As has happened in many parts of Canada, the war has brought what might be termed a measure of prosperity to southern Yukon. The United States have undertaken a number of projects up there, such as the Alaska highway, the piping of oil from Norman Wells, the establishment and operation of an oil refinery at Whitehorse, and the building of a splendid airport there by Canada. These have all added to the prosperity of that part of the territory. They have all entailed the expenditure of large sums of money, which has meant increased revenues to merchants, hotelkeepers, contractors and possibly to most of the general public.

As I have said before in this house, the government policy of establishing wage ceilings in the Yukon on Canadian employers and employees while United States employers and employees, working side by side with them in Yukon, were allowed to pay and receive much higher wages, has created a great and lasting dissatisfaction. At the last session I urged the government either to remove the ceiling on wages in Yukon or to make foreign employers and employees conform to the rates established by this government while in Canada. However, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) turned a deaf ear to the suggestion, and the unfairness to Canadian labour has continued.

The shortage of man-power has handicapped gold mining in Yukon, as it has throughout Canada. The shortage of man-power in Yukon is due to the fact that most of the young men there who were of war age quickly answered their country's call and are now to be found in the navy, the army and the air force on all the fighting fronts of the world. Due to high taxation and the shortage of man-power the output of gold in Yukon for the current year will not be more than one-third of the average production.

In order to show the effect of the government's taxation policy on mining in Canada I should like to quote from studies which have been made by competent authorities and which show that Canada's mining industry is in a precarious position. New mines are not being developed fast enough to replace those being worked out. Eighty-four per cent of Canada's 1942 metal production came from mineral areas discovered prior to 1920, and only five per cent came from mineral areas discovered since 1930. That is a serious state of affairs. The report of the committee on reconstruction appointed by the dominion government says of the mining industry:

> An immediate radical change of national policy in regard to mining is clearly indicated in order for us to pull our weight in the war and to have a reasonable chance of maintaining a mining industry in the post-war period. If this policy is not changed there is little use in counting on the mining industry to help carry the post-war load or to help in the rehabilitation of our men now in war services.

The Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, in an official brief on taxation presented to the federal government on February 24, 1944, said:

> Unless relief from destructive taxation is forthcoming at an early date, the Canadian mining industry will continue, at an accelerated pace, on the road to exhaustion.

[Mr. G. Black.]

The brief on taxation of the Quebec metal and asbestos mining industries emphasizes:

> The immediate future of the Canadian mining industry, and the part it may or may not play in post-war years in alleviating unemployment and the rehabilitation of other industries, is largely in the hands of the dominion government. On it must rest the responsibility. Drastic and prompt action by federal authorities is necessary provided the industry is to survive.

The Ontario mining association brief says:

> To-day, mining in Canada is on a salvage basis, with little or nothing being done to assure its continuance as an all-important basic industry.

The Ontario mining commission, appointed by the province, declares in its preliminary report:

> Unless some favourable action is taken to overcome the handicaps under which the business is now operating, it will continue its present decline, and at an accelerated rate.

The Canadian mining industry does not ask preferential treatment as to taxes. Nor is it the aim of the mining industry to attempt to shift the necessarily heavy war-time tax load on to other shoulders. What the mining industry does ask, however, is that mining taxation be placed on a sound basis, and it recommends:

> That depletion allowance of fifty per cent of the net earnings of metal and industrial mineral mines be allowed, and extended to dividends paid by such mines.
>
> That taxes paid annually to provincial governments and to municipalities be allowed as a deduction from earnings of all mining companies before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax purposes.
>
> That all annual expenditures made by mining companies on outside exploration in any part of Canada, excepting cost of options or purchases of property, be allowed as a deduction from earnings before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax.

I am informed that the above recommendations represent the unanimous views of all investigating bodies appointed by government and industry alike as to the proper method of providing an over-all equitable plan of mining taxation and to place the industry on a footing where it will best be able to perpetuate itself to the lasting benefit of Canada.

In last year's budget, part of the amounts contributed by corporations and syndicates to be expended in exploration and prospecting were credited on taxation. In Yukon, not only corporations but individuals contribute to prospecting and exploration, but under the budget of last year the contributions by individuals were not allowed as credits so far as taxation was concerned. I wrote to the Minister of Finance suggesting that his policy be broadened, and he referred me to the Minister of National Revenue. Since then I have had the privilege of briefly discussing it with that minister, and I am inclined to think he is favourably impressed and that some relief will be granted.

A wide range of subjects has been discussed in this budget debate, but one which I think is of public interest, one which should be of interest to the house and the people of Canada, is the present unsettled condition of the civil service of Canada, a condition which has obtained throughout the past four years. My attention was called to this matter by a recent broadcast by Raburn. Instead of the claims and grievances of the civil service employees being referred as they should be to the civil service commission I understand that the Minister of Finance has undertaken by his own efforts to a large extent to deal with these complaints and difficulties and that a national joint council on civil service affairs, consisting of sixteen members, has been appointed. It is not to be headed by the chairman of the civil service commission, who I think would be best fitted for the position, but by one with only a limited experience in civil service matters. As yet I do not think the house has been told, at any rate for my part I do not yet understand, what the functions of this national council on civil service affairs are to be. Is the council to supplant the civil service commission? Is it to take over their duties? If so, I think it would be necessary to have an amendment to the Civil Service Act.

I think the house should be informed of the activities of the government concerning the civil service commission and the civil service generally. When the Civil Service Act was first passed it was considered to be the finest piece of civil service legislation in existence. Under it the returned soldiers were given a preference which satisfied them and was equitable, and for a long time the civil service commission saw to it that a member of the Canadian Legion sat on every board of civil service examiners. The civil service was reclassified by the commission on a duty-salary basis and on the readjustment the additional salaries paid to the civil service in Canada amounted to $10,000,000. I believe that the returned men of to-day would not have that well-established system abolished or interfered with. But my information is that the civil service commission since the war began has been largely ignored and that thousands of so-called war workers have wormed their way into the civil service without reference to the civil service commission. Take the Bank of Canada, with its army of employees; the income tax branch, with its army of employees; the broadcasting corporation and the unemployment insurance commission—my information is that none of these employees is subject to control by the civil service commission. New departments, new agencies, numerous special so-called war departments and agencies are being established, and my information is that the civil service commission is not consulted in regard to any of them. In fact, the civil service commission has become a joke and is ignored.

In the past the civil service commission and the civil service were looked upon as the right hand of the government. The civil service will have increased duties and responsibilities after the war and it should be strengthened and encouraged. As I see it, the policies of all parties should be: hands off the civil service. Positions for returned men which are now being filled by others should be reserved for the returned men. Only recently a radio broadcast from the civil service commission announced the establishment of some new agency and that the age limit for the employees of that agency would be sixty years. Heretofore the age limit was thirty-five years. Why that change of policy?

I think it would not be asking too much if I asked the Minister of Finance before the close of the session, if not in closing this debate, to tell the house of proposed changes in the civil service and in the civil service commission and of the reports that have been made to him or to the government by, I think, three commissions or committees which have been set up on civil service matters.

Canada is progressing in social legislation, which is all to the good, but the cost of administration of that social legislation may not be realized by some members of this house, much less by the people of Canada who pay the shot. For instance, take the unemployment insurance commission. In the present fiscal year it will cost over $5,000,000 in federal taxes to pay the expenses of the unemployment insurance commission. This is more than twice as much as the commission has paid in workers' benefits in the previous three years. Administration costs or expenses during those three years were almost five times as great as the total amount paid in benefits. Workers' benefits to the end of March last totalled $2,465,043.41. Administration costs for the same period totalled $12,187,993.64. These administration expenses come out of taxes and are an extra charge on the insurance contributor. I am all in favour of unemployment insurance, but surely it could be administered and handled at a lesser cost to the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I presume that my remarks now will close the debate on the amendment. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister is not closing the debate on the amendment. Of course, he has the right to speak but he is not closing the debate on the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe).

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are many other speakers, so that I will say what I have to say now, in the hope that we can take the division or divisions this afternoon.

The debate has gone on for some days. I am sorry that it has not been possible for me to be in the house all the time, but I have kept very closely in touch with the debate. It will be impossible for me, of course, to deal with all the suggestions that have been made. Two amendments have been proposed, the first by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and then a subamendment by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was an addition to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. That is, it placed the stamp of C.C.F. approval upon the proposals of the Progressive Conservative amendment, and then added a few proposals peculiar to the C.C.F.

That subamendment was voted on at a very early stage of the debate without any discussion, but since most of the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar were made before he moved his amendment, I should like to deal with some features of his speech.

I am going to take the position that the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party contains certain inconsistencies and evidences a degree of irresponsibility; but I would not go quite that far in regard to the C.C.F. amendment. Irresponsible—yes; that is, irresponsible from the point of view of those who would like to see the framework of society as we have constructed it in Canada continued, but not inconsistent. To those who believe that business should be torn to pieces and that class antagonisms should be aroused to that end the amendment is a good amendment, and the speech of the hon. gentleman is a good speech and is consistent with the doctrine of the party which believes those things. But to those who believe that a good part of what we built in the past we should continue to retain, the amendment of course would not commend itself, nor would the speech.

Since I have been in the house I have heard a great many criticisms of budgets, and I have often heard this phrase, which was used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, "rich man's budget." He used it in the concluding part of his remarks. Let me read to the house his words as reported in Hansard, at page 4353:

> I feel that this is indeed a rich man's budget. It offers a sop to the poor and underprivileged, but on the other hand it contains most valuable concessions to the rich and powerful individuals and corporations who to-day control this land. That, Mr. Speaker, is what I wanted to say.

I cannot for a moment let these remarks pass unchallenged. I consider them entirely unjustified. It seems to me that any person who regards any budget which has been brought down during the course of this war as a rich man's budget has something wrong with his judgment. The budgets which we have presented to this parliament during the war have imposed very steeply graduated progressive taxation upon the people of Canada, have taken enormous taxes out of those with the higher incomes and those of wealth. That has been the policy which has been followed throughout the war. To adopt this old catch-phrase of a "rich man's budget" and tack it on to this budget is not in keeping with the sense of responsibility which the leader of a group or a party in this house should have.

"Big business" was the phrase which the hon. gentleman used; we were helping big business, he said. He left out of account altogether the fact that the means of encouragement which are proposed in this budget to business in this country, the assurances we are giving to business as to what it can expect in the post-war period and in the transition period, are privileges available not only to industry but to agriculture; they are available not only to big business but to small business; and they are a means of encouragement which we are giving for the purpose of providing employment and helping the rank and file of the common people of this country to make a suitable transition from the war period to the post-war period and to prosperity in the post-war period.

The hon. gentleman said something else in his speech which I should like to criticize. He said, as reported in Hansard, at page 4349:

> The present concentration of wealth in their hands—

He is speaking about the speculators and the big holders who, he says, will be taking up the cashed bonds after the war.

> —will in my opinion after the war be intensified because our present taxation methods make that almost certain. With this and other factors in mind the party which I have the honour to represent have proposed that the government guarantee victory bonds to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar for the protection of the small holders against depreciation or speculation.

Now, will the present concentration of wealth—if any—in the hands of big holders of bonds be intensified because our present taxation methods make that almost certain? I challenge that statement, and I want to deal with it. It is true, I believe, although I have never checked the figures, that after the last war there was a tendency to concentration of victory bonds in the hands of big holders. But there have been two changes in our taxation system between that time and this which set in motion directly opposite forces. The first is that our income tax now taxes all the income from bonds. At the end of the last war, with a large number of the bonds issued during the war tax-free as to income, they took on a value in the hands of persons in receipt of heavy incomes which caused them to become concentrated in their hands. That is not the case at the present time. The case is just the reverse, because persons with large incomes, if they acquire victory bonds after this war, will have to pay a very large percentage—sometimes as high as eighty, ninety, or ninety-five per cent of the income which they receive on these bonds—by way of taxation, and concentration will be discouraged, instead of encouraged as it was by the taxation arrangements in existence before.

The other change in our taxation system between the last war and this is the change in succession duties. Succession duties are much higher. They are much higher in the provinces, and we have dominion succession duties as well.

The combined effect of the three factors—the factor of taxability of all victory bond interest, the factor of steeply progressive rates and very much higher rates of taxation on victory bond interest than was the case before, and the factor of succession duties—will make for dispersal rather than concentration, a fact to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has given no consideration whatever.

Now as to the next statement:

With this and other factors in mind the party which I have the honour to represent have proposed that the government guarantee victory bonds to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar for the protection of the small holders against depreciation or speculation.

The effect of that proposal which the hon. gentleman has made, and made repeatedly, and which has a certain plausibility, is simply this, that no person would have any reason for accepting or buying a bond which paid less than three per cent. It would be utterly impracticable, utterly impossible to make a division between small holders and large holders. Any provision that if more than a certain value of bonds were presented the guarantee would not apply would be entirely impracticable; and if the guarantee were applied to all bonds, why would anyone buy a treasury bill or lend money on a deposit certificate or lend money for two years to the government? They would all buy the long-term bonds at three per cent, because their par value would be guaranteed throughout, and the result would be that we would lose millions of dollars every year, the advantage which we now get through our market for short-term securities.

These are very simple considerations, and I am greatly surprised that the leader of the C.C.F. party, occupying so responsible a position, should repeat and repeat this policy of his of guaranteeing that the bonds would always remain at par, having no regard whatever to the cost of financing which that would entail on the country. I have not very much more to say about the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. party. I think it was consistent with the attitude of the C.C.F. toward business and the economic problems of this country.

I now wish to direct some attention to the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party. Before I come to that may I say that in the course of this debate some hon. members have expressed a considerable amount of concern at the size of the debt and the degree to which it is mounting. One of the hon. members who spoke very forcibly on this subject was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). I think he believes that we should have financed the war in an entirely different way, a way which would not have resulted in the piling up of the volume of internal debt that has been necessary under our present method of financing. I have gone into that question time after time in the house, but the more I think about it, and I have thought about it quite a lot since I heard the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the more I am convinced that we have financed the war in the only way in which any responsible government and any responsible minister would dare to finance a war, for this reason: when the government is pouring out vast sums of money on war expenditures for goods, a large proportion of which are not consumers' goods, then unless the price level is to soar to great heights the money must in some way be brought back from the people into the coffers of the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It cannot be done without debt.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it cannot. Certain groups in this house become tremendously excited when I begin to talk about these matters, but if they will just contain themselves for a moment I shall continue. Let me point out that there are only two ways in which it can be done; one is by a compulsory method of taxation, which is the reason why our taxation is heavy and severe, and the other is either by brutal compulsion of some kind, such as I presume they have in some countries, I do not know, or by paying people to save their money by offering some monetary inducement to them to do so, which means the payment of interest to persons in return for the delivery of the money over to the government. In time of war we have a tremendous disparity between the amount of money spent and the amount of consumer goods produced. Unless you are going to tear your price level all to pieces and push it to great heights you must resort to taxation and to borrowing, and therefore you must accumulate a very considerable internal debt. A war economy is the worst of times for the issue of what is called debt-free money, because it could have only one effect and that effect would be very serious inflation.

Now, with regard to the debt, I wish to say something about the volume of debt in Canada at the present time and I am afraid it will take me a few minutes to do so. I do it because I am afraid that with speeches such as the one delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard the other day the people in the country may become alarmed. He used such phrases as these: "Pyramiding billions upon billions of interest-bearing debt"; subject to "an intolerable strain"; about to run into "inevitable disasters", and so on. Let me remind the house that this is not the first time that predictions of that sort have been made. A little over a hundred years ago Robert Southey, who was British Laureate at the time, made similar statements about the public debt of Great Britain, and Lord Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review of January 1830 answered him. After referring to the previous forty years as witnessing—

> . . . a war, compared with which all other wars sink into insignificance; taxation, such as the most heavily taxed people of former times could not conceive; a debt larger than all the public debts that ever existed in the world added together. . . .

Macaulay goes on to say:

> We cannot absolutely prove that those are in error who tell us that society has reached a turning point, that we have seen our best days. But so said all who came before us, and with just as much apparent reason. "A million a year will beggar us," said the patriots of 1640. "Two millions a year will grind the country to powder," was the cry in 1660. "Six millions a year, and a debt of fifty millions!" exclaimed Swift; "the high allies have been the ruin of us." "A hundred and forty millions of debt!" said Junius; "well, may we say that we owe Lord Chatham more than we shall ever pay, if we owe him such a load as this." "Two hundred and forty millions of debt!" cried all the statesmen of 1783 in chorus; "what abilities, or what economy on the part of a minister, can save a country so burdened?" We know that if, since 1783, no fresh debt had been incurred, the increased resources of the country would have enabled us to defray that debt at which Pitt, Fox, and Burke stood aghast, nay, to defray it over and over again, and that with much lighter taxation than what we have actually borne. On what principle is it that, when we see nothing but improvement behind us, we are to expect nothing but deterioration before us?

At the end of the Napoleonic wars in 1816, the colossal debt which the critics felt that Britain would never be able to carry amounted to £887 million. In 1912, before the last great war it had climbed to £8,816 million. On March 31 of this year it was £19,592 million, and I think there is less doubt in Britain today about the country's capacity to carry that debt than there was in 1816 when the debt was less than five per cent of its present magnitude.

I should like to point out that our government revenues during the last fiscal year, exclusive of any borrowing, were eighty per cent of our direct funded debt at the end of the immediate pre-war financial year and that in the last five years the achievements of this country in war finance and in production would have seemed wholly impossible to any observer in September, 1939. These achievements have evoked repeated tributes from competent observers in other countries. They have been based not on any financial sleight-of-hand methods but on methods which have been tried and tested by many countries in the past. They are achievements, moreover, which point the way to the future, constitute a challenge for us in the future. They have been accomplished under war conditions, but it is my conviction that if we Canadians can remain united in peace time behind a great national purpose, instead of splitting up into sectional or other groups warring with each other in regard to methods and ideologies—if we can remain united behind a great national purpose, we can go forward to still greater and better things; we can assure that Canada's achievements will show as great advances in the next decade as in the last decade.

Let me deal more specifically for a few minutes with the details of the increase in our national debt. At March 31 last our gross direct funded debt was $10,689 million; at March 31, 1920, it was $3,041 million, and at March 31, 1939, it was $4,372 million. The increase from the immediate pre-war year was therefore $6,317 million. That is undoubtedly a very large increase, and, if the war continues, our debt will be larger still. But this need not cause any alarm. Let me try to demonstrate that. In the first place, let it be noted that one cannot apply the same economic or moral precepts in the case of a national debt that one can in the case of a personal indebtedness. Personal debts are owed to other people and can be paid only by the sacrifice of wealth or income on the part of the person owing them. National debts, other than external debts, are owed by the nation to itself. In paying interest on its national debt, the nation is simply making a transfer of income amongst its own people, and in many cases the same people are paying taxes and receiving interest. It is important, of course, that the national securities should be widely distributed and that the country's tax structure should be equitable, based on the principle of ability to pay. Both these things are true of Canada to-day. Our tax structure is steeply progressive and is aimed to distribute the cost of war and of government as thoroughly as possible. Over three and a half million people, it is estimated, hold victory bonds or war savings certificates —probably not less than sixty per cent of the income earners of this country. Probably over $3 billion of dominion government securities are now held by individuals. It is difficult, I think, to exaggerate the importance of this fact, that so many individuals hold such a large volume of liquid assets available for use in any emergency in the future.

In the second place, it is a fact of great importance that while at March 31, 1939, 23·85 per cent of our total funded debt was payable in New York or London, to-day only 3·23 per cent of our funded debt is payable abroad. In other words, while the terms of payment of part of our debt in the immediate pre-war year created for us a transfer or foreign exchange problem, to-day no significant problem of that kind exists. This is an important reason why the analogy between our national debt and the indebtedness of an individual breaks down.

A third important point is that while the gross amount of the national debt has shown a substantial increase, there has at the same time been a substantial reduction in the interest rate payable on that debt. It is a mathematical truism that a fifty per cent reduction in the rate of interest will enable twice the former debt to be carried without any increase in the annual burden. In the five years of the last war, from 1914 to 1919, the national debt of that day had increased nearly seven times, but because the average rate had risen from 3·579 to 5·002 per cent, not taking into account the tax exempt feature of a large proportion of the debt, the annual interest charges had risen more than nine times. By March 31, 1939, the average rate of interest on Canada's funded debt had been reduced to 3·52 per cent. On March 31 this year it was only 2·57 per cent, just about half of the rate at the close of the last war and probably less than half if we make any allowance for the tax exempt feature of certain bonds issued during the last war.

A fourth point of fundamental importance is that it is the net annual carrying charge rather than the gross interest charge which is significant for any analysis of the weight or burden of a national debt. A very substantial part of Canada's gross debt is due to the purchase of so-called active assets; that is to say, loans, advances and other investments which pay interest, dividends and other revenues to the government. In other words, part of the increase in Canada's national debt has been caused by the purchase of revenue-bearing assets which carry themselves and do not constitute an extra burden.

If we go to the dominion's balance sheet and deduct from the gross debt the value of assets which are regarded as active, after setting aside a reserve of $100 million to take care of possible losses on ultimate realization, we find that the net debt of the dominion at March 31, 1944, was only $8,842 million. This was an increase from $2,249 million on March 31, 1920, and from $3,366 million on March 31, 1939.

It is perhaps only fair in this type of analysis, however, to call attention to the fact that in addition to its direct debt the Canadian government has certain indirect or contingent liabilities outstanding, chiefly in the form of securities issued by the Canadian National Railways and other government-owned enterprises, which securities are guaranteed by the government of Canada. The amount of these guaranteed securities in the hands of the public was $115 million at March 31, 1920, $1,085 million at March 31, 1939, and $699 million at March 31, 1944.

If we take the annual interest charges on the amount of our direct funded debt outstanding at the end of each year, add to these the payments which had to be made by the government on behalf of government-owned enterprises which had guaranteed securities outstanding in the hands of the public, and deduct from the total thus obtained the annual cash return on investments held at the end of the year, we will get the true picture of the net annual carrying charges of the government's direct and indirect funded debt. I am sure these figures will come as a great surprise to hon. members. They show $164·3 million as at March 31, 1920; $149·7 million as at March 31, 1939, and $183·5 million as at March 31, 1944. With the consent of the house I will place on Hansard the table showing this:

Net Annual Carrying Charge of Canada's Direct and Indirect Funded Debt

	March 31, 1920	March 31, 1939	March 31, 1944
Direct funded debt	$ 2,596,816,821	$ 3,385,697,034	$10,689,490,757
Guaranteed securities in hands of public—
C.N.R. and predecessor companies	115,129,763	1,054,865,758	669,037,663
National Harbours Board	.....	21,200,338	21,005,682
Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships	.....	9,400,000	9,400,000
Sub-total	115,129,763	1,085,466,096	699,443,345
Total direct and indirect funded debt	$ 2,701,946,584	$ 4,471,163,130	$11,388,934,102
Annual carrying charge—
Interest on direct funded debt (based on year-end debt)	$ 134,559,302	$ 119,197,190	$ 274,291,929
Payments on behalf of government-owned enterprises which had guaranteed securities in hands of public—
C.N.R. and predecessor companies	47,700,000	54,314,196	.....
National Harbours Board—
Montreal harbour	.....	358,000	370,000
Saint John	.....	391,078	194,000
	$ 182,259,302	$ 174,260,464	$ 274,855,929
Deduct—
Annual return on investments based on year-end assets	17,909,730	24,609,474	55,706,574
C.N.R. surplus	.....	.....	35,640,000
	$ 164,349,572	$ 149,651,990	$ 183,509,355*

* If C.N.R. surplus be not taken into account, this amount would be $219,149,355.

The surprising nature of these results is due to the fact that the government railway system was a considerable drain on government revenues in the earlier years and produced a substantial surplus last year. It may, of course, be contended that last year's Canadian National Railways surplus of $35·6 million is abnormal and could not be expected to be maintained under peace-time conditions. That may be true and hon. members are welcome to discount that factor to any extent they like. Even if we take no account whatsoever of last year's C.N.R. surplus, the net annual carrying charge of the direct and indirect funded debt outstanding at March 31, 1944, would be only $219·1 million, which is an increase of less than forty-seven per cent as compared with March 31, 1939, and of only about thirty-three per cent as compared with March 31, 1920. But these increases in the dollar amount of the net annual carrying charge do not reflect a corresponding increase in the weight of the burden, because they fail to take into account either the increase in population or the increase in national income or the increase in taxable capacity of the Canadian economy. If we take account of the increase in population we find that the net annual carrying charge of our direct and indirect funded debt was $19 per capita in 1920 and $13.22 per capita in 1939, while to-day, even if we take no credit for the C.N.R. surplus, it is only about $18.50 per capita. More significant has been the reduction in the real burden of the public debt due to doubling or more than doubling the national income. The net annual carrying charge of our direct and indirect funded debt at March 31, 1920, was roughly 3·9 per cent of the estimated national income at that time; at March 31, 1939, it was still roughly 3·9 per cent; while at March 31, 1943, again not taking any credit for the C.N.R. surplus, it is only about 2·6 per cent of the estimated national income of to-day. Incidentally, in this connection I might point out that the annual interest charge on the British national debt in a year before the war, say 1936, was approximately five per cent of the estimated national income of the United Kingdom.

But if Canada's national income has approximately doubled since the outbreak of war, its taxable capacity has increased a good deal more. It is the surplus income over and above the cost of basic food, shelter and clothing requirements which is a significant indication of taxable capacity, and it is obvious that this surplus income has increased proportionately much more than total income. In relation, therefore, to national income, the net annual burden of Canada's direct and indirect funded debt is less than it was at the end of the last war and less than it was immediately prior to this war. In relation to taxable capacity, it is substantially less than in both previous periods.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard quoted the following sentence from the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada:

> In making these comments I do not wish to suggest that public debt could be increased at the present rate for an indefinite period without placing intolerable strain on our economy.

With that sentence I agree, but I also agree with the two following sentences in Governor Towers' report, which the hon. member failed to quote:

> I do feel, however, that the war debt and the increases which will inevitably take place for a time after the war ends, can be handled without serious embarrassment. The key to this problem, as to many others, lies chiefly in the maintenance of a high level of employment and income.

I do not know whether I was justified in taking so much time in presenting these considerations to the house, but from certain hon. members I heard so much of a needlessly alarmist nature about our public debt that I thought it well for this house and the public to be told the true situation.

I now come to the speech of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, the critic of the official opposition in respect of the budget. If the leader of the C.C.F. can be criticized for an irresponsible attitude toward business, that is an attitude which would be destructive and, according to the language he used, calculated to make an appeal on behalf of the little man against the big man—if, as I say, the leader of the C.C.F. can be criticized for that attitude, then certainly the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe can validly be criticized for making a speech which, in its effect, was very much of a big business or pro-business speech.

He made one very significant suggestion, namely, that, as he put it, we should eliminate double taxation in Canada. What does that mean? It means that we, now, in this year 1944 I presume, should take off altogether the corporation tax, at a time when the United States, the country which lies side by side with us, has a corporation tax. I have never felt that this was a practicable suggestion. I know, of course, that it is a most appealing suggestion to a great many people in the country. But make no mistake about it, the suggestion is that we take off altogether the tax on corporations, because that is the only way of which I know by which double taxation can be eliminated. That is his suggestion in this year 1944, at a time when our revenue requirements are so tremendous, and at a time when the critic of the official opposition is ostensibly laying stress upon the progressive part of the Progressive Conservative party platform, and talking on behalf of the farmers, labour and so on. That is the big suggestion he makes in his speech, that we remove the corporation tax altogether.

Mr. ROWE: I did not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish hon. members to overlook that, because it is an important suggestion. It may be that the time will come when we can recast our whole taxation system in such a way that we can eliminate corporation taxation. But—

Mr. ROWE: I did not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then what did the hon. member mean, when he said that we should eliminate double taxation, and have a system such as they have in Great Britain, if he did not mean taking off corporation tax?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Let the official interpreter answer that.

Mr. ROWE: Did it do any harm in Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is for the labouring man, I suppose.

Mr. ROWE: I know; nobody knows it any better than you do.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is not making much progress in trying to get himself out of the suggestion he made. I do not say that that could not be done in time of peace—

Mr. ROWE: You know it can be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: —but I do say that anybody who makes that suggestion at this time has a degree of irresponsibility which is not in keeping with the official critic of an opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a matter of opinion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then he went on to say that taxation of the farmers was unjust, and that the system should be reformed. Apparently he ignored a very important change in this year's taxation of business, including mining businesses, to the effect that losses might hereafter be carried back one year or carried forward three years. That is a tremendous reform along the lines on which, I believe, he professes to be working.

