permits such institutions to live in perpetuity. No one of us here is immortal, and even this institution reviews itself, perhaps for the better, every four years. Every institution we can think of is accountable in some way to somebody except that institution called a corporation, and because a corporation has conquered time, the institution of corporation now wants to conquer space. It wants to be able to go anywhere. It is a kind of pantheism. When it tries to go forward it runs up against a resistance of bodies exactly of the kind we have here in this House today.

Let me get a little closer to the problem. George Ball, a name we know well, in an article referring to the importance of being stateless, that is an international corporation being stateless and subject to nobody, not even its own government, says:

> An international companies' act, as I see it, has intrinsic merits. It offers the best means I can think of to preserve the great potential of the world corporation for expanding.

What is he trying to say here? I suggest he is referring to an attempt to create a supranational authority, with a charter that would be granted by the United Nations, which would be above the activities of the different national assemblies across the world. This search for a supranational state is a logical development we are presently going through. This is an attempt to place what we could call a cosmocorp, whether it is a multi-flag, multi-branch, multiinternational or multinational authority, beyond the reach of politics, making it above politics, or making it apolitical.

I will admit that corporate planners may be able to do things better. There is no doubt that they have accumulated in their hands greater resources; capital, technology and even management skills, and they can apply this to given operations, but they cannot decide for a people how their nation's resources should be allocated. That is what a House like this is all about. It is politics that defines what the inhabitants of a state think are the problems that should be solved rather than the multinational corporations, no matter what their claims are to a superior technical nature.

I agree with a free flow of international capital. As an economist I agree with this just as I agree with free trade of goods and products. What is also being advocated today with the free flow of international capital is the idea of a free flow of ownership and property rights. This is a completely different thing.

The United States was built on a free flow of international capital, mainly from the United Kingdom, but there were no property rights involved. This capital was in the form of loans, debentures and bonds to enable the United States to get going, but the ownership, control and equity in the future growth of the United States remained in American hands. This is the kind of consideration we have to give to an over-all strategy in order to come to grips with the problems facing this country.

I have my grave doubts, too, about a great deal of the claims made for this sort of institution. The bulk of investment funds does not come from capital markets, it comes from the consumer; the dollar that you and I pay for whatever product we buy. Some 80 per cent of new capital expenditures are financed by profits retained out of that dollar bill. They are financed by depreciation allowances, accelerated investment allowances, double depreciation and depletion in the case of mineral resources. These are the things that enable corporations to accumulate the money they invest tomorrow.

The actual investment of these funds is determined not so much by what the consumer wants or what the consumer needs, it is determined more with an accent on the growth that the corporation direction wants or for which it is searching. These are the funds that count. It is not the salaries and wages corporations pay in a certain locality or riding that are important. They are important in a limited way, and deadly important to the people who are employed, but the people who are so employed could also be employed by a wise and expansionary government policy doing things that are perhaps more satisfactory to the consumer. The money that is paid the employee is not nearly as important as the money that is retained. These are charges against the dollar for distribution, for royalty fees, for management fees and for research and development, all paid for by the consumer. The profits are made and used to reinvest for research and development, technology, plants and equipment for tomorrow. If you cede this for the whole future direction you give up not only ownership rights to your economy today, you give up ownership rights and the right to direct your economy for all time.

There is undeniably a tremendous hostility because of the very magnitude of the problem. It will accelerate during the next three, four or five years because at the present time what is worrying the multinational corporations of the world and the three big trading blocs is that an overwhelming proportion of these are owned and controlled in the United States. The Japanese have the funds and the will to acquire their share. They will go searching out. The Europeans will need their share. In this flow of buying out the resources and markets of the world, there will inevitably be a counter reaction of tremendous hostility and resentment. I only hope that when this resentment comes we will have the grace to say it was our fault, mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa, and that when finally it becomes a political realization we will say it is something we ourselves should have and could have foreseen and can hardly blame the dependent nations for engaging in it.

I do not want to go any further into the operations of the multinational corporations. I suspect greatly that the claims that are made about the benefits of their technology to countries such as Canada are exaggerated and that if we had a positive economic policy of our own we could easily equal the so-called advantages and expand well beyond them because it is not technical efficiency which counts. It is the relationship of the efficiency to the supply and factors of production of the economy of a country such as Canada. If we rely on the promises of technology we must remember that our problems are much more. The promises of technology really demand tremendous capital and capital is not in surplus in Canada. Normally when you make an economic decision you make it to use to the utmost the factors that are in surplus, as in our case labour and employment, and to husband your resources in the area of capital. You can have a perfectly rational technology and efficiency which on purely technical grounds seems to be superior. If it employs more of the factor that is absent in the economy and less of the factor that is plentiful in the economy then it is not a rational economic decision.

They sell production techniques, but these techniques which they export to Canada and across the world are the production techniques they developed for their own domestic market. That they could be equally suitable to countries all over the world is somewhat doubtful. There is no reason to believe they are. In fact, the introduction of technologies that are superior to the state of the art in many countries creates great strains and stresses which have a distinct impact on the social, cultural and political fabric of each of these countries. As I have suggested we need an over-all attack on the problem. Because the problem is so serious, and so large a part of the population of this country is aware of it and has as they say a gut feeling that something is wrong, I think we need the co-operation perhaps of all parties in developing it. I must simply say that I do not expect that kind of policy to come from what we euphemistically call an establishment here in Canada. I do not expect it. I do not blame the cabinet for this kind of a bill. It is the kind of bill which could be promoted only by the people who are here in the civil service.

You know, Galbraith yesterday talked about the structure in the United States and the symbiosis, as he said, of bureaucrats and the great corporations and the social establishment. Symbiosis I suspect is a good word for shacking up or living together. We have the same situation here. It is understandable. You do not find many deputy ministers talking individually with farmers or small businessmen who have gone bankrupt, had tax problems and perhaps had something to say about the kind of policies which led to this. Or you do not find them talking to small entrepreneurs who are successful. The conjunction here, the meeting of the minds here in Ottawa, is between the bureaucrats in the large corporations and in our very large federal departments. It is understandable. They belong to the same jet set. I do not mean the watering holes of the world but rather the same international conferences in the Genevas, the Tokyos, the Parises or the Washingtons. They meet on the same plane and attend these same conferences and meetings.

As I say, they do not see any representative of the real guts or the vast majority of the people who make this economy go. The president and the vice-president of a corporation and a deputy minister have roughly the same standards of living and the same salaries. They have roughly the same size of organization and the same number of employees. They have a billion dollar budget in each case and perhaps more in some cases, but the relationships and comparisons are reasonably of the same order. They have the same motivation. Their 22,000 employees they would like to see grow to 25,000 tomorrow. That would be a significant indication of their importance. Applied to the private sector they are judged now not by the old classic definition of how well they can handle the assets entrusted to them or the profits made but more on the growth of their assets and the growth of the number of employees. This largely applies to departments. They have the same kind of motivation. They also have the same kind of utter confidence in themselves that they know what is good for people. So you find them not really considering the problems of small business or service industries today but how can they goose the economy with some physical leap forward into technology.

Technology for what? To produce things people do not want. It may be the moon, supersonic aircraft or technology to provide services the people do not want. They have the same priorities for destroyers, CF-5's or hydrofoils. Now, the current one going on is that somehow there is a technology of STOL aircraft which might place Canada in the forefront. The large corporations and bureaucrats get their heads together and talk about sums of $200 million to invest in this project. I do not know why people want to go from Montreal to Ottawa in 48 minutes instead of two hours. I do not see how many people, less than one per cent of the population, would ever take advantage of such a service. However, I can see how the people of Canada would pay out $200 million to provide such things as more clothes, better houses, transportation, food, and the things we need in so many areas of our population.

But I think the greatest bond of sympathy that I can find between the two groups, a bond of sympathy that does not and cannot exist between the average Canadian entrepreneur or farmer and a civil servant, is that they are not operating with their own money. The ordinary farmer and the middle sized manufacturer is operating with his own money, and right off the bat there is a distinction between him and the civil servant. But there is no distinction between the civil servant at the highest level and the bureaucrat of a large corporation; neither of them is making these decisions for our benefit and neither of them is handling his own money. The vice president of a multinational corporation or his board of directors are not operating with their own funds; they are operating with the funds of the shareholders about whom they could not care less because what they are maximizing is their own expansion, growth, prestige and status, and all that they want to do is to give as little to the people who actually own the company as they possibly can to keep them satisfied. Nor is the civil servant operating with his own money. He is operating with the taxpayers' money. So all of his dreams and visions will not cost him a nickel. There is lots more where that came from.

This kind of bill came out of that kind of environment. It did not come from the cabinet or from the members of the caucus who have a political sensitivity to the problem as it actually is and to the depth, width and breadth of the solutions that are actually needed.

I am sorry to say that I would vote for the bill because it is a small step forward, and something is better than nothing, but I will vote for it on that basis only. But after a long period of gestation, far more than the normal nine months, I would like to say that if this is all that the government can bring forward as a response to the kind of problems and to the depth of the problems that foreign ownership represents for the Canadian people, the government would have been better off not to have brought it forward at all.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans). Just before I came into the House the usual conversation took place behind the curtains when some government members, in an attempt to find out how long the debate was likely to last, asked me, "How many speakers do you have?" I said that we had three speakers, four if you count Eric Kierans. I am delighted with the position that the hon. member for Duvernay has taken because in some ways he reflects what has happened to a lot of us. I can remember the time when the hon. member for Duvernay was less concerned about the flow of foreign currency, and in some cases took very strong exception to extreme nationalist tendencies. This has also been the case so far as I am concerned on a number of matters.

We are being pressured at the moment to get this bill through the House. The government obviously wants it as some kind of a showpiece. Why they would think it a showpiece is beyond me, but they seem to feel that it is of some benefit to them to get this measure through. I presume that in their view it is of some benefit to the country to get the bill through. There is some suggestion that the Finance Committee deal with this bill rapidly and bring it back to the House in time to have it passed by the end of June. I think it would be a terrible mistake to rush this bill through the committee and through the House, since it is of so little value. By getting the bill through we may be doing ourselves a terrible disservice in the sense that we will be undercutting the kind of sentiment which exists in Canada to really do something significant about the matter of foreign ownership.

A number of Liberal party supporters are obviously feeling embarrassed about the position in which they find themselves. I am thinking, for instance, of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) and the Liberal members who signed the telegram of the Committee for an Independent Canada. They obviously do not see much value in this bill, yet at the same time they are saying it is better than nothing. Even if it is only a small step forward, they feel the bill should go through. I would like to suggest to you that it is not better than nothing, it is worse than nothing simply because it is an attempt to diffuse this whole issue of foreign ownership in Canada with a bill that will not accomplish anything at all.

If we are going to deal only with the question of takeovers, we must ask ourselves what the urgency is. First of all, there is not a great deal left to take over if we start from that premise, and second, since the takeover aspect represents a relatively small proportion of the increases in foreign ownership year by year, I do not see that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which is going to have the responsibility for screening the foreign takeovers, will turn anyone down in view of the criteria which have been established. I doubt whether any takeover of any industry in Canada could not be made to fit inside the boundaries of those criteria. In fact, if this bill were legislation today, there would be very little difference in the rate of takeovers that would occur in Canada.

So what is the urgency in passing this bill? If we take a look at the key sectors, we find that most of them, such as newspapers, television, banks, transportation, uranium, power and pipelines are now controlled. There can be no takeovers in these areas without the government's approval. On occasions, when there was an uproar and sufficient concern in the country, the government has stepped in without legislation. They did this in the case of Home Oil, in the case of uranium, in the case of Denison, and in the case of the Mercantile Bank. There was no legislation for the government to use. Where was their authority? Apparently they must have had some authority, unless they were acting illegally, because they moved in and definitely stopped foreign takeovers.

The truth of the matter is that the government now possesses all the power that is required to prevent takeovers in Canada if they chose to exercise that power, but in most cases they simply do not choose to exercise it. What we are being asked to do is take the government off the hook and establish criteria which are so wide that virtually any takeover can be accommodated within the criteria. Then, the government can say that the government has passed legislation and everybody fits the criteria. This reminds me of their good behaviour pamphlet which they sent around to foreign owners of industry, telling them that they should be good boys. I have heard minister after minister rise and say that there was nothing to worry about because they had all agreed to the good behaviour guidelines that we laid down. Of course, this good behaviour did the government a lot of good. These companies applied for DISC and did not even bother to tell the government what they were doing. I suspect that this takeover legislation will serve as nothing more than camouflage to get the government off the hook about doing something about foreign ownership. Frankly, I would prefer to have no legislation at all, rather than this timid, insipid legislation that will do no good. I would prefer to keep the government on the hook, to keep them under pressure and to keep them responsive to the Canadian people. A great deal more would be accomplished in this way.

Everyone faces a dilemma with regard to the foreign ownership issue. People in my party face a dilemma. I do not suggest for a moment that there is total agreement within my party as to how we should proceed and how far we should proceed. There are differences. But there is one thing on which my party is united. There are no more facetious comments, as there have been in the past from the other side of the House, about the waffle movement and about what we are doing with regard to this. There is one thing on which we are all united. All of us are determined that this country is going to remain independent. While we may not all agree on the exact techniques to accomplish these things—that is an on-going debate—in this party, unlike the other parties, there is an absolute determination to do something about foreign ownership and Canadian independence. I cannot say that about the Liberal and Conservative parties.

There is a kind of tragic dilemma that faces many Liberals. I am sure that all of us in this House come to know each other, regardless of the parties to which we belong, and we develop a fair amount of respect for each other despite our political differences. Mr. Speaker, it is tragic to see what is happening to the good Liberals, to those who want to be Canadian nationalists. They want to stay inside the Liberal party. They think that by staying in the party they can exert pressure from within, that they can change the party's course on foreign ownership and strike a blow for Canadian nationalists. But the fact is that all those well intentioned Liberals have failed.

I do not want to talk about my friends in the Conservative party. When it comes to the question of foreign ownership the differences in that party are so deep that nothing seems to emerge upon which we can comment.

Mr. Dinsdale: Worry about your own differences.

Mr. Saltsman: I have explained our differences, and I have been frank about them. You should be frank about your differences in the Conservative party.

Here I can think of my friends in the Committee for an Independent Canada, who sent a telegram to all of us asking us to support a position on Canadian independence, and to take a strong position on foreign ownership. I think of their desperate attempts to justify their political affiliations, at least those who are not in the New Democratic Party, and to reconcile them with their sense of Canadian independence and their concern about the future. I think of candidates like Mel Hurtig and other fine people, trying to walk the line, saying, "We can do it within the Liberal party." The question is: can they? I don't think they can. Here I also think of newspapers like the Toronto Star. No one can say the Toronto Star has not fought as hard as a newspaper can for Canadian independence. But still it supports the Liberal party. When it comes to a question of the fortunes of the Liberal party they forget about Canadian nationalists. Other issues become more important to them. All of their prestige, and all of the words of the best editorial writers they can command then say, "It's again time to vote Liberal."

I can also think of my friend, Eddie Goodman, the former chairman of the Conservative party, trying to do the same thing within the framework of the Committee for an Independent Canada. These are people whose loyalty to their parties is so great—I am not critical of them for that because my loyalty to my party is deep—that it poses a dilemma for them. How do you reconcile your desire for Canadian independence with on-going loyalty to your own party? These people are still waiting for change to be made from within. Apparently all the people I have mentioned have indicated that they are not prepared to change their political affiliations. They have said that they are going to work from within their parties. But can they bring about this change? Can they, in fact, accomplish this? I do not think they can.

The reason is that the Liberals, for one, are immobilized by their own outdated ideology of free enterprise. They will not intervene in the economy. If they will not intervene in the economy, then the cause of Canadian independence is hopeless.

I was quite interested in the references that the hon. member for Duvernay made to the other measures that are necessary—how it is necessary to relate fiscal and monetary policies, and how it is necessary to have some kind of an industrial strategy if we are going to deal with foreign ownership. I concur in those statements because while foreign ownership is a problem it is not the only problem in the management of the economy. Unless the whole problem of foreign ownership is put in the context of what we as a nation desire, what social purposes we have, what kind of society we want to be, what our objectives are, how we are going to relate to all industry and not just to foreign industry, what sort of things we are going to emphasize and concentrate on, and how we will relate our monetary and fiscal policies to these objectives, then we cannot deal with foreign ownership.

We cannot bring in related legislation on takeovers. To what are you going to relate it? Will you bring in legislation limiting the ownership? How does that tie in with your plans? Which industry do you say is not desirable, and which is? How does it tie in with your plans? When you have no plans you have no datum. You cannot make decisions of this type. This is one of the reasons I and many other people continue to support my party. We at least realize that without some degree of planning in our society we cannot do anything about foreign ownership. This is the critical point about the entire debate on the foreign ownership issue. Unless the nationalists are prepared to take this position, then their nationalism will go down the drain. They will not succeed. This is the dilemma.

The Liberal does not want to take this position very often. He believes in the market economy. He believes in keeping his hands off things. He wants them to run their normal course without government interference. He does not want to take the hard measures that are necessary. These will be difficult measures to take. Those in charge will have to speak with the provinces. Many differences must be reconciled. Planning is not an easy matter. This is not the kind of planning you impose on people from the top down. That kind of planning is neither acceptable nor workable. You must sit down and discuss these matters with all the people involved.

There are some provinces that do not feel the same way about foreign ownership, that think the more foreign ownership they can attract the better it will be. Can you blame a province with a relatively low level of industrial development for saying, "Look, we are not concerned about the ownership. We know it has certain effects on the national economy, but 20 per cent of our people are unemployed. Anyone who wants to come in here and put up a factory is welcome." This is a serious problem, but it is not an insoluble one if you are prepared to do some planning about your economy, and if you can say, "There are ways we can help."

There is another difficulty, Mr. Speaker. Very often questionnaires are sent out ask people if they are upset about foreign ownership. Almost invariably something like 80 per cent to 90 per cent reply that we have too much foreign ownership and that we must do something about it. But when you ask the critical question, "Are you willing to pay a price to do away with foreign ownership"? the percentage drops enormously. If the question is coupled with some antagonism toward the United States, then the percentage goes way down. That is a characteristic mark of this country. If we are going to take action along these lines, then it is the responsibility of the national government to persuade the people of Canada that we can do something about foreign ownership without being enemies of the United States, and without any substantial reduction in our standard of living, or in providing employment. In fact, quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker, because by taking action in some areas of foreign ownership we can increase the prosperity of Canada. I will come to that argument a little later on.

We have been brainwashed by the myth of the superiority of the international corporation. The American businessman has been told this over and over again by people in the highest places. No less a person than a former prime minister of Canada, bolstered by all the business leaders, high civil servants, and the cabinet ministers who listen to them, has been taken in by this myth. The public have been brainwashed into believing that there is some superior business technology that we would lose if we took action against foreign ownership. I do not think that is really true. Foreign ownership of enterprises in Canada makes us poorer, rather than richer. I was interested to read the remarks of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) as recorded in part at page 2654 of Hansard for May 29. He said:

There is much evidence to show that whether or not enterprises have been owned in Canada is irrelevant to their performance in the interests of Canada.

His authorities were Professor Safarian and Professor Watkins. I know the hon. member and know him to be very careful when quoting. Yet, he was not very careful in his research. I think both Professors Safarian and Watkins dealt with aspects of performance of American as against Canadian companies. I do not think they dealt with the efficiency of corporations. Researches I have asked the Library of Parliament staff to undertake establish clearly, I think, the inefficiency of foreign controlled manufacturing industries which have set up in Canada, as compared with the efficiency of companies, private or public, that have remained Canadian. The preliminary evidence, I do not say it is conclusive, tends to rebut the claim, heard often, that ownership makes no difference to performance or that American-owned companies are superior to Canadian. The most efficient manufacturing companies in Canada, by and large, are those which have remained under Canadian ownership, and the most inefficient are those which come under foreign control and are broken up into branch plant operations. This is not because the Canadian entrepreneur is more talented at organizing than his American counterpart; this has come about because the pattern of foreign ownership in Canada has proven ineffective and inefficient and is not suited to the Canadian market. American companies have tried to create in this country a replica of the United States market, a market almost 11 times our size. If you make a suit that is 11 sizes too big for a man, you can hardly expect him to look good in it or walk well in it. Many sectors of the Canadian economy are poorer, as a result of being foreign owned, than they otherwise might be. I will not deal with the outflow of funds. That question was excellently dealt with by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans).

Having said all these things about foreign ownership, I return to my earlier theme. We need to consider the whole business of ownership in some kind of national, planned context. I am not in favour of the outright prohibition of foreign ownership; nor am I necessarily in favour of licensing arrangements, which are more and more entered into. Sometimes a foreign corporation, instead of establishing a branch plant in Canada, will licence a Canadian manufacturer to produce a commodity in this country. I have seen some licensing agreements; some are worse for this country than the presence of the foreign corporation. For instance, they sometimes insist that the product shall be sold only in the Canadian market, at a price considerably higher than that charged in other countries. In many ways such agreements limit Canadian manufacturers and impose conditions which are little short of slavery. What is worse, since the conditions are invisible, the people of the country are unaware of the difficulties that may be created by such licensing arrangements. Perhaps some licensing is good. Really, I am suggesting that our difficulty is not with foreign ownership alone.

If we pass this legislation and attempt to prohibit takeovers, how can we deal with a company that says, "If you will not let me take over a corporation, I will start a new company." Nothing prevents the setting up of a new corporation. What will happen if the new corporation is to do business in an already overcrowded field? What would happen, for instance, if a tire manufacturer were to establish himself in this way? At present, virtually every United States tire manufacturer operates in this country, as well as one from France. The tire manufacturing field is already overcrowded. Permitting industries to be established in an already overcrowded field and thereby permitting an even greater fragmentation of such industries would work a disservice to the Canadian economy. It would not be a benefit.

Also, a company could say, "Fine; although we are not allowed to take over a company, we will set up in competition to it and drive it out of business." That company may have a thousand times the assets of its competitor; it could lower the price of a commodity and drive its competitor out of business. Actually, big, foreign corporations have available so many options that the takeover route is sometimes the kindest of all and may be preferred to driving another company out of business. How will the government decide, when faced with such situations, if foreign corporations are or are not to be allowed to operate in this country? I do not think the government will be able to decide in these matters. I think it will rubberstamp every request for a takeover that comes before it.

In opening the debate for my party, my leader made an interesting suggestion that has been made by others. He suggested that we ought to use the money in our foreign exchange reserve fund to buy back some Canadian companies. This would accomplish a number of things. There is approximately $5 billion in the fund. It is a source of embarrassment to us. If we took that $5 billion and went to the New York Stock Exchange, say, and began buying shares in some American corporations or repatriating foreign obligations, we should obtain a number of benefits. First, we would rid ourselves of that embarrassing fund of money that is not doing us any good. I am, of course, talking about our foreign exchange reserves. If we were to participate in this kind of "buy back", we should lower the value of the Canadian dollar and stimulate manufacturing in this country. Of course, no doubt some hon. members think that this is such an unusual scheme that it has not been tried. Well, let me say Japan is carrying on a somewhat similar policy. Japan is in a position similar to Canada's, in that Japanese currency is appreciating rapidly. This has resulted in unemployment and in pressures being exerted in that society. That country also has some foreign debt. It is taking money that has been built up in its foreign exchange reserves and is repatriating that foreign debt. I think we can do much the same. Let us use imagination and exercise courage.

It is important to plan because, today, ownership is not as important as it once was—at least, it is not all that important. Whether companies are foreign-owned, domestically owned, publicly owned or privately owned, power in a democratic country, as people become more involved in the political process and understand better what is happening in politics, rests more with the people. It is the government of Canada, by and large, that possesses overwhelming power, not General Motors. We have recently witnessed confrontation between the public power and private power. We must not be confused merely because the government has backed down. Sometimes, it chooses to back down. When the government does not choose to back down in a confrontation with the private sector, the government, exercising the power of the people through representatives elected to Parliament, wins. We have seen this often. More important than legislation such as we are now discussing is the willingness of the government to act when the clear necessity arises to act within the context of an over-all plan.

Some foreign ownership, I think, may be advantageous for us. I think of some areas in which foreign ownership is helpful. To the extent that it is helpful for this nation, I say, why should it not be permitted here. On the other hand, much foreign ownership is not of advantage to Canada. You know, the old idea "The more foreign ownership, the better" has caused us lots of trouble. We can no longer make that assumption. What we have to do from here on is ask foreign ownership to make its case because a case has not been made with the philosophy of the more foreign ownership the better. This is creating a lot of difficulties for this country.

We should be prepared to look at foreign ownership, but first it has to make its case, not just on a takeover because that does not relate to anything. It has to make its case in terms of its expansion from the use of internal funds and with regard to whether it is going to open a new factory. We have never before asked that that be done. We have not created a framework whereby we can judge the case it is trying to make or created a mechanism whereby we can tell what benefit to Canada their operations will be.

We all know that no country is completely free. As much as I would like to see it completely free, with no strings attached, just as I as an individual would like to be completely free with no strings attached, there is not this kind of complete freedom for anyone or any country. We want a world where we are interrelated, have some concern for each other and want to help each other. There is going to be some interdependence. The crucial question is not whether we are totally free, but the extent to which in this kind of interlocking world we can preserve the maximum freedom to pursue our own objectives. That is becoming more and more difficult with the high degree of foreign ownership in this country.

This government does not seem to have the foggiest notion about how to proceed with the problem of foreign ownership. On one hand, they bring in this legislation which states that any company with assets in excess of $250,000 under takeover threat is going to be examined. How do you determine that? There are many ways this can be hidden from the government if a company so chooses. The corporations Act does not call for the disclosure at the $250,000 level. It must be in the millions before disclosure is required. The Canada Development Corporation cannot step in and take such action. It cannot purchase anything unless the assets are in excess of $1 million.

We had the Unemployment Assistance Act. When the government of the United States imposed a 10 per cent surtax, instead of taking other action that was open to it, this government, in a panic, said "Don't worry about it. If you lose any benefit, we will give you a benefit. We will up the ante." With the reduction of the corporate tax to 40 per cent, this has now been put into permanent legislation. That was an attempt to outbribe the Americans under the DISC program. I do not think we can operate in this way. There is no indication whether or not we want all these companies, whether they are worth bribing or of what value they are to us. It has come to the point where the government is making such substantial bribes that we wonder whether the whole thing is worth it. We do the same under DREE. There is increasing evidence that these companies would have located without the bribes.

There is no real science policy. I notice that the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) is in the chamber. I have been looking to him for great things. To date, all I have been getting has been nice speeches crossing my desk, but no science policy. We were hopeful that once a member of the cabinet was designated to be responsible for science, we would hear something. If something is going on, we are not hearing about it. I suspect there is still no policy and that we are still passing out money in the vain hope that perhaps some of it will do some good.

The government is either walking or running around, depending on their energy on any given day, in a grand flap. They do not seem to know where they are going or what they are doing. The air force used to call it "situation snafu". That means it is all "fuddleduddled". I remember what "snafu" means.

Mr. McCleave: Fouled up is what you mean.

Mr. Saltsman: They are more careful of their language in the air force than in the House of Commons, which is saying something.

Mr. Dinsdale: The gentlemen of the air force.

Mr. Saltsman: It is for many of these reasons that I feel the legislation is unsatisfactory and should not be passed. Therefore, I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton):

That Bill C-201 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the introduction of a measure providing for an independent review body answerable to Parliament with power to limit and control new foreign investment in Canada and the expansion of foreign-owned corporations already established in this country, as well as the take-over of existing Canadian corporations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like assistance on the procedural acceptability of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). Hon. members may argue that it is declaratory of a principle in opposition to the principle of the bill but even if that is the case, and I do not admit it to be at this point, it does seem to me that the proposed amendment goes considerably beyond the scope of the bill which we are now considering. It deals with the expansion, for example, of foreign-owned corporations already established in this country. I cite that only as an example that comes to mind from taking a quick look at the proposed amendment. I would be very pleased to have the assistance of hon. members.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, as might befit the occasion, the amendment is an ingenious attempt at orderliness, but I submit that it is procedurally unacceptable for two or three reasons. First, if the amendment is accepted, it would raise a most obvious difficulty in that it proposes the establishment of an independent review body which is answerable to Parliament. This body would have the power to limit and control, not only the subject matter that is envisaged in the bill, but a wide range of subject matters.

I think it is accepted as a matter of course that if such a body is to have any function and power, it would have to be supported by a staff and secretariat in order to be competent and operate as would be envisaged by the motion. The body would have to be staffed by talented, capable economists and experienced persons who would command a substantial salary and require staff to support them. Obviously, there would be a considerable expense to the public treasury which is not envisaged in the recommendation from his Excellency. It cannot be seriously argued that if such a body were set up it would not create, or require, that sort of expenditure; the hon. member would not suggest that it would act on a voluntary basis and that its support staff would do the same. So, there is a fundamental difficulty.

In addition, I would submit two further considerations. First, the question immediately arises whether the amendment is really opposed to the principle of the bill, as an amendment on second reading must be. I am sure the hon. member and his colleagues do, in fact, accept the principle that control should be exercised over takeovers by foreign investors of undertakings in Canada. So what they are really saying is that they agree with the basic principle of the bill calling for control, but require, or suggest, that control be exercised by a different body in a different way and that it be exercised over a wider range of transactions than presently contemplated. In short, they are saying that the principle of the bill is acceptable but that its provisions do not go far enough.

The precedents are so clear as to scarcely need citation. In this situation, amendments of the kind the hon. member has in mind are not in order, for the obvious reason that if the principle of a bill is accepted, specific proposals can be examined in detail during the clause by clause study in committee at which time amendments can be put forward. In addition, amendments of this sort can be introduced at the report stage to flesh out the skeleton of ideas now before us—amendments to clauses or the addition of further clauses to the bill to accomplish the objective the hon. member wishes to pursue. In other words, an attempt is being made here to propose amendments to the bill by the device, not of moving such amendments now, which would be clearly out of order, but by seeking to amend the motion for second reading and thus having the government consider the introduction of a totally different kind of measure. The device of referring this back to the government is, therefore, a means of getting around difficulties which would arise in making specific amendments to the bill itself; it is an attempt to do indirectly what cannot be done directly.

I submit, therefore, that the proposed amendment is clearly out of order. It is obviously irregular to go into the merits of the provisions of a bill at this stage, yet this is what the amendment would envisage. A third difficulty is that it goes totally beyond the scope of the bill itself. It goes beyond the scope of the recommendation, as I have said. For all these reasons, I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say, first of all, that some of the arguments used by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council may have merit. There is one he used, however, which can surely be disposed of quickly. In his opening remarks, he suggested that the amendment would involve the expenditure of money and was out of order on that ground. I would draw to his attention, and to yours, Mr. Speaker, that the whole of the amendment is governed by the phrase "in the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the introduction of a measure—". It is an understanding as old as this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, that when a member asks the government to give consideration to something, it is not an instruction. Therefore, acceptance by the Chair of this amendment, or its passing, would not be an instruction calling for the expenditure of money; it would only be an expression of opinion that consideration be given to the proposal set out in the resolution. I put it to you, therefore, that the argument that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend is one involving the expenditure of money does not carry any weight at all.

The parliamentary secretary had a good deal to say about the fact that because the amendment suggests things which go beyond the present bill it should not be put forward now. He invited us to wait until we get into committee, or to the report stage, or to third reading. I suggest to him, since he is fast becoming No. 1 or No. 2 in the procedural efforts from that side of the House, that if we sought to do these things at the committee stage or the report stage he would be the first to get up and say we could not do them because they went beyond the provisions of the bill.

I have dealt with these matters first because I do not believe them to be serious, as is the basic point which arises with increasing frequency as we try to move reasoned amendments. Although there are a hundred years of precedents in this area, it strikes me we have developed some restrictive jurisprudence in the last few years. For example, it now seems to be established by the Chair that the mover of a reasoned amendment must not only be in direct opposition to the bill, but that he must be opposed to the principle of that bill. If that is his position, the mover of such an amendment is then entitled under the terms of Citation 382 of Beauchesne, Fourth Edition, to move an amendment setting out the reasons he is opposed to the principle of the bill and suggesting other ways of dealing with the matter. My hon. friend, the member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) has made it clear that he is opposed to this bill. He even went so far as to say that it is not a case of its being better than nothing—it is worse than nothing.

However, I am prepared to admit to Your Honour that you sometimes say it is not enough for us to express opposition to the bill; we must be opposed to its principle. Well, one of the things which is sometimes a little difficult to sort out is the principle of a bill. What is the principle of the bill before us? One might easily say that it does not have any, but that is hardly a procedural point. The principle of this bill is the provision of an arrangement under which a Minister of the Crown may review takeovers of Canadian companies already established in Canada. That is all it does. We are opposed to that principle. We think that in its place Parliament has the right to ask the government to bring in a bill to provide for foreign investment, foreign takeovers, and the extension of foreign ownership or foreign influence in Canada, to be reviewed by an independent body—not just by a minister—that is answerable to Parliament.

It is because we think that that alternative, while it is in the field of foreign investment and foreign ownership, is so distinctly opposed to the principle of this bill that we contend it is the type of reasoned amendment that Your Honour ought to consider very seriously, even in the light of the dicta that have been laid down by the Chair in recent weeks. There is no question about our stand on the bill. We think it is worthless and we intend to vote against it. We think that, in principle, it is wrong to handle this matter by putting this namby-pamby power in the hands of a minister. We think it is wrong in principle to confine activities under legislation of this kind to one area only.

Having stated our opposition to the principle of the bill and to what it tries to do, we have proposed, as we think is our right under citation 382, an alternative; and our motion asks the House to call upon the government to give consideration to that alternative. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because this is an alternative and is presented by members who want to see this bill proceed no further; we contend that the amendment meets the terms of a reasoned amendment and should be put to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there are no other members who would like to assist the Chair on the procedural argument, I should like to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for their assistance on the question whether or not this is a reasoned amendment which the Chair should accept as such. When the amendment was proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) I indicated that I had some doubt whether it was in fact a reasoned amendment as defined by the authorities which bind the Chair. Despite the very lucid and helpful arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I must tell the House that he has been unable to convince me that this amendment does meet the tests required to make a reasoned amendment acceptable to the Chair.

I think there is no disagreement on the authorities; the parliamentary secretary dealt fully with them. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated—and I agree with this—that a reasoned amendment must be declaratory of a proposition that opposes the principle of the bill before the House for second reading. This, of course, is very well established in May, in Beauchesne and in the precedents which the Chair must follow.

I should like to deal with this matter firstly on the basis of whether or not the proposed amendment is in opposition to the principle of the bill. With respect, I do not find that it is. The title of the bill is "An act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons". I think I would fairly describe the proposed amendment and the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if I were to say that he is proposing another way, an enlarged or different way, in which to achieve the same objective and also to do other things. If this is the case—and I believe it is—I do not think he is opposing the principle of the bill but is suggesting another way in which the objective of the bill might be obtained. On that basis, I would have to say that I cannot accept the proposed amendment.

The parliamentary secretary raised two more points. I agree with his first point that the proposed amendment does seem to go beyond the scope of the bill. It not only suggests an alternate way of dealing with the matter with which the bill attempts to deal; it also suggests that the independent review body would deal with other matters as well. I mentioned before the expansion of foreign owned corporations already existing in this country which is referred to in the proposed amendment. It would seem to me that that provision goes beyond the scope of the bill before the House.

If I may deal with the third point for the record, it was argued by the parliamentary secretary that this proposition would involve the expenditure of funds. I would agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this point. The amendment is merely asking the government to give consideration to such expenditure, and that is all. However, that is not the point on which my decision turns and I refer to it only because both hon. members who argued the case referred to it.

For the two reasons I have mentioned, I very much regret that I cannot accept the proposed amendment as a reasoned amendment that comes within the rules.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in this debate on foreign ownership I should like to put forward some ideas of my own on the problems involved in this issue. It seems to me that one of the most important facets of foreign ownership and control of the Canadian economy is to have some clear idea of what the different types of foreign investment are and their effect on the Canadian economy. Government statistics indicate that Canada's liabilities to foreigners as at the end of 1970 amounted to a little over $49 billion. However, only half of that sum was foreign investment in companies controlled by non-residents, including overseas owners as well as those in the United States. The rest consisted of financial investments by non-residents in stocks of Canadian companies, bond issues of Canadian governments and corporations, and short-term investments. Certainly this part of foreign investment in Canada does not represent ownership and control in any sense.

I should like to look at some aspects of this particular half or portion of foreign investment. The present NDP government of Manitoba has been a large borrower in the United States market since it came to power. Its premier, Mr. Schreyer, had only been in office a couple of weeks when he found it necessary to go to New York to arrange a loan. Just this week German financial interests made a loan to the government of Manitoba, which presumably was just a roll-over. This is an indication that the province of Manitoba needs foreign money to carry on its business affairs.

This morning the Montreal Gazette reported that the New York market had raised a loan of $150 million for the government of Quebec. This loan was defended by the premier of that province as being necessary and useful to the province. The James Bay project, with which the province of Quebec would like to continue, demands a $6 billion investment, probably even more, and it is considered there is no way that this money can be financed, given the present state of the Canadian economy, within Canada. Without these borrowings by various provincial governments, the provinces would not have been able to proceed with the building of these schools, hospitals and highways at anything like the volume we currently enjoy. I do not think there is anyone in this House who would be willing to say the provinces should have been curtailed in their borrowing rights if that had meant a reduction in any of the social services our people enjoy. Indeed, it is well recognized that the federal government has been most adamant in forcing on the provinces a high level of social services.

Recently, there has been an inflow of capital into Canada for mortgage loans for residential buildings. Certainly, in this case ownership and control remains in Canada. When it is considered also that Canada has abroad $21 billion worth of investment, this helps in turn to off set the flow of capital into Canada and bring us into balance. If you subtract the $21 billion from $49 billion, you get to the stage where we have a net imbalance of $28 billion. It is perhaps not so bad, when you consider that our gross national product is approaching $100 billion a year, to have a net deficit of $30 billion. That is not so great considering the immature state of development of our economy.

For instance, the recent tax legislation goes further in the way of limiting foreign securites that Canadian pension funds can buy, presumably on the philosophy that savings which are available for investment in stocks should be bottled up in the Canadian market. Canada wants to keep this money at home, but at the same time wishes to obtain free access to the United States capital market. We have indicated this in many ways, particularly in respect of borrowings for Canadian provinces. In some ways it seems to me we are kind of wanting to have it both ways. We want free access to the New York market but we propose to limit the access of Canadian capital to the U.S. market. All this makes for a certain amount of trouble.

It seems to me, whether we like it or not, United States investment is one of the principal vehicles of technological progress we have available to us. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), who spoke just before me, mentioned that his study showed Canadian manufacturing was superior to manufacturing by foreign-owned companies. If that is so, it seems unusual that we have one of the highest tariffs in the world to protect our manufacturing industry.

In the last two years we have seen the government move in the textile industry so that foreign textiles have been kept out and have largely disappeared from our shelves. United States investment, with its large technological know-how, seems to be needed by us for at least the foreseeable future. If this U.S. technological know-how is unavailable or closed to us, as well as other technological know-how from western Europe and Japan, surely we in the long run will be poorer for this. It is doubtful whether our citizens would put up with a lower standard of living than our neighbours enjoy, particularly to the south of us. Technological know-how from other jurisdictions surely increases rationalization and modernization in our own economy. It forces our manufacturers to more productivity and presumably increases the standard of living of all our citizens.

In the recent tax changes made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he presented his budget greater stress was placed on tax incentives for the manufacturing industry. How will we obtain this high level of technology in manufacturing, particularly when it is recognized that our high priced manufacturers must sell largely in the United States market, unless we are willing to procure technological know-how from other countries?

In respect of Canadian banking institutions, it is pointed out they are doing business with other countries. Apparently, as Canadians, we are happy to have them do this, yet we have designated banking as one of those segments in which we do not wish any foreign investment. So, it seems in this area we have considerable differences of opinion and a collision of ideas.

Official statistics suggest there is a high percentage of foreign ownership and control in certain of our industries such as petroleum, chemical, rubber, machinery and manufacturing. It has been found that when a corporation changes from being foreign-owned to Canadian-owned it does not necessarily change its way of doing business or does a better job so far as the Canadian public is concerned. For instance, the CPR has been majority Canadian-owned just in the last decade, yet have there been any discernible changes in the policies of the CPR? I have yet to see them. It is just as actively engaged in discouraging travel by passengers as it has been in the past. I met one citizen who made the journey from Lethbridge to Winnipeg without ever having to turn in his ticket.

In the case of petroleum and natural gas, the recent decision of the National Energy Board, which was strictly political, to not export natural gas is an indication that this industry can be effectively controlled without foreign ownership. Without foreign investment there would at the present time be no western petroleum industry. This has all been developed with United States capital and a little western Canadian capital. Eastern money was not available or eastern investors were not interested in investing in the western oil industry at least to the present time.

It is often said that foreign investment is capital intensive and, therefore, we should not encourage it because it does not employ a lot of labour. The province of Alberta, with its rapidly growing cities of Edmonton and Calgary, demonstrates that oil and gas create a climate for the employment of a large number of people. It is estimated that over one million people are dependent in western Canada on the oil and gas industry. This represents 20 per cent of the total population of western Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's order paper, namely Notices of Motions and Public Bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DESIGNATION OF RENFREW COUNTY BEYOND JUNE 30, 1972

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of extending the designation of Renfrew County for special incentives under the Regional Economic Expansion legislation beyond June 30, 1972.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on December 10, 1969 an almost identical motion was moved in this House by me. My concern then, as it is today, was for Lanark and Renfrew Counties, and I asked that they be named as special designated areas under the then new Regional Development Incentives Act. I was on that occasion ably supported by the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins). Our representations in the House more than two years ago were but the tip of an iceberg, being that portion in view to the public of much larger representations we were making as vigorously as possible to bring federal assistance to eastern Ontario and to obtain an improved and better life for the people we represent.

In April, 1970, just four months after my motion was debated in this Chamber, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) named Renfrew County as a special area. This good news, which some said would never come, was met with startled disbelief, followed by a real sense of joy and enthusiasm by all who live in and love the Ottawa Valley. For too long too many people, especially in the Renfrew County area, have been living in the outer regions, just beyond the fringe of economic growth, so they have become accustomed to a very average and mediocre future as part of their lot. It is therefore a real source of satisfaction for me, as the federal Member of Parliament for a large portion of this county, to be able to play a part in breaking this block to progress. For two years now the county of Renfrew has been designated.

Two years ago the western world was in the midst of a very severe set-back in the aircraft production industry. The whole industry was in bad shape. This hurt Renfrew in particular which was very dependent upon that industry. Similarly the county had a natural dependence and tie-in with the forest industry which needed to be restructured. The forests needed to be better harvested and better utilized. The federal government under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not only had sympathy for the poorer areas of Canada but took action and set up a whole new Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the sole purpose of which was to assure a greater degree of equality and justice for people such as those I represent so that our dream of a continuous and varied industrial growth could become a reality and a steady stream of new job opportunities could be provided for the young and old alike. This progress, along with a solid agricultural base, is giving the people and the area I represent the kind of confidence for the future we all want to have.

Allow me now to be more specific. What has happened since April of 1970 when the designation was made? I refer in my participation this afternoon to only the eight townships I represent, the townships of Westmeath, Ross, Bromley, Admaston, Horton, McNab, Bagot and Blythefield along with towns such as Cobden, Renfrew, and Arnprior. I am sure other speakers will follow me in this debate in respect of areas of the county which they represent. I hold in my hand at the moment a sheet which lists some 15 different grants which have come into my portion of the county alone. I shall not take the time of the House this afternoon to go through all of these, but they cover a large section from Waba at one end into Arnprior, Renfrew, Cobden and Westmeath. In other words, it is pretty well distributed over the entire area of my constituency. I shall simply refer to the total value of the regional economic grants approved for Renfrew County. The amount under this designation since 1970 has been $3,313,706; in other words, just over $3¼ million of federal aid to create employment and sizeable job opportunities in this whole area. I will deal with this in more detail later. The momentum has just built up and some announcements of real significance will be made in the very near future.

I believe it might be wise to place on the record this afternoon something which confuses some members of the public concerning regional economic expansion designations. When a grant is approved some persons assume that somehow the new industry has received into its hands the amount of money announced. That is not the case. When the federal government announces the approval of a grant, this means simply that representatives of a certain company have come to the government, have said they propose to establish a facility to produce this many units of a certain product and want to know what proportion of the capital cost the government is prepared to contribute if they locate in a slow growth, designated area.

After analyzing the market for the product concerned, after analyzing the need for it and after analyzing the possibility of producing it with the facility suggested, the government will either approve or not approve a grant. In the case where a grant is approved the important point is this. It is then up to the company to go out, raise the funds, build the facility and purchase machinery, equipment and so on. It is only when the new facility comes into production that the money is indeed and in fact paid out. Even then the whole amount is not paid out. Under most of these plans, 80 per cent of the grant is paid out when the facility first comes into production and the other 20 per cent in 36 months or three years. The reason is very obvious. It is to protect the public purse from some fly-by-night operator who might come in and not have a worthwhile company. He may not be prepared to go forward with the project. There is no way any member of this House would want to see the government provide money without ascertaining that the company is a worthwhile company and ready to put in some of its own money and actually go forward.

When I speak of $3¼ million in federal grants being approved I mean just that. They are approved. All the money is not paid out yet, only to those plants now in production. This is the main point of the motion before us today. It takes some time for industrial development to occur. It takes time to bring in these facilities. Among the 15 I have listed here—and again this is only in my portion of the county—a few have not yet gone into production for one reason or another. Always there will be some which may never go into production. Therefore, it is essential and incumbent upon the government, in my opinion, that this designation be not terminated on June 30 as now scheduled but be extended beyond that date. Ideally the designation should be continued for another three years, but at least for an absolute minimum of one and a half years or 18 months. That is the purpose of the motion I have moved today. It is to encourage the government, and to set out in this Chamber the need for having this designation extended.

It takes time to become located. Now, more industrial growth is coming into the county, but it has taken time for the people on the local scene to get organized in order to take advantage of the assistance the federal government has made available to the county. In the Renfrew County area, we have overcome the set-back caused by the closing down of the Renfrew Aircraft and, indeed, the spin-off effect on Haley Industries and some of the set-backs which came to the area because of the pressure on the aircraft industry. However, the long-term advantages of a viable and flourishing forest-based industry have not yet been achieved. The dramatic intervention of the federal government is still needed because the forest industry has not yet reached a point at which this resource can be properly harvested and moved forward. I see in the House the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) who has within the boundary of his constituency a greater forest area than I have in mine. This is also true in the case of the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins). Possibly they will wish to take part in this debate and therefore I shall not refer further to the forest based industries.

I mentioned at the outset of my remarks that in 1969 I asked to have Lanark County included in the designated area. The situation in Lanark, in 1970, was ruled to be less severe than in Renfrew. Only Renfrew County was designated. The motion before us today refers only to Renfrew County. It was placed on the order paper on February 23. Just five days later, on February 28, 1972 we were all shocked to learn that Findlay's Limited in Carleton Place announced it was closing down as of the end of May. That announcement followed all too closely on the heels of another very negative announcement that Digital Equipment intended to withdraw from the town of Carleton Place. The point I am making is that Carleton Place is not in Renfrew county, it is in Lanark county.

As long ago as December, 1969, I stated in this chamber that in my opinion the designation was needed in both

Lanark and Renfrew counties. The government and the officials saw fit to provide the designation for Renfrew county but not for Lanark. It did seem that since that date there was some justification for their decision because certainly the circumstances in Renfrew county were severe. But the point I want to make very clearly this afternoon—a point which I made a few days ago in the Committee on Regional Development—is that the circumstances have shifted recently, and now I firmly believe that the needs of Lanark county, and in particular of the Carleton Place region, are equal to if not more severe than the needs of Renfrew county. So I would make an appeal here that the DREE designation of Renfrew be not considered in isolation but that the needs of the wider area be taken into account at the same time.

Following meetings with the Carleton Place officials at the end of February and in March, it was soon revealed that the Ontario Development Corporation was covering the area of Lanark, and so for some weeks in March and indeed in April I was convinced that perhaps it made sense to have the county of Renfrew under the federal plan and the county of Lanark under the provincial plan, and to have a division of responsibilities. However, if press reports are correct, the province of Ontario through its minister, Mr. White, just over one week ago announced, without any prior consultation with the federal government, that no further Ontario Development Corporation forgiveable loans would be forthcoming to foreign owned firms. The fact of the matter is, regardless of how any member of this House may feel about foreign owned industries, that many of the firms who are interested in settling in these more remote, smaller towns such as Renfrew or Carleton Place or Almonte are indeed foreign owned. Therefore, one week ago a sudden change was introduced and Lanark county was thrown into a serious disadvantage.

I raised this question in some detail a few days ago in the Committee on Regional Development at its meeting on May 30. I would certainly like to draw the attention of anyone interested in this question to the record of proceedings of that particular meeting as it appeared in issue No. 14, where a very lengthy and detailed discussion was recorded between myself and the officials of the federal department as to just what would be the future of a community like Carleton Place when it was suddenly placed at a distinct disadvantage, since many of the industries that would be interested in settling there with the assistance of the Ontario Development Corporation would now naturally migrate a few miles further to the county of Renfrew to get the advantage of the federal designation under DREE. This is a problem that is extremely serious. If you are in a high density population area it is not so urgent, but when you are in a more remote area where industrial development is more difficult, then a sudden shift like that upsets the whole balance.

I appealed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) at that meeting on May 30 to consider filling this vacuum that had suddenly been created by the Ontario government's withdrawal. I see my time has almost expired, but I would like to conclude by saying that the county of Renfrew needs more time to develop the forest based industry. It needs more time to take advantage of the new industries which we have been able to get, a large number of them spread through the whole area. But I also want to say that in my opinion Lanark county has suddenly had a severe kick in the pants and has been placed at a serious disadvantage. I want to quote one short section from the record of the proceedings of May 30 of the Committee on Regional Development which reads as follows:

> MR. MCBRIDE: I will ask a question which is really a representation. In view of this statement by ODC, will the minister assure this committee that he will give every possible favourable consideration to the designation under DREE of areas like the depressed areas of Lanark that are now going to be left at a significant disadvantage?
> MR. MARCHAND (LANGELIER): We are going to discuss this with the government of Ontario, and if this decision of ODC changes the situation to a large extent, of course it might bring us to revise certain things that we have done.

I want to assure the House and to publicly assure the minister that there are many people in the Ottawa valley today who sincerely wish and hope that the federal government would move to take up the slack that has been created by this change in provincial policy. I want to assure the House that I will do my part to encourage the minister to give every possible favourable consideration to including, especially the northern part of Lanark county which includes Almonte and Carleton Place, in some kind of a special area, or else to meet again with the province and get them to reconsider their action.