Then, with regard to dispersal sales of live stock, and similar problems, may I say that consideration was given to this at the time the budget was being prepared and I was assured that the matter was being looked after administratively. However, further consideration is being given to it, and if it is necessary for us to introduce a resolution, or make an amendment so as to give effect to the administrative practices carried on for some time past in relief of this situation, I, of course, would be glad to do it.

Then, I was struck with the silence of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in respect of the removal of the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only a gesture; it does not mean anything.

Mr. ROWE: The minister admitted, himself, that it did not mean anything.

Mr. GRAYDON: And the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) was not very silent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would have thought that if the hon. member was speaking on behalf of the farmers he would have had a remark to make, one way or the other. I would think that at least one member of the official opposition, somewhere, would have said something one way or the other about it.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) did.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ROWE: The minister told us that it made no difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was it a case where silence was best?

Mr. ROWE: The minister said that it would not make any difference, and that we would not get any more implements, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then, in connection with the suggestion about mining developments and encouragement to mining, I cannot say any more than I have said in my budget speech. I gave then, very fully, the reasons why I did not think the present was the appropriate time—before consultation with the provinces—to make very wide taxation concessions to the mining industry, along the lines advocated this afternoon by speakers from the opposition. In my budget speech I said:

> Natural resources, of course, are for the most part in the hands of the provinces, but the dominion, it is believed, can do much to promote full development and wise conservation. Tax policy may be one of the devices which it may appropriately use to these ends, but it will be by no means the only one. The dominion's programme should be part of an integrated programme worked out in cooperation with the provinces. At the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference this programme, it is proposed, should be discussed with provincial governments and agreement reached as to the contribution to be made by the respective levels of government.

Then I went on to enumerate a considerable list of measures we have enacted in the last two or three years to encourage the search for strategic minerals, and to encourage mining development generally.

Something has been said about the complexity of our income tax forms. The complexity of our income tax structure and of our income tax forms is due to one thing, and one only, namely, an attempt to introduce equity in many situations. Hon. members from all sides of the house ask us, in the course of a budget debate, and during the debate on the resolutions, to do something in regard to a particular situation, to bring a tax down here, or to extend a privilege there. Each of those requests acceded to results in further complexity in our tax forms and our tax structure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not due to the introduction of so many new forms of income tax, and so many new taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not. We could make the income tax system just as simple as anything in the world by imposing a flat tax on everybody's income, with no exemptions. It would be so simple that no one would have any trouble in making out his tax return; but it would be unjust, it would be unsocial, it would be backward looking, it would be wrong. The complexity of our tax form and our tax methods is due largely, almost wholly, to the fact that we have tried to introduce equity into our tax system in as many situations as possible.

The removal this year of the compulsory savings will at one stroke do more to simplify our tax returns and our tax structure than almost any other step I can think of. When we introduced compulsory savings we realized that we would have to make provision for persons who had contractual obligations for savings, and accordingly documents had to be drawn up which would provide for the reporting to employers by employees of the insurance payments they had to make, of the payments on principal on mortgages on their residences, of their payments into pension funds and so forth. The fairer we made it, the harder the forms were to make out and the more complicated they became. With the removal of the compulsory savings entirely, all that vast amount of work by employers and employees, by the taxpayers, and to a certain extent by the employees of the income tax branch disappears. It is a great measure in the extension of simplification.

I want to come now to perhaps the main criticisms of the budget. One suggestion made is that overtime be untaxed, that there be no tax on overtime earnings. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was making the argument the other day that money earned by overtime work should not be taxed. I want to thank the hon. member for the courteous and sympathetic reference to myself which I appreciate greatly, and I really regret that I interrupted him in the course of his speech. I felt that I had to interject and say that the untaxing of overtime earnings would be impracticable and inequitable, and I want to give my reasons for that.

Do not let any one in this house think that an immense amount of consideration has not been given to this proposal. I want to give the reasons why it would be both impracticable and inequitable. In the first place it is contrary to the basic principle of taxing according to ability to pay. Our whole taxation system is based upon the progressive principle that the more a person earns, the higher rate he pays. We do not try to ascertain whether one man works harder than another or works longer hours than another, whether one man has more ability than another or anything like that. It would be entirely impracticable to try to make inquiries and form judgments on factors of that kind. We must realize that the higher the income, the greater the rate of taxation, and it would be a violation of that principle not to tax the amount earned on overtime.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not that ignore human nature?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it does.

Mr. ILSLEY: Economists and critics of the income tax in the thirties and forties and fifties in Great Britain were arguing against this progressive principle of taxation. I do not know whether they said it ignored human nature, but they took very much that position. They said it was not fair to impose a higher rate on a man with higher earnings because he had earned that himself; it was due to him; he had earned it by his own industry or by his own ability or something of the kind, and therefore there should be a flat rate on all earnings. I used to read some of the articles in the British quarterlies on that and I found them very interesting. However, the enlightened opinion of mankind finally came to the conclusion that the progressive principle was the proper one.

If we were to lay down the rule, as the Progressive Conservative amendment suggests, that earnings on overtime were to be untaxed we would have to define overtime; we would have to define normal time. Would normal time be the same in every industry, or would it vary with different industries? I presume it would vary with different industries. In one industry a man would be taxed on what he earned between forty-four and forty-eight hours a week, let us say, and in another industry he would not.

Mr. ROWE: It would be all overtime.

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends upon how you define overtime. How could overtime be defined in the case of farm help, in the case of domestic help, in the case of proprietors of small businesses, in the case of employees of small businesses where all kinds of informal arrangements exist? How could it be defined for the farmer? What part of the farmer's income would be untaxed because he had earned it in overtime? How could it be defined for the members of the armed forces in Canada who are subject to income taxation? What part of their duties are performed in overtime and what part are not performed in overtime?

Mr. ROWE: What—

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman please not interrupt. What about school-teachers who work in the summer? Would what they earn then be overtime? It certainly would be surplus to their ordinary earnings. What about business men? What about civil servants? Many of these work overtime but they do not get paid for it. What about the professional men, the doctors and lawyers? What about the great mass of our citizens? It would be impossible to define their overtime or their normal time. What answer is there in justice or in equity to these people that overtime earnings should not be taxed?

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister, if the overtime earned by war workers were not taxed, would it help to shorten the war by one less day? That is the only motive we have in suggesting it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it would. Then there is the question of piece workers. How shall we define what is overtime for piece workers? Then there is the question of the returns to be made at the end of the year where a person would have to specify the amount he had earned in overtime and the amount he had earned in normal time. There would be the greatest incentive in the world to overstate overtime earnings and understate normal time earnings. We would have to ask employers to make annual returns breaking down the remuneration paid to employees into normal and overtime. There would be a complexity of accounting in connection with the withholding of tax at the source.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) suggests that it would lead to countless arguments between employers and employees. Would it have the effect of inducing people to work overtime for a few weeks and then stay away from work for a week or two? It may be suggested that I am reflecting upon the workers of Canada, but I have tried not to do that. We have the evidence of a great many members of parliament that taxation has something to do with absenteeism and with the refusal to work overtime. We have had that evidence not only from members of parliament, not only from employers but from employee organizations. The untaxing of overtime would not solve the ordinary absenteeism problem, which means working less than standard time.

Finally, I cannot find any country where overtime earnings are exempted from taxation. It seems to me that that is an overwhelming case against a very plausible suggestion. Suggestions are put forward by employers here and there who think they could work it in their own industry, but they regard their own industry as an integer, a unit unrelated to other industries of the country and to the great mass of the Canadian people. The more the thing was considered by the government, and it was very carefully considered, the more apparent it became that it would be impracticable and that it would be inequitable for us to exempt overtime earnings from taxation. That was one of the suggestions of the Progressive Conservative party.

Let us take the next. The next is that we should retain compulsory savings and that we should raise the income tax exemptions, and the reason given was that we must fight inflation, and that to release $110,000,000 of compulsory savings and try to get it back, or get back a great deal or some of it by voluntary methods, would mean that we would not have the volume of savings we otherwise would have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You suggested that yourself.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are going to try to get voluntary savings equal to the compulsory savings we gave up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The alternative suggestion was that the income tax exemptions be raised to $800 and $1,600. To begin with, apart altogether from everything else, I do not see how one member of a partnership, and Canada is in a sense a partner of Great Britain, the United States, Australia, New Zealand and other countries, all of which have income tax exemptions—I do not see how Canada, a partner that has higher income tax exemptions already than these other countries, can with self-respect look her partners in the face and substantially raise her present exemptions. Ours are very much higher now than those of any other country I have mentioned, considerably higher.

An hon. MEMBER: Total war.

Mr. ILSLEY: The official opposition do not seem to find any trouble on that score. They seem to think there is nothing inconsistent in raising these exemptions in such a way as to lift the burdens to some extent on a very large number of people; neither does the C.C.F. But let us look at the economic effects of their proposal that the income tax exemptions be raised to $800 and $1,600 for single and married taxpayers respectively.

If, instead of abandoning the compulsory savings, we had lifted the exemptions as suggested, the effect of raising the exemptions, according to a memorandum that I have from the officers of my department, would be that we would collect $135,000,000 less in taxation.

The memorandum is as follows:

It is assumed that the proposed increase in exemptions would be effected within the present structure of the law; i.e., that the present $660 deduction from income for graduated tax would be increased to $800, and that the present $1,200 starting point for married taxpayers would be increased to $1,600. It has also been assumed that the savings portion of the tax would be retained, since the amendment does not specifically provide that it be dropped.

Revenue Loss:

It is estimated that the proposal would result in a revenue loss in a full year of about $135,000,000, of which $106,000,000 would be pure tax revenue and $29,000,00 savings revenue.

The effects of the proposal are roughly threefold in character:

(a) The complete exemption from tax of about 135,000 single taxpayers and 430,000 married taxpayers, or about 565,000 in all, with a revenue loss of about $28,000,000 fixed tax and $10,500,000 savings tax. Exemption of this number would leave about 1,435,000 taxpayers.

(b) A considerable reduction in tax for a further 165,000 single taxpayers and about 415,000 married taxpayers through extension of the two-thirds tax rate up to incomes of $1,000 in the case of single, $2,500 in the case of married no children, and about $2,000 in the case of married with one child. This would result in a revenue loss of approximately $38,000,000 pure tax and $8,500,000 savings tax. It would also result in bringing approximately 580,000 taxpayers, or about 40 per cent of the total, into the area where the marginal rate is 66⅔ per cent.

(c) A further considerable reduction for taxpayers above the limits of the 66⅔ per cent area, extending to every taxpayer, no matter how large his income. It is estimated that some 855,000 taxpayers would benefit, at a revenue loss of approximately $40,000,000 pure tax and $10,000,000 savings tax.

Summary:

The total revenue loss of $135,000,000 may be apportioned to roughly $38,500,000 to exempting certain taxpayers and $96,500,000 to giving relief to the remaining taxpayers.

Of course the relief given would be the greater, the greater the income of the taxpayer. That was pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and I could give figures to show the same thing if I had the time. If we did that, we would accentuate our anti-inflation problem rather than make it less. When the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe gets so worried about inflation because we are releasing $110,000,000 of compulsory savings which we are appealing to the people to give back by the voluntary method, and then himself advocates a remission of taxation amounting to $135,000,000, he is being extremely inconsistent.

What would be the effect of raising the exemption level to $800 and $1,600 on absenteeism and working overtime? If we left our present tax structure as it is, it would make the problems of absenteeism and overtime worse. It would mean that a far larger number of persons in the range just over $800 would have 66⅔ per cent of their earnings over that figure deducted, with the result that there would be the stronger incentive to work up to $800 or $1,600, and then stop. It would not solve the problem at all, and the only way in which you could make any kind of reasonable attack on it would be by taking off compulsory savings as well. Then you would be out not only $110,000,000 but $135,000,000 too, or $245,000,000 altogether, or something like that.

It may be said that the tax structure should all be changed, that we could get rid of the absenteeism problem by starting at $800 and $1,600 exemption, and then beginning with a very low rate of taxation and raising it fairly slowly. That tax structure would do it. But it would mean such an appalling loss of revenue that at a time like this I cannot contemplate it.

So, looking at the thing from every point of view, from the point of view of what other countries are doing, from the point of view of what they might reasonably say of their partner, from the point of view of revenue, from the point of view of fighting inflation and preventing absenteeism and removing the discouragement to work—from every point of view we thought this was the proper relief to afford, and not the raising of the exemptions.

I do not know how much thought was given to this proposal of raising the exemptions by those who made it. On the face of it I suppose it looked like a popular proposal, and perhaps it is; I do not know. But from the point of view of the Minister of Finance and of the government it certainly has everything to condemn it as against the proposal that we did adopt, which I have reason to believe is already having results because of greatly lower deductions from the pay envelope when the person moves into the taxpaying class.

That is about all I have to say on the issues that have been raised in this debate. There have been a great many other suggestions that relate to the resolutions and I will deal with them, or my parliamentary assistant will, when we come to consider the resolutions. But it seems to me that on the merits the house would be fully justified in voting down the amendment to the motion to go into supply.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Rowe) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Adamson	Hlynka
Anderson	Homuth
Bence	Jackman
Black (Yukon)	Jaques
Boucher	Knowles
Bruce	Kuhl
Bryce	Lockhart
Burton	McGregor
Cardiff	MacKinnon (Kootenay East)
Casselman (Grenville-Dundas)	MacNicol
Castleden	Noseworthy
Church	Perley
Diefenbaker	Quelch
Esling	Ross (St. Paul's)
Fair	Rowe
Fraser (Peterborough West)	Senn
Graydon	Shaw
Green	Stirling
Hanson (York-Sunbury)	Stokes
	White
	Wright—40.

NAYS

Messrs:

Abbott	Ilsley
Authier	Isnor
Bertrand (Laurier)	Jean
Bertrand (Prescott)	King, Mackenzie
Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)	Kirk
Blair	Laflamme
Bonnier	LaFleche
Bradette	Lafontaine
Breithaupt	Leader
Brunelle	Leger
Casselman, Mrs. (Edmonton East)	Little
Claxton	McCann
Cleaver	McCuaig
Corman	McCubbin
Coté	McCulloch
Crerar	MacDiarmid
Cruickshank	Macdonald (Brantford City)
Dechene	Macdonald (Halifax)
Denis	Macdonald (Kingston City)
Dorion	McDonald (Pontiac)
Dupuis	McGibbon
Edwards	McIlraith
Eudes	McIvor
Factor	MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent)
Farquhar	Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)
Fauteux	McLarty
Ferland	McLean (Simcoe East)
Ferron	Macmillan
Fournier (Hull)	Marier
Fraser (Northumberland, Ont.)	Martin
Fulford	Matthews
Furniss	Maybank
Gardiner	Mayhew
Gershaw	Michaud
Gibson	Mitchell
Gladstone	Mulock
Golding	Neill
Goulet	Nielsen, Mrs.
Graham	O'Neill
Gray	Picard
Hanson (Skeena)	Pinard
Healy	Poirier
Henderson	Pouliot
Howden	Purdy
Hurtubise	Ralston
Reid	Soper
Rennie	Taylor
Rhéaume	Thauvette
Rickard	Turner
Roebuck	Veniot
Rose	Ward
Ross (Hamilton East)	Warren
Ryan	Weir
St. Laurent	Whitman
Sanderson	Winkler
Sissons	Wood—112.

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Hill	Hazen
Emmerson	Black (Cumberland)
Chevrier	Aylesworth
Tucker	Ross (Souris)
Blanchette	Desmond
MacKinnon (Edmonton West)	Harris
Turgeon	Brooks
McNevin	O'Brien
McNiven	Tustin

Mr. GILLIS: I was paired with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was paired with the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. HAZEN: I was paired with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, judging by the interest the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has shown in the province of Quebec one may wonder if he does not intend to run for a seat in that province at the next election. As a citizen of Quebec I was greatly surprised at the questions that were asked in regard to the statements made by the premier of that province concerning the postponement of military service for farmers. Hon. Mr. Godbout has said that he did not recall having made certain statements, and in addition he thought he had been misquoted by the press. I am not going to insist on that point; I am a supporter of the premier of Quebec, and his attorney general is my mate for one of the provincial counties forming the federal constituency of Témiscouata.

There is a very good excuse for anyone in this country, even an eminent counsel, making a mistake in interpreting the mobilization regulations, because even those who drafted them do not know what they are about. I regret very much that these regulations are not in statutory form, for this would ensure stability of the law. I have no objection at all to praising the way in which the legislation of the union government was drafted; it was put on the statute books and not passed by orders in council which change as often as the rays of an aurora borealis. This question has been before this house and before committees of the house repeatedly, but no light has been thrown upon it. That is because of the intentional confusion as between those who have done part of their training and those who have not been to training camps; between those who have regimental numbers and those who have only call numbers from the registrars. It would be necessary to give a course of law to every citizen of this country to have everyone understand these regulations. The very day after the national selective service regulations were tabled in this house the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, at page 1567 of Hansard for March 24, 1942:

> Under the new regulations, farmers, farmers' sons and agricultural labourers will normally not be obliged to undertake compulsory military training and service.

Within three or four days, for the first time in the parliamentary history of this country, a cabinet minister contradicted a statement made by his chief, the Prime Minister. I have in my hand a release from the Department of Labour, of which the first paragraph reads as follows:

> Ottawa, April 1. Essential farm workers may be granted indefinite postponement but not exemption from military service under the new national selective service, Honourable Humphrey Mitchell, Minister of Labour, said to-night.

So that in connection with these regulations, which were in force for three or four days before being tabled in this house, we have one interpretation by the Prime Minister and another by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Then I was told over the telephone by an official of the national war services department that the effect of orders in council 2251 and 2252 of March 21 was to displace the onus probandi, or the weight of evidence. Consequently a farmer, the son of a farmer or a farm helper who was exclusively or principally employed or occupied as a farmer on March 21 of that year would in future be presumed indispensable as such to agriculture, unless there should be contrary evidence. That was the tenor of a conversation I had with an officer of the army who was the right hand of the deputy minister of national war services. The very same day the same gentleman wired the registrar, giving a shade of difference to the official interpretation that he sent me. This was his wire:

> Substantially the interpretation given by Mr. Pouliot is exact. I shall have to make clear the interpretation that I have given to Mr. Pouliot, that the individual concerned shall make a request for postponement to the registrar, as before. And, naturally it is the mobilization board, the national war services board, which will decide whether the applicant is essential to agriculture, according to paragraph 14, subparagraph 3 of the regulations, as modified by order in council P.C. 2252 dated March 21. With the reservation of that supplementary explanation the interpretation given by Mr. Pouliot is correct.

This is signed by the director of mobilization.

Well, sir, it was entirely different. In the first place it was stated that the applicant, the farmer, had the modus vivendi in his favour, which meant that it was up to the board to prove that he was not a farmer and essential on the farm. On the other hand it was left to the board to decide what to do.

Who is the lawyer, even the most eminent counsel in the country, who would not be baffled by such a contradictory interpretation? And mind you, sir, when it comes to the interpretation of a statute, the member of parliament is a lawmaker. But when it comes to the interpretation of an order in council it must be the high officials in the department concerned who give the right interpretation. What can anyone do when that interpretation is as contradictory as this one was? It is most difficult.

Then, let us go in between. Other statements have been made by the Prime Minister, one of which is found at page 922 of Hansard for June 19, 1940. It is found at the bottom of the first column and the top of the second. That statement was made by the Prime Minister after I had suggested the raising of a whole battalion in my county for the defence of Canada. I had said that in the caucus room, and I was very much flattered when the Prime Minister reported to the house what I had said in caucus. My name was not mentioned, but since I have referred to the Prime Minister's statement I shall read it. Mark you, sir, I had shown my good will by offering to raise a battalion for the defence of Canada. It was in conformity with the law of the country at the time, when the mobilization act was about to be passed. This was only for the defence of Canada, and I was abiding by the law of the land and showing my good spirit.

Here is what the Prime Minister said:

An hon. member on this side of the house made the statement publicly this morning that he felt he could go into his constituency and, by making it known to his constituents that this measure had to do with the protection of Canada and our own Canadian soil, bring forward in a very short time men from the forests, from the fields and from the factories, all prepared immediately to join the Canadian forces to resist any possible invasion, and that he would be prepared to guarantee that that could be done in constituency after constituency throughout the country, once it was understood that there was the necessity of defending our own Canadian shores. I pointed out to him that in doing that he might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest; that, to win this war, we might wish to keep at work in the forests the men who are now working in the forests, to provide the timber which will be required for docks and wharves and required immediately; that the men who are working in the factories may be a thousand times more useful to the government of this country in giving their skilled labour to the manufacture of aircraft, munitions or other weapons of war than they could possibly be in lining up and presenting themselves for military service; equally that on the farms, if we are to perform what will be expected of us, we shall need all the production that can be effectively and rapidly carried out on the farms of our country.

I have stood by what the Prime Minister said on that occasion. At the time there was no plebiscite. That was not said to gain any votes. It was said after an election. It was to be the voluntary policy of the government, and that policy was to keep the farmers on the farms. It was a good policy. And it was just the same for those in essential industry. I withdrew my offer afterwards and, when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) asked us to indulge in recruiting for overseas I wrote him and said that since our chief, the Prime Minister, had precluded me from recruiting for the defence of Canada, how could he, as Minister of National Defence, invite me to do recruiting for overseas? I received no answer. Yet Judith Robinson published this in Toronto, and said that it should appear in every paper across Canada.

There are many other things I wish to say. Not only did the great lawyers not understand the contradiction between the statement made in the house by the Prime Minister, and that made outside the house by the Minister of Labour, but even the great brains of the Ottawa Journal used this title in an editorial which was published on Monday, April 6, 1942, "Government Lines Crossed." It reads:

There appears here needless confusion over a fairly important matter; confusion that starts grousing and harmful talk.

Not only lawyers, but even journalists, the brightest of all men, found that it was obscure and hard to understand. Not only that, but the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) has lent me a compilation from a return he received, in which were set out the number of boards, commissions, orders and actions. We do not count any more by small numbers; we count by millions. Nearly half a million orders have been issued by clerks, dollar a year men and everybody else. The exact number was 495,488, plus 45,000 orders in council. That is the number of orders issued since the war began. I doubt if there is a room in this building large enough to contain all those publications.

Some of those orders were most important. There is order A-1182 dated April 22, 1944, dealing with rolls of tissue paper. This amended another order and the object was to make the rolls tighter in order to save space. I regret having to mention these things, but it shows the scope of the law making by people outside parliament. There is order A-1201 dealing with water-closet seats. They have consolidated three orders in this one. There was the original order; it was amended and then this order amends that one again. There was another one dealing with felt hoods for ladies' hats. Many other things like that are covered. It is childish that orders are passed for such things and published in the official publication. It makes it difficult for those who want to know exactly what is the law.

Let us go a little farther and see what department passed the largest number of orders. Agriculture passed eighty-three; finance, thirty-five; trade and commerce, five; wartime prices and trade board, 1,684, and Department of Labour, 493,681. Nearly all the orders were passed by the Department of Labour which deals with the mobilization of man-power. The Department of National Defence is not mentioned.

Would it be possible for the premier of any province to check the 493,681 orders to know if something had happened affecting the mobilization regulations? Nobody could do that. Nobody knows anything about it. I spoke of this to a man well versed in the law and he told me it was due to the war. When I asked him if it would continue after the war was over he said that if it did it would be unbearable. It is a most abnormal situation.

I should like to refer to the way in which the national war services regulations have been amended. We heard a lot about one month, four months and the duration. When the change was made to four months it really meant for the duration, and I will explain why. The first order in council, P.C. 3905 of September 17, 1940, covered the thirty days training. Then on March 18, 1941, P.C. 1910 was passed for four months, which would expire on July 18, 1941. It was for that period or for such other period as the Minister of National Defence might from time to time prescribe.

On July 2, 1941, an army order signed by the Minister of National Defence was issued which extended the training period for the duration. Those who were in for four months from March could not get out in July because of the order signed by the Minister of National Defence. P.C. 1910 for four months was passed on March 18, 1941, during the season when many farmers were in the forests. It was the dull season and advantage was taken of this fact to extend the period for four months. The farmer had a little leisure and he could take one month's training.

Another great mistake was made in passing the national selective service regulations also in March during the dull season when many farmers were not on the land. The Prime Minister, who has a country place but who is not a farmer, said that the farmers were frozen on the land. I am sure he meant it, but on the other hand a large proportion of them were not there. This created a lot of difficulty which was increased by the press release sent out by the Minister of Labour.

I regret deeply that there is not a different procedure in the Department of National Defence with reference to those who are badly needed on the farm. Many times I have asked for men who were needed in different places, by their brothers-in-law, by their close relatives, by their uncles and by other people. Although these cases were most meritorious it was impossible to get a satisfactory answer. The Minister of Labour has written to the premier of Quebec stating that farmers will be as well treated as they are everywhere in Canada. There is no exception for Quebec. When I fight for the farmers, as I said yesterday, I do not fight just for the farmers of my constituency or of my province; I fight for the farmers of Canada. What we get for the farmers of our province we get for all the other farmers in the country. There are many farmers who have met their obligations on time.

It was considered a favour to renew a postponement. That is precisely the reason why the chairman of the board in Quebec city was removed and replaced by somebody else. Every time a farmer went to the board and asked for a postponement of his military training the chairman said: "I grant you this favour," and he would grant the man a postponement once, and then a second time, but the third time he refused to grant a further postponement although it was impossible for the farm to be run without the man. To-day I have seen one man who comes from a county far from mine. He is in the army. One of his legs is one and a half inches shorter than the other; he suffers from rheumatism, and he has been put in category A. His father is old and ill; his mother has been ill for eighteen years, and this farmer's son would like to help his father with the cattle on the farm. He is of no use to the army. But all he could get was "no" from his commanding officer. At other times it is still worse because when a man makes his application for postponement he is told by his commanding officer that his application is approved although it is not. It is unfair to treat a man like that, but many a man has suffered injustice just by being treated in that way.

When an application for postponement is made to the commanding officer it is sent to a kind of technical board on which there are men who have no technical experience, especially in farming. Invariably the board decides that the boy is in the army and shall remain there. The board gives its decision in accordance with what the Minister of National Defence said yesterday in his remarks. So long as this thing is not corrected, and so long as the Minister of National Defence does not change his attitude regarding the farmer and does not understand that the farmers are essential to this country, it is unfair for the Minister of Labour to say that we have no conscription for farmers. Every possible means are used to bring the boys into the training camps, and once they are there it is impossible to get them out for any reason, because, as the Minister of Labour has said, the authorities consider that the first duty of a man is to get into the army. If I fight for the farmer, it is not because I am not supporting the army; I believe that the army should be well fed; that the population of this country should be well fed, and that our allies should receive the surplus after the army and the civilian population of this country have been taken care of. That is only reasonable.

If hon. members will look at Hansard of February 19, 1943, they will find that I put on the record a list of the members of parliament who have stated that the farmers should be exempted. That was said even by those who speak against the province of Quebec. Were they sincere or were they not? If they were sincere in saying that the farmer should be exempted from military training and that he is following an essential occupation in the war, they have no reason to complain against the province of Quebec. They have no reason to attack the handful of members of parliament who fight for the farmer in this house as well as for others engaged in other essential industries. They have no reason to attack the premier of Quebec. We are in common in fighting this war, and the farmer deserves to be recognized as being the equal of any other man in this country and, what is more, evidence should be given of that. We are the law-makers. We should see that all the orders and regulations, even the orders in council, which do not do justice to the farmer should be corrected by legislation passed in the House of Commons, and that no one shall indulge in false pride by not saying a word on behalf of the farmer who is so essential in this war as well as in peace. It is the easiest thing in the world to uproot the farmer; but, mind you, once a farmer is uprooted he is finished with the land. He does not want to return to the farm. I do not believe in these schemes to bring soldiers on to the land. There may be a few who will make a success of farming, but they will be the exception. I believe that in fighting for the farmer I am fulfilling a national duty.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to give a word of special praise to an old friend of mine, Alderman Joseph Matte of the city of Quebec, who wants to investigate the manner in which young draftees have been dealt with in British Columbia. These young men are so far from home that it is hard for them to get home on leave because it takes so long. These young men who abide by the law should be respected by their commanding officer. He should not try to make life impossible for them. Therefore I say that Alderman Matte and the city council of Quebec deserve special praise for their stand in this matter, and I hope they will be successful in having a probe conducted into the manner in which these young men are treated. I hope also that Alderman Matte will be appointed as a member of the board conducting the inquiry.

All of this has been said, Mr. Speaker, to try to bring the house back to fundamentals, in order that we shall not forget the essentials while we are discussing the most important issues before the country.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, on June 23 last when I spoke on the amendment to the budget, I placed on the record certain figures regarding the country of New Zealand. On July 3 the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in his speech endeavoured to correct some of the figures which I had given on June 23. I am sorry that under the rules of the house which prohibit a member from speaking more than once on the amendment, it has not been until this late date that I have had an opportunity to correct once for all the figures given and the statements made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am now taking the very first opportunity of placing accurate, authentic and up-to-date figures on the record.

I do so for two reasons. The first is that I have been very careful ever since I came into the house and into public life to be in a position to substantiate statements I make in public, and I am pleased with my record in that respect. Secondly, I do so because of the attitude of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, who for a number of years have gone through the length and breadth of Canada and on every occasion possible have cited conditions in New Zealand, pointing out that if the people of Canada had only a government like the government of New Zealand, a new heaven upon earth would open for the people of this country.

I propose this evening to explode that picture, because it is just a picture. I have noted that, whenever I make a statement in the house, immediately it becomes known, particularly in British Columbia, the henchmen of the C.C.F. run into print and, rather than quote entire figures, just say I am mistaken and am making a lot of false statements. I come before the house to-night with statements with which I challenge the factory of scientists which the C.C.F. have, and any hon. member in the house, because I shall quote the actual facts from New Zealand itself, and I have their records before me.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South was rather "cute"—I use the word advisedly—because when he quoted his figures he knew, I think, that I was quoting the latest available statistics, whereas he had gone back to the 1941 records, which gave the figures of 1940, and then endeavoured to compare them with those of 1942. But as every hon. member knows, especially in this time of war great changes occur in each country every year, especially in incomes and expenditures.

Before I have finished I shall—unlike the hon. member—give exact dates with respect to every figure I am going to quote. I shall endeavour to leave no room for complaint other than that hon. members opposite cannot contradict what I am going to say.

Mr. GILLIS: It is correct to say that you did not give dates in the first place, although you were asked to?

Mr. REID: If what has usually happened before is going to happen again to-night, that interjections are made to try to throw me off the track and spoil my speech, let us have a free for all. It is all right with me. But I would ask hon. members to possess their souls in patience unless I say something very personal, and there is no fear of that for I shall endeavour to keep within the rules of the house.

Mr. GILLIS: Try to stick to the truth, though.

Mr. REID: I object to that interjection, and I am going to show that there is no truth in the figures the hon. member placed on the record. If he will be patient I will prove that he does not know the correct figures. That is what I am out to do to-night. If he got his figures from the factory of C.C.F. scientists I have great sympathy for him, because he takes what is handed to him; but if he dug them out for himself I need not say more.

He began by stating that the population of New Zealand was 1,640.000. I hold in my hand the New Zealand official year book, 1943. I have looked through it carefully; I have gone through the years from 1932 to 1941, the latest figures given, and there is no such actual figure in the whole schedule as 1,640,000. In the year book three statistical columns appear; they give the population for the periods ending March 31, June 30 and December 30, and then they take the mean of those three periods. I therefore am taking the mean average, and the latest figure given is 1,630,000. I think that is plain enough.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the population?

Mr. REID: That is the population of New Zealand; it is the mean of the three periods of the year, and it is the figure which is usually taken by the minister of finance and others who have occasion to quote the population.

I come next to the debt figures quoted by the hon. member, namely, £322,146,633. I have searched as diligently as I can through the records, and I cannot find that figure. I intend to go over the hon. member's speech and show how foolish all his figures were as he gave them. I will keep to the official record, because I hold in my hand a copy of the New Zealand budget speech of 1943, delivered by the Hon. Walter Nash. That surely should be proof enough of the truth of the statements it contains. I am not quoting my own figures. The statistics I give are for 1942 as regards both New Zealand and Canada; I think that is a very fair way of making comparisons.

Table 5 of the New Zealand budget, June 3, 1943, gives the total public debt of that dominion in New Zealand pounds—the New Zealand pound has depreciated some twenty-five per cent below that of the British pound sterling—as £463,825,371. Converting that into Canadian dollars at the rate of $3.60 to the pound—it may be a cent or two lower or higher, but that is as near as one can get to it at the moment—we obtain a Canadian equivalent of $1,669,771,335.60. Divide that by the population of 1,630,000, which appears to be the average of 1941 as given in the New Zealand Year Book for 1943, and we find that that per capita dominion debt of New Zealand is approximately $1,024. Compare that with what the hon. member gave us the other day, when he said that the New Zealand debt per capita was around $840. But I am not through, Mr. Speaker; not by any means.

With this I wish now to compare the total of Canadian funded debt and treasury bills as given on page 27 of the Canadian public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1943. This total is $7,913,295,639.86. Dividing this by the estimated population for 1943 of 11,812,000, the figures which I obtained the other day from the bureau of statistics, we get a per capita debt for Canada of approximately $670.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any provincial debt in New Zealand?

Mr. REID: I am glad the hon. member asked that. I am coming to that debt; I am not omitting anything so far as I know. The latest figures available of the debts of New Zealand's municipal and local authorities are those given on page 427 of the New Zealand Year Book for 1943, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which shows a total net debt of £57,900,236, New Zealand currency, which is equal at the exchange rate just used to $208,-440,849, Canadian currency. That is approximately equal to $128 per capita. Compare this with the direct bonded debt of the Canadian municipalities, after deduction of sinking funds of $960,600,000, as given on page 62 of the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada for September, 1943. Dividing this by the population for 1941, the latest figure we have, we get a figure of approximately $84 per capita.

New Zealand has no provincial governments, but it is necessary to take account of the provinces in Canada. Therefore we should include the total funded debt and treasury bills of the provincial governments. The latest available figure for this total can be found on page 35 of the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada for May, 1943, and relates to the year 1942. The total for funded debt and treasury bills less sinking funds given here works out at $1,794,000,000. On the basis of the 1942 population that is equal to $154 per capita. If we add together the per capita figure of the Dominion of New Zealand and the local authorities of New Zealand we get a total of $1,152, while the total for the Dominion of Canada, provinces and municipalities for 1942 is $908. There is the actual record. I claim there is no getting around that.

With regard to interest charges, the hon. member for Cape Breton South made slight of my check of interest charges. He said: "The average rate of interest is 3·34 per cent for Canada and 2·49 for New Zealand." This afternoon we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) quote a figure away below three per cent, but since he was dealing with later figures I shall still keep to the year 1942 to put the figures of Canada and New Zealand on a comparable basis. The New Zealand public accounts for the financial year, 1942-43, part III, show the annual interest charge on the public debt as of March 31, 1943, to be £15,021,714—these are New Zealand pounds. That works out to an average 3·24 per cent on the public debt of New Zealand, which is a total of £463,825,371. These figures are taken from the budget statement of the Hon. Walter Nash, of 1943. Surely hon. members of the C.C.F. party will not dispute the statement of the Minister of Finance of New Zealand. One may compare this figure with that given for the average coupon interest rates on the funded debt of the Dominion of Canada for March 31, 1943, as given in the public accounts for the year ending on that date, which is 2·60 per cent, and the Minister of Finance's figures this afternoon were 2·57 per cent. I have taken up the time of the house to put this on the record because from Vancouver island to Halifax the C.C.F. have been holding out to the people of Canada the New Zealand picture, and instilling or leaving, if possible, an inference in the minds of the Canadian public that the C.C.F. party is just like the labour government of New Zealand and that if we had a government like that in Canada things would be greatly different in this country and far better.

I noticed that when the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking he paid no attention to my statement that in New Zealand on income tax they soaked the poor and in this country we soak the rich. That was left out of his speech. He omitted to make any mention of Canada's treatment of ex-servicemen. I said that although we had not reached the ultimate in giving consideration to our returned men, our treatment of ex-servicemen was not excelled by any other country in the world. I am not going to pit this country's war effort against that of any other dominion. I do not think it would be wise to do so, nor do I think it would be right to do so because, as everyone knows, each one of the dominions has, I believe, contributed to the utmost. But I can say this, Mr. Speaker, there is no dominion that has exceeded the contribution of Canada, and if figures are wanted I could place them on the record, too.

In the subtle propaganda of the C.C.F. speakers outside this house they always endeavour to leave the thought in the minds of all audiences that what New Zealand is enjoying in the way of social measures came into effect because they have a labour government there. Let me explode that fallacy, because fallacy it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is interesting.

Mr. REID: I understand they had a socialist government in New Zealand away back in 1892, but the things they tried to do in those days did not take very well and they were kicked out. Following that, they had what the C.C.F. so glibly calls the "old-line parties". It may surprise hon. members of this house to know that the old-line parties put most of the social legislation on the statute books of New Zealand. Let me give the facts. In 1894 they had the first arbitration court on wages and conditions. In 1898 they had old age pensions. Mothers' allowances—

Mr. KNOWLES: Long before we had them here.

Mr. REID: Yes, it was a long time ago. If the hon. member wants me to repeat it—

Mr. KNOWLES: I said that it was a long time before we had them in Canada.

Mr. REID: I know it is hurting him, but I shall try to be as easy as I can. Mothers' allowances, 1911; pensions for miners, 1915; that is, pensions for those with diseases of the mine such as T.B. and dust diseases; epidemic pensions, 1918; pensions for the blind, 1924; family allowances, 1926. It was not until 1935 that the New Zealand labour government came into power; yet this great propaganda is going out to the Canadian people: the New Zealand people down under can show us the way. Throw the government out and put us in, say the C.C.F., and you will get the same conditions in Canada as they have in New Zealand.

I am not going to call on a witness that I have before me, because I realize that perhaps it would be unfair to do so, but I can bring that witness before the house, since I have him on record before me in the shape of the leader of the opposition of New Zealand. I could quote what he has to say about the New Zealand government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By all means let us have it.

Mr. REID: It is just terrible. This is not a Canadian, an American or a Britisher speaking, but the leader of the opposition in New Zealand. And by the way, before coming to that may I say I nearly overlooked this—

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not leave anything out.

Mr. REID: I may leave out a little because I may need to come back. I shall, however, put enough on the record to keep their scientific factory working overtime. When they are going through this country telling the people about the labour government of New Zealand being like the C.C.F. party I wonder if they would mind telling the labour unions and the labour people this story. In New Zealand they have what is known as the flat wage schedule. The artisans, the men of ability who may spend seven or eight years learning a trade in that country get on the average only five cents an hour more than the ordinary helper. I want them to go out through the country and tell our artisans that if we adopt the same kind of government in this country as they have in New Zealand we might have that here. I should like them to tell the people this also. On looking through the records I find that they do not pay the women in comparison to the men anything like what we pay them in Canada, because they pay them less than fifty per cent of what the men receive. I want the public to be told these facts; that is why I am making these remarks to-night. I have had some experience in British Columbia since 1935; if I had time I could tell many queer stories of what happened in that province during the years of depression up through the Fraser valley, but I am not going to deviate from the story I have to tell, because it is too good. I want hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. to tell the people of Canada the truth, and I am giving them the truth to-night; not the political truth but God's truth.

New Zealand, it is true, is the most protected country in the world, but that does not give its people a particularly high standard of living. We should think that over carefully. I could quote the leader of the opposition in New Zealand, who says of the labour government that it has left a trail of broken promises. I have something else of his to quote; it sounds very much like something that might have been said during the Saskatchewan campaign. By the way, I heard some figures quoted yesterday in regard to the vote in Saskatchewan. I wonder how many hon. members know that the labour government of New Zealand got in with thirty thousand votes less than the combined opposition. They very nearly missed it. Here is what the leader of the opposition in that country had to say in 1943.

> Labour tries to soft-pedal its socialistic doctrines for tactical reasons, but its fundamental goal is still the socialization of the means of production, distribution and exchange. And the "means of production" means farms—your farm!

Remember these are the words of the leader of the opposition in that country; I am sure my hon. friends will not be able to refute his statements:

> This so-called security. There is not a farmer in New Zealand who can say that his farm will not be wrested from him under the Small Farms Act. That is the "security" that socialism has given him!

I have one complaint and fault to find with the labour government and the finance minister of New Zealand, and I am speaking as one who at different times has urged monetary reform, in the realization that we must move forward. The government of that country has been described by the C.C.F. as socialistic. It has been similarly described by the leader of the opposition there, who says that the only way to get rid of the socialist government is to vote it out and put his party in its place. Let me read what Mr. Nash had to say, and I really think he might have copied this from the Minister of Finance of Canada, for it sounds exactly the same. Remember, this is the government that went in on the promise of debt-free money.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Which was written first?

Mr. REID: Just wait till you hear this and perhaps you will not laugh so loudly. I do not have to remind the hon. gentleman of the saying about the loud laugh. I quote from Mr. Nash, in presenting the New Zealand budget of 1943:

> An examination of the estimated cost of the war will show the futility of attempting to take the amount required by taxation, but inside the objective (the maximum production of goods and services) taxation should be used to the extent that it will give the best results. The goal set by the government has been to pay one-half at least of the cost of the war from taxation. Owing to abnormal capital expenditure during the year just past this goal has not been reached, although the proportions would have been closed had all income taxes been collected.

Here is where I am greatly disappointed; here is where I recall the promise made about debt-free money. Hon. Mr. Nash says:

This takes me to another method by which money can be raised—creation of credit. It has been suggested by many good citizens, who have not fully examined the effect of their proposals, that the full cost of the war should be met by the issue of currency from the reserve bank. This is such an easy road that if it had good foundations we should follow it, but the facts of life prove that it would lead to chaos and disaster.

This is the socialist government that was elected on a promise of debt-free money, and when I say "elected on the promise of debt-free money", again I am using the words of Mr. Holland, who is now leader of the opposition in that country. As most hon. members know, New Zealand does only about half its banking business. When the Minister of Finance made his statement this afternoon I could not help thinking that the debt structure in New Zealand is far heavier, apart from the fact that it is greater, than that of Canada. This afternoon the minister pointed out that only 3·3 per cent of our debt was now payable outside the country, which means that interest on our debt will be paid mostly to our own people. In New Zealand, however, 33 per cent of the debt is payable in London. As Mr. Nash said, if they had to pay £145,000,000 in London last year, they would need to raise something like £200,000,000 in order to do so.

My time is passing very rapidly. I am sorry I have had to take so long on this one subject, but it is so important to the people of Canada that all the facts should be placed before them.

Mr. GILLIS: You are going to have to make another speech after this one.

Mr. REID: Well, it will not be because you will refute anything I have said, if one can judge from the last figures you gave.

Mr. GILLIS: You will see, after I get started.

Mr. REID: I will tell you what I will do with you. If you think you can prove these figures wrong, although they were quoted by Mr. Nash, and you are willing to place your seat in jeopardy, I am willing to do the same.

Mr. GILLIS: Your seat is in jeopardy anyway.

Mr. REID: If you will just come out to my constituency and make a speech I will be elected.

Mr. GILLIS: I would love to.

Mr. REID: You had better be careful or I may visit your riding and show up your figures.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. GILLIS: You have a standing invitation.

Mr. REID: I made my previous offer and statement and I stand by it.

Mr. GILLIS: You have a standing invitation to come.

Mr. REID: I notice the hon. gentleman has not replied to my offer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think you are both safe.

Mr. REID: I am quoting figures from the actual records. If they are wrong, surely the hon. member who quotes them cannot be held entirely responsible. I am not just ferreting these out; I have the New Zealand official records in my hands.

Mr. GILLIS: Graham Towers ferreted them out for you.

Mr. REID: Well, Mr. Speaker, if we were outside this house I would say that the hon. gentleman lies if he says I had anyone help me with these figures. I spent three days looking them up, and I will back my mathematics against those of any member of the C.C.F. I spent my own time digging up these papers, with no one to help me. I obtained the loan of the records, and now the hon. gentleman has the temerity to make a statement like that. However, my statements stand.

Mr. GILLIS: You are very sure of yourself.

Mr. REID: Yes, I am. This is the old game; the hon. gentleman throws in a few remarks; then goes home and tells the boys, "Didn't we interrupt his speech? Didn't we spoil it?" I can tell him now he will not be able to say he put Tom Reid on the spot. He is not able to say that, anyway.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. REID: You will have your chance. Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to keep order. I have been brought up in a tough mechanics union—

Mr. GILLIS: Let somebody else tell the story.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) not to interrupt unless he brings up a point of order. I would ask him to stop his interruptions, and to address the Chair when he wishes to interrupt or ask questions.

Mr. REID: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Well, since my time has almost expired, may I say that I think I have put enough figures on the record to keep my hon. friends working hard for a long time—including their scientific factories. I am apologizing to the house for jumping into the debate at this late stage, but I felt I could not allow those figures to go unchallenged. I felt that in coming before the members of the house I should bring the official records. I have given the figures honestly, sincerely and to the best of my ability; I have done it unaided, and I take the responsibility for saying it. There is no scientific factory of men behind me.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have been amazed to-night to listen to the tirade the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has seen fit to put on the record, in the dying hours of the budget debate. The government are very much concerned about getting the business of the house done; at least they are leading the public to believe that. That is their position, except when it suits their purpose to put over some political propaganda. The amazing part of this exhibition—

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to have exactly the same amount of order, Mr. Speaker, that you demanded for the previous speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: As much as you gave.

Mr. GILLIS: The surprising thing to me is that the last night the hon. member for New Westminster addressed the house he rose in his place and occupied about fifteen minutes of the time of the house in assuring all and sundry as to how carefully he had dug up his figures, at the same time striking himself on the breast and telling all who would listen just how truthful his statements were. Oh, he did not make any mistake, because he dug his facts so carefully! Well, all he has succeeded in doing to-night, so far, is to prove to the house that the figures he put on record on the first occasion were absolutely incorrect. To-night he has changed completely every figure he put on the record at that time. I am wondering, if I go to the trouble to dig up further figures in this matter, whether his statement will not be just as much at variance the next time he speaks as it was to-night.

What I made clear, in the figures I put on the record, was this. First, I attempted, and I think successfully, to defend a sister dominion. Only a few days ago the Prime Minister of New Zealand stood at the head of the table in front of Your Honour. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and his entire group, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and every member on that side of the house, eulogized New Zealand. They rose in their places and cheered the Prime Minister of that country. They paid tribute to the war effort that country was making, and to the contribution their soldiers are making overseas.

To-night the hon. member for New Westminster places New Zealand at the foot of the ladder, so far as nations are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. REID: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: I have the floor.

Mr. REID: I have a right to raise a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GILLIS: Do not do so much hollering. I am not easy to make sit down; get that under your hat.

Mr. REID: The statement the hon. member has made is absolutely incorrect. I said I would not pit one dominion against the other, because they all had contributed to their utmost.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster can place whatever construction he likes on his remarks. But I sat in my place, and I know the impression I got. That was the implication of his remarks.

The thing I am concerned about is this. Every member on that side of the house, and many members on this side applauded the Prime Minister of New Zealand in his remarks. If that is the attitude of this government and the leader of the opposition, then in my opinion their gestures to the Prime Minister of New Zealand were sheer hypocrisy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just leave us out of it.

Mr. GILLIS: Just sheer hypocrisy. You will have a chance to make your speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has accused members of this group and our leader, who is not at the moment in his place, of hypocrisy. I wish him to withdraw that word. We have not discussed New Zealand in any way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not withdrawing. I am addressing the Chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, I suggest that the hon. member must withdraw the charge of hypocrisy against the leader of the opposition. It will not do for him to take the attitude that he will not withdraw anything. The Chair and the house must decide whether or not he will withdraw. I think, on an appeal to the hon. member's good judgment, he will withdraw it. If he will just withdraw that remark about the leader of the opposition, and other members of the group, and let them speak for themselves it would be much better. So far as I am concerned, when acting in the place of the leader of the opposition, while he is unavoidably absent, I do not intend to allow that charge to go unchallenged.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I have the right to speak to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Let the hon. member speak to the point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not accuse anyone in particular on this side of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: What I said, and what I repeat, is this, that the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster were roundly applauded on this side of the house.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What has that got to do with it?

Mr. GILLIS: That you agreed with the remarks.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Absolutely.

Mr. GILLIS: I say, then, that when your leader took that microphone and represented the opposition groups in the house, and said the things he said about New Zealand, and eulogized the Prime Minister of that country and the contribution they were making—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): To the war effort.

Mr. GILLIS: —and you take this attitude in the house toward that country when they are not here to defend themselves, that in my opinion it was a gesture of hypocrisy.

Mr. HOMUTH: Again I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: And that goes for both sides.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member has accused the leader of the opposition and members of this group of hypocrisy.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not; the leader of the opposition is not here.

Mr. HOMUTH: The word itself is unparliamentary, and I will ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I believe the point of order has been well taken.

Mr. GILLIS: I knew you would.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Standing order 41—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just heard the hon. member observe, "I knew you would." That has to be effaced, since it is a reflection on the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the remark was made, then I ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South to withdraw that insinuation.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, any insinuation I may have made with respect to yourself I gladly withdraw.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Citation 298 of standing order 41, page 97 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, reads:

> The following expressions have also been ruled out of order: dodge; factious opposition; hypocrites.

And so on. It is under that standing order that I ask the hon. member to withdraw his insinuation.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, if in your opinion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —I have not respected the ruling of the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, if in your opinion I have said something that is not in accordance with the rules of the house I withdraw it.

Mr. HOMUTH: I submit that the hon. member is not withdrawing as he should. It is not a question of your opinion, Mr. Speaker; it is a question of the rule of parliament that you have quoted, and the hon. member must withdraw without any modification.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: In this case I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South has made a proper withdrawal.

Mr. GILLIS: In connection with that great ceremony my mind goes back to the ceremony we had this afternoon when we welcomed that great French soldier, General Charles de Gaulle, in front of the parliament buildings. He is a soldier who has fought the reactionaries of the world since 1934. He finally fought his way to a place of power and recognition by the peoples of the world. I wonder how sincere many of us were this afternoon in that great ceremony. My stand is well known in the circles he moves in. It leaves me a little doubtful at times as to what the future holds for Canada.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) pointed out something this evening that is ancient history. Most members of this group know the fight for social reform that has been carried on for thirty-five or forty years in New Zealand. While many of those reforms were put on the statute books of that country when the old-line parties were in power it was done because of the pressure of the socialist and labour movements. We have a repetition of that history in Canada to-day. We have family allowances and other reform legislation which were promised by the Liberal party as far back as 1919 but which were never enacted. To-day this legislation is before the house. Why? Because they want to give it to the people of Canada? No. It is there because of the pressure of organized labour across Canada in its march in the political field. That has forced a general recognition on the part of the old-line parties that social reform must come. If the people do not get it from the government in power, they will do what they did in New Zealand; they will throw them out.

The figures that I put on the record are still there. If they are wrong, then the Canada Year Book for 1941 and 1942 is wrong. If they are wrong, then the New Zealand Year Book for 1941 is wrong. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made it abundantly clear this afternoon that in comparing debt, interest and so forth of different countries there are many ramifications to be considered. There is no exact blueprint and you cannot make any particular statement with respect to debt. You must take many factors into consideration.

When the hon. member for New Westminster put his figures on the record I searched for comparable information. I could have taken the 1942 figures, but the only information I could find comparable with the figures he put on the record was in the 1941 and 1942 year books which gave the 1940 situation. The 1940 figures with respect to debt, social legislation and so forth are the only figures that can be taken as a comparison with the New Zealand situation.

I could go to-morrow and get the war debt that has accumulated in Canada since the outbreak of the war and compare it with New Zealand's, because that is what the hon. member did to-night with his figures for 1942. The 1940 figures are the only comparable figures that should be used in comparing the two countries and those are the ones I used. The hon. member for New Westminster carefully shied clear of what they get for their taxes. To make a general statement about social security does not mean anything.

I have put a clear, concise statement on the record with respect to taxation. I said that no one complains about paying taxes; no one quarrels about any tax imposed by a government if he gets something for it. That is the point. I do not want to go over my figures again and waste the time of the house, but they showed that in the field of social security and education Canada spends only $15.83 per capita while New Zealand spends $39.50.

Anyone who attempts to justify the existing social legislation in this country by comparing the debt and interest charges of Canada and New Zealand has a lot to do. New Zealand is a small country with a million and a half people. It is a barren island with little or no resources, but that country has given its population one of the highest standards of living in the world. It has done that with nothing to work on. We live in a country that covers the north half of the north American continent. We have unlimited resources and 11,500,000 people to provide for. To attempt to justify our situation by comparing our country with a country like New Zealand is certainly not statesmanship.

Personally I recognize New Zealand's limitations. During the process of fighting this war I am accepting literally the provision of the Atlantic charter for free access to the raw materials of the world. I see Canada in the future helping to raise the standard of living of those countries which have not the wherewithal to provide for their people. I hope that not many hon. members are going to take small countries with few resources as an example in an effort to justify our own inactivity in developing our natural resources. We should not attempt to justify that simply because some other country has not done it. That is the position the hon. member for New Westminster takes to-night.

Mr. REID: No, it is not.

Mr. GILLIS: The position this group takes is that taken by Roosevelt and Churchill when they drew up the Atlantic charter, and that taken by Stalin and Roosevelt and Churchill when they met at Teheran and laid down the strategy for the annihilation of nazism and totalitarianism. Those are the things we are fighting for, and those should be the social objectives of each and every country. I am very sceptical when a member of this house attempts to quarrel with the figures, as has been done on two occasions.

But more than that, I am afraid to-night of the statesmanship of the men who sit on the treasury benches opposite, men who should have the respect of the people of this country and should show more statesmanship than to laugh and applaud when someone occupies the valuable time of this house in trying to ridicule and belittle a sister dominion which is fighting shoulder to shoulder with Canada on every battlefront of the world. I am afraid of that kind of statesmanship. As a member of this House of Commons I take my duties seriously. I am here to see that the people of this country, in every section of it, are protected. I am here to see that our service men get a deal. When we talk of all the things that we have done for our service men, I say that what we have done so far leaves much to be desired. I am going to leave it to the service men to give their answer on that.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You take in a lot of territory.

Mr. GILLIS: A lot of territory was taken in by the hon. member for New Westminster whom I am answering, and I would not have occupied the time of this house at all at this time except for a direct attack upon myself.

Mr. REID: After you attacked me.

Mr. GILLIS: No; I merely corrected certain figures that you put upon the record. The figures that I put on the record came from the Canada Year Book of 1941 and 1942 and were 1940 figures. Anyone can rise in his place every two weeks in this house and show, when you take in the changing figures of the debt situation, that the figures put on the record a week or a month ago are not up to date to-day. If you want to do that, you can keep this house going for a long, long time. I could dig up figures to-morrow that would contradict the figures put on the record to-night by the hon. member for New Westminster, just as the figures he put on the record to-night completely contradicted his own figures that he put on the record two weeks ago. But that sort of circus does not add to the prestige of this house. I am sorry that I have been inveigled into this, and for the first time since I came into this house I am doubtful about the future of Canada under the statesmanship displayed in this house to-night.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You have displayed that sort of thing ever since you came into the house.

Mr. GILLIS: You are not here often enough to know whether I am here or not.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) finished by saying that he was doubtful of the future of Canada in view of the statesmanship shown in this house.

Mr. GILLIS: To-night, I said.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not believe many people can be doubtful about the future of Canada as long as they know the facts and face them squarely in every argument and deal with them as Canadians.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South says that the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was belittling New Zealand, whereas the hon. member for New Westminster was actually belittling the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation arguments drawn from the case of New Zealand, and drawn incorrectly, as the hon. member for New Westminster pointed out.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South rose, he said, to defend a sister dominion. No one in this house in my hearing has ever attacked any dominion of the British crown anywhere, least of all the hon. member for New Westminster to-night. He never brought up these figures in the first place—

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, he did.

Mr. CLAXTON: He did not. The figures were brought up by the C.C.F. on the hustings from one end of Canada to the other; and when figures are brought to meet them, to show how inaccurate they were, the C.C.F. raise objections and say that we are attacking a sister dominion. Who began these comparisons? Mr. Speaker, on two occasions I myself have urged that comparisons between different countries are misleading and should not be made except for the purpose of healthy emulation. But for a year and more past the C.C.F. in Canada have been using facts and figures, they say, derived from the experience of New Zealand, particularly for the purpose of influencing Canadian electors, and now when these alleged facts and figures are met, they say that there is an attack on New Zealand. The attack is on the C.C.F. figures on New Zealand and on their failure to take into account the total picture of New Zealand, which must be taken into account.