In conclusion, I want to say that the federal designation of 1970 has meant that more federal funds have come into Renfrew county than ever before in its history, and this is being appreciated by myself, as the local member, and by the people there. It has brought a whole new future to the area. It must be continued so that we can finish what is now well under way.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—Grain—Request for forgiveness of overpayments to farmers in light of forgiveness of duties and taxes owing by car manufacturer; the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack)—Penitentiaries—Suspension of regulation making inmates financially responsible for wilful damage to property; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Manpower—Local Initiatives Program—Response to requests for additional sums and extension of time for completion of project.

Regional Economic Expansion

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DESIGNATION OF RENFREW COUNTY BEYOND JUNE 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McBride:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of extending the designation of Renfrew county for special incentives under the Regional Economic Expansion legislation beyond June 30, 1972.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I wish to compliment my friend, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) for his opportune motion.

I take it that the hon. member is asking that the present designations and rates be extended beyond June 30, but he does not state for how long. Under the Pearson government, and before redistribution, when we first had legislation providing for treatment of certain designated areas, none of those areas were located in any part of the riding that I then represented. That was the riding of Prince Edward-Lennox. In that riding at that time we were forced, and we still are forced to stand on our own feet, pay federal, provincial and municipal taxes, and do without the benefits of designation. Thus, I was obliged to take the stand that since the undesignated areas received no special benefits, and had to continue to pay taxes to stimulate the designated regions, this did little net good over the whole national scene. That is logic that cannot be refuted. The more assistance we give to certain areas, then the bigger the load that unassisted areas must bear.

Although I support the hon. member's motion because I now find myself representing 12 townships and two incorporated villages in the Barry area to which this designating motion applies, we have found that in spite of quite a long and fairly productive period of designation there is something still wrong. The forest industry, and all the other business such as secondary industry, that we thought would be immensely benefited, are still impaled upon the hazards of taxation and poor markets. I now contend that the government should extend further tax benefits to these firms and help them find markets for their products. I know that the hon. member for Renfrew-Lanark-Carleton is listening to me, Mr. Speaker, because here I am referring to markets for wood pulp and wood chips.

The lumber market in that area is fairly good. The price of maple is at an all time high. The mills are paying $85 to $90 a thousand for spruce logs. That indicates they are getting good prices for sawn lumber. However, the market for pulp and wood chips is in a turmoil and uncertain. There are some companies which got assistance under ARDA, and others that are hoping to receive grants under DREE, that do not know what the next quarter will bring with respect to marketing of the products for which they may receive assistance to manufacture. The government, the House of Commons, and all private members in it are finding out that designation is not just everything we thought it would be. There must be some better plan of assistance for primary industry, especially for the small primary industry we have in the Ottawa valley.

If we are to do as my colleague recommends, and extend this arm of benefits beyond June 30, then I must insist that the northern part of the counties of Lennox and Addington, and the northern part of Frontenac be included in this designated area, plus the five townships of western Lanark which I have the honour to represent, including North and South Sherbrooke, Bathurst, Dalhousie and Lavant.

An hon. Member: You might as well get a share of the pork barrel.

Mr. Alkenbrack: An hon. member says that we might as well get a share of the pork barrel. I point out that three applicants in the township of Raglan in the western part of Renfrew county have had no satisfaction from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to date. This would indicate that the pork barrel must be pretty well used up. More than one industry in the Renfrew county portion of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington has applied for assistance, and has not yet received any benefits.

The forest industry in my area can still be classed as a primary industry. Although the government has encouraged the establishment of pulp and paper mills helter-skelter, indiscriminately and unwisely across the country, it has not tried to encourage any secondary manufacturing in the forest industry in the Ottawa valley. There is a pulp mill at Portage du Fort just across the river from Pembroke, and I wonder why we cannot have one on our side. Our people from Ontario have to market their plup wood there sometimes at a disadvantage. Sometimes they do not get full measure for their product, a product which they have to draw many miles. I ask why cannot a study be made into the feasibility of a pulp mill on our side of the river in Renfrew county? Such a mill could manufacture the wood into pulp, and possibly into paper. It would be a secondary form of manufacturing which could employ some of the manpower we have there. It would employ more people than the primary production to which we have been confined for so many years.

Diverging from the wood industry for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point to a very energetic and economically viable maple syrup industry in Raglan township, which is the result of a brilliant man's mind, the result of much work, and the result of patents held by this individual. By vacuum action he pipes the maple sap from each tree. He has over 50 miles of plastic piping conducting the sap to a very modern sugar house. It contains the most modern equipment, costing thousands of dollars. I understand he has spent over $40,000 on the operation he now has. It produced this year about $20,000 worth of maple syrup of the very best quality. This man was unsuccessful in his application for help from DREE. He applied but was given short shrift. The other day I said to him, "I suppose you have received a grant from the federal government." He said, "No, not one cent". He received very little from the provincial government. He is now operating on his own credit and doing fairly well. I think such an industry deserves assistance. He was given none.

• (1730)

I suggest that we need better tax incentives for industry in the Ottawa Valley. I also suggest to the House that there should be better marketing assistance. When the government considers these two items positively and specifically, tax incentives and marketing assistance, I am sure it will find that less cash will be needed from what hon. members have called the pork barrel.

Can anyone say with credence—I ask hon. members to answer this question in their minds—that any one county is at a disadvantage in the total, over-all picture when one considers industrial progress? Is any one county at a disadvantage under the status quo, say in western Ontario? I think not. Is any one county in eastern Ontario at a marked, lamentable disadvantage? I think not. We are too closely related, socially and economically, for that to be the case.

That is why we might be better off it we looked more at the vital questions of taxation and marketing instead of saying to a man who wants to borrow money to buy another chipper with which to make more chips from his wood lot, "We will give you a certain percentage per man that you hire." Perhaps the project the man has mapped out will not work if he is given a grant under those conditions. This is another area that should be more clearly defined. I know a man in my riding who approached DREE for assistance in a chip and lumber industry. His is a most reliable firm. The application is being processed. I have recommended the firm and hope the minister will approve the necessary financial assistance and permit the company to see its project through to the end. The firm has been in business for a long time. It is reliable and will continue in business whether or not it receives the grant. Other firms in the same area and business have already received grants from DREE. I insist that everyone should be treated in a similar fashion.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the development of parts of Lanark, Renfrew, Carleton or the counties of Frontenac or Lennox-Addington, I ask: what about the development of all eastern Ontario? In adopting this motion, why not adopt a broader outlook? I say there must be a similar assessment of our problems and that the whole area must be treated equitably so that all undertakings in eastern Ontario are given an equal chance. Others here will speak for western Ontario. I support the hon. member's motion in the hope that the program may be extended and that it will bring some of its anticipated benefits to our area.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride). I listened to him sympathetically as he put forward a case for the needs of his constituency. I think we could all speak of particular problems facing our constituencies. Using the vehicle of his notice of motion, the hon. member was able to outline to the House some of the problems facing his constituents. I know a little about his constituency, having had occasion some years ago to work there. I found the people particularly hospitable and got along well with them. I assure the hon. member that I enjoyed very much the short time I spent there.

In the motion before us I note that the hon. member has made specific reference to an area of his constituency. As I suggested, I cannot blame him for finding an opportunity to deal with the problems of the people he represents. At the same time, I must express my view. I had hoped that the notice of motion might be based on a somewhat wider view of the situation. Problems and policies connected with regional development and programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion affect the whole of Canada.

I am sure the hon. member appreciates that policies and decisions concerning a particular area of his constituency can hardly be made unless we consider also the situation in other parts of Canada. Thus, I think we must consider other factors as well, particularly—as has been pointed out—the fact that current designations under the Regional Development Incentives Act and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act are due to expire at the end of June. The minister has indicated on a number of occasions that he expects in the near future to make an announcement concerning future designations. Naturally, quite a few members of this House are interested in particular areas and in the basic policy approach that will be adopted by the minister during the next three years for future programs which the department may undertake.

This matter is critical, Mr. Speaker. I am sure all hon. members agree with the objectives of regional development. The removal of regional disparities in Canada is something to which we all subscribe and on which we all agree. If we are to achieve these objectives we must examine some important considerations. The department structured its program in a way that would provide for a review of the situation at this time. I think this is a good time for us to consider what the department has done up to the present and where it will go from here.

As I listened to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton I noted that there are a couple of policies which need to be questioned. One of his assumptions seems to be inherent in the thinking of some people who deal with economic problems. The very simplistic idea that one hears expressed either clearly or in somewhat vague terms is that all that is necessary to solve the problems of an area is to get industry to move in; all that is necessary is to dangle a carrot in front of them, then no problems will follow and everyone will be happy.

Many of us have learned through observing the scene that this is simply not the case. It does not deal with the problem. New industries have moved into particular areas and benefits have accrued from their establishment. However, this has not removed or solved the basic problems of these areas. We have to find something more. We must find an appropriate way of dealing with the problems of economic development and the whole social and economic picture of the region with which we are concerned. We must achieve better integration of government programs.

One of our concerns at the present time is pollution and environmental problems. This question came to my attention last year when there were problems involving the establishment of a pulp mill in Saskatchewan. This became a political issue in my province. The government of the day, which is no longer in power, wanted to establish a pulp mill. It twisted the arm of the federal government to get a commitment for a regional development grant. It was quite a large grant, $12 million or more. The federal government said it would insist that the new pulp mill in the Meadow Lake area meet all the pollution standards being established by the Department of the Environment. I had occasion to question the deputy minister and some of the officials of the Department of the Environment. I was assured by various officials of the Department of the Environment. I was assured by various officials, including officials of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, that this firm and the provincial government were really serious about tackling the pollution problem. They saw no reason why they could not solve the problem.

We all know what happened in Saskatchewan. The government of that day was defeated in 1971. The new government, in honouring a commitment it had made during the election campaign, undertook to wind up the agreement that had been signed for the construction of the pulp mill because it felt the benefits that would accrue from this development were not commensurate with the very large cost involved. It took a great deal of courage to make such a decision.

I do not have the clipping before me at the moment, but last fall I read a news article which appeared in two Saskatchewan papers. The article reported an address given by a top official of the Department of the Environment; as a matter of fact, one of the officials whom I had questioned in May, 1971. He assured me there would be no problem in dealing with pollution. However, after the agreement had been wound up, this official, Mr. K. C. Lucas, said in Saskatoon that the pulp mill never had a hope of meeting the pollution control standards being established by the Department of the Environment. The story that came out was what we had suspected all along. It came out when it would not do any harm to certain people who had a political stake in that mill. This is one of the concerns we must have.

Another example involves the hon. member's constituency. I understand that a charcoal plant was proposed for the community of Wilno in the Madawaska Valley. I think that is in the hon. member's constituency. The hon. member is shaking his head in the negative. In raising this matter I want to make it clear that I am not jumping to conclusions; I am simply raising some points that have been drawn to my attention and which I feel deserve consideration. These involve some of the considerations we must bear in mind when dealing with the whole question of industrial development and attracting new industry to areas.

Some time ago an announcement was made for the construction of a charcoal plant in the community of Wilno. No doubt this was welcomed by some people. In making the announcement, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said it should be clearly understood that the conditions of the agreement on which the grant was based required the company to meet all the anti-pollution standards laid down by law. He stated that no money would be forthcoming from the department unless the anti-pollution equipment met the standards laid down by law. He did not specify in that announcement whether he was referring to federal law or provincial law. The information I have may be subject to correction, but I understand that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was simply going on the basis of standards set by Ontario provincial authorities. I am not in a position to judge whether those regulations are adequate or not, but I raise the question.

This should be a matter of interest to the federal Department of the Environment. Even though it may not have legislative authority to deal with a matter of this nature, other departments such as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be able to draw on the Department of the Environment for a judgment on the adequacy of standards that are maintained where a grant is proposed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Another area where there is cause for greater integration and co-ordination of effort is grants to foreign-owned or controlled firms. I have raised this matter on a number of occasions in the House. The question is before us for debate today under the government's bill concerning review of foreign takeovers. We are dealing with a piece of legislation which, however inadequately, proposes to provide a review mechanism in respect of a foreign-owned or controlled firm proposing to take over a Canadian firm or enterprise. At the same time, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is to continue its current policy of providing grants to firms and applicants no matter whether they are Canadian owned and controlled or owned and controlled from outside Canada.

If the objectives in the foreign takeover review bill, Bill C-201, are to be accomplished it is inconsistent for the federal government to carry on its present policy through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion of continuing to make incentive grants to foreign-owned and controlled firms without any other policy development.

Over the past three years the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has spent $1.2 billion. Another $500 million expenditure is proposed for the current fiscal year. Already $250 million has been committed under the Regional Development Incentives Act in grants for the establishment of new industry. Much of this amount still has to be spent. I suggest that there is no evidence of progress in overcoming regional disparities through this program.

The fact is that the federal government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion have indicated that this is a priority program undertaken in an attempt to overcome regional disparity. The program simply has not been successful. I am not suggesting there is not a place for some grants being made to industry, whether public, private or co-operative, but the emphasis which is being placed at the present time by the department on giveaway grants must be changed because it is not serving the function it should be serving and the people of Canada are not getting the value they should be getting for their money.

I continue to believe that regional disparity must be overcome. It must be the subject of priority attention because inequality in the distribution of our national wealth remains one of the greatest threats to our nation. When we do review this program there are certain provisions which should be incorporated in it.

First, direct state intervention is needed to establish an industrial strategy for each region. The federal government in co-operation with the provinces must be prepared, at least at the outset, to invest directly in enterprises which can be viable in the long term.

Second, the corporate tax structure should be overhauled so that taxes reflect the real social cost, such as overcrowding and congestion, of industries locating near cities such as Toronto, for instance, as opposed to the Maritimes, the Prairies or Renfrew county.

Third, a carefully planned infrastructure program co-ordinated with industrial development is needed. Co-ordination is presently impossible because the department only responds to propositions made by corporations which present applications, and such proposals are only haphazardly tied to the department's program for giving slow-growth regions the basis they need for development.

Fourth, there must be a greater measure of consultation with the provinces and with local governments and organizations. Regional development cannot work effectively if the support of the people in the region concerned is tepid because their views have been set aside. This program needs overhaul. I know that all of us are committed to the principle of overcoming regional disparities in Canada, but we must find more effective ways of doing so than have been presented up to the present time.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have an opportunity to support the hon. member's motion and to spend just a few minutes before six o'clock commiserating with him on the difficulty he faces because one part of his constituency is designated while the other is not.

Long before he became a member of this House I experienced the same upsetting arrangement in Lambton-Kent. In those days, areas to be designated were decided on the basis of unemployment figures originating in various Unemployment Insurance Commission offices. This arrangement left a terribly grey area affecting the jurisdiction of the Wallaceburg unemployment insurance office and the Chatham office which at that time was not designated. Thus, I have reason for sympathizing with the hon. member and I am pleased to support his motion, particularly since he has called for an enlargement of the designated area. I am sure I speak for him when I say it must be uncomfortable to contemplate a high degree of unemployment in Lanark involving the closing down of plants, while just a little way north in Renfrew everything seems to be booming.

In Lambton-Kent we also carry on a lumber industry, though not to nearly such an extent as the country which the hon. member represents. I was in conversation the other day with a sawmill operator who was forced, as part of the fight against pollution, to make a $50,000 investment in a wood-chipping machine. He is going to make wood chips and sell them to the United States. One of my hon. friends asks whether they will be used to make charcoal. No, these wood chips from southern Ontario go through a manufacturing process in which they are made into inexpensive pressed board.

When the policy of assistance to less developed regions was first announced by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) on March 11, 1970, he outlined the area in Renfrew which was to be covered, but in the closing part of the statement he said—I am quoting from his announcement—that the agreements being made with the provinces would be for the same period as the designations; for most of the areas, however, it was expected that these agreements would be followed by further joint development plans extending over a five-year period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The time allotted for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I was pointing out that the oil and gas industry had brought to western Canada an estimated one million in population, or 20 per cent of the population of the west. With our period of high unemployment during the last two decades, I was posing the question where these one million would have found a living, whether in Toronto or Montreal. Certainly, without United States capital the oil industry would not be nearly as far advanced as it is today.

Then, again, I pointed out that recent discussions have been going on in this House and the country at large over the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Looked at in a dispassionate way, it seems that the best route for bringing oil and gas from the Arctic is down the Mackenzie Valley and into continental North America. Construction of this valley pipeline really depends upon whether Alaskan ecologists can convince the United States government that a pipeline through Alaska is not in the best public interest.

• (2010)

In view of the efforts of the Alaska Chamber of Commerce and other people involved, including those who build tankers and people on the west coast and in the United States who need oil, it is likely the Alaska pipeline is the one that will be chosen. What about our own position? It is considered that a $5 billion pipeline is clearly beyond our capacity as a nation to build on our own in the immediate future. This seems to be another example of what will happen without foreign investment because it will be a considerable time before a pipeline is built down the Mackenzie Valley.

The 13 Liberal rebels have expressed dissatisfaction with the government's proposed legislation. They consider it weak and inadequate. These hon. members are all from Ontario, the province which has benefited most from foreign investment as shown by the Ontario government survey. This is also the area which has access to large amounts of Canadian capital.

The proposed takeover committee implies massive government scrutiny of Canadian business. There is great concern professed in respect of what the private sector is doing, yet almost half our gross national income is being spent by the three levels of government. It is time the government reconsidered what it is doing. Surely there is now less leeway for the private sector to have initiative on its own. Presumably, in respect of foreign takeovers each company will be required to manufacture and trade in the interests of the country.

The greatest difficulty is, of course, that the committee will be almost completely political. We will have the same situation as under Bill C-176, the marketing act, where the government will determine where the agricultural industry is to be located. We already have, in the Canadian Dairy Commission, a body that locates industry using politics rather than the market as the determining factor. This new act also will allow the government to decide where industrial activity will take place in Canada. In view of the regional character of Canada, it seems to me past experience has shown that industrial activity will take place in those areas which have the largest representation in Parliament, and this means central Canada.

The necessity of the committee always making decisions with politics foremost in mind is the main weakness of this board concept. Surely the demand on the members of the committee will be so great that it will only make a superficial examination of takeovers. With all the questions involved, such as how many jobs will be created, will Canadian management be employed, will money be spent on research and development, and will export markets be developed—all very nebulous and difficult to answer—I do not think a committee could more than superficially examine any particular problem. Every new company hopes it can accomplish these things but only time will tell whether they are successful.

If the committee functions in any sort of meaningful way in attempting to assess any proposition, it will be years behind in that assessment. It will have many of the problems which face the Russian state planners. It seems likely that this committee in practice will not function unless it is willing to assume a very large role in the Canadian economy. It certainly is a vehicle by which discrimination against the peripheral parts of the country could be carried on. I hope that when the bill reaches committee many of these aspects in relation to the potentially very powerful committee will be thoroughly investigated. At that time we will have an opportunity to discuss how the committee might best function.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate because of its significance to the future of this country, about which my generation is very concerned, particularly in terms of the direction in which we move in controlling the operations of our economy and, in that respect, our society.

It is a long time since the original reports on foreign investment and ownership of Canadian industry were published. There was a great deal of expectation in society that this government, or any government, would make a concrete move in dealing with foreign investment and foreign ownership. We have heard a number of members, including members on the government side, express concern about measures proposed to deal with foreign control of our economy.

We have heard a great deal about foreign ownership being sovereignty versus multinational corporations. These corporations have developed under the British system on the basis of democratic control. Governments are concerned with seeing that the needs of people are met and governments must deal in politics. But multinational or domestic corporations are concerned only with one aspect of the lives of people. There is a fundamental difference between the role of the multinational corporation and the role of the government.

When societies such as that of the Unites States were developed with foreign capital, in most cases investment from Great Britain, those societies maintained control and ownership of property. In this way there was mainly a development of domestic firms. These firms are responsible to the government to the extent that government is representative of the people. Domestic firms were easily controlled, regulated and watched. But in our society in the second half of the twentieth century there has been a fundamental change from sovereignty and national government to international corporations, so that governments such as ours and those of the United States and Great Britain, are caught in a complex situation, having to play one interest against the other. Because of the essential interests of multinational corporations, the government of the United States has been put in the position of having to adopt legislation such as DISC in an attempt to involve these corporations in domestic production. Whenever this is done it immediately affects the economy of countries such as Canada because these countries have allowed their economies to fall into the hands of foreign ownership, thus losing sovereignty in a good many respects.

This difficulty becomes greater when political parties are financed by the corporate aspect of the economy, because it is their responsibility to continue their position of economic power. Because of the manner of development of multinational corporations in the last half of the twentieth century, many difficulties have arisen. A multinational corporation of the United States operating in Canada serves as a means of draining brainpower while concentrating manual labour in one country and skilled workers in another. Quite often they frustrate geographical planning by the use of investment power. If allowed to locate development where they choose, they can redirect their investment power on an international scale, thus injuring the country in which there has been some control over or planning of investment.

Quite often they can regulate their income, their investment and their profits, if you like, so that they can pay taxes in whichever country has the lowest tax rate. This, once again, allows the corporation to play one country against another country for special concessions and breaks. This was pointed out in the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), in terms of tax cuts.

Some people ask what is the future of multinational corporations. George Ball of the United States State Department says that the structure of multinational corporations will be used to develop a supernational world going beyond nationalism, where profit is the personal motive of economic development. He could be correct in some way. He could well be correct in pointing out that the multinational corporation may set up its own system of allowing the development of international government of a kind which I would find extremely threatening.

As many of my colleagues have pointed out, not only is there need for action by the national government of Canada in coming to grips with this problem and question of foreign ownership, which is not tackled by any means in this piece of legislation, but there is need for national governments be they in Great Britain, in Canada or in the United States, to re-examine our role with each other in terms of developing on the world scene a kind of international examination of the role of multinational corporations and the possibility of setting up certain aspects of international standards to deal with these multinational corporations.

So when it is suggested that there must be international co-operation, along with the government of Canada being prepared to tackle the problem, one can see how important it is that the government come to grips with this problem very soon. Governments will have to co-operate to force multinational corporations to disclose full information concerning their operations. To realize this one need only cite the example of secrecy surrounding, according to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the DISC program which I think in terms of the world scene has proven to be counterproductive.

Furthermore, governments among themselves should pass co-operative legislation to set up standard charters or documents of incorporation which would establish certain regulations and certain manners in which multinational corporations could deal with the economy. Governments should set up intergovernmental regulations for adjustment among themselves to prevent corporations playing one government against another. They should consider government representation on boards of directors as well as partial public ownership as a mechanism of control. Governments should refuse corporations the right to operate without the government having a holding in them and setting up a joint holding body for the purpose.

What I am suggesting is that not only is the legislation introduced in this House completely ineffective in coming to grips with the issue of foreign ownership but, further, the government in co-operation with other governments on an international scale must come to grips with the matter of setting certain standards and regulations for the operation of multinational corporations.

Foreign ownership in Canada is neither a new issue nor an issue which will become old with time. It is perfectly obvious, by the introduction of this legislation, that the government sees very little need for tackling this important question which faces the Canadian economy. Throughout our history we have developed this country on the basis of opposing north-south development in such a sense as to fragment and break up the nation. Sir John A. Macdonald developed a plan to build the Canadian Pacific Railway in the manner in which he did, in the hope of avoiding control of that corporation by United States interests. There was great controversy, as there should well have been, concerning the way in which the CPR should be built. But one of the effectual and important things was that it was done in such a manner that there would be Canadian control as he saw it in the 1870s and 1880s.

We have developed our nation, as well, through disputes over the Alaska boundary and our concern about arrangements in respect of the international boundary with the United States. We established an international boundary commission to check into the matter of water resources. So since the early days of Canadian confederation we have continually, in one manner or another, sought to develop the kind of economy that would maintain our political independence from the United States of America.

By the 1960s we should have reached a decade of decision, but it passed without any decisions being made. We had report after report. I need not go into this. We had a call for action by different groups in our society in respect of an independent Canada. This involved people such as Walter Gordon. In 1961 the founding convention of the New Democratic Party called for the development of nationalism of a positive nature, not narrow nationalism such as was developed in the 1930s in Europe but positive nationalism which would show that we want Canada to remain a free, independent nation.

We expect this to be done only by a government which brings about a true concept of Canadian control of the economy. Control of the economy by a foreign country, no matter which one, brings about, in the political realm, a certain amount of loss of independence on the part of the people whether it be through Russian control of the Polish economy or United States control of ours. The dimension might be different but there is the fundamental question that people who do not control their economy cannot control their government and their democratic system.

It is in this decade, and I believe in the next ten or perhaps 20 years, that essentially we must come to grips with the problem or find ourselves having to talk of reforming the whole of North America in a continental system. If we do not come to grips with the problem now, my generation and generations to come will find themselves more and more involved with the United States of America and its economic system as well as its corporate control.

I had hoped that after the groundwork was laid in terms of reports, this decade would be the one in which there would be action to try to develop a truly independent Canada. But with the government in power and Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition both essentially tied to the corporate interests, I do not think, nor do I believe, that the Liberal party which is holding on to the concept of continentalism will ever come to grips with this issue unless there is a fundamental restructuring of politics in Canada and a strengthening of the position of the NDP.

We have had a decade wherein we should have made a decision, but the end result is this piece of legislation which is before us now. As the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) pointed out, it is almost an act of treason in some sense of the word for this kind of legislation to be produced, a piece of legislation which deflates the great anticipation of Canadians and of the younger generation that we will come to grips with foreign ownership in our economy, that we will really delve into the problem, show some imagination and hit it head on.

Why does a foreign company invest? It invests to make higher profits relative to the risk it must take. Some people suggest that because of the small market in Canada, Canadian subsidiaries do not have advantages in production. However, Canadian subsidiaries of international companies usually hold a superior competitive position with similar domestic plants simply on the grounds of their relationship with the parent company. This allows them to expand and grow to the disadvantage of the domestic plant, and thus it allows an eventual takeover.

There is no aspect of this bill that deals with such expansion on the part of such corporations, no attempt to curtail it and redevelop the direction in which we are heading. The smaller size of the Canadian market is not a hindrance to these multinational firms but, in fact, leads to the establishment of small plants and thus increases the advantages of the multiplant corporations which give the small plants access to large-scale markets. This lowers the cost as well, which gives multinational firms a further advantage over the domestic plant.

Many sectors of our economy have fallen into foreign ownership, such as Canadian patents 90 per cent of which are foreign owned, 70 per cent by Americans. Foreign ownership of industries is highly concentrated in what I would call an oligarchical position where they fix prices in terms of the Canadian economy. When people talk of the free enterprise system where there is competition, I suggest they talk of something that is far removed from reality.

[Mr. Knight.]

Foreign ownership is highly concentrated in industries which have control of the market, such as the tobacco industry, the automobile industry, aircraft, oil, rubber, etc. Corporations may generate millions of dollars of profit to their shareholders. However, one must consider where the shareholders reside. The multinational corporation hinders the more equal distribution of income. One need not delve deeply into the tax system in order to note the kind of corporate tax cut which we saw in the budget which further enhanced the position of multinational corporations in the Canadian economy.

Many members of the House have pointed out in the past some of the difficulties which we face in terms of controlling our economy and have given examples such as the one referred to by the hon. member for Duvernay in his speech last fall when he spoke of the income tax bill relating to our exports and the control of our economy. He said:

> An additional $1 billion export of energy to the United States, for example, would give us in this country $68 million in wages and salaries. But that balancing inflow on which Mr. Connally and Mr. Nixon are insisting in manufactured goods could mean that we are importing anywhere from $200 million to $350 million in their wages and salaries, depending on the industry. If it is the furniture industry, we would be exchanging $68 million for $330 million. If it is the textile industry, 26 per cent of $260 million on an average of their output is composed of wages and salaries. If it is agriculture, wheat or products like that—and I am at no time speaking of pulp and paper or wheat and fish and hydro electric power, which are renewable resources; I am speaking of non-renewable resources and agricultural products—the average is 26 per cent. If it is pulp and paper, the average is again 26 per cent. So we are exchanging 6.8 per cent or $68 million out of $1 billion, for $260 million. We cannot have our cake and eat it too. It is some exchange! There may be a balance of trade in dollar terms, but there is no balance of trade in jobs or wages and salaries.

This points out the dilemma which we now face in Canada. We are in fact exporting jobs, salaries and skilled labour. Further to that, as I previously mentioned there is the relationship of the multinational corporation to the whole area of the laws of the country. What develops in the multinational corporation, in an economy controlled by it, is a duality, one loyalty to the laws of the mother nation and the other to the laws of the parent company. Both of these can affect the trading aspects of the nation. The American anti-trust laws and trading with the enemy act both affect the kind of trade and distribution that Canadian industry has allowed when it is controlled by the parent company. American moral, political and economic judgments are fostered in foreign nations through the roots of the multinational corporation.

As I suggested previously, corporations take away Canadian talent which is in the hands of the parent company. Some of these remarks are based on comments made by such people as the vice-president of Dupont Company of Canada who once stated:

> Clearly any subsidiary is always the chosen instrument of its parent company. The very reason for its existence is to carry out the function of the parent in its designated sphere of activity and it must recognize this relationship in all its actions.

That is the loyalty to the parent company. Therefore, what develops is a kind of over-all government policy, a policy that affects people in the multinational corporations and people in control of the domestic affairs of the nation, and thus the government loses that kind of power.

Direct investment by multinational corporations erodes the decision-making process of citizens, and this is essentially what has been happening in the Canadian economy.

What is the reaction of this government? The government has not set up a screening process. It has set up nothing more than a smokescreen to hide its deficiencies in the realm of policy regarding foreign ownership. I do not think the dismal failure of this government to come to grips with the matter of foreign ownership can be understated. It merely sets up a smokescreen. There have been a number of editorial comments dealing with this subject. The Financial Times of Canada, in an editorial headed "The Missing Policy", wrote:

• (2040)

The government has been talking out of both sides of its mouth. It wants to reassure business that nothing drastic is planned. At the same time it is trying to tell Canadian nationalists that this may be only the first step towards more stringent controls. Some hints are being dropped that real limitations on foreign ownership are merely postponed until the employment outlook is brighter.

The cabinet appears to be split on the issue and several ministers are visibly unhappy about what has been produced. Even after two years of study and debate it appears that the Trudeau government felt obliged—presumably by the approach of the election—to say something about foreign ownership when it hadn't made up its collective mind what to say.

The first part of that paragraph is where the essential truth lies. The government is trying to produce a bill and then go to the people and say it has done something about foreign ownership, but in fact it will have done nothing. As an hon. member has already said in this debate, directors of multinational corporations can roll over and go back to sleep because they have nothing to worry about from the actions of the federal government. The Montreal Gazette, in an article headed "Ownership Policy Puny, Invites Trickery" which appeared on page 10 of its May 3 issue, summed up what the government has done as follows:

The mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse—

Not only does the government's decision disregard the principle recommendations of its own major task force headed by revenue minister Herb Gray, it also falls far short of the objective outlined by Prime Minister Trudeau himself.

"As a government, our minimum posture is to maintain the status quo," Trudeau told Southam News Services chief Charles Lynch last November.

"American control of our oil and petroleum is 95 per cent, we wouldn't like to go to 99 per cent; the American control of our manufacturing industry is 60 per cent, we wouldn't like it to go to 80 per cent—and so on, and I think if we tell the American people this, they will understand it"—

Takeovers simply aren't the principal problem.

In what the Gray report calls "a more or less normal year," takeovers account for only some 5 per cent of the increase in the assets of Canada's foreign-controlled corporations.

New investment from abroad plays a much more significant role. And the most important fact of all is the expansion of foreign corporations already established in Canada.

I repeat the statement that the most important factor of all is the expansion of foreign corporations already established in Canada. The government has not seen fit to deal with this fundamental question. What the government should do in the future, as has been suggested in this House previously, is create a stronger role for the Canada Development Corporation, to institute a kind of planned economy which develops our country on the basis of the essential needs of Canadians and not on the basis of the essential needs of corporate interests.

While the leader of my party was speaking in this debate he was asked a question about grains and wheat and it was implied that he was talking about the manufacture of wheat in Canada into flour before shipping it abroad. To me it was a preposterous question. Wheat and similar products are non-renewal resources, but the minister in charge of the Wheat Board was comparing them with products that are renewable resources. It is those which we presently ship abroad and buy back as finished goods; the minister should know that.

Essentially, what I have suggested tonight, Mr. Speaker, is that we in Canada must take action on the international scene to persuade other governments, those of Great Britain, of European countries and of the United States to work out the standards which multinational corporations must meet and the roles they must play in the economies of the world. Such steps must be taken, along with much stronger action by the government in terms of developing domestic control of our economy.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, this bill is making a mockery of Canadian nationhood. It is the type of measure which leads to confusion, misunderstanding and resentment among Canadians. It is the type of bill that places Canadian nationhood in jeopardy. Canadians have a right to expect more forthright leadership from the government than is demonstrated in this bill. The government of Canada, whatever its political persuasion, has an obligation to provide more effective leadership to the nation than has been demonstrated in this bill.

Many strains face Canadian nationhood at the present time. I suggest that this type of weak, ineffective response to a serious national problem can only intensify these strains. Canadians at the present time are searching for their identity. They are seeking to remove inequities and disparities that exist in our nation. But what does the government do? Having allowed much of our industry, much of our economy, the control of that industry and our economy to be alienated from Canadian hands, the government says, "We are not going to do anything about that. We are going to do something about future takeovers and future mergers of firms." I suggest that this will not help Canada in its search for identity and in finding ways and means of overcoming some of the problems we face at the present time. I suggest that the record of the Liberal government is pretty bleak and dismal in this whole area.

We can go back a number of years to the early 1960s. First of all we had Walter Gordon who came on the scene shortly after the Liberal government assumed power in 1963. He may have had a somewhat misplaced faith in certain institutions in Canada, but nevertheless all of us must be prepared to give him credit for his courage and for a very imaginative proposal that be brought forward, which unfortunately was shot down somewhere along the line.

I am sure there are some members on the other side of the chamber who remember that incident very well, members such as the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). At that time, Mr. Gordon presented a proposal for a takeover tax which could have prevented some of the problems we are now attempting to wrestle with and which we have been discussing. Following that, Mr. Gordon and some of his associates had to determine a course of action. Eventually they appointed a committee which produced what has become known as the Watkins report, which made a number of proposals to assist in attaining more effective control of the Canadian economy. These proposals were rejected by the government of the day.

Then we had proposals for a Canada Development Corporation. They really originated with the policy convention of the NDP in 1961. Subsequently this idea was picked up by a number of people, but with some variations. One of those people was Walter Gordon. He presented some proposals in this regard. They were shot down. A bill was presented to the House of Commons while he was minister of finance but never saw the light of day beyond its introduction.

Finally, in 1971 we had a bill to establish the Canada Development Corporation. I am sure most people were looking forward to a creative and imaginative proposal. I suggest it was nothing of the sort. We established an institution, a new corporation, and it was set out clearly that it was to be profit-oriented, that it would be privately controlled and that the government's stake in the corporation after it was established was to be limited to 10 per cent. This new instrument as established cannot be, as it develops its operations, an effective instrument for developing our national development policy. The measures which have been enacted cannot change the course of foreign investment, foreign ownership and foreign control of the Canadian economy.

• (2050)

As a result of a great deal of pressure which the opposition exerted on government, a study was undertaken. It was decided to study the question of foreign ownership. This was commissioned in the spring of 1970 and, of course, questions on this matter have been raised in the House of Commons frequently during the past two years. As late as last fall, and I have information I could give in detail if anyone doubts my word or memory—

An hon. Member: No; good heavens!

Mr. Burton: —we were assured on a number of occasions that the matter was still under study and that the government had not made up its mind. Later, information came to light clearly showing that the government had made its basic decision last July. It came to light on July 29, to be precise, through a document published in the Montreal Gazette or Montreal Star—I forget which—which clearly appeared to be a copy of a cabinet memorandum that had been leaked.

It was clear that despite what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of government said on a number of occasions in months subsequent, the government had made its basic decision on this matter last summer. More work was to be done and further discussions were to take place. Finally, May 2 was to be the big day. I can only comment by saying what a ghastly performance that was. What a shameful performance. I am surprised the government had nerve enough to present such a policy to the House as its answer to the problems which have been discussed for so long.

The government had had this matter under study for two years. As well, a voluminous document was presented to the House of Commons representing the studies and reflections connected with this subject. However, when it came to action being taken we found that there was to be a much more limited response by the government. I ask, does the government seriously think this bill will do the job? What does this bill show about the Liberal approach to public affairs? I suggest the Liberal party does as little as it can get away with. It does not want to disturb anything. It does not want to upset the present power structure in Canada. It does not want to offend the 95 corporations on which it depends for its support. The Liberal party is not truly committed to the process of social change and advance. It will move when it is forced to, when it must and when it has no other choice.

Before May 2 last we witnessed a most curious situation involving the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party. The Liberal party, on the one hand, had traditionally been known as the continentalist party, the party which advocated the continental approach to our economic affairs. It appeared that changes were taking place, that the party might be prepared to take action and change direction. The Progressive Conservative party, on the other hand, traditionally had been known as the nationalist party, the party that was concerned about nationhood and had taken stands in the past on that question.

We found in recent months the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Stanfield) making statements to the effect, "Let us not scare the Americans. Let us not harm our relations with the Americans. Let us not cut off our source of foreign capital." I am sure that, many faithful, sincere and loyal supporters of the Progressive Conservative party winced and shook their heads as they heard their leader make those statements.

I read carefully the speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) who began speaking for the official opposition in the debate on this bill. I think he added to the confusion surrounding this situation. I think the approach of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal was at variance with the approach his Leader took, as expressed in statements he has made in recent months. The hon. member correctly noted some of his concerns respecting the bill. He noted its ineffectiveness, some of the problems it must deal with and expressed the view, as I interpret it, that the bill will not accomplish much in dealing with the problem it was introduced to deal with. What sort of topsy-turvy situation affects the Liberal and Conservative parties? It seems they are both in a total state of confusion. Neither is willing to take effective action to stem the erosion of the Canadian economy, to develop alternative approaches or to develop alternative instruments of policy.

In addition, it must be said that the Prime Minister's role in this entire debate has been somewhat pale and ineffective. In his statements of recent days he has adopted a most cautious stance which does not do him credit. He suggested that if this bill were held up in the House of Commons the consequence would be serious. He said opposition parties would be held responsible if the bill were held up and did not pass before the end of June.

Let us examine that assertion in the context of what has happened. As I noted, the study of this matter was begun officially by the government in the spring of 1970. A great deal of background work had been done before then. We were given the official statement of government policy and the draft bill on May 2. Bill C-201 was introduced immediately thereafter. Not until May 29, almost one month after the bill was introduced, was the debate on second reading of Bill C-201 begun. But now the Prime Minister blames the opposition if the bill is held up. That, I suggest, is irresponsible hypocrisy.

We know, for example, that the Prime Minister stalled answering questions by using all sorts of diversionary tactics. He said the matter was still under study, when it was clear that the government had made its basic decision on this question. The Prime Minister also dragged red herrings across the trail, one of the most serious being the entire issue of regional development and the relationship between foreign ownership policy and regional development considerations.

An hon. Member: Now you are dragging a couple across the trail yourself.

Mr. Burton: He suggested that any restriction on foreign ownership would hurt the disadvantaged regions of Canada. May I quote from a statement the Prime Minister made in Regina early in 1972. The statement gave a great deal of concern to his good friend, Walter Gordon.

Mr. Benjamin: If he never comes back it will be soon enough.

Mr. Burton: According to a report, the Prime Minister said:

> There is this constant trade-off between those parts of Canada which are already fairly developed like the central provinces, and particularly Ontario.
> And that's where you find the Melville Watkins and the Walter Gordons who think that enough is enough and they don't want any more foreign capital to develop their province, but they don't always realize that other parts of Canada have not developed that far and therefore they would not mind a little bit of foreign capital if it means there is more technological progress and higher standards of living and so on.

That is what the Prime Minister said in Regina. I suggest the Prime Minister's statement is wrong in fact and that its effect is harmful. Varying studies, some of which have been commissioned by the federal government, relating to economic geography have come to our attention and these show clearly that the pattern of foreign investment is not directly related to the pattern of regional disparity that is evident in Canada. Also, reports which have been produced by the federal government show clearly that foreign investment has been highest in Ontario where the highest level of income in Canada is earned.

The typical pattern of entry of foreign businesses, with some exceptions such as industries that are resource-oriented, has been to Ontario. They go to Toronto or one of the larger centres nearby and establish their Canadian operations. I suggest that the manner in which foreign investment has taken place in Canada has contributed to the problems of regional disparity with which we are now wrestling.

There is another matter concerning regional development policy that we must consider. That is the regional industrial incentives program. The federal government, through the Regional Development Incentives Act of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, has already committed over $250 million in grants under this program. Over half the money that has been committed under this program will go to foreign-controlled firms.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) maintained that he could not cut off grants to foreign-controlled firms because this would hurt regions in need of help. He has said many times that we need a policy of controls over foreign investment but it has to be a general policy, it cannot be part of the regional development program and cannot be an instrument for controlling or curtailing foreign investment. In response to questions I asked in the House and in committee, the minister expressed the hope that there would be an effective policy to deal with this problem in the foreseeable future. Where is that policy? Where is the minister? It seems that in so far as his policy is concerned, it is business as usual; there is no change.

The foreign takeover bill before us states that it will do something about maintaining Canadian control of our economy. On the other hand, however, we continue to feed this growing monster under programs such as the regional development incentives program. The foreign firms which helped create regional disparities by the pattern of their development will not solve the problem now. We need a different sort of Canada Development Corporation than was presented by the government. We need a complete overhaul of the industrial incentives program.

The bill before us is designed to curb takeovers. But why should a foreign firm be interested in a takeover when it can get help like this to expand an existing operation or start up a completely new operation? What we need from this government is a complete change of policy. The government might take note of the change that was recently introduced by the Ontario government whereby they decided to stop forgiveable loans to foreign-controlled corporations. The Ontario government reached the conclusion that this was not contributing to development in the province of Ontario.

We have Bill C-201 before us. We had the usual type of detailed introduction by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). He is the same minister who told American businessmen in a number of recent speeches that they had nothing to fear and nothing to worry about with regard to legislation the government was going to introduce. He was right. This minister also had a recent experience with some of the American-controlled subsidiaries in Canada. The minister thought he was dealing with them in good faith; he thought he could rely on them and that they had not taken action through their parent corporations to become involved in the United States DISC program which would undercut their Canadian operations. The minister found out through newspaper articles and reports from Washington that he was wrong. He thought he was able to operate on a straightforward basis with these corporations. The bill before us reflects the known concerns and attitudes of the minister. We have known for some time that he wanted to take very little action to control the activities of foreign-controlled firms in Canada.

I wish to review briefly some of the loopholes in this legislation which must be examined very closely. I do so within the context of the suggestion that even in this limited area where the government is proposing to take action, that action will not be effective and will not do the job. I find that clause 2 of the bill is quite ironic. It sets out in grandiose terms the purpose of the act in these words:

> This act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern, and that it is therefore expedient to establish a means by which measures may be taken under the authority of Parliament to ensure that—

I ask hon. members to note this passage:

> —in so far as is practicable after the enactment of this act, control of Canadian business enterprises may be acquired by persons other than Canadians only if it has been assessed that the acquisition of such control by those persons is or is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada, having regard to all the factors to be taken into account under this act for that purpose.

This is a very grandiose statement but we have this one catch, "in so far as is practicable after the enactment of this act". We find, as well, various factors which the minister says will have to be taken into account in assessing mergers or takeovers in the future. This, of course, is very difficult to assess at this stage. It is not so much a question of the words in the bill but, rather, the manner in which the bill is put into practice once it is enacted.

I have another concern. It appears from examination of the bill that there are certain types of business which for tax purposes might be classed as non-profit. For example, there are some foundations which carry on industrial operations, the profits go for charitable purposes and they are exempt from income tax on that account. The fact is they only carry on a subsidiary operation in Canada. I know of one large, international drug company where this is the case. Most of their research and development work is carried on in England. They do some final testing work in Canada but do none of their basic research work here. They operate in Canada through various subsidiaries but they do not carry on the basic part of their operation here. Such business is exempt from the purview of this legislation.

Another matter that concerns me is that this bill is to be applied to any purchase of shares of a corporation where 5 per cent or more of the voting rights attach. That has to do with a corporation whose shares are traded publicly. It is not a public corporation as such but a corporation whose shares are publicly traded. There are many corporations incorporated as public companies or public corporations but their shares never reach the stock market; they are never traded as such. They would not be involved at this 5 per cent level but, rather, at the 20 per cent level which concerns private corporations. When 20 per cent of the shares of a corporation are exempt from the purview of this legislation, the situation becomes serious.

There are other clauses in this bill which require further examination, but I do not intend to discuss them at the present time. However, when I was reading this bill, on several occasions, since provision is made for certain things to be done and certain things not to be done, I wondered what penalties were set out. What happens if a person or group of persons fails to take the action prescribed or takes action which is prohibited?

At the end of the bill I found that penalties have indeed been provided. Intentional failure to report a takeover is punishable by a fine of $5,000. Now, $5,000 means a good deal to some people but I doubt it would mean very much to a large corporation which felt it might be advantageous to go ahead with takeover arrangements without reporting them, and then to go through the motions if the government ever caught up with what was happening. The corporation might well be ahead by a good deal more than $5,000.

The bill deals with takeovers and mergers. But what about the expansion of firms already existing in Canada and the establishment of new enterprises? Members might be interested to take note of the pattern of foreign investment in Canada over the last several years. I have here a set of figures obtained from "Survey of Current Business", for November, 1970, published by the United States Department of Commerce.

One of the tables sets out the sources of funds of United States subsidiaries in Canada, giving a percentage breakdown. The percentage obtained from United States parent companies and other United States sources in 1968 amounted to only 6 per cent. Funds obtained from retained earnings amounted to 25 per cent, from depreciation and depletion 41 per cent, from borrowings in Canada 24 per cent, from equity sales in Canada 2 per cent, and from other sources 2 per cent. Only 6 per cent came into the country from abroad. Most of the money was generated internally to provide for the expansion of foreign-owned firms here.

I have another table also taken from "Survey of Current Business" for October, 1970. This shows the inflow of new United States capital investment in Canada compared with the outflow of payments to parent firms. In the period between 1960 and 1969 the inflow of new United States investment amounted to $5,497 million. The amount paid out in interest and dividends flowing back to the United States amounted to $6,252 million. The amount paid out in royalties and fees totalled $1,770 million. So the total for these two items flowing to the United States amounted to $8,022 million, which means that the net outflow during the ten-year period was $2,525 million. These figures should be kept in mind. In addition, there are fees paid out in royalties and in respect of franchise arrangements, sales contracts, and so on, which contribute to the picture.

At the present time there is an absence of policy for dealing with this situation. As I said, a grandiose phrase appears in clause 2 of the bill describing the government's intentions but it has not been followed up by any means for effective implementation. What is obviously needed is an effective way of dealing with the situation I have described—a revitalized and reconstituted Canadian Development Corporation, for example, together with a control instrument which would really do the job.

A great deal of confusion exists as to policy. The hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) correctly stated this afternoon that whatever the need for foreign capital in Canada, we were attracting it in the wrong way; we were placing no restrictions on the inflow of equity capital while, on the other hand, discouraging provinces and other institutions from borrowing in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, if there is need for an inflow of capital into Canada, the most effective way of satisfying it while retaining some control over our economy is to allow it to take place in the form of capital borrowing. This, in fact, was the pattern of development in the United States in its earlier years when that country depended on an inflow of capital from Britain. The government is caught amid conflicting priorities. It is encouraging capital investment by offering all kinds of incentives though it is known that in some areas there is a shortage of capital in Canada. On the other hand it has done nothing to bring about a more effective use of labour in Canada by ensuring that Canadians can find employment so as to make a living. After all, more than half a million Canadians are unemployed at the present time. Budgetary policy this spring seems to follow the motto: What is good for the corporations is good for Canada. This seems to be the approach of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

When we discuss measures of the kind before us, in line with our responsibility to our constituents, we ought to realize fully that we are dealing with a matter which affects the future of this nation, that the future of Canada is at stake and that the decisions we are making now will affect the nature and substance of Canada in the future—indeed, whether there will be a Canada in the future at all. Many of us have a stake in ensuring the development of a healthy society which will reflect concern for those in our community who are least fortunate. It is time the government changed direction and abandoned its present catastrophic course of action.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, there is some disposition to conclude the debate, so I shall not prolong my remarks unduly. Contrary to all hopes, the government's policy as reflected in the bill before us is similar to its policy in connection with agriculture. It is a stopgap measure, narrow in its viewpoint, shortsighted and deficient in that it allows for no long-term planning. There is no glimpse here of a comprehensive economic plan for Canadian development and the measure suggests no means of increasing and maintaining control over our resources, industries, etc. In effect, it is only running fast to keep from going backward.

Much has been said about the bill and I do not wish to repeat it. However, I do want to kick around for a few minutes some ideas about what we might do in regard to foreign ownership. It seems to me that the present government lacks new business ideas and is not forward looking enough to meet problems in the future. I can think of no better example than the shipping of grain to the west coast. Everybody knows that trade with the Asian rim countries has been improving and we have now sold more grain and other products to that part of the world than the railways can ship. This is very poor business management. I agree that buying boxcars by the government is better than taking no action at all, but I suggest this is a stopgap, ad hoc measure and is typical of what takes place too often in this country. We see much evidence of this sort of thing.

Therefore, why should we be surprised by a bill of this nature that attempts to deal with foreign ownership? Many people have suggested improvements in the shipping of grain, and as a farmer I have made several myself over a number of years. Yet the government still has not produced a long-term plan. It is high time the government made some forward-looking plans to promote Canadian business interests.

I should like to discuss one idea of my own. I suggest that when we use the taxpayers' money to buy shares in a company, or give a company a DREE grant to conduct research that would be worth something to the company be it foreign-owned or otherwise, the taxpayers should receive something back on their investment, on the use of their money. Otherwise why spend the money in the first place? It seems to me we should have a sort of Panarctic approach. If money is given an oil company to prospect for oil in the Arctic, some of the oil should belong to the people.

I also think more thought should be given to the development of Canadian business. I observe the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) in the chamber and I suggest to him, as I have done before, that it is high time someone on the government side produced an industrial strategy that related to items in Canada that we produce very well. An industrial strategy should help Canadian business, which is what we are primarily interested in. A lot is said about foreign capital and foreign ownership as if this were necessarily bad, but the bill before us simply allows a big fish to eat a little fish, provided the cabinet approves, which is a rather negative approach. I suggest that if the government looked after Canadian business, Canadian business would be in a better position to look after itself.

I have another idea I should like to put forward. Suppose a lead-zinc mine—we have several of them in Canada—needed foreign technological know-how or foreign capital for development purposes. We should say to these investors, "If you join hands in partnership with us, we will pay you in lead and zinc. But once we have paid you back, the remainder of the equity in the mine is ours". Let us just consider this idea for a moment. In effect, I am saying that we are not making a very good deal with countries like Japan, Great Britain, Germany and the United States. These countries with technological expertise and spare capital also need resources. My point is that we might make a better deal. We are not as shrewd traders as we might be.