The hon. member for New Westminster did not mention to-night the great contribution which New Zealand has made to the war in the way of man-power, a contribution which is surpassed by few countries on the face of the earth. He discussed facts and figures in the light of the facts and figures brought up by the C.C.F., and did nothing else. That drew the hon. member for Cape Breton South out of his seat to give a speech which did not add very greatly to our knowledge of this subject. Then the hon. member for Cape Breton South says that our side, when we meet his facts and figures, are producing political propaganda. Let us have more political propaganda if it produces the facts and gives to the people of Canada the facts upon which they can base their decision in the days and months and years that lie ahead.

When I rose to speak to-night I had not intended to deal with this, but wished to deal with another subject related to it, the need of all the people of Canada getting all the facts about every subject. The prosecution of the war and the preparation for the peace are in the forefront of the minds of all of us, of members of all parties and of all the people of Canada to-day. Whether we are legislators or men working in the factories or on farms or soldiers fighting overseas, all our thoughts and energies and hopes are concentrated on these two objectives. The one essential ingredient for the effective prosecution of the war and for the preparation for the peace is that the people of Canada should remain united in will and in purpose. This has been frequently urged by members in all quarters of the house, but things have been said recently in the house and outside it which do not make for unity.

The unity of any country depends upon general understanding. We must recognize our common interest in the common good. Any understanding can be based only on knowledge and truth. The effective working of a democracy depends upon the knowledge of all the people and in their interest in their own government. This is particularly so in Canada, with five geographical divisions, a country where most of the people are descended from the two races which have given to the western world its major civilizations. Judged by any standards, Canada has done well through the years of peace and through the years of war. Even if we look backwards it is hard to say where our total effort on behalf of the united nations could have been increased.

Moreover, the measures adopted by this government have led to the burden of the war being fairly distributed on the shoulders of the population in relation to their ability to bear the load. When one considers the differences which we must recognize do exist in Canada and the difficulties that have been overcome, the record of the people of Canada stands up better than the record of the critics of Canada. The great majority of Canadians are anxious to remain united in the war and in the peace. The great majority of Canadians are prepared to face facts realistically and to make their utmost effort to get along together in the recognition that along any other road lies disaster. The great majority of Canadians deplore the attempt by anyone which has the effect of diminishing unity or dividing the country into separate races and creeds. Unfortunately there are in all parts of the country groups that respond to sectional and racial appeals, and there are unfortunately people who make those appeals.

My attention was recently called to a speech of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), given at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière on July 3 of this year at the opening of the campaign of his brother, Noel Dorion, Duplessis candidate for the Union Nationale in Kamouraska. According to a report in L'Action Catholique of July 3, 1944, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay said this and I may translate it:

> I accuse the Godbout government of entering into an alliance with the Communists and with the Labour Progressive party, as witnessed by the declaration of Fred Rose in the National Affairs Monthly of July, 1944. I accuse the Godbout government of not having prevented King from putting into the hands of Russian Jews the Bank of Canada, the war information board and the national film board, in naming the Jews Rasminski, Petegorski and Kentchum to posts of command in these organizations.

As for the charge that the Godbout government is linked with the communists, I leave that to the good sense of this house and of the Canadian people and of the people of Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not the usual type of campaign speech in Quebec, anyway?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have never heard that particular line developed in Quebec in any campaign which I have engaged in—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is learning something.

Mr. CLAXTON: —and it strikes me as being something unusual. However, if my hon. friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) suggests that this is characteristic of Quebec, he must bear the burden for that reflection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am asking you the question. You know.

Mr. DUPUIS: No. That is the counterpart of Lake Centre.

Mr. CLAXTON: The second charge is that the Godbout government did not prevent King from putting into the hands of Russian Jews the Bank of Canada, the wartime information board and the national film board. Before going any further let us see what the facts are. The hon. member says that the King government put into the hands of Russian Jews the Bank of Canada, the wartime information board and the national film board. I wonder whether the hon. member believes this. Does he know who are the members of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, the board of directors of wartime information board, or the board of directors of the national film board? If he can find any Russian Jews in that company I shall be very much surprised.

Mr. DUPUIS: It will be well for the hon. member to mention those who are in charge.

Mr. CLAXTON: And if he looks at the administrative officers—respectively Graham Towers, A. D. Dunton, and John Grierson—I do not think he will find anyone there who answers to that description.

Mr. DUPUIS: And St. Amour. He is not a Jew.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member bases his assertion in Ste. Anne de la Pocatière on the facts that "Rasminski, Petegorski and Kentchum have been appointed to posts of command." Let us take "Kentchum" first. Undoubtedly, by "Kentchum" he intends to mention David Ketchum, who is an officer of the wartime information board. The family have been on this continent for some hundreds of years, and as far as their records go back their origin is completely Anglo-Saxon or Irish.

Let me come to Messrs. Rasminski and Petegorski. Both these men were born in Canada and they are of the Jewish faith. Mr. Rasminski was educated at the university of Toronto and the London school of economics. For many years he was on the economic staff of the League of Nations. He is now an assistant to the governor of the Bank of Canada. He is known in Canada and throughout the world as one of the outstanding banking economists of the whole world. If the people of Ste. Anne de la Pocatière could meet Mr. Rasminski they would find a gentleman who could speak French, who would delight them and charm them with his knowledge of and love for their country, and who would impress them with the great services which he has given to our country.

Mr. Petegorski is an employee of the national film board on loan to the wartime information board, where he had to do with his own special field of labour relations. He is a graduate of Columbia university, and after taking a post-graduate course at the London school of economics he became a professor at Antioch. He is a born Canadian, and he has, like any other born Canadian, the right to serve Canada.

These two men and a handful of others who are of the Jewish faith are in the service of the government of Canada. Are they to be deprived of the responsibility of serving Canada because they are of a faith different from yours or mine? Is Canada to be deprived of the advantage of having their services? Are we to limit ourselves to people of Anglo-Saxon descent, or French descent or some other descent? The duty of serving Canada must not be limited to people of any one race, and the right to serve Canada is not limited to people of any race. It should be the glory of Canada that this is one place on earth where myths of racial superiority and racial prejudices shall not flourish.

We ought to recognize the facts. We are a country of minorities. Every race in Canada, whether English or Scottish or Irish or French or Ukrainian or Jewish or German or anything else, is a minority with reference to the whole; they are in a minority when viewed in the total picture of the people of Canada. Every person in Canada, with the exception of the Indians and Eskimos, is descended from immigrants. We ought to be proud of that fact, and proud of what our forefathers did for us in settling in this country and pioneering for us. Hitler advertised race theories and the world has seen what they mean. In fact his reign of terror is best expressed and understood by the violent anti-Semitism which has been, not his article of faith, but his stock in trade. When we join in anti-Semitism of any kind, when we join in giving voice to racial theories of one kind or another, we point Hitler's sword at our own breasts.

Since the hon. member who mentioned this is of the Catholic faith, may I recall to him—and I do it with the utmost respect—the word of his Holiness Pope Pius XI, who had this to say:

> Abraham is called our patriarch, our ancestor. Anti-Semitism is not compatible with the sublime reality of this text. It is a movement in which we Christians cannot share.

Spiritually the people who give way to racial prejudice, who breed intolerance by their own intolerance, who create injustice by being less than just, are walking in the footsteps not of Christ but of all that Christianity and humanity stand and fight against in this war. The province of Quebec, my own native province, to which I am deeply attached, having been born there and descended from people who lived there for three generations, is not to-day predominantly rural. It is no longer self-contained. Seventy per cent of the people of that province are urban. No part of industrial Canada is so dependent for its livelihood and prosperity on trade outside Quebec, with other Canadians and with the people of other countries. Quebec's interests are not isolationist, but above all places in Canada and, indeed, almost in the world, the interest of Quebec lies in the greatest possible cooperation with the people of other provinces and of other countries.

To-day we have been honoured by the presence of General de Gaulle. He paid his tribute to the sons of French parents who in the Canadian regiments were among the first to land on the beaches of Normandy from which their ancestors had come just three hundred years ago. For most of them it was their first return to the home of their ancestors. They went overseas to bring freedom to France and to humanity. Let us not lose that freedom at home. Freedom is a very civilized thing, and so is tolerance. Civilization is measured by the degree of freedom and the amount of tolerance there is in any community. We can be free economically and socially only if we have the advantages which come from united action and agreement on common objectives. And on those objectives we are not so far apart as the hon. member for Cape Breton South would like us and the Canadian people to believe. We can be free and united only if we have that respect for the individual which is the hallmark of Christianity. We can be united, provided that we keep before us the concept of Canada as a country second to none on the face of the earth.

A few days ago a friend of mine received from his son overseas a letter in which this was said:

> It is a funny thing, I never really felt as proud of being a Canadian until I got down here with some of the best fighting men in the world and found what respect they hold us in. Our chaps made quite a name for themselves in the last war and in this one they are living up to that name and doing one better. The more I see of people and countries I thank God I am a Canadian.

The Canada that boy is thinking of is the rivers and lakes, the open spaces and the dark woods, the mines and factories, the farms and the city streets. It is the history of Canada that it has roots in two civilizations that have led the western world; and it is in the geography of Canada with its back to the pole and its arms stretching out to the two oceans, bound to Britain by no ties except ties of interest and of affection, associated with the United States in a friendly relationship, the depth and the extent of which other nations cannot even understand. When he speaks of himself as a Canadian this soldier overseas is not thinking of an English Canadian or a French Canadian or a Jewish Canadian, he is thinking of a Canadian, an unhyphenated Canadian, and so are his comrades in arms, and so are the vast majority of the people of Canada to-day. They want to keep away from all the isms, from all the hyphens and to be people living in this great country of ours, people not only with a past that anyone can be proud of, but people with a future better than that of any other country. That is the kind of Canada he is thinking of, and that is the kind of Canada we in this house mean to give him.

The truth is that we can accomplish almost anything in Canada if we stay united. The war has shown that. But what advantage would it be to the people of Quebec or elsewhere if the seeds of disunity are planted, flourish, grow up and separate race from race, creed from creed, province from province? Unity is not a lofty ideal; it is a stern necessity if our welfare is to be served.

Mr. Speaker, I referred by name to the gentlemen I did because of the speech of my hon. friend to which I have referred. I hold no particular brief for those of the Jewish faith or of any other faith. I say that people who come to Canada and settle here have the right to be treated as all other Canadians, that there should be no discrimination between people in Canada whether they be of one province or another, of one race or another, or of one faith or another. It is our job in this house to see that as far as it lies within our power everyone in Canada is given equal opportunity to give our country what he can give it and to make for himself, his family and his descendants a life in this country such as only this country can give if we stay united.

But in any country having interests as wide as Canada's, national unity can be founded only on a cause which is larger than the nation itself. Patriotism begins at home, but it must not stop there in this world of little distances. The unity we seek must extend beyond the national borders. The unity we seek is essential to prosperity at home. The unity we seek must include the larger unity beyond our borders, which is also essential to our prosperity. We have everything before us if we stand united. We have nothing but weariness, difficulty and dissension if we allow these racial discords to be encouraged in our midst.

I feel that I make what may seem a rather prosaic statement in this house at this time, but I feel it deeply and I feel that I am voicing the views of those men whom I have met in our armed forces and of those people in Canada whom I have met, who say that they want to see this Canada grow strong as Canada, as a country stretching from sea to sea, as a country which we can be proud to work for, to die for and to live for.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): I would certainly not have participated in this debate had not the honourable member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) made a direct allusion to me. Since those words have been uttered, I think I may appropriately point out some truth which seem to be all too often overlooked on the other side of the house. The hon. member has referred in highly eulogistic terms to the part played by the Liberal party in promoting national unity in this country. Well, I have already said and proved, and I shall repeat and prove once again to-night that the worst disunion propaganda in this country has for the last 25 years come from the Liberal party.

In 1925, when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who had failed to be reelected in his constituency, returned to this house with 101 members while the Conservative party had 116, he was maintained in power through the cooperation of progressive members from the west. But, Mr. Speaker, among the 101 members who kept him in power, there were 60 members from the province of Quebec who had been successful at the polls because he had come before our people and advised them to stand up against their English-speaking fellow Canadians.

Mr. DUPUIS: To whom are you referring?

Mr. DORION: And I call to witness all the newspapers of the day. Look back on Quebec's Le Soleil, Montreal's Le Canada during the electoral campaign which preceded the 1925 election and you will find that in the fight against the Hon. Mr. Meighen, French Canadians were told that he had victimized our sons, that he had sent them to war and he was shown, as I have already pointed out early in the session, with hands dipped in the blood of our sons. And yet, these are the people who tell us to-day that we foster disunion because of the views I do not fear to hold, that I have held for a long time and that I shall continue to hold. That is the reason why it is necessary, as I said a while ago, to remind them too often unfortunately, since they have a very short memory, of what happened in the ranks of the Liberal party in the past twenty-five years.

[Mr. Claxton.]

In 1937, we heard the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) say: "I went to war, I returned, I will not go back and I will send no one to fight." Such words were uttered during the 1937 election campaign in the county of Lotbinière. And they maintain to-day that we are the ones advocating disunion.

I am not afraid to appeal to the press and the electors of this country to prove that jokers are not on this side of the house. If the other day I objected to certain appointments of the dominion government, it is because I have considered the words spoken by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister upon his return from London, when he said: "I am back from overseas and I must warn you that the war may still be long and hard, but worse still, after the war we shall have to fight the forces of evil throughout the world." The other day in the speech which I made on the budget, I was wondering where those forces of evil were? I would ask the Prime Minister of this country to finish his sentence and to explain what he meant when he told us about what he found overseas. It is because I am afraid of these forces of evil in our own country that I am endeavouring to sound a warning, that I am trying to check communistic propaganda and that I am denouncing the alliance between the communists and the Liberal party.

To-night, I heard the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George using against me the same arguments as the hon. member for Montreal-Cartier (Mr. Rose). They claim that my arguments are those of Hitler. I do not have to blush for the arguments I use in this house and outside of it. That is where I discover the alliance between the Liberal party and the Communists, and I shall denounce it, not because I wish to fight the Liberal party, but because I intend to defend our own institutions with all the energy at my command. That is why, I claim we have no lessons to take from these people.

As for military service, I repeat what I said on previous occasions, that I do not fear any comparison with these gentlemen. I have been on active service when I was of military age instead of claiming exemption as some people whom I know.

I was in the air force in 1918 and I served overseas when I was only 19 years of age and I am proud of it. That is why to-day I take every opportunity offered me, as member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, to describe, in this house and elsewhere the feelings of our population. I am not afraid of doing so and I do not fear the arguments which may be brought up against me here or elsewhere. That is why,

I wished to-night to take issue with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on the statement he made a few minutes ago.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I deem it my duty to say a word in regard to the numerous matters brought up during the discussion on the budget. As a Canadian of French origin, and with the experience which I have gained in this house I must say first that it gives me great pleasure to compare what I have heard yesterday from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) with the moderate, well-balanced speech, fair and just to all classes of society, made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). That is why, I am proud of the party to which I have the privilege of belonging. Indeed, after listening to such a speech, the broadness of outlook, the fair play and practical patriotism, of which do honour to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George who refuted the statements made outside this house by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), I am doubly proud of my party. The hon. member attempted later to indulge in demagogy, for I believe that in parliamentary language this is the only word that can appropriately describe that speech.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Use words you please.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): If my hon. friend allows me to go further, I shall be even more frank, but it is contrary to my habit to direct strong language at my opponents. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, delivered a speech outside the house in the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay which formerly was represented by worthy members of the Liberal or Conservative parties, who held Canadian citizenship in high esteem. He leaves the House of Commons to help a relative during a provincial election to arouse racial and religious prejudices and distort facts, as proved by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. DORION (Translation): On a point of order, I would ask the hon. member to mention one instance where I have aroused racial prejudices. If he cannot do so, I shall ask him to withdraw this statement.

Mr. LEGER (Translation): In all your speeches in this house.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I have just been interrupted by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche). I do not intend to disregard charges brought against me in this house. If the minister has enough courage to repeat what he said—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He said nothing.

Mr. LaFLECHE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is wrong again, as has evidently happened quite often recently. I am not the one who spoke a while ago.

Mr. DORION (Translation): If you are not the one, I am sorry.

Mr. LaFLECHE (Translation): Then take back what you said. Go ahead and prove that you can still boast the qualifications you had in the last war. I believe the hon. member was a commissioned officer. Is he a part-time gentleman?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Part-time gentleman! What a splendid part he played in the last war!

Mr. DORION (Translation): Play your own part.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I served my country. I was turned down because of my health. I was then a student at McGill university, and with all my fellow-students—

Mr. DORION (Translation): I too was a student.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation):—I volunteered to serve. One of my brothers died on the battlefield and eleven of my nephews are in Europe at present where they are fighting for the freedom you yourself have not the pride to want to defend.

Mr. Speaker, it seems it is a good thing to keep one's head; not to allow oneself to be carried away by sentiment, and I will try to act accordingly. I want to be kind to my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay because I remember the words of the Carpenter's Son who said at the hour of his death: "Forgive them; for they know not what they do." It is Christian forgiveness that I offer him.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks us to prove that he has raised racial prejudices. Nonsense. Some people are so hard of hearing! The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has just quoted verbatim words that he uttered at a meeting held in honour of one of his relatives—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Of his brother.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What an argument!

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He is a Conservative member.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): He said:

I accuse the Godbout government . . .

And I ask the hon. member to rise in protest if I do not quote the words he used and which are reported in L'Action Catholique of Quebec.

I accuse the Godbout government of entering into an alliance with the Communists and with the Labour Progressive party, as witnessed by the declaration of Fred Rose. I accuse the Godbout government of not having prevented King from putting into the hands of Russian Jews the Bank of Canada, the war information board and the national film board, in naming the Jews Rasminski, Petergorski and Kentchum.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I did not mention Kentchum's name.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Did the hon. member really say that?

Mr. DORION (Translation): I did not name Kentchum.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Did the hon. member really say that the King government entrusted its various services to Jews? I ask the hon. member who, at heart, must wish to remain worthy of the title conferred on him by his electors, to tell us if, at bottom, he really thought he was speaking the truth when he said that the national film board, the war-time information board and the Bank of Canada were controlled by Jews. Now tell me whether you think you spoke the truth or whether you knew that you were not speaking the truth. Now, is it true, yes or no, that you knew you were not speaking the truth?

Mr. DORION (Translation): The hon. member is a more experienced parliamentarian than I am, but he should learn, if it is indeed news to him, that no hon. member may speak twice on the same subject. I have not the right to answer him. He ought to know that. As far as his last remarks are concerned, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to have him withdraw them because no member has the right to say that one of his colleagues has lied.

(Text):

Mr. DUPUIS: I am going to speak in English. I said that he lied outside this house, when he spoke in favour of his brother in Charlevoix-Saguenay, and when he said that the King government put the wartime information board, the national film board and the Bank of Canada under the control of Jewish people. I stated that when he said that outside the house he lied. I asked him to say that it was not true, and he just admitted that, by his silence.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) I am positive that the words "lie" "lying" are not parliamentary. I will therefore ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) to withdraw that qualification.

Mr. DUPUIS: I withdraw, then. I withdraw the word "lie"; nevertheless—

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful now.

Mr. DUPUIS: Allow me to speak in French. I know intimately members of every race and party represented in the house. I know them to be broadminded, and to recognize that the people of this country who belong to my race have at least some usefulness, sometimes, and they recognize that the French language is welcomed in the House of Commons. I do not know of any member, including the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who would not like to speak French.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chalevoix-Saguenay ran the last election under an independent ticket, although he was formerly a Tory.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He still is.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I wonder whether he will ask me to withdraw this statement.

Mr. DORION: No fear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): It should be an insult to him because when he made his campaign with the support of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), he was an independent of short standing, and this is the truth. Then he swore by everything to his electors, from the northern part of his constituency to the enchanting shores of the St. Lawrence river that, once in the house, he would be of an absolute independence, voting with one or the other party according to the merits of the matters involved. Since I have been here, only once have I seen him vote with the Liberals, that is on our side; perhaps he wanted to support the communist members who voted against the amendment at the time.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Since the hon. member does not follow the proceedings of the house, let him reckon up the votes I have cast last year and he will notice that I supported the government more than once.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): On matters on which all the hon. members who have the least bit of common sense had to vote with us.

Mr. Speaker, it is most unfortunate that such happenings should occur among hon. members from my native province. We, citizens of French extraction, who, no later than this afternoon, were so proud to hear the voice of France through General de Gaulle; we who, in 1763 transferred our allegiance from France to Britain, and who, thanks to the spirit of justice which is predominant in all British citizens have obtained freedom of action in this country; we who, in spite of this freedom, have to fight those who oppress, through their might and their money, the weak and the working classes; we who form a minority in this country, who should always remain united, should ever work hand in hand when the interests of the province of Quebec are at stake, what have we seen in this house, especially during the last few years? We have witnessed, in the province of Quebec, the very same unfortunate events that occurred at the Bourbon palace in the years before 1939, when Frenchmen, instead of remaining united and preparing to fight Hitler, the modern tyrant, were divided and fighting among themselves.

Despite the inspiring example given by our former motherland, we, the citizens of the province of Quebec, give the same evidence of disunion, we give the sad example of that dissension which the great Mercier stigmatized in days gone by when he advised his fellow-citizens from the province of Quebec to put an end to their internecine strife and achieve union among themselves.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is one of those people, I do not blame him personally for that, I rather ascribe it to an old habit and to a mediate cause arising from the intellectual training we get in the province of Quebec, to the individualism from which we suffer so much rather than to a personal and intentional shortcoming on the part of the hon. member.

He is neither a conservative, because he has disowned the conservative party, nor a liberal, for he has never been one, nor again a member of the Bloc populaire, because I think that group does not want him, nor a supporter of the C.C.F., because that would not do in Charlevoix-Saguenay since the C.C.F. is but a camouflaged communism and the Charlevoix-Saguenay people value their money too much to hand it out to parasites. He belongs to no party. He is his own party.

Next to him there is the Bloc Populaire party, whose members for reasons and motives I shall not mention, because in their conscience they know them all too well, have left the Liberal party to wend their way toward a region as dismal and cold as a block of ice, in an attempt to bring down to their own level a man whose shoe-laces they are not fit to tie, the honourable and distinguished leader of the Canadian government. I shall not call him the greatest statesman, because that expression has become too commonplace, nor will I call him a great diplomat because too many people are labelled so, but I shall designate him as one of the liberators of mankind. Because of his contribution to the freedom of the working classes, some people have endeavoured to vilify him, to sully his reputation by resorting to all kinds of arguments with a view to bringing about his downfall in the province of Quebec. This has gone on to such an extent that people like the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and young greenhorns who support the Bloc Populaire, when they want to ruin the good name of the Hon. Mr. Godbout in the eyes of his fellow-citizens, accuse him of working hand in hand with the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, as if that were unworthy and scandalous, as if it were a humiliation to enjoy the friendship of the hon. the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Speaker, far from being humiliating or shameful, for one to proclaim himself the friend of the Prime Minister of this country, I maintain that it is a great honour, because he has contributed to the supreme greatness of this country. Let the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay listen to this carefully: I say that it is providential, in these tragic times, when the world is plunged into the most terrible of all wars, a prey to the greatest scourge which mankind has ever known, I say it is providential that the government of this country should be led by a man as gifted, experienced, patriotic, broad-minded as the present Prime Minister. I challenge the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay to try to reach even to his shoe-soles.

The future Prime Minister of Canada, after extensive studies in economics, furthered his training in thought and meditation, in appropriate surroundings under the guidance of his mother, the daughter of a great patriot who joined us in 1837 in the fight for freedom.

In 1908, through the grandfather of the present postmaster general (Mr. Mulock), Sir William Mulock, he was appointed in Ottawa by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the position of editor of the Labour Gazette. Why did he take this responsible post? Because that young man had found that the labour classes—workers and farmers—did not receive justice in this country, or at least they did not receive the full measure of justice to which they were entitled. He gave such a good account of himself that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier set up a department of labour with William Lyon Mackenzie King as minister. Since then, he has seized every opportunity to protect the interests of the working class, to fight abuses committed by capitalists.

I would point out, however, Mr. Speaker, that I am not denouncing all capitalists, for there are honest capitalists. I am in favour of freedom of production, of private enterprise, and in this democratic country of ours I am in favour of allowing all young men to prosper and to develop the talents with which Providence has endowed them.

But, there are capitalists who overstep the mark and who may be compared to those who committed similar abuses in 1837 and against whom we rebelled.

That young man, destined later to become Prime Minister, devoted his life to devise and submit to the parliament of this country laws to protect the working classes, the workers, the farmers, and to prevent the trusts from making an abusive use of their capital. He had laws enacted against these capitalists, against the trusts, and he saw to it that they were complied with. For twenty-five years, he proposed laws in favour of workers, giving them the right to organize and to protect themselves against those who were not acting fairly. We shall celebrate, on the seventh of next month, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his nomination as leader of the Liberal party. And when our friends of the Bloc, or the so-called independent members or the other parties in this house suggest social legislation, they should remember once for all that they are merely following, and from a distance at that, the path blazed by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that if there is in the province of Quebec an insignificant minority of citizens who are against our participation in this war, who are against everything we do, who seize upon every opportunity to say that we are fighting for England, that we do not owe anything to England, that the English are not doing anything, that young Englishmen hide in this country, that we are defending England, I should like to take this opportunity to inform the house and the citizens of my country, of the attitude of well-thinking citizens of Quebec and of those of the other sections of the country whose origin is the same as mine. Every human being in this world is actuated by a principle of primary importance, which is the ultimate object in life. It is the pursuit of happiness. While it is never reached, through our work, our energy, the virtues which we acquire through the principles which were instilled into our minds by our parents and by the clergy of any of the Christian denominations to which we may belong, we may hope on such solid basis to follow the path which was assigned to us by Providence.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

The main factors in the achievement of such an ideal include the love of freedom, freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of expression, freedom for our Christian clergy to teach, freedom to own property, freedom for us all to use as we choose the reward of our labour or the income derived from whatever property we may own. Those are the great freedoms which to us mean more than anything else in the world. Since the last war, which had no character of finality, our traditional enemies prepared in stealth and through all the crafty means they could design to destroy that freedom. But, on our part, we merely relied in the first place upon the League of Nations because we always advocated peace, and secondly, in case of war, upon the Maginot line built in France, which in that country was held to be impregnable. That explains why the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country, the hon. the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power)—to whom my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay has referred—the former minister of public works, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, whose memory we cherish, and all the government's spokesmen said, before the downfall of France: We shall wage a moderate war, Canada will send only a token army overseas. However, in June, 1940, after Czechoslovakia had been crushed and Austria invaded; after Poland had been attacked; after England and the other united nations had declared war; after all these events had occurred and France, our former mother country, with Belgium, had fallen and the French government, having taken flight to the south of their country, had been forced to ask for an armistice, where is the reasonable man who, considering the special events of these unfortunate times, would not have modified his views. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Choquette), who honour me by listening to my remarks at this moment, had the greatest confidence in the Maginot line; however, when we saw it breached and when we witnessed the fall of France, would it not have been sheer foolishness if, for the simple reason of stating with pride that our opinions had not changed, we had refused to alter our views with regard to our participation in the present war?

As General de Gaulle said this afternoon, in view of the easy flow of transportation, and thanks to modern inventions, the countries are all bound together; absolute sovereignty has ceased to exist in the world; all nations must help one another, and, in the present armed conflict not a single democracy was justified in remaining neutral. As for us Canadians of French ancestry, after our former mother country was crushed by the foe, we knew that Canada would have the same fate unless England resisted to the end; we knew perfectly that the freedoms we have enjoyed since the conquest would have been lost forever if we had not realized that our sacred duty was to take our share of this war and to help Britain who was struggling alone when all the European countries were under the nazi yoke.

Mr. Speaker, has my time expired? If the hon. members of this house will give me a few minutes more, I shall be through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. DUPUIS: When all other countries had been crushed, England, in her heroic resistance against the tyrant who had enslaved all the European territories, fought in a manner for which we should ever be thankful. The way for our country to express her gratitude in such circumstances, was to help to the limit of their resources those who had protected them against a tyrant whose victory would have meant enslavement for centuries perhaps.

(Text):

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as a member of French descent, I feel it my duty, despite the lateness of the hour, in view of the speech of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) to make a few remarks. I had intended to speak on the budget, but had given way to others in order to shorten the debate, because we thought it might be over by the end of last week. I do not wish now to make the speech which I had intended to deliver. However, I feel I must rise to state emphatically to this house that the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay does not represent the views of Quebec but the views of a boisterous minority. To my mind no French Canadian does more to harm his people than one who stirs up prejudice for political purposes.

French Canadians have had long and strenuous fights to gain recognition of their rights, but, 185 years after Canada became British, seventy-seven years after confederation, it can be said that no rights are denied to our people. The fight is no more for rights; they are not denied, except by a few bigots who have no influence even with their own people. The fight is now for obtaining some of the privileges which derive from those rights. The fight may be to obtain more in the way of public appointments. I wish to point out to our friends of English descent that more harm is done to national unity by not recognizing this, and because in some of the government services they do not give us our share, ammunition is furnished daily to ultra-nationalists and isolationists and others in Quebec who stir up prejudice. Were we treated more fairly in some quarters these people would be deprived of an argument which they bring up on the public platform in Quebec. If we did not have in some of the government services in Montreal people who do not know a word of French, although they deal daily with French people, and have to get an interpreter to sit by them when they have in front of them a Quebec farmer; if we did not have in the city of Quebec employed by the wartime prices and trade board a man who, although his French is confined to the equivalent of "yes" and "no" and a few other words, is retained under the pretext that he was formerly with a packing company—personally, probably, a nice chap, but one who can barely understand the people who speak to him—while such small incidents continue, although they are small they are aggravating. Every day our people meet these men and are incensed about it, and that sort of thing gives material to the ultra-nationalists to stir up prejudice.

Yet I say that it is not by raising racial prejudice that these people will help our race. It is by understanding, by discussing questions dispassionately, as in this house, with the best of faith and the best of intention to cooperate, that we can attain results. I repeat that it is by mutual understanding that these results will be achieved, not by going on the platform, as the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has done in the present election, and trying to raise racial prejudice.

When hon. members hear such statements as have been made by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and are occasionally heard in the Quebec house from some other members, they may have a small idea of the difficulty experienced by those of us who are trying, in order to bring unity and harmony in this country, to interpret English Canada to French Canada and French Canada to English Canada. On the one side we are faced with the intolerance of certain of the public servants who do not want to give us what is our share; on the other side we are faced with the intolerance of bigots of our own people who try to excite others against the English majority, and are now about to enter upon a campaign of anti-Semitism. Day by day some of these people, instead of granting to others the tolerance they ask for themselves, get up on the platform and make such statements as those which were made at Ste. Anne by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. Nothing can be more harmful. I repeat, and I should like some of the "patriots" of my own race to understand it, that there is nothing more harmful than statements of that kind. When they are taken to task, as has been done so aptly to-night by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), they do not deny it, but they hide behind a smoke-screen and enter upon a tirade on political lines. That is what we have to face, those of us who understand that the country is larger than the limits of Quebec, that our country is Canada, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that we as Canadians have a great role to play.

What are we faced with when we go to Quebec? We meet the kind of propaganda, the counterpart of which is also found in other provinces and of which oftentimes we have evidence in this house in certain quarters when statements prejudicial to our people are made, and on a vastly larger scale, outside this house. If Canada is to enter again the era of intolerance, what of our future? I appeal to those who are trying to work for national unity. There are some such, I would say, in each of the political parties in this house, for I would not wish to monopolize for my own party all claim to goodness in that respect. However, I believe that as far as Quebec and French Canada generally is concerned it has received more comprehension, more understanding and vastly fairer treatment from the present administration than it has from the friends of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, the people whom he supported and whom he tried to elect in 1940.

Before resuming my seat—and I have promised that I will not speak at length—I wish to state emphatically that the statements of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay made at Ste. Anne, the statements he has repeated to-night, and others of the same type which are spread daily in Quebec, are not the views of the majority of the province. They are nevertheless a very dangerous current of opinion, and I appeal at the same time to my friends of other groups to try to understand our people. Those of us who are endeavouring to act as a go-between try to get the people of both sides to understand one another and to make compromises. Here again I repeat that never has the province of Quebec or the French Canadian minority in this country experienced fairer treatment than by the present administration, not in the way of favouritism, but in the way of fairness and equity.

The attitude of mind which we find in certain people on platforms in Quebec, that attitude of intolerance which is to be found in some people in other parts of the country, would not have the influence it has were it not for the press of the English language which, whenever a member in Quebec makes a foolish or rash statement, prints in big broad lines, "French Canadian says this"; but when, the next day, somebody makes a constructive speech, he will get two lines on the last page, if he gets that much. The same thing is true so far as our French nationalist press in Quebec is concerned. When a crackpot of some sort like Shields gets up and makes a crazy statement it is put all over the province. I admit that the fault is on both sides. I appeal to both sides now while there is yet time, not to carry on with the idea of prejudice and intolerance, but to work together in a spirit of harmony for the greatness of Canada.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, had I caught your eye an hour ago I might have spoken for twenty minutes in this debate. However, I appreciate the desire of the government to conclude this debate to-night if at all possible; therefore I shall take only a few minutes in the hope that the debate can be brought to a close.

First of all I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and others who have associated themselves with him in his fervent plea for racial tolerance and understanding in this country. There is such a thing as a liberal democratic tradition. That liberal, of course, has a small "L". Those who share in that tradition are, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) has just said, not confined to any one party. The fact is that on all sides of this house there are members who value deeply the ideals and the concept of humanity as stated to-night by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, as well as by some of the other hon. members who have spoken. I felt encouraged when the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was speaking in connection with another point that is in the minds of some of us. I refer to the fact that in due course I hope we are to have an opportunity to do something about the miscarriage of this principle which occurred in connection with bill 135 some time ago; and I am glad to feel from what has been said to-night by a Liberal member that there are in that party a great many who share his view and who in the liberal democratic tradition will join with some of the others of us in what we hope will happen when that bill comes before us.

However, with an eye on the clock and remembering my promise, what I should have liked to have time to do would be to make a contribution—I feel it would be that—to the debate that we had earlier this evening on the question of New Zealand. Had I the time I would have given the house the information contained in material that I have in my hand which was prepared not by the government of New Zealand or any opposition group trying to discredit that country, but rather by the International Labour Office at Montreal. This material sets out in factual form the actual social benefits that accrue to the people of that dominion. To give even the headings of this material that I have would take more time than there is left at my disposal. But on some future occasion perhaps that opportunity will be presented, and I should like to give that material when that opportunity comes.

The point I wish to make has in fact been made by some of the others already, namely, that you get nowhere in this kind of argument when you attempt to compare tax rates and national debt and all that kind of thing. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) pointed out this afternoon, national debt has to be set against the ability of the country to carry it; it has to be set against the standard of employment and standard of living generally. Also, when you look at tax rates you have to find out what proportion of the total taxes collected by the country, not just the taxes of one kind, but what proportion of the total taxes are levied according to ability to pay; but even after you have done all that in the most complete statistical form it is still just about impossible to array two systems against each other in that way. I feel, however, that there is merit in looking at the things that the people of New Zealand actually have in the way of complete social security benefits, and on another occasion I shall, because I think hon. members should have it, place a digest of it on Hansard.

There is one other reference that I shall call to the attention of hon. members. This time it is a book from New Zealand entitled "New Zealand, the Working Democracy," by Walter Nash. I refer hon. members in particular to appendix 3 of this book on pages 318 and 319, in which there is set out in tabulated form the benefits that were paid to New Zealand people under the social security laws in effect when the labour government came into power in 1935 and the benefits in effect in 1943. This table answers one of the arguments made to-night.

Hon. members have already made many comments about our having so much to say about New Zealand. We have no apology to make for that. As a matter of fact we feel we have done the people of this country a service in printing by the thousands such a speech as that which was made in Ottawa in 1941 before the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation of this house by Walter Nash, a speech in which he set out the things that they were doing in that country. I myself had something to do with that reprinting in Manitoba and I know the orders that kept coming in amazed us. They showed the interest of the people in what was going on down there. We feel that we are doing a service to the people of this country in pointing out what has been done in that sister dominion. As a matter of fact I am reminded of the words of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who spoke in this present debate on June 30 as reported at page 4386 of Hansard. He said:

> As one who was born in the same country, indeed in the same neighbourhood, may I pay my humble tribute to one of Scotland's sons who has made a name for himself by his public service to New Zealand and thereby to mankind.

I feel that in line with what the hon. member said on that occasion, rather than what he said to-night, we are doing a service to the people of Canada in making known to them as widely as we can the service that has been rendered to their people by the labour government of New Zealand.

Main motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to on division.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ADDRESS

OF

GENERAL CHARLES DE GAULLE

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC

PARLIAMENT HILL, OTTAWA, JULY 11, 1944

(General de Gaulle was welcomed by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, and Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, Minister of Justice)

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister of Canada): Your Excellency, Your Royal Highness, ladies and gentlemen: We are met this morning to extend to General Charles de Gaulle a hearty welcome to Canada.

To you, General de Gaulle, as a French soldier, as a leader in the fight for world freedom, and as representing the unconquerable spirit of France, I am proud to offer this welcome in the name of the government and people of Canada.

Here, in the presence of the representative of the crown, are assembled before you the representatives in parliament of the Canadian people. Here also are assembled residents of our capital city. All are proud to honour the man who in the darkest days of this war rallied the forces of Free France, and who to-day is the symbol of the determination of the French nation to restore its freedom and greatness.

In welcoming General de Gaulle to our country, I can speak for the whole of Canada. In no country has the sympathy for France in her agony been deeper than in our own; in none have the prayers for her liberation been more fervent; in none has the growth of French resistance been watched with greater pride and admiration.

For the visit to Canada of General de Gaulle, the hour could not have been more happily chosen. At this moment, French and Canadian soldiers are fighting side by side in Italy. On the battle fields of Normandy, Canadian fighting men form part of the great allied striking force. Amidst these scenes of conflict and triumph there has been a proud renewal of the historic association between the people of France and Canada.

General de Gaulle comes to us fresh from his visit to Normandy. What emotion he must have felt as he set foot once more on the soil of France! What a thrill of pride was felt in many Canadain homes when we learned that the first troops he met in Normandy were men of Canada's army! It was from Normandy that the first Canadians came to make a new home and found a new nation in the new world. We rejoice that Canada's fighting men are helping to-day to free the ancestral home of so many of our people.

France is not only the ancestral home of many Canadians; in France are many shrines sacred to all Canadians. The Somme, Arras, Cambrai, Vimy, and a host of scenes of battle a generation ago, are names that will live forever in our history. In fighting for the liberation of France, Canada is fighting for what is truly a part of herself.

Within France a living spirit of resistance has revealed itself in countless acts of heroism and sacrifice. Behind the enemy's lines the French resistance has been undermining German power. Since the landings in Normandy, underground forces have been quick to strike. On all sides there is evidence that in the hearts of the French people there still burns an unquenchable fire of "liberty, equality and fraternity" which no dishonourable betrayal within, or fiendish tortures from without, have been able to extinguish.

In the revival of French military power, inside and outside France, General de Gaulle's role has been of incomparable importance.

In these years of war, we in Canada have sought to do our part to keep alive the flame of French civiliation. We have continued to cherish our admiration for France and all she has meant to freedom. We have never lost our faith that the greatness of France would be restored. The people of Canada are proud to have their part in the memorable events in which the liberation of France is being accomplished.

In thanking you for your visit and in wishing you all that is best in your valorous leadership, I ask you, General de Gaulle, to take back with you an assurance from the Canadian people to the people of France. Tell them that all Canada is united in support of the determination of the allied nations to drive the enemy from the soil of France. Tell them we are not less united in the determination to destroy the power of Germany to terrorize Europe, and to end, once and for all, Germany's capacity to disturb the peace of the world. Tell them that we are with them heart and soul in these days of suffering and sacrifice; and tell them to fight on, for we are confident the day is drawing near when we shall be sharing with them their joys and triumphs in the supreme hour of victory.

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Your Excellency, Your Royal Highness, ladies and gentlemen: We are met this morning to extend to General Charles de Gaulle a hearty welcome to Canada. I am proud to associate myself with the right hon. Prime Minister to extend to you, General de Gaulle, a hearty welcome in the name of the government and the people of Canada. We welcome in you the great Frenchman who defends his country, a leader in the fight for world freedom, and a representative of the unconquerable spirit of France.

Here, in the presence of the representative of the crown, are assembled before you the representatives in parliament of the Canadian people. Here also are assembled residents of our capital city. All are proud to honour the man who in the darkest days of this war rallied the forces of Free France, and who to-day is the symbol of the determination of the French nation to restore its freedom and greatness.

In welcoming General de Gaulle to our country, I can speak for the whole of Canada. In no country has the sympathy for France in her agony been deeper than in our own, in none have the prayers for her liberation been more fervent; in none has the growth of French resistance been watched with greater pride and admiration.

For the visit to Canada of General de Gaulle, the hour could not have been more happily chosen. At this moment, French and Canadian soldiers are fighting side by side in Italy. On the battle fields of Normandy, Canadian fighting men form part of the great allied striking force. Amidst these scenes of conflict and triumph there has been a proud renewal of the historic association between the people of France and Canada.

General de Gaulle comes to us fresh from his visit to Normandy. What emotion he must have felt as he set foot once more on the soil of France! What a thrill of pride was felt in many Canadian homes when we learned that the first troops he met in Normandy were men of Canada's army! It was from Normandy that the first Canadians came to make a new home and found a new nation in the new world. We rejoice that Canada's fighting men are helping to-day to free the ancestral home of so many of our people.

France is not only the ancestral home of many Canadians; in France are many shrines sacred to all Canadians. The Somme, Arras, Cambrai, Vimy, and a host of scenes of battle a generation ago, are names that will live forever in our history. In fighting for the liberation of France, Canada is fighting for what is truly a part of herself.

Within France a living spirit of resistance has revealed itself in countless acts of heroism and sacrifice. Behind the enemy's lines the French resistance has been undermining German power. Since the landings in Normandy, underground forces have been quick to strike. On all sides there is evidence that in the hearts of the French people there still burns an unquenchable fire of "liberty, equality and fraternity" which no dishonourable betrayal within, or fiendish tortures from without, have been able to extinguish.

In the revival of French military power, inside and outside France, General de Gaulle's role has been of incomparable importance.

In these years of war, we in Canada have sought to do our part to keep alive the flame of French civilization. We have continued to cherish our admiration for France and all she has meant to freedom. We have never lost our faith that the greatness of France would be restored. The people of Canada are proud to have their part in the memorable events in which the liberation of France is being accomplished.

In thanking you for your visit and in wishing you all that is best in your valorous leadership, I ask you, General de Gaulle, to take back with you an assurance from the Canadian people to the people of France. Tell them that all Canada is united in support of the determination of the allied nations to drive the enemy from the soil of France. Tell them we are not less united in the determination to destroy the power of Germany to terrorize Europe, and to end, once and for all, Germany's capacity to disturb the peace of the world. Tell them that we are with them heart and soul in these days of suffering and sacrifice; and tell them to fight on, for we are confident the day is drawing near when we shall be sharing with them their joys and triumphs in the supreme hour of victory.

General CHARLES de GAULLE (Translation): The moving welcome that you have accorded me seems to come from a double inspiration. No doubt you wish first of all to testify to the comforting solidarity which unites in the world across frontiers, oceans and continents, the men who fight together for liberty.

No doubt you have also judged it well to show here that France has not been, is not and never will be forgotten.

Well, gentlemen, I wish to say that for France, Canada is a dearer friend than ever.

Certainly the past accounts for a great part of this mutual sympathy. On the one hand your people, who have never been opposed to ours in any historical event; your people, whose men have always opened their minds and their hearts to the ideas and sentiments which have elevated the French spirit your people, in the veins of many of whom flows blood which has come from France, and on the other hand my country which remembers having been the first to carry Christian and European civilization to this immense land, my country which has never ceased to follow and admire the magnificent efforts of your ancestors and of your kinsmen in their struggle to bring about prosperity through the development of the natural resources of the country and to develop the minds of the people intellectually, spiritually and morally in order to create a state of full consciousness of its own valour and in loyalty to the Commonwealth of which it is a part. Your people and my country—may powerful bonds link them throughout time.

Nothing seemed more natural to old France than to see Canadian soldiers struggling on her soil for the same cause in the preceding world war and to bury reverently in her soil those whose heroic memory is symbolized by Vimy.

And let me say here that nothing has seemed more moving to the man who has the honour to speak to you than to have seen the Canadian Corps engaged on the banks of the Liri River in Italy recently side by side with the French army and to find first upon the beaches of Normandy, where they took a foothold at the beginning of the great battle, a fine and brave Canadian regiment.

(Text):

But, ladies and gentlemen, if the past holds so many special reasons why France and Canada should understand one another, I may say confidently that the present has added a great many more! It is in a time of crisis that friendship proves itself. Well, during these difficult years France has passed through many trying days. Submerged by the enemy, stunned by the disaster, betrayed or deceived by those who, having seized the state, did not use either their power or their reputation except to plunge it and maintain it in the shame of debasement, France might for a short time have presented to malevolent or superficial observers the appearance of one of those falls from which a nation does not rise when she has accepted it. But others, better informed because they were more favourable, quickly realized that my country, in the depths of its misery, refused to give up. These understood very soon that the determination, the hope, the spirit of the French people remained firmly at the side of those who refused to lower the flag and who at all costs intended to maintain their country in the camp of liberty.

I will not try to describe what such an enterprise has cost in effort, losses, often bitter disappointments, for the French who in every domain, whether it be in the interior of France or outside the country, have carried on this fierce struggle for independence and for national unity.

But it is my duty to say what comfort and support they have found in Canada, in its government and in its people. The French aviators whom you have trained here; the French forces whom you have helped to arm; the French prisoners whom you have fed and clothed; above all, perhaps, the innumerable French who, in their suffering and their fight, heard the echo of Canadian sympathy, are a witness to this fact.

To-day France is standing upright and united. If the living friendship which she has found everywhere in Canada has contributed to sustain and lift my country during her trials and thus has materially and morally strengthened the coalition of Free Peoples against their bitter enemies, to-day it becomes a very important factor in the task of reorganizing the world which will come out of this terrible war. At present, victory flushes the horizon. We feel in the hearts of the peoples who have united to assure the triumph of right and liberty, a tremendous aspiration towards a better future. For, if so many men and women in a free world have voluntarily suffered, fought, worked, if so many good and brave soldiers have died without a murmur, if so many towns and villages have offered themselves up in sacrifice for our common salvation, it would not be tolerable, it would not even be possible, that from so much death, sacrifice and ruin a greater and better humanity would not emerge.

But, in a world where all intercourse has unceasingly tightened the interdependence of nations at the same time as that of individuals, how is it possible to conceive human progress if not within a system of real international cooperation? For the same reasons that a single war common to all covers the whole of our earth which has become so small, the peace which we will have to make must be a single peace, common to all. For the same reasons that what is being thought, produced, manufactured anywhere in the world has inevitable consequences upon the destiny of the most obscure combatant, thus to-morrow, the condition of man in the world, whatever his race, country or activity, will depend in some measure upon what will be achieved anywhere in the political, economic, social, spiritual, intellectual and moral spheres. In other words, it is impossible to imagine either assured security or solid and lasting progress for any nation or any individual if all nations among themselves, or within each nation, all citizens among themselves, are not willing to consent to work together in normal brotherhood.

France, emerging step by step from her temporary misfortunes, France enlightened by her suffering, France intending no longer to divide, but to unite her passion for progress and traditional wisdom, states herself ready to play her full part in this universal task. She is certain to find, at her side and in agreement with her, all the peoples who know her well—and first among them she will find Canada.

Wednesday, July 12, 1944

The house met at three o'clock

PRIVILEGE

MR. LACOMBE—REFERENCE TO ACTION TAKEN BY THE HOUSE ON JULY 4

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not intend to question the decision taken by you, sir, and by the house, but my contention is that I am entitled to give this chamber some explanations I was prevented from giving on July 4.

According to the rules of the house, and Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, at page 303, this right is given to members, and is set out in these words:

> In the Canadian house, questions of privilege take a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the house collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character.

As reported at page 4514 of Hansard this is what occurred:

> Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie please be seated.
>
> I have already said to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) that I would not tolerate any further interruptions of the speech made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie. It is apparent that the hon. member does not intend to obey the injunction of the Chair, and I will have to name the hon. member.
>
> I therefore name Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two Mountains.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the rules of the house—
>
> Mr. Lacombe: I only put a question to my hon. friend.
>
> Mr. Speaker: Order.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): In accordance with the rules of the house, and in the absence of any explanation by the hon. member, I shall have to move, seconded by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock):
>
> "That the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, Liguori Lacombe, be suspended from the service of the house for a period of seven days."
>
> Motion agreed to.
>
> Mr. Speaker: I would ask the sergeant-at-arms to remove the hon. gentleman.

I did not then have the opportunity of availing myself of my right to give the house some explanation. I quote from page 367 of Bourinot:

> In case, however, a member persists in unparliamentary conduct, the Speaker will be compelled to name him, and submit his conduct to the judgment of the house, in accordance with a very old rule. . . .
>
> In such case the member whose conduct is in question should explain and withdraw, and it will be for the house to consider what course to pursue in reference to him. If the house consider the explanation sufficient, it will be proper for a member to make a motion to that effect, which will be adopted and duly recorded.

And at page 368:

> The house in all cases should give every proper opportunity to an offending member to make such a defence as may satisfy the house and avoid a reprimand.

As will appear from the reference to Hansard which I have just mentioned, the procedure indicated by Bourinot has not been followed. That is why my privilege as a private member of this house has been infringed.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That for 1944 the total tax on individuals be reduced by one-half the amount of the refundable portion thereof, less one-half credits for savings, and that for 1945 the total tax on individuals be reduced by the full amount of the refundable portion thereof, less credits for savings.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to express my personal regret that the administration has seen fit to take this step. In the budget debate of 1941, I pointed out that we should have some type of compulsory savings in war time, when so much of our income is required for war purposes and when expenditures should be reduced to the minimum. I indicated that one of the best methods of obtaining this money—and it has been so obtained in the last two years—was through a compulsory savings tax. It is elementary to point out that at a time when we must curtail our expenditures so as to make available large sums of money for war purposes, we should either through taxation or through compulsory savings or otherwise take as much money as possible from the people of the country. I advocated this principle two years ago, and felt at that time that for those in the lower income tax brackets we should make the tax as light as possible, in order that the people might be enabled in the future to enjoy the benefits of the extra time and effort they were devoting in such great measure to war production.

It is most important in the post-war period that there be purchasing power in the hands of the people, particularly the small or common people, if I may so describe them. Under the present system of persuading them to purchase victory bonds and war savings certificates we will obtain a certain amount of money; but certainly the more equitable plan was that of compulsory savings.

I am sure the administration will regret very much having taken this step. If they had approached the task in a more vigorous and forceful manner, perhaps as is done in connection with victory loan and war savings campaigns, they would have given the people a more complete understanding of the full value and meaning of compulsory savings. The minister would have been far better off had he reduced the tax in the lower income tax brackets and retained this feature of compulsory savings to serve as a cushion in the transition from war to a peace-time economy. We would have placed in the hands of people who normally do not save very much a considerable amount of purchasing power, as against the present tendency of concentrating that purchasing power in the hands of fewer and fewer individuals. I regret very much indeed that the minister has seen fit to cancel this provision, which was in force for two years.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I add my voice to that of the hon. member for Saskatoon City.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

I am sorry that the government has not seen fit to accept a suggestion which was perhaps even a little more sweeping, that instead of removing the savings feature in the lower income tax brackets we remove the tax and keep that savings feature. I agree with the hon. member that had we done that we would have collected the same amount of money, and placed in the hands of the people after the war some very much needed purchasing power.

When I read what some of the economists, analysts, and forecasters are saying with respect to the future, as to the possibility of a boom and then a depression, I realize it is essential that ways and means be found to increase the purchasing power of the people in the post-war period, and particularly to encourage persons who are able to do so to prepare for that time.

I know that at this stage it is of little use to make the suggestion I have made, and I do not purpose spending a great amount of time in the discussion. I am sorry we have not done this, because the same amount of money would come into the hands of the government; and then in the post-war period these people in the low income tax brackets, who to-day are feeling the incidence of taxation perhaps as very few other groups in the community are feeling it, would have had some purchasing power with which to buy the things they need and at the same time promote the industry of the country.

As time goes by the government will probably see the wisdom of a proposal of this kind. As I said before, it would not reduce the amount of money the government would have in hand, nor would it allow any more expansion of purchasing power than is proposed in the budget. These suggestions would have been all to the good, had they been followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As the hon. member for Saskatoon City has pointed out, the principle of compulsory savings was advocated from this side of the house, and was accepted by the government on the theory that it would prevent inflation, add to the war revenues of the nation, and create a backlog for the citizens of the country in the days to follow the war. I thought the principle was sound, and I still think so. But I am bound to say that the reaction in the country was not nearly as favourable as I had hoped. Particularly among the older ranks of our citizens, there was an astonishing measure of resistance. A person over sixty-five years of age who was compelled to pay this compulsory saving tax took the view, rightly or wrongly, that he would never see his money again, and that probably he would be dead before any refund was made. That was the type of resistance offered against the tax.

Nevertheless the government has determined on the measure now before the committee, one which will bring relief to two classes. I referred to this matter in the remarks I made in the debate on the budget. Those in the lower brackets, who had to make compulsory savings, felt they could ill afford to do so, having regard to the enforced deductions from their purchasing power through an already depleted pay cheque. I would like to read to the committee a letter I received only the day before yesterday, commending the amendment to the budget offered by the official opposition with respect to proposed elevations in the exemptions. That amendment was defeated in the house yesterday. I shall not take time to read the letter, but shall be content to say that it was symptomatic of many communications I have received. I fancy that many of those in the lower income tax brackets who had to pay this compulsory savings did not have compensating factors such as mortgage payments or life insurance payments that those in the higher brackets may have had. The departmental administration will know much better than I whether that is so or not. I always had the idea that the compulsory savings provision bore more harshly on those in the lower brackets than it did on those in the higher, but I may be wrong about that. I should like the minister to tell us concretely what the loss will be in the six months from July 1 to the end of 1944, on this year's figures as far as they are available, and what the loss will be in a full year.

There is a suggestion I want to make, which I have communicated to the minister and to the Department of National Revenue. As I understand the law, these compulsory savings are not assignable by the taxpayer to anyone. I assume that was to prevent the trafficking in these savings certificates, if I may so term them, and I think that is proper. If they were assignable and money could be lent upon them, I can see the possibilities of a grave evil being carried on by speculators and otherwise who would buy them up at greatly reduced values. I am not suggesting that they be assignable for any commercial purpose, but a husband ought to be able to assign his compulsory savings to his wife, and the wife ought to be able to assign hers to her husband, or either or both ought to be able to assign savings to a dependent. This would not give the right of cashing in the savings. I can see a good deal of virtue in the suggestion and I realize also that there may be administrative difficulties in the way. I am not suggesting that these assignees should be able to anticipate payment, but a husband ought to be able to assign to his wife as a gift. It would not be operative as a gift at the time, but it would become a gift in fact after his death or upon the maturity of the term.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My wife gets my money now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know there are some men who have the habit of allowing their wives to go through their pocketbooks every day, but I have never allowed my wife to do that. I am serious about this because I believe it is a constructive suggestion. I ask the minister and his officials to give serious consideration to these suggestions. I do not think there is an insuperable difficulty in the way. Take a man who had possibly $800 accumulated over a period of time. It might be that that is his only estate, and probate would have to be taken with all the accompanying expenses in order to get the government to release the money. If the compulsory savings were assigned to his wife or his issue they would automatically be paid in a proper case. I suggest that to the department in great seriousness.

I do not suggest that it ought to be anticipated in any way or that it could be assigned for collateral purposes. However, the government are now allowing the twenty per cent refundable taxes paid under the excess profits tax to be assigned in a given case as collateral for loans in anticipation of capital expenditures by industrialists in the post-war period for the purposes of providing employment. But in this case the husband ought to be allowed to assign to his wife, especially a man in advanced years who may not live to see the payments come due. This should apply also in the case of the wife. Then it should be extended to take care of dependents.

I offer this suggestion in good faith to the minister. It has come to me from a man who thinks seriously about these taxation problems. He is far removed from political considerations in this country, but he wants to see the law ameliorated as far as possible in the interests of the taxpayer, who after all is more or less the forgotten man in this country.

While I am speaking about the forgotten man, I wonder if you will consider it relevant, sir, if I take this opportunity to say a word on behalf of a group of taxpayers in this country who are indeed forgotten men, namely, the private members of parliament. I hope I shall be allowed to say what I want to say on the theory that I have no particular axe to grind. It does not make much difference to me whether the indemnity is $4,000 or $5,000; I am in the red now so far as indemnity is concerned, and I have been living on capital ever since this war started. But that is not the case with a large number of members of this house. For some reason, whether it is modesty or humility or fear or what-not, private members of parliament seem loath to get up and tell the country their exact position.