Another point I should like to make is that if we allow these countries to have access to our resources, we should also make a better deal for markets for our manufactured products which are more competitive. A trade-off has been suggested. If countries want something from us, let us trade something with them in return. It seems to me the government has made some poor deals of this nature. In effect, we have been backwoods boys dealing with shrewd businessmen.

These are not hard and fast suggestions but I did not want the debate to go by without suggesting that we look at other ways of solving our problems. It is not enough simply to take a negative stand and allow foreign capital to come into Canada only on certain conditions. Let us look at developing Canadian industry in a positive way. If we do this, some of our problems may solve themselves.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise, not to take part in this debate but to speak to a point of order. I think you will find that there is agreement among the parties that if a vote on the second reading of this bill is called for—and I can tell you that one will be called—perhaps it could be made an order of the House that the vote be taken not at this time but at 9.45 p.m. tomorrow night. I point out that tomorrow is an opposition day under the aegis of the Progressive Conservatives, and I believe that the House leader for that party will confirm that he and his colleagues are agreeable to this suggestion.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we agree; and I should like to think that the government would be quite prepared to sacrifice the time of one of its members from a quarter to ten until ten o'clock tomorrow. I think it would be a good idea if the vote were held tomorrow because it would enable hon. members to read their speeches and decide which way to vote.

Mr. Lang: That would be agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I support the proposal which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just made, and I understand that it would be in the interest of the House that we proceed with the vote tomorrow night, as suggested.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the House leaders of the various parties. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to special order made earlier this day, a recorded division on the motion stands deferred till tomorrow at 9.45 p.m.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT FOR WHEAT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO FLAXSEED, RYE AND RAPESEED

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-204, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, as reported from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

• (2130)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I put the motions which are before the House at the report stage, I might say it would appear that motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), is defective in that it not only purports to amend Bill C-204 but it also would rescind section 35(1) of the main act and, in effect, substitute for that section a new and substantive proposal. This is the thought the Chair has at this moment. To indicate the authority for the view the Chair takes, subject to whatever arguments hon. members wish to make on the point of order I should like to refer hon. members to May's Seventeenth Edition, page 549, where it is stated:

> An amendment is out of order if it is irrelvant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill, or if it is irrelvant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the clause under consideration. Amendments which are irrelvant to the clause under consideration should, as a general rule, if they are within the scope of the bill be moved as new clauses.

If hon. members would like to assist the Chair on the procedural point with reference to motion No. 1, I would be pleased to hear them.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the amendment is in line with the purpose of the bill. It was proposed as part of the bill when it was first presented to this House for consideration; therefore, the government and those responsible for bringing in the bill must have considered this matter as relevant to the bill.

The bill deals with the matter of quotas. That is an inherent part of the measure before us. One of the main purposes of Bill C-204 is to regularize and make legal, by amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, certain procedures the Canadian Wheat Board has been following in administering quotas and establishing the rights of farmers to deliver their product at a given point of time to a delivery point to which they are limited, plus an alternative. This is one of the main purposes of Bill C-204 dealing with control of flax, rye and rapeseed.

I refer to this matter specifically in the amendment; therefore, I maintain it is within the four corners of the bill. I gather from the minister's attitude that he agrees with me on this point. For that reason I suggest the amendment is in order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to make the very brief point that whatever the situation may be in strict, regular fashion—and I do not really quarrel with Your Honour's approach to the interpretation here—we are in a peculiar situation, having the bill restored to the report stage with the bulk of the original proposal as contained in the original bill. I think the recommendation is broad enough to support this amendment and for that reason I would not argue against its admissibility at this point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) for the comments he has just made and I trust Your Honour will take that point of view into consideration. It is the point I wished to make. Surely Your Honour does have to look at the circumstances under which this order is now before the House. There was an agreement among all four parties at this session that we would put this bill back on the order paper at precisely the point it had reached in the last session.

If at this point in the last session we had been faced with this amendment there would have been no question as to its admissibility, because it was part of what had been in the earlier draft of the bill and removed by the committee. In other words, all we would have been doing at the report stage of the last session would be putting back into the bill what had been taken out in the committee.

In view of the fact it was an all-party agreement not to debate the bill on second reading again and send it back to the committee, but to resume the matter exactly at the stage it had reached the last time, I suggest Your Honour should take that into consideration. Whatever was admissible at this stage in the last session should be admissible now. Since there does seem to be agreement on both sides of the House that this is the way we ought to treat it, I hope Your Honour will see fit to allow the amendment.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the point raised. What the amendment does is reinstate the bill to the position it had reached last session. That portion of the previous speaker's remarks is correct, but the bill would never have passed the committee if this section had not been deleted. It was with the deletion of this part that the committee agreed to pass the bill, hoping it would get passage at the last session.

If one checked the record he would see that another bill, doing essentially what this amendment does, was presented to the House for first reading. I think that was Bill C-255. Technically it might be in order, if we really consider that this bill is now at the report stage of second reading, to accept the amendment. Certainly the understanding reached in committee at the time this bill passed the committee and was returned to the House was that this part should be deleted. This was done almost unanimously, though I see an hon. member shaking his head in a negative fashion. In any event, it was passed by the committee only because there was an agreement in committee to facilitate the passage of this bill without the contentious part in order to continue the operations of the Wheat Board.

I suggest you should rule the amendment out of order at this time and that Bill C-255 should be re-submitted so that the whole question of rye, flax and rapeseed could be dealt with. If this were done I could understand that the consideration of Bill C-204 would be facilitated and it would be passed before the end of this month.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words in the same vein as the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). When the bill was examined in committee, we agreed practically unanimously to delete that clause from the bill and when we reported to the House it had actually been deleted. It was the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) who deemed it advisable to move an amendment at the report stage in order to include the clause once more in the bill.

For my part, I should much prefer not to have the amendment incorporated into the bill because it extends the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board. Past experience has demonstrated that powers vested in the Canadian Wheat Board have not resulted in making us very happy in eastern Canada and our argument against granting greater powers to the Canadian Wheat Board was the iniquity of the Board's present regulations.

I do not feel this is the right time to extend the Board's powers to other types of grain and I suggest that the amendment be rejected.

• (2140)

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, arguments about whether hon. members wish to have this matter dealt with one way or the other would seem to be totally irrelevant at this time. What is to be taken into account, I submit, is set out quite clearly in Hansard for May 9, at page 2081, where the government House leader, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), rose in introducing this bill and said:

> I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect to this bill of which notice is given on the order paper. There have been discussions among the House leaders and because this is the same bill as was reported out of committee last session it is understood that when and if it is given first reading it will be moved forward to the report stage on the understanding that hon. members will be able to move amendments in the usual way and will not be confined to the amendments that were moved in the last session. If the House is of a mind to do so, I should like to have an order which would put this bill at the report stage, where it stood at the prorogation of the last session, on the understanding that hon. members might move amendments either as in the former session or new report stage amendments.

In the exchange that followed it was clear that there was agreement, and Mr. Speaker concluded by saying:

> Pursuant to the order made a few moments ago this bill stands for consideration at the report stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The difficulty the Chair has, of course, as I indicated initially, is that it would appear the motion in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is not procedurally in order. I suggested at that time that it does reach back into the act itself. It goes beyond the scope of the bill before the House for consideration.

Hon. members who have directed their remarks to assist the Chair on this matter have not quarrelled with that submission. Some of them have, however, on the other hand, indicated that there was some degree of consent or agreement among hon. members and that this might be considered notwithstanding the fact that the Chair might find the motion is not in order procedurally. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) has quoted Hansard of May 9 and the words of the House leader of the government, but I would think with respect, that those statements were predicated upon amendments being in order before they could be accepted unless there is consent of all hon. members.

I gather from the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and the parliamentary secretary that there would not be such consent. In the absence of the consent of hon. members I would have to find, as I indicated earlier on the basis of the citation in May's Seventeenth Edition, page 549, that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am uncertain just how to handle this, but it seems to me as House leader for the New Democratic Party I have a point of privilege I must raise tomorrow with the government House leader. There was no suggestion earlier that consent would have to be obtained at a later stage to the moving of certain amendments. There was a clear understanding among the four House leaders that this bill would be advanced to the report stage on the understanding that members would be able to present at that stage the same amendments they were able to present at the last session, plus any others they might wish to present. This amendment is one that was presented at the last session. It was in order then because it was simply restoring something which had been taken out. I must say, if this is the result, we were taken in by the kind of agreement into which we entered as House leaders which in turn was confirmed by the House.

I feel very strongly that if you do not see fit to accept this amendment tonight, the matter should stand until we have a discussion among House leaders. We get along very well and when the four of us reach agreements those agreements stand. I do not quarrel with the right of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard) to oppose the matter in principle, but there is not any doubt in my mind concerning the agreement reached. If I may say so, one reason the bill concerning the Northern Canada Power Commission is still standing as a notice and has not been proceeded with is that the same type of agreement sought in respect of it was not reached. But in the case of Bill C-204 the agreement was clear and iron-clad. If Your Honour feels that the procedural niceties do not allow the Chair to accept it, I suggest it be allowed to stand until the House leaders clear the matter.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I must say I would probably be opposed to the amendment moved and yet I must also say that in my view the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stated in essence what I thought was the understanding, that is, that hon. members would be able to offer amendments at the report stage in the way in which the hon. member indicated.

I have not had an opportunity to look into this thoroughly, but I notice there is an amendment at the report stage standing in the name of the minister. It would appear to deal with sections in the act which are not covered by the amending bill. I am referring to amendment No. 2. I may be wrong but it strikes me, on the basis of the reasoning of the Chair, that we must only look at amendments at the report stage which can be related to the amending bill before the House. If that is the case, I wonder whether amendment No. 2 of the minister is in order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege I should like to confirm that my understanding certainly agrees with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Perhaps I might on this question of privilege draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the reference of the extension of the act to rapeseed, flax and rye does not appear in the bill. I take it that it appears in this form because that was the original form of the recommendation to support the amendment.

I say to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and to the parliamentary secretary that I would propose in due course to urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment, not because I am against it in principle but because of the nature of the deliberations which took place upon it. That, however, is a different issue. I hope at this stage we might go to the substance of the amendment knowing that the history of the matter is as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says. That was the understanding concerning the bill at the report stage.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have one further comment. In respect of your words to the effect that this amendment goes beyond the context of the bill before us, may I say that while it may not have gone beyond the context of the original bill before the committee it now, in your words, goes beyond the context certainly of amendments at the report stage. If this is so, conceivably it is out of order.

While I know good will must prevail between the House leaders of the various parties, I would suggest at this late hour that perhaps the best way in which to proceed would be to call it ten o'clock and let the House leaders meet again to discuss the pertinent points. Then we could proceed tomorrow with a better understanding of how to deal with the suggested amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, after listening to what the hon. minister has just said concerning the position which may be taken when the bill is examined, I have no objection to this amendment being debated, except that I reserve the support which, for intance, I may give to the said amendment.

• (2150)

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, with respect may I add one further point. I say this not in criticism of the Chair but perhaps in criticism of all of us here. It seems to me that when the amendment at the report stage appeared on the order paper, as this one did in the previous session, at no point in time did anyone in this chamber draw to the attention of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) that his motion might be out of order. After all the time that has elapsed, surely the motion should be allowed, if for no other reason than that it was not ruled out of order, and we must at least allow the motion to proceed to a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to the Chair that the situation is as I indicated earlier, that from the point of view of strict procedure I have considerable doubt as to the acceptability of the motion. Hon. members have referred the Chair to discussions at another time among hon. members. May I point out, with respect, that the Chair has the responsibility to rule on the procedural acceptability of motions such as this. Normally consideration is given to motions when they come before the House for debate.

I have indicated the ruling I would make but am not anxious to make a ruling now, if hon. members would prefer that I defer it. If it is the wish of the House, as was suggested by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who are generally in accord, I will defer my ruling until the next time the matter comes before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House would be pleased if you would do that. When you are giving further thought to your ruling, I wonder if you would take into account in a particular way the point just made by the Minister of Justice regarding the royal recommendation. I draw your attention to the fact that he was speaking not only about the royal recommendation in last session's bill but about the royal recommendation that is attached to this session's Bill C-204 in which there is a reference which reads, "to extend application of the act to flaxseed, rye and rapeseed".

As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, in the bill as it is before us, which is in the form in which it was reported from the committee last session, there is no such reference. So as I tried to say before, we are dealing not with a situation that is governed by the normal rules but with a situation that is governed by the fact that we have carried over a matter from one session to another and have done it by a clearcut understanding among the House leaders of all parties. If Your Honour will give the matter consideration overnight, perhaps we can deal with it more acceptably the next time it comes up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that I am aware of the terms of the recommendation but that is not the basis on which I feel that the motion is not in order. I indicated that I thought it went beyond the scope of the bill before the committee.

I consider that in so far as the royal recommendation is concerned, there would probably be no objection on that point. I feel that whatever hon. members, through the House leaders, think they should do is a matter for them to consider. In so far as the Chair is concerned, as I have indicated I will defer my ruling if it is necessary to make it. However, I would prefer hon. members, through the House leaders, to give this matter further consideration and when the matter comes before the House, to indicate to the Chair if any agreement has been reached.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—REQUEST FOR FORGIVENESS OF OVERPAYMENTS TO FARMERS IN LIGHT OF FORGIVENESS OF DUTIES AND TAXES OWING BY CAR MANUFACTURER

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on May 25 I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who is also in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that a major car manufacturer owes the Crown $6 million in duties and sales tax and that this debt is to be forgiven, I wonder whether the minister or the government would give consideration to a similar forgiveness of overpayments to farmers, as described in the Auditor General's report?

The answer I received was extremely insufficient and incorrect. The minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not see the connection between the two situations described by the hon. member.

I think this points out a lack of continuity in government policy. There are certain groups in our society which are put into a privileged position, such as the large automotive industry, especially in terms of a company that ships cars from the United States. They receive a write-off of $6 million, but the farmer who is affected, as reported in paragraph 64 of the Auditor General's report, by the wheat inventory reduction payments is not in the same position.

The Auditor General's report sets out a number of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the administration of this program. The department has established that some 4,000 farmers have been overpaid approximately $540,000. Of this, $177,000 has been recovered and attempts are being made to recover the remainder.

When it comes to the complaints of farmers in western Canada we are in a situation where 4,000 of them will have to repay the overpayments. This is the position under the Lift program due to misadministration of the government. Yet the government is writing off $6 million for a large corporation. That is the inconsistency of the government. They are the financial backers of this government; let there be no question about that.

Throughout his report we see all kinds of inconsistencies pointed out by the Auditor General. In paragraph 69, on the cost of unused accommodation in Ottawa, we find that $32,000 was spent for unoccupied space in moving the Canada Council to new accommodation. In paragraph 73, on royalties not reported by a foreign licensee, we find that because the royalty portion of the licensee's selling price has been withheld by a foreign government agency, the licensee has not reported sales on which approximately $118,000 in royalties should have accrued to Canadian Patents and Development Limited.

In paragraph 77, on indirect compensation to chartered banks, we find that government deposits aggregating $100 million remain at the disposal of the chartered banks free of charge without the approval of Parliament. At the same time, there is inconsistency on the part of the government when they drag the court 4,000 farmers in this land because of the misadministration of PFRA by the Department of Agriculture. We as Members of Parliament should be pleased that the Auditor General points out these inconsistencies and we should be happy to have the opportunity to read his report.

On page 4 of the Auditor General's report we find that the government is trying to cut back on the services available to the Auditor General to look at government expenses. He points out that there has been a downgrading of senior staff positions and says:

> In my opinion, this action by the Treasury Board secretariat is unfair and discriminates against the Auditor General. It should be corrected forthwith. If it is allowed to stand it will mean that his office is prevented from employing auditors in the highest classification in the public service of Canada. It will also mean that in order to reach the highest classification in their profession, his most experienced auditors must leave the office of the Auditor General.
> This action points up more clearly than anything else that if the Auditor General of Canada is to be truly independent he must be free to recruit the staff he needs and to determine their salary levels within the framework of the public service of Canada.

Not only is the Auditor General the most important employee of Parliament but it is a fact that the government is making moves to undercut his position. It is in this report that Members of Parliament such as myself can find the inconsistencies of this government in how it handles revenue. The report points out time and time again the kind of inconsistencies that have occurred.

This is money set aside, budgeted and not spent, built up to over $200 million, to which the government has access for spending on any kind of program it sees fit, without direct action by Parliament. It is a nice chunk of pie ready to be served to the people of Canada before a general election.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in directing his original question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) sought to draw a parallel between two distinctly different circumstances. The situations mentioned were the Canada-United States automotive agreement on the one hand and the Operation Lift program on the other. The minister in his reply stated that he could see no connection between the two situations and frankly, Mr. Speaker, neither can I.

Although the Canada-United States auto agreement is not administered by the Canadian Department of Agriculture, perhaps I may still reply to that part of the hon. member's question which pertains to this agreement. It is my understanding that this agreement was based on the principle of free trade. As such it did not envisage collection of duty or sales tax by either party. The amount the hon. member interprets as being a direct liability is, in my understanding, what has been referred to as a contingent liability, not a direct liability nor an outstanding debt owing.

The overpayments to farmers are examples of direct liabilities and as such are quite different both in terms of accounting principles and of actual fact. Under the terms of the Lift program, farmers who elected to participate in the program were paid a specific amount for each acre taken out of wheat production, with an additional payment made when this acreage was diverted to perennial forage production. These payments were made subject to a definite set of governing regulations.

I am certain the hon. member is well aware of the reasons behind the Lift program and I need not go into them in detail. However, I should like to mention the fact that the government, in an attempt to put needed cash into the hands of farmers as soon as possible, made advance interim payments to farmers who submitted claims. Final payments were made when on-farm inspections had been made. Some overpayments did result. Some of these overpayments arose out of arithmetical errors and misunderstanding of the regulations. In other cases there were definite inconsistencies when the actual farm inspections were made.

In conclusion, and to answer the hon. member's question, the government does not intend to forgive or write-off these overpayments. Rather, we have already collected much of the amount owing and have been, and are, judging each outstanding case on its own merits. Where, according to the regulations, recovery is justifiable we shall attempt to collect the full amount owing.

PENITENTIARIES—SUSPENSION OF REGULATION MAKING INMATES FINANCIALLY RESPONSIBLE FOR WILFUL DAMAGE TO POPERTY

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I bring a question before this House tonight which is of vital importance to Parliament, to our penal system and to all Canadian taxpayers. It arises from a sequence of events at Millhaven penitentiary in my riding. During the first week of May a hunger strike and riot were staged by certain inmates, and in the latter action these persons wilfully destroyed an estimated $4,000 worth of federal property, namely, the plumbing in that institution. As a result of this, on May 16 I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General on a subject which has aroused public opinion regarding certain happenings in our penal system. Can the minister inform the House and give his assessment of the extent of damage done by certain inmates of Millhaven penitentiary last week when in a reported protest or strike they wilfully destroyed an estimated $4,000 worth of federal property in that new prison?

The minister said he would be happy to look into the matter. I asked him a supplementary question as follows:

> In view of the minister's new but ill-advised policy of full wages for inmates, will he not deduct the amount of damages from their wages?

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the Solicitor General said he would be happy to look into the matter. I now draw your attention to another document, a news item which appeared in the Kingston Whig Standard four days later, on May 20. I will quote from it. It shows that the minister must have looked into the matter, but in a manner harmful and detrimental to the interests of the Canadian public and not in keeping with the protection of persons and property. I quote from the Whig Standard the article headlined, "Prisons suspend rule":

> The Commissioner of Penitentiaries has suspended a regulation that requires inmates of federal prisons to pay for damage done to prison property.
> The regulation states that when an inmate damages government property he may be financially liable for the full cost or a portion of the cost of repairing the damage.

Regional director John Moloney acknowledged Friday that inmates no longer had to pay. This is a "recent innovation" he said. He did not know why the regulation was suspended.

> In the past, inmates made good the damage out of pay credits. They could be deprived of pay up to three months if necessary, but at that time their case was automatically reviewed.

The publishing of this latest piece of policy emanating from the office of the Solicitor General compelled me to ask another question in the House on May 30, which has brought us to this confrontation tonight. Public opinion in my constituency is aroused over this latest policy or desertion of policy on the part of the Solicitor General and his department. I asked, as recorded at page 2675 of Hansard for May 30, the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it deals with a matter I asked the minister about on May 16 concerning deduction of amounts of damages done by inmates to prison property from the salaries of prisoners in federal institutions. On May 20 the regulation holding prisoners financially responsible for wilful damage to prison property was suspended. Would the minister tell the House who authorized that directive?

It has always been an axiom of the common law that Canadians shall be held responsible for damage they do to persons and property. The law applies as well to persons in our penitentiaries and we must uphold especially the regulations governing those persons. Neither the Commissioner of Penitentiaries nor the Solicitor General have the power to change this law. How crazy can the government get in implementing its permissive society?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General are now projecting their version of the permissive society even into the prisons. Now, under their policy, a person convicted of crime and incarcerated in an institution is a privileged person. The suspension of this time-honoured regulation will only invite wilful damage and vandalism, encourage more riots and discourage the recruitment of guards for the penal service. The guards at present face a tough enough time. There is no need to make it tougher for them to maintain order and to perform their duties in our prisons.

The cost of Millhaven prison, the most commodious and modern in Canada, will be over $20 million when completed. According to the evidence I have placed before you, and according to reports of speeches alleged to have been made by the Solicitor General in western Canada, he and the Prime Minister are following dangerous policies and are now saying to the criminal elements of Canada, "We honour you in our participatory democracy. We are removing most of the deterrents to your chosen vocation of crime. If you go to prison, we will give you a better standard of living than many taxpaying Canadians enjoy. You can destroy all the property you like; we will not hold you morally or financially responsible. The taxpayer will pay for your damages. We will also restore to you your privileges and in your commodious quarters we will make the taxpayer restore whatever you destroy. You can retain the salaries which we will pay you and thumb your noses at the judges of the courts who sent you here, for you may soon have a privilege that they do not possess, that of the franchise."

May I remind the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, that the law of Canada stipulates that we shall at all times maintain the protection of persons and property. It is for this very reason that the Solicitor General's office exists. On behalf of the Canadian people I demand that the minister reveal who authorized this relaxation of law as evidenced in the directive in question. Originally, the director said he did not know why the regulation was suspended. This House and the Canadian people are quite sure that the Solicitor General knows why. The Canadian people are sick of and disgusted with the permissive policies of this government and its failure to govern. They are revolted by the abandonment of well-founded principles and deterrents which used to be assured by law, and they deplore the sick society which has resulted.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member of the opposition is only half right. He suggested that the damage in Millhaven amounted to $4,000; actually, it amounted to $2,200.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I said the amount was estimated.

Mr. Hogarth: Then is $4,000 an estimate of $2,200 worth of damage?

An hon. Member: You must take inflation into account.

Mr. Hogarth: May I point out, to correct the hon. member further, that there is no intention on the part of the Solicitor General to relieve any individual inmate from responsibility for civil damages or property destroyed or damaged in our penitentiaries. What has been decided is that the collection of such damages will no longer be pursued merely on the basis of an administrative directive from the commissioner. Henceforth, in appropriate cases collection of such damages will be pursued by a regulation appropriately passed under the provisions of the Penetentiaries Act or, in the alternative, by civil process in the courts of ordinary civil jurisdiction.

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—RESPONSE TO REQUESTS FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, today I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) if any consideration would be given by the government to providing more funds to municipalities or groups to complete projects which were approved under the Local Initiatives Program and, through underestimating the project, cannot complete same due to lack of funds.

For some reason or other the congenial parliamentary secretary continued to avoid the import of the question and instead, for the benefit of his party, said what glad tidings he had for us about what the government is doing. Tonight I am going to surprise him and say that I think the Local Initiatives Program is good. I give full marks to the government for introducing it, but unfortunately they made a few errors, which anyone can make, and I am going to try to help the parliamentary secretary and the minister overcome these weaknesses.

My question was prompted by several representations made to me because projects which were approved could not be completed due to the fact that costs were underestimated. This is going to leave a good number of projects incomplete and, therefore, the value of such projects and their benefits will be lost. Indeed, the money so far allocated will be wasted. In this regard, I feel it imperative that a good, hard look be given immediately to all projects in order to assess and ensure successful completion.

While I have the opportunity, I think it is worth while to put forth some ideas to the government in line with the Local Initiatives Program. In my opinion, the federal government should broaden the concept of the Local Initiatives Program into a five-year national development plan to strengthen provincial and municipal infrastructures. Every community in Canada requires basic public services such as water and sewage, access roads, fishing facilities, standard housing conditions, medical services, day-care centres and the like. The government should give consideration to providing a program, through the coordination of all departments concerned, to work in cooperation with all levels of government to provide the funds through local initiative to achieve these goals.

If consideration were given to such a proposal, the departments of government concerned could allocate funds from their votes in ensuing years to support local initiative. Not only would public services be provided but it would instil a sense of local participation, pride in one's community and a sense of comradeship and community spirit to make a better Canada.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) accepted a suggestion that I made in the House a couple of weeks ago that Fisheries and Public Works collaborate with his department to develop a type of project similar to the Local Initiatives Program to allow fishermen to provide new inshore facilities. The minister, whom I admire for his non-partisanship, accepted the idea. I hope something will be forthcoming in this area.

This idea could be broadened to take into account all phases of community infrastructure services with the involvement of local people. This would create a sense of involvement which would contribute toward the objectives of a better Canadian nation. One of the most important problems in our nation today is that of controlling pollution. The government is prepared to spend billions of dollars in this area but it seems to fail to realize that basic control should be directed at the root of the problems in the area of proper sanitation control in communities.

[Mr. Marshall.]

I have another example. Submissions were advanced by the score in connection with the provision of fishing facilities. They were turned down on the grounds that extended facilities were not justified. Yet similar projects have been approved under the terms of the Local Initiatives Program. This emphasizes the confusion which surrounds the disbursement of government funds and the duplication of effort which occurs. Far better results could be achieved through a combination of effort on the part of all levels of government.

In this connection, I ask the parliamentary secretary to suggest to the minister that when the cabinet next meets it should consider the proposal that the subject of local initiatives programs be placed on the agenda of the federal-provincial-municipal conference to take place this fall. If he needs any help from the opposition, I am ready and willing to assist him in any way possible.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister I wish to thank the hon. member for setting forth certain of his ideas with respect to the Local Initiatives Program. As he knows, the government is very responsive to good ideas from whatever direction. As well, I welcome the enthusiastic support accorded to the Local Initiatives Program by the hon. member speaking for the official opposition. This is especially heartening in view of the earlier criticism voiced by one or two of his colleagues on the basis of incorrect information.

As of June 5 the department has granted an extension of time in respect of 1,396 projects to allow them to be completed to the extent of the funds which have been allocated to them. These extensions have been allowed to June 16 and are in line with the minister's announcement made on May 1. Furthermore, the minister stated on June 2 that an additional $30 million allocated to the Local Initiatives Program would permit some 1,200 projects to be extended to September 30, keeping some 15,000 persons at work until the end of the summer. I know the hon. member will greet this news with real enthusiasm.

The minister has indicated already that the criteria for selecting the extended projects will, in general, favour the quality of life over job creativity. In this regard, I understand there have been 11 extensions involving an amount of almost $300,000 in the great province of Newfoundland alone. The manpower and immigration department has issued a first list of the projects extended during the summer; it contains some 730 names. That was on June 2, and the number will be greater by now. It is expected that all the 1,200 contract extensions will have been signed within a few days.

The original $150 million program created 92,500 jobs during the winter, far in excess of the number predicted by certain members of the opposition. One hundred million dollars was allocated to projects promoted by private organizations and $50 million to projects sponsored by municipal councils. Most of the extended projects are private ones.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

APPENDIX

May 31, 1972

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL, BONN, MAY 30-31, 1972
FINAL COMMUNIQUE

The North Atlantic Council met in Ministerial Session in Bonn on 30th and 31st May 1972.

2. Ministers reaffirmed that the purpose of the Alliance is to preserve the freedom and security of all its members. Defence and the relaxation of tension are inseparably linked. The solidarity of the Alliance is indispensable in this respect. Allied Governments seek an improvement in their relations with the countries of Eastern Europe and aim at a just and durable peace which would overcome the division of Germany and foster security in Europe.

3. Ministers noted progress in relations between Western and Eastern countries, increasing contacts between the leaders of these countries, and the conclusion of important agreements and arrangements. They welcomed these developments flowing from major initiatives undertaken by their governments, which had full and timely consultations on these subjects. Such consultations will continue.

4. Ministers welcomed the signing by the United States and the USSR of the Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems and the interim agreement on Certain Measures with respect to the Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms. They believe these two agreements limiting the strategic arms of the United States and the USSR will contribute to strategic stability, significantly strengthen international confidence and reduce the danger of nuclear war. Ministers also welcomed the commitment by the United States and the USSR actively to continue negotiations on limiting strategic arms. They expressed the hope that these two agreements will be the beginning of a new and promising era of negotiations in the arms control field.

5. Ministers noted with satisfaction that the Treaty of August 12, 1970, between the Federal Republic of Germany and the USSR and the Treaty of December 7, 1970, between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Polish People's Republic are to enter into force in the near future. They reaffirmed their opinion that these treaties are important, both as contributions towards the relaxation of tension in Europe and as elements of the modus vivendi which the Federal Republic of Germany wishes to establish with its Eastern neighbours. Ministers welcomed the declaration of May 17 in which the Federal Republic of Germany confirmed its policy to this end and reaffirmed its loyalty to the Atlantic Alliance as the basis of its security and freedom. They noted that it remains the policy of the Federal Republic of Germany to work for circumstances of peace in Europe in which the Germany people, in free self-determination, can recover their unity; and that the existing treaties and agreements to which the Federal Republic of Germany is a party and the rights and responsibilities of the four powers relating to Berlin and Germany as a whole remain unaffected.

6. Ministers also welcomed the progress made since their last meeting in the talks between the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR. They regard the conclusion of the agreements and arrangements between the competent German authorities, which supplement the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin on September 3, 1971, as well as the signature of a Treaty on Questions of Traffic between the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR, as important steps in the effort to improve the situation in Germany. They thus feel encouraged in the hope that, in further negotiations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR, agreement might be reached on more comprehensive arrangements which would take into account the special situation in Germany.

7. Ministers noted with satisfaction that the Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the USSR have arranged to sign the Final Protocol to the Quadripartite Agreement. The entry into force of the entire Berlin Agreement being thus assured, the Ministers hope that a new era can begin for Berlin, free of the tension that has marked its history for the past quarter century.

8. In the light of these favourable developments, Ministers agreed to enter into multilateral conversations concerned with preparations for a Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. They accepted with gratitude the proposal of the Finnish Government to act as host for such talks in Helsinki at the level of Heads of Mission under the conditions set out in its aide-mémoire of November 24, 1970. Accordingly, they decided to work out with other interested governments the necessary arrangements for beginning the multilateral preparatory talks.

9. Ministers stated that the aim of allied governments at the multilateral preparatory talks would be to ensure that their proposals were fully considered at a conference and to establish that enough common ground existed among the participants to warrant reasonable expectations that a conference would produce satisfactory results.

10. Prepared in this way, a Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe should constitute an important factor in the process of reducing tension. It should help to eliminate obstacles to closer relations and co-operation among the participants while maintaining the security of all. Allied governments look forward to a serious examination of the real problems at issue and to a conference which would yield practical results.

11. Ministers considered that in the interests of security the examination at a CSCE of appropriate measures including certain military measures aimed at strengthening confidence and increasing stability would contribute to the process of reducing the dangers of military confrontation.

12. Ministers noted the Report of the Council in Permanent Session concerning a Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. The Report examined the issues which might be included on the Agenda of a Conference as set forth in paragraph 13 of the Brussels Communique of December 10, 1971, as well as the procedural questions relating to the convening of a Conference. Ministers directed the Council in Parmanent Session to develop further its substantive and procedural studies in preparation for a Conference.

13. Ministers representing countries which participate in NATO's Integrated Defence Programme recalled the offers to discuss mutual and balanced force reductions which they had made at Reykjavik in 1968, at Rome in 1970 and subsequently reaffirmed.

14. These Ministers continue to aim at negotiations on mutual and balanced force reductions and related measures. They believe that these negotiations should be conducted on a multilateral basis and be preceded by suitable explorations. They regretted that Soviet Government has failed to respond to the Allied offer of October, 1971 to enter into exploratory talks. They, therefore, now propose that multilateral explorations on mutual and balanced force reductions be undertaken as soon as practicable either before or in parallel with multilateral preparatory talks on a Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

15. These Ministers noted the studies conducted since their last meeting on political, military and technical aspects of mutual and balanced force reductions. They instructed the Permanent Representatives to continue this work in preparation for eventual negotiations.

16. These Ministers stated that the present military balance of forces in Europe does not allow a unilateral relaxation of the defence efforts of the allies. Unilateral force reductions would detract from the Alliance's efforts to achieve greater stability and détente and would jeopardize the prospects for mutual and balanced force reductions.

17. Ministers took note of a report by the Council in Parmanent Session on the situation in the Mediterranean. They expressed their concern regarding the factors of instability in the area which could endanger the security of the members of the Alliance. They instructed the Council in Permanent Session to follow closely the evolution of the situation and to report to them at their next meeting.

18. The next Ministerial Session of NAC will be held in Brussels in December 1972.

19. Ministers requested the Foreign Minister of Luxembourg to transmit this communique on their behalf through diplomatic channels to all other interested parties, including neutral and non-aligned governments.

TABLING OF EXTRACT FROM MINUTES OF MEETING OF COMMISSIONERS OF INTERNAL ECONOMY, APRIL 24, 1972

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table an extract from the minutes of a meeting of the Commissioners of Internal Economy, held April 24, 1972, concerning salary revisions of the staff of the House of Commons.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION OF HERMAN WEISZ

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 70 I present to the House the petition of one Herman Weisz, endorsed by myself. The petition humbly prays that the House should cause the person or persons responsible for the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's right under the Standing Order is simply to present the petition. No explanation is required. He simply indicates that he is tabling the petition, which will be studied between now and tomorrow. There is no provision in the standing order to permit an explanation of what the petition is about.

Mr. Brewin: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I present the petition.

POLLUTION

POLLUTION OF CANADIAN SHORE BY CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. The subject matter has to do with the oil spill which occurred last Sunday at the ARCO oil refinery at Cherry Point, Washington, which is now being carried by the tides and currents into Canadian waters and polluting Canadian shores south of Vancouver. I would hope the unanimous consent of the House would be given, in which case I would move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams):

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to examine and inquire into the oil spill at Cherry Point and the consequent infringement of Canadian sea and territorial sovereignty; and to relate its findings to studies on public hearings conducted on the west coast into the TAPS oil tanker route and oil transfer and refinery terminals; and to have power to travel from place to place both in Canada and elsewhere.

Since the Standing committee is now on the west coast, I would hope it might begin this inquiry immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's proposed motion has been placed before the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. Therefore the motion cannot be put at this time.

FOULING OF CRESCENT BEACH BY CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having in mind the oil spill that occurred at Cherry Point, a few miles from the riding of Surrey-White Rock, which has resulted in oil slicks drifting ashore at or near Crescent Beach in that riding, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

(a) That this House approve immediate federal action to help clean up and protect the affected area; (b) to provide that no economic loss be suffered by the people of that area; and (c) that what has happened be drawn forcefully to the attention of the government of the United States as constituting a small sample of the inevitable ecological dangers and disasters that will follow the transportation of oil by tanker along our western coast.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is also proposed to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POLLUTION

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—ARRANGEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING CLEAN-UP IN WATERS OFF PACIFIC COAST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of the oil spill at Cherry Point which I understand took place in United States waters but part of which has moved into Canadian waters. I assume that the minister is doing everything possible to clean it up, but may I ask him whether there are any joint arrangements in existence between Canada and the United States to deal with oil spills in those waters?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the sense of technical co-operation between officials or special agencies of the governments of both countries there is a co-operative arrangement, and this is in effect in the case of the present incident.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST TO U.S. GOVERNMENT—PROGRESS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT AUTHORITY OVER WATERS OFF PACIFIC COAST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that this oil spill appears to have drifted into Canadian waters, I should like to ask the minister whether any protest has been made to the United States authorities regarding their failure to prevent the drift of this spill into Canadian waters?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not as of this moment, as far as I am aware. I think the question might more appropriately be addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I might add that the drift of the oil, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated, is precisely what we had forecast. In other words, the scientific and other people had indicated that a spill there would, under certain circumstances, tend to drift into Canadian waters, and this confirms our concern over the whole project.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the minister propose to recommend to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that a protest be made, since presumably he would to some extent act on the minister's advice in this matter? I should also like to ask the minister or the Prime Minister, if this question is outside the minister's jurisdiction, whether any progress has been made on the Canadian proposal that a joint U.S.-Canada authority be established in that general area over these waters, be it the International Joint Commission or some such body? I believe such a proposal has been made. Has any progress been made regarding its implementation?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in the first instance, I think it has been made abundantly clear by the government of Canada and, indeed, by this House that it is our judgment these large tankers ought not to follow the so-called Cherry Point route. This information has, of course, been conveyed to the United States government. About all I can add at the moment is that at informal discussions in Washington last Thursday I reaffirmed this view and expressed the willingness of the government of Canada to co-operate in every way in the event the United States did not see fit to take note of our original representations.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will, of course, recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary question, but I think in all fairness I ought then to recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Stanfield: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he will answer the earlier part of that long question. Does he intend to recommend that a protest be made, based on the failure of the United States to clean up that spill before the oil came into Canadian waters?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think the choice of words might be somewhat different in the sense that I will certainly, by means of the various marine channels through which I work, indicate to the parties responsible our disappointment that they have not done this as rapidly as perhaps might have been possible. On the other hand, I say that with the qualification that I believe the United States authorities were on the spot very quickly and, to the best of my knowledge and from a technical standpoint, they have been doing everything possible to prevent the oil spill from spreading.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST FOR AID TO B.C. MUNICIPALITIES AFFECTED TO CONTAIN OIL SLICK

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Having in mind information I have just received that in the area affected the oil slick is now approximately one mile in length from Crescent Beach to White Rock with a width of ten feet, and in view of the fact 100 to 150 people are mobilized there trying to keep the beaches clear of the oil slick as much as possible, will the minister undertake to give every immediate aid requested by the municipalities or the people of that area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The answer to the question is an unqualified yes, Mr. Speaker. In fact, our people are already on the scene using all of the devices we had originally put in place in that area to take care of a contingency such as this.

RESPONSE OF U.S. GOVERNMENT TO RESOLUTION OF HOUSE RESPECTING PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a final supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Will he indicate what response has been received from the United States government to the motion unanimously approved some weeks ago by hon. members of this House, calling attention to the dangers involved in the carriage of oil through those straits, which presumably was transmitted to the United States government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in a sense the response to the concern expressed not only by the government and the House but by many people across the country is the fact that when President Nixon and I met several weeks ago we discussed this very matter, at which time I indicated ways in which I thought the International Joint Commission could be brought into service to control spills on the east and west coasts. The President agreed that we should discuss this very matter. The Minister of Transport has just said that discussions along these lines at the official level did take place last week. We hope that this present event will indicate even more strongly to the United States that our fears were not without foundation.

OIL SPILLS—REQUEST THAT PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS AND BILLS PERTAINING TO PREVENTION BE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. Will he take this comparatively minor oil spill at Cherry Point as an indication of the seriousness of the problem which both Canada and the United States face and send all private members' notices of motions and private members' bills pertaining to the prevention of such accidents to the appropriate standing committees of the House for study and action? While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: You are not on your feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we might proceed in an orderly fashion by allowing the minister to reply to the original question, and when the hon. member is on his feet again he may ask a supplementary.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am already giving consideration to that proposal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may now resume his feet.

Mr. Groos: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that I am on my feet again, may I draw your attention to the fact that today is the twenty-eighth anniversary of the allied landing in Normandy. In doing so, I hope I may remind hon. members that there is still plenty of peaceful action needed today on the pollution front.

• (1420)

UNITED STATES POSITION RESPECTING REFERENCE OF PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Has the government yet received any assurance from the United States government that it would be willing to submit the whole question of the Cherry Point and Strait of Juan de Fuca route to the International Joint Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge, although I would have to confirm this with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But as I said in my answer a moment ago, when I discussed the matter with the President he did indicate the willingness of his government to study this matter and see in what way we could best manage the problem of possible spills on the east and west coasts. I repeat that there have been meetings at the official level. There has been to my knowledge no official and final response from the United States government yet.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING POSSIBLE DAMAGE TO CANADIAN PROPERTY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. When I addressed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday on the matter of the oil spill at Cherry Point he said he would look into the matter to see whether or not we have a case to take up with the United States. In light of the announcement of Canadian government policy that we will hold the United States responsible for any damage to Canadian property from such spills, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has looked into this matter and is there any information he can give the House concerning action of that kind against the United States government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a report on this since the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke yesterday, but he will be in the House again this week and I am sure he will be glad to answer the question then.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont for a last supplementary on this subject and then go to the next matter.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE OF HOUSE NOW ON WEST COAST INVESTIGATE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Parliament of this country has already expressed itself on this question and the fact that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence is now on the west coast, would the Prime Minister consider contacting the chairman of the committee to see if it might take some time from its agenda to study the matter directly in order to be able to report to the House and the government on any additional information available or any action that might be taken?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am rather afraid the House would find it improper if I were to take it upon myself to give direction to a chairman of a parliamentary committee. If the House wants to give a direction it would be more proper for it to do so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

STEPS TO OVERCOME ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN PROGRAMS AND REGULATIONS DESIGNED TO BENEFIT BUSINESS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of a statement he is reported to have made that the government's programs and regulations designed for the benefit of business in Canada are not only numerous but also mutually conflicting and often work at cross-purposes. Can the minister tell the House briefly what steps he is taking to overcome this maze of conflicting and counter-productive regulations and plans the government is now working with?

Mr. Speaker: The minister would have to do this very briefly because the hon. member is inviting the minister to make a statement of a very general nature which normally should be made on motions. If the minister can reply briefly, he might be allowed the floor for that purpose.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, simply by developing a better synchronization between departments of the federal government and between federal and provincial authorities; between governments and industry.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister how long he expects these consultations with business and labour and the various government departments and provincial governments to take and when he thinks he will be ready to announce a national policy with economic and social purposes for the programs he has in mind?

Mr. Pepin: If my hon. friend is referring to the development of a new industrial strategy. The best answer I can give is later rather than sooner.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister this question. I note his statement that it would be later rather than sooner, which is, of course, very encouraging to Canadians and Canada's economy. I should like to ask the minister whether he would undertake to make a statement to the House at an appropriate time in the next little while outlining precisely the programs which are now in conflict, work at cross-purposes and do not do their job from his point of view, so that members of the House may consider the obviously chaotic conditions over which he presides?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if all these problems were already solved there would be no need for an effort toward an improved industrial strategy. Solving conflicts is what we are trying to do now. I made a statement yesterday in Edmonton, copies of which are obviously available and will be available, which is the first effort on my part to define the problems. The Prime Minister and others have worked also at developing a process by which, in consultation with industry, labour and the provinces, we will develop in the coming months a clearer, better, improved industrial strategy, and I swear to God I will be working all summer at it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

AIR TRANSPORT

SECURITY MEASURES AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS TO PREVENT HIJACKING

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Are additional security steps being taken in Canadian airports in connection with international flights throughout the world since the recent incident at Tel Aviv and others here and there in various countries?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House and the hon. member that security measures of quite an intensive nature are now in effect at most major airports in Canada, particularly at Montreal. We are taking extraordinary measures with regard to flights destined for what might be described as delicate areas of the world where in recent times there have been some unfortunate incidents.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

At the beginning of April, at Orly airport, all passengers were searched before boarding an Air Canada plane. No matter whether or not a member, the search was carried on. Were those doing the searching employees of the Canadian government or of the French government?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: I am afraid I would have to take that portion of the question as notice. To my knowledge, at foreign airports these people would be under the jurisdiction of the airlines concerned, but on the specific case in point I would have to ask the necessary questions of the Air Canada officials.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED PRESENCE IN CANADA ON MARCH 4 OF KOZO OKAMOTO, LONE SURVIVOR OF ASSASSINS INVOLVED IN TEL AVIV AIRPORT MASSACRE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can he advise the House now whether Kozo Okamoto, the lone survivor of the group of three Japanese involved in the Tel Aviv Airport incident, was in Canada on March 4, 1972, what the nature of his acitvities was and, in particular, was he involved in activities with the FLQ?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the question of finding out whether or not that individual was in Canada is now being investigated.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I did not rise immediately, Mr. Speaker, to ask my supplementary question because it took me a little while to get the answer of the minister through the translation system. In view of the fact that the person in question may not have had a visa to enter Canada, after the investigation is completed would the minister be prepared to make a statement, particularly as a serious situation could develop at our airports such as has developed elsewhere?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Of course, Mr. Speaker, if it is in the public interest.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO ENSURE CO-ORDINATION OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made in St. John's yesterday by the secretary of the Ministry of Science and Technology to the effect that there is no co-ordination of Canadian policies either in space or beneath the seas, and in view of the statement made in Stockholm yesterday by the Minister of the Environment that Canada was prepared to commit $100 million toward a world environmental program, what steps is the government taking to ensure that these programs are co-ordinated, either through the Minister of State for Science and Technology or through the Department of the Environment?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second part of the question I might take this opportunity to indicate to the hon. member that a correction has been published in the press, correcting the first impression about the $100 million. I think the decision by the government, announced by the minister, is that if a fund in the area of $106 million were set up, under certain conditions with which the government could agree, then we would be prepared to contribute to it an amount of $5 million to $7 million. So much for the $100 million part of it, Mr. Speaker.

As to the co-ordination part of the question, yes, it is the very function of the new Ministry of Science and Technology to ensure that there be more and better co-ordination between all aspects of science and technology in Canada.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBILITY OF CONTINENTAL POLICY—CONSULTATION ON POSITIONS TO BE TAKEN AT STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): What efforts have been made to achieve some kind of continental environmental policy with the United States? I ask this in view of what appears to be opposition by the Americans to the position we are taking at the Stockholm conference.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member merely has to recall the very successful meeting I had with President Nixon a few weeks ago on this very subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. members who are laughing are not from Ontario. I note that one is from Peace River where he has pollution of his own.

Mr. Baldwin: I am looking at it right now.

Mr. Trudeau: The agreement signed between the United States and Canada at that time had to do with the prevention and clean-up of pollution in the Great Lakes. If the hon. member from the Maritimes and the hon. member for Peace River would get on their toes, perhaps they might be able to do the same thing for their areas too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a member from an Atlantic province which is a much bigger area than the Maritime provinces. Was there any consultation with the Americans prior to the Stockholm conference with a view to getting some sort of co-ordinated approach to world environmental problems?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this is a conference set up under the aegis of the United Nations. It is in fact co-ordinated and managed by a Canadian, Mr. Maurice Strong. He has been in consultation with all participating governments, including ours, and at those meetings with him we indicated the desire of the Canadian government to co-operate in a very positive way at Stockholm. I hope the House and the country have taken notice of the fact that the Canadian government position at Stockholm has been a very forward one. I do not think that this is the proper place to criticize what the United States has done. I think we should at least wait until the conference is over and see then if there are proper ways of making it a success.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs I would like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the continuing representations by veterans organizations over basic rates of pensions, the commitment by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that this matter would be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and the number of questions that have been asked in the House during the past week, is the parliamentary secretary able to indicate to the House whether this matter will be referred to the standing committee?

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the matter to the attention of the minister who will make a statement, as I indicated the other day, in due course.

Mr. Marshall: As this is the same answer we have heard for a week, can the parliamentary secretary assure us that this matter will be referred to the Standing Committee of Veterans Affairs before the end of this session?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF FOOD INDUSTRY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I would like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the statement by the president of the Canadian Grocery Distributors Institute that a recent survey shows that public confidence in the grocery business has dropped from 48 per cent in 1966 to 24 per cent in 1971, will the government consider implementing the 1967 recommendation of the Senate-Commons committee that the investigation into concentration in the food industry be continued?

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to bring this question to the notice of the minister.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a related question. Because the food chains now hold over 50 per cent of the Canadian grocery market, having taken 2 per cent more from independent retailers during the past year, will the government look into the effect of this control on consumers and the smaller independent retailers?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

METIS AND NON-STATUS INDIANS—SUGGESTED DESIGNATION OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH PROBLEMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the representations made today to the government by the Native Council of Canada, composed of representatives of the Metis and non-status Indians, can the Prime Minister tell the House which department of his government and which minister will be designated to take responsibility for the special problems that concern these some 700,000 Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might realize it is impossible to see that all aspects of the lives of some 700,000 Canadians can be taken care of by one department or one minister. It really depends on the subject which is foremost in their minds at any time. We would hope that all government departments would be open to them and, in dealing with their many areas of concern, provincial government departments also.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that this particular group in our population, as the Prime Minister well knows, has rather special and unique problems which are not covered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, would the Prime Minister not give consideration to designating one minister and one department of government through which their representations and complaints at least can be funnelled to the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do think it is important that their representations be funnelled to the cabinet. I hesitate to follow the suggestion of the hon. member to set up one minister to be in charge of all aspects of the lives of any one group of citizens. The hon. member has pointed out that we have a department responsible for Indian matters, and I am sure many of the concerns of Indians would be channelled through it. But as regards the Metis we have very many aspects of government concerned with them. For example, we know that the Secretary of State has set up friendship centres which are very successful and which deal with some urban aspects of the problem. We know that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion deals with other aspects of their problems. We also know that the minister responsible for citizenship deals with—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the Prime Minister goes through all the departments, perhaps the Chair could intervene and invite the hon. member for Peace River to ask his question.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA IN SELECTING OF PROJECTS FOR EXTENSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister, or possibly the parliamentary secretary might even be persuaded to answer. My question has to do with the extension of the local initiatives program which was recently announced and the statement of the minister on Friday that the extended projects will in general favour quality of life over job creativity. As some of the extended programs seem very lively, including a telephone answering service for the homosexual society—that is one of them—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —would the hon. gentleman request the minister to make a statement indicating the specific criteria which in fact were used to persuade the government to pick out and select certain projects to receive these extensions?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to enunciate the five principal criteria employed in determining which projects should be extended, starting with projects which have a potential for becoming self-supporting if they are provided with assistance for a further period, projects which provide employees—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Perrault: —with a learning experience giving them new skills—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please?

Mr. Perrault: —services that could, given time—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary can continue answering but this time I have the floor and what he is saying is not recorded. I suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that when he asks for a general statement he should not be scandalized and the Chair should not be scandalized if the parliamentary secretary replies giving a general statement. I would think the question should have been asked in the terms of whether a statement might be made on motions.