I can best illustrate the position of the private member by referring to my own case. As a private member I receive $4,000 indemnity if I do not lose too many days. If I lose more than fifteen days I am penalized to the extent of $25 a day. During last session, as well as this session, I was not able to be here every day, and I may be penalized. However, we will leave that out of consideration. According to the records I have established, the government deducts at the source from my indemnity cheque a total of $1,480 per year because I am treated as a single man without dependents. I have lived in Ottawa a good many years, and I think it is the desire of my constituents that I should live in a proper state, a state becoming a member of parliament representing one of the finest constituencies in Canada. I can honestly tell this house and the country—I am not making any plea on behalf of myself—that it cost me $10 a day to live in Ottawa, including gratuities. With a session lasting 180 days that means $1,800. If you do a quick sum in mental arithmetic, that $1,800 plus the $1,480 makes $3,280 to be taken out of my sessional indemnity.

I like to go home once in a while and I have to travel overnight. I am getting so old now that I like to have a compartment, and I cannot go home and back under $25 for the round trip. If I do that twice a month it means $50, and six times $50 amounts to $300. How much is there left from my sessional indemnity?

Mr. SLAGHT: Do you like to visit your constituents occasionally?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely, and I like to go home and see the wee wife once in a while. I am putting this forward as an actual case. I know there must be many hon. members who have not a backlog upon which to draw to support themselves in the position in which a member of parliament ought to support himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ninety per cent.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assume it is ninety per cent. No one has asked me to make this speech, but I did feel that in justice to the members of this house the country should know something of their plight. How do they treat their members down in the United States?

An hon. MEMBER: Some of us have to keep up two establishments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have to keep up two homes, one here and one in Fredericton.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And what about the extra income tax they take off that?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Leave him alone. He is making a good job of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have taken some trouble to ascertain what the position is in the United States. The senators and members of the United States Congress get a yearly salary of $10,000. I suppose that is subject to income tax, I do not know; I am taking it for granted that it is. In addition, each member of the senate and house of representatives gets free postage and free telegraph service. We get free postage under certain conditions here, but certainly my telegraph bill is substantial. When I had the honour of leading the opposition for three sessions the telegraph bill and the telephone tolls which I had to pay out of my indemnity grew to such proportions that I suggested to officials of the house and to my friend the finance minister that as I was an official of parliament the government should pay the telegraph and telephone tolls, which they did, and for which I thank them. But as a private member I get no such consideration, and I am not at the moment arguing for that here.

Mr. McGEER: Did they pay them for the C.C.F. too?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know. You will have to ask them yourself. I am not in their confidence.

In addition, the members of the United States Congress get travelling expenses to Washington and back home. Of course we have a certificate of membership in this house which carries the members free on the railways. The members of the United States Congress also get a grant for stationery and supplies, and for clerical help—and I want the members to listen to this—for clerical help a member of the house of representatives gets $6,500 a year and the senators $15,120 a year.

Mr. ADAMSON: Free of income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All those items are free of income tax. The duties of a member of the United States senate and of the members of the house of representatives may be heavier and take up more months of the year than do the duties of members of the House of Commons here. Nevertheless we are here for six months every year, and I can remember when it used to be only three months. I can recall having made a sporting offer to my friend the Prime Minister in the early 1920's that if he would limit the session to two months I should be glad to serve for $2,000 a year, and if for three months I would be glad to serve for $3,000 a year. It would have paid me in those days to take much less if I could have been freed from attendance in Ottawa.

The disparity between what is paid by our rich neighbours to the south to the members of congress and what is paid to members of parliament in Canada is so glaring that I thought I ought to call attention to it. The country ought to understand what the situation is, and I invite hon. members, if they will, those who are feeling the pinch of this situation, to get up in their places and fearlessly tell the country just what their financial position is having regard to the extremely heavy income tax imposed upon their indemnities, which they have accepted without a murmur so far as I know because of the exigencies of war.

Let me say this as a tribute to my fellow members of this house, that taking them by and large there is no more patriotic group of citizens in Canada than the membership of the House of Commons. We may differ about principles and practice, about what we should do and would do in a given case, but there is not a man in this house who does not want to see this war won and won as quickly as possible, and who would not give his last red cent if he could help win this war one day quicker. The country ought to understand that.

In addition, in the United States if a member of congress takes ill, if he has to have his tonsils or his adenoids out or be operated on for appendicitis, he is sent to a government hospital free of charge and gets the best medical care and nursing in the United States, all free of charge, all at the expense of the taxpayer. I am not suggesting that we have that here, although I would like to see the government of this country do something for the health of the members of this house by reconditioning the air in this chamber. That would be a very fine gesture that we could make, and I commend it to my friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) if he is here and is receptive, or to his successor whoever he may be, and I have no idea who that will be. There is no specific authorization for this free medical treatment at Washington, but it is a custom of long standing, and that is something to be taken into consideration, because it costs money to be ill in Ottawa. I know that from personal experience. It costs a lot to die here in Ottawa, too. I do not suppose any of us has had that experience, but if you want to find out about it, you had better inquire at some of the undertaking establishments and see what it will cost to be outfitted to be sent home.

An hon. MEMBER: You are not going to die here!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not if I can help it. I am serious about this matter. I commend the situation to the members of the administration, and I do not want them to say: Oh, this is a most inopportune and inappropriate time to bring this matter up. It is brought up only because the matter has come to a head.

I will go a good deal further. I will say that it is a perfect disgrace to Canada, the meagre salaries she pays to certain public servants of this country. When you consider that the salaries of the Prime Minister and of the chief justice of this country are only $15,000 a year, and that you are paying many men I have no doubt down in the Bank of Canada a good deal more than $15,000 a year—

Mr. McGEER: What for?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The member for Vancouver-Burrard asks what for. I suppose I could counter by saying, to counteract the member for Vancouver-Burrard.

It is nothing less than a scandal that the Prime Minister should receive only $15,000 a year—and that is subject to income tax. True, he also gets the $4,000 indemnity and an allowance for motor car, which he more than spends. The salary of a cabinet minister under the present income tax rates is wholly inadequate. I asked one of my friends in the cabinet how much net he had after he had paid his income tax. I am not going to name him, but he told me that it was less than $7,000 a year, and he had to to live on that as a cabinet minister should. You just cannot do it, keep up the position on that salary in the manner that custom, usage and everything else demand. I commend to the members of the treasury benches a serious consideration of the plight of the private member.

You may say that this is no time to do anything about it when everybody else is making sacrifices. I say that there is no other class in Canada which is making sacrifice of time and of ability and of capability and of money comparable to the sacrifices made by members of this Canadian House of Commons. I stand by that statement, notwithstanding the criticism that I expect may come to me from certain portions of the public press. I am willing to take whatever criticism comes to me. I can justify the plea I am making on behalf of the private members of this house and on behalf of the cabinet ministers of this country.

I suggest to the members of this house that if they approve the lead I have endeavoured to give them in a wholly non-partisan way, they frankly tell the house and the people of this country what their plight is. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who is not in his seat, has had something to say on this matter in days gone by. I am sure the thinking people of this country will react properly to a suggestion that some measure of relief be granted to members of parliament, because they know that a professional man cannot leave his business for six months in the year and come down here to Ottawa and perform his duties as a member of parliament without seriously affecting his professional income. A medical man, for instance, might just as well fold up his practice. I am sure that the medical men in this house will bear me out. How much money can a practising lawyer earn at the bar and attend to his duties as a member of parliament? Yet lawyers as a class are sent here in greater numbers than men of any other vocation, because they are expected to have—and have, I assert with great confidence—capabilities and abilities which commend themselves to their constituents who send them here to help make the laws of this country.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance to do something, not for himself but for the common members of this house. They are the people who are suffering most; and I think it is time that somebody stood up in his place in this house and said what I have tried to say, however inadequately I have said it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that this might easily become a political issue—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope not.

Mr. COLDWELL: —if one group alone expressed the opinion which has been expressed by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). Consequently I am rising to say that I agree with what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said. I know what the position of the private member of this house is. Not all of us are required, perhaps, to live on the standard which the hon. member for York-Sunbury as a former cabinet minister is required to maintain in this city; but I think that every one of us fully realizes the position in which private members have been placed during the last two or three years. There have been no complaints on the floor of this parliament. There have been discussions—I have heard them—among members in groups. I have even heard some hon. members say that if this condition were to continue they would have to withdraw from the house when the next election comes. I know too that many hon. members during the past two or three years have been compelled to exist—and I use advisedly the word "exist"—upon the savings of former days, if they have any. I know hon. members who have had to forgo their life insurance, who have exhausted their savings, and have had to do a number of other things which ought not to be expected of the membership of this house.

We are all mindful of the situation in which the rest of the country finds itself at this time, and the necessity for doing everything we can financially in order to win this war. But there is a time when public service should be recognized and when, if it is not recognized, some of the men best equipped to carry on the duties of a member of parliament—

Mrs. NIELSEN: And women.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and women, yes—will be compelled by force of circumstances to withdraw from that service.

As I have said, I rise because I feel that a statement of this kind emanating from only one group in this house might be misconstrued, that the outspoken remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury might be used by some as a political weapon; and so far as I am personally concerned I would not under any circumstances allow that to be done. I endorse the plea which has been made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, a plea which perhaps ought to have been made in this chamber long ago; which, perhaps, because of his own personal circumstances he was in a better position to make than some other hon. members. I appreciate what he has said, and congratulate him upon the courage he has shown in saying it.

Mr. SLAGHT: I concur in everything that has been said by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I do not speak from a personal standpoint.

I do not propose to reiterate any of the considerations which they put forward so carefully and, I believe, so conservatively, but I want to refer to three factors which have not been touched on, and then to make a suggestion to the Minister of Finance and his advisers.

My first consideration is that it is, in my view, the duty of a member, in so far as he can do so between sessions, to travel about into all parts and corners of his riding. In city ridings that is not such a task as far as out-of-pocket expense is concerned. In the rural ridings it is different. I am not thinking of myself as suffering in this matter, but in my riding, which extends 150 miles one way and 100 miles the other way, there are many portions which are not accessible by railways or boats, so that you can travel there only by motor car; and in order to perform this very important duty of a member of parliament, to learn at first hand what our people are thinking in order that we may better serve them, there is a substantial cash out-of-pocket outlay, which is made in honestly earning our indemnity. That is one point.

My second point is this. Frankly I believe —and I speak of this matter entirely of my own volition—from informal discussion, that some hon. members are going to find it necessary to retire from public life because they can no longer do their duty to their families or sustain their home obligations if they continue to serve in this parliament. It seeems to me that as we progress we should make service in this house ever more possible for men of integrity and ability occupying the humbler roles in life where they are not blessed with incomes that provide any backlog, where they have not been able to accumulate any savings, and perhaps have a mortgage on their home and are to some extent in honest debt. Our present system with the existing tax burden encourages the well-to-do and even the wealthy man to come to parliament, while to some extent discouraging the common man or the relatively poor man from seeking to find a place in this chamber. There is no one but will agree that that is all wrong, if my diagnosis of the situation is correct.

One other factor. We know that the younger men, from the very nature of the struggle for life, have not been able to provide a reserve of savings, or backlog, as it has been called, to the same extent as older men have been able to do. As one of the members of this house who in years, at least, although I hope not in all respects, must be reckoned among the older men, I recognize that this is more and more becoming a young man's day so far as public life is concerned. That is as it ought to be. It is becoming more and more so in the mother country and in our sister commonwealth nations of Australia and New Zealand. In the parliaments of those two commonwealths, as far as years recorded on the calendar are concerned, the average is a greater number of younger members than in the Canadian house. These are three points that are worth keeping in mind.

I have a suggestion to make to the minister, and he and his advisers will know whether it can be acted upon or not. If it can, then if there is the courage—well, it is not a matter of courage; it should be the duty of the government to bring it to pass at this session, if they can. If they can properly do it in this way I think the country will be content with it. The suggestion is this. Why should we not divide the present amount—not increase it but divide it—in a fair manner as between what may be regarded as remuneration and what may be regarded as expenses, the latter being an amount to cover the necessary out-of-pocket cash one has to spend. If that were fixed at say $1,500 or $2,000, leaving the balance of either $2,500 or $2,000 as supposed remuneration, only that sum would then be subject to taxation. I leave that with the minister as a modus operandi, if he and the treasury board and the administration believe that this is a matter that ought to be corrected for the reasons that have been placed before the committee this afternoon.

Mr. QUELCH: The member for MacLeod (Mr. Hansell) spoke on this question on a previous occasion and therefore I will not take up much time discussing it. I could never understand why a member of parliament should be the one individual to pay income tax on his gross income instead of being allowed to charge legitimate expenses against it.

Mr. GIBSON: All gross income is taxed on salary income.

Mr. QUELCH: But you are allowed to charge expenses against it.

Mr. GIBSON: Not on salaries.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is not a salary, surely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have made it a salary by the income tax law.

Mr. QUELCH: Another interesting point is this. If the government thinks that is the right stand to take, why should it not be consistent and deal with cabinet ministers in the same way? Why should the government exempt from taxation expenses on account of cabinet ministers' cars? We have a right to expect cabinet ministers to pay a tax on car expenditures. It does not look well to the people to give a special deal to cabinet ministers in that regard. However, the member for Macleod has already dealt with the matter at some length and I do not want to take up the time of the house discussing it now.

Coming to the resolution before the Chair, I am sorry the government has seen fit to introduce this provision. One of the questions of major importance before the country is that of ways and means by which production of goods and services can be maintained at the highest level, and no matter how the government may raise revenue, or how much they may raise, unless production can be maintained at its highest level the war effort is bound to suffer. No one will deny that the heavy taxation of low incomes has in many ways been a detriment to the war effort, a detriment to production. It has meant an increase in absenteeism. I believe the Minister of National Revenue has denied this, but I know it to be a fact. Workers have received cheques and found that when they have been absent one or two days the cheque is larger than when they have worked their full time. The minister has denied this, but I have seen cheques showing this to be the case. Possibly at the end of the year it will be rectified, but at the time the cheque is received the worker finds that after an absence of one or two days his cheque is larger than when he was not absent at all, and that causes workers to be slack. The wiping out of the compulsory savings will not rectify that situation. As a matter of fact, I think the policy of the government should be the opposite. All money obtained by taxation from people in the low income brackets should be credited as savings and the tax wiped out. There are many reasons for this. First of all, it would help to maintain efficient production; secondly it would result in a more equitable distribution of the debt claims against the nation; and thirdly it would help to maintain effective demand after the war. It would build up a large pool of purchasing power in the hands of the very people who will need it most at the conclusion of hostilities. These are three grounds that should be given careful consideration in introducing a change of policy of this kind.

There is no doubt the people of the country are greatly perturbed by the size of the national debt, and perhaps it is a healthy sign that this is so. The people remember that during the depression years they were told by prominent bank managers that one of the main causes of the depression was the war debt. They remember that the debt was only 3½ billions, whereas to-day the direct funded debt is in the neighbourhood of 10½ billions. The minister has pointed out that the position has completely changed to-day; that the national income has more than doubled although the debt has increased three times. But the minister must realize that there is no guarantee that the national income will be maintained at that figure after the war. We hope it will be, but we notice in the financial papers statements to the effect that it is nonsense to expect the national income to be maintained at the present figure after the war, and that of course is having a bad effect upon the minds of the people. We have no real reason to believe that it will be maintained at that figure. During the war the government has proclaimed that no financial restrictions will be allowed to impede the war effort. Why should they not make a similar declaration with regard to the peace-time period? If the government would declare that the same financial policy will be maintained, so far as the amount of money required to maintain a maximum post-war effort is concerned, a great deal of the fear in the minds of the people would be removed. The government should definitely state to-day that no financial restrictions will be allowed to impede the post-war effort, and we should be given assurance that the national income would be maintained at the present figure. But if the national income is to fall after the war, unfortunately the national debt will not fall with it. While the national income may decrease, the national debt will steadily increase, and of course the burden of servicing that debt will be far heavier than it is to-day.

The minister has also emphasized the fact that the debt is owned internally and that we have a very wide distribution of debt claims. While it is true that we have a wide distribution of debt claims, nevertheless, generally speaking, it is the small bonds that are widely distributed, while the large bonds are held in the hands of comparatively speaking a few people. And of course the bond sales that have been carried out further aggravate the situation. I quoted once before the figures for the third and fourth victory loans, and the same is true of the more recent ones. One-third of one per cent of the subscribers to the loan purchased sixty per cent of the total loan. While it may be argued that among the large subscribers we have insurance companies, nevertheless the fact remains that most of the people who are unable to buy bonds are the same people who are unable to buy life insurance, and that does not help matters. The situation is still further deteriorating owing to the fact that many people have to liquidate their bonds. It is all very well for the minister to say that the sale of bonds is voluntary. He knows that in many instances the purchase of bonds is compulsory, because it is all a man's job is worth to refuse to buy bonds in certain plants. If he refuses he may lose his job. Instances have been called to my attention to show that the purchase of bonds is not altogether voluntary. Now what happens? These people buy bonds on the instalment plan and on the date on which the final payment is made they look upon the bond as money and spend it the minute they get it. That happens in many instances.

The minister made a very peculiar argument yesterday when he said he did not think there was any great danger of large accumulations of bonds after the war because, owing to the heavy taxation, if people started buying bonds in large amounts they would have to pay such a high tax on the interest they received. If they invest their money in any concern they will have to pay a tax on the interest they receive. In other words the minister suggests that people will have to stop investing money, because otherwise they will have to pay taxes on the income. That does not apply to bonds any more than to investments of other kinds.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a big difference between the situation now and the situation at the end of the last war, when income tax was payable on income from other securities but not on the income from victory bonds.

Mr. QUELCH: That is true. That is the only way it makes any difference. But the minister also said if people purchased bonds they would have to pay such a high tax that practically all the interest on the bonds would be paid in taxation. That is true of every investment; therefore it will not stop people from buying bonds. As a matter of fact when they find taxation very heavy and as a consequence their incomes small they will seek the safest possible investment for their money in order to safeguard it, and as a result will be more likely to invest it in bonds than in anything else. The minister's own argument proves that after the war there will be a tendency towards heavy investment in bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: My whole argument was that there would not be the same tendency as there was after the last war.

Mr. QUELCH: But the minister did mention the two things, the matter of taxfree bonds and also the fact that the income from bonds would be taxed. I can read his statement if it is desired, for I do not want to misinterpret what he has said. To-day it is very hard to know just what the situation is in regard to the holdings of bonds throughout the country, as I am sure the minister will agree. I refer to this fact for the simple reason that there have been so many sales of bonds that might be called fake sales. Sales have been faked time and again, until now we do not know whether a sale is genuine or not. I want to read a letter I received from a prominent Toronto business man in regard to this matter:

> In the second last victory loan campaign a special names canvasser called on me and asked what I was prepared to take, and I told him. He immediately suggested that I treble this, and proceeded to give me a high pressure talk to the effect that the bank would lend me the money at the same rate of interest as the bonds carried for a certain period of time, and then, if necessary, at the end of that period the bank would take over all or any part of the excess.
>
> I deliberately let him ramble on, and then I said, "Listen, buddy, if the bank can manufacture money to lend to me to buy bonds, then the bank can manufacture the money, buy the bonds themselves and leave me out of the picture."
>
> To my amazement he promptly answered "right", and then proceeded to divert the conversation and make out the application for what I had said I would take.
>
> This same chap called on me again a few weeks ago—an awfully decent chap, by the way—and in the course of conversation he frankly admitted to me that his bank manager had persuaded him to sign up for $20,000 of this last loan, on the definite understanding that the bank would lend him the money at the same rate of interest as the bonds carry for a period of six months, and that the bank would then take over the bonds in entirety. He was very frank in admitting that the whole thing was rotten camouflage.

Just as long as practices of that kind are permitted we can understand that there is never any danger of a victory loan not being subscribed in full. If the banks are willing to advance money for the purchase of bonds on the definite understanding that within a certain period of time they will take over the bonds, it becomes simply a question of how much money the banks are prepared to create and lend.

Mr. ILSLEY: Those practices are discouraged by the national war finance committee, and I do not think they are widespread.

Mr. QUELCH: Why should they be permitted at all? They defeat the very purpose the minister is trying to accomplish in selling bonds. One of the main purposes is to curtail spending. If we are going to allow the banks to create money with which to buy bonds we are not curtailing the spending of the people; we are increasing the amount of money in circulation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I join with the hon. gentleman in absolutely condemning that practice; I say it is discouraged by the national war finance committee, and I do not think it is widespread. The hon. gentleman asks why it is not prohibited. Is he suggesting that it be made a criminal offence, or something like that?

Mr. QUELCH: No, I do not suggest that, but we are having victory loans fairly often, and the sale of war savings certificates goes on continuously. I do not see that anything is gained by a man borrowing money with which to buy a bond. If he has not the money with which to buy the bond let him wait until the next loan comes along, and buy his bond then. Why should you urge the banks to lend people money with which to buy bonds? Let these bonds be purchased entirely out of savings and prohibit the banks from lending money for the purchase of bonds at all. Otherwise it gives an entirely false picture of the situation. If we had only one sale of bonds a year, or one every two years, I could appreciate the need for that, but when we have a loan every six months—and as a matter of fact people can go into the open market and buy them in between loans—what is to be gained by borrowing money for the purchase of bonds? They can just as well wait until the next loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Many people are more likely to save money in that way, by paying back the loan out of current earnings.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not know if that is the actual experience, but I do know many people have borrowed money to buy bonds and they are not paying back that money. They say the banks are not in a hurry for it, and they let it go, at least for six months. I suppose after six months the rate of interest they have to pay on the borrowed money becomes greater than the rate of interest they receive on the bond and after that they may try to pay it back or let the bank have the bond.

I agree with the minister when he says that the internal debt is not harmful provided it is equitably distributed. Unfortunately we have not that equitable distribution. If we had; if everyone owned a proportionate share of the national debt and people had to be taxed to pay their own interest, we could wipe out the debt, which would be a very pleasant situation. But our policies to-day are not even making an approach to that situation. In view of that fact we must consider very carefully the danger of increasing the debt at the present rate. Our debt will continue to increase, not only during the war but after the war. At no time in our history has the public debt of this nation ever decreased. We hear people refer to the years from 1924 to 1931, when we had a balanced budget. It is true that we had a balanced budget during that period and that the national debt decreased. On the other hand the provincial debt greatly increased, so we came out of that period with an increase in the total public debt amounting to some $250,000,000. In other words we decreased the national debt by around $250,000,000 and increased the provincial debt by about $500,000,000, so that we still had an increase of some $250,000,000 in the public debt. Of course I agree that if we are bound to have an increase in the public debt it is far better to have that increase in the national debt than in the provincial debt, because it is so much easier for the federal government to finance the debt than for the provinces to do so.

Doctor James, former chairman of advisory committee on reconstruction, has stated that in his opinion we should adopt an entirely new budget philosophy; that we should have a balanced budget for current expenses and revenues, but that as far as capital expenditures are concerned we should have a long-term budget. He said we should be prepared to see the debt increase probably every year for the next hundred years. I do not know why he stopped at one hundred years, because if the debt is going to increase every year for that length of time that process will go on forever. If the national debt is going to increase year by year I think the minister will agree that it becomes even more important to see that the debt is distributed just as equitably as possible. That is one reason why I am opposed to doing away with the compulsory savings. I am surprised at that statement by the chairman of the advisory committee on reconstruction, because the minister gave the house a totally different picture last year. He was asked what provision was being made to pay the national debt. Another question was:

If present policy is continued, can this debt ever be repaid?

The minister's reply was that the debt could be repaid under the present policy. I would certainly like the minister to explain to us how the national debt is ever going to be paid under the present policy. I do not mean refunded; I mean paid, because refunding the debt is not paying it. I will quote what the minister said in reply to the first question:

In the budget speech delivered in the House of Commons on February 25, 1937, the Minister of Finance, in referring to an issue of perpetual bonds, stated "It was intended as the initial step in a programme which is designed to provide for the consolidation and simplification of our public debt structure. Another purpose which we had in mind was to facilitate the setting up, as soon as the condition of our national finances make it practicable, of a general sinking fund to provide for the gradual amortization of our long-term debt on scientific lines."

During the war period and for some years before the dominion government has been operating at a deficit and it has not been possible to provide for the paying off of indebtedness out of revenue. However the government plans in this respect will be made known at the appropriate time.

That was a year ago. Surely by now the government can tell us what the plans are for paying off this debt which, it states, can be paid under its present policy. The amazing thing is that ever since confederation we have expanded our debt. Doctor James says it will probably increase every year for the next hundred years, while at the same time the minister says that under the present policy we will pay it off. The minister should indicate by what miracle or wizardry he proposes to pay off the national debt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did he say "pay it"? Did he not say we could carry it?

Mr. QUELCH: No, not "carry it", at all. Here is the question: "If the present policy is continued, can this debt ever be repaid?" and the reply is "Yes"—just the one word, yes. I say we should have a reply.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was that question put on the order paper?

Mr. QUELCH: This is sessional paper No. 377, tabled June 7, 1943. It stated that in due time the government would announce its policy in this regard. That is over a year ago, and I say that by now we should have that announcement.

Mr. SLAGHT: Whose answer is that?

Mr. QUELCH: It is the answer of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do I understand it was a question put on the order paper?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, and a reply tabled in the house on June 7, 1943.

Mr. McGEER: But you can always pay debts.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, by refunding; but that is not paying off the national debt so far as the country is concerned. We want to know how the national debt can be liquidated. The process of refunding is just transferring the claim against the nation to some other body.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is the way Micawber paid.

Mr. QUELCH: Another thing that puzzles me is that the minister should quote and use the words of a former minister of finance, Mr. Dunning, because if there is one man in this country whose policies have been discredited, it is the Hon. Charles Dunning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, oh.

Mr. QUELCH: Someone laughs. But just let him go through the years 1935 to 1939, when we were told time and again we could not put the unemployed to work because there was no money, and that the only money available was the money received from taxation. Yet within six weeks after this war started, $200,000,000 was created for the government by the chartered banks, and in the past year $900,000,000 by the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not laughing at the hon. member, because to some extent I am in agreement with what he said about Mr. Dunning.

Mr. QUELCH: Well, I am glad we can agree on that point.

Mr. McGEER: And the same applied to Mr. Bennett and Mr. Rhodes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that may be.

Mr. QUELCH: It was Mr. Dunning who was quoted in this return, and I am wondering why the minister should quote Mr. Dunning to-day, when the memories of those days are still so fresh in the minds of hon. members.

To come back to the resolution, I would favour wiping out all taxation on people in lower income tax brackets—that is, on those with incomes of $1,000 if single, and $1,500 if married. That is, the amount obtained from those people to-day by methods of taxation could be credited to them as savings, and the tax structure on incomes above that would have to be changed so as to have a fair relationship between pure taxation and compulsory savings. That would be necessary, because the minister said that if we eliminated the tax in the lower income brackets, those in the higher brackets would also benefit. That would very well be taken care of by changing the tax structure in regard to the higher incomes.

I would like to see a far wider application of this whole principle. I would like to see all money that has to be taken out of circulation, in order to prevent inflation, removed by a process of taxation; and then the money obtained from the people in the low income brackets by that method could be placed to their credit in the chartered banks and frozen there until after the war. No debt would be incurred, because it would not be a case of the government borrowing their money. That is, the money would be placed at their deposit in the chartered banks, and frozen there for the duration of the war, or for as many months after the war as might be considered necessary, to prevent inflation. Then as the government wished to expand the purchasing power of the people it could release so much of that frozen money at a time as necessary. By this method the government would greatly curtail the expansion of debt. No interest would be paid, and it would be creating a large pool of purchasing power.

We have been told to-day by the minister, and by others—perhaps I should not say the minister, but certainly by the deputy minister of finance—that in order to maintain full employment at home after the war we shall have to indulge in a large scale foreign investment policy. I think we should indulge in a programme of investments in our own markets, at home. Now is the opportune time to freeze this purchasing power which can be released after the war. The minister may say: Would the people be willing to have this money taken, and receive no interest? I am satisfied the people would far rather maintain their capital intact, without interest, than have it taxed away from them. If I were faced with the alternative of having $100 taken away by taxation, or having that $100 placed somewhere to my credit and frozen without interest, I would choose the latter. That is what I advocate, as far as those in lower income tax brackets are concerned. Then as a man's income increased the structure would have to be adjusted so that there would be a fair proportion of tax and a fair proportion of compulsory savings.