Mr. Baldwin: My intention was to ask whether a statement would be made on motions, which of course would permit hon. members in other parties to reply.

SARNIA OLEFINES AND AROMATIC PRODUCTS PROJECT —PUBLICATION OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BOURASSA TO PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

It seems that the Quebec premier wrote him a letter concerning the development of the oil industry and more specifically the Sarnia Olefines and Aromatic Products project. I should like to know when he will reply to the letter of the Quebec premier, and whether or not he intends to publish the reply in the interest of hon. members.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I always marvel at how hon. members usually have a copy of the correspondence that is sent to me even before I receive it. I shall look at my mail and see whether it has arrived; if such a letter exists, I hope to read it soon. If I do not have it, then perhaps the hon. member can send me a copy of it.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PETROCHEMICAL CENTRE IN SARNIA—STATEMENT OF QUEBEC MINISTER OF INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister complains about a lack of communication with the Quebec government. Perhaps the relations between the Quebec government and the opposition are friendlier than with this government.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

The Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce has expressed serious apprehensions regarding the establishment, at Sarnia, of a world petrochemical centre. Could the Prime Minister say what is the attitude of his government concerning this artificial boundary, the Borden line, which limits Quebec to its own domestic market for the sale of its petrochemical products?

Mr. Speaker: I feel that this question is of a general nature and that it calls for a statement on motions. The hon. member might perhaps agree with me on this point.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Does the Prime Minister intend to make in the near future in the House a statement on such an important matter, in order that we may know what is the government's position on that problem raised yesterday by the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will surely examine the letter, if there is one. However, in answer to the hon. member, I simply want to make him understand that the oil policy to which he referred has enabled Quebec to pay less for its fuel than the western provinces which have to buy their oil in western Canada. Well, if this is not a beneficial policy for Quebec—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that such a question and the Prime Minister's answer are rather argumentative and I also feel that we should try to proceed a little more quickly.

[English]

There are just about ten minutes left before the end of the question period and we do not seem to be moving very quickly because we have so many supplementary questions and long questions and long answers. Perhaps we should try to move along a little more quickly. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Asselin: The hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated to me that he could have been asked the question and that he knew the answer. Can the minister answer the question I asked?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO COMPENSATION FOR LOSSES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment perhaps I might address this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, accompanied by at least two government backbench acolytes, last week visited areas of British Columbia which have been inundated by reason of unusually large spring run-offs, has the government received any recommendation from that minister regarding compensation for losses because of the flooding?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I reported to the House yesterday, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo have visited the areas concerned. I reported to the House that the policy of the federal government is to consider such claims for compensation after a request has been made by the province concerned. I reported yesterday that as of the moment no such request had been received.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I should like a little clarification becuse there was a lot of racket and I did not quite get the reply. Is the government of British Columbia, in concert with the federal government, considering methods of relieving the financial losses caused by such disasters not only in the area of Kamloops but should they occur elsewhere?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I answered this very question yesterday when it was asked by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. Perhaps the hon. member for Fraser Valley West was caught in the flood. The answer, I repeat, is that the government is prepared, as it has been in the past, to consider any general plan which might be put forward by the provinces, but there has been no such request by the province of British Columbia.

Will the government find a way to collect $300 million, or will there be an arrangement to make a clean sweep of this amount plus interest, since it has become impossible for the Authority to meet its commitments?

ESTABLISHMENT OF PETROCHEMICAL CENTRE IN SARNIA—INQUIRY AS TO DIRECT ASSISTANCE BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government under consideration any direct assistance to the new world-scale petrochemical industry in Sarnia that is to be conducted by Esso, Polymer and DuPont?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was going to answer a previous question on the same subject by saying that this project, SOAP, and a couple of others are presently being studied by the government but no decision has been taken. To answer the previous question at the same time, let me say the interests of Quebec will be taken into account in this study; there is no doubt about that. The provincial Minister of Industry and Commerce was anticipating the possibility of a decision and was entering a caveat.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister give the further assurance that all similar industries, particularly in New Brunswick, now under consideration will receive equal and fair treatment.

Mr. Pepin: Certainly. The problems of the petrochemicals industry vary very much from one region of Canada to another, as hon. members would expect.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CAPE BRETON—REPLACEMENT OF ELIGIBILITY LIST FOR UNILINGUAL POSITIONS BY ONE FOR BILINGUAL POSITIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. On May 5 I raised with him the question of the eligibility list set up in a competition for possible positions that would be vacant in the Cape Breton area in the public service. The question was with regard to the changing of the competition which called for unilingualism. Twenty-three people qualified. It is our understanding that as of June 15 this list will no longer be in effect and replacements will be made from a bilingual list. On May 5 the minister said that he would inquire and provide an answer. On May 17 he assured me that there would be no discrimination and that he was waiting for a report on the subject. Is the minister yet in a position to give that report, and can he reassure us again that those who qualify will get the positions that become available and will not be cast out as derelicts because they are not bilingual?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, upon inquiry I discovered that the question related to two eligibility lists established as a consequence of competitions held by the Public Service Commission. The notes on the answer were to have been given to the House by the Secretary of State and unfortunately I have not got them with me. I am sure that the next time he is in the House he will give the answer.

Mr. Muir: Will the minister make it his duty to ensure that the minister he referred to will be in the House before the end of the session, before June 15?

Mr. Drury: I shall be glad to give that assurance, Mr. Speaker.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON POLICY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In the debate today on transportation policy, is the minister going to make the long awaited and often promised statement on Atlantic transportation policy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Wait and see, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question. I thought I would get a flippant answer to a serious question. I am going to sit in the House and see to it that the minister does make a statement. That answer did not surprise me at all, and it will not surprise the people of Atlantic Canada who are being sold short by the minister because he is not doing his duty.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a supplementary, but we should try as much as possible to reserve our fire for the debate which will start in a few moments.

Mr. Nowlan: My supplementary is very serious and sensible, but the answer the minister just gave indicates his frame of mind. The people of Atlantic Canada are being raped by the indecision and inaction of this minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is using up the rest of the time we have for the question period. Perhaps he might ask his supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: Will this statement, concerning which I have been told to wait and see, include a report on the further freight rate increase the Railway Association of Canada has announced will be filed with the Canadian Transport Commission on June 19? What is the minister going to do about that?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, out of all that verbiage the only thing I can make out to be a question is, what is the minister going to do about the announced freight rate increase. As the hon. member knows, the minister is not empowered to do anything about these freight rate increases.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been some discussion about the length of speeches in the debate today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might wait for just a moment until there is order in the House. The hon. member for Peace River might then make his comments on his point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion among the House leaders with regard to the length of speeches on the supply motion today. It has been suggested that we follow the terms of the Standing Order for the first speaker of our party, in whose name the motion stands, and for the first speaker on the government side in response. The first speakers of the other two parties would each have 20 minutes, pursuant to the rule. All other speakers will be allowed 15 minutes. It should be clearly understood that there will be no exception for anyone.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the hon. member for Peace River represents the arrangements to which we have agreed, especially that there be no overtime.

Mr. Speaker: If it is agreed, it will be ordered by the Chair that the debate be conducted on the basis mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River and agreed to by other hon. members. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP A NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY TO TAKE CARE OF PRESENT AND FUTURE CANADIAN NEEDS

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton) moved:

This House regrets that the government has failed to develop the National Transportation Policy, pursuant to section 3 of the National Transportation Act, and has failed to take measures to revitalize and rebuild Canadian transportation for present and future needs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, judging from the recent exchange between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan), it should be a very interesting debate this afternoon.

One of the most important issues facing Canada today is the development of a sound, co-ordinated, interrelated and forward looking transportation system. The future of Canada, politically, economically and environmentally, depends on it. The next 20 years will play a major part in deciding that future.

On September 1, 1966 when the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill introduced his new policy for transportation in Canada, he spoke in glowing terms of what it would mean for the future. According to Mr. Pickersgill, and this is recorded at page 7990 of Hansard for September 1, 1966, it was not his intention to scrap the basic corporate structure of the railways or any other form of transportation, but it was his intention, and I quote:

—to create a framework within which they can operate in a way which, in our view, will not only better serve the public—which is the main consideration—

I underline that.

—but which will also better ensure the Canadian treasury and the Canadian taxpayers against unnecessary and undue charges, and in some cases duplicated charges for duplicated services.

Unfortunately, the government has totally failed to develop a national transportation policy pursuant to section 3 of the National Transportation Act and has failed to rebuild and revitalize Canadian transportation in accordance with present and future needs. Section 3 of that act outlines the purposes of the new policy, which were to make the best use of all available methods of transportation and to co-ordinate them under terms, conditions and tariffs which would make them competitive and compensatory. In addition, the act was purportedly designed to ensure that all forms of transportation would be co-ordinated under tolls and tariffs and conditions which would not constitute an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between various points in Canada and which would not discourage the development of industry in areas where poor transportation presented a serious problem.

Mr. Pickersgill's opening statement on that date, as recorded at page 7995 of Hansard, drew attention to the manner in which the legislation followed the principles laid down by the MacPherson commission inasmuch as an attempt was being made to develop a policy in accordance with which the railways—and the railway companies were specifically mentioned in this case—would be required to perform their duties in the national or social interest. If these services could not be provided economically, losses would be paid largely from the public treasury. In other words—and here I quote directly what Mr. Pickersgill said—"We should not put the whole burden on the railways for continuing these services." It is because the government has completely failed to develop such a policy that I felt compelled to propose my motion today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Since Confederation, Canada's national transportation policy has concentrated on fostering political unity and on integrating regional and provincial economies. Originally our transportation system was developed with the object of covering vast distances, moving goods and people from one point to another, coast to coast, at a reasonable cost. Various federal governments since Confederation have concentrated on policies designed to equalize opportunities and benefits available in all Canada's provinces and regions. As this country continued to grow, its transportation problems increased. The simplistic notion upon which our transportation system was originally based is no longer valid. The federal government has failed to realize that in 1972, transportation in Canada takes on a different connotation. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not taken action with the future of Canada in mind when developing their transportation policy.

In order to play a major part in future development, transportation decisions must be based on public need rather than political expediency. Air pollution, highway and airport congestion, the swallowing up of valuable urban land by expressways and growing noise pollution, should all play major parts in any decisions relating to transport policy today. Unfortunately, the government has seemingly disregarded this concept, basing its policy decisions on an economic evaluation of financial profitability. This is a mistake, and current trends in transportation are a tragedy because the mistakes of the past are being perpetuated on an even larger scale.

The greatest problem arises through lack of direction on the part of the government, and it shows in the quality of passenger and freight transportation across this country. Transportation policy is unco-ordinated. Systems of air, rail and highway transport are not integrated and the government takes refuge in constitutional hassles to hide the fact that it has no answers. The most recent example, I suppose, was the conclusions arrived at by the Railway Transport Committee after its visit to southern Ontario. The longest hassle, I suppose, has occurred over the implementation of Part IV of the National Transportation Act.

A glaring example of lack of co-ordination in transportation policies can be found in the case of Air Canada. Here is a Crown corporation owned by, and supposedly designed to serve, the Canadian public. Yet it provides a haphazard service, often at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer in terms of time and money. I draw attention to the rapid deterioration in passenger reservation services throughout the system, the callous disregard for the welfare of in transit passengers and the reduction of services in areas where there is no competition, all of which provides ample evidence that Air Canada has placed profits above service to the public. For example, the Air Canada international service out of Newfoundland is costly, inconvenient and totally unfair. International flights leave Newfoundland from one point only, Gander, on Monday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday at the unreasonable time of 10.10 in the evening. If a person has to leave on a Saturday, for instance, he is forced to fly west to Halifax or Montreal to pick up an overseas flight. Thus, he is required to pay double the cost, because he flies over Newfoundland again.

A great many complaints have been made against Air Canada's inter-Canadian flights, especially the fact that in many instances it is possible to fly across the Atlantic for less than is charged to fly a similar distance in Canada. We have gone into this matter with Air Canada officials in committee, but as far as I am concerned we have never been given a satisfactory explanation of why it should cost a Canadian taxpayer more to fly in his own country than it does to fly overseas.

According to Mr. Yves Pratte, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer, the main problem is that the management of Air Canada does not know what the corporation's mission is in terms of service. Mr. Pratte appeared before the Transport Committee last spring. He was asked then to define Air Canada's role in relation to service to the public. At that time he said:

> The basic problem is for the government to define the role and mission of Air Canada. If that is defined I am satisfied we can do the job. But it is not up to us to decide what our role is. We may have ideas, we may have suggestions, but the role of Air Canada should be defined by the government within the parameters of their over-all policy.

Following that statement by Mr. Pratte, the minister was asked questions on the matter in the House. As reported in the Toronto Star of June 28, 1971, he said:

> We should like to give Air Canada a clear-cut mandate . . . but it is hard to be precise. I have been working on this for two years.

If that is not an indictment of the government for its lack of an over-all policy, I should like to hear some further explanation from the minister later.

What is the government's policy, if any? According to Mr. Dan Burtnick, legal counsel for the Province of Ontario, the federal government does not seem to have one. At a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on May 29, Mr. Burtnick said:

> The government of Ontario believes the passenger transport system in Ontario and in Canada cannot be developed on an ad hoc basis. It is our position that the future requirements for passenger transportation demand a co-ordinated approach to the supply of these facilities. We believe that until those requirements for a minimum passenger network have been determined, it is illogical to hear any applications for discontinuance. We further believe such an inquiry must be related to a co-ordinated study of the interrelationships of various other modes of available passenger transport.

I repeat that it is the responsibility of the federal government to supply the co-ordinated approach to transportation referred to by Mr. Burtnick. Unfortunately, there does not seem to be any definitive policy worth mentioning for Air Canada or for any other mode of transport either separately or in combination. Many times in this House as well as outside the House, we have asked for a clear cut delineation of the government's regional air carrier policy. To my knowledge that statement has not been forthcoming. We still find regions, such as the Atlantic area and parts of western Canada, where Air Canada has a virtual monopoly of services. Regional carriers are prepared to supplement these services, but under this government's policy—or lack of policy—they are not allowed to supply these supplementary services.

It seems as if the decision-making powers with regard to quality and quantity of Canadian transportation rest solely with the companies involved and provincial or municipal governments. Decision-making powers are diffused and transportation services, whether owned by the Canadian public as in the case of Air Canada and Canadian National Railways, or owned by private sources as in the case of CPR and various trucking companies, seem to be vying with one another to determine which will make the most profit at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. The result has been increased trucking rates, shipping rates, passenger rates, freight rates, again at the expense of the taxpayer.

I am not one to deny the railways and transportation companies the right to raise their rates to meet increased expenses brought on by new labour agreements and increased costs. But I do say that it is up to the government to develop a policy that will enable the railways to pay these increased costs and remain competitive, if necessary providing essential public services that are subsidized by the public treasury, as promised by Mr. Pickersgill and as outlined in the preamble to the National Transportation Act.

This principle may be difficult for this government to grasp, because its transportation policy seems to be geared largely to the profit motive. For example, when an application is made under the act, to discontinue passenger services, the frequency of passenger train services in any one day and the timing of that service is not subject to any control by the Canadian Transportation Commission unless it decides to take the initiative and order a certain frequency of service. In addition to that, as I have pointed out many times it is almost impossible to obtain a subsidy for a specific service unless you apply for total abandonment of the service. Again the emphasis is on profitability, as determined by profit and loss statements prepared by the railway's cost accountants—and there has been a great deal of criticism as to the validity of these statements—rather than on the social effects and hardships that will be caused by abandonment of passenger service. In short, not only has the federal government failed to develop a transportation policy of any consequence; it has also managed severely to compromise the little policy it has.

Transportation problems are becoming so critical that if they are not solved soon, and with a view to future requirements, they may become not only difficult to solve but impossible. Pollution and urban growth statistics bear this out. In Canada's major cities the car is responsible for about 60 per cent of the air pollution. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) does not like that statement, but unfortunately it is true. There were over 100 million cars and trucks in North America in 1970. By 1980 the number will rise to 180 million, which is some consolation for the hon. member for Vegreville. During peak traffic hours on main thoroughfares in metropolitan Toronto, concentrations of carbon monoxide ranged from 25 to 50 parts per million and sometimes as high as 150 parts per million. A recent Stanford University study has shown that the capacity of volunteers to perform normal work was severely reduced when concentrates of carbon monoxide of 50 parts per million were inhaled for as little as 79 minutes.

In 1921 less than half the population of Canada was urban. By 1966 the proportion was 73 per cent. By 1981 it is expected to reach 85 per cent, and by the year 2000 it is projected to rise to 94 per cent. In other words, nine out of ten Canadians in this country by the year 2000 are expected to be living in towns or cities. In 1966 the nine largest cities in Canada accommodated 40 per cent of the population. So we can see the rapid rise that will take place during the next 25 years. In fact, within the next 30 years it is expected that more than 50 per cent of Canada's population, some 61 million people, will be resident in 21 centres stretching along the St. Lawrence lowlands from Windsor to Quebec City. What plans has the federal government made to deal with this situation? If automobile use continues, how will the federal government deal with the results? If our cities continue to grow at the rate and in the manner that these statistics predict, what are the federal government's plans for transportation? At this time the federal government does not appear to have considered these facts, all of which are very, very appropriate.

S. A. Caria, former president of the American Transit Association, says that mass transportation is the only alternative to utter chaos in our metropolitan areas. To lift the siege by automobiles, he says, Public Transport must become so efficient, attractive and fast that motorists willingly abandon their cars in favour of it.

Dr. H. J. Holland, a professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, says that every mile a car travels costs society $1 in increased pollution, endangered health, traffic safety and changes in property values and land use. Yet many Canadian cities are adopting the same old programs and perpetuating the mistakes that have already been made by increasing the number of freeways to provide for more automobiles. But can we blame them? Or should we blame the federal government which has failed to set an example for them and which seems unconcerned about the problem?

Other countries are setting an example in the field of transportation systems. A Montreal Star press report dated January 4, 1972, indicated that the Japanese are constructing an all-new network of high speed railways and have authorized a parallel network of expressways to counteract Tokyo's air and automobile pollution. Thousands of miles of new rail tracks and roadways will be criss-crossing the countryside during the next few years and a new motor vehicle tax is expected to provide a considerable amount of finance with an expected annual yield of $425 million. The rest will come from bonds and loans. The government's policy, says the report, is to realize an opulent life for the people throughout the country, aided by a new national, integrated transportation system.

I realize that the problems in this country are not exactly the same as the problems in Japan. Certainly, Japan does not have the vast distances to overcome that we have. But I still think there is much more room for government planning in devising mass transportation systems in this country. I think passenger trains have long been recognized as the most efficient way of hauling large numbers of people over distances. Rather than having this spectacle to which I have referred, I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will be able to tell us of his plans for a transportation policy which will put the trains back on the rails and get passengers moving in the most economic and pollution-free way.

We do not have to go to Japan to examine the transportation system as there are many plans in existence in England, France and some of the northern countries which should receive the immediate attention of the federal government if Canada's transportation policy is to be one for the future. I should not want to accuse the government of not studying these plans as I know they have. I have heard from the minister before about what surveys have been made, but I suggest it is time to move a little faster in developing a coherent and comprehensive policy which will solve the problems of mass transportation in this country.

The present policy is not good enough. It is uncoordinated, and to a great extent it is ad hoc, piecemeal and irrelevant to today's world and its problems. It seems that on many occasions a decision is made to build an airport, and I will not get into that controversy, not from the standpoint of public service or economic value, but using political expediency as the main criterion. The federal government should begin immediately in co-operation with the provinces, municipalities, business, labour and the Canadian public to develop a national transportation policy taking into account pollution, environmental control, population growth and expansion. Unless the federal government is prepared to give this problem its attention now, Canada's present and future will be severely compromised.

I should like to add my support to the questions raised earlier by my colleague, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan). We in the Atlantic provinces have been promised a national policy for many years, and I hope the minister will say something about this in his reply. I hope he will have something to say about what is being done throughout the country to develop co-ordinated services and to do something about the downgrading of Air Canada services to Canadians. Perhaps he will tell us what we may expect in the way of relief from ever increasing freight rates, and I hope his statement will give us some assurance that his department is prepared to take action to make those principles envisaged by Mr. Pickersgill become at last reality.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) for setting out a number of questions which

I will do my utmost to answer as thoroughly as I can in the limited time I have available. I am sure he and hon. members will appreciate that this is one of the most complex subjects and, of necessity, a subject of this kind has to be dealt with to some extent at least in generalizations rather than in specifics.

I also have something of a problem as to the priority I give to the several approaches to this problem as they relate to what the hon. member has had to say, because I have heard the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) say that he would like me, quite understandably, to devote the majority of the time I have to the whole question of transportation policy as it relates to the Atlantic provinces. On the other hand I realize, as indeed the hon. member for Moncton has, that there are other issues and other questions which really ought to be dealt with in a debate of this sort.

Let me say at the outset that really what has been established by the hon. member for Moncton is the philosophical question which has been at the root of transportation problems in Canada for perhaps 100 years, or for as long, indeed, as there have been Crown corporations and other agencies of a similar nature which one Parliament after another has affirmed in a more or less independent role. It would be presumptuous of me to tell members with far greater experience than I in this House the history of these organizations, but the truth of the matter is that one government after another, and one political party after another of all political persuasions, have constantly reaffirmed that in so far as direct government intervention or even parliamentary intervention is concerned, that no doubt this was anathema in respect of what might be described, as it was today, an organization of corporations and agencies.

May I give three examples to illustrate what I mean. The hon. member referred, for example, to the Canadian Transport Commission. Some of us were members of the committee which heard the long evidence that led to the establishment of that commission. Some of us were members of this House when, in fact, the National Transportation Act was passed in 1967. Members will be aware of the very great fears which were expressed at that time that the Canadian Transport Commission would not remain what might be described as an at-arms-length organization and would not retain its quasi-judicial aspect, but might be subject to political or other undesirable pressures. Therefore, I have to call to the attention of the House the fact that there is a very clearcut distinction between those matters which can be dealt with by the Canadian Transport Commission under the authority granted to it by the act, and those matters in which I can become involved or the government can become involved, being matters of what might be described as national policy. As long as the National Transportation Act exists, it constitutes national policy in that particular field.

I do not presume today to comment in any detailed way on the propriety or otherwise of the judgments of the Canadian Transport Commission. I do want to point out a few interesting facts in respect of some of the commission's activities in the relatively few years in which it has been in operation. There appears to be an impression abroad, and here I am referring expressly to the work of the CTC and not to the railways, which I hope to deal with in just a few minutes, that the Canadian Transport Commission has had something to do with cancellation of passenger services. In spite of this impression, which appears to be widespread, the fact of the matter is that since the National Transportation Act took effect in 1967 only about 6 per cent of passenger train mileage in Canada has been discontinued, and this had involved less than 6 per cent of total passenger traffic. A great many hearings have been held and a great many recommendations in one form or another have been made, but in terms of actual passenger train mileage or passenger traffic which has been eliminated or discontinued in Canada, this constitutes something less than 6 per cent over all.

In the case of southwestern Ontario, to which the hon. member referred, it is again interesting to note that the commission did conduct an investigation of the operations in that region. The facts are well known to hon. members and to the public. The decision there came as the result of the fact it was shown that less than 20 passengers were being carried per train on that particular route. Here, once again, I am not going to argue the merits of this decision, or suggest whether it was a wise decision. I am simply pointing out that it was a decision in fact made by the commission entirely within its own responsibility, in which it was impossible in any way, shape or form for the government to have any influence even had it chosen to exercise it. But the hon. member did not say, and I should like to emphasize this, that there are in fact provisions which Parliament very wisely put into this bill which do apply and which have a wide variety of appeal procedures included in them. Several appeals, in fact have been lodged both in this case and in others and in most respects have been disposed of in what I believe to be a satisfactory fashion.

• (1530)

Without spending too much time on this particular point, let me re-emphasize the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission is an independent body deliberately created by this Parliament to carry on a particular function. The suggestion that in some way or other the government or the Ministry of Transport is derelict in its duty because of some judgment of the CTC with which some members may disagree is in fact a misinterpretation of the facts of the matter.

An hon. Member: Do they do a proper job?

An hon. Member: They do not.

Mr. Jamieson: The question arises whether they do a proper job and then another hon. member says "they do not". These are matters of opinion. I repeat that in cases where it is the judgment of any individual that an appropriate job has not been done, there are appeal procedures and these procedures can be instituted either through the Minister of Transport or the Governor in Council.

An hon. Member: The chairman is your good friend.

Mr. Jamieson: I can assure the hon. gentleman—in the event it was not heard he said the chairman is my good friend and what good would this do—that he should not be surprised if I say I resent most deeply that suggestion if it infers any misconduct on my part or on the part of the chairman of the Commission. I can assure him there is no such thing. There are very rare occasions upon which legitimate appeals against the findings of the Canadian Transport Commission have not in some way been dealt with, either through the Governor in Council or myself as Minister of Transport.

But as I said at the outset, we might also consider the other two elements introduced by the hon. member for Moncton which have to do with the role of Air Canada and Canadian National Railways. Here, once again, one can come back to the creation of Canadian National and read literally reams of declarations, but I think some of the wisest men who ever sat on either side of this House or represented any party in this House have constantly maintained a basic theme which continues in my judgment to be the view of the vast majority of the people of Canada; that is, that there should be a minimum amount of parliamentary intervention in respect of either of these Crown corporations and that there should be virtually no government intervention in the day-to-day operations of these corporations, except through the means provided by the Parliament of Canada, which of course in the case of Canadian National is in respect of only its operating and capital budget and in the case of Air Canada consideration of its capital budget. These are quite clear strictures and quite wise strictures which were placed long ago upon governments and parliaments dealing with these organizations.

The hon. member for Moncton made the comment that the chairman of the board of Air Canada indicated there was a need for a clear definition of the role of Air Canada in terms of its function as a Crown corporation and expressed his regret that the government or I had not been sufficiently precise. He was mildly critical of the fact that I said it took the best part of two years to define what that role was. The difficulty occurs simply because one has to walk an extremely narrow line between what constitutes government policy with regard to a Crown corporation, what constitutes the appropriate form or direction that should be given to a Crown corporation, and what constitutes interference. Having talked about the need for some definition of the role of Air Canada, the hon. member went on to demonstrate, perhaps better than I could, the kind of difficulty this creates. He talked about the reservations system and whether or not this should be changed. Is this something which should be written into the policy in respect of a Crown corporation? He talked about the levels of service being maintained in certain parts of the country. Is this a matter of policy? Is it appropriate that the government should say that services should be, for instance, increased or, conversely, whether some services should be decreased on a particular line?

I suggest it is indeed appropriate, as this Parliament has reiterated time after time, that it is not the role of the government and is certainly not the role of the Minister of Transport to indicate to either of these Crown corporations either one of these courses. Let me try to re-affirm or state what I believe it is appropriate to say in terms of the role of Air Canada. The government believes in the pre-eminent position of Air Canada as the major national carrier owned by the people of Canada and intends to see that this pre-eminence is maintained. I think the government is legitimate in seeing that adequate levels of service are provided for the people of Canada and that these services are on a par with those available in any other comparable area of the world; in other words, that Canadians are entitled to a very high level of service. Let me say parenthetically—and I believe there is adequate evidence to back this up—I believe Air Canada is today among the finest air lines in the world and that the great majority of Canadians are being served by Air Canada in a way comparable or better than people are served by the service provided in any other country of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: When I travel abroad I find it is only in other countries that one hears the kind of comment I have made now. Perhaps we are too close to the forest, in a sense, to see the trees. The truth of the matter, however, is that Air Canada and the CNR are held up by people in other countries as good examples of a standard of service the public should have and, secondly—this applies to Air Canada—that there is no better organization of its kind in the world and that it is one of the safest. From this point of view I can say this is part of the policy we ought to give to Air Canada. On the basic question, I would simply repeat that what we say today has been said from the days when Air Canada had its beginning as Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is essentially a profit-oriented airline. This is the way it must continue because if it is not profit-oriented in the sense that its executives and its board of directors have some goal of that nature toward which they can work, then of course much of the initiative and drive would go out of the organization. Surely, it has been proven consistently throughout the history of this country that any carrier of a Crown corporation nature that is not designed to achieve a profit will not be a very successful organization.

So, I repeat that this is not simply something being created as of today and that in terms of government policy it has been part of the role of Air Canada from the days when it was created as Trans-Canada Air Lines. This does not mean that Air Canada should make a profit on every single one of its operations, or in fact should be free under its own auspices to withdraw from a particular service or reduce a particular service. It simply means in the totality of its operation that its main objective should be to operate like any other corporation in like circumstances.

Having said that I believe that Air Canada, as a corporation owned by the people of Canada, has a special responsibility to the people of Canada to ensure that services are provided in regions which are not at all times profitable on a particular leg, on a particular run, or whatever the case may be. They do have this additional responsibility. I think it is appropriate for a Minister of Transport to say this in terms of declaring what are the goals and objectives of Air Canada. Given these broad perspectives—I have not dealt with the international field because of the matter of time—it is my feeling that the chief executives and board of directors of these corporations should continue to be free to make this decision. I suggest that if hon. members opposite really think about this matter deeply they will realize that this is a thoroughly responsible policy; otherwise, it would not have survived for as long as it has. The reason that it is sensible is surely that we do not want to have these two large corporations become what are in effect political footballs. The hon. member on one side of me talks about a lack of interference or a lack of direction for the CTC and for these other corporations, and yet the suggestion comes from another quarter that perhaps we are interfering too much. It is in trying to achieve this balance that the difficulty arises.

I want to be sure that I have enunciated the policy clearly. It is, (a) that Air Canada is the pre-eminent carrier in this country, owned by the people of this country, and with its main objective to operate for the benefit of the people of this country; (b) that Air Canada's basic motivation shall be to run at least on a break even basis and preferably to make a profit; (c) that it should not make a profit by giving Canadians something less than the best service that they could expect under comparable circumstances in any other country; and (d) that it does not have to make that profit on each one of its routes but simply in totality.

Mr. McGrath: (a) is in conflict with (d).

Mr. Jamieson: I am not certain that I would agree with the hon. gentleman. I said that (a) it is the pre-eminent carrier but that it is pre-eminent in its totality. I call his attention to the fact—and forgive me if I was not straight in my answer on it—that I am speaking now outside of the international sphere because in order to give a full dissertation on this subject I would have to say that the international routes are also quite important in the sense that they are what I believe makes (a) and (d) compatible. They are compatible because I hope we would have overseas routes that would help on some of these non-profitable domestic routes. In any event, I hope I have given enough here at least to indicate that these are the broad outlines of the policy, and that it is in trying to go beyond it that it is difficult to try to spell it out with any more clarity. I would be grateful to hon. members opposite if they were to indicate their views as to whether or not in fact it is appropriate for the government of this country or for a minister of the government of this country to go very much beyond what I have outlined in terms of giving direction to any one of these corporations.

Mr. Benjamin: It is a straw man.

Mr. Jamieson: Perhaps the hon. member will explain why it is a straw man when he speaks next.

I will go on to say that a third and major element in terms of the transportation complex to which the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) referred is the question of Canadian Pacific, with both its rail and air operations. Here, except for the normal regulatory restrictions, these are private corporations which are entirely free to do what they choose. This, of course, makes again for a very difficult circumstance in terms of trying to outline just where one fits in relation to the other. Hence my emphasis at the beginning on the fact that Air Canada is the pre-eminent carrier, and it is our intention to continue to look at it in that way.

I am sorry that time is moving by so fast, but I did want to touch briefly, before getting into the matter of transportation in the Atlantic provinces, on the whole question of regionals, and my hon. friend's continuing difficulty, which quite honestly I am not sure I understand, with getting our so-called regional air policy clear. The regional air policy was declared by me in August of 1968. It is quite specific and I can give the hon. member its rough outlines quite easily. They are, that there are five recognized regional air carriers in Canada stretching from west to east. I do not think I will take the time to go through them; my hon. friend knows them. Each one of them is given a geographical sphere in which it is assigned to operate, and it does so with one other proviso, that is that each one of these regional carriers is provided with access to a large metropolitan market.

Here it will be necessary, to illustrate my point, to name some of the airlines. There is Pacific Western which has Vancouver, for example. It also has Edmonton and Calgary, so that it is in a reasonably good shape in terms of having large centres of population. Transair which operates out of Winnipeg has access to Toronto. Nordair has been given a circle of routes which include access to, for instance, Ottawa and also one or two trans-border routes in order to give it a reasonably viable basis, and Eastern Provincial Airways and Quebecair each have Montreal. So, what we have sought to do has been to define geographically the area in which an airline would operate in a region and also to give it access to some major centre. I think hon. members will know that, by and large, the regional carriers have had within the last two years a major breakthrough in terms of their economic strength and viability and that now almost without exception they are equipped with jet aircraft. I am sure that my hon. friend from Newfoundland would agree that Eastern Provincial Airways has been improving steadily and is now on a par with virtually anything you could find anywhere.

An hon. Member: Give them more routes.

Mr. Jamieson: If we gave them more routes we would be doing so at the expense of Air Canada, for instance, because remember that Air Canada, being a free agent, also has a right to ensure that its route structure is viable. Therefore, it is the role of the CTC, when competition arises, to indicate which one ought to be given a particular route. Once again, I would wish to have time to go into great detail on this, but I notice that my time is passing and I would now like to turn to the question of the Atlantic provinces transportation.

No subject has had more discussion and, I suppose it can be said as well, more defence and criticism than the whole matter of transportation in the Atlantic provinces. On Tuesday of last week, I met with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in St. John's, Newfoundland. I think that the first paragraph of the release which the commission put out following that meeting sums up in a few lines what really constitutes the consensus, and the growing view within the Atlantic provinces, as to what the transportation policy in the Atlantic provinces should be. It calls upon the minister, in this case myself:

> . . . to state publicly that the principle underlying any new, modern and flexible transportation policy for the Atlantic region should be to lower the costs of marketing products manufactured in the region by de-emphasizing distance.

I would like to re-emphasize myself that the underlying principle should be to lower the costs of marketing products manufactured in the region by de-emphasizing distance, in other words, the groups to whom I speak in the Atlantic provinces—and by the way, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is, I am sure you will agree, a thoroughly reputable organization 50 per cent of whose members are appointed by the provinces and 50 per cent by industry, trade, commerce and the like in the area—have come to the conclusion that blanket subsidies, blanket support in whatever form, is not really the solution.

Here, as I undertook to do last week, I would ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to table the second report of the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Region Transportation. This report, which I will table when I am through with my remarks upon it, with your permission, indicates two new recommendations. But it might be as well if, before turning it over to the table, I read the first portion:

> The first report of the committee was submitted to the Minister of Transport in May, 1970.

As a basis for what has been described as this transportation policy, and the committee was set up to make recommendations to us in this regard, certain recommendations were made and certain things were done. These include the intra-regional subsidy available to both rail and highway transportation, which was put into effect so that trucking would be on the same level as rail transportation. We extended the same kind of help and assistance with regard to trucking on the ferry services to both Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. In fact, all of the recommendations that were made in the first report of the federal-provincial committee have been acted upon in a positive way. As far as I can determine at the moment, there is none of them not now in effect. Hon. gentlemen opposite are looking at each other in some surprise, but I do not really see anything in that first report that has not been acted upon.

For instance, beginning on October 1, 1970, a 17.5 per cent subsidy on intra-regional truck traffic was implemented, and in early 1971 the intra-regional rail subsidy became 17.5 per cent. Reductions of 25 per cent were introduced for the truck traffic rates on the Newfoundland ferry services, and reductions of somewhat less than this figure have been introduced on the Prince Edward Island service. These were the recommendations. These were acted upon. There were other events of significance which the committee also commented upon, and which related to the over-all policy which the premiers recommended, that is, a highway policy for the Atlantic provinces.

In 1971, we provided $60 million for highway construction within the Atlantic provinces. This, by the way, was a continuation of and an extension to other measures provided under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. So, it can be seen that we have significantly helped the region with regard to road networks, not only in the last two or three years but over the last ten years. The Council of Maritime Premiers announced standards for truck weight regulations, adopted a standard method of truck licensing, and introduced a standard bill of lading for the three Maritime provinces.

I turn now to the recommendations of the committee in this second report which I propose to table, and I will indicate my intentions with regard to them. I quote:

> With the two exceptions noted below, the committee is of the opinion that no serious problems have resulted from a reduction in the intra subsidy from 20 per cent to 17.5 per cent. The committee recommends that the next phase in the planned reduction to 15 per cent be allowed to proceed on April 1, 1972.

Some weeks ago, in fact in March, I announced in the House that I did not intend to accept that recommendation, and did not in fact reduce the subsidy by 2.5 per cent. I did this for two reasons. First, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to consult with the commission, and I did so last Thursday, with a view to seeing if two further objectives can be achieved in the Atlantic provinces, and I am now satisfied that they can be achieved.

For instance, it is our intention that this subsidy of 17.5 per cent or 15 per cent, whichever level it may be at any particular moment, will be paid to the shippers rather than to the carriers. In our conversations with the Commission last week I put it to them that we would like to get from them, and would be prepared to implement any proposal they would put forward, which provided us with an effective way of seeing that the shippers are paid this subsidy directly. This is a key point, Mr. Speaker. There are extreme difficulties connected with it. It is hard to figure out just exactly how the payments can be transferred to the shippers. Nevertheless we believe, and the Commission believes, it can be done. I have indicated my willingness to do just that, and we are prepared to do it on the basis of recommendations provided by the Commission.

A second and most important point, which is a reflection of what I believe to be a quite comprehensive policy, is the fact that we are moving toward something which is essential if we are to see sound industrial development in the Atlantic provinces. So far as I am aware the Commission has accepted an invitation which I extended to them, to come up with a plan with regard to selectivity in connection with certain forms of imports of items necessary to the manufacturing process in the Atlantic provinces.

For example, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of industries in the Atlantic provinces which have 75 per cent of the ingredients necessary for their manufacturing processes available in the area, and which have to import possibly 20 per cent or 25 per cent of their ingredients. I have said to the Commission that we would like to get from them, and will act on their recommendation, a scheme whereby a form of selective subsidy especially aimed at industrial development is provided for those raw materials which it is necessary to bring into the region. I have also stated that we are prepared to look at the extension of such a subsidy to water borne transportation, because often it is a bulk material which is involved and water borne transportation is the logical way to carry it.

Let me say, in case hon. gentlemen opposite from the Atlantic provinces may feel that all is lost, in the sense that nobody is thinking about these problems, that the committee was quite frank in indicating the basic problem was not one of dollars and cents in terms of expenditures. They recognized there had been extremely significant expenditures both on roads and highways and on various forms of subsidies—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the minister but his time has expired, and I believe the order made by the House was that no additional time be granted.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, two or three times in each session of Parliament the subject of Canada's national transportation systems comes before the House. Historically, for many years—

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is this a point of order?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. I appreciate the order made by the House, but during his remarks the minister did say that he hoped to table that second report of the federal provincial agency, from which I thought he was taking some of his remarks.

Mr. Speaker: That was my understanding also. The minister did ask that it be tabled at the end of his remarks. Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, for many years the problems of Canada's national transportation systems have remained pretty well the same. There has not really been any fundamental change in the problems, and I suggest there has not been any fundamental change in the cures or solutions put forward by either of the old line parties which have taken turns in governing the country for the past 100 years.

I want to say to the minister that there is no argument at all with him, or with anybody else, about Parliament, cabinet or himself interfering with the day-to-day operations of the railways and airlines in our national transportation systems. No one would suggest for one moment that this House, or he himself, should attempt to run the railways and airlines on a day-to-day basis. That has never been the question or the problem. That is why I say that that is a strawman. No one is suggesting that this minister or this government do that. What is at issue is that unless we have a fundamental change in the policies, in the framework within which our national transportation systems must function, then we will continue to have the problems we have now.

The minister speaks about the Canadian Transport Commission, and about how it has lived up to the requirements of the National Transportation Act. I do not doubt that for a moment. But, Mr. Speaker, that act was designed to militate against the best interests of Canadians in different regions. It was designed to militate in favour of something that the minister himself said was a profit oriented transportation system.

When one speaks of the CTC, one is reminded of the story about the skunk and the chickens. When you appear before the CTC and want a hearing, file an appeal, make an application on behalf of a railway or an airline, of course the Commission goes through all the formalities required by law. But it is something like what happens when a skunk gets into the chicken coop. The skunk takes several chickens back home to his family. When they get there the chickens say, "We want to lodge an appeal." The skunk says, "Fine. We will give you a proper hearing." The chickens then get a proper hearing, according to all the rules and regulations laid down by skunks, and at the end the chickens still get eaten.

The same thing applies when the CTC hears applications for the abandonment of rail lines and for the closure of agencies. Last winter scores of agencies were closed in western Canada. Even the personal representations and briefs, presented by members of this House and members of the other place to that august body, the CTC, were given short shrift. Within a matter of days the railroads were given the go ahead to close scores of agencies. In effect, Mr. Speaker, we were eaten again. I submit that until there is a fundamental change in the policy and the framework within which our national transportation systems operate, we will continue to have this problem.

Our country is 4,500 miles wide, is nearly 4 million square miles in area, but has only 22 million people, and yet we continue to put up with a transportation system that might work in a country one-quarter that size with at least ten times that population. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the geographic reality is that not only are we that large in size and small in numbers, but we refuse as a nation to face up to the other reality. We are a northern nation and seem to be incapable of acting accordingly. We build roads, houses and automobiles meant for one or two thousand miles south of here. We operate transportation and communication systems that still cannot cope adequately with our geography and climate. One could cite all the defects of rail transportation through the Rocky Mountains this past winter. To hear the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) talk, one would think that this was the first winter we ever had rock or snow slides. Our transportation system is incapable of coping with our geography.

In so far as transportation is concerned, we are a nation that has succumbed to economic rules and conventional practices that other nations gave up a long time ago. We continue to abide by these rules and practices whose example and history neither meet our needs nor suit the requirements of a northern country as vast and thinly settled as Canada. If we are to remain a united country because we can communicate easily and cheaply from one end of it to the other—without "Ma Bell"—United because we can transport our people in terms of numbers and costs that any Canadian can afford, united in that we can move goods from Halifax to Vancouver at freight charges that apply equitably to all Canadians, then one of the first priorities for a united and independent Canada has to be a publicly owned, financed and operated transportation and communications system.

This means for example, Mr. Speaker, a stove manufactured in Nova Scotia, laid down in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Regina or Vancouver will contain in its selling price the same freight charges. It is lunacy to continue to advocate industries, particularly manufacturing, for the maritimes or the prairies or rural Quebec that cannot compete with industries, manufacturing or any other kind, that have the geographic and transportation advantages of being located on the outskirts of Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. What I am suggesting here, Mr. Speaker, is a form of equalized freight rates or subsidized rates to a greater degree than we now have, or a combination of both.

Even more important is how we are able to transport people within our nation. Surely, it betrays some kind of national schizophrenic tendency or death wish when it is made cheaper for a Canadian to fly from Montreal or Toronto to Europe than from Halifax to Vancouver or Newfoundland to British Columbia. How ridiculous, and embarrassingly so, we have to appear in our own eyes when our national air system can offer us economical excursions to the southern U.S.A. or the West Indies or Mexico, in mid-winter and yet cannot offer the same kind of cheap fares into the northern parts of six of our provinces in summer or winter, or, if they did, could not accommodate us once we got there. If one were trying to get a job, going to see a loved one, or just getting to know our country and our fellow Canadians better, whatever it might be, our transportation system would almost be a handicap.

To accomplish or even approach these goals we must first, as a nation, radically revise the National Transportation Act which perpetuates criteria that are not only outdated but have never met the requirements of the people in a northern nation as large and thinly settled as ours. To be more precise, the Transportation Act is responsible for the uncertain future of passenger service in this country and, in my opinion, it seems to have been deliberately designed to encourage the railways to get rid of their passenger trains. The railways want to abandon passenger service—they have made no bones about it—and to do so they have only to prove to the satisfaction of the Canadian Transport Commission that the service is losing money to get a ruling either that abandonment can be proceeded with, or that it cannot, in which case the government will subsidize losses to the extent of 80 per cent.

The bias in the act is clearly in favour of discontinuance. It implicitly discourages the railway from looking beyond its profit and loss statement in determining passenger policy by making it impossible to obtain a subsidy on a service without applying to abandon it. The act puts the emphasis on the strictly "economic", meaning profitability, as opposed to the broad social effects of abandonment. The Transportation Act places emphasis on profitability in our transportation systems—with service to the public and fulfilment of Canada's transportation needs receiving only minor consideration, if any at all.

Policies of successive governments in this country have been outdated, fragmented and short sighted. The major flaw in present policy and law is the continuing application of the "free enterprise", competition and profitability criteria to the operation of our national transportation and communication systems. Mr. Speaker, I have said this before in this House and I make no apology for repeating it. Railroads, airlines, telecommunications are all essential public services and, consequently, are public utilities, yet we continue to operate a system where profitability is the over-riding consideration when arriving at the kind, quality, frequency and efficiency of our various transport systems. Railways and airlines are necessary services, which puts them in the same category as streets sidewalks, sewer and water systems, or our postal system. No one, not even a raving "free enterpriser" would suggest that sewer and water systems, or streets, sidewalks and highways should make a profit, or that there should be competition in these areas. They are essential public services, meeting basic public needs and the public is willing to pay for those services both directly and indirectly.

Attempts in recent years to get our postal system to the point where it "pays its own way", to quote a late and unlamented minister, ended in a debacle witnessed by every member of this House. But that was an excellent example of how the application of so-called "free enterprise" concepts to essential public services not only does not work, but does a disservice to our country and our people. We in the New Democratic Party believe we must have policies and laws that put service before profits in the area of transportation. We believe that since our national transportation systems are an essential public service, they should be publicly owned and operated.

It is as ridiculous to continue operating our national rail and air transportation systems with competing railways and airlines as it would be if we had two or three competing water systems under our streets, or two or three competing post office companies. With three or four exceptions, railways all over the world lose money on passenger business, or on all their operations, whether they are publicly or privately owned. But in a number of countries, notably France, where the railway is publicly owned, they have been concentrating on the upgrading of passenger services, and are being rewarded with increasing numbers of passengers. While France and many other countries subsidize their railways, their people enjoy fast, modernized, frequent passenger service at modest fares. In Canada we lose both ways, we subsidize our railroads and receive ever-decreasing service for our money.

I have received a publication, Mr. Speaker, as I trust all other hon. members have, called France Actuelle which is published by a private association of French businessmen. It does not come from some of the hard-nosed socialists or radicals who want to nationalize everything. In the issue of November 1, 1971, an article on the front page reads:

> The French now take it for granted.
> But American and other foreign visitors since the situation in their own countries seems so otherwise, almost always remark with astonishment and pleasure on France's modern railroad system and equipment, with their high speeds in safety, cleanliness, comfort, excellent moderate price meals en route and general superior service.

Further on the article reads:

> The French, although born gripers, complain very much less about the service they get on their state-owned and operated . . .

railroad system than the American public does about the quantity and quality of service it gets (or doesn't get) from some of the privately owned and operated ... railroad lines in the United States.

And further on:

The French railroad service does not pay its way—no nation's railroad system does. In 1969, the French railroads "lost" $354.8 million—compared, for instance, to the Italian railroads' 1969 deficit of $504 million, and the Japanese railroads' $453 million.

• (1610)

However, Mr. Speaker, those losses were paid by those nations as a whole. As a result of the public paying, both through fares and subsidies, they receive superior, fast, efficient and comfortable passenger service. The record of these operations, compared to the dismal showing we make in our nation, should cause us to take a more serious look at the kind of national transportation policies we have.

A number of steps must be taken to start putting our transportation system in a situation where Canadians in all parts of the country will get fully modern, efficient, integrated transportation services at fares and rates that are more equitable, and that they can afford. I would like to suggest a few changes.

First, we should make basic changes in our transportation policy and legislation that would put service and meeting transportation needs ahead of profitability. As long as the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) advocate that Canadian National Railways and Air Canada should operate on the basis of profitability first, we will continue to have the kind of service we have had and it will get worse. As long as we continue to treat both Canadian National Railways and Air Canada unfairly in terms of private competition, they will continue to have the difficulties they now have and they will get worse. While I am not one of those who advocate state ownership of everything, I submit and the New Democratic Party believes that in the areas of transportation, essential public services and utilities, private enterprise has no place. In fact, it is inefficient and cannot meet all the transportation needs of any nation. We not only have the evidence of that in our country, but in scores of others. There is no need or place for private enterprise in our railway system or in our airlines.

The National Transportation Act needs to be amended to ensure service and the meeting of transportation needs must take priority over profitability. Unless we make that reversal in our present policy, regardless of what the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) might say, I submit these problems cannot be solved by continuing on the same track we have been on since 1867.

My next point covers an amendment that I will be moving. My colleagues and I have considered this very carefully. We do not in any way want to detract from the motion of the official opposition, but I submit that this amendment will merely be an addition to their motion. We hope it will point out one area in which the government and Parliament of Canada should move, that is to bring under public ownership the Canadian Pacific Company. I deliberately refer to in it that way because I understand that is now the official name of its railway and subsidiary operations. Only in this way can a change in the priorities of the CPR be brought about. This issue has been before Canadians for many years, and it has been a policy proposal of our party since the early thirties. That policy was accepted by our party in 1933. This reminds me of the time in the early thirties when there was talk about taking over the CPR. A farmer asked the CPR station agent for the time. The agent said "It is three o'clock CPR time." The farmer said "My God, do they own that, too!" That octopus needs to come under the ownership and control of the Canadian public.

We have a number of other proposals. If I had more time, I would elaborate on them. One in particular would be removing the financial handicap of the CNR by having the government take over the nearly $2 billion long term debt, making the government a full shareholder on behalf of all Canadians and relieving the CNR of this heavy interest load.

Another proposal would be to bring about by stages, to as great a degree as possible, equalization of rail and air passenger fares and freight charges. Other proposals are putting an end to any further eroding of Air Canada routes and fully integrating a publicly owned CP Air into the present Air Canada system. Why do we need five regional carriers?

In view of these remarks and the remarks which my colleagues will make, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and further, as a step toward meeting this end, the House calls upon the Government to give consideration to the introduction of legislation providing for the public ownership of the Canadian Pacific company, including its railway and ancillary operations, with the objective of providing Canadians with efficient, integrated rail, air, water, communications and interprovincial trucking systems that give priority to service over profit."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. After looking at the amendment and Section 3 of the National Transportation Act, which is referred to in the amendment, I am prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member. Unless hon. members wish to express a different opinion, I will allow the amendment to be put.

Mr. Steven Otto (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas), who moved this motion, had in mind the type of transportation policy recommended in the amendment moved by the hon. member by Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I am sure the Conservative party did not intend this motion to include the nationalization of the CPR. Indeed, if it went no further, I imagine someone from the New Democratic Party would move that the whole kit and kaboodle come under the Saskatchewan government and that would be the death of the whole works, considering the experience with nationalization in that province.