One other word, and it is this. The minister knows very well that there is at the present time a great deal of opposition to the way in which he is financing the war. Surely the least he could do would be to make the bonds he issues to-day callable, so that if after the war another government were in power, one which did not believe in the type of financing followed by this government, they would be in a position to call in those bonds instead of having to pay interest on them for the next ten or twenty years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to follow the line of argument offered by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I believe we should clear up one subject at a time. I wish to speak—and I am not afraid to speak, and never have been.

[Mr. Quelch.]

I have never been afraid to speak my mind on anything, at any time, because if the electors of my riding are going to take exception to what I do in the house, then I do not wish to be their member.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for York-Sunbury upon his forthright and courageous approach to this matter. I believe every hon. member will realize that he was not speaking personally. All those of us who know him will know that he is not in the financial position of many other members. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who, without hesitation, put his party on record, in order that there may be no misapprehension in connection with the arguments advanced. And I would include also the hon. member who spoke for the Social Credit party.

I would place before the committee a point which I believe is most important in this connection. I remember that, speaking in 1940, the Prime Minister said that the people he wished to represent Canada were the youth of the country, particularly the soldiers, and those engaged in labour and agriculture. I am not using his exact words, but I believe a check in Hansard will show that I am almost correct. I point out to the Minister of Finance that the kind of representation we have in the House of Commons after the next election is his present responsibility, and his only. What earthly chance is there for the young man now working for $1.50 a day overseas, to come home and stand as a member of parliament? There is no hope for the young man who is coming back and who wants to get married. What chance has he to get into this House of Commons, no matter what party he represents?

None of us know which party is going to be in power after the next election. I have my own ideas as to which one I would like to see in power, but I can assure you that there is one member coming back here. I can say that for the simple reason that I am not afraid to talk about this or any other matter. I do not fear publicity in my riding. My riding is either rural or straight labour. There is a certain percentage of labour there, and I can assure the minister that every farming district in western Canada and every labour union believe that the labourer is worthy of his hire.

I want to revert to what I think is the most important part of this question. If the democratic form of government is worth fighting for, surely it is worth having it administered by the rank and file, by the ordinary common man referred to by President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill and by our own Prime Minister.

I doubt if there is one of the present 245 members who wants to come back as a stooge for some corporation. Such a man would not have to worry about his costs, but he would be a stooge for some organization. I will put it that way, not confine it just to the financial interests. That is not the type of man our soldiers overseas want to represent them. I do not believe the soldiers will begrudge us, even in this present parliament, getting what we should. Two of the most brilliant young members we have—I am not going to refer to them by name—both soldiers in this war, are having to give up politics. They do not want to do this, but they find they have to. They are married men with young families to bring up and they find they cannot afford to stay in politics. Some of the highest ranking men in public life in Canada have practically begged these men to stay in public life. These young men with excellent education and wonderful attainments are forced to take this step for one reason and one reason only.

I took it upon myself to canvass a lot of people in this connection. As I say, I do not care for publicity and never did. If you are honest in your convictions, if you want to be reelected, that is the course to take. I want to tell the committee that a couple of prominent Liberals have said that the publicity about this would not be good with an election coming on. I want to tell those two members that the action they are taking will do more to harm their party than any publicity that might come out of this. The publicity about motor car allowances did not hurt the Liberal party in the last election, nor did it hurt the Conservative party in 1935, or whenever it was they were last elected. A cabinet minister receives this allowance even though he does not own an automobile. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I am not quarrelling over their getting an extra salary, but I am quarrelling with any member of the government who will get up and defend the payment of $2,000 for a motor car allowance when he does not own a car.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): What cabinet minister does not own a car/

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can make your speech, but I am making mine now.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I am just asking a question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have no time to answer a question now.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You do not want to answer that question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can ask the cabinet about that. I do not care if he does own a car, and I want to make that point clear. I am simply following the line taken by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I do not begrudge the payment of $2,000 to the cabinet ministers, but I do think it is a disgrace to Canada that a man sitting down in a plush seat in the Bank of Canada should draw twice the money paid to the Prime Minister of Canada. I think it is a disgrace to Canada that any two-by-four moving picture actor who is brought up here to peddle bonds should draw more money than any member of the government.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Ten times as much.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Ten times as much. I am not begrudging the members of the government what they get, but I think they should have the courage of their convictions and be ready to stand up on the floor of this chamber, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the leader of the C.C.F. have done, and give some reason other than "this is not the time."

I wonder if any member of the government knows how much it cost the member for Fraser Valley to-day for one long distance call to Vancouver on business, two telegrams and some air mail stamps? The cabinet members get those free, but we private members do not. I do not say that they should not have those expenses paid, but I do contend that the cabinet should take these things into consideration. I have to pay those charges. If you want just old or wealthy members to come here to represent young Canada and the men who are fighting for our vested interests, I can tell you one way to do it. Instead of requiring $200 as a deposit, make it $270,000 and in that way you can keep out the ordinary working man from the next election. The people of Canada do not want that. The soldiers do not want that. The government should endeavour to justify themselves to the soldiers overseas by seeing that their fellow soldiers, instead of having to withdraw from parliament this session, can stay in parliament and bring up their families in a reasonable and honest manner. So far as I am concerned the answer, "Now is not the time to approach the public", will not go down with the people of my riding, and that applies to the three parties that may be running in the next election. Now is the time to face the issue in order that when the men who are fighting to save democracy come back they will find not a rich man's government but a democratic government which really represents them.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to add a few words to the appeal which has been made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the hon. member who has just taken his seat in connection with the sessional indemnity—I should like to emphasize the word "indemnity"— paid to members of parliament. I heartily endorse what the hon. members who have just spoken have said regarding the position in which members of parliament find themselves when they are forced to spend from five, six or seven months in Ottawa.

It would seem to be the irony of fate, or perhaps a lack of appreciation on behalf of the powers that be, that as a commercial traveller I can go into a hotel in Ottawa, present my commercial traveller's certificate and receive a consideration of fifty cents per day on the amount I must pay for keep. If I go into the same hotel as a member of parliament the clerk at the desk looks at me with suspicion. After all is said and done, sometimes members of parliament are looked upon with suspicion. He says, "Well, Bill, you are not a commercial traveller, you are a member of parliament." Instead of paying $5.50 per day, I must pay $6 simply because he is suspicious of me as a member of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You look like a capitalist any time.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): The difficulty with this question is a lack of courage on the part of the powers that be. Within the last twenty-four months the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have had presented to them by a number of hon. members from each group a recommendation that members of parliament should have $1,500 exempt from taxation in order to cover their expenses while living in Ottawa. I submit that there is not one person in Canada who would object to or criticize that action. I repeat emphatically that it is a lack of courage—there are three words in my mind I could use but they do not come within the concept of parliamentary language—that an order in council has not been put through extending consideration for the members who sit in this house, representing anywhere from 30,000 to 80,000 people. We are doing arduous work, and working long hours, with no union regulation but working day and night, Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday for $4,000 a year, all subject to taxation. I challenge the Minister of Finance to get up on his feet here and now in this house and defend that position of the government, particularly when every member of every party of the house will support what I say in this regard.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

I want to go further in my endorsation of the statements made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cruickshank). You are sabotaging the public life of Canada when you penalize decent honest-to-God Canadian citizens who have the ambition to discharge what they feel is their duty to their fellow Canadian citizens when you assign to them a remuneration that is less than that of a truck driver. I am not submitting; I am demanding that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues take action in this matter now, even if this is the fourth year of the life of this parliament. I go further and challenge any member of this house to get on his feet and either defy, criticize or support and supplement what I say in that connection. There is not a member of this house who does not endorse what I am saying, and the Minister of Finance knows it but—shall I use those three words?—he lacks what is implied by those three words when he does not take action in this matter. If this government is afraid of public criticism over such action, this government has become politically, academically—shall I say?—anaemic to the wishes of the members of this house and to the wishes of the people of this dominion.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my few mild words on this occasion will clarify the atmosphere. As my good friend who has just taken his seat has said, we may not perhaps be doing all that we would like to do here; we may not perhaps be as effective as we would like to be. Nevertheless as a humble member in the ranks of my beloved leader I believe—perhaps I am just kidding myself because of my ego—I am making some infinitesimal contribution to the maintenance of democracy in this country as we know it. I may be wrong in that, but at all events I kid myself into the belief that by spending my time in this chamber at a temperature of 98 degrees I am contributing in some infinitesimal way to what the boys in France and Italy are fighting for. We have 245 decent honest-to-God men in this house who are trying to do their very best. Every member of us, I do not care whether he be C.C.F., Social Credit, Progressive Conservative or Liberal, is doing his utmost to maintain democratic principles for the people of Canada, and to maintain for the boys overseas the way of life for which they are fighting and suffering and giving their lives to-day.

In concluding what I have to say on that subject I challenge the Minister of Finance to tell this chamber why he has not had courage enough to come across and make sure that the next group of members of another House of Commons will get a decent, square deal at truck driver wages.

I have one or two other observations to make. In some respects the taxation of Canada has become impossible. The hon. member for York-Sunbury made some reference to that in his speech on the budget. There are features in our taxation system in Canada that are not only impossible but abortive; they defeat themselves. Take, for instance, small private businesses in this country which have struggled on through the years of depression and prospered through the years of prosperity, businesses which have followed sound and conservative methods of accounting, businesses which have followed a policy of building up by not distributing their annual earnings. I want my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party particularly to bear this in mind—and I say particularly, having heard what he has said on many occasions with respect to relations between employers and employees. I want to tell him that employers are not all wrong. They are not all without consideration for their employees. They are not all failing to cooperate with their employees. So far as I personally am concerned, and I am only a horizontal cut of the employers in this country, I pride myself on having in my employ families who have been with me for two and three generations. Many businesses in this country have built up through the years by not distributing their earned surpluses. They have an appreciation of sound accounting methods, a conception of the up-and-down curves, and many of these private businesses over a long term of years, ten, twenty or thirty years, have not distributed their earned surpluses. But if the principal of such a private business should die to-morrow, his successors would be confronted with the succession duty and income taxation laws of this country and the business would be bankrupt, regardless of the thrift and foresight and sacrifice and the long hours of work that had gone into building up that business. Under the taxation laws as they stand to-day the earned and non-distributed surplus of that business would have to be paid out to meet the succession duty and income tax demands, and the business would be bankrupt. I have discussed this matter privately and in detail with the powers that be, and once again I challenge the Minister of Finance to give any reason or excuse why the undistributed profits of a private business should be taxed to the extent of ninety-two per cent for succession duties and income tax under the present laws.

Perhaps the excuse will be: We have been too busy; we are fighting a war. Perhaps the excuse will be: We should set up a commission or a committee to consider this matter. The fact remains that such laws are on the statute books of Canada, and there was absolutely nothing in the budget speech of the minister that promised to relieve the present impossible taxation situation. Once again I ask the Minister of Finance to try to explain why that situation is permitted to remain under the laws of this dominion.

Those are two situations, Mr. Chairman, with which I wish to deal. One has been dealt with by several members this afternoon. The second one was referred to by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. That situation should be corrected now. The matter should not be shoved aside. We should not be told: We will do it to-morrow or the next day. Action is required now. It is a surprising fact—and I want to put this on record—that if the undistributed profits of a private corporation to-day were paid out in the form of dividends to pay the succession duties on the estate of the proprietor of that private business, they would be taxed under our taxing act ninety-two per cent. You could not get either the succession duties or the income tax. Let us correct this. Let us face both these issues. Let us provide at least a living wage possibility for candidates in the next election, so that they will be able to live decently. As the hon. member for Fraser Valley said a few minutes ago, there should be provision to maintain decently two homes, by allowing the exemption which I get as a commercial traveller, on the expenses involved in living in the city of Ottawa. Also, let the minister now —not to-morrow—take cognizance of the fact that he is in many cases devastating the estates of privately-owned corporations which were built up by initiative, sacrifice and hard work and a cooperative attitude toward their employees, in order that when the owners die their families might not be made paupers, in order that their private businesses should be perpetuated, providing employment and continuing to be an asset in the economic, commercial and financial life of this dominion.

I am making these two requests frankly to the Minister of Finance. Let him answer.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed, I know that the hon. member for Northumberland does not want to use unparliamentary language. According to standing order 41, citation 299, Beauchesne, 2nd edition, no member will be permitted "to impute want of straightforwardness or courage" to another member.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all right, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member need not withdraw it. I do not want it withdrawn; I want to deal with it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont): If it is against the rules I will use other language.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that it is against the rules, and unparliamentary.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I willingly withdraw it because it is contrary to the rules of the house; but I am quite satisfied that the Minister of Finance has that abstract commodity that I refer to, and will reply to my challenge on the basis on which I have made it.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to say a word or two in connection with the subject which has just been discussed by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I am not going to demand anything from the minister. I doubt whether if I demanded it I would be successful, in any event, by that method; but I suggest that the minister is far less reasonable than I believe him to be if the logic which has been expressed by the hon. members who discussed this matter this afternoon does not appeal to him.

I tell him that so far as some of us are concerned the situation is completely intolerable. In the first place, I understand it is a principle of taxation that those expenditures shall be exempt which are required in order to earn the income, whether it is a salary or income from a business. The Minister of National Revenue has said, "Oh, no; expenses are not allowed to be deducted in connection with salaries." But this is a very unusual type of salary. It is probably the only type of salary of which it can be said that people have to spend money out of their own pockets in order to earn it. Others who are earning salaries have to pay only their ordinary expenses of living, whereas members of parliament have extraordinary expenditures.

The position of ministers of the crown is not the same as that of private members. Ministers take up their residence in Ottawa; they have only their ordinary living expenses to look after, and probably the whole of their income should be taxed, since the expenses of their offices, their telegrams, long distance telephone calls, and all that kind of thing, are covered by government allowances. So far as private members are concerned that is not the situation. Personally I keep up a home in the city of Saskatoon, where I have a family and a large house and all the expenses which go with it. In order to earn that $4,000, if you call it "earning it", I have to come to Ottawa and live on a scale which is very high, considering the charges which are made in this city as compared with those in other parts of the country. Members of this committee know as well as I do that the costs of living down here are out of proportion to those which obtain in most other parts of Canada. You pay a very high rate for rooms, fairly high rates for meals, and the longer the session lasts the less money you have as far as your ordinary expenses at home are concerned.

This matter has been taken up at this time, unfortunately, because of the fact that the pinch of taxes has made itself felt in this connection. Actually it is a principle which should always have been operative. Of course as a younger and one of the more recent members I never had an opportunity to take it up, nor do I know whether I would have done so or not. But older members must recognize that in the past they have been derelict in their duty with reference to the position of future members of parliament. In the days when taxation was not high, when it was not necessary to live here for more than about three months, when one could get quarters at reasonable rates for one's family and bring them down if one liked, it was not a matter of very much importance. But at the present time, when in order to earn this indemnity, which is supposed to provide for our out-of-pocket expenses and compensate us for absence from home, we have to pay substantial sums of money out of our income, it is a matter of importance, and I suggest that something be done about it.

I believe it would be a great mistake to propose any increase in the indemnities of hon. members at this time. That would be the worst possible approach to the problem.

Mr. ABBOTT: Why?

Mr. BENCE: If we did that, every other class of citizen in this country would be demanding similar consideration, because all of them find their burdens very heavy. But there are very few citizens who realize that we are not entitled to deduct for taxation purposes the expenditures we incur in order to earn this indemnity. I have discussed the matter with literally dozens of people in my own constituency, and they were dumbfounded to know that I was not entitled to deduct the cost of telegrams sent to them to tell them something about their own affairs, or the expense of a stenographer when I am at home to take care of the affairs of my constituents, or any part of my living expenses in the city of Ottawa, despite the fact that my family and personal expenses are going on at home just the same.

I do not know why it is necessary that this matter should be taken up in the house. Surely it has been brought before the cabinet on previous occasions. From what I have been able to pick up from other hon. members, it has been discussed; surely it should have been settled upon the principle of taxation which I believe has always been applicable in this country, despite the fact that there may be one or two decisions of law which are a little complicated, and probably faulty, and were determined when conditions were not the same as they are now. In any event, whether there is a judicial decision on the subject or whether there is not, I suggest, in view of the arguments which have been advanced publicly this afternoon by hon. members who have done so at the risk of jeopardizing their positions—I say this advisedly—and of being misunderstood outside the house, because unquestionably it is seldom that the full import of a member's remarks ever gets to his constituents, the administration should consider this matter very seriously indeed. I repeat that the situation is intolerable for a number of members who are required to continue to live in the city of Ottawa under the circumstances which exist at the present time.

Mr. SLAGHT: To revert to the interesting discussion that ensued when the hon. member for Acadia indicated to the minister the state of affairs that exists in connection with the sale of victory bonds, reading a letter and mentioning a certain incident, the committee will recall that he cited a case where a salesman had induced a purchaser to purchase bonds, borrowing the money for six months through an arrangement with the bank that at the end of that time the bank would take the bond off his hands and would become the purchaser. The minister said he deprecated that type of transaction and asked the hon. member for Acadia how it could be cured; whether a gaol term should be provided. With the permission of the hon. member for Acadia I should like to be helpful and to tell the minister how he could avoid it without a gaol term or any harsh or drastic course—and he would avoid it for all time. He can join with those of us who want to amend section 59 of the Bank Act by doing away with the right of private banks to create new money without having cash reserves behind it and, as the minister once put it to the house, to carry on the business of banking by lending seven, eight, nine and ten times more money than the banks have in their cash reserves; because, if that transaction was consummated six months later, it was that very practice, described in that last phrase, which the bank carried out when they took the bonds off the hands of the original purchaser.

If the minister really disapproves of the banks acquiring bonds by purchase in that manner, then his course is simple. He can amend section 59 of the act by requiring the banks, so far as their deposit accounts on loans, not including savings accounts, are concerned, to have 100 per cent cash reserve. Let me suggest that it is not merely the transaction that the hon. member for Acadia mentioned that we must consider. There is a much more serious state of affairs in that our Minister of Finance has, in the past two or three years, increased the borrowing for the government of Canada through the chartered banks partly by short-term loans and partly by securities exceeding two years to run, so that now this country is indebted through him to the chartered banks for an amount on which we are paying interest to the extent, on April 30 last, of $2,696 million, or, roughly speaking, $2,700 million, every dollar of which. instead of having interest-bearing securities lying in the vaults of the ten chartered banks for that amount, could have been issued into existence through the use of public credit through the Bank of Canada by amending section 59 as a protection against inflation. If we had done this we would not have been carrying an intolerable burden of $40 million every year and down through the years to come in order to finance that type of borrowing.

I commend to the minister this course that I am suggesting. He does not need to gaol anyone. Simply take back for the people of Canada the privilege which they were given under the British North America Act, so that they themselves, the government, shall issue and control the currency and credit of this country which our forefathers gave away to the chartered banks in their charters and which the chartered banks are again to-day seeking to retain in the form of a monopolistic privilege when they ask us to renew their charters without amending section 59 of the act.

That is a simple course to take and I beg the minister to give it full consideration, because if he comes to the banking and commerce committee and says that he believes in using the credit of the country in the terms laid down by his leader, the Liberal Prime Minister, in 1933 and 1935—in terms of public need and not in terms of bankers' greed—this is a remarkable opportunity he has, this tenth year, to come into that committee if he withdraws his opposition to the amendment of section 59. He has not yet declared himself, but I am making a bad guess if he has not yet seen the light to the extent of joining with others in asking that this be done. He will save the country $40 million a year for the next twenty years. He will save much more than that, because there is a gap between what we can get by taxation plus the sale of bonds and what is obtained by borrowing. Either he will go and borrow more money next year from the Bank of Canada, issuing it into existence as new money, without an interest-bearing load, or he will go back again with his hat in his hand to the chartered banks and borrow from them at the low rate of interest which he has been able to obtain. Why not issue the money into existence interest free, by using our own credit, instead of appointing the banker as a toll-gate to exact interest from the people of Canada in order to lend money for public need into existence with an interest debt upon it?

The CHAIRMAN: We are in committee of ways and means, and I would point out that standing order 58, section 2, reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked the consent of the Chair and of the committee, which was accorded him, to discuss the question of parliamentary indemnities, but since then some other questions have arisen altogether foreign to the clause which we are supposed to be discussing. I trust the committee will find it possible to confine its remarks to the clause before the Chair.

Mr. McGEER: This discussion on the first resolution under the Income War Tax Act proposes to reduce the provision for accumulated savings, and it has brought on a debate which involves in its wider sense the responsibility of parliament to the taxpayer. I venture to suggest that this debate has already indicated that our Department of Finance has a very limited idea of where it is to-day. It has a vague idea of how it got there, but I do not think it has the foggiest idea of where it is going to land this nation if it continues on its present course. I make that statement because we have arrived at a point where the government is faced with a revolt led by the leader of the official opposition, supported by the two junior parties in the house and, I believe, by a majority of hon. members sitting behind the treasury benches, in regard to the policy of taxation which has gone so far that it has been declared by one government supporter to be a sabotage of the public life of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nothing like relieving ourselves from taxation.

[Mr. Slaght.]

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend chirps up with his usual bright remarks, which are just about as foolish as the financial policy he supports.

Mr. ABBOTT: About as bright as most of yours.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend can continue with interruptions of that kind if he wishes, but it is a very easy matter with which to deal. I do not know of any time in the history of the House of Commons of Canada when a more serious charge was made against any responsible ministry than that made this afternoon by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, that the government is sabotaging the public life of Canada. How did we get to that position? We got to it by ignoring the advice of every Minister of Finance who has held that portfolio in this house. From time immemorial we have been advised that it was essential that any sound budget should be balanced out of taxation. Since 1914 we have gone on increasing the public debt, until in financing this war we have carried on, as we did in financing the depression, a deficit system of financing, increasing the burden of debt and taxation until to-day the repayment of our national debt has become a public joke, and we assume that for all time to come generations yet unborn will have to carry on under the slavery of an involuntary load of interest-bearing public debt.

Therefore we ask what we must do. Tax the people at the source? I heartily agree with every word uttered by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that taxation for the needs of war knows no limit; but does anyone think for a moment that we have to tax single people whose earnings are below $100 a month, or a family whose earnings are below $1,800 a year, to finance this war or to meet any other obligation of the country, when we have at our disposal a national institution that can put into circulation the best money the Canadian people ever used as a medium of exchange? Anyone listening to the Minister of Finance yesterday when he explained how easy it would be for us to carry this debt would have thought we were in a comfortable position of security. If the minister is right, then how terribly wrong have been all his predecessors in office. Do not, however, make any mistake about the position he took. He said that the time would come, with a pyramiding national debt, when an intolerable strain would be placed upon the economy of the nation. He did not tell us, because he does not know, when that intolerable strain is going to arise. He did not tell us, because he did not know, what the remedy would be when that intolerable strain of an immense debt load became evident. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this parliament that this intolerable strain has already arrived, and that we are financing by following a false course, by putting into circulation a medium of exchange which is merely an appalling discount of the rights and wealth of the people of to-morrow.

We have been told a great deal about the necessity of taking money away from the people in order to avoid inflation. If there was ever any justification for a single word of all those arguments, then the ending of compulsory savings is one of the most unsound things this government has ever done through its Department of Finance. It would have been far better to relieve from taxation those earning less than $100 a month, which would include most of the young men who are accumulating for their to-morrow, and families whose earnings are less than $1,800, at the same time accumulating savings for them to be used by the country during the war and to be made available to the people when the war is over, than to have this provision which I venture to say will meet with the approval of but a very small percentage of even the people who are supposed to benefit under it.

Let me point out something else. When are those accumulated savings to be repaid? How are they to be repaid? What guarantee is there that some government in the future, not the one creating the obligation under a vague and general law but a government forced to carry on and service the enormous debt load created by this government which imposed that provision—what guarantee is there that some new parliament, under the debt-load obligation it will have to carry, will feel itself bound to pay back even the accumulated savings? The people whose money it is have never been given a statement; they have never been issued a certificate, or even a book in which to record the savings that have accumulated on their behalf. A great many people throughout the country tell me quite frankly, "Oh, we will never get back those accumulated savings." I venture to say that if they had been given some concrete form of security in exchange for them, very few would not have been glad even now to continue to accumulate. I do not think many people in this country would fear the danger to the finances of the government if that course were taken; in fact, from my discussions with hon. members in all parties in this house I am satisfied that a majority are in favour of such a course. There is one other thing I wish to say: The responsibility is only in the first instance that of the ministry. The responsibility is on parliament, and it is for parliament to say whether its overwhelming will shall rule, or whether it shall be the will of one department.

If we endorse, as a great many members have, the statements made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, those made by the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties, and by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, whose will is going to rule? This issue involves not merely the question of taxation upon lower income earning brackets. The issue raised to-day involves not merely the right of a member of parliament to be indemnified. The charge of sabotaging the public life of Canada could exist only if what the hon. member for Fraser Valley has said was true, namely, that two brilliant young soldiers have found it impossible to carry on as members of parliament in Canada, because of the taxation policy of the present ministry of finance.

Yes, what is involved is the sovereignty of parliament. The time has come when members of this parliament should unite to restore something that has been taken away from them, and that is the right of parliament to have its will carried out by the ministry. The thing that must be changed is the right of the ministry to impose its will upon parliament, whether parliament agrees or not. This goes to the very root of democracy; it is the issue upon which this war is being fought. And that is the issue raised to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member surely has the right to introduce a want of confidence motion at any hour he wishes.

Mr. McGEER: And the hon. member is probably now going to be faced with that issue. I think the minister has done enough harm in the country already.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not saying I should do anything.

Mr. McGEER: If we are to be told again, "Oh, well, you accept my will, or I will resign," as we have been told, then I shall have to consider what I will have to do about that. I say to the minister that many of us supporting the government he represents have to consider what we are going to do about this matter if it continues.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only point is this: The hon. member says that this goes to the sovereignty of parliament, and that we must do something to make a change, so that the government cannot do things against the will of parliament. What I say is that the hon. member is quite free, at any time, to take the will of parliament on a specific issue by moving a want of confidence motion. He is quite free to do it. So that there is nothing wrong with our democratic system or the soverignty of parliament. Parliament is perfectly sovereign. As a matter of fact parliament has already pronounced itself on the issue he is talking about, namely compulsory savings and exemptions.

Mr. McGEER: All right; my hon. friend has the issue put up to him, and he has been invited by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, to make his decision upon it. When that decision comes, the issue will be fairly out as to whether or not the generally expressed will of parliament, which, I take it, in this house to-day is something of no uncertain measure, should be accepted. That issue will, I hope, be dealt with.

Mr. ILSLEY: How many hon. members, before to-day, have risen in their places and said that they wanted their indemnities free from taxation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They want it; make no mistake about that.

Mr. McGEER: I speak only from the information which comes to me, but I believe that there have been committees appointed, and that on more than one occasion those committees represented all parties in the house —Liberal committee, meeting with committees of the official opposition, and the Social Credit and C.C.F. parties—and have returned to the government, and conveyed a unanimous wish on the part of all parties in the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been a difference of opinion among members.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ROEBUCK: Mr. Chairman, I asked for the floor in the early part of the debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Chairman said that he would next see the hon. member for York West.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Trinity was in the committee, while the hon. member for York West was not here. I do not say this in any disparaging way, but unless members are here it is difficult for the Chair to arrange the order of debate.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I wish to congratulate the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and to commend the statement he has made respecting the financial position of hon. members. I refer particularly to the quiet, dignified and statesmanlike way in which he presented the subject. While I approve most highly what he said and the manner in which he said it, I also deprecate the violence of speech and the extreme statements which have been made, following his address.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): On a point of order, will the hon. member elaborate on that statement?

Mr. SLAGHT: I desire to suggest, also, that I was one of the speakers who followed the hon. member for York-Sunbury. Since the hon. member for Trinity has put his statement in the plural, that he deprecates the lack of dignity of the statements made following that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, in my judgment he has covered a little too much territory, and I think he had better certify as to whom he means.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Again on the point of order, the hon. member for Trinity has no right to impute anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont): Let the hon. member for Trinity stay within the confines of the order, then.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I did not refer to lack of dignity on the part of anybody, nor did I mention any hon. member who had preceded me. I spoke about the violence of the language and the extreme statements I had heard.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): And I challenge the hon. member to mention who made violent statements; who uttered the violent language?

Mr. ROEBUCK: My hon. friend will put the cap on.