The minister stated that the purpose of the act and the policy is to ensure that the railways operate with a profit motive. I am not so sure that they have operated with a profit motive. Indeed, if we examine the CNR over a period of years and the accumulated debt. I do not think we could say that there was much profit involved. It shows a fault not only in the people of Canada, but the railways, which could be referred to as a sort of tunnel vision.

One hundred years ago it was said that we must have a railway connecting this great country from coast to coast. In exchange for this railway, the government of the day said, "we will give you all kinds of goodies, including land, oil rights and timber limits." This was an enticement. I wonder how many of us have considered the change in the structure and emphasis that is now necessary after 100 years to the Railway Act and the structure of the CNR and the CPR.

Originally it was the intention of the government to put in a line at any cost, and at that time it was a great undertaking. But today we need to re-examine the role of the railway companies, to re-define their obligations and their privileges. Consider what happened only 50 years ago. Canada stood, then, in a very favourable position. The new, developing nations had been able to accumulate little capital. Germany, Japan, great nations now, were either in a turmoil politically or lacked the capital resources necessary to enable them to compete with us, so close to the United States with our relatively advanced techniques. Rail transportation was therefore not so important as far as we were concerned. We could set profitable rates and still enjoy a competitive edge over our rivals.

That picture has changed. Under the Marshall Plan after the world war, and on a continuing basis through international development funds since then, we, together with other countries have provided capital and techniques to less developed countries with the result that nations which are small or which enjoy a favourable geographical transportation area can outbid us and outprice us. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) spoke about Japan. That is, of course, a small country; a plant established anywhere in Japan might as well be on the seacoast. Hon. members all know that if we set up a plant, say, in Winnipeg it is a long and costly affair to send the goods to the coast to compete with countries which enjoy easier access to the sea—and transportation by water is still the cheapest form of transportation and will probably continue to be so for a long time.

In Germany a plant can be established 180 miles up the Rhine from Wilhelmshaven. But what happens? The barges are owned by the government, the barge masters are paid by the government and the charge levied against firms for bringing their goods down to the seacoast amounts to pfennigs, a few cents per ton. In other words, because of the geographical course of the Rhine every industry in Germany might as well be right on the seacoast. This is what is happening in the world today and we, as a member of the United Nations and as a contributor to the International Development Fund are supporting the new nations and equipping them to compete against us. However, under the GATT Agreement there is a sanctimonious idea that we dare not take any new tangent to solve our transportation difficulties and place us in at least a competitive position equal to that of other nations.

As a result of this tunnel vision which the railways have exercised, along, to an extent, with a great number of other Canadians, there is a good deal of hesitancy about subsidization, or, more generally, about approving government interference with the conduct of the railways. All of us need to re-examine this question and ask ourselves whether the Transport Commission is fulfilling the role which Parliament assigned to it, whether the role of the commission should be re-defined, and whether the whole of the transportation Act might not be revised so as to re-define the purpose of the railways. We might ask ourselves whether automation ought not to be considered. Right now we are following a vicious circle. Despite all the yearning among hon. members opposite for a new policy on the part of the companies, the minute railway managements introduce a newer system we find the work force backing off and saying: we shall lose our jobs. So it is a vicious circle. The companies are saying: these lines ought to be abandoned, but if they are continued the government will subsidize them.

We might further ask ourselves whether there is room for the railway companies to provide transportation within metropolitan areas. If the hon. member for Moncton was correct in predicting that in a few years 94 per cent of the Canadian people will be living in the cities and that most of the goods will be produced and consumed in the cities, what will the railways do? Outside the urban areas they will have no purpose at all. So we should consider whether or not the railway companies—any overland transportation—can find a useful place within metropolitan city structures. My feeling is that following a redefinition of the whole purpose and obligation of railways and intercity, metropolitan involvement should be part of their role.

It is obvious that if the railways lose money—and they are losing money on their transportation services—they will become increasingly involved in the business of hotels, office buildings, oil wells, minerals, exploration companies and so on. But is this really fulfilling the function they were authorized to fulfil? The companies say if they are losing money on railways they have to find the money somewhere else. Unfortunately, it is not very practical to use profits earning in one direction to cover substantial losses in another. It does not make sense. This is why I say we should redefine the function which the railway companies should perform.

For example, I have no doubt that bearing in mind the subsidy we are providing to both railway companies, and the opportunity for availing ourselves of new techniques, including automation we could send every person in this country anywhere he wants to go in Canada, and ship every ounce of material or manufactured goods across this country free of charge. Taking into account the fantastic subsidies we are providing and the room which exists for the introduction of new techniques and methods, I believe we could probably, for a nominal amount, provide a free transportation system throughout Canada. It would then be possible, say, for Winnipeg, Edmonton or the northern areas of Ontario, to produce goods which could be sold competitively with goods produced in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. In these circumstances we might witness a reversal of the growth of the metropolitan areas to which the hon. member for Moncton referred. If people could do the same kind of work outside a metropolitan area, and if transportation difficulties were minimal, they would hesitate before moving into the big cities. It might be that a change in our thinking with regard to overland transportation would bring about a halt in this movement toward larger and larger cities with all the problems that arise from them.

• (1630)

The hon. gentleman spoke about France and its wonderful transportation system. There is no reason why our railways could not provide a good transportation service in metropolitan areas as a substitute for automotive traffic—the great headache. The hon. member of the NDP will realize that the reason people use a car is that they are willing to pay for the extra square footage they receive and for the comfort. If you provide a substitute system you must also provide the same comfort. It is not enough to say that during the rush hour people must hang on to a strap because trains are crowded. This is why people prefer to take their own car. However, if you tell people that they can have a compartment, then they will pay for it.

Mr. Benjamin: You want to crowd the roads instead.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member opposite who made that remark said that this would not be fair, that people want equality. In other words, they all want to be crowded. We must discover why it is that people travel by car. Then we should introduce a new railway system, be it a monorail system or some other type. We should give the railways increased rates or whatever it is, but they should then be obligated to provide a service that the people will use. This means research must be done. They cannot finance this research out of their present earnings because they do not have any. The railways did introduce a new turbotrain running between Montreal and Toronto; they lost a little money, it did not work perfectly and so they forgot about it. Within the structure of the transport department there are facilities and money for research. We should emphasize to the railways that we will give them the money that is required to introduce a more efficient system.

In conclusion, since my time is almost up, may I say that if the motion had been phrased in this way, that the Canadian people should consider a new role for the railways, then it would have been acceptable to me. But I do not think you can blame the government for having the same type of vision that all Canadians have, and I include the hon. member.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, may I briefly refer to the first part of it, which reads:

> This House regrets that the government has failed to develop the National Transportation Policy pursuant to section 3—

Section 3 of the act provides:

> It is hereby declared than an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation—

—be established. That act was passed in 1967 but the government has done very little to provide the leadership necessary for an adequate transportation system in all parts of Canada that makes the best use of all modes of transportation. This is what I will attempt to prove in the 15 minutes available to me, which is a very short space of time.

Mr. Otto: The act also says an "economic" transportation system.

Mr. Horner: An economic, efficient and adequate system to serve the people of Canada. We have a population of 22 million stretched across the country a distance of 4,500 miles. This is why we need an adequate system. An economic and efficient system might mean one rail line running between Montreal and Toronto. Such a line would be economic and it would be efficient, but would it be adequate for a country the breadth of ours? No, it would not, and this is the point I want to make.

What has been done to develop the port of Churchill? Certainly, not very much, yet much grain could be moved out of that port. A lot of grain out of what might be called the central prairies could be moved through the port of Churchill at about 11 cents a bushel saving to the prairie farmers. This year the price received by the farmer for his wheat has been the lowest in the last ten years. In 1969 wheat tonnage going through the port of Churchill amounted to 656,000. In 1970, it amounted to 738,000 tons and in 1971 it was down to 617,000 tons, in round figures. Has the government been encouraging importation of goods through that port? Not very much! Has the government established larger warehousing facilities at the port of Churchill to handle other produce coming into that port for what might be called the central prairies? No, it has not.

Mr. Otto: What about Vancouver?

Mr. Horner: I will come to Vancouver in a moment. Has the government established a longer insurance period for grain moving out of and through the Hudson Strait? No, it has not. The government did encourage some international insurers to take a look at the port, but nothing came of it. The government has not provided any leadership to develop this port.

Much has been said about modes of transportation, yet section 3 of the act has not even been implemented. That section refers to the trucking industry, and whether that industry can compete favourably with the railways on the prairies. Under section 3 of the act, regulation of all modes of transportation will not be of such a nature as to restrict the ability of any mode of transport to compete freely with any other mode. We all know that under the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, which was passed in this House in 1954, there are all kinds of restrictions on trucking companies in the provinces that inhibit them from competing favourably with the railways. Some interesting figures have come to light recently regarding feed grain assistance given the trucking industry in the province of Quebec.

I have before me the Canadian Livestock Feed Board annual report, in which table 15 clearly outlines that from Thunder Bay to Chicoutimi the rate for rail transportation of feed grain was 92 cents per hundredweight in 1967. Since feed grain assistance was given to trucking firms, the rate has progressively gone down, until in 1971 it was 55 cents a hundredweight. The rate from Thunder Bay to Ottawa in 1967 was 73 cents per hundredweight, but this rate has also progressively gone down until in 1971 it was 41 cents per hundredweight, and this purely because of competition.

We have not progressed one little bit in implementing section 3 to bring about greater competition on the prairie provinces. Let us look at the recently announced statement of the government regarding diversifying rail movements to the west coast. The government announced in the House, with all the fanfare that it could muster, that it was going to spend $5 million in developing the port of Prince Rupert. I should like to quote from the committee proceedings No. 9 for Thursday, May 25 last. As reported at page 9:63 I asked this question:

> I would like to question you briefly on the concept of the $5 million for Prince Rupert. This is a very worthy project and so on and so forth. What disturbed me about the announcement is that tagged along with it came the statement that we would invite suggestions as to how to develop this port.

I suggest the government might just as well have said that it was going to spend $100 million—which might have got a few more votes on the Prairies—because the government does not even know how to spend $5 million. Eventually, the government well might. In reply, the minister said:

> On the question of the $5 million, basically my conception of that is that it would probably be used in the first instance, if it was deemed to be clearly necessary—in other words, if conditions proved it—probably to increase the bulk loading, and especially the grain handling facilities in Prince Rupert.

So, the minister is saying that the $5 million would probably be used if it was deemed to be clearly necessary. He does not know whether it will be clearly necessary. At the time of the government's announcement, the port of Vancouver was in great difficulty as a result of snow problems in the Rockies. The minister thought that the best way to divert shipments would be to suggest development of the port of Prince Rupert. He threw out the political bait of $5 million for Prince Rupert, and then admitted he had no idea how to spend it. Then, he continued:

> But in other words, if there is a demand for more grain storage at Prince Rupert, then the funds have been allocated so that that grain storage can be provided.

It is the old question of which comes first, the chicken or the egg. Do you provide facilities at Prince Rupert or do you wait until that port is cluttered up with grain, then acknowledge that grain is being shipped out there and that another port, a dock or storage facility should be built? This has been my complaint in respect of the government of the day in the field of transportation. It has failed to provide leadership. It is not good enough to say we will spend $5 million, the government must say it will spend $5 million for this thing, that thing and another thing. The government must say it wants the railroads to move grain to that port and commodities from that port.

When we are dealing with Pacific rim countries we must remember that Prince Rupert is closer to those countries than the Port of Vancouver and other ports on the west coast. What is the situation in Prince Rupert? In 1962 and 1963 the government built elevator storage there at a cost of $620,000. Government expenditures there have gone downward sharply in each year since then, to the point that last year only $57,000 was spent by the federal government. This does not really encourage much development at that port. There is one major storage facility for grain with a facility to load ships for grain and one for general material such as lumber and so on. The Prince Rupert port is relatively open to storms originating in the Pacific Ocean. Perhaps the government could spend part of its money building more facilities there for the handling of grain. It should also encourage railway companies to use that port.

What has the government done in respect of grain handling facilities at the Port of Vancouver? In 1967, the federal government spent $17 million or $18 million at that port, and its expenditure has gone down since then to $6 million last year. In comparison, federal government expenditures have been in the area of $19 million to $20 million for the last four or five years at the port of Montreal. The Department of Transport has suggested it will develop a new concept called a user$ concept. What has happened in respect of traffic in Vancouver as compared to traffic in Montreal? The traffic in Vancouver has sharply increased and it is now handling 27 per cent of all tonnage in and out of Canada.

Mr. Deachman: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I notice the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) applauding. Let me remind him that the government of which he is a party member has sharply curtailed its expenditures at that port. Let me remind hon. members of the competition that the Port of Vancouver has from that port to the south, namely Seattle. I am sure the hon. member is aware that Seattle has developed its port to the point it now has 10 or 11 containerization facilities, while Vancouver is in desperate need of a second containerization facility. Because Vancouver does not have the facility, it is continually losing trade to the Seattle port. It is cheaper for Japanese goods to come into Seattle by containerization, where they are handled quickly and efficiently and moved to western Canada or central Canada. If you talk to the people in the Vancouver Port Authority, you will find this out for yourself.

I was pleased to note the other day that the government intends to contract for the construction of 2,000 hopper cars. I referred to this need in a speech I made in respect of transportation of March 8, and I am pleased to see that some of my suggestions are being accepted. We have another problem in respect of our rail system throughout Canada. Much of our Prairie rail line is up for abandonment, and our second and third lines cannot handle a full hopper car because of the weight of our trackage. Most of these lines can handle only a 2,000 bushel car, but a hopper car can carry 3,000 bushels. There is not much point in building hopper cars if the trackage is not heavy enough to carry them fully loaded. Has the government clearly enunciated a policy of upgrading our secondary rail lines to handle maximum loads before allowing main line abandonments? I suggest it has not, but this should be done.

There has been a great deal of talk about the concept of Crowsnest Pass rates and how terrible they really are, but even some members of the Liberal party from western Canada admit there is a problem. It has been suggested the railway companies are not making enough money and that is why they are not interested in handling grain. I have often said, as have other hon. members, that there is no Crowsnest Pass rate in respect of the movement of cattle. Last fall the companies did not look after that business very well. There were reports of cattle cars arriving in eastern Canada with as many as 10 or 20 head of cattle dead or dying because of the poor handling by both railways, the CPR and the CNR. There was no freeze on freight rates and there have been seven or eight freight rate increases since the 1967 National Transportation Act came into effect.

What is the situation in respect of Crowsnest Pass rates and are the railroads losing money? It is interesting to make a comparison of those years in which the railroads moved the most grain for export, particularly as to the profit and loss picture. In 1966, the railroads handled a record amount of grain for export, some 815 million bushels. The CPR's profits were never higher. They had a net profit of $50 million on freight that year. If the railway was losing money moving grain and handled twice as much as they normally handle, one would expect their profits to be down, yet in 1966 the profits were higher than in any of the 10 previous years. What is the case as far as the CNR is concerned in the movement of grain? Before the interest on debt is taken into consideration, in other words the net operating profit or loss picture of the CNR for 1966, the profit was $24 million. That profit has not been higher in any one of the previous 10 years.

In 1971 the estimated movement of grain, that is barley, wheat and other grains for export, was 800 million bushels, nearly equal to that for the year 1966, yet in that year the CPR showed a profit of $45 million while the profit for the CNR in the same year was $21 million. In 1970, the CPR's profits were $38 million and the CNR's profits were $14 million. One could go back over the years, but I am hitting the highlights to point out quite clearly that the argument that they are losing money in the movement of grain on Crowsnest Pass rates is wrong. If they were losing money, then the more grain they moved the lower their profits would be, and that is not the case.

I see my time has nearly expired and you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker, so I thank you for this opportunity of expressing my feelings.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this discussion of our national transportation policy. There is a pressing need in Canada for some major changes in our over-all approach to transportation problems. As an important trading nation in both industrial goods and raw materials it is absolutely essential that our national transportation system provide quick and cheap access of goods and people to every part of our nation.

Canada needs an integrated transportation policy which would take into consideration the four major means of transport; air, rail, road and water. The lack of an adequate policy and program by the present government is apparent in all fields of transportation. Our rail service for passengers and all types of goods is anything but satisfactory. Discriminatory regional freight rates are allowed to exist in our country and nothing is done to remedy the situation.

Moves are being made by the B.C. government and certain economic interests to siphon off part of the coal haul in the east Kootenay area to a United States railway line. Again, there is silence and lack of federal policy and direction on what could become a major communication problem in every part of Canada. The building of the Kootenay and Elk railway should be blocked by the federal government, if necessary by an amendment to the Railway Act. In addition, this government should lay down a national transportation policy which would ensure that goods and materials for shipment or export would be carried wherever possible over our own Canadian communications system. I should like to give in more detail the serious economic effect which the building of the Kootenay and Elk railway would have not only on the economy of the Kootenay area but on the economy of Canada in general.

If this type of railway construction can be licensed provincially, then something is seriously wrong with our Railway Act. This contemplated railway cannot in any sense be classed as a provincial railway. It is merely an appendage to a United States railway called the Burlington Northern, and should be wholly under federal jurisdiction. The building of the Kootenay and Elk railway has been backed by the Social Credit government of British Columbia and by the previous Social Credit government of Alberta. Both governments sent legal counsel to the Canadian Transport Commission hearing in Ottawa in the fall of 1970 to back up the case presented by the Kootenay and Elk railway.

It is difficult to understand why any provincial government would take such a stand in view of the serious economic effect the loss of jobs and income would have on the general economy of the area. If an alternate route to the Pacific coast were required it could and should go over the existing Kettle Valley line which closely parallels the United States border. This line should be upgraded and used as an alternate route for the coal haul and as a possible return route for the empty coal trains. There is no need for further sellouts to foreign transportation systems, for the existing rail facilities in the area can handle the present coal haul and also any increase in future exports.

Right from the start the Kootenay and Elk railway was never intended to be a provincial railway in the true sense of the word. It was a scheme to establish a competitor to the CPR for the transportation of coal from the east Kootenay coal fields to the Pacific coast via an United States railway line. It was never intended to be a wholly intra-provincial railway because it was not to operate as a common carrier. It was not to have any rolling stock or equipment of its own. That would all belong to the Burlington Northern.

What a ridiculous situation it is for the government of British Columbia to claim that this could possibly be a provincial railway. It is nothing but an appendage to a United States railway system and as such should be wholly under the control of the federal government. As Chief Justice Hall pointed out in the recent decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada, no one disputes the jurisdiction of the province of British Columbia in incorporating a railway to operate wholly within its boundaries, but it is equally clear that the province has no jurisdiction to incorporate a railway which is, in its inception and concept, international in character. He goes on to say when the application to incorporate the Kootenay and Elk Railway was made the incorporators knew that it was to be an appendage to be used entirely so far as international rail traffic was concerned.

I should like to deal with several of the economic aspects of this particular Kootenay and Elk railway and point out how it could severely affect the whole transportation policy of Canada. It seems to me, if the federal government intends to allow the building of a small spur line in one province, such as we see in respect of the Kootenay and Elk railway, and allow it to haul bulk cargo, in this particular case coal, down to the United States border and over a United States communications system to the Pacific coast, then there is nothing to stop similar lines being built in every province of Canada. What, for example, is there to stop another link being built in a prairie province or in all the prairie provinces to connect with a United States railway line to the south so that Canadian wheat could be hauled to eastern or western points. What would stop a similar link being built to carry bulk cargoes of potash over United States railway lines? All I need mention in so far as the interior of British Columbia is concerned, is that there is nothing to stop tens of thousands of cars of lumber going down these spur lines into the United States when in my frank opinion the cargo should be hauled over our existing communications system. This would not only affect the province of British Columbia. It would affect the entire transportation system of Canada.

We find that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the federal government have kept mighty mum in respect of this particular rail link. The position our party has taken, which I strongly endorse, is that we should stop the building of the Kootenay and Elk railway, even if this means amending the Railway Act in order to make certain that construction does not go ahead. Very recently the Corporation of the City of Revelstoke, a number of other municipalities and organizations in our area, and in fact in the whole interior of British Columbia, have been sending briefs to the Transport Commission, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the Minister of Transport, and, of course, to their local M.P. in opposition to the building of the Kootenay and Elk railway. They know what will happen. Every unit train which is diverted south of the border will mean that 60 or 70 Canadian jobs will go down the drain. In a time of high unemployment we are fed up being faced with the possibility of a further erosion in the employment picture so far as the whole Kootenay area is concerned. This is what is disturbing these people. It is not a case of them being selfish or greedy. They realize jobs mean a large payroll in the communities in which they live.

We and the people in these communities are aware of the severe economic loss which will take place in respect of Canadians generally if this line is allowed to go ahead. There is another aspect of this which I believe I must draw to the attention of members of this House. I am not thinking merely in terms of jobs so far as Canadian railway workers are concerned. I am thinking of jobs related to this whole matter of diverting trade to a foreign railway line. If the Kootenay and Elk railway is built, the sponsors have already stated that they are going to use the equipment belonging to the Burlington Northern railway. What does this mean? It means loss of Canadian jobs. Let me put it in another way. The locomotives that haul the coal trains are built in the city of Montreal by Canadian workers using Canadian material. Every coal car in the unit trains, and they are 70 or 80 cars long, is built down in Nova Scotia in the Hawker-Siddeley plant in an area where there is extremely high unemployment, and again they are using Canadian material. The steel for the railway line which has to be replaced quite frequently comes from Ontario, from Sault Ste Marie, Hamilton and the other steel plants in the province. All kinds of communications equipment is manufactured right here in Canada, and even the ties that we put under the rails come from our British Columbia woods. This is why I contend it is not only a problem of employment in the Kootenay area. This is a national problem, and we have to look at it nationally. If the construction of this link goes ahead, and we do not take a firm and decisive stand on it, then similar links will be built in other parts of Canada for the hauling of bulk products, again with an erosion of the type of jobs which I have just mentioned.

It is for these and for other reasons that we are asking the federal government to set down a crystal clear communications policy for Canada. Wherever possible, bulk cargoes and goods should be carried over existing Canadian communication lines to the points of export. There is nothing wrong with that. We have been subsidizing the railway systems for years on their coal hauls in an effort to make them pay their way. Just when we reach a point at which they might make some profit through the lucrative coal hauls, there is talk of diverting a part of this trade to a foreign rail line. I want to say that this does not meet with any amount of approval so far as the residents in our area are concerned. We are strongly opposed to it and we are asking the federal government to do something about it.

So far as this rail link is concerned, I do not want to see it built to haul coal. In fact, I do not want to see it built at all, even as a common carrier because the very same principle would apply. If it is built as a common carrier we are going to see a big chunk of our lumber go down the Windermere valley over the American lines and on to the various parts of the United States where lumber is taken to market. This will reduce the railway crews working on the Prairies, because this lumber now goes as far east as Manitoba and down into the United States through Emerson.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be very brief because many of the things that I will be saying in the next few minutes have already been said in the House over the past few years, and it is only because the motion of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) was put forward this afternoon that I believe some facts should be emphasized once again.

May I start by saying that I agree substantially with the motion put forward by the speaker for the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Moncton. I say this because in the past week, along with other members of the Standing Committee on Transport of the House I have been visiting western Ontario. We attended hearings in the city of London, in Chatham, Stratford and the town of Walkerton. With respect to the speech made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) earlier this afternoon, made in a very capable manner, in my opinion he defended a rather weak case. I must tell him that, without exception, not one of the briefs that were presented to us in each of the four places took the view that he took this afternoon.

He stated that the Canadian Transportation Commission, which is responsible to the government of Canada, has been doing a good job so far as passenger transport is concerned, particularly in western Ontario. I must remind you that the Parliament of Canada, through its national transportation policy, states:

—an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic wellbeing and growth of Canada.

Having quoted this, may I ask the Minister of Transport the following question through you, Mr. Speaker: how can the transportation system be "economic, efficient and adequate" when in certain areas in the province of Ontario there is no transportation whatsoever, by rail, by bus or by air? The only form of transportation that is available to the people in those areas is the automobile. Of course, you and I know that not everyone in Canada drives an automobile. They may be senior citizens or they may have no wish to drive a car, or else they may not have the desire to drive into a large city like Toronto where it is very difficult for other than professional automobile drivers to get around these days. There are many municipalities in western Ontario which simply have no mode of transportation whatever.

I refer you to a front line story in the Globe and Mail of a week or so ago which referred to the situation in the town of Chesley, a beautiful town approximately 120 miles from the city of Toronto. It would be far faster for any resident of that area who does not have an automobile to travel on a horse than it would be to travel by bus or by train. There are simply no trains, and the bus service is so deficient in that area that one simply cannot get out of the town. I respectfully ask whether this is an adequate and efficient transportation system so far as the town of Chesley is concerned. The same is true of many towns and cities in that area. May I respectfully point out that in the great city of Galt, a city of 70,000 people, there is not one single passenger service going either in or out of the city, and this has been so for some months now.

This afternoon the Minister of Transport said the following in defence of the Transportation Commission: "Only about 6 per cent of passenger train mileage in Canada has been discontinued" in the past few years. What he failed to say was that the hierarchy of the CNR and the CPR have applied for the discontinuance of the passenger service. It is difficult for me to believe that only 6 per cent of the passengers have been affected by the discontinuance of the service. While this may be true, nevertheless I tell you that as soon as the CNR apply for the discontinuance of 100 per cent of the passenger services they will get permission from the CTC if we, as Parliament are not prepared to do something about it.

• (1710)

The hon. Minister stressed that the CTC must be independent in order to do its job, and that there must be a minimum of interference from the government and Parliament. But, Mr. Speaker, where the CTC does not do a proper job we, as members of this House, have an obligation to interfere. We are not here to stick up for the policies of either the CPR or CNR. We here to stick up for the people in our constituencies. The fact is that in constituencies like my own, transportation facilities are not adequate and something must be done about them.

On many occasions it has been said in this chamber that the railways have an obligation to the people of Canada because many years ago the railways were granted certain rights, given large sums of money are huge tracts of land. As a matter of fact, at the hearings we held in Walkerton a few days ago, we were told that many of the municipalities in that area had granted substantial sums of money to the CNR, in return for which the railway promised service in perpetuity. On numerous occasions it has been pointed out that the CPR got a cash grant of $25 million from the people of Canada and 25 million acres of land. In return, it agreed to provide service to the people of Canada in perpetuity. Mr. Speaker, what happens to a farmer in my riding if he gives a mortgage on his farm and cannot pay it? You and I know the brutal facts of life. He loses the farm.

I point out to you, Sir, to the CTC and to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) that the railways signed a deal to accept so much money and so much land, in return for which they would provide certain services. Those services are not now being provided. As Parliament, we have an obligation to the people of Canada to see that the railways stand by the bargains they made, and honour the signatures that their officials affixed to certain documents many years ago. It is not just small municipalities which are suggesting that trains be placed back on the tracks in order to provide passenger service. The province of Ontario submitted a brief to the Standing Committee on Transport only a week or two ago, in which one of the strongest recommendations was that passenger trains be put back on the tracks again. I heartily agree with that recommendation.

The other day I read in the financial section of the Globe and Mail that the President of the CPR had stated he was pleased to see that the people of Canada seemed to have gotten out of their heads the thought that railways necessarily had to provide passenger service. Mr. Speaker, not only do the railways have a moral obligation to provide passenger service, they also have a legal obligation to provide it. I am sure that if the president of the CPR or the president of the CNR signed a deal with some of their mining or gas companies in western Canada, they would expect the people on the other side who signed to stick to their bargain. We expect the railways to stock to their end of the bargain with us. This does not mean that we will not discuss a more economic way of providing passenger service. Of course, we will. As legislators we want to do things as economically as humanly possible. But we want to see the people provided with transportation, particularly in areas where there is no bus service or air service. Passenger trains can provide service, and we must interfere with the decision of the CTC on this matter.

I respect the judgment of these gentlemen. A hundred years from now it may be proven that they were right. But at this point in time the people of Canada, particularly those with whom we talked last week in western Ontario, disagree with these gentlemen of the CTC. It costs us a great deal of money to provide passenger service to the people of Canada through our railway systems. But we spend large sums of money on many other causes. The CBC is frequently criticized for its large annual deficits. But the CBC is used to provide television and radio service in both languages to remote parts of Canada. Under no circumstances could such service to the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the northern parts of the provinces make money. We have accepted the fact that all our citizens deserve this service.

In the same way I have no doubt in the world that the western farmers deserve the 2,000 extra grain cars that are being provided for them through the Canadian Wheat Board at a cost of $42 million, even though I have not yet been told about the financial arrangements. This is a necessary service. I would be the last to criticize it, but I point out that we in western Ontario also deserve something. Factually, Mr. Speaker, 40 per cent of the taxes of all Canada come out of the province of Ontario. One of things we deserve in return is a passenger service, if not by rail at least by bus, or by some other method, provided as efficiently and economically as possible under the dictates of this Parliament and this government. This is something we have not got.

The last part of the sentence I quoted from our national transportation policy read, "it is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada." It is absolutely impossible to promote the economic growth and well-being of Canadians in western Ontario if we do not have adequate transportation facilities. For this reason I think the hon. member who presented this motion this afternoon was on the right track.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I believe that today is an opportune time to have this debate in the House of Commons following the hearings we held in western Ontario last week on the inadequacy of rail passenger service and bus service, as mentioned by the previous speaker. Yesterday in the House a motion was moved under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Wellington-Gray-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) that alluded to the lack of passenger service, to the hearings that were held last week throughout western Ontario, and to the fact that adequate bus service has not replaced the rail passenger service that was discontinued in 1970. That motion, which I seconded, reads:

• (1720)

That the government immediately issue instructions to the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway to re-establish the passenger rail services which were discontinued in November, 1970, in western Ontario.

Federal authorities in conjunction with the province of Ontario and the municipalities involved immediately undertake studies which would involve public hearings with a view to determining a minimum railway passenger train network as defined in relationship to the most economic, efficient and adequate transportation system required.

That motion was turned down by the government, Mr. Speaker, and I might suggest in all kindness to the hon. member who just finished speaking that it looks as if he has his work cut out for him in caucus tomorrow. I hope he takes advantage of the opportunity to work on his colleagues, because I know where his heart is and what his feelings are.

At the hearings in Owen Sound in March, 1970, about 95 per cent of the people making submissions said that they believed the railway passenger service should continue and that it should be upgraded. In spite of this, the Canadian Transport Commission seemed to pay more attention to the submissions of the bus companies and the railway companies because they made this ruling:

This committee finds that the highway system serving the points in this region of Ontario served by the passenger-train services is excellent and is probably as extensive as could be found in any comparable area of Canada. The committee further finds that the existing bus services in the area constitute a satisfactory alternative public transportation service and the committee accepts the evidence adduced at the hearings that these bus services will be adequate in capacity and will be increased in frequency as required by traffic demands resulting from discontinuance of passenger-train services.

The committee agrees with the submissions of both railways that discontinuance would have a minimal effect on other passenger-train services. The committee has considered the effect on other passenger carriers and, as explained above, has concluded that the bus services can adequately serve the additional traffic.

If some of the members of the railway transport committee had been with us last week when we attended hearings in western Ontario, they would have found out that their conclusions were incorrect. A brief presented by the Wingham Business and Professional Women's Club stated that it takes 4½ hours to go to Toronto by bus and takes 6½ hours to return, but by car it only takes 2 to 2½ hours travelling within the speed limit. At weekends the bus takes a different route and less time. The brief pointed out that the main problems with the bus service are that it is slow, it is uncomfortable, there are no washrooms on the buses and there is no place to get even a cup of coffee. It is no wonder that the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) said it would be just as quick to use a horse—if you had a fast horse, it would be a lot faster. This sort of thing was brought to light in almost all the briefs that were concerned with the passenger service in that area since the railways abandoned their service; indeed, some were concerned with the type of service that had existed even when the railways were operating.

Another reason for the necessity of adequate transportation in that area was presented by the reeve of Bayfield, who is the chairman of the planning committee of Huron county:

> The rail passenger service depreciated until finally in 1970 the service to Huron county was stopped. No matter what the economics of the service dictated it is apparent to the people of this area that while parts of this country have had its services increased ours has suffered in the transition. The roads were adequate at one time, therefore as the rail passenger service deteriorated the people turned more and more to the use of the roads by automobiles. Thus, as the highway traffic multiplied and rail passenger service was withdrawn, the "time of travel" increased for the people in Huron county.

It is quite obvious to anyone who uses the roads to any extent that they are becoming more and more crowded, particularly on weekends, and that the time of travel has almost doubled. The brief continues:

> To this area "time of travel", whether by road or rail, has become very important. We must compete with other areas of the country for industries and tourists to enhance our economic base. The cost of transportation has increased, but also the requirements for transportation has increased in all areas and especially in Huron county. Our location requires a speedy means of entry and exit for our industries, our citizens and our visitors.

The brief goes on to say there is evidence that transportation facilities, particularly for people wishing to use train services such as students and senior citizens, are not adequate. At the hearings in Walkerton, the room was packed with senior citizens who depend on rail service to provide transportation to the larger centres.

It was apparent from many of the briefs that people feel the railways have deliberately tried to discourage them from travelling by train. To travel from Sarnia to Toronto, it is necessary to go to London and this service is still operating. People from Huron county must go to London or Stratford to get the train, and both are about 45 or 50 miles away. It was brought out that people often have to stand in baggage cars from London to Toronto. When a representative of the CNR appeared before the committee, he denied some of these allegations but the people who travel these routes seemed to know what it was like. Apparently, although it would be a simple matter to leave extra cars in London to be used when there is a big crowd going from London to Toronto, this is not done and only a few cars are brought in from Sarnia. If there is not enough room for all the passengers, those who do not get on the train must get to Toronto as best they can. It would seem to be a simple matter to leave extra cars in London and have personnel there to serve them. It appears that when one of the official cars transporting some of the top brass of the railroads arrives in London, there is lots of help to move the cars around but for the ordinary paying passenger there is not much assistance.

Some of the advertising done by the railroads is not very helpful, and possibly even harmful. They seem to do their advertising in spurts of about two weeks and then forget about it for the rest of the year. They should continue to upgrade their service and let the people know what kind of service is available.

• (1730)

If there are enough people using the rail service, the application is not for discontinuance. The railroads must apply for discontinuance of passenger service in order to be granted a subsidy under the act. That act was passed in 1966, shortly after I came to this House. I remember well when the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill set himself up as chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission. The act states that the railroad must apply to discontinue the service. The commission can then rule that the service shall continue, and the railroad is granted a subsidy of up to 80 per cent of its losses.

[Mr. McKinley.]

I believe this is what the railways were looking for when they discontinued the service out of Huron county. They put their case so well before the Canadian Transport Commission that the commission allowed them to drop the service: everyone was fooled. I do not think there would be any danger of the service being dropped if the railways provided the type of service that people want. There would be more passengers. Instead, the railways are trying to get rid of passengers.

I have a lot of material here, Mr. Speaker, but my time is limited. I would also like to point out that there are no baggagemen to assist older people and women with children. City maps should be provided to passengers to assist them when they arrive at their destination. There is no decent food service. We have already heard about the stale sandwiches and lack of coffee. The railways have done away with dining cars. It used to be a pleasure to travel by train, but many of the things that made it a pleasure are no longer available.

I wish to refer to a brief submitted to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications by the province of Ontario. Some of their recommendations which I heartily endorse are as follows:

> (1) Passenger rail services which were discontinued on November 1, 1970, should be re-established immediately. Decisions involving equipment to be used and the scheduling of such re-established services should be made in consultation with the residents of the communities involved. It became clear during the discontinuance hearings that inadequate equipment and inconvenient schedules played a part in the losses reported by the railways.
> (2) Federal authorities in conjunction with the province of Ontario should immediately undertake studies which would involve public hearings with a view to determining a minimum railway passenger train network as defined in relationship to the most economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost.
> (3) A moratorium should be placed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. Under the order of the House there is no provision for an extension of time allocated to hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am most happy to speak on the motion moved by the Progressive Conservative party and which reads as follows:

> This House regrets that the government has failed to develop the National Transportation Policy, pursuant to section 3 of the National Transportation Act, and has failed to take measures to revitalize and rebuild Canadian transportation for present and future needs.

If I take the floor on this matter it is simply because I have noticed the deplorable state of the transport services in our region, especially those intended for passengers. I think that for a long time, and more so in recent years, the CN authorities have done their utmost to modernize freight services in our region. Surely it was quite profitable to set up the freight service since our region is a regular gold mine for the province of Quebec.

Every day, trains of up to 100, 125, 140 freight cars carrying all kinds of freight: copper, iron and aluminum ore, lumber, newsprint, are seen rolling out of the Saguenay-Lake St. John region.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that our area is certainly not contributing to the deficit of the Canadian National Railways and I do not intend to place too much blame on those in charge of freight movements because they have set up servo-centres and developed an efficient system. What I do have against them is their having systematically snuffed out all interest on the part of the public in passenger transportation.

When you consider the progress which the area has achieved in all fields of endeavour, development of industry and the increase in population, you realize that as the population is increasing the railways are reducing their services. We have reason to wonder about so many things. After all, when the Canadian National ends up with a deficit, as it often occurs, the taxpayers are the ones who have to make it up, but without getting any service in return.

• (1740)

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words particularly on the passenger service. I was just about to send a letter to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) but, since I have the opportunity of denouncing the action of the Canadian National Railways, I am going to do my duty as a member of Parliament and set forth a situation which is no longer tolerable in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area with regard to the passenger and sleeping-cars services. I want to talk about serious discriminatory steps taken in our area by the new CNR experts against the users of sleeping-car facilities. The responsible people in the CNR are very much aware that our area ranks first when it comes to freight transportation.

The reward offered us for this participation is the cancellation or the slow death of our passenger service.

We are told that the number of passengers is decreasing and I am convinced of it, Mr. Speaker. However, I add that if large centres were given the same kind of service, not only would the number of passengers decrease but there would be none left between Montreal and Ottawa or Montreal and Toronto.

The management is forgetting that the CN is above all a transportation service and not a service created to open new hotels throughout Canada. It is precisely this poor service given by the Canadian National that everybody is complaining about.

Passenger cars date back to the years 1925 or 1930. We shall soon be celebrating their 50th anniversary. Besides being decrepit, they are badly maintained and sometimes have a musty smell. Some of them, Mr. Speaker—I must tell the House about this—were full of cockroaches. Lastly, all the museum specimens were sent to the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. It happened only once in ten years that we got a fine 80-seat car, but authorities, realizing their error, hastened to send it out west.

How many fights we had to put in order to keep our sleeping-cars or what is left of them! That on the Dolbeau service has simply been suppressed and that on the Chicoutimi service has been reduced to its simplest expression. And to further discourage passengers, a rate increase has just been imposed which took everyone by surprise. It took effect on June 1, which was last Thursday.

Mr. Speaker, I want to express objection to this increase in the sleeping-car rate. I wonder who approved this increase. Imagine that for a lower bunk, a person must pay $14, and two persons must pay $21 for the Montreal-to-Chambord trip, a distance of 250 miles.

When they say that meals are included, they are shamelessly lying, because when you leave Montreal at 8 or 9 o'clock, you already have had your dinner, and when you reach Chambord at 6 in the morning, you have your breakfast in the station restaurant. For that matter, there is no dining car on the train to Chambord, Chicoutimi, Dolbeau, just a small lounge and counter.

Coming back to Montreal, as the train reaches Central Station at seven o'clock in the morning, you must have your breakfast there, for it is too early for the lounge and counter to be open.

These so-called meals which are paid for but never served are an outright robbery. In addition, a single person must pay $26 for a roomette; a couple travelling together will pay $35; and if there is a child with them, the rate is up to $41. And all this, to travel over a distance of 267 miles in a small musty roomette.

Let us hope that the C.N.R. management is made up of honest people who are comparing prices in western Canada or for a trip to Toronto over the same distance. It is a scandal.

One must also add the price of meals when travelling West; passengers have a right to curse the CNR and all its little bright boys. Can anyone truly believe that our people are not as good as those of other provinces and do not deserve equal treatment? We are not asking for better treatment, but for equal treatment.

If an hon. member wants to go on a primitive trip, he should go to Lac Saint-Jean in the winter on a CNR train. He is sure to feel he has gone back 50 years; in fact, on boarding what is called a coach, a new 50-year-old coach, he will freeze to death or be too warm, and if he asks somebody to do something about it the answer will be: You must wait till we reach Montreal. Is it not incredible!

I have seen women with their winter coats on wrapped up in blankets. They were freezing because the heating system of the train was not working.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Are you sure that is the reason?

Mr. Gauthier: And at other times—I will ask the member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) to make a short trip in my area during the winter; he will see how interesting it is.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would be willing to go.

Mr. Gauthier: He will realize how interesting it is, especially when he has a look at the cars; he is used to travel west aboard some nice ones, because the railway company keeps all its best coaches for trips in western Canada.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They are comfortable.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, it is true. Indeed, I am quite happy for westerners, but I would hope to find similar conditions in our area. The same thing happens throughout Quebec. It seems as if the CNR is keeping for that province its dirtiest and oldest equipment to disgust its passengers and keep them away.

It is sometimes suggested that the tracks are responsible. Now, this cannot be true, because an engine which can draw freight trains of 150 cars at 40 or 45 miles an hour could easily draw a small passenger train with only 4 or even 5, 6 and 8 cars.

But such is not the case. We leave Montreal at 8 p.m. and after having travelled 250 miles, we reach Chambord between 6.30, 7 or 8 a.m. sometimes at nine o'clock. Why? We must wait and let a freight train pass while the passengers are waiting. That is the new system of the CN's technicians.

I have seen a train on a side-line having to wait almost three hours for a freight. That is very interesting. So interesting in fact that many passengers getting off the train were heard saying: They have had me once but I will never let it happen again. Mr. Speaker, that is not a way of attracting customers and organizing a profit-earning transport service. One feels that the managers would rather stay in their offices in Montreal and carry freight only.

What about maintenance? Formerly, there was one office employee for five railwaymen. Today it is the opposite: for one railwayman there are five office employees doing nothing, lying on their wall-to-wall office carpet. And nobody looks after the railroad. The rate of derailments was the highest ever this winter. Why? Because of the lack of maintenance. The maintenance staff was reduced by two-thirds in our area and the rest of them cannot cope with the work.

On the other hand, the ranks of bureaucrats are swelling.

I have seen three foremen spend two hours watching a workman at his work. Examples as ridiculous as that do exist.

I believe it is about time for the government and the Minister of Transport to assume their responsibilities and require more fair-mindedness from the CN management. Moreover, the next time they ask us to make up their deficit, let us think about it twice before doing something. If we cannot get reasonable service from that Crown corporation which cannot manage to get out of the red and keeps asking the people who receive no service to foot the bill, let us sell it to private enterprise. I believe it will be the best way of giving satisfaction to people in our area as well as the rest of the province of Quebec, because the same critics are being heard on the southern shore of the St. Lawrence. One can be forbearing for some time but there is a limit to everything.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

I am surprised to find that other hon. members keep silent, put up with anything and seem to deem it satisfactory. The situation is worse than ever. If this keeps up within two years nobody will want to board CN trains for they will simply be disgusted. I hope that these remarks will reach the ears of the CN officials.

I would have much more to say, but since my time is limited to ten minutes, I shall conclude my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I wish to remind the hon. member that his time is not limited to ten minutes, but to twenty minutes. Therefore, he still has a few minutes to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A while ago I was told that I was not allowed 20 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. In order to clarify the situation, I might say that since the hon. member is speaking on behalf of his party, the rules allow him twenty minutes.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for bringing this to my attention. Once again, I simply wish to say that if we could blame the government for not voting the necessary credits for track maintenance, we might be inclined to believe that it is too poor to finance the Canadian National Railways. However, such is not the situation now.

During the last year, we have replaced almost all the tracks and so we now have a perfect line. There are still weaknesses in some sectors and I feel that the worst is too big a volume of freight for the present line. Of course, we do not have an intercontinental line, with rails designed to carry the weight of 125 cars loaded with iron ore, copper or wood. A single train of 150 cars is out of question. This explains the many derailments of freight trains this winter, and the situation will remain the same as long as the maintenance personnel is not increased.

Mr. Blouin: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): With the unanimous consent of the House, we can call it six o'clock.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Since it is six o'clock, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 5.58 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to say a few words tonight on the opposition motion submitted by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas).

I have listened carefully to the hon. members who spoke this afternoon and perhaps they have a right to criticize some aspects of our current transportation system. Obviously mistakes are committed and things are not always perfect.

However, it seems that what has been done over the last five years in the area of sea, land or air transportation is not appreciated.

Obviously, some problems are still to be solved and some will always exist in such a big country as ours with a relatively small population. But to say, as the opposition did, that this government has developed no long-term transportation policy is, in my opinion, complete nonsense.

On May 25 last, the able Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) informed the Committee on Transport and Communications of his department's objectives as to the reorganization of our national ports through a new policy and as to assistance to small airports in isolated regions.

On December 10, 1971 the minister announced that the funds available to small airports would be trebled through a new assistance program.

Pilotage has been reorganized into four separate authorities thus giving greater autonomy to Canada's regions.

The Arctic Transport Agency which cooperates with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the construction of a second international airport for the Toronto area, the construction of the new Sainte-Scholastique airport which is due to open in 1975; these are some of the achievements of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, I have only mentioned a few objectives from amongst many. It is known that the Department of Transport's budget for the current fiscal year amounts to $467 million, including $82 millions in loans. It is an impressive budget with impressive aims.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to revert to the point I made a few moments ago, that is the assistance to smaller airports, for example. In my riding, which is quite large, there are some isolated and far-away communities which cannot be reached either by road or by rail. Air transport is the only available means in winter and sea transport in summer.

In co-operation with the Minister of Transport we have studied a project for the construction of major regional airports. In co-operation with senior officials of the Department, this project has been examined, and tenders having been invited, the work has begun on some of these regional airports which, I am sure, will provide at least during the winter months, adequate service to the people I am privileged to represent.

I would like also to point out, Mr. Speaker, that much has been achieved in the maritime field. Obviously, this is not fully appreciated, but in this field, harbour facilities have been improved; they have been updated through adequate loading and unloading facilities, particularly with regard to containers.

• (2010)

This afternoon, I heard the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) say that the Department of Transport would have to expand considerably harbour facilities at Churchill. Of course, I have nothing against Churchill, but as I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot, the federal government would have to expand the Churchill harbour facilities, at a cost of several million dollars.

We know—and the hon. member for Crowfoot should know it as well—that the port of Churchill can be used for only three months a year or so. Therefore, I do not see how the federal government could make that port better suited to navigation than it is at present, even by expanding existing facilities.

The hon. member for Crowfoot also mentioned the importance of seaports. I listened to him with great attention as he said that Vancouver harbour was the largest seaport in Canada. I would like to tell him that we also have some very important seaports in Eastern Canada. I would like to mention here the port of Sept-Îles in my constituency, which in 1970 was the most active in Canada as far as the tonnage of goods handled was concerned.

The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) is cheering with good reason. Indeed, we had the opportunity to go on a trip to Sept-Îles together with the committee on transport and communications a few years ago, and the member thus had a chance to visit that important seaport. Following that trip, recommendations were made by the committee on transport and communications, and I am happy to say to this House that most of the recommendations of the committee, which was composed of members from all political parties, have been, if not implemented, at least accepted for implementation a few years from now.

In 1970, the port of Sept-Îles shipped 28,600,000 tons of iron ore, making it the busiest and most important port in Canada.

Obviously, much remains to be done, but I know the Minister of Transport will read the recommendations which have been made to him, especially those of the committee on transport and communications. He can study them and see to it that they lead to the construction of ports as important as those of the Pacific coast and eastern Canada, ports that are equipped with far more modern facilities.

Transport by railroad was also discussed. In the huge riding I have the honour of representing, neither the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific nor any other railroad belonging directly or indirectly to the state, serves the people.

Still, we do have a railroad system which is unique in its way in that it is almost circular and runs over a distance of more than 600 miles from the St. Lawrence inland. I am thinking of a private railroad, which is kept by the mining companies that use it to transport iron ore. I say this because that railroad is isolated and it is not subsidized in any way by the government. However, there is heavy traffic and I know that the government gives assistance to those companies in connection with public security and cost control. But an enormous amount of iron ore still continues to flow every day from that vast area.

• (2020)

The iron ore of the area is delivered at Sept-Îles at the rate of about 164 cars every two hours, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, which represents as I said a short while ago approximately 28,600,000 tons a year and makes my small region the biggest exporter of iron ore in the world.

One is surprised at times when I quote those figures. I did it in committee and I was asked whether I had verified my figures, since 28,600,000 tons did not make us the biggest exporter of iron ore in the world.

However, if you add the 12 million tons of iron ore that are delivered each year 40 miles west, you get a total of about 40 million tons, and this is how you get figures that make us the world's largest exporters of iron ore.

Mr. Speaker, I say this so that my colleagues may understand that these gigantic developments, in so far as iron ore and mines in particular are concerned, are huge investments made at an unbelievable rate.

Of course, we are still in need of other suitable transportation means, in particular in the eastern part of the St. Lawrence north shore. But I trust, thanks to the cooperation I have received for a few years from the Minister of Transport as well as a few senior officers of his department, that we shall succeed in achieving our objectives and provide to the people a fairly suitable service.

In the lower north shore, the Department of Transport has to subsidize maritime transportation, so that the people get a better service. About $1 million are required each year in subsidies, which can be renewed every five years or so.

This enabled a shipping company, during the summertime, to serve all those small communities along the shore, from Sept-Îles to Blanc-Sablon, that is over a distance of 500 miles.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I would like to comment on the freight rate situation. In some cases I believe the freight rate policy has worked to the detriment of western Canada. Western railway freight rates have been a topic of controversy ever since the Crowsnest Pass agreement of 1897. The railways were entirely responsible for the settlement and development of the Prairies and of the interior of British Columbia in the last part of the last century and the first part of this century. Yet once their initial role as a land colonizer was finished, the railways continued to dominate the west. It is my submission that this domination by the railways today is all-pervading in western Canada.

Many people say that we are overstating the role of the railways in western Canada. I do not agree. If anything, the effects of the railways on every facet of western life have been downplayed. I consider the railways and their policies to be responsible to a large extent for the lack of western development, and because of this the conduct of the railways will always be a number one political issue in western Canadian politics.

I might add that this issue was one of the main causes for what I consider to be growing alienation among westerners. I would caution the powers-that-be not to ignore this growing feeling of western alienation which is sometimes expressed in bitterness. It is a condition which arises out of neglect, out of eastern domination and out of a feeling, which is justified, that we are not developing to our fullest potential because of lack of consideration for all parts of the country.

One of the main factors involved in manufacturing in secondary industry is the cost of delivering the product to the market. Because of the present freight rate structure a competitive disadvantage is put on western secondary industry. This manipulation of freight rates is in effect a subsidization of eastern industry in that its products can be shipped to western Canadian markets at rates which often undercut our local manufacturers and in some cases go as far as to drive them out of business. A good example of this is the processing of rapeseed into meal and oil.

As we all know, rapeseed is a newly developed crop in Canada. Processors of rapeseed on the Prairies have discovered that they have lost their competitiveness in this business because the freight rates allow bulk rapeseed to be shipped to eastern Canada, processed there, shipped back to western Canada and still undercut the local manufacturer's price. At the present time, western processors are testing the validity of these freight rates in court action in the city of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. I consider this to be pure discrimination in favour of eastern interests. It is just one of hundreds of examples. What I find most disconcerting is that basically the same principles for western freight rates apply today as were agreed to in the Crowsnest pass agreement of 1897. In the intervening period of 75 years, conditions have greatly changed in the west but we are still subjected to the same basic rules.

The purpose of the 1897 agreement was to provide a method to ship grain out of the west at reasonable rates and to supply the colonists who were opening up the country with the consumer goods they needed. This was all part of our national policy. This agreement has always been a good precedent for government control of freight rates for grain and its provisions have kept down the cost of shipping grain so that these products could be most competitive.

It must be noted that the railways are still making profits, at the present rates, for shipping grain despite the fact that they have made repeated attempts to have the grain freight rates raised. It cannot be said that grain freight rates are being subsidized as are the rates for eastern manufactured goods. The railways are not required to warehouse grain as they are with respect to manufactured goods. They do not load or unload the cars. And grain constitutes the largest volume of any commodity hauled: it moves in bulk, by full carload of maximum weight, over long distances and by large trains. Although the railways did face increases in certain costs of their operations, many of these costs were offset by better technology and mechanization.

Improved methods of transporting grain have resulted in substantial savings. The tonnage per mile is now much greater. Fewer trains, smaller crews and lower operating costs will now move the same volume as was transported 20 years ago. This is not to say that grain transportation is operating at all times on a satisfactory basis. Rail tie-ups and lack of organization often result in lost sales and tie-ups at our export terminals, resulting in demurrage charges that are paid by the farmers and not by the railways. I think that we in western Canada should look forward to the appointment of an independent railway controller to co-ordinate the various facets of grain movement and of agricultural produce generally from western Canada.

It must also be noted that railways have increased their profits by increasing the rates on grain for domestic use, which is not subject to the rates set out in the Crowsnest Pass agreement. An example is the rate structure for grain moving from Carman, Manitoba, the town from which I come, to Vancouver, British Columbia. In 1960 the rate per hundredweight of grain for export was 34 cents. Today it is the same price. However, the rate on grain for domestic use has gone up from 91 cents per hundredweight to $1.28.

It should also be noted, Mr. Speaker, that on many occasions in the 1950s and 1960s considerable pressure was put on the government and the then board of railway commissioners to have an upward revision of the freight rates for export grains. However, the railways could not prove that they were not already making large profits under the existing rate structure. Further, freight rates for grain are within the sole jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. Because of their success and the profits on export grain transportation, it is my contention that these rates should remain the same.

I wish I could say the same for other freight rates. As I have already said, conditions have greatly changed since 1897. The west, although greatly reliant on agriculture as a prime industry, is in a state of transition. Our cities have grown; we are close to vast and rich natural resources; we have a skilled labour force. We are struggling to take advantage of these assets. Diversification is the only answer to relieve the west from the ups and downs in world grain markets and poor years in agriculture. Yet we are being held back by external factors. One of these, in my opinion, is the discriminatory freight rates in favour of eastern interests. This is a subtle protectionism and is contrary to the spirit of the free trade provisions of the BNA Act.

In the west the railways have us over a barrel, Mr. Speaker. There is no effective water competition to serve the prairie provinces. Truck competition tends to be more competitive over short hauls for manufactured goods produced primarily in Ontario and Quebec than on the longer hauls of raw materials in western Canada. I might say that we could have effective water competition if the government would develop the port of Churchill to its full potential. We in the west are victims of what the railways call captive status. There are thousands of examples both of spectacular disparities and modest disadvantages affecting the general structure of freight rates. What recourse do we in the west have in these cases of discrimination? There is very little recourse, and what there is, is under the auspices of the National Transportation Act of 1967.

That act supposedly provides a criterion for appeal and an investigation method for any accusations of discrimination. But in order to seek compensation or revision of the freight rates one must show that there is a deliberate act or omission by a carrier in the establishment of rates that will endanger the public interest. Further, for relief under the act a shipper must show he is captive to railway shipping only for goods shipped in quantities of less than one carload, or 5,000 pounds. A shipper must apply to the commission to fix rates at a more equitable limit based on a complicated formula.

However, this whole process results in hearings which are expensive and lengthy, and they cannot be termed an adequate method of determining freight rates. The inadequacy of the 1967 act has been responsible for the comparatively modest number of rate hearing applications to the CTC in the last five years. I can give several examples of how these discriminatory freight rates have affected Manitoba industry. The freight rates for iron and steel products, canned foods, livestock and a variety of other products which are shipped to northern Manitoba are good examples of the wide differences in freight rates.

The distance from Sault Ste Marie to Ottawa by rail is only six miles less than the distance from Selkirk to Gillam. The rates on the eastern run are one-third less than the rates on the run from Selkirk to Gillam. Rates on iron and steel products from Selkirk to Vancouver are identical to those from Montreal to Vancouver, although the latter run is twice as far. I could list dozens of more spectacular examples. The general trend, however, is more subtle but is to my mind just as devious. On the whole, rates to and from Manitoba and within Manitoba are approximately 15 per cent above rates in other parts of Canada. I have and always will consider this situation deplorable. The rail transportation system in western Canada should make an attempt by basing its freight rates on all other rational factors besides captive status, which is the state in which all the western region outside Vancouver finds itself.

Considering the tremendous effect that the railways have on our lives in western Canada, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that we must investigate new transportation policies. Perhaps an independent body composed of all interested parties to look into discriminatory freight rates and tariffs would be a realistic approach. I think this must come if we are to have equity in all parts of the country.

In conclusion, I believe that the freight rate structure is maintained primarily to benefit central Canadian industry and transportation companies. Tariffs and railway rates are not conducive to diversification of industry and western development. I should like to ask how long the federal government and eastern commercial interests expect western Canada to suffer silently this gross inequity.

National Transportation Policy

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, some members in this House may realize that I have recently inherited an airport in my riding to be called the Pickering international airport, I presume. As this is directly related to transportation policy, I should like to say a few words which I hope the minister will take into consideration.

First of all, the airport proposal obviously has opponents and supporters and I am sure each one feels that he has pretty good reasons.

Those who oppose it do so because they feel that the need has not been established. Many feel that other transportation facilities could relieve the congestion that exists at Malton airport, that transportation problems can be solved through rapid transit systems and STOL aircraft to handle short flights of less than 500 miles. They presently comprise approximately 50 per cent of the air traffic at Malton.

Many people feel that if this kind of thing were done and STOL aircraft were developed quickly, the need for the new airport would not exist. Other people oppose it on the basis of its close proximity to metropolitan Toronto and the fact that the proposed location would have an enormous impact upon the further urbanization of the Toronto region. We could end up with a de facto extension of Toronto to the Oshawa area.

All these people have a right to question the decisions being made by advisers to the Department of Transport and the bureaucrats. I am not saying that the department is wrong; I do not know. I do not have access to enough information to enable me to make a definitive statement in this regard. However, these people have a right to their reservations and a right to be heard. If this government is to live up to the expectations of participation that it has created, then I think we must take appropriate steps to see that these voices are heard.

When the new Expropriation Act was passed by this Parliament it was felt that a great step forward had been taken which would allow people about to be expropriated under federal jurisdiction to have a voice in the deliberations. Under the Expropriation Act, hearing officers are appointed. They are intended, in effect, to be the eyes and ears of the minister and to hear the complaints of those who would oppose a particular project. It is rather strange, however, that the hearing officer himself has no right to make any recommendation; all he can do is hear the complaints and report back to the minister. To many it would seem to be reasonable to expect that the Expropriation Act would give the hearing officer the right to make recommendations.

I suggest that the appropriate minister or indeed the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in this particular case, ought to make it clear that he would have no objection to a hearing officer recommending what should take place. If he is not willing to do that, then I think this House should give consideration to amending section 8(4)(d) of the Expropriation Act. This section reads:

—within 30 days after his appointment, prepare and submit to the minister a report in writing on the nature and grounds of the objections made.

I think it would be reasonable—

Mr. Benjamin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Murta.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: In light of the motion put forward by the official opposition on the National Transportation Act, would you please ask the hon. member why he is talking about the Expropriation Act?

Mr. Cafik: I would be delighted to answer that question. It is because the Expropriation Act in this case happens to be the vehicle that the Minister of Transport is using and I presume will use in future in order to acquire property for transportation purposes. It seems to me to be relevant.

Mr. Benjamin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, we are not discussing amendments to the Expropriation Act and the hon. member is completely out of order. If he wants to carry the ball for some land speculators, he can do it some other time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik).

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be reasonable to amend the act to add to that particular section—

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, will you rule whether it is in order for the hon. member to talk about amendments to the Expropriation Act when we are debating the National Transportation Act?

Mr. Basford: You are out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope that these interruptions will be deducted from the time allotted to me. I believe that kind of amendment would give an opportunity for more meaningful participation by people affected in the expropriation of properties for transportation purposes. I further believe that the same objective would be accomplished if we were to permit the hearing officer to allow cross-examination of witnesses in respect of the need, whether it be for airport sites or otherwise. People should have the right to cross-examine government witnesses and experts on whether a particular expropriation is required. This is not provided under the act at present and I think that the minister ought to make it perfectly clear that it is the intention to allow such cross-examination.

There are other things of genuine concern to people whose property is being expropriated for this or any other purpose, and I think they have a right to be heard and a right to participate. At the moment there is nothing in the act which indicates how many hearing officers would be appointed to deal with this type of problem. In a case of this magnitude I suspect that more than one would be required. I believe that the minister ought to appoint a senior hearing officer, who would be a judge, to deal with the over-all question. In addition, I think this is how our expropriation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I did not want to disturb the hon. member who has the floor, but two points of order have been raised by another hon. member. This is a motion concerning transportation, and airport facilities and air service are transportation matters; but perhaps the hon. member is dwelling too much on the specific question that concerns his riding. In order to help the Chair and the House, the hon. member should debate the motion before the House.

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall certainly do that and I hope the House understands why I was trying to deal with these important matters. I am sorry that it is not possible to do it, because they are of great concern to the people whose properties may be taken for the building of a second international airport. Certainly in my view, this comes under the heading of transportation policy. However, in view of the objection of the NDP, I will confine my remarks to other areas. They are also related specifically to the airport problem as well as to the general complex problem of transportation in Canada.

If we had a proper transportation policy which was clearly enunciated, some of the views and concerns of people in my area would be somewhat alleviated. People have the impression that this government, particularly in relation to the project I have spoken about, has a minister of aviation and not a Minister of Transport. It is important that the government make it perfectly clear that they are concerned about all avenues of transportation and have taken into consideration rapid transit systems right across Canada in order to minimize the volume of air traffic at the present time or that which is projected for the future.

The projection for the Toronto region is that by the year 2000 there will be approximately 60 million air passengers per year. To many people this appears to be an absurd projection. If there were proper means of transporting people in the short haul, this figure could possibly be reduced and perhaps some of the air transportation facilities which are presently being projected would not in fact be needed.

It seems to be relevant to this question that the government make perfectly clear their over-all plans in terms of building a rapid transit corridor across Ontario and into Quebec, at least from Montreal to Toronto, which would alleviate much of the need for air transportation. As a matter of fact, in the long run I think it is essential to have a transportation corridor from Quebec City through to Windsor. This would have a very beneficial effect in another area, by allowing the spread of urbanization over a much larger area of land across Ontario and Quebec rather than concentrating it in areas like Montreal and Toronto. There are many who feel that the prospect of a Toronto with eight million people is not socially acceptable. I feel we ought to express our reservations in this regard.

I would like to talk for a moment about a couple of other points. The first is urban transportation in the Toronto region. Some time ago, on June 3, 1970, I suggested in writing to the Minister of Transport that we required certain amendments to the railway acts of this country in order to give more emphasis to commuter transportation. In that letter I suggested that four amendments would be advisable in terms of transportation policy for urban areas of Canada. The first was to spell out in legislation that the CNR and the CPR make railbeds available for the purpose of commuter transportation in a better way than they had in the past. My second suggestion was as follows:

> To force the railways to give preferential time schedules for such purposes, even though it may require adjustments to freight schedules.

This is important because at the moment urban transportation running on rail lines is often confined to hours which are not socially acceptable to the working population of these areas. My third suggestion was:

> To force the railroad to charge reasonable mileage rates for commuters. Some believe that the present wheel mileage rates are excessive—

Others feel that there should be a preferential rate even if it requires some subsidization. Then fourth:

> To force railroads to allow other individuals or agencies to use these rail beds for urban transport purposes. It is suggested that private enterprise itself may be interested in bidding on urban transport routes in the metropolitan area, and the act would have to be changed to allow such individuals to use these railbeds.

An hon. Member: Where do you stand?

Mr. Cafik: I subscribe to those suggestions in view of the fact that I made them. A member of the New Democratic Party asked, as he often does, where I stand. I clearly stand for the suggestions I have made. There are a number of areas that we need to explore in terms of transportation policy so that the policy will have some worth-while effect on the ecology and the problems of urban sprawl. Such a policy will have a very important and meaningful part to play in the way in which this country is developed for the good of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I looked forward with a great deal of anticipation to this debate. I know that I speak for most people in Atlantic Canada when I say that I hoped the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) would make a far reaching and useful statement regarding a transportation policy for that part of Canada.

After listening to the minister I can only say that in the time I have been in this House I have never been more disappointed by what was said in so far as Atlantic transportation is concerned. I think it is fair to say that in nine months, the normal pregnancy period, the minister brought forth an abortion as far as Atlantic transportation policy is concerned. It is worse than useless. It is a grave and deep disappointment for every resident of Atlantic Canada. The Minister of Transport spent most of his time talking about an air policy. As far as transportation in the Atlantic provinces is concerned, everything is certainly up in the air now.

Immediate action must be taken to overcome the many additional problems that have been created for industries in the Atlantic provinces since the spring of 1969 when the four Atlantic provinces' premiers presented to the Minister of Transport their long-range proposals for a realistic Atlantic area transportation policy. On September 2, 1969, the federal government produced its alternative policy to that submitted by the Atlantic premiers. The federal government established an advisory board which was composed of four provincial and two federal representatives. The board has been advisory in every sense of the word. Its latest report is another piece of advice, and nothing more. It does not contain anything really useful and helpful to the Atlantic area. It is a far cry from the agency proposed by the four premiers. It has been anaemic and non-effective in its efforts to assist the area in its fight to overcome its transportation disabilities. The premiers' report stated as follows:

The provinces will accept modification in the blanket subsidization of intraregional traffic subject to the strict qualification—

I underline the words "strict qualification".

—that a federal-provincial agency be empowered to administer transportation assistance from federal funds to selected industries within the Atlantic provinces.

That is found at page 11 of the Atlantic premiers' report, which is entitled "The basic elements of an Atlantic provinces transportation policy," submitted to the federal government in March, 1969. On page 12 of the report they suggest that members of this agency be residents of the Atlantic provinces and that the administrative offices be located in the Atlantic provinces.

The federal government did not carry out the desires of the premiers with regard to either the type of board or make-up of those appointed to the agency it did establish. The committee has no power and no money. However, the federal government did latch on to the proposal and suggested that the intraregional subsidy be reduced. They reduced it from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent. They had intended to reduce it a further 2½ per cent to 15 per cent on April 1 of this year, but because businessmen and others in the Atlantic area raised particular hell prior to April 1, the proposed 2½ per cent reduction was not put into effect.

The premiers' report also recommended, as is found at page 23 of the report—

That the federal government take the necessary steps, either by legislation or by agreement, to maintain the freeze on Atlantic provinces rail rates until such time as the regional transportation policy is effective.

The government implemented its diluted and unrecognizable version of the premiers' report in September of 1969 and immediately thereafter freight rates began to rise. Rates which were 50 cents on September 23, 1959, were 81 cents on February 14, 1972—a 62 per cent increase. Freight rates which were $1 on September 23, 1969, were $1.46 on February 14, 1972—a 46 per cent increase. Rates which were $2.50 on September 23, 1969, were $3.32 on February 14, 1972—an increase of 33 per cent.

In all, there have been seven freight rate increases since September 23, 1969, the date on which the railways were allowed to impose increases. I am not objecting to the railways increasing their rates if the money is required in order to carry on the service; I am objecting to the federal government allowing them to increase rates without making certain that the increases are necessary and, second, that they are within the means of the industries of Atlantic Canada. In the latter case some form of subsidy should be provided so as to offset the effects of the increase. This has never been done.

Under present government policy, freight rates will continue to increase forever or until there is not a single viable business operation left in the area. The minister's statement today did not give much hope to industry as far as freight increases are concerned. We are told that yet another increase is coming. It is obvious that this situation cannot be ended on the basis of what the minister told us today.

We have faced many disabilities in Atlantic Canada since 1867 and some of them can be traced back to the beginning of this nation. The federal government by its policies has manufactured many of the problems that plague us to this very day. Certainly, the national industrialization policy dating back to 1867, coupled with federal tariff policy, has made it very difficult for industry to develop in both the east and the west. It is a disadvantage from which both versions suffer to this day.

Atlantic Canada and western Canada continue to subsidize the industrial complex of central Canada. Atlantic Canada was cursed by a second decision, this time in the military field, which made the journey from that region to the markets of central Canada both longer and more expensive than it might have been. We have never experienced a transportation policy which would allow our goods to compete in the marketplaces of central Canada on an equal footing, and the government has never been willing to alter the tariff system in order that our goods could flow from north to south, the logical path.

The time has arrived when a number of actions must be taken by the federal government if we are to enjoy the benefits of a true transportation policy. First, tariff barriers must be lowered in order that goods from our area may reach their natural market in the northeastern United States in a competitive position. Second, an effective course of appeal must be made available against the avalanche of freight rate increases which have faced the region since September 23, 1969. Third, an agency along the lines proposed by the Atlantic premiers should be established and funded so that the original objectives of the premiers' proposals can be achieved. Fourth, the activities of the Canadian car demurrage bureau must be blunted so that it cannot arbitrarily change the basis of charging demurrage without shippers at least having the opportunity to argue their case before the Canadian Transport Commission on appeal when they consider the charges exorbitant. Fifth, the agricultural industry of Atlantic Canada must be placed in a position where it is no worse off than any other area of the nation. In order to accomplish this, protein concentrates and mineral supplements originating in the central United States and Canada for use in livestock and poultry feeds should be included under the provisions of the federal feed freight assistance policy so that Atlantic producers may achieve a competitive position vis-à-vis those in central Canada.

Only when the federal government undertakes in earnest an over-all transportation policy of this type can we hope to develop a viable industrial and agricultural base. It is true the government has moved in the field of truck transportation and ferry transportation and has also provided immeasurable assistance in highway construction. By these means it has sought to make the trucking industry a strong competitor to the railways. Up to this date, however, the volume of freight handled by trucks and other modes of transportation has not been sufficient to force the CNR, the main rail facility in the Atlantic provinces, to maintain a competitive low-rate structure, particularly as applied to most bulky inward-bound production imports and bulky outward-bound manufactured or agricultural products.

Although the government has tried, it has not achieved the intent of the National Transportation Act and must therefore undertake new initiatives if this goal is to be reached. The initiatives announced today by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) certainly fall a long way short of those which are required. He gave the shippers of Atlantic Canada to understand that he was completely tied up with air policy and not in the least concerned about freight rates in my part of Canada. It is a sad state of affairs that a minister who comes from Atlantic Canada and who should know, if anyone does, just how serious is the transportation situation in all sectors of the economy, should leave such an impression. We are, as of today, without a transportation policy in Atlantic Canada as a result of what the minister has said. That is the measure of the weakness of the statement the minister made.

Since the minister is so involved with air policy I should like to make a few comments on that aspect. They relate to a matter which irritates me no end. I have noted with concern that a Canadian has no difficulty at all in getting a flight out of Canada to almost any destination, at a very cheap rate. As I was flying recently, I took copies of the international Air Canada schedule and the national Air Canada schedule and compared some of the rates which are being charged for air travel. You can fly from Halifax to London for $106 less than you can fly from St. John's to Vancouver. A 45-day excursion between Vancouver and London costs $334, whereas one from Vancouver to Halifax costs $358. In other words, you can fly from Vancouver to London for $24 less than you can fly from Vancouver to Halifax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing this evening a motion presented by the official opposition criticizing the government for its failure to develop a national transportation policy. I am in support of the motion because the government has no transportation policy. As I listened to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), who spoke a short while ago and went into some detail about the ideas that he submitted to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) some two years ago regarding the need to encourage urban commuter transportation, I wondered how he could support a government that had completely failed even to commence to develop a national transportation policy.

The government's policy has been one of default, one of drift. Let us just examine what is happening. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) is in Sweden making great speeches about the need to do something to stop pollution. We in Canada are encouraging competition between trucks and railroads, though there is no question that trucks are unable to move large amounts of freight without polluting the atmosphere. We encourage this pollution by subsidizing the building of superhighways while requiring the railways to build and maintain their own rights of way. We discourage use of the railways by raising the price of passenger tickets while encouraging people to travel by car on superhighways on which they have not paid anything to ride.

One of the best means of transportation is provided by the railroads, yet we are destroying it. The Ottawa to Montreal run is a distance of 120 miles which the railways covered in two hours. When I came to Parliament ten years ago there were between five and eight trains a day. We have now raised the rates so much, discontinued dining car service—in fact, we provide no meals service—and cut down on the number of trains a day to the point that people no longer use the trains on this route. Instead there is a bus service every hour. There are already many cars using this road and the province of Quebec has had to build a superhighway on its side of the border. The province of Ontario is now building its superhighway to link with the Quebec highway.

The Minister of Transport is not satisfied with having virtually wiped out railway passenger routes; he is now spending $200 million to encourage travel by STOL aircraft. What madness is this? One can go from the centre of Ottawa to the centre of Montreal by train in two hours. As I say, we are now going to spend $200 million so we can fly from somewhere in Ottawa to somewhere in Montreal in 48 minutes. That, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of transportation policy that the government has.

Sufficient hon. members from the Atlantic provinces and the Prairies have already spoken about the inequities of freight rates that I do not need to put on the record what the situation is. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) gave some illustrations of the difference in cost of moving freight and how it is cheaper to move freight from Montreal to Vancouver than it is from Winnipeg to Vancouver. This is because there is an alternative route: one can ship freight by boat from Montreal to Vancouver via the Panama Canal. This means the railways have to lower rates to compete between Montreal and Vancouver, while this is not the case from Winnipeg.

I should like to discuss for a moment a subject with which the minister dealt this afternoon and about which I interrupted him, somewhat facetiously though not entirely. I do not have the text of what he said, but I am sure I am not misrepresenting him when I say he said that the government's transportation policy was based on the National Transportation Act and that the workings of that policy and the decisions arising out of the act stemmed from the Canadian Transport Commission. He went on to say that those who did not agree with the decisions made by the Canadian Transport Commission had the right of appeal.

I then interrupted him, as I say somewhat facetiously, to say that I thought this was pretty useless since the chairman of the commission was the friend of the minister. The minister, I think quite properly, made it clear that there was no sort of relationship, though they were friends, between the chairman of the transport commission and himself. I am prepared to accept the assurance of the minister that his position is clear and that he does not interfere in decisions, but like many other people both inside and outside Parliament I cannot say that I have the same confidence in the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission as I have in the minister.

Before we set up the Canadian Transport Commission we had the board of transport commissioners. As I read their decisions I began to think they were wasting money on rent to stay in Ottawa, that they ought to have their offices on the premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I never knew them to make a decision that was against the interests of the CPR. But I do want to say that the board of transport commissioners was a great organization compared to the Canadian Transport Commission under its chairman, Mr. Pickersgill.

I should like to give some illustrations of the kind of decisions that are made by the commission under its chairman. Since the Canadian Transport Commission took over its responsibilities under this minister, it has been the policy to downgrade Air Canada and to build up the regional air carriers. I have been interested to watch the regional air carriers who have been able to get their share of the gravy. I come from Winnipeg, and although I am speaking somewhat parochially I cannot say that I am unhappy at the growth of Transair. But I would be less than honest if I were to say that I believe it is a coincidence that Transair's operations have grown so rapidly since the advent of the Canadian Transport Commission, under the chairmanship of Mr. Pickersgill, knowing that the president of Transair, Mr. Rod McIsaac, was formerly—and may still be—the chief fund-raiser of the Liberal party in Manitoba and that the vice-president of Transair, Mr. Morrison, was formerly the executive assistant of Mr. Pickersgill when he was minister of transport.

I do not believe that was sheer coincidence; nor do I believe it was sheer coincidence which permitted Transair to order large, expensive Boeing-737 airliners when its operation at that time did not warrant the purchase of these aircraft. Of course, Transair had an application in for longer runs from Winnipeg to Regina to Saskatoon, and from Winnipeg to the Lakehead to Dryden to Sault Ste. Marie and Toronto, and a jet run from Winnipeg to the Lakehead to Toronto. It required a great deal of confidence to buy those aircraft before the CTC had heard the applications and made a decision. I do not believe this was a coincidence; they must have had some foresight.

Let us look at what happens in the case of that great Canadian company which has only one purpose, serving the needs of the Canadian people—the Bell Telephone Company. I cannot remember a time when the Bell Telephone Company made an application for an increase in rates and the Canadian Transport Commission said no. It is true that Bell Telephone does not get everything it asks for, but I have had a good deal more experience with unions than with corporations and it seems that Bell Telephone, when it asks for rate increases, operates in much the same way as most of the unions. It asks for two or two-and-a-half times as much as it expects to get, and hopes to settle for a pretty good increase. That is precisely what Bell Telephone has done every year even though its profit has been substantial and has increased every year. Each year Bell Telephone asks at least once for an increase, and at least once a year it has received an increase as a result of the kindness and impartiality of the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Deachman: So why don't you buy a block of stock and get rich?

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) suggests I should buy a block of stock and get rich. If I had his money I probably would do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: Let us look at what has happened to passenger services since the Canadian Transport Commission has taken over the supposed supervision of railway services. Passenger services have been cut in virtually every part of the country. It is true that the commission has not yet agreed to all the requests of the CPR, but if it did there would be no passenger service provided by the CPR. I suppose we should thank God for small mercies.

I have already referred to the most glaring example of the cut in services that has taken place, namely the service between Ottawa and Montreal. The same thing is happening on a lesser scale in every part of the country. The members of the transport committee have just come back from hearings in southern Ontario about reduction in service in that part of the country. We have a reduction in the number of trains and dining and sleeping cars have been taken off, all of which was permitted by the CTC. Of course, the railway companies will come to the CTC and say they want to discontinue these passenger services because they have no passengers. Of course they have no passengers: they have done everything they can to drive them away.

The situation in respect of rail passenger service is duplicated in respect of rail freight service. Members from Atlantic Canada, the most disadvantaged area of this country, have spoken again and again over the years, as they did again today, about the inexorable increases in rates for freight moving across the Atlantic provinces. This results in a reduction in the standard of living in these areas because of a reduction in services, in employment and in the ability of the Atlantic provinces to compete for jobs and the production of goods, because the movement of raw materials required for manufacturing and the moving of the finished product costs more. Therefore they become less competitive than they have been up to now.

That is the record of the Canadian Transport Commission, that body established by a Liberal government to help us develop a national transportation policy. One thing we ought to have learned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I read with some interest, but frankly with very little surprise, the motion presented by the official opposition on this opposition day. One can almost see the Conservative caucus, presided over by the genial member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), missing the magniloquent gentleman from Prince Albert. One can almost sympathize with the dilemma even of this body, because it seems there are so few subjects upon which its members can agree or even reach consensus.

That dilemma takes on insurmountable dimensions when they endeavour to come up with a subject they can speak about in a positive way, having found unanimity in their party. Here we have a motion which I think some Conservative genius has dreamed up for a party that cannot reach consensus in any positive policy direction, a party which finds itself ever more unable to reach consensus even when attacking the government.

This is quite a motion for debate. It allows each member of the opposition who takes the opportunity to speak, to highlight transportation problems as they affect his area. He can then go back to his riding and say in a political way, "I really told the government off." It would be my hope that the candidates who oppose those people in the next election will ask the obvious question, "After you told the government off, did you then proceed to tell the government how to remedy the situation?" Of course, the opposition party, being what it is, will duck that question as it so often does here, by saying that is not exactly its responsibility.

That is exactly the role the official opposition in the House of Commons is called upon to play and that is why I feel it is almost a waste of an opposition day, when the opposition had the opportunity to do something in a positive way, for the opposition to tell us what they think about a positive transportation policy. We have not heard much about that today.

An hon. Member: You won't listen.

Mr. Cullen: I did listen to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas), who is not in his seat but is in the House. I give him credit for being one of the few members of the opposition who, when he moves a motion on an opposition day, sits in the House during the rest of the debate to listen to what other hon. members have to say. Normally the mover makes the motion, says what he has to say before the television cameras and we do not see him during the rest of the debate. The hon. member for Moncton has been courteous enough after moving the motion to listen to what the rest of us have to say. The important role which the opposition should play has been ignored.

When I prepared my notes for this speech I did not know whether I would speak midway in the debate or some time toward the end. I am satisfied that if anybody takes the time and effort to do a bit of research on the speeches made today by members of the opposition, he will find running throughout these speeches more parochial complaints than national ones, and I believe he will be hard pressed to find any positive direction in the debate even after sifting through the myriad criticisms.

Mr. Benjamin: You weren't listening.

Mr. Cullen: I was not only listening, I was listening quietly, which is something the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has a hard time doing when any debate is taking place in this House.

A national transportation policy is naturally a very difficult thing. By the same token, no one can deny the multiplicity of difficulties growing out of any attempt to resolve this dilemma. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in speaking to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on May 25, 1972, set out what he sees as our national transportation policy. In the time available to me I cannot repeat what he said at that time, but he made 17 or 18 suggestions about that which he is trying to do.

• (2130)

I commend the minister's speech of that date to anyone who wants to find out what we in this party are trying to do about a national transportation policy. The minister said that the structure of the ministry has been refined, that the new ports policy has been implemented, that the organization of the National Harbours Board has been updated, that the national policy council will play a key part in assisting policy formation, that most Canadian ports had their most successful year in history and that all ports responded well to the pressures caused by the United States longshoremen's strike. On and on it goes, all on the plus side of the picture. The minister did not duck anything. He came out with what he says is our national transportation policy. No one today volunteered to refer to the fact that the minister brought this forward. Naturally, in the half hour allotted to him he could not go through all three categories, land, sea and air, to the satisfaction of all the parties.

An hon. Member: He left the chamber.

Mr. Cullen: Yes, he left because like the wonderful minister he is, he has other duties and responsibilities to perform which he does beautifully. One of the problems we have in establishing a national transportation policy is the jealously guarded municipal and provincial jurisdiction, which means that a federal government in establishing a national policy must be prepared of necessity to deal with the provinces and with probably all the metropolitan areas which do not necessarily see eye to eye with their own provincial governments concerning the area in which priorities should be established. This is not to rule out the smaller rural and urban communities. But surely the provinces have the responsibility to deal with these communities and then to bring these ideas to a transportation policy conference.

A conference of this nature would have a tendency to get bogged down in political bickering, each one looking after his own community or particular responsibility. We would expect politicians to assume this role, and naturally they do. I am not too much in favour of in-camera meetings, but this is an area in which the country stands to gain tremendously if positive and compromising suggestions could be made by all levels of government and if all kinds of ideas could be brought about without the confrontation aspect that is bound to ensue under the glare of the mass media.

At the conclusion of the conference or conferences, because I can see many of these being necessary, communiqués could be issued and then the final analysis conference should be held in the hope of hearing ideas about the direction our transportation policy should follow. I do not look for an overnight sensational announcement arising out of these conferences, nor do I see a headline to headline type of communiqué such as the press and other media would like to see because it provides good stories: I see this as a long, hard grind before decisions are reached. In the final analysis it might very well be the responsibility of the federal government to take the leadership role and make the decisions which must be made on a national transportation policy.

Mr. Paproski: We will look after it following the next election.

Mr. Cullen: I do not know how you will look after it, because you will be back in Edmonton. It is just possible that the tri-level, municipal-provincial-federal conference would be the best forum at which to discuss this particular problem. Certainly at such a conference finances and taxation would dominate. That is to be expected, because I am satisfied that municipalities need a larger share of the tax dollar and a better method of taxation or system of sharing in revenues than their present, almost total reliance on real estate taxes supplemented of course by provincial grants gained in large measure from the federal purse. But in addition to taxes and finances, transportation surely must rate high on the list of priorities of such a conference.

My second recommendation would be that the Department of Transport is too large a federal department, dealing as it does with land, sea and air, and therefore I would suggest that the department be headed by a minister of transport who has assigned to him two ministers of state, one responsible for air and the other responsible for land and sea.

Mr. Baldwin: Are you available?

An hon. Member: Are you looking for a job?

Mr. Cullen: I know I could do the job, but I am not preaching for a call. I am trying to make some positive suggestions.

An hon. Member: You are fixing yourself up for the next election.

Mr. Cullen: It is nice of the hon. member to say I am fixing myself for the next election, because he is conceding we will win. It might even be suggested that three ministers of state be appointed with one responsible for land, one responsible for sea and one responsible for air transportation. We in Canada are fortunate that we have such a splendid Minister of Transport at the helm at the present time. I think Mr. Tissington says it very well in his column which appears in the Thompson newspapers across Canada but which I read in the Sarnia Observer. Mr. Tissington, a reporter, had this to say on June 3 of this year:

> The more I see transport minister Don Jamieson in action, the more I am impressed. The most recent wave of admiration occurred following meetings of the Commons Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Each session, Mr. Jamieson makes an appearance before that committee to be examined on his ministry's spending estimates for the current fiscal year.
> This annual appearance took place here the other day with the committee meeting in the morning, in the afternoon and again in the evening. Mr. Jamieson appeared at all three meetings, accompanied each time by a retinue of officials from his department. Some idea of the size and scope of the ministry of transport can be grasped from the fact that no fewer than 20 of these officials were on hand at the meetings, from the deputy minister to assistant deputy ministers, head of various branches—

This is why I say the department is too large and too great a responsibility for one man, although fortunately we have the right man at the helm. The article continues:

> Once in a while Mr. Jamieson refers a question to one of the experts but I get the impression he only does this to give them something to do or because he needs to pause for a minute or two to regain his breath after answering the ten preceding questions single-handedly.

In conclusion, Mr. Tissington says that if the minister cannot answer some questions, perhaps a parochial question of minor import, it is only a matter of a day or two before the member is sent the answer. Mr. Tissington also states that it is little wonder the transport minister is so popular and respected by his Commons colleagues. I could not have said this better myself.

I should like to make one other recommendation for the consideration of the Minister of Transport. At the present time I believe there are between 40 and 55 applications lodged with the Canadian Transport Commission by Canadian National Railways to cease passenger transportation to various communities in Canada. It is known by everyone that the CNR has no intention of abandoning this passenger service. But in order to secure the subsidy which it seeks, it is necessary for the company to appear before the Canadian Transport Commission with an application to abandon rail passenger service.

It seems to me it would be extremely simple to agree to an amendment so that when a railway company is applying for a subsidy it should have the right to go the direct route. In this way the local municipalities, chambers of commerce, citizens—and railway unions, for that matter—could support the railway in its application and it would be in their best interests to do so. The public relations benefits to be derived from such a procedure are self-evident.

However, when a railway sincerely wished or found it necessary to abandon a passenger service, it should make direct application to do so. In these instances the municipalities, chambers of commerce, railway unions, passengers and others could present their briefs in opposition to such an application. The opponents of such an application might very well establish that the passenger service could run, if it were subsidized, so the project could be dropped in the second category and a subsidy provided. Surely, however, the time has come to stop placing the railway companies in the position where they apply for the abandonment of a line in order to secure a subsidy.

These, then, in capsule form, are my recommendations: First, a national conference, probably using the tri-level meeting of municipalities, provinces and the federal government to discuss the transportation policy and transportation problems; second, the Department of Transport should be headed by a minister of transport with the assistance of three ministers of state, each responsible for a particular area of transportation; third, an amendment to the legislation which would permit the railway companies to apply for subsidies when they are looking for subsidies and to apply for the discontinuance of routes when that is their intention.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, after listening to "Cullen's fairy tales" I would suggest that if the hon. member is fortunate enough to come back here after the next election he might well qualify for fourth acting critic of the opposition on transportation.

There is only time for me to make one comment, and it is this. The national transportation policy as enunciated in section 3 of the act has been a dismal failure. It has not operated, it has not worked. This country is in a difficult and unfortunate position because of the failure of the government to implement anything like that policy.

I conclude this very simple statement by saying that when a new government takes office it will certainly have as one of its priorities a review of the national transportation policy and will do it, not through experts as the government would like but through a committee of the House, and it will propose a new policy and a new National Transportation Act. We are overdue in that regard. After listening to hon. members on the government side, it is quite plain that is what we must have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have perhaps only one minute in which to make my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps by consent the hon. member might be given 30 seconds.

Mr. Rose: I would just like to say that I was very interested in listening to that beautiful man from Sarnia, and his great defence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). I attended the meeting of the transport committee at which such glowing remarks were made about the minister. I agree that the Minister of Transport is an old smoothie, and I suggest he has a tremendous future in radio if he ever decides to retire from politics.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to special order made June 5, the time provided for the consideration of the business of supply at this sitting has expired.

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF FOURTH REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the fourth report of the Clerk of Petitions.

The report was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Fourth Report of the Clerk of Petitions

Wednesday, June 7, 1972.

The Clerk of Petitions has the honour to report that he has examined the petition of Herman Weisz, of the City of Ottawa, Ontario, in relation to a report entitled "Concentration in the Manufacturing Industries of Canada", dated March 31, 1971 and published by the Queen's Printer for Canada on behalf of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, presented by Mr. Andrew Brewin, Member of Parliament, on Tuesday, June 6, 1972, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Respectfully submitted,

Fernand Despatie,

Clerk of Petitions.

PETITION OF HERMAN WEISZ—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: The House has just heard the Clerk read the fourth report of the Clerk of Petitions in relation to the petition filed yesterday by the hon. member for Greenwood. Since the filing of the petition yesterday, I have had an opportunity to study very carefully the contents and substance of that document. The substance of the petition is that the petitioner who was a public servant was largely the author of a report entitled "Concentration in the Manufacturing Industries of Canada" published by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This report was attributed to be the work of a public servant, not the petitioner, under the direction of yet another public servant, also not the petitioner.

The suggestion is that it was wrong, and inaccurate in failing to give the petitioner credit for his part in the publication, thereby damaging his reputation. The petitioner urges the House of Commons to cause the person or persons responsible for the alleged wrongful appropriation of his work to publish a correction and to give him credit for his part in the publication.

Hon. members will recognize that it is a heavy responsibility of the Chair to ensure that petitions are in accordance with the historic practices and usages of the House. There is a fundamental right to petition the House of Commons, but that right should not be used to put aside other and probably more effective remedies. It is my understanding that there is an avenue open to the petitioner which has not been referred to in his statement of grievances. There is a precedent in the year 1956 to the effect that the House will not receive a petition dealing with a matter, the jurisdiction of which has been assigned to another body. This precedent may be found at page 163 of the Journals of the House for Thursday, February 16, 1956. I quote from the Journals of the House:

Mr. Speaker decided that, although the abovementioned petition met the requirements of Standing Order 70—

Now Standing Order 67.

—it was irregular in that it did not set forth a case in which the House had jurisdiction to interfere since Parliament had vested in the Governor in Council and in the Minister of Transport the exclusive authority to approve and issue licences for the operation of private television stations, and that the petition could not be received.

The Chair has other reservations concerning the substance and the language of the petition filed by the hon. member yesterday. The document, in my estimation—and I say this after much serious thought and consideration—is more in the nature of a remonstrance or a listing of grievances rather than a petition as it is understood by our usages and practices. Included in the substance of the purported petition are statements which, in my opinion, are charges of a very strong character against a minister and a senior departmental official.

As the House knows, assuming a petition to be acceptable from a procedural standpoint, further discussion or consideration of it may be carried out only by consent. We have to go back to the year 1962 for an instance where such unanimous consent was given to allow a debate in the House followed by a referral of the matter to a committee. Perhaps I might be allowed at this point to refer to Dawson's Procedure in the Canadian House of Commons, page 242, dealing with modern practice in relation to petitions:

These rulings and the procedure surrounding the reception of petitions have acted, in recent years in particular, to discouraging petitioning. At many times the House has shown itself willing to waive its rules, however strict, to allow the introduction or the passage of a measure it desires, but it has consistently refused to do the same with petitions. Not only is the possible subject-matter limited today, but the forms are strictly observed. The examination by the Clerk of Petitions ensures that many petitions will never be received by the House. Even if they are drafted properly and deal with a proper subject, the petitions cause little stir in the House: the Speaker informs the House that they may be received and they disappear from sight without comment. At best a member may present a petition in person and read the prayer; his fellow members nod agreeably and the petition disappears; there is no debate. The result of these restrictions and this procedure is that petitions are of little use today. Petitions for private bills are still common, but the old tradition by which an individual could pray for redress of wrongs and expect an alleviation of difficulties has fallen into disuse. It is unlikely ever to be revived.

In light of what I have read and said I wonder whether hon. members would not agree that, if allegations contained in a document were allowed to be inserted into our records, another possible injustice would be created.

I might refer hon. members to Citation 333 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition in reference to the use of language in a petition.

For the reasons stated, I feel that the document filed yesterday is not a petition which meets the requirements of the practices and usages of the Canadian House of Commons covering the receipt of petitions. With regret, because I know the matter is perhaps of interest to members, and certainly to the hon. member for Greenwood, I suggest that the matter cannot be brought to the attention of the House by way of petition. The hon. member knows as well as I that there are other ways a grievance can be submitted to the House. There are many avenues open to the hon. member if he wishes to pursue the matter, but I suggest, with regret, that the avenue of a petition is not the proper one at this time.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTINUANCE OF PRESENT DESIGNATED REGIONS FOR FURTHER PERIOD

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that, following consultations with the provincial governments, the Governor in Council has decided that regions now designated for purposes of the Regional Development Incentives Act should continue to be designated for an additional period of 12 or 18 months.

Regions designated in August, 1969, for a period ending July 1, 1972, will continue to be designated for a further period of 18 months, that is, until December 31, 1973. These regions include all of the Atlantic provinces except Labrador, all of eastern and parts of northwestern Quebec, part of northern Ontario, southern Manitoba, parts of southern and northeastern Saskatchewan, southern Alberta, and southeastern British Columbia. Regina, Saskatoon and Renfrew-Pembroke will also continue, until December 31, 1973, to be designated as special areas for purposes of industrial incentives.

[Translation]

Regions designated in January 1971 for a period ending July 1, 1972, will continue to be designated for a further period of 12 months—that is, until July 1, 1973. These regions include southwestern Quebec and parts of eastern Ontario.

By July 1972, current designations will have been in existence for somewhat less than three years. Six to nine months were required to bring the program into fullscale operation and, during the initial two years of the program, manufacturing investment, activity, in Canada as in many other countries, was at a relatively low level. As a result, experience under the regional development incentives program is only now becoming sufficient to permit meaningful evaluation. Intensive work to that end, and to review related aspects of the regional economic expansion program, is underway and will be followed by a process of thorough consultation with each of the provincial governments. The decision to continue existing designations will provide the time needed to complete this process.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the minister for extending the usual courtesy by providing an advance copy of his statement. Second, I should like to say we particularly welcome the announcement contained in the minister's statement that he is at long last undertaking an evaluation of the whole regional development program. This has been suggested many times in the House during the past two to three years. It has been suggested by the Canadian Council on Rural Development and by others as well. I can only say we hope that when this review is completed it will be made public to allow for critical and, if you like, independent analysis of that evaluation.

The minister's statement extending the term of all designated regions until December 31, 1973, really comes as no great surprise. We are, however, a little surprised at the brevity of the minister's statement; we are surprised that he said so little. In fact, we expected that he would take advantage of this opportunity on motions to respond to some of the criticisms that have been levelled at the program both inside and outside the House. Having said that, I readily admit that the minister has done a commendable job before the Standing Committee on Regional Development in his many appearances during the course of examination of his estimates. But that is not quite the same as making a statement of policy on motions in the House and giving the opposition parties a chance to reply for the record.

I had hoped that rather than continue to scatter public funds under the Regional Development Incentives Act in this ad hoc fashion across half the populated area of Canada, the minister would have shown greater selectivity and hence a greater appreciation of the regionally disadvantaged areas of the country. In our view it is not reasonable to suppose that development of viable secondary industries can be promoted in each and every one of the population centres across the vast area of the designated regions in this country which are found in every province in the land. In each of the designated regions there are centres which have a potential for the growth of secondary industry. It is in these centres that the incentive program should, in our view, be concentrated. This concentration can be done through the mechanics of industrial complexes, if you like, similar to the new Multiplex Corporation which is now under way in Saint John, New Brunswick, and which we feel hold the ultimate promise for the success of regional development in this country. However, this blunderbuss approach of the minister in fact defeats the purpose of the program by lavishly extending the designated regions right across the country.

We had hoped that the minister would take advantage of this procedure in the House to reply to the genuine reservations and concern that we have over the effects that the budgetary provisions with respect to capital write-off and accelerated depreciation will have on grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has indicated that in its view the accelerated write-off and capital depreciation provisions in the new budget will in fact dilute the effects of the Regional Development Incentives Act. Questions in this regard were directed to the minister in the House and to the Minister of Finance, but members have not been able to extract any assurances to the contrary. I have also been advised that the Atlantic Development Council, which answers to the minister, has this important matter under study.

May I say in conclusion that we regret that the minister has not revised the whole designated area concept and its application right across the country because we believe this defeats the very purpose of the government's policy to end regional disparity in this country.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for supplying a copy of his remarks to opposition spokesmen ahead of time. The first statement made by the minister is not true. He said,

> ... following consultations with the provincial governments, the Governor in Council has decided that regions now designated ... should continue ...

The cabinet made a decision on March 30 to continue the present basic designated regions to the end of 1973. The present designated regions were established in mid-1969 and have been in effect for almost three years. The government provided for a review by setting the June 30 expiry date this year. But now we are told there is to be no change. This is evidence that the program has failed. There is great disappointment and there will be great disappointment, particularly among the provinces, that there has been no change in content or in boundaries. The sum of $250 million has already been committed, much of it still to be spent, and the commitments are accelerating, but we have business as usual for the next 18 months.

In addition, there is no change in policy with regard to grants to foreign-controlled firms. I think we might have expected some change associated with Bill C-201. Why should any foreign-controlled firm want to take over a Canadian enterprise when it can get this type of industrial incentive grant to expand its present operations or to set up a new operation in Canada? In addition, they have over half the country to choose from when picking a location. The government should also note that Ontario is doing away with its program of forgiveable loans to foreign-controlled firms because the loans are doing no good.

A great deal of study was given to this program by the committee. There are many problems in its administration, but the minister has allowed the program to be used for short-run objectives. An evaluation program has not been developed even though the minister said last year that they were starting such a program. It is urgently needed now.

A Montreal Star editorial in the June 6 issue pointed out the following:

> The program, then, is ripe for a thorough reassessment. It is too expensive, and the needs for regional development are too pressing for policies to be taken on faith.

In committee I raised a question on the legality of the grants because clause 7 specifies that "no development incentive may be authorized ... if ... (a) it is probable that the facility would be established, expanded or modernized without the provision of such an incentive." Two deputy ministers have said that grants are merely likely to accelerate decisions rather than to effect a negative decision. But the minister has told us that no legal opinion has been obtained from the Minister of Justice on whether any grants can be given under these circumstances, and he gave no undertaking that such a legal opinion would be given.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, we believe that regional disparities must be overcome. Every Canadian in every region of the country has the right to share in national prosperity. The government is placing emphasis in its program on these give-away grants, now totalling a quarter of a billion dollars. The government has the wrong priorities in its program. The taxpayer is tired of paying money to industrialists, with no results to show for it. The program needs a complete overhaul.

A new program must be developed that includes direct state intervention to establish the nucleus of an industrial strategy in each region, an overhaul of the corporate tax structure to reflect the real social costs of locational choices by industry, a carefully planned infrastructure program co-ordinated with industrial development, and there must also be genuine consultation and co-operation with the provinces and with local groups and organizations rather than the phony consultations that the minister has just reported.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, where is the progress with regard to other programs which I think all of us can go along with, such as the multiplex program already referred to and the agricultural services centre program? These other types of programs certainly need much more priority than has been given to them.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I beg to congratulate the minister for the statement he has just made, namely that it has been "decided that regions now designated for purposes of the Regional Development Incentives Act should continue to be designated for an additional period of 12 or 18 months". I would have liked to receive a copy of his statement earlier, but it has just been put on my desk. It is regrettable because I would have had many comments to make on this matter.

The minister has also said and I quote:

> Regions designated in January 1971 for a period ending July 1, 1972, will continue to be designated for a further period of 12 months—that is, until July 1, 1973. These regions include southwestern Quebec and parts of eastern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, some might say that I talk in a parochial spirit, but I always think about the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. I congratulate the minister for the projects that have been carried out in this area, particularly in the Roberval riding, because the constituents are satisfied with the programs that have been implemented, although they are unhappy about the manner in which they were announced. I warn the minister not to use this kind of announcement concerning these programs as a political stepping-stone because I discovered when the last two were made that we were faced with a real Liberal organization and the people were saying that the event was "patronized" by the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will look at Standing Order 15 (3), he will see that any remarks he may make should be limited to the minister's statement and should not be designed to provoke a debate.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I did thank the minister in the first place, because he likes to be thanked.

Just the same I want to draw his attention on the matter because all the constituents of Roberval were disgusted, including some of the most sincere liberal organizers.

I have pointed out to the minister in committee the projects concerning the small local industry. I think that in general, too much attention has been given to the large industry, the so-called millionaire industry at the expense of the small local industry. Yet it is the latter which provides jobs and not the large industry. Indeed, as soon as some aid is granted to the large industry, it abolishes jobs, while the local industry does the opposite.

The minister is well aware of that fact, since I have already drawn his attention on it. I hope he will take the matter in consideration because I know he is not stubborn. Indeed, he takes heed of criticism and I hope he will do so when announcing the establishment of industries in the Roberval constituency.

IMMIGRATION

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I ask permission of this House to move the following motion:

That the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration investigate the circumstances of the suicide of Alicia Wiercioch, a mother aged 35 years who was ordered deported by the Immigration Appeal Board, and that the committee review the Immigration Appeal Board Act and related federal legislation and regulations and consider amendments to these and other acts as necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, in view of this tragedy and other near tragedies and hardships related to the operations of the federal legislation and regulations dealing with immigration and deportation cases—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has indicated what his motion is. As he knows, the rules are clear that the case cannot be argued. The hon. member has already indicated the terms of the motion. I think the Chair has no alternative at this point but to inquire whether there will be consent. This motion is put to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous agreement. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

Some hon. Members: Who said no?

An hon. Member: The Grits again.

Mr. Trudeau: I didn't, but you never know.

Mr. Jerome: I did.

POLLUTION

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion. Having in mind the pollution by oil of beaches in the Crescent Beach and White Rock area of Surrey-White Rock constituency, which resulted from a relatively minor oil spill at Cherry Point refinery, U.S.A., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That this House invite the U.S. Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Rogers Morton and the Administrator Environment Protection Agency, Mr. William Ruckelshaus, to visit the afflicted area and to see, at first hand, a small sample of the inevitable desecration of the west coast which will result from the proposed shipment of Alaska oil by tankers to Cherry Point.

Mr. Speaker: The motion suggested by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having in mind the recent oil spill at Cherry Point which is causing severe pollution damage in Canadian waters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather):

That a message be sent to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence requesting it to proceed forthwith to the west coast to carry out an investigation of the oil spill at Cherry Point and to report back to the House.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is also submitted under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

POLYMER CORPORATION—DISMISSAL OF PERSONNEL

Question No. 2—Mr. Orlikow:

How many people were dismissed by Polymer Corporation in the year 1971 (a) with professional degrees (b) technicians (c) others?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Polymer Corporation Ltd., advises that: The number of employees whose employment with Polymer was terminated in 1971 was as follows: (a) 35; (b) none; (c) 84 (24 employees have since been re-employed with the company).

Questions

DEVELOPMENT OF GASPÉ REGION

Question No. 230—Mr. Burton:

1. What were the amounts of federal funds spent in each fiscal year to date under the Federal-Provincial Agreement with the Province of Quebec on the development of the Gaspé Region, signed in May, 1968?

2. What were the corresponding amounts spent by the Province of Quebec?

3. In each of the above years, how were the amounts of federal funds spent, distributed according to specific activities?

4. In each of the above years (a) what amounts of federal funds were spent on consulting, research and similar fees (b) what were the names of consultants, researchers and other personnel of this kind (c) what were their assignments (d) what amounts of federal funds were paid to these experts?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. 1968-69, $2,184,605; 1969-1970, $7,306,221; 1970-71, $12,145,086; 1971-72, $19,041,616.

2. This information should be requested from the Province of Quebec.

4. One major study of transportation problems, undertaken by Lalonde, Valois, Lamarre and Associates, was financed wholly by the federal government (DREE and CTC) at a cost of $202,233 in 1969-70 and $22,470 in 1970-71. A large number of studies directed by the province were also conducted on a cost-sharing basis, the federal contribution over the period totalling $1,493,772.

BUTTONVILLE AND TORONTO-MARKHAM AIRPORTS

Question No. 359—Mr. Ryan:

1. Will operations at the Buttonville Airport and at the Toronto-Markham Airport be allowed to continue when the proposed new Toronto Airport is put into operation?

2. Is it the intention of the government to become involved in discussions with provincial, regional and municipal authorities aimed at providing Toronto with a downtown airport?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. While some procedural control might be necessary, operations at Buttonville Airport will be allowed to continue. Continued operations at the Toronto-Markham Airport will not be possible in view of the close proximity of this site to the new airport location.

2. Yes.

AIR CANADA—RELOCATION OF WINNIPEG PERSONNEL

Question No. 392—Mr. Rowland:

1. Is it the intention of Air Canada to further reduce the number of dispatchers and assistant dispatchers located at Winnipeg and, if so, on what date?

2. Is it the intention of Air Canada to relocate the flight crews now located in Winnipeg and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The dispatch function at Winnipeg was terminated in November 1970. At that time five Assistant Dispatchers were permitted to remain in Winnipeg until such time as they were required at other locations. It is expected that all of these will have been relocated by June 30 this year.

2. There are no present plans to reduce the number of flight crews in Winnipeg. However, the number of people required to fly aircraft and to cater to passengers is dictated by the number of flights and the type of airplane used.

Questions

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO ZAÏRE FOR ROAD TRANSPORT PROJECT

Question No. 398—Mr. Godin:

Has the government granted a loan to Zaïre for a road transport project and, if so (a) when was the loan granted (b) in what amount (c) what is the interest rate (d) what is the duration of the loan?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government has granted a loan for a road transportation project in Zaïre; the details are as follows: (a) approved by the minister on February 14, 1972; (b) $4,000,000; (c) 0 per cent interest; (d) 50 years with 10 years of grace.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Question No. 443—Mr. Schumacher:

1. To date, how many people have been arrested under the provisions of the War Measures Act?

2. How many of these (a) were released without charge (b) had charges withdrawn (c) had proceedings stayed (d) were charged?

3. How many of those charged pleaded guilty and to what offence did they so plead?

4. How many were found guilty?

5. How many pleaded not guilty and to what offence did they so plead?

6. How many of those pleading not guilty were found guilty and of what offence or offences?

7. How many cases are still pending and what are the pleas and charges in each case?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): On the basis of information supplied by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of the Province of Quebec: 1. 465, two of whom were re-arrested, making a total of 467 as of March 15, 1971.

2. (a) 403; (b) none: (c) all charges laid under the War Measures Act were stayed by nolle prosequi at the request of the Attorney General on July 31, 1971; (d) 86 under the War Measures Act and 19 under the Criminal Code, against 62 persons.

3. 13 persons on two or more counts under sections 4(a), 4(c), 4(d), 4(e), 4(g) and 5 of the War Measures Act.

4. See answer to part 6.

5. 49 persons on two or more counts under sections 4(a), 4(c), 4(d), 4(e), 4(g) and 5 of the War Measures Act.

6. 5 persons on two or more counts under sections 4(a), 4(c), 4(d), 4(e), 4(g) and 5 of the War Measures Act.

7. None.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—TRIPS AUTHORIZED, 1971

Question No. 444—Mr. Paproski:

What trips did the Department of External Affairs authorize in the 1971 calendar year for personnel of each of the following Canadian Embassies in (a) Russia (b) Poland (c) Czechoslovakia (d) Hungary (e) Roumania (f) Cuba and in each case what were (i) the names of the staff members concerned (ii) the length of their absence from Ottawa (iii) the destinations (iv) the dates?

[Mr. Duquet.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Apart from the U.S.S.R., members of the diplomatic missions in Canada of the countries referred to in question 444 are not required to file travel notices. U.S.S.R. Embassy personnel in Ottawa are free to travel without giving notice within a 75 mile radius of the centre of Ottawa but when they wish to travel beyond this radius, the embassy is required to give this department 48 hours notice of their intent to travel. While records of all trips under the travel regulations are maintained, it is not the government's practice to put them in the public domain.

TRUCKS AND CARS OWNED BY CNR

Question No. 454—Mr. Godin:

1. How many automobiles does the CNR own which are available to its employees?

2. What make of trucks does the CNR own and how many of these trucks can be used on railway tracks for daily inspection?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. There are a total of 472 automobiles which are made available generally to employees in the sales, investigation, claims and telecommunications functions where the continual and full-time availability of a car is essential to the efficient discharge of the employee's duties.

2. (a) Assuming make of truck means name of manufacturer: GMC, Ford, Chrysler, International, White. (b) 26.

SEGREGATION OF WASTE PAPER BY HOUSE OF COMMONS FOR RECYCLING

Question No. 485—Mr. Kaplan:

1. How much waste paper was discarded from the Parliament Buildings in a recent accounting period (a) what efforts are made to segregate waste paper from other wastes (b) what efforts are made to assure that this waste paper is recycled?

2. What efforts are made by departments to assure that waste paper discarded by such departments is recycled?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned: 1. Approximately 120 tons of left-over or waste paper was removed from the Parliament buildings in the calendar year 1971; (a) The contractor, Florence Paper Co. Limited, segregates all waste paper picked up, through a screening operation at their plant. (b) All useable paper is identified through this screening operation. Useless waste material is taken to the city dump.

2. CADC is responsible for negotiating the contract with Florence Paper for monitoring the removal and recycling the waste paper generated by government departments.

CNR DERAILMENTS IN QUEBEC

Question No. 490—Mr. Godin:

From November 1, 1971 to March 31, 1972, were there any derailments on CNR tracks in the province of Quebec and, if so (a) how many (b) how many people died as a result of such derailments (c) how many were injured (d) in each case, what was the estimated damage in dollars?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Yes. (a) 22; (b) one; (c) six; (d) Estimated damage to railway property: $2,381, $39,958, $1,549, $110,800, $2,704, $14,680, $219,016, $201,000, $40,000, $12,325, $12,050, $3,208, $4,231, $6,114, $16,938, $162,000, $91,835, $88,941, $505,064, $121,674, $2,608, $4,497.

UNUSED CNR RAILWAY PROPERTY

Question No. 505—Mr. Noble:

1. Has the government given any consideration to releasing property deserted by the Canadian National Railways to the local municipalities?

2. Will the government take some action toward having the weeds and brush cut on such unused railway properties?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No consideration has been given to this activity as a specific program. As a general rule, in the case of disused rights-of-way the railway attempts to dispose of them in as large blocs as possible by offering them first to provincial departments of highways for road purposes, then to Hydro for power transmission line purposes. If there is no interest on the part of these agencies, local municipal governments are then approached; piecemeal disposal to adjoining owners is used as the last resort.

2. As property released from active use for railway purposes is subject to local ordinance where weed control is concerned, it is not contemplated that direct federal action will be taken with respect to weed and brush cutting on such lands.

REPAYMENT OF LOAN—JAMAICA TRANSPORTATION SURVEY

Question No. 538—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise of the terms of repayment of the loan to Jamaica for the Jamaica transportation survey?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Jamaica Transportation Survey entails two stages: Stage I, a comprehensive transportation survey completed in 1970. Stage II, technical and economic feasibility studies of high priority transportation projects arising from Stage I. Two of these have been undertaken. They are the Airports Study and the Road Engineering Studies, both of which commenced in 1971.

Stage I of the transportation survey and the Jamaica Airports Study are among the studies carried out under the loan agreement signed August 2, 1967 for pre-feasibility, feasibility and pre-investment studies in Jamaica.

The terms of the loan are: (a) Interest is payable at the rate of 3 per cent on the amount of the loan drawn by Jamaica and outstanding. (b) The principal amount of the loan is repayable in semi-annual instalments due and payable on the last day of March and September in each year commencing on September 30, 1974 and ending March 31, 1997.

The Road Engineering Studies in Stage II of the transportation survey are the subject of a separate loan agreement signed October 20, 1971.

Questions

The terms of the loan are: (a) Interest is payable at the rate of 3 per cent on the amount of the loan drawn by Jamaica and outstanding. (b) The principal amount of the loan is repayable in semi-annual instalments due and payable on the last day of March and September in each year commencing on September 30, 1978 and ending March 31, 2001.

COST OF "INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES"

Question No. 540—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise of the cost of the first issue of the publication "International Perspectives" and what is the estimated cost per subsequent issue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The cost of printing the first issue of the publication "International Perspectives" was $5,525.98; 5,460 English copies and 1,635 French copies were produced and distributed.

The estimated cost of printing each subsequent edition, which will have a wider distribution, is $5,900.

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO BANGLADESH AND PAKISTAN

Question No. 549—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is Canadian assistance to Bangladesh included under Canada's participation in the Colombo Plan?

2. What are the major long-term Canadian assistance projects now under development in (a) Pakistan (b) Bangladesh?

3. What major Canadian development projects are now being planned for (a) Pakistan (b) Bangladesh?

4. Are any further contributions for short-term relief to Bangladesh being contemplated by the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canadian assistance to Bangladesh is not included under Canada's participation in the Colombo Plan. Bangladesh is not yet a member of the Colombo Plan.

2. Pakistan—Canadian assistance to Pakistan has in the past been concentrated largely in the generation and distribution of electric power. Two major projects which are presently being implemented in this sector are the Tarbela Dam and Irrigation Project, $5 million and the Hyderabad-Karachi Interconnector, $4.4 million. In addition Canada has almost completed the installation of an Earth Satellite Station.

Bangladesh—Canadian development assistance currently being implemented is primarily directed towards the immediate rehabilitation and reconstruction needs of Bangladesh, particularly in the transportation, agricultural and power sectors. Projects approved by the minister so far include railway track material $7 million, commodities $5 million, power system equipment $1 million, and shallow draft vessels $2.5 million. The minister has also approved the continuation of an existing priority development project in the agricultural sector involving the provision of tubewell casings, $5 million.

3. Pakistan's immediate requirements stem from the loss of foreign exchange earnings and raw materials which previously came from the now separated east wing.

Projects presently under consideration are therefore aimed at providing commodities and spare parts which are urgently required to keep Pakistan's industries functioning.

Bangladesh's immediate rehabilitation and reconstruction requirements will continue to predominate over long term development considerations for some time to come. At the present time projects involving locomotive spare parts and replacement parts for existing Canadian projects are under consideration in CIDA. Discussions are continuing with the government of Bangladesh to identify additional priority reconstruction and rehabilitation requirements.

4. In addition to previously announced contributions to multilateral and Canadian voluntary organizations, arrangements are currently being made to provide $15 million in wheat to Bangladesh, and discussions are under way with the Bangladesh government on the provision of an additional $5 million worth of either wheat or rapeseed oil.

TRAINING OF BRITISH TROOPS AT SUFFIELD, ALBERTA—LOCATION OF THE DEFENCE RESEARCH ESTABLISHMENT

Question No. 579—Mrs. MacInnis:

1. Did the British-based ship Sir Bedivere during the first week of May, 1972, unload a cargo of heavy duty tanks and ammunition at the Port of Vancouver?

2. Was the cargo bound for the site of the Defence Research Establishment at Suffield, Alberta and, if not, what was its destination?

3. Did another ship with a similar cargo arrive in April?

4. Is another ship expected about the middle of May?

5. Is a ten-year agreement in force by which British troops in groups of between 600 and 1,000 men will train each year for about three weeks between the months of May and November on three training sites, one of them being Suffield?

6. Are such troops being trained for urban and guerilla warfare and, if not, for what purpose are they being trained?

7. Are such troops to be used in Ireland?

8. What is the area of the training base at Suffield?

9. What studies, if any, were made as to the effect of such training on the grassland ecology of the area?

10. What is the anticipated cost of developing the base facilities for this troop training at Suffield?

11. What is the expected annual payroll cost of permanent Canadian and British staffs, and of civilian employees hired locally?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Environment as follows: 1. Yes.

2. The destination of the cargo was Canadian Forces Base, Suffield but has no connection with the Defence Research Establishment.

3. No. However, two ships arrived in March with cargoes of staff cars, armoured personnel carriers and heavy engineer equipment.

4. Yes. The ship arrived on 14 May, 1972.

5. The ten-year agreement relates to various aspects of training in Canada but the training of British forces in groups between 600 and 1,000 men applies only to Suffield.

6. No, the troops are from units in the NATO formation, British army of the Rhine, and are being trained in the conduct of conventional warfare.

7. British authorities have confirmed that the training to be conducted in Suffield is not related in any way with the British troop operations in northern Ireland.

8. The area of the whole Canadian Forces Base, Suffield is 629,910.12 acres. Approximately two-thirds of the area will be used by British forces for training purposes.

9. See Sessional Paper No. 283-7/44 tabled October 27, 1971.

10. New construction costs, which are recoverable from Great Britain are estimated to be $1,232,000.

11. Annual payroll costs are estimated to be approximately $1,400,000. The costs of the permanent Canadian staff and civilians hired locally will be recovered from the British government.

[Mr. Sharp.]

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA—NUMBER OF INDIAN STUDENTS REGISTERED FOR HIGH SCHOOL

Question No. 603—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many Indian students from Northern Reserve communities in Manitoba registered for High School in Winnipeg last fall?

2. How many of these are still attending school?

3. What reasons for leaving school were given by those who dropped out?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the reply to Part I is 334 and the reply to Part II is 201. In reply to Part III, the following reasons were given for dropouts: (a) Problems of social adjustment in school and boarding home; (b) Family problems at home which necessitate withdrawing from school.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRANTS MADE BY NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD IN LIEU OF TAXATION

Question No. 76—Mr. McCleave:

On what date or dates, and in what amounts, did the National Harbours Board make grants in lieu of taxation for each year since, and inclusive of, 1967, to (a) Halifax (b) Saint John (c) Quebec City (d) Montreal (e) Vancouver?

Return tabled.

DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS IN OTTAWA

Question No. 429—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Which countries where Canadian diplomatic missions are located have not reciprocated this arrangement with the establishment of their own mission in Ottawa?

2. Do any countries with diplomatic missions in Ottawa not have Canadian missions stationed within them and, if so (a) which ones (b) does the government have any plans to establish missions in these countries?

3. Is it intended to open a full-time office in Dacca for the use of officers of the Canadian mission accredited to Bangladesh and, if so, on what date?

Return tabled.

INCOME TAX RETURNS FILED BY FARMERS IN YEARS 1966 TO 1970

Question No. 550—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many farmers filed income tax returns in each province in the years 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970?

2. How many of the returns in each province recorded incomes of (a) less than $2,500 (b) $2,501-$5,000 (c) $5,001-$7,250 (d) $7,251-$10,000 (e) $10,001 and over for the years 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970?

3. What was the total amount of income tax collected from farmers in each province for the years 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970?

Return tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I return once more to point out the failure of this government to answer starred questions and the delays which can only have resulted from an intention on the part of a minister to treat this House with contempt. I refer to questions Nos. 589 and 616, both of which concern the Department of the Solicitor General. This is not the first time I have had reason to complain about delays on the part of that minister who shows to this House an adamant disregard of the rights of Parliament and a contempt that cannot be justified in any way. Certainly inertia is not an explanation for refusal to answer these questions. I find it necessary at the same time to point out that unless starred questions are to be answered it is a ridiculous waste of time to mark them as starred questions, and that some action should be taken by this House to bring recalcitrant ministers to the realization that starred questions should be answered within three days.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, as a result of comments by the right hon. gentleman in the past I have looked into these matters. I know some work has been done and that in both instances the answers are very close to completion. Hopefully, we may be able to table them soon.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Question No. 88 has been on the order paper since February 18 last and was on the order paper during most of the previous session of this Parliament. I have raised this matter on several occasions. It is a very simple question involving whether the government is going to re-establish or repair the walk around Parliament Hill previously known as lovers' lane. Apparently after two sessions of parliament the government cannot make up its mind on this question. One would think they would know by now what they are going to do, but apparently not.

An hon. Member: You don't use it.

An hon. Member: This is leap year.

Mr. Nesbitt: I might remind Your Honour that it is summertime and—you know!

An hon. Member: Explain!

Mr. Nesbitt: The second question is No. 557, also a very simple question inquiring about the amount of money paid for an alleged piece of art.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: If nothing else, at least I have managed to put the House in good humour this afternoon. It involves something called "Klonos"—I am not sure whether that is a Greek word—and a very large sum of money was paid for it. It consists of eight pieces of fibreglass and I am wondering why—

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might like to reply to the hon. member. I do not think it is necessary to make a long speech and bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that a question has not been answered. The parliamentary secretary may wish to reply.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I have made a note of the numbers of the question and of the tremendous impact on the way of life of the Canadian people of the subject-matters therein contained. I will certainly direct attention to them right away.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 59 is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the wish of the House that notice of motion No. 59 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 59—Mr. Nielsen:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the financial statements of the Yukon Native Brotherhood for each fiscal year during which grants have been made to the Brotherhood by any department or agency of the government.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 11?

Motions for Papers

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. JOHN CARSON AND HON. JOHN N. TURNER REGARDING BILINGUALISM IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Motion No. 11—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a coy of all correspondence between Mr. John Carson, Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Hon. John Turner, Minister of Justice, regarding bilingualism in the Public Service and its application under the terms of the Public Service Employment Act.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this correspondence in general cannot be identified as government papers as such but, rather, should be identified as correspondence between the Minister of finance, as a Member of Parliament, and one of the established institutions of government. In addition, some of the correspondence reflects on the personal competence or character of individuals and some of the papers are private and confidential. It is respectfully requested that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, since the parliamentary committee is now meeting to discuss a question of concern to a great many people in Canada, namely, the question of merit, I think this correspondence is vitally important and I certainly do not intend to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, some time ago I had on the order paper notice of motion No. 6 which has to do with an order for the production of all documents, reports, letters, papers and statements relating to the release of Yves Geoffroy from penitentiary. I would also refer to notice of motion No. 15 which has to do with copies of all documents, application forms, photographs and letters leading to the issuance of passports to Geoffroy and Carmen Parent. I wonder whether the Solicitor General could produce those papers? The other papers were produced. Both these notices of motions ought to be taken together.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General had some conversation with the hon. member about the other notice of motion he referred to. I shall certainly ask him if he will be good enough to discuss with the hon. member the matter he has raised.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to Your Honour for raising this matter again, but I do so in the same manner as the right hon. member for Prince Albert raised a point concerning starred questions. I am referring to notice of motion for production of papers No. 40, having to do with a copy of the evaluation report of the government's 1971 opportunities for youth program. This has now been on the order paper for almost three months and the estimates have been passed for next year's program. I find it passing strange that no response has been made. I would ask Your Honour and the officials of the House to consider seriously the plight of hon. members who have placed on the order paper notices of motions for the production of papers which stay there for an inexplicably long time. I wonder if there is not some responsibility on the part of ministers to respond to these requests when they are placed on the order paper?

[Mr. Jerome.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices or motions stand?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State could indicate when we might expect an answer to a fairly straightforward motion for papers?

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notice of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDUSTRY

LANARK INDUSTRIES, DUNNVILLE—REASONS FOR POSSIBLE CLOSING OF PLANT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce respecting the plant at Dunnville, Ontario, operated by Lanark Manufacturing. I assume the parliamentary secretary will be fully informed and able to answer this question. In view of the alleged closing of the plant and the possible relationship between this and the automobile pact, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been in touch with the management of this plant to obtain some explanation of what is going on and the reasons for such action?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take that question as notice and refer it to the minister.

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN AMERICAN POSITION BECAUSE OF RECENT CANADIAN TRADE DEFICIT IN AUTOMOBILES AND PARTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the apparently dramatic change in the figures for trade between Canada and the United States in automobiles and automobile parts, which show Canada in a deficit position for the first three months of this year as opposed to the surplus position about which the United States authorities had complained, has the government been in touch with the United States authorities and has this apparent turnaround evoked any change in the position taken by the United States administration with regard to modifications in the pact?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been personally in touch with any of the United States officials on this subject but I will gladly ask the minister if there has been any contact.

LANARK INDUSTRIES, DUNNVILLE—ALLEGED THREATS IN PAST TO CLOSE PLANT WHEN FACED WITH DISPUTES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister any information regarding previous threats by Lanark Industries of Dunnville, an American-owned corporation, to close down operations when faced with individual disputes in the past? If he has that information, would he give it to the House? If not, will he try to obtain it for us?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will look into that. I do not have any information before me.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CONTINUANCE OF DESIGNATED REGIONS—POSITION OF PROVINCES—NATURE OF CONSULTATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion arising out of his announcement this afternoon in which he told us that the extension of the program which he announced had been discussed with the provinces. Can he inform the House whether any provinces agreed to the policy of extension without asking for changes in the structure and application of the incentives program? Was there unqualified agreement by all provinces or only by one or two, as I suspect?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there was any general answer. Some agreed to the renewal without modification; many suggested modifications. However, we decided we should keep the designated areas as they are until 18 months have elapsed.

Mr. Lewis: Can the minister briefly indicate what was the nature of the consultation? If the government had already made up its mind to make these extensions without bringing in changes either in the program or in the boundaries of the areas, what was the nature of these consultations with the provinces, or were they merely informed of the government's decision?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker. There was real consultation. We asked the provinces to comment on what we intended to do. Some indicated they wanted some changes in the designated areas. A few even suggested modification of the whole system. Those are the matters on which we will negotiate during the period which has been announced.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I take it I am to understand from the minister's reply that he asked for comments so that he could either ignore them or study them later rather than take them into account in his program, which is not very great federal-provincial co-operation. Would the minister undertake to table the correspondence between himself or his department and the provincial governments subject, of course, to the provincial governments agreeing that the correspondence or any documents exchanged with respect to the program he announced today be tabled?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question into consideration and consult with the provinces to learn what their opinions are.

SIDBEC—INQUIRY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion contributed, or will it be contributing in the near future to the establishment and expansion of the Sidbec steel works in Contrecoeur, which were inaugurated last Monday by the Premier of Quebec?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a grant totalling some $6 million has been offered to Sidbec. However, it is not quite sure that the grant will reach that amount as it will all depend on the work being completed before December 31, 1973.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON ORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): May I ask the minister whether he is in receipt of the results of the study conducted into the organization of his department by the Canadian Council on Rural Development? If the minister has received such a report, will he table it in the House at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will look into that, Mr. Speaker.

CONTRECOEUR—CONTINUANCE OF SPECIAL AREA STATUS

Mr. Speaker: Did the hon. member for Chambly have any other supplementaries for the minister?

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the minister's statement to the House a few minutes ago, is the Contrecoeur area still part of the designated area.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

CONTINUANCE OF DESIGNATED REGIONS—DATE OF CABINET DECISION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Would the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion care to inform the House on what date the cabinet made its basic decision to extend the present designated regions by 12 and 18 months respectively with respect to industrial incentive grants?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I do not have the date in my mind. I may check and answer later.

Mr. Burton: I should like to ask the minister this question. In view of the fact that the cabinet decided on March 30 to continue the present designations, eight days before the minister began to consult with the provincial premiers, would the hon. gentleman explain to the House why he bothered to carry on this consultation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously argument and not a question.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Can he say whether current negotiations are such that we may hope for an early settlement of the longshoremen's strike which so far has caused considerable harm to business in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Our objective is, of course, to bring an end to this dispute as rapidly as possible. This morning I transmitted to each party in the dispute the wire received from the other party. These telegrams expressed a willingness on the part of the parties to see arbitration procedure go forward. I have urged them today to give me an assurance that they will in fact take this step and initiate arbitration procedure either singly or jointly.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Will the minister tell us whether he gave them an alternative if they did not comply with the request submitted in the telegrams?

Mr. O'Connell: Both the law and the collective agreement are explicit as to what steps should be taken in disputes of this nature. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to suggest alternatives to that which the law requires.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

INDUSTRY

LANARK INDUSTRIES, DUNNVILLE—POSSIBLE CLOSURE —SUGGESTED USE OF EXPORT PERMITS TO PREVENT SHIPMENT OF USED MACHINERY FROM CANADA

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to direct to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It relates to the Lanark plant at Dunnville. In view of the fact that on Monday night 11 transport trucks carrying machinery left that plant, reportedly bound for the United States, would the department consider introducing a system of export permits applicable to used machinery with a view to preventing the wholesale shipment of foreign plants out of Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I would be pleased to take that question as notice as well.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SCREENING SYSTEM TO KEEP OUT UNDESIRABLE PEOPLE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to address this question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Justice since at one stage he was charged with responsibility in this area. In light of the fact that the Japanese terrorist, Kozo Okamoto, was in Canada as late as March, 1972, and since many other hoodlums and gangsters such as Jerry Rubin, James Earl Ray, Bremer and others have been in Canada, is the government considering setting up some sort of screening system at ports of entry in order to keep out these undesirable people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I am sure that at an appropriate opportunity the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will be glad to inform the hon. gentleman exactly what precautions are now taken and what the procedures are governing entry into Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: When the Minister of Justice next has a conversation with the minister presently in charge of immigration, would he ask him to make a statement on motions setting out the rules and regulations concerning the requirements for the issue of visas and other regulations governing visitations by people of this kind, particularly when there are 9,000 applications pending before the Immigration Appeal Board, including many by deserving people who cannot get their cases heard?

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF PETITION OF HERMAN WEISZ ALLEGING INJUSTICE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and of his parliamentary secretary, may I address my question to the acting minister if there is one or, if not, to the Prime Minister. Will the minister give consideration to the petition of Herman Weisz which was referred to earlier today and which alleges a serious injustice done to a public servant. Will he make a statement remedying the injustice if he finds it exists?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly take notice of the question on behalf of the minister.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED ASSISTANCE TO GOVERNMENT BY ETHNIC COMMUNITY LEADERS TO SOLVE PROBLEM OF BACKLOG OF APPEALS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I am a little embarrassed because the hon. member for Parkdale has alluded to this issue by way of a motion under Standing Order 43, but perhaps it is a legitimate question. In view of the tragic suicide in Toronto of a Polish woman who came here in 1968 and was ordered deported yesterday, will the government consider, as a matter of urgency, a proposal to invite leaders of Canadian ethnic communities to assist the government in evolving an equitable and speedy technique for solving what is obviously a serious problem posed by the substantial backlog of applications to the appeal board which are still pending?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The minister has stated on a number of occasions that he is considering new legislation to meet some of the problems which have resulted in this backlog. He has, of course, been in consultation with various ethnic groups across the country in an informal way. He also has the benefit of the advice of Members of Parliament, many of them members of our party, who have given him valuable advice on matters affecting ethnic groups.

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would request the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to investigate the circumstances surrounding the death of Alicia Wiercioch?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The circumstances, in so far as they concern our administration, are reasonably well known. The application was rejected many months ago and the appellant's lawyer lodged an appeal with the federal court. It was while this appeal was pending, and no action was being taken on it, that the death occurred. At that time the immigration and manpower people had not been engaged in any way in pursuing the case. We were waiting for the pursuance of the motion in the federal court. As far as other circumstances are concerned, I do not believe they are under the jurisdiction of this government.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Would the Prime Minister give consideration to getting rid of some of the members of the Immigration Appeal Board?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF LAW

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is a short supplementary. In light of the facts that have come out in questions and other hon. members have put concerning Canada's immigration policy, can the Prime Minister tell us whether there is anything on the tracing board with reference to changing the rules governing immigration, particularly when deserving people are held up and other kinds of people are permitted to enter Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will check. The hon. member referred to some board. I am not sure to which board he was referring.

• (1500)

Mr. Woolliams: May I repeat my question. I thought it was clear; perhaps it was not. In light of the facts brought out in questions and answers with reference to immigration, is there anything on the government's tracing board to change immigration policy whereby deserving people will get their applications to stay in Canada heard and those who are not deserving will be kept out?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the minister to read the hon. member's question. I am still not familiar with the kind of board to which he has referred.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has a supplementary, but again I bring to the attention of the House that we are running short of time. There are a number of distinguished colleagues in the fourth and fifth rows who fell by the wayside yesterday and I should like the opportunity of recognizing them today.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER FOR DEPORTATION OF TUAN VU

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister, in consultation with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, give consideration to asking the Immigration Appeal Board to reconsider the deportation order in the case of Tuan Vu since, if the order is implemented, he will almost certainly face execution in South Viet Nam?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a particular case of which I have no knowledge. If the hon. member will send me the name of the person I will look into the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR LIST OF NON-LANDED IMMIGRANTS USING CANADA FOR POLITICAL ASYLUM

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is the government prepared to table a list of non-landed immigrants in Canada who are using Canada either for temporary or for permanent political asylum?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that such a list exists. We do not have a doctrine of asylum in this country.

INDUSTRY

SARNIA OLEFINES AND AROMATIC PRODUCTS PROJECT—PUBLICATION OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BOURASSA TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

With reference to the question which the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) asked yesterday, namely, whether the Prime Minister of Canada had received a letter from the Quebec premier concerning the development of the petrochemical industry of interest to this province, the Prime Minister having indicated that he had not received such a letter, could he advise us today whether he has found the letter in his mail, and what is Quebec's position?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed found a letter from Premier Bourassa concerning the matter of the chemical industry, but without any reference to the industries and the special project in Sarnia which the hon. member mentioned in his question; there, no doubt, is the source of our misunderstanding. I have not yet replied to this letter which, I think, dates back less than two weeks.

GRAIN

IMPLICATION OF PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS AND TRUCK DELIVERY TO INLAND TERMINALS IN LIGHT OF GRAINS GROUP REPORT ON HANDLING

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. With the recent purchase of hopper cars for the movement of grain and the use of trucks to deliver grain to inland terminals, would the minister inform the House whether we are seeing a piece by piece implementation of the grains group report on rationalization of the grain handling system in western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, what we are seeing is the way in which the government is dealing with the problem of moving record volumes of grain and an expansion of the system as required, whether it be for cleaning or handling grain. We are also seeing the co-operation of all parts of the industry in order to ensure that these record volumes of grain are moved.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF GRAINS GROUP REPORT ON RATIONALIZATION OF HANDLING

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the same matter to the same minister. Is he now prepared to make public the report of the grains group on their study of transportation problems connected with grain movement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the study in question has been given fairly wide distribution to producer organizations as well as to provincial governments, the companies most directly involved and the Canada Grains Council. We are having discussions with the Canada Grains Council regarding the steps to be taken from this point forward both in developing further information programs and on development within the handling and transportation system itself.

TRUCK DELIVERY TO INLAND TERMINALS—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASED COST TO FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the decision to truck grain to our inland terminals could result in greatly increased costs, up to 14 cents a bushel, some people say, can the minister assure the House that either directly or indirectly the farmers will not have to bear the brunt of what seems to be a fairly costly experiment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The movement of grain to inland terminals is not new. The departure in using trucks rather than rail equipment is the only difference. This is not necessarily more costly than rail movement. Further matters being examined include the possibility of more direct hauling by the farmers themselves to the inland terminals, which is likely to be the cheapest of all ways of moving the grain.

Mr. Speaker: There are five or six members rising to ask supplementaries on this subject, which I suggest will take until the end of the question period. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Churchill and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is on the same subject. In areas where the one and only elevator is being phased out, has the government any plans to assist farmers with the extra haulage necessitated by the provision of trucks to haul grain to the nearest elevator?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the tradition has been for this to be a simple decision by certain segments of the grain handling industry, the individual elevator companies. There has been no government involvement. One of the purposes of the over-all study of the system was to consider the question from the point of view of maximum benefit to the producers, and this is precisely the kind of question that I expect the Canada Grains Council and other producer organizations to make representations about in the very near future.

SUGGESTED AUTHORIZATION OF CANADA GRAINS COMMISSION TO ACT AS LONGSHORING COMPANY BECAUSE OF STRIKE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in the absence from the House of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the request by Mr. Atkinson, president of the National Farmers Union, to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board as well as to the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Agriculture that action be taken, to authorize the Canada Grains Commission to act as a longshoring or stevedoring company in order to ensure that the movement of wheat through the St. Lawrence ports can be resumed, would the minister inform the House what action is being taken either by himself or the Minister of Agriculture on this request?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it would be premature to make a response to that specific question at this time. The delicate situation on the St. Lawrence is, of course, fully in the mind of the Minister of Labour and I would want his views on any action in this regard.

[Later:]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question I asked earlier. This situation is not only delicate but to western farmers it is disastrous. Can the minister in charge of the Wheat Board tell the House whether the Board of Grain Commissioners or the Canadian Wheat Board have been asked to assess the situation at the St. Lawrence ports and the extent to which it is affecting the movement of grain both for export and domestic use in Quebec and in the Maritimes?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, naturally, the Canadian Wheat Board and the minister have been in discussion about the difficulties which the labour situation in the Montreal area can create for the movement of grain. We are very concerned about it and have made this concern known to the Minister of Labour who has indicated to the House his great concern about this matter and also how he thinks a solution should be found.

ADDITIONAL SALE TO CHINA—PAYMENT OF FREIGHT—ADEQUACY OF PRICE TO RETURN PROFIT TO FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. There is widespread interest among western farmers concerning the recent sale of wheat to Communist China. They are wondering whether the price is one that will return to them any advantage or profit, in other words, more than the estimated cost of production today which, according to the group that met recently in Minneapolis, is $1.76 a bushel. Would the minister say whether or not, first, the government of China or the purchasing agent for China is paying the freight on this sale and, if so, from which point to which point? Second, is the price being received one that is really in the nature of a fire-sale price which will return very little, if anything, to western farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated many times in the House, and I am sure in the past by the right hon. gentleman himself, pricing information about sales made by the Canadian Wheat Board is confidential commercial information. I can assure the right hon. gentleman, however, that the pricing negotiated by the Canadian Wheat Board is the best possible obtainable in a competitive market. I can also tell the right hon. member that the ordinary practice is for the buyer to pay the freight on grain, either basis Vancouver or Thunder Bay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer amounts to nothing. It is simply a multiplicity of words chasing an idea. The minister says that it is not customary to allow the price to be known. A couple of weeks ago he told me that it is very easy to figure out because from day to day the Wheat Board announces its sale prices. The minister has stated that it is not a fire-sale price. I challenge him to produce the record and show what the sale price was.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT MOTION TO REFER PUBLIC ACCOUNTS FOR YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1971, TO COMMITTEE BE PROCEEDED WITH

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government House leader. Will he move at the earliest possible opportunity the motion that stands in his name that the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1971, and the Auditor General's report thereon be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts? If he would do that I can assure him there would be no debate on the motion as far as this party is concerned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if it is understood there would be no debate, I would be happy to move it as the first item of government business today.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

TENDERS FOR RECONSTRUCTION OF COLLEGE GYMNASIUM AND LIBRARY FOLLOWING FIRE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. With your permission, may I first say how much it was regretted that he was unable to be present over the weekend at the fourth graduation ceremonies of the Canadian Coastguard College.

In view of the great concern expressed not only by many parents and cadets but also by the director of the Canadian Coastguard College regarding lack of proper facilities at the college, will the minister advise how soon tenders will be called for replacement of the gymnasium and library which were destroyed by fire?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot give an accurate date. I can only say to the hon. member, as I believe I have on previous occasions, that there is no intention in the foreseeable future to move the college. I have asked for information as to just what is necessary in respect of the whole complex, because this matter does not only involve rebuilding what was destroyed by fire; there is also some necessity for upgrading and renovating existing buildings. As soon as I have that information I will let the hon. member know.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, will the minister do his utmost—I know he will because he is always very willing and obliging—to move this study ahead, thus preventing the inadequacy of facilities causing discomfort to the students who are trying their best to get ahead in their studies?

GRAIN

ALLOTMENT OF ADDITIONAL RAILWAY EQUIPMENT TO MOVE FEED AND EXPORT GRAIN BECAUSE OF LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Can the minister in charge of the Wheat Board say whether he, the Minister of Transport or both of them together have had any discussion with the railways as to facilitating the direct movement by rail of feed grain for domestic use in Quebec and the Maritimes and grain for export?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that question, in what seems to be an extremely general form, has to be answered in the affirmative. I think the hon. member has something more specific in mind, but he would have to particularize his question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized on a last supplementary question, but we do have to move on.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the minister for not being clear. Has an additional allotment of railway equipment been put into service for the movement of feed grain for domestic use and export grain to the Maritime ports in order to alleviate the situation at the St. Lawrence ports?

Mr. Lang: Not in connection with the immediate situation, Mr. Speaker, although there are general discussions about the use of additional equipment for possible movements of this sort at different times of the year.

[Mr. Muir.]

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—SUBMISSION TO MINISTER OF PROPOSALS FOR SUBSIDIES

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and arises from the fact that his speech yesterday was cut off in full flight. I should like to ask whether his speech as recorded covered all his proposals for a new Atlantic transportation policy, or whether there are any specific proposals in that part of his speech which unfortunately did not get on the record?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have very serious doubts about that question. Perhaps the hon. member would like the minister to pursue the speech he was making yesterday, but a question in that form is not in order at this time.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might rephrase my question. The Minister of Transport referred to discussions he had with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission and the federal-provincial agency and to various areas of agreement that were reached. Has a date been agreed upon by the minister and the commission as to when these specific proposals will be presented to him for selective subsidies?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, but I would be prepared, as I indicated to the commission, to receive them as soon as possible. I asked them, in fact, if they would undertake this particular job. I have not had a definite confirmation from them that they will undertake it, although I suspect they will. When I get that information I will, as I assured them, act on it immediately.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether these discussions covered the whole range of railway freight rates and whether agreement has been reached on the action to be taken to hold freight rates in line until a policy has been evolved?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the commission did not specifically ask that question. I think the emphasis was primarily on the matter of selectivity and the more useful employment of the tens of millions of dollars that are now being expended in one way or another. It was agreed that this money was not being expended to the best advantage. The discussions were more in respect of selectivity than on the question raised by the hon. member.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROPOSED FREIGHT RATE INCREASE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER HOLD DISCUSSIONS WITH CARRIERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Transport yesterday about the Canadian Railway Express Association intention to ask the Canadian Transport Commission for a further freight rate increase in Atlantic Canada, and perhaps all across Canada. The minister replied that he was limited under the act as to what he could do with the CTC. I appreciate in large part the limitations on him, but is the minister going to do anything in the way of moral suasion or persuasion such as his colleague the Minister of Finance does in dealing with the banks? Will he discuss this matter with the Railway Express Association to find out why they feel this increase is necessary before it becomes a fait accompli, some time after June 19?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am in reasonably constant touch with both the railways concerned. I might point out to the hon. member that more than 50 per cent of the traffic affected, if my figures are correct, is carried by truck. Of course, we do not have very much more than moral suasion, to which he referred, in regard to the trucking industry, but I would be glad to meet with them on the subject to see what can be done about it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the statements contained in the annual report of the Public Service Commission and the statements made by the chairman of that commission before a committee of this House indicating an emasculation of the merit system, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to request the resignation of the chairman of the commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in order for me to comment on what is happening before a committee of the House. The hon. member might refer to the act, where he will find that the chairman of the commission is an officer of Parliament and can be removed only on a joint address by both Houses. The hon. member or his party might want to initiate that procedure; this government does not.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would hope so, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE PIPELINE THROUGH EASTERN ARCTIC—ASSURANCE OF MAJORITY CANADIAN OWNERSHIP—HYPOTHECATION OF GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his comment on a television program to the effect that he would prefer to see majority Canadian ownership of pipelines tapping northern gas reserves. My question is about the proposed pipeline in respect of which Panarctic Oil is now doing aerial reconnaissance. Has the government any plans to ensure that such a pipeline, if and when it is built, will have majority Canadian ownership?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the same objective should apply in respect of a pipeline through the eastern Arctic as to one through the Mackenzie Valley. As the hon. member knows, all that is being done at the moment is photographic reconnaissance of a possible route.

• (1520)

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of Mr. Heatherington, the president of Panarctic, that market considerations would indicate that this gas, if Panarctic brings it down from the north, would go to the United States, I ask the minister if this is government policy and does the government intend to have this gas hypothecated to the United States, in view of the statement of the National Energy Board that as of June 30 last there was a deficit of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time and hon. members should try to limit the length of questions.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, government policy is as stated in the National Energy Board Act: that the actual export of any particular quantity should be determined by the board. Of course it is the board's decision to determine whether the TENNECO agreement, which is the one the hon. member is referring to, should be carried out or whether the gas should remain in Canada.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION FOR CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary. I should like to ask the minister whether the government has yet received an application from any company or consortium for the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We hear a great deal, Mr. Speaker, from the bush telegraph on this question, but I think I am right in saying that neither myself, the National Energy Board nor my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has received any formal application at the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSSIBILITY OF ARBITRATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour in order to clarify the contents of the telegrams to which he referred. Have the parties to the Montreal dock strike indicated their willingness to go to arbitration, pursuant to the terms of the contract? Have they actually said they are prepared to do so?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of an opportunity to clarify the answer I gave earlier to the hon. member for Shefford. In the reply of one party there is clearly an indication to proceed to arbitration. In the reply of the other party I would put it this way: there is an indication of not being unwilling to see an arbitration procedure pursued by the other party.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind hon. members that there are just one or two minutes left before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: I have one supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer of the minister and the fact that this strike is costing the country $100,000 per day, can the minister advise the House when he figures the government should step in, in view of the fact that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member is asking an academic question which I would judge not to be in order. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

TAXATION

INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR DELAY IN MAKING INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. On June 2 the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador inquired about the long delay being experienced in processing income tax returns. Is the minister now in a position to reply to that question?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, I am, Mr. speaker. The answer is rather lengthy because it is somewhat detailed. I sent the hon. member a letter this afternoon setting out the information. I would be pleased to have the letter printed in Hansard or dealt with in a way satisfactory to the House, if the hon. member wants the answer to be given publicly.

[Later:]

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the statement of the minister, I wonder whether he would agree to having the letter printed in Hansard today so that it might be available to all members of the House? It is a matter of general interest to all Canadians.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair would suggest that the letter be tabled rather than have that kind of correspondence appended to Hansard. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

COMPLETION OF CONSIDERATION OF BILL BEFORE ADJOURNMENT OF HOUSE—TIME REQUIRED TO IMPLEMENT PAYMENTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell the House if the government proposes to proceed with the FISP bill before the adjournment of the present session, has there been any review of the timetable for the bill to become operative? I am thinking of the statement made the other night by his deputy minister to the effect that it would be eight months before payments could be made under the new plan.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As to the first part of the question, it is generally the position of the government that we will complete our deliberations on the bill. As to the second part of the question, the reasons were given in the committee for the time interval before actual implementation and were well set out by the deputy minister. They have a good deal to do, of course, with the administrative difficulty in terms of sending out the applications, obtaining the returns and processing them through the computer.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

SPECIAL AGENCY TO CO-ORDINATE USE OF COMPUTERS AND COMPUTER PROGRAMS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a correction, in effect, to Hansard of yesterday in respect of an answer to a question by the hon. member for Wellington, recorded at page 2888 of Hansard, about the co-ordination of computers within the government. He asked under whose jurisdiction is the agency responsible. There are two agencies in fact or two bodies. The Department of Supply and Services has a computer service bureau which provides a general computer service to other government departments, but responsibility for co-ordination and development of the total framework of computer use is with the Treasury Board.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Perhaps I should put to the House first the motion referred to earlier by the President of the Privy Council. My understanding is that this motion is to be put without debate.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL

AMENDMENTS TO CANADA ELECTIONS ACT AND INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, May 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-211, to amend the Canada Elections Act and the Income Tax Act in respect of election expenses, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was before us some days ago I had the opportunity to make a few initial remarks. Among them was the conclusion I drew, that this piece of legislation is very important for the operation of our democratic system because it affects the true operation of an electoral system in Canada.

I am sure most Canadians are unaware of the amount of money spent on elections. This was especially true when we had elections more often than we do now. The amount spent on elections has over the years grown considerably. It is interesting to note it is estimated that election expenses in the federal election of 1968 amounted to approximately $31 million. In a country with a population of 20 million people this would seem to be a great deal of money to spend on an election. For this reason most Canadians are concerned about curtailing election expenses, that undue expenses be not incurred, that there be the shortest possible time for the electoral process and that our election procedures be such that the least influence be felt by the political parties in electing a government.

This process has been distorted over the last few years by the huge expenditures made by certain corporations in the election of a government. In 1956, in the province of Quebec election expenditures became so flagrantly extravagant that the people of Quebec showed great resentment and came up with a number of changes in the electoral process which curtailed some of the exorbitant and less worth-while expenditures.

Obviously, this happens as well in the province of Ontario. The amount of money spent by the provincial government in the last Ontario election was phenomenal; the expenditures they incurred were ridiculous to the degree of overkill. In my opinion, those expenditures have put the Ontario government in bondage to the insurance companies in particular for the rest of their term of office. Some companies in Ontario made extravagant expenditures, but those which did so most flagrantly, those which have obviously received most consideration from the government since that time, are the insurance companies. As a result, every person in Ontario who buys automobile insurance, house insurance and fire insurance, and who in fact deals with an insurance company in the province which takes in an excess in premium payments, pays part of the expenses of the provincial election.

Over the years we have recognized that the people who raise money for political parties are an important group. The present government and past governments have recognized this over the years by appointing many of the bagmen to the Senate. The expression "bagmen" has not been used by the New Democratic Party, probably because they can carry the money around in a small satchel. These men are sometimes rewarded by appointment to the Senate.

In exposés that have been made on the contributions which bagmen have raised it has been indicated—again, particularly in the last election in Ontario—that they know exactly who is going to make what payment. The bagmen go to the financial supporters with an indication of the range of payment which they expect from them. This relates to the contribution they made previously and also to the contribution it is expected they should be able to make. I suppose it goes up as the cost of living goes up. In regard to the requirements of political parties, their being similar to those of other people, cost of living escalator clauses are a familiar term to bagmen and instead of asking for $1,000 they might ask for $1,250.

Without question, in the last election Ontario abused all our democratic principles relating to elections. It was almost impossible to make a legitimate choice between the various political parties in Ontario because the predominance of publicity and the preponderance of information being disseminated by the media in the province was overwhelmingly in favour of the Davis campaign. It seems to me that this operation is similar to that of a soap company which advertises that its product is better, washes whiter, and uses all the other exorbitant advertising clichés. They seem to have been successful on the North American continent, because if you are willing to put money into the news media quite often the sale of your commodity goes up. Obviously, if they did not you would not be paying for advertising.

Under our system, a certain expenditure must be made to meet the cost of elections. This is a big country and a number of points of view must be expressed. Advertising or buying time on the news media, particularly in the urban centres, is very expensive. For this reason time on the news media is almost exclusively limited to those who have a large amount of money.

Let us look at the two major fund-raising drives that were held in Toronto recently, particularly the government fund-raising drive. It is interesting to note the people who were present at the fund-raising dinner. They included such people as representatives of IBM, which had received DREE grants totalling $6 million; representatives of Union Carbide, which had received DREE grants of $1,395,000; representatives of Canadian Johns-Manville, which had received a grant of $307,000 from DREE; representatives of Falconbridge Nickel Mines, which had received $4 million from DREE; and representatives of Noranda Mines, which along with its subsidiary Gaspé Copper Mines Limited had been favoured with DREE grants totalling more than $4½ million.

There were others at those fund raising dinners who I am sure had not received DREE grants. I am not suggesting that the bagmen would request contributions in light of the DREE grants which were received, but I suggest that most political parties have friends who expect certain considerations from them.

I was not surprised the other day when the Liberal party refused to support our request to have representatives of the chain stores appear before a House of Commons committee to ascertain whether the huge profits they were making were exorbitant and whether they could be curtailed to the benefit of the consumer. I was not surprised that the Trudeau government did not see any merit in that suggestion. What surprised me, however, was that the Conservative party rejected the idea of investigating the chain stores.

This bears out the charge that is sometimes made, that the party in power receives large contributions from most corporations and the opposition receives contributions relative to the results of the polls and the expectations of people who under certain circumstances believe that insurance in this form must be taken out. In my opinion, this means there is always some pressure applied because of these contributions. I admit that in the New Democratic Party also there is interest in the funds that we receive, particularly the small donations. Quite often they are from old age pensioners or other persons who make a donation of $5, which is a considerable donation and a hell of a lot more than a donation from Noranda Mines to the Liberal party in terms of what they get out of it and the amount they have to play with. They, in turn, expect some consideration from the party which they think has done them some good and which they hope will do them some good in the future.

I am sure most members of the House agree that there are a number of reasons, which are fairly well known, why election expenditures should be curtailed and kept to a minimum. There would be less and less influence bought through the support of a political party. This system is not unique to Canada but exists in every democratic country in the world. If we did not have a democratic system we would be operating under a system such as exists in the U.S.S.R., where the government pays their share of the expenses at the price of absolute control.

In all countries operating under the democratic system a close study has been made of ways to curtail these expenditures to the advantage of the democratic, electoral process and they have come up with controls which are not apparent in this bill. A committee has studied this matter. I understand that after a great deal of compromise its members unanimously agreed on a number of recommendations. This bill is quite insufficient in its treatment of those recommendations; many of them are not included within its provisions. Among the questions that have to be considered is the limit to be placed on candidates' expenses. I think there is general agreement that the limits originally placed on candidates have been fair and reasonable, but the limitations stipulated in this bill for political parties will lead to great abuses.

What is foreseen here is completely the reverse of what happens in my political party. When calculating the budget for my riding on the basis of membership in our provincial organization, we agree that 20 per cent of all moneys raised should be transmitted to the provincial party. It in turn distributes money to the federal party if a federal election is involved. I understand this is the reverse of what happens in other parties.

In my own area the amount available is already fairly well known; in fact, one candidate used part of it for a nominating convention, I may say to the chagrin of other candidates. Just putting a limit on the amount of money raised by a candidate is useless if the money comes from outside a riding. This is particularly so if a candidate is defeated, because then those amounts will not have to be disclosed. Under the law, disclosure must be made by the elected candidate; there is no penalty for defeated candidates who do not file proper returns.

To my knowledge, a number of things have happened that are not covered by the provisions of this bill. During election campaigns you find government departments being used to do work for the party in power. Ralph Nader, the watchdog of the American consumer, has laid charges against several United States government departments, including the department of agriculture, for supporting a particular political party. In Canada I would probably select our Department of Agriculture because of the announcements it makes during election time.

This bill does nothing to control that situation. I point out that a number of government departments already operate automated typewriters, either singly or in banks. For example, message No. 7 is fed into a computer attached to the automated typewriters and they type personal letters to be mailed in accordance with a list of names and addresses. The body of those letters is made up of a pre-recorded message. Banked, automated telephones are also used for this purpose. A number of telephone numbers are fed into these banks and they use a pre-recorded message something like, "We are calling you, Mrs. Smith, because you are a housewife. We know you are concerned about the high cost of living. We want you to know that 'X' party is doing something about it. Thank you very much for allowing us to speak to you, Mrs. Smith." Such devices are not really a factor in Canada yet, but they are being used with devastating effect by political parties in the United States which can afford this type of operation.

There are many deficiencies in this bill. There must be an accounting system but it should not be through the Minister of National Revenue. The present minister may be a very trustworthy gentleman, but I will be surprised if he cannot find some use for the information that will be at his disposal. A minister in that portfolio could go down the list of all the corporations in Canada and if he found one that had not made a contribution to his party then I suspect that corporation would have difficulty in getting a DREE grant. Just imagine the situation if the minister were sitting in cabinet and a number of his colleagues made a great pitch for company "X", he knowing that the company had not contributed to his party and that his vote would be influenced by this kind of information. This difficulty could be overcome by establishing a registry in which to list contributions to political parties, where the lists could be publicly inspected.

There is another side to this donation business, Mr. Speaker. Under the provisions of this bill a company may donate $1,500 to a political party and one third of that, a maximum of $500, is tax free. In other words, a company may deduct that amount from its tax; and we must bear in mind the fact that the tax structure at that level is about 30 per cent. If we want to keep people honest we should know which orchestra is being paid and who is paying them. In that way we will have a better idea of the tune that is being played. Further, this registry should list contributions made to all candidates and not only to elected candidates. It should list annual contributions to political parties.

The Barbeau report recommended a total prohibition on public opinion polls during election campaigns. If public opinion polls did no good and were of no political value, I should be able to convince some of my leaders that we should not conduct them. In my opinion, the Gallup poll has on occasion influenced elections unduly—in fact, on at least two or three occasions during the last ten or 15 years. The Canadian people deserve better electoral reform legislation than they now have, and I think the general public is in favour of electoral reform in order to make the democratic process as effective, as efficient and as painless as possible.

• (1550)

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That Bill C-211 be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned this afternoon with the subject of electoral expenses and reform, the financing of elections and the financing of political parties. It is unquestionably a subject of the greatest importance: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who led off the debate for our party, emphasized this. He pointed out a number of inadequacies in the bill and mentioned that there were at least three factors of particular importance that the bill touched upon: one, the matter of contributions to electoral expenses of parties from the public treasury; two, the control of the expenses of parties and candidates; three, the question of the disclosure of the source of funds.

I do not know how much good the provisions in the bill relating to disclosure will do, and I do not object to them nor to the question of disclosure of category. I realize that there is strong feeling in the country in favour of disclosure of names of individuals or corporations. I say quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I do not endorse the suggested requirement of individual disclosure because I have considerable respect for the power of government to bring influence to bear upon those who are opposing it.

It has been said, of course, partly by way of joke, that under this bill with its provision for the deduction of contributions for tax purposes up to a certain point, the government would have the best of both possible worlds; that by virtue of the disclosure that would have to be made to the Department of National Revenue, the government would know who was making contributions without having to make any disclosure itself. I see no alternative: if one is going to encourage contributions by allowing tax deductions, these of course have to be claimed through the Department of National Revenue. I am not as cynical about this as the hon. member who just spoke, and I hope my comments in this regard will be justified when some such measure becomes law. I put it that way because I wish to make it very clear that I am not supporting the bill which is before the House at the present time.

The question of contributions from the public treasury toward legitimate candidate and party expenses is an important one. It is a principle which I favour with great zeal, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of important reasons for supporting legitimate contributions to serious candidates, under proper conditions, in elections. One of these reasons is that it provides a better opportunity to candidates who do not have substantial financial backing; it gives them a chance to get their point of view before the electorate and to mount an effective campaign.

Secondly, the provision of a reasonable contribution from the public treasury toward expenses of parties and candidates reduces the dependence of these parties upon any one source of funds. When I say that, I am not for a moment subscribing to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) with regard to chain stores and the attitude my party took the other day. It might have occurred to him, upon reflection, that the suggestion contained in the resolution with regard to the reason for the high price of food was a little simplistic in attributing this to chain store profits. A day or so later somebody else suggested quite emphatically that with the present price structure many grocery stores, not necessarily chain stores, were going broke.

I do not believe that contributors influence party decisions in that respect. I think it is very desirable that all parties have this additional source of public funds from the public treasury under appropriate conditions. I think it does, to that extent, tend to increase the independence of bona fide political parties in this country. I therefore emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I very strongly support the principle of a contribution from the public treasury under proper conditions. I favoured this when it was done in Nova Scotia, although I was not responsible for it. I think it was a marked step forward. In many of the reports I have received in respect of the province of Quebec it has been seen as a marked step forward.

The conditions, of course, must be that candidates and parties are serious and receive a certain percentage of the votes cast. I would think, also, that any contribution from the public treasury must be related in some way to contributions from other sources; in other words, it should not be a fixed contribution but should be proportionate to the contributions made to the party or the candidate from other sources. Clearly, if a candidate cannot get some basis of support generally, he ought not to be entitled to any kind of lump sum contribution from the public treasury. I want to emphasize that I strongly endorse the principle of contributions from the public treasury under proper conditions, namely, that the candidate receives a specified proportion of the votes cast in his constituency and that the contribution from the treasury be in some way related to the amount of the general contribution that the candidate receives.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize equally strongly that the contribution from the public treasury should be toward the expenses of the candidate generally and should not be directed toward particular expenses of the candidate or party. Under our democratic institutions I think the party or the candidate should decide how funds are to be expended. This is a decision to be made by the candidate and the party, and not by Parliament. I feel that this is a matter of principle which is departed from in this bill. The contribution from the public treasury should be a percentage of the expenditures in all legitimate categories made by the candidate, up to a prescribed ceiling.

• (1600)

Again, Mr. Speaker, if there is to be a contribution from the public purse toward the expenses of a candidate or party, it seems reasonable and clear that there should be an over-all limit. If the public treasury is to make such a contribution, in my view it is necessary for over-all limits to be placed on the expenditures of candidates and parties. There should be an over-all limit, not simply a limit on the spending of the candidate or party on such things as advertising and publicity. I question the wisdom of imposing limits only on advertising or publicity expenses of a candidate.

Moreover, clearly it is useless and it is wrong to limit simply the spending of a candidate or party on publicity while leaving completely open the amount that can be spent in other categories. For instance, most of us in politics recognize that the publicity you get in the news columns or on the news shows of the networks is worth much more than advertising. Yet this bill, as I understand it, while limiting the amount that a candidate or party can spend on direct advertising, does not limit in any way how much the candidate or party can spend on extravaganzas designed to create news and be reported on news shows. I mention this to show the absurdity of restricting spending in areas like publicity while imposing no ceilings or restrictions at all on the over-all spending of candidates or parties.

This bill is put forward as a reform measure at the eleventh hour. As I said, I cannot support it. I am strongly in favour of electoral reform and I am certainly anxious to see contributions made from the public treasury, under appropriate conditions. These should not be to meet selected categories of expenses but to meet expenses generally. The party or the candidate should be allowed to decide how the money should be spent; it is not for Parliament to tell candidates how to run an election. I would favour that, provided there is an over-all limit on expenditures. That limit should be incorporated in any provision providing for contributions from the public treasury. It is nonsense and absurd to introduce a bill which simply limits expenses on publicity but leaves the sky as the limit for all other kinds of expenses. I say this is an absurd bill. I cannot regard it seriously as a measure put forward in terms of electoral reform.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The bill has been brought in at the eleventh hour. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a commitment in 1968 to give this whole matter top priority. As far as I can see, he forgot about it. Indeed, a few months ago he made it clear that the government could not introduce the bill in time for it to be effectively implemented during the next election campaign. Then, as a result of the public razzing which the Prime Minister took, he decided to honour the commitment he had made in the campaign of 1968 and this bill was produced in great haste.

There is much evidence of the obvious haste with which this bill was produced. For example, newspapers are not to be allowed to indulge in partisan political comment for 24 hours before the day of the election. That does not mean that election activities will have stopped. We saw a good example of this in 1968 when the Prime Minister was involved in what was not, perhaps, in the narrow sense political activity but in activity which was widely reported. This activity on the night before the election, it is thought, had a widespread effect on the way a number of people voted the next day.

What does this kind of restriction mean as contained in the bill? What does the restriction that newspapers cannot comment for 24 hours before election day mean? Does it mean that there can be no interpretative news stories about what might well be the crucial, final moments of an election campaign? Does it mean that there will be no stories at all about the climax of the campaign? Of course, the government might say that this is not its intention, but that is not good enough. In legislation, intentions do not count—words count.

Speaking of intentions, what are we to make of the intentions of this government? Five months ago the Prime Minister said, both in this House and in an outside interview, that there was no possible way in which a viable law could be passed before the election. I do not regard this as a viable law and I certainly agree with him to that extent. I quote the Prime Minister when he answered the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

> I am told, Mr. Speaker, that would be an impossibility.

The Prime Minister was saying that it would be impossible to introduce such legislation in time for it to be effective in the next election campaign. I continue:

> Even if the legislation were passed now—

And this was said almost four months ago.

> —unless we were going to have an election very late indeed, or even beyond the constitutionally permitted time, it would be difficult to have legislation effective in time for that election.

That is what the Prime Minister said in February. Now, because of public razzing, he has brought forward the bill before us.

Mr. Woolliams: It is all window-dressing.

Mr. Stanfield: What kind of game is the government playing with Parliament and the people of Canada? That is the question we have a right to ask ourselves. That is the question the Prime Minister must answer, if he can. The hon. member for Hillsborough and others have already shown in detail some of the faults and inconsistencies, as well as inadequacies of the bill. For my part, I do not hesitate to accuse this government of making a desperate attempt to produce some election fodder at a time when it sees all legitimate election issues escaping its grasp. I am very much in favour of genuine election reform, Mr. Speaker. However, we are not prepared to permit this government to use Parliament in this way and abuse the Canadian people by pushing through a bill that is nothing but a sham.

The measure before us is not a measure of election reform. I have given my reasons for saying so. It is not even a good excuse for such a measure. However, it is a measure of something; it is a measure of this government's desperation in face of an impending defeat at the polls. It is a measure of its readiness to try any cosmetic surgery possible with which to make itself prettier. The Prime Minister is willing to swallow any and all of his presumably well-considered statements of the past in order to try to fool the Canadian people. But he will not succeed.

He will not succeed in making the Canadian people believe that this bill will bring more democracy to the political process when it does no such thing. He will not succeed in convincing the Canadian people that this government is sincere about electoral reform, when it brings in such a bill now, four months after the Prime Minister solemnly said that it could not realistically be introduced in time for the next election; that is, of course, unless the Prime Minister is planning on delaying the election until the constitutional time limit is reached. That is what he said would be involved when he replied last February 18. I do not accuse the Prime Minister of any such intention. I think he intends to call the election soon. He cannot do otherwise, on the basis of those democratic traditions which he says he accepts. However, if that is the case then the Prime Minister is playing a juvenile game with a most serious subject. Electoral reform and the subject of financing the election of candidates and parties are far too serious to be handled in this way.

Some say that though the bill is inadequate, certain of its proposals relate to detail and these can be corrected. I agree there are details in the bill which could be corrected in committee. Some argue that the bill, while very faulty, amounts to a step in the right direction. Mr. Speaker, I would support very willingly a bill which provided for a contribution from the public treasury to the expenses of parties and candidates generally, rather than being confined to certain aspects of political activity. I object to that in principle as tending to limit the freedom of expression of candidates.

As I say, I would be happy to support a bill which made a general contribution, with appropriate safeguards, leaving discretion to the candidate, provided there was a general, over-all ceiling and not just a limitation on certain expenditures by candidates and political parties which left everything else wide open. If a general contribution were proposed with proper safeguards plus policing, I would support such a proposition very gladly. I hope to have the privilege of introducing a bill along those lines in the House before very long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I cannot support the bill before us, however, because I have grave objections to it in principle of the kind I have mentioned. It is a bill which contributes only toward certain limited expenditures, a bill which does not place any limitation in a meaningful way upon the expenditures of parties and candidates, despite the fact that the government proposes to make a contribution from the public treasury toward those expenditures. I cannot support a bill in these terms because in my view it is wrong. I shall therefore vote against it and support the motion proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I decided to rise only after listening to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for whom I have a great deal of respect. I listened very carefully to what he said and I agree with a large portion of his remarks. I would suggest to him, however—this is also by way of a plea to the government House leader—that all is not lost at this stage. I hope I am not being naïve in expressing this view.

No doubt all is lost in terms of there being any limitation imposed on election expenses in time for the next general election, particularly if it is held within the next five or six months. I should like to remind the House, however—in doing so I am sure I am supported by my hon. friend from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—that 12 good men and true, plus two or three others, took turns sitting on a special committee of this Parliament which laboured for more than a year on this issue and came forward with a report which in most ways, in my opinion, is the best which has come forward so far. I should also like to remind the House that a large number of members of both parties subscribe to almost all the recommendations made by that committee.

I say to the Leader of the Opposition that I hope this bill passes the House today and goes to committee. I hope he is wrong in terms of his suspicions about the motives of the government in bringing this legislation forward at this time and in this manner. Possibly he hopes he is wrong, too. One way of finding out whether the government genuinely means business in this area is to let the bill go to committee and be dealt with at the report stage. If the government cares to accept amendments from members of other parties, or brings in amendments of its own in certain significant areas of the legislation, I believe this could be made an effective measure. No single hon. member would be able, of course, to get everything he wants nor should he expect to do so.

I should like to find out whether the government means business, and for this reason I should like the committee to deal with the bill this week and, if necessary, the week after. If the committee has to sit daily next week, I for one would be prepared to do so. I hope the minister will reconstitute the special committee composed of those 12 good men and true who worked for a year on their report and allow them to deal with the bill after it has been referred to committee. If, however the government wishes to refer the bill to the Committee on Privileges and Elections—of which, incidentally, I am also a member—I hope the membership of that committee will not try to re-thresh all the straw which was threshed for a year by the special committee and for two years before that by the Barbeau commission.

I hope, also, that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will take part in this debate and tell us that he is prepared to listen to ideas for improving this legislation. It would be better still if he could go further and indicate amendments which the government might be seriously considering at this moment even thought it might not have made up its mind finally about them. It will soon be evident whether the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members who have spoken in the debate are right and the government is just playing games, or whether they really mean business and want an effective piece of legislation passed by June 30.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak only briefly at this time. The subject is one which has already been debated a good deal and, as well—as we have been reminded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin)—a considerable amount of time has been spent on it in the special committee.

I may say that I share much of the suspicion and misgiving which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) expressed in connection with the motivation of this legislation—its production of what is really the eleventh hour. I have no doubt the only reason we are discussing the bill at this moment is that its absence would be a continuing source of public embarrassment to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I clearly recall a television program at which an old news clipping was shown containing statements by the Prime Minister committing the government to dealing with the whole issue of election expenses as a major priority. It was only a few months ago, though, that the Prime Minister stated he had no thought of coming forward with legislation in this area during the present Parliament.

What we are dealing with, therefore, is a deathbed repentance and in these circumstances we should examine what the repentance is all about. It concerns something which is basic to the function of democracy in this country, something which has to do with what is possibly the most basic element in politics, namely, money. Money has always been something of a sacred nature, and certainly of a secret nature, in relation to politics. Questions are asked: Where did it come from? How will it be used, and with what political impact? These are always areas of great suspicion and curiosity.

The government has now moved to present to us a bill which, though inadequate in its provisions, does nevertheless make an attempt to take action in an area which concerns members of this House as well as many other Canadians. It recognizes that there must be some provision of financial support for political parties. We find in the bill the principle that contributions to political parties are to be recognized in law as qualifying legitimately for tax exemption. I believe this to be a basic principle. The manner and method of disclosure is unsatisfactory, but the principle at least is in the bill.

Further, there is the belief that there must be some limit on election expenses. If one examines the current drift toward the skyrocketing expense of election activity, the danger is that it is open only to the privileged class, to those with the wealth able to participate. We must recognize that we must at all costs avoid limiting political opportunity to the privileged few. Thirdly, there is recognition that the public generally, apart altogether from individual or corporate contributions, has a responsibility for the political process, and again this is recognized in the bill to the degree that certain election expenses will be partly underwritten.

These, to my mind, are the strong points of the bill. There are obvious weaknesses and these have been mentioned—the weakness of lack of full disclosure, direction of limitation and the way in which the limitation applies only to some specific range of political activity in terms of advertising and broadcasting, which has little to do with the over-all concept of party activity or the increasingly important features of a national and leader's campaign. In addition, the responsibility for making clear who regulates and objectively supervises the handling of fiscal or financial aspects of election activity is not effectively spelled out.

We are faced with a dilemma. We are in the dying days of this Parliament. Members are not sure what, if anything, will eventually come back from the committee. It is a deathbed repentance. But having said that, I must in this case differ both from the leader of my party and, I assume, most of my own colleagues and the colleagues to my left who decide to vote against the bill. At this point I am prepared to give the government the benefit of the doubt with regard to getting some basic principles established in the matter of election expenses.

However, I am not saying that having voted to send the bill to committee I will then be prepared to vote for it on third reading. I think the many weaknesses and inadequacies in the bill must be corrected in committee. I am not, nor have I ever been a member of the committee that deals with election expenses, but I trust that our representatives on the committee, as well as the representatives of other parties, will take into account the very valid criticisms that have been made in respect of amending the bill. This must be done if it is to be a truly workable and effective bill, one that is acceptable to the people of this country.

Whether or not the bill becomes law before the next election is really an academic question. What is of importance is that the basic principles be established; that an effective means for carrying them out be provided for in the law. So at this point I will support the government even though this measure is late-in-the-day action and inadequate though it be in many respects. But I expect to see the basic problems mentioned earlier by the Leader of the Opposition and others attended to in the committee; otherwise I may feel there is no purpose or point in supporting the bill when it comes back to the House from committee.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, having just come into the chamber and listened to the previous hon. member giving his views, and in view of the fact that I have had some experience in elections over the years, I felt I might say a few words about the bill now before the House.

No one disagrees with the fact that election costs today are skyrocketing to such extent that they constitute a denial to many people of the opportunity to participate actively as candidates through inability to meet the tremendous cost. Over the years I have not been a spender in elections. I have tried to mobilize opinion within my constituency and secure voluntary workers. I have succeeded in doing that by challenging each and all of them to join with me, not on the basis of what the return will be to each of them individually but on the basis of giving them an opportunity to serve their country, through the medium of participation, and to support those principles in which they believe.

I have found that this works. I have found that if you go to the Canadian people, and in particular to young men and women, and ask them, desirous as they are to bring about changes, to mobilize on behalf of those principles in which they believe, it is amazing the reaction that takes place. As I say, I have participated in quite a large number of elections, four or five unsuccessfully but ten in a row successfully, and in no case have I ever permitted expenditures beyond those that are absolutely necessary to ensure that the constituency is organized. Generally, excepting the officials, those who join in assisting in the campaign give of their time without remuneration.

I believe we must do something to impose a ceiling on expenditures. From my own knowledge of the United Kingdom's system I can say that the rules there permit expenditures to be made by political parties in advance of the issue of the writs, and these in no way enter into the computation that is made in imposing the ceiling on expenditures. There the expenditures are tremendous. Political parties are organized—two of them, in any event—in a way that we cannot begin to imagine within our own country. We speak of organizations in the various constituencies, but generally they are weak and almost inactive though they have a president and a secretary for each area.

I am sure that the experience of my friend from Ottawa East (Mr. Richard), the sub-dean of this House who has been a great credit to the parliamentary system, is the same as mine. I have lived quite close to his constituency and know something of the manner in which he conducts a campaign. I think he will be generally in agreement with the fact that large expenditures have not been the reason for his long-time success.

Having said that some action should be taken, I now come to a very short, almost cryptic reference to this bill. I think it is designed to fool the people in the coming election. It reveals a Machiavellian acuteness and craftiness that can only be attributable to a great deal of thought being given to a subject realized as being attractive to the people. But, Mr. Speaker, look at the bill. It is a sham and a delusion. It is worse than that: it is an endeavour to obtain from the Canadian people in the coming election, under false pretences, support for a general proposition that is not embodied in the bill.

As far as I am concerned, I am not going to join in support of the bill. I am favourable to the general considerations that it has in mind, but the manner in which it has been brought in indicates that it is believed members will suddenly join in support of something, the general principle of which they believe in. Pass this bill and you pass nothing. Nothing in this country is improved by it. As I say, it is a sham and a delusion.

• (1630)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am probably risking a great deal in rising to speak at this moment because I realize that once this amendment is put, if it is put this afternoon, we move on to the motion on second reading which can constitute another debate. So I am going to attempt not to inflame the House at this point, though I am seriously tempted to respond to some of the comments made this afternoon.

I must congratulate the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the first part of his speech. I wish the same quality had been continued until the very end, but there was a lapse which did not appeal to me very much. I stated when introducing the bill on second reading that I intended to listen to hon. gentlemen in the course of the debate with an awareness of the fact there was no single person with a monopoly of wisdom or knowledge in this field, and that each Member of Parliament brought a great deal of experience to the question of election expenses. Therefore, I was prepared to consider changes in the bill in committee which could be justified on the grounds of improvement, changes which were workable and would contribute to the objective we have in mind.

There are three principles in the bill. The first is the principle of greater disclosure to the public about the affairs of political parties and their candidates. There has been a demand over the years to open up the books, so to speak, of political parties and candidates. Suggestions have been made to show where we get the money and how the money is being spent. This bill, in so far as disclosure in respect of political parties is concerned, follows exactly the recommendations of the expert Barbeau committee and the recommendations of the special committee. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) agrees with that principle as embodied in the bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) disagrees and states we ought to go further. In this particular field we have followed the recommendation of both the Barbeau committee and the special committee.

In respect of disclosure of candidates, which also attracted the support of the Leader of the Opposition, we have followed in substance, but not totally, the recommendations of the Barbeau committee and we have retained the present law as recommended by that committee. We have not followed the recommendations of the special committee because that committee recommended, in my opinion, a relaxation of the present disclosure provisions. That is what we are doing about disclosure, and it has the support of the Leader of the Opposition.

The second principle is that we should diversify the support of political parties, or reduce the dependence of political parties on private contributors by contributions from the treasury. We have accepted that principle and the notion that it ought to be applied to serious candidates, namely, persons who get 20 per cent of the vote, and we have related that reimbursement or contribution from the treasury to the over-all expenditures of candidates. In other words, we have said that in order to draw support from the treasury you must be able to draw support from other sources in the community. We do not believe it is the function of the treasury to totally underwrite candidates in elections.

We do not think the citizenry of this country would be terribly pleased if we ended up with a bill that would permit candidates to run in elections in substantial fashion without having to get a nickel from anybody else or from their own pockets but could draw totally on the treasury. There is a difference of opinion on that. The Leader of the Opposition agrees with the position in the bill, but members of the NDP, and I believe members of the special committee, agree that there ought to be a contribution from the treasury in the form of a grant given, no matter whether the candidate can draw money from other sources or whether he spends anything else. The Leader of the Opposition and I are in agreement on these two points.

The third point raised by the Leader of the Opposition was whether the limits we have placed on candidates and on parties—

Mr. Stanfield: Also the nature of contribution confined to publicity, and so on.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, this is the point I am going to raise and I will, hopefully, deal with that matter. Even though the Leader of the Opposition felt our proposals in the bill in respect of limitations on candidates and on parties were unsound, he went further than that and called them absurd. They are drawn entirely from the recommendations of the Barbeau committee. The Barbeau committee—and my hon. friends will recall that one of the distinguished members of that committee was Arthur Smith, a former Conservative member from Calgary—concluded that while it would be desirable and probably a good idea to put an over-all limitation on the expenses of candidates, that would be unworkable in practice.

The Barbeau committee said, let us put the limit first on expenses that are skyrocketing. Those are the words of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). What are the skyrocketing expenses of modern elections? I suggest they are media expenses; that is where the skyrocketing is taking place. The recommendation of Barbeau and his associates, including M. J. Coldwell, was that we put a cap on media expenses because that is where the skyrocketing is taking place. Members of that committee went on to say that these are the expenses which are obvious, knowable, provable and controllable: let us not try anything further because we will not be able to do the job.

That is what we did in this bill in respect of candidates. I believe, personally, though I have no theology on this subject, that it would be unwise to include everything in that ambit because it would be impossible to really know and control everything: let us take the items that are accelerating, knowable and controllable. That is why we put a cap on over-all media expenses.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the minister permit a question at this point? Does he not think that if a limit were put on these specific items it would create a situation in which money would be immediately put into other areas, and therefore this would be insufficient?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not know, but I think it is obvious to all of us that if you are going to run an election you are going to run it in the modern milieu, and the modern milieu is through the media of television and radio. It may be that some new technique would emerge, but I would think when it emerges we might be able to deal with it. For those reasons we did it in that way, based on Barbeau, and I believe they are sound reasons. I agree that there can be a difference of opinion here; but there it is.

• (1640)

I now come to the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition which I think is quite valid. It was made earlier. This is a matter which can be dealt with in the committee, namely, that we have related in the bill the reimbursement formula to advertising or media expenses. In other words, one would be unable to draw a contribution from the treasury for any expenses except advertising, broadly speaking. I believe when the bill goes to the committee it would be proper to alter it so that expenses which are legitimate under the law could be reimbursed in addition to expenses which for the reasons I have mentioned have been halved. The reasoning has to do with the candidates. But when it comes to the political party, in approaching the bill I probably have somewhat of a bias. It is this: political parties and candidates in Canada have operated for a long time with a great deal of freedom.

It certainly was not the intention in the bill to regiment, regulate or hamstring political parties or candidates; it was to put a clamp on the escalation of expenses in this field. Here Barbeau told us that the big change, the big increase in expenses by political parties in the last ten or 15 years was in broadcasting. That is where the big money probably will be spent in the next election by the political parties, if we are realistic. Here we have said that political parties cannot spend—with the co-operation of the Chief Electoral Officer who pays half—any amount of money greater than one half that which is required to produce 6½ hours of time. That is 6½ hours for all the political parties.

So when it comes to that big element of broadcasting, the political parties are limited. Barbeau said we should put a cap on that. We have put a dollar limit on all parties. I do not know who knows what an adequate and proper dollar limit is. The information given to the committee is that there is no certain way in which one could put an adequate cap on political parties from the point of view of information. Anyway, that is why we did it. If the bill goes to committee, members probably will want to take that point further.

There is another point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked, what is the point of limiting candidates if political parties or national headquarters and provincial organizations can spend limitlessly on candidates? The purpose of the bill is to prevent political parties doing anything directly to assist a candidate.

Mr. Lewis: How do you do that?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member asks how it is done. Probably there will be certain borderline cases, but certainly it seems to me that a candidate could get boxes of information or material, with his name on the boxes, from the national headquarters and regard that as an item which is not to be included in his over-all limit for advertising. It would seem to me that if in the committee there is any doubt concerning the tying-off of that string, or that it has not been tied properly in the bill, then it should be done in the committee. So there are limits in these two phases of possible activity.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister will entertain a question. He was speaking of individual candidates. Will he not agree that someone who has been a senior cabinet minister, or someone who has been a senior Member of Parliament would have an exposure on the media because he had the privilege of being here previously? He might be running against a just as good or an even better candidate who is a newcomer, but because that candidate had not had exposure on television, radio and perhaps the other media, he would be running at a very great disadvantage. There is the problem.

Mr. MacEachen: Of course my hon. friend is right. Who is equal in politics? The right hon. member for Prince Albert spoke about his method of electioneering. Who could be on an equal basis with him? Who could start in an equal position with the right hon. member for Prince Albert, in his constituency or in any other? What law could alter that? It seems to me we must be realistic and understand what a law can do in respect of trying to cover every possibility and make everything equal for members.

In respect of this bill I have attempted to tackle the obvious problems where results can be achieved. These are the principles I wanted to outline to the House, I hope in a non-provocative way, in order to explain the attitude behind the proposals. The Leader of the Opposition made an important point, as did other members, about the provisions respecting the print media, the moratorium on partisan comment, so-called, on polling day and the day before. People have asked where this came from. I shall try to explain the evolution of the appearance of that clause in the bill. It is clause 13. The special committee, in recommendation No. 25 recommended as follows:

> We further recommend that the existing restriction on political broadcasts on polling day and on the immediate preceding day be extended to the print media, with the exception of newspapers which regularly publish only on Sunday.

Without boring the House by reading the sections, may I say that the present restrictions on political broadcasts are contained in two places, section 99 of the Canada Elections Act and section 28 of the Broadcasting Act. In reading that recommendation from the committee, one must refer to the existing restrictions and the existing law which is to be found in the two sections I have mentioned. It is a fact, also, that the Barbeau committee made no recommendation on this point, while the special committee did.

I shall not read the sections because they are there and can be read by members. Section 28, for example, I believe indicates the nub of the restriction. It provides that no broadcaster shall broadcast and no licensee of a broadcasting receiving undertaking shall receive a broadcast of a program, advertisement or announcement, of a partisan character. Then it refers to polling day and the day before.

• (1650)

What the draftsmen did in applying this section to the print media was probably to substitute the words "article" and "editorial" for the word "program". That is a simple transference in legal language, and the intent is to do that. There is no intention in this bill to have a news blackout; the intention is merely to achieve under the Broadcasting Act, for the print media, that which has existed since 1936 in the broadcast media. You can find the references in the parliamentary committee proceedings in 1936 when that provision was put in the Broadcasting Act, and broadcasters have been living under it from 1936 until 1972. That is a fact. Nobody has screamed about freedom of speech for the broadcasters.

I am informed that while there are some difficulties in application, it has been possible over these years for broadcasters to abide by this rule without too much difficulty. There has been some resistance to its application to the print media, to the newspapers, and I want to tell members of the House that when we go into committee, if it is commonly agreed that this is an inappropriate provision, that it ought to be modified and that different treatment should be accorded to the newspapers or the print media than to the broadcast media, then I will be receptive to legitimate and reasonable change. Changes can be made in the committee because the purpose, really, is to give effect to recommendation No. 25 of the special committee.

I have mentioned two matters already, one with respect to the reimbursement formula, upon which I think further thought is justified, and the second is the print media provision. Undoubtedly, there are others that will occur. All I want to say is that I am somewhat regretful that members of the House did not take my words at their face value when I said I had an open mind on a lot of things. Probably I will not agree to change some things, but here are some that I think we ought to consider in committee. In any event, regardless of the vote on second reading I would hope that we can tackle the bill in committee and, hopefully, produce a piece of legislation that will justify the support of the House in the final stages.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister permit a question for clarification? Was I correct in understanding the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to say that he thought perhaps there was merit in the government contribution being related to the total range of expenditures of a candidate, rather than simply to areas of publicity, and that the President of the Privy Council is not prepared to support a ceiling on those total expenditures? In other words, is the position of the President of the Privy Council that he is prepared to consider at least a government contribution related to the total range of expenditures of a candidate, but he is not prepared to recommend a ceiling on publicity expenditures, despite the fact that the government would be contributing toward the total expenditures?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I said that I would be prepared to consider relating the contribution to the over-all expenditures that a candidate would list on his return, rather than just to advertising expenditures. I have considered this and I do not believe there is necessarily any logical contradiction in agreeing to the proposition urged by the Leader of the Opposition and not agreeing to placing everything under a limit. But perhaps my logic does not work in the same way as that of others. At least I think that that area has to be considered in the committee.

Mr. Benjamin: I am not clear on what the minister said. Perhaps I missed something he said regarding the recommendation of the special committee on the limitation of expenses of a party. I am sure the minister is aware that the limitation which the special committee recommended was 30 cents per elector in the aggregate number of constituencies in which the party runs candidates, provided they qualify. Would the minister tell us what his feelings are on this, and if there is no over-all limitation on the parties in that sense does that not nullify much of the rest of the bill?

Mr. MacEachen: As I mentioned, there is a virtual limit on broadcasting and that, we have been told, is the area where the greatest expansion of expenditure has taken place in the last ten or 15 years. So that is capped; there is a limit on that. I have said that the intent of the bill is to prohibit parties from spending money in a way that will assist the candidate in piercing his limits on advertising. It seems to me that those are two effective limits on parties. If you put a dollar limit on the over-all expenditure you would strike out the broadcast limit, because why have two separate limits?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that more of the MacEachen logic?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the minister has spoken with such a pleading voice to members of the House that one feels almost uncomfortable in telling him off, but I will suffer the discomfort. May I say to him that no one doubts that his mind is open. The question is whether it is merely ajar on the points that he has indicated, or whether it is really open with respect to some of the basic principles of this bill which my colleagues have indicated, which the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) indicated and about which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) spoke today.

Let us look at the situation and find out why the minister is so eager to push this bill through. The question of election expenses has been on the agenda of public discussion in Canada for God knows how many years and, as has already been pointed out on a number of occasions, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) undertook in no uncertain terms in the campaign of 1968 to deal with the matter of electoral reform on a first priority basis. At one point he said—if I remember correctly and I am sure I do—that he would deal with it at the first session of Parliament if he were elected Prime Minister.

We have waited four years. It is clear from what the Prime Minister and the Chief Electoral Officer have said publicly to the committee that even if the bill were passed quickly, it is not likely to be available for the next federal general election unless that election does not take place for a year. So why is the government so anxious to push this bill through, when they know perfectly well that it will not be available, even if it were not changed, for the next federal election?

Mr. Woolliams: The answer is obvious.

Mr. Lewis: As the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said, the answer is obvious. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister want to be able to go across the country waving a piece of paper in the air and saying that they have done something about electoral reform.

• (1700)

So far as my colleagues and I are concerned, we do not intend to make it easy for them to mislead the Canadian people that they have engaged in electoral reform. If the President of the Privy Council admits, with the Prime Minister and the Chief Electoral Officer, that this law cannot be of use in the next federal election, then I say to him that the proper thing to do is to take a great deal of time with the bill and see whether we could not arrive at changes that are basic to the whole concept of election expenses.

Not with any surprise, Mr. Speaker, did I hear the Leader of the Opposition agree with the government party against requiring full disclosure of election contributions. I want to emphasize that so far as the NDP is concerned, we stand firmly on the proposition that the people have a right to know who has contributed to parties and to candidates. Other people have dealt with this question in a personal way. Let me put it to you, Mr. Speaker, in a personal way. I am certain that if there were full disclosure of personal contributions to my campaign, I would lose some contributors because some persons who contributed to my campaigns in the past are not of my party but are well known supporters of some other party. But for some aberration or other that I would not like to define, they have decided they would send me $100 or $200 to assist me in my campaigns.

It may well be that if I had to disclose their names, they would telephone me and say, "David, I am sorry. I did it during the last few elections but I cannot do it now because I don't intend to make public the fact that I make a contribution to you." That may happen to all members of this House and it may happen to all parties in this House, but I think that is a very small price to pay for the important and basic principle by which our party stands, that the people of Canada have a right to know who is contributing to my campaign, who is contributing to my party and how much is being contributed to my campaign and to my party.

Mr. MacEachen: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MacEachen: Is the hon. member aware that under the present law he would be obliged to disclose the names of these contributors, that is, he being a candidate? We will not need any change in the present law to accomplish that objective.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows what I am talking about. I am surprised at his intervention. I know this is not in the act, and I also know it is not going to be made public.

Mr. MacEachen: Why not?

Mr. Lewis: Is the Chief Electoral Officer obliged by law to make public the names of my contributors? Am I obliged by law to make public every contributor who gives me money?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

Mr. Lewis: I do not read the bill this way. My return goes to the returning officer for my constituency.

Mr. Woolliams: It is the law, but it is circumvented legally.

Mr. Lewis: You mean under the law at present? My heavens, if I had thought the minister was talking about that I would not even have been as polite as I was. He knows that every member and every candidate lumps contributions into some constituency organization, or something else, and thus those contributions are listed as coming from the York South constituency organization. Everyone knows that that is the case.

Mr. MacEachen: Is it lawful?

Mr. Lewis: I think this is the way the present law is worded. Therefore, there is need for a change in the present law to oblige every candidate and every party to make public the names of the contributors and the amounts contributed. I am perfectly well aware of the fact that this will cause embarrassment to some contributors. It may cause embarrassment to corporations which make contributions to both the other parties in this House.

It may be that it will take a few years before people accept the practice as being necessary and desirable for our democratic society, and it may be that there will be some loss of contributions by candidates and by parties. And maybe that is not a bad idea. Maybe to have a law that produces contributions from those organizations and people who really support the candidate and party, rather than contributions which are given as a matter of insurance by persons, corporations or organizations, would be a good thing for democracy and for society.

I gather, Mr. Speaker, that the government is not prepared to deal with the question of disclosure of all contributions. Therefore, that is one basic principle of this bill that we cannot accept and to which we thoroughly object. I want to make perfectly clear that I mean all contributions: I mean the contributions of all corporations which contribute to the Liberal party, to the Conservative party or to my own party. But I have never known of one that does so, although there may be such.

I also mean all the contributors who contribute to the NDP, and not only contributions in cash but in kind. I want to have a law that clearly obliges my party and myself to disclose to the people of Canada all information about the sources of my funds and the funds of my party, precisely, fully and completely. I believe every party in this House has to be prepared to do precisely that. That is the only way in which the people of Canada can gauge what is subliminally influencing candidates and parties in this House, and it must be remembered that the subliminal influences not infrequently are a great deal more important than other influences.

The minister says it is difficult to enforce limits on parties and so he has confined himself to the limit on the media. Let me say two or three things about that. As he was speaking I recalled being on a plane several months ago with a leading Liberal who is a member of the other place—and, incidentally, why we have a habit of saying the "other place" instead of saying directly "the Senate", I will never know. This man is a Senator. He was one of the directors or chairmen of the Liberal party campaign in 1968. He informed me during our conversation—I am sure he will not mind my saying this—that Liberal party expenditures on the media during 1968 were very few. In fact, if I remember correctly he said they did not spend any money on media expenditures, as a party.

I asked why, and his answer was that the Prime Minister was getting so much coverage on television and radio that was free, that the Liberal party did not have to spend any money on buying time on the media. I do not know just how accurate that may be and I do not know whether the people of Canada appreciated the exposure that the Prime Minister received then. I do not know how much they will appreciate it in the future. I merely mention that conversation to indicate that it is an illusion to think that merely limiting media expenditures is a real limit on party expenditures.

You can organize anything if you have the money. I have never had that pleasure or experience in politics, but you can organize all sorts of things. If you have the money you can organize all sorts of affairs and shindigs, all sorts of circuses, all sorts of pancake breakfasts, and all the rest of it. The people in the media, the public relations firms employed by the Liberal and Conservative parties, are pregnant with ideas all the time and they usually require only a few hours rather than nine months of gestation. They come forward with every sort of gimmick, every sort of thing that can be done without coming under the heading of media expenditure at all.

• (1710)

You could spend literally millions of dollars, as was the case in the province of Ontario with the Conservative party in the recent election. You could spend hundreds, thousands and probably millions of dollars on all sorts of gimmicks and ideas and services. You could get all the coverage and media exposure that you needed without actually having to buy the time. There are all sorts of ways it can be done. So when the minister tells us that limiting expenses on the media is an effective limit on party expenses, I tell him, "Rubbish". It just is not so. All he is doing is making it possible for the rest of the money to be used in such a way as to get media exposure without directly paying for it.

There is no reason why we cannot enforce a limit on party expenditures, unless we assume that the political parties in this country are thoroughly dishonest, will not obey the law and will find ways of evading it when they can. I do not make that assumption about any party in this House. I am confident that if the law requires limits, requires disclosure to be made, the political parties in this House will be meticulous in observing that law. If my confidence is misplaced, I am sorry for democracy in Canada. That is what we need, Mr. Speaker. So long as there is objection to enforcing limits on party expenditures as well as candidate expenditures, we cannot accept this bill. This, to us, in principle is wrong.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke the other day he pointed out on our behalf that the reimbursement formula is totally unjust, that to put a formula on a percentage basis merely means that the public treasury gives more to him who has more. We have had too much of that from this government and from our society as a whole. We have too many laws, too much legislation, too many practices that give more to him who already has. The time has come to think seriously about giving to those who do not have. That is as true for candidates in elections as it is for anything else in a genuine democratic society.

I was not here at the time but I am sure my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is accurate, as I have found him to be, when he states that the minister said that if you do not make an allocation on the basis, for example, of the number of electors in a constituency and pay each recognized candidate a certain number of cents per elector, then you give money to somebody who cannot get money anywhere else. Mr. Speaker, I say, so what? There is a provision in the bill that before he is entitled to any reimbursement a candidate must have received 20 per cent of the votes cast. That is the requirement and that is high enough. Indeed, I think it is too high; it could easily be 15 per cent, without violating anything.

The point I want to make is that if a candidate is to receive at least 20 per cent of the votes cast before he is entitled to reimbursement, that is requirement enough. If 20 per cent of his constituents thought well enough of him to give him their support, surely the law ought to give him a reimbursement equal to the number of electors in his constituency. The amount of money he will have to spend, even if it is very little, is related to the number of electors in his constituency.

If the candidate is a member of a party which cannot give him very much money, or if he cannot raise very much money—perhaps my remarks are a little self-serving because we have some candidates in that situation—and he has to get 20 per cent of the votes cast, then I suggest that on the basis of principle on which reimbursement rests he should be entitled to reimbursement on a just percentage. That would mean reimbursement by a certain number of cents per elector in his riding.

What is the philosophy behind reimbursement? The philosophy behind reimbursement from the public treasury, and I am not saying anything that every member of this House does not know, is obviously that for a democracy to function there ought to be an opportunity for the person who is poor, who does not have the means, who does not even have the sources to go to for the means, to be able to stand as a candidate. That is the philosophy behind it. Then the minister destroys that philosophy by saying that in order for a candidate to get reimbursement he must raise money outside and then he will be given a certain percentage—25 per cent of what he raises. If he raises $30,000 for publicity—I think it is limited to publicity—then he will get $7,500; if he can only afford $2,000 for publicity, then he will only receive $500, and if he can only afford $1,000 he will receive $250.

I ask the minister as seriously as I can, how does that jibe with the principle and philosophy of public reimbursement? If the people of Canada are going to make it possible for candidates who are poor and do not have large resources at their disposal to seek election, is that a just way for the people of Canada to act? I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that if you were to ask the people of this country—assuming that they agree to make any reimbursement, which is something I wonder about in view of the attitude that is sometimes prevalent in regard to politics and politicians—if they were in favour of reimbursement and whether they would do it on a more fair basis or on the basis of giving more to those who spend more, the overwhelming majority would say that the reimbursement should be just.

If I run in a constituency which has 50,000 electors and my opponents can raise as much money as I hope I may be able to raise in my campaign, they ought to be entitled to the same reimbursement as I because they have exactly the same constituency, the same number of electors, the same function to perform and the same job to do. That would be fair. The other method is not fair at all and it is another principle that we cannot accept.

The question of closing off partisan comment in newspapers, radio or television must be dealt with. There is one major difference between radio or television and printed material. It happens that as a young man I was national secretary of the CCF and represented my party on a committee which discussed the rules regarding broadcasts, including the question of blackout in the last 24 or 48 hours. At that time it referred to radio because television had not arrived at the end of the thirties. One of the reasons the radio people urged such a blackout was that on radio—this is also true of television—comment in the sense of editorial comment was not as frequent nor as important; the important thing was the public affairs newscast. So long as newscasts are not prohibited, radio and television can serve their purpose and function in society. Obviously, newscasts are not prohibited.

• (1720)

The Leader of the Opposition has already referred to the unfortunate incident of June 14, 1968, in Montreal that was carried all over the country on radio, television and in the newspapers. That incident may have had as much effect on the votes cast the following day as any other single incident. There is nothing in the rules to prevent television and radio carrying such a newscast. There is nothing in the rules to prevent a speech made by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the New Democratic Party or the leader of the Créditiste party (Mr. Caouette) being carried on radio and television. That sort of news reporting is a major aspect of the electronics media and shows the importance of the media. That is the point I am making. They have not made much fuss about not being able to sell time in the last hours before election day because they will sell enough in the earlier weeks of the campaign.

Furthermore, according to the advice I have been given it is very doubtful if radio and television are interested in selling such time in the last 24 or 48 hours of an election campaign. Since according to law our elections must be held on Monday or, if Monday is a holiday, on Tuesday, the last hours of bought time would be time available over the weekend, and I am told it is not sensible to do it this way. Nor are the media people anxious to sell that time, because on Saturday on Sunday there are other events which interest their audiences much more. That is the situation—I think I have outlined it correctly—with respect to the electronics media.

An entirely different situation applies to the print media, to the written word. Background articles, newspaper attempts to dig deeper into the election situation, to make a deeper analysis of individuals as well as of parties and programs, reports on the progress of campaigns and editorial comments, all these fall within the purview of the written word, of the newspaper, daily, weekly or otherwise. In this area the printed word still necessarily outdoes, so to speak, the electronics media. My party and I have not always been recipients of the most favourable comments in printed material every day of our existence, Mr. Speaker, so that it can be seen I am not arguing for one party. I am saying that the function of the newspaper is different from the function of the electronics media. Therefore, I doubt whether the limits imposed on the electronics media are really sensible, because newscasts are often much more important than commentaries.

Applying considerations with respect to the electronics media blindly and automatically to the newspapers seems to me to be somewhat illogical and overlooks the difference between newspapers and the electronics media. In any event, newscasts and news stories carried in the newspapers and on the electronics media are much more important than any commentary. The only consolation I enjoyed in my political activities before becoming a Member of Parliament as well as afterwards was from learning that according to surveys only a small percentage of the people read editorials. Most people read news stories rather than editorials and sometimes they read only the headlines and not the news stories.

At all events, it is news stories that people are interested in, so saying you cannot make partisan comments is not of very much help. News stories will be carried in the newspapers and on the media, and when you consider the way in which news stories are written it seems to me that we shall face incalculable difficulties in enforcing the law. You will need to consider the headline—whether it is partisan,— whether it should make a positive statement instead of a negative one, and so on. You will need to consider whether the name of the party spokesman should be included in the headline, whether the name of the party should be in the headline, whether the headline has been deliberately concocted to do harm to the spokesman or to do somebody else good. This, really, brings us to the area of quasi-censorship and I do not think it is desirable for Parliament to enter that field, although my mind is not closed on this matter in view of some of the comments the minister has made and some of the arguments I have heard.

I do not want to make a long speech. I need not go further except to say to the minister that he has not persuaded us that the basic principles of the bill will be touched in committee. I am glad he is willing to consider some change in the matter of reimbursement. Obviously, he is not willing to consider changes which would make the reimbursement more just, changes in the formula for reimbursement. I think he is willing to consider merely a change in area—

Mr. MacEachen: Wait and see.

Mr. Lewis: The minister says that I should wait and see. Let me say to him that we must oppose this bill on second reading, and that when it goes to committee we will do our very best to see that he makes the bill a workable one. In conclusion, I say that there is no reason for the government's hurry and there is no reason for pushing this bill through quickly, except a political reason affecting the Liberal party. I note that in the present political circumstances in Canada, that party needs all the favours it can get. However, I do not see why we in the opposition should help that party in this respect.

An hon. Member: Who is helping?

Mr. Lewis: We do not hesitate in saying that the bill before us is a phony. It does not deal with election expenses in a meaningful way and it does not serve the democratic process in a meaningful way. If it becomes law, and I suppose the government majority will make it law, I think it will be a disservice to electoral reform. I say this for one reason. Life has taught us that once you create an institution, once you put a law on the statute books, it takes a long time to change that law or tradition or institution established by law. Therefore, passing an inadequate bill, a bill that does not meet the principles of democratic reform—and this bill does not—is not doing a service to the people of Canada.

I reject the notion by which the minister and others say, "You cannot agree on everything but you must concede that this is a step forward." Mr. Speaker, there are some steps forward, so to speak, that are stopped in their tracks. The feet become locked, as it were, in the morass of the bill and you cannot pull out of that morass for years, years and years to come. We want to pass the right kind of bill. We want a bill that deals with election expenses in a meaningful way. If we want that, now is the time to insist on it. Now is the time for members of the Liberal party, as well as of the other parties in this House who harbour real regard for the idea of electoral reform, who harbour genuine concern for a good law dealing with election expenses, to show courage, to stand on their feet and say to the government, "This is not a political matter. Electoral reform is not a partisan question; it touches the democratic process of our society."

Division

Members of the Liberal party who agree with me should have the courage to rise to their feet and to say to the government, "We will not accept this bill." Of course, I do not think I will see that. However, if they did that they would render a service to Parliament and to our democratic process.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.