Mr FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): He certainly will, but my hon. friend is afraid to say what he was referring to.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask for order in the committee; otherwise I shall have to use the power I have to restore order. The debate should be confined to the item before the committee.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Let the hon. member for Trinity stay within the item, then.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Because the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, desires me to do so, I will specify that the statement with regard to the courage of the Minister of Finance, and the suggestion that his thinking was anaemic, were certainly violent and extreme statements.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): He does not need your help.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Perhaps not, but I am a member of the house, and I am as free to state my opinion on the floor of the house as was the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario. And I say to hon. members that nothing is to be gained in the discussion of our own problems by making overstatements or statements which have at least the appearance of anger. Certainly nothing is to be gained by attempts at driving the administration or offering challenges and that sort of thing. This is a subject which should be approached with the greatest dignity, reserve and care. It is for that reason that I feel a duty to speak and also because I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury has understated rather than overstated the case.

I should like to put upon Hansard some figures with regard to this question of indemnity, but first may I say that I am not grinding any axe of my own. Fortunately I have been able to get by, largely because of an earning power, a very small family and the fact, that, like many others in this house, I have a perfect wife. With that combination I have been able to keep going. I am not speaking on my own behalf; I am speaking because it is the duty of a member to express himself on these matters and particularly to defend democracy which is in danger.

Let me give the figures I have gleaned since this debate started. Let us suppose that a member has no other source of income than his indemnity. If he is a married man without a family he will pay a tax of $1,364 on his $4,000 indemnity. That is to say, he will receive by way of indemnity, not $4,000, but $2,636.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does that include compulsory savings?

Mr. ROEBUCK: It does. I am speaking of this year's figures and there would be compulsory savings of ten per cent of the gross income. Some day that money will be paid back, but I am reminded of a remark made by someone following the last war. The Russians were starving and some one assured them that they would have a good harvest in the spring. We may be able to wait for some years for the repayment of this money if, like the Russians, we do not starve to death in the meantime. This net income of $2,636 is the best position in the series I am going to mention. That is the amount left to the member to permit him to live in Ottawa for six months and to maintain himself in his constituency for twelve months and pay the various expenses, including those of regular elections.

If he were a married man he would receive $2,636, but if he were single he would receive $2,406, after paying a tax of $1,594. That is what he would have left to maintain himself. I hope that there are few in this house, although I know there are some, who have to maintain themselves on what is left of their sessional indemnities after their taxes have been paid.

Let us suppose that someone with an income of $3,000 is waited upon by the usual committees urging him to become a member of parliament. Let us suppose that he consents and that he is unfortunate enough to be elected. Let us suppose something which is not always the case, that he is able to retain his income of $3,000. What will be his position?

On his income of $3,000 he would pay an income tax of $884. The expenses of being a member of parliament are offset with an indemnity of $4,000. When the $4,000 is added to the $3,000 he is placed in the $7,000 class, in which case his tax will be, not $884 but $2,985. That is to say, his tax will be increased by $2,101 by reason of his receiving the $4,000 indemnity. After the increased tax has been paid, he will have left out of his $4,000 the sum only of $1,899. That is the situation facing hon. members of this house.

The indemnity is paid not as a salary. It was instituted in the first instance to pay the expenses and thus make it possible for a poor man to be a member of parliament. In this case the indemnity is $1,899 and not $4,000.

Let us go into some of the slightly higher brackets. Supposing the man who is urged to become a member of parliament receives an income of $6,000 a year. Let us suppose that he becomes a member and is able to retain that income. With his indemnity his total income is now $10,000 and he goes into the $10,000 class. What are the figures? In the first instance, he would pay $2,415 on his income of $6,000, but when he goes into the $10,000 class by reason of his added expenses and added revenue, he will pay $4,762. The increase in taxation by reason of the receipt of the $4,000 will be $2,347. That is to say, he will retain out of the $4,000 only $1,653.

If one considers the expense of living in Ottawa for six months in the year and possibly maintaining a house, he can see that many members will be in the red. The hon. member for York-Sunbury confessed that he was in the red so far as his indemnity was concerned. I can match him in that. I, too, am in the red. By the time I have paid my living expenses in Ottawa, without figuring the time spent or the other expenses of my constituency and that sort of thing, I find that I am out of pocket. That is, after I have paid my income tax out of the $4,000, it actually costs me money to live in this city as a member of parliament, just to room and eat.

I am not speaking on my own behalf. I have no complaint to make with regard to the position I hold. I am intensely grateful to the constituency which paid me this honour and charged me with this responsibility, but I suggest to the committee this thought. The indemnity was established in the first instance in order that democracy might continue. It was the Labour mind of the House of Commons in England that advocated payment of members of parliament. It was not the rich who put it across; it was rather the poor. It was those classes who had public things in mind, and who knew that the poor man could not sit in the house unless his expenses were paid. The people of England came to realize that if the public did not pay, then somebody else would. It was in order to substitute the public man, in its truest sense, for that man who holds a seat in the house for the purpose of serving private interest that the public decided to pay the members' way. It was to substitute democracy for the service of private interest, that caused the English people to give an indemnity to their members of parliament.

The principle is as strong to-day as it was then. If we are to maintain democracy of this house, its high standing in the community and the respect of our fellow men, it is necessary to take this problem into consideration. If the administration feels that this is not the proper time to make a change, it should at all events lay this question before the electors at the next election, and see to it that the impression now abroad that members of parliament grow rich is dispelled. It is not true. Members of parliament grow poor in the service of the public, and our public does not know it. Let it be stated openly and publicly, boldly and without reservation, to the people of Canada and let them be told what is involved in this matter. If you continue the present policy you will restrict parliament to representatives of rich interests, to rich men and to people without responsibility who can live here on less than $3,000 a year.

The issue is clearly put. It is a financial issue. It is necessary in order to preserve the strength, the credit, the respect of this house that we put our members in a position to pay their way, to be independent of anybody, to look the world in the face and say: "I owe not any man. I am not to be paid and I am not to be bought. I cannot be hired. My expenses cannot be paid by anybody. They are paid by my constituents, by the taxpayers of Canada, and I have but one duty, the service of the people." I hope that my language has not been driving language. I hope that I have not urged this matter too strongly, because it is a subject for clear thought rather than of emotionalism. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) suggested that we members did not have the courage with which to approach the question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I asked them to have courage.

Mr. ROEBUCK: All right. I am corrected to that extent. But it has not been lack of courage on our part that this matter has not been raised before. It has been a sense of responsibility. It has been that diffidence to advocate our own cause. It has been a readiness to sacrifice in order that this war might be carried on and that public morale might be maintained. It is a matter of credit to us and not of discredit that this question has not been previously discussed.

As for the Minister of Finance and the suggestion that he is anaemic in thought or lacks courage, let me ask how many in this house would like to substitute for him and to answer the barrage that meets him from both sides of the house, while he carries the responsibility of the raising of billions of dollars. I do not always agree with the Minister of Finance, but I have held my peace knowing the burden that he carries. I have felt that he was not anaemic but rather a lion-heart in his office.

Just one word on another subject that is related to the one before the house, namely, the abolition of the savings portion of the present income tax. Lest the Minister of Finance and the country think the criticism voiced is the general opinion, because of silence on the part of others, let me express commendation. Many of my fellow members feel that the administration deserves credit for making this change. There is such a thing as riding a willing horse to death. Statesmen must be careful not to go too far in bleeding a country white even in time of war. Caution in going too far and taking too much is wisdom at the present time. The abolition of this tax is intensely popular in the country.

It has been observed on the floor of the house that the change will benefit most strongly those in the lower income brackets, because those in the higher income brackets usually are able to offset a portion of the compulsory savings by the payment of insurance premiums and various other things. It is the low income taxpayers who will benefit. I appreciate the argument that it is a good thing to have money now in order that we may have it to expend after the war is over. But you must take the whole financial policy together. You must not select single points and emphasize them. While the poorer people will not save as much to expend after the war if this change goes into effect, on the other hand, if the present plans as I understand them are carried out, there will be family allowances. Something like $200,000,000 a year of purchasing power is to be distributed among the low income people of our country in the form of family allowances, thoroughly offsetting the loss of compulsory savings. One offsets the other. Both would give added purchasing power after the war. We now lose the compulsory savings, but on the other hand we gain $200,000,000 in family allowances.

Mr. ADAMSON: The Minister of Finance has stated this afternoon that this question of indemnities has not been brought up in the house before.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not say that. I asked the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard how many members had mentioned it on the floor of the house before. I did not mean to intimate that none had. He was representing that the discussion this afternoon showed a general movement of hon. members in favour of freeing part of their indemnity from taxation, and I asked him how many members had brought it up before.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to tell the minister that on three previous occasions this very question has been brought up in the house, once by myself, twice by my room-mate, the hon. member for Northumberland, New Brunswick, not Northumberland in the hills. The hon. member's contention was—and I think it is well founded—that the indemnity is paid to members of parliament to indemnify them for their time, and that under the House of Commons Act to consider this a salary is entirely improper—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And unconstitutional.

Mr. ADAMSON: —and that if the legal lights could get together they might prove that every act of this parliament was illegal, because under the present taxation system we are put into the position of being employees of the government, and the House of Commons Act definitely states that a member of this house cannot be an employee of the government, with the exception of a soldier, sailor or airman serving his country during time of war. That is a very important point, and one which I think should be cleared up.

With regard to two hon. and gallant members who have intimated, I think quite publicly, that they could not afford to continue to be members, I support the contention of the hon. members for Fraser Valley and for Northumberland, Ontario, that the loss of these two members to this country is a serious loss, and represents the sort of thing which may happen all across Canada. I say to the committee through you, Mr. Chairman, that in politics as in everything else you get what you pay for.

There is what I consider to be a particularly mean decision of the treasury board through which both of these hon. and gallant members suffer severely. I know this because I was fortunate enough to be serving overseas with one of them. By a ruling of the treasury board, if you are a member of this house you are not entitled to dependents' allowance; that is, separation allowance. That decision may be legal, but I suggest that it is very mean. It does not affect me now, but it did. I mention it now because it does not affect me. Here we have members who, because they are such, are penalized, in that if they are married or get married their wives do not receive the separation allowance. It is a penalty illustrative of the mentality of the treasury board in its reaction to the matter of indemnities paid to members of this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is news to me. I discussed it with members, and certainly I am very much surprised. May I ask the hon. member, on what is the ruling based? It may be that it exists; it may be that it is validly based, but would the hon. gentleman give me a little enlightenment on that?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes. If you are in the army you get what is called a separation allowance for your wife.

Mr. ILSLEY: The dependents' allowance.

Mr. ADAMSON: The dependents' allowance. If you happen to be a member of the house that is automatically cut off, by the ruling of the treasury board, because you cannot draw a salary from two departments at once.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about your soldier's pay?

Mr. ADAMSON: You get that, but not while serving as a member of the house. I want to make this very clear, that no hon. member on active service while serving in this house draws two indemnities. He does not draw his army pay and his indemnity as a member of this house if he serves in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): While he is in the house.

Mr. ADAMSON: He receives leave without pay to look after his parliamentary duties. But whether he is serving overseas or anywhere else he does not receive separation allowance for his wife at any time. I think that is a peculiarly picayune and rather mean proviso of the treasury board. I must say that it is not endearing the treasury board to those who are affected by it.

Mr. HOWDEN: Which does he receive, his army pay or his parliamentary pay?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He receives his parliamentary pay in full. His wife gets no separation allowance from his army pay, and he loses his army pay while he is here in the House of Commons. I think that is the correct statement.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Supposing he were here for six months he would receive his full parliamentary indemnity and no army pay during that period. During the remaining six months he could draw his army pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is so. But he gets no wife's allowance at any time.

Mr. ADAMSON: He would draw no separation allowance at any time. Both these hon. and gallant members have brought this up to me and mentioned it as peculiarly unfair and "small". Both of them are professional men, and married. Before they became members of parliament they lived on the fees which they received for their professional services. That source of income is completely cut off; both of them have found it almost impossible to live, and both have stated that they cannot remain members under these conditions. Because of the ruling I have mentioned we are losing from this house the very type of young men we should have in it.

I wish now to refer to the British budget. As brought down quite recently by Sir John Anderson, it definitely recognizes, or so I understand from the press, that a member of parliament has definite expenses, and gives him an allowance for them. Surely we can follow the lead given in this respect by the British house.

I hold in my hand a bill which shows that the Australian parliament recognizes not only the expenses which have been mentioned, but election expenses as well. I think the committee would be interested in one of the clauses of this act, since we are likely to have an election, I understand, in the very near future. Section 74 of the Australian income tax assessment act as revised this year reads:

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Expenditure incurred in the year of income by the taxpayer in being elected as a member, or in contesting an election for membership, of the parliament or of the parliament of a state shall be allowable deduction.

That is a very interesting clause, and remember it is put in by a Labour government. I think it is important for this reason. What we have to do in Canada is to see to it that the type of man we get in the House of Commons is truly representative of the people throughout the country. We are going to be faced with a good many young men coming back, discharged and demobilized; we hope that the next House of Commons will have a great number of servicemen in it, and unless we liberalize our methods of taxation and our present method of reducing the indemnity until it is impossible to live on it, we are not going to get, after the next election, the type of independently thinking young man in the House of Commons that we should have. Everything should be done under our taxation policy to make it easy for courageous and forceful young men who have fought for their country to become condidates for parliamentary honour. We need that type of young man, but under the present taxation system we do everything to discourage such men, and that is one of my most serious condemnations of the present system.

Several matters have been brought up on this resolution and I wish to say just one word with regard to succession duties.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON: When the committee took recess at six o'clock, I was speaking in general terms about the peculiar way in which we as Canadians treat our public men. There is in Canada a philosophy, I think one of the most pernicious that could be harboured in any country, that all men who go into public life do so for ulterior reasons; and when a public man is defeated many people continue to bear a personal dislike to that individual. No other country in the world treats its public servants as badly as Canada does. To-day there are living in Canada I think seven gentlemen who at one time or another have been premiers of some of the sovereign provinces of this dominion. All or most of them are living in a degree of oblivion; some have been or perhaps are actually close to destitution. That is something the public man sees in Canada when he looks around. He sees men once great, once leaders of great provinces, elected by the public will, whom the fortunes of politics have turned down and who have been treated worse than men engaged in any other line of endeavour. These are the things we see, and they are not conducive to the well-being of the state.

We have taken a cynical attitude toward public servants. We have said that no man who enters the public service can possibly be honest. That is the philosophy of the country. When I was elected to this house I was in the army. My colonel said to me, "If you had been in the penitentiary for five years people would have forgotten and forgiven you. Now you have become a politician, and that will stay with you for the rest of your life." That is the philosophy we have spread in Canada, and I say to hon. members that it is a damnable philosophy. We do not consider, as do the English and the other democracies, that a man enters the public service of his country for the same reasons that another man enters the armed service of his country. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that until we overcome these peculiar ideas we shall continue to have the sort of negative government we have at the present time. That is all I have to say with regard to the sessional indemnity.

I should now like to say a word about succession duties, which I believe come under this item. There is a specific item dealing with them, but what I have to say is more germane to this item than to any other. It is a peculiar thing, but we have developed the philosophy that it is a sin to make a success of anything. Once a man has made a success in life he is considered suspect, and the taxing authorities of this dominion regard his estate almost as an enemy of the country. I am going to put on record to-night some specific figures with regard to an estate—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, we made a bad start this afternoon with respect to the rules. The hon. member for York-Sunbury asked in a polite way for leave to introduce under this item the question of taxation on sessional indemnities, and no one took exception. We have strayed from one field to another, and I think now we should decide to comply with the rules of the house after we finish with some of the matters that have been brought up; not all of them, but I think probably the matter of the taxation of sessional indemnities will have something more said about it. I suggest that we get back to our items and stick with them; otherwise we shall never make any headway. If we have general speeches, appropriate to the debate on the budget, on each resolution the whole discussion will get entirely out of hand. The hon. gentleman is now propounding his philosophy, or his criticism of the philosophy of others, with respect to accumulations and whether or not they should be passed on at the time of one's death. That has nothing to do with this item, and I raise the point of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The minister is quite correct in his interpretation of the rules, and this evening I hope hon. members will confine their remarks to resolution 1, which reads:

1. That for 1944 the total tax on individuals be reduced by one-half the amount of the refundable portion thereof, less one-half credits for savings, and that for 1945 the total tax on individuals be reduced by the full amount of the refundable portion thereof, less credits for savings.

I hope hon. members will try to cooperate and keep to the point under discussion.

Mr. NEILL: The minister said that we were to finish the subject we had started this afternoon.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; we shall have to finish that.

Mr. ADAMSON: I bow to your ruling, of course, Mr. Chairman; but since this afternoon the general subjects of the functions of chartered banks and the Bank of Canada, and the issue of debt-free money were allowed, I considered that on the first item there would be an opportunity to all members to discuss the general taxation policy. However, if the Minister of Finance wishes to have it otherwise, and if in the future we shall have an opportunity to deal with specific items as they come up, then I shall reserve what I have to say on succession duties until the specific item is before the committee. I understand that I have that guarantee, and I therefore bow to your ruling.

Mr. WOOD: Mr. Chairman, so far as possible I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to the first item in the resolutions. I believe it is quite in order that we discuss the taxation upon the sessional indemnities of members of parliament. I must point out that I have a great deal of sympathy with my fellow members in the matter of taxation of those indemnities, and I cannot see any rhyme or reason why a member of parliament is not entitled to the legitimate expenses connected with his being a member of parliament as would be enjoyed by any other Canadian citizen. Some consideration should be given to that aspect of the situation. We are taxed on the full amount of our sessional indemnity, and I myself find considerable difficulty in paying those taxes. Like the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I find that $1,400 is deducted from my $4,000 indemnity for income tax. However, I do not expect to go into the red, because in the past I have tried to conduct my business affairs so that this will not happen, if at all possible.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury complained about the high cost of living. If it requires as much to live as he said it does, then perhaps it is a case of the cost of living high, so far as that hon. member is concerned.

But when it comes to the point of increasing our sessional indemnities by rewarding members of parliament and giving them a monetary consideration commensurate with their positions, I am not so sure that this is an appropriate approach to the problem. First, I was nominated as a Liberal candidate in my riding, the constituency of Brant. When I was nominated and elected I knew the indemnity was $4,000. I did not have to take part in the election; this was still a free country. But I have found there are many who, like myself, are anxious to make some contribution to the public service. After listening to some hon. members who spoke this afternoon, one might decide that they were giving their time and attention without any remuneration at all. The indemnity might not be as large as some think it should be; while the House of Commons is as fairly representative a cross-section of the people as can be found, it is still possible that some of the 245 members may not be worth even the $4,000, and would not make that if they had to compete in some other form of life. That is a point which should be considered.

After all, the average member of parliament has a contribution to make when he offers his services at election time. Very often during the campaign his speeches reflect a high plane of thought, when he solicits the votes of his constituents to support him in the contribution he wishes to make to the public service.

There are other compensations besides the monetary one. The first of these is the honour of being a member of parliament—because I consider it a great honour to represent the people of Brant. I have had many predecessors whom I have looked upon with much approval.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You cannot eat honour.

Mr. WOOD: I did not hear the hon. member. The fact is that some most honoured men have represented the constituency of Brant, and I feel highly honoured in being one of those called upon to represent those splendid people. That is a consideration which money cannot buy, and which should be kept in mind.

If one places only a monetary value upon his membership in the House of Commons, then we see at once that there are some in the house who, in many other walks of life, might earn four or five times as much as they receive here as members of parliament. So that I suggest the matter should not be considered only from a monetary point of view. After all, the member of parliament has a contribution he can make, one which I believe is best exemplified in a book I take a great deal of pleasure in reading, when I want inspiration. This book is called "Self-Help," by Samuel Smiles, and at one page I find this:

> Even the humblest person, who sets before his fellows an example of industry, sobriety, and upright honesty of purpose in life, has a present as well as a future influence upon the well-being of his country; for his life and character pass unconsciously into the lives of others, and propagate good example for all time to come.

If we as members of parliament, in the dying hours of a session, say that we are going to extract more from the taxpayers of this country, I am wondering what kind of example that would be to our fellowmen.

After all, there is this to be said about it, that in these days in which our boys are fighting against tyranny a weapon has been put into the hands of civilians, namely, the weapon of taxation. That weapon is evidenced in various types of controls, price-freezing, price-setting, gasoline rationing, sugar rationing, and controls of other kinds. Many of these controls can be used as weapons in the hands of civilians. I am sorry to say I have had complaints from some who have been too cowardly to use those controls with a grace which would have been commensurate with the contribution being made by our soldiers.

This is a weapon we have within our hands, and we must use it to help our boys when they are fighting the forces of tyranny; because, after all, they could not get very far if we as civilians did not back them up. I repeat that when I hear people complain of high taxes, I am bound to remember that we are living in a country which is free, one in which our homes are not bombed, and one in which we enjoy many privileges. We complain of some of the weapons the Minister of Finance is using, the taxation he is inflicting upon us, but I consider it is the right and privilege of a citizen to pay these taxes. We should not overlook that.

It would be unfortunate if we as members of parliament showed a bad example at this particular time. I hesitate to think where it might end. Naturally we all do not like paying taxes; but if we as members of parliament do not show our sense of duty, how can we expect those who are fighting our battles for $1.50 a day to react? What will they think of members of parliament who are looking after their own particular interests regardless of the welfare of our soldiers who are fighting our battles at this particular time? I may be all wrong—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You certainly are.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member is quite within his right to pass his opinion. I may be all wrong, but I have never reached the point where I consider I never make a mistake.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You never will.

Mr. WOOD: There are those who claim they never make mistakes, but they do not know when they make one. I am not so sure that making it easy for society will produce the best results. There are those who have admitted that they have enjoyed the fruits of poverty in their success. I should like to quote again from the same book:

> Riches and ease, it is perfectly clear, are not necessary for man's highest culture, else had not the world been so largely indebted in all times to those who have sprung from the humbler ranks. An easy and luxurious existence does not train men to effort or encounter with difficulty; nor does it awaken that consciousness of power which is so necessary for energetic and effective action in life.

We have in this house men who have deserted a particular field to come and work for this poverty-stricken indemnity of $4,000 that is taxed. We do not seem to have any difficulty in finding people to take this truck-driver's job. Truck-driver's pay was mentioned this afternoon, but I do not think that kind of phraseology lends dignity to this house. I do not want to get on too high a plane but, after all, I feel that a member of parliament should set an exemplary example in his community.

Some of those who have spoken have referred to the lack of fortitude and courage on the part of the Minister of Finance in facing this issue. Some of us who come from the simpler walks of life do not feel as strongly about this matter as others. So far as I am concerned, if some of these gentlemen do not think the $4,000 indemnity is sufficient there is no reason why they should not resign their seats and put their energies to other things where they may be better rewarded.

I would be much opposed to increasing the indemnity at a time like this without asking for the confidence of the people whom I have the honour to represent. While it is an honour to be a member of parliament, it is only right that the member of parliament should deserve that honour and not take advantage of an opportunity to increase his monetary remuneration at a time when the country is struggling so hard. There are people who think we are already getting too much. I believe a service has been rendered to the people of Canada by directing attention to the position in which a member of parliament finds himself to-day.

On page 32 of the appendix to the budget there is a table showing the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures. One heading covers legislation, which I understand includes the indemnities of senators and members of parliament and the salaries of all officials associated with the two houses. I find that the percentage of the expenditure for legislation is ·05 per cent of the total. This is just a bagatelle compared with other expenditures. Of course war expenditures were the greatest, being 86·28 per cent. However, the principle is still there, and I do not think we have the right to increase our own remuneration.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who asked for that?

Mr. ADAMSON: Nobody suggested this afternoon that it should be increased.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He is talking nonsense.

Mr. WOOD: I think if you read the hon. member's speech you will find that he referred to the treatment given representatives and senators in the congress of the United States, and the inference was that there should be an increase for members of parliament.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nonsense; nobody said that.

Mr. WOOD: You are saying plenty, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How many days have you missed this year?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member must not be interrupted.

Mr. WOOD: If the hon. member does not want to agree with me, that is his privilege. That is his right, but I also have the right to approach this subject as a member of parliament and I do not intend to be scared away by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. He is within his right to voice his own opinion, but I reserve my right to do likewise. As I pointed out in the beginning, possibly we are entitled to a certain relief from taxation upon the cost of being here. That is quite within our rights, but other than that I take the view that we are being paid for at least a part of our time that we spend here and we are not doing it for nothing.

I do not think it would be wise to put a monetary value upon the work of a member of parliament, because it might eventually create a racket. We might have here the type of people who would try to come here just for the monetary consideration and not because of the public service they could render. During my life I have found that there are many people who have made great contributions to society without receiving any great reward therefor. I would far rather be classed with those people than with those who are extremely wealthy. We have to give consideration to the sentimental aspect of this matter. The hon. member for Fraser Valley may call it a lack of courage, but I do not think it is. It is a case of doing our duty in accordance with the circumstances as they present themselves and not taking advantage of the dying days of the session to increase our monetary considerations.

There is one other matter to which I should like to draw attention. This was referred to in the speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard when he dealt with the debt of this country. I notice on page 50 of the appendix—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think we should attempt, under this resolution, to deal with the debt of the country.

Mr. WOOD: I shall be glad to bow to your ruling if I am going outside the resolution. If I am out of order, Mr. Chairman, I will resume my remarks later.

Mr. NEILL: I would not have taken part in this debate but for the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) who has just sat down. I would not go so far as to say that I resent them for, of course, he is entitled to his views. But I deprecate them; perhaps that is the better word. Of course, every member and every section of this house and of this country have their own troubles. The hon. member occupies a seat apparently reasonably close to this city which allows him to go home week-ends. There are members of this house who are known as the Thursday-Tuesday people, who disappear at 3.30 p.m. on Thursday and we do not see them again until 10.30 on Tuesday night. They can go home over a long week-end and conduct their business in some kind of way at any rate by this week-end supervision. But those of us who come from the far west are tied down here for the whole session. If the session meets in November there is not time enough to make it worth while going home at Christmas. If I had gone home at Easter I would have had exactly two days at home. So that we who come from the far west are tied down here from the beginning of the session to whatever time the powers that be or the lap of the gods decide that we can go home. That makes a difference. I conducted a fairly profitable little business which I had to sell because I could not get home to run it.

Anything I have to say, Mr. Chairman, will come with better grace from myself than from some other members because it is well known that I am not going to run again. Therefore I shall be free of any suggestion such as the hon. member for Brant made that perhaps members had a personal and a pecuniary interest in suggesting that some adjustment should be made in connection with our expenses. It can mean nothing to me. I am only trying to put forward my views for the benefit of those who will come after me and, as I hope to show, for the benefit of the country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The country will lose a good servant if you do not come back.

Mr. NEILL: I hope it may be my pleasure in time to come to look down on this assembly and see how it is progressing.

Mr. REID: It will be nice to have you still with us.

Mr. NEILL: It is quite true, as the hon. member for Brant said, that nobody asked us to run. On the other hand, the people who sent us here expect us to fight for their rights and privileges, and we have not the courage to fight for our own. If we have rights, surely we are entitled to them.

Somebody says that an adjustment has not been asked for to-day. I will take it upon myself now to ask, on behalf of those members who may come after me, that there should be, not an increase in the indemnity, but fair treatment as regards members' expense accounts. I hope that by putting it on the record it may get out to the public, because many people are entirely ignorant of the real facts. The popular idea is that we live here at the expense of the country. When people read in the papers, for instance, that the restaurant went several thousand dollars behind, they think we got the benefit of all that. We do not. A good many people think we do not pay for our lodgings here and so on. A gentleman, a very decent fellow, once sent me a wire collect. It was a nice chatty wire, beginning, "Dear Mr. Neill" and ending with "Yours sincerely". It cost me $7.50. He thought that was one of my privileges.

I only ask that we should be treated the same as any other body. Many years ago—I may be wrong in this, but this is my impression from studying the thing at the time—the same question arose in more modified form, and the then Minister of Finance, I think it was Mr. Fielding, but it might have been his predecessor, said that he would arrange it so that members would get some allowance for their expenses.

If I were a real estate agent I would be allowed, when making up my income tax return, to deduct from my profits any expenses that I had incurred in obtaining those profits. I have to maintain an office, rent, fuel, light, telephone, et cetera, and a stenographer all the time to carry on my political work. If I were a lawyer or a doctor I would be allowed to deduct those expenses from my income, and quite properly so. There is no occupation that would not be allowed to do that. But we are not. There is no sense of fairness about that. It does not make common sense.

Some seventeen years ago, being Scotch, and the Scotch can always see a nickel without a microscope, I took up this question with an authority in the taxation branch. The difference was not nearly as great then as it is now. I said to him, "I am entitled to deduct these expenses." He said, "No, you are not." I said, "Oh, yes; here it is in the law. It says that if you are away from home pursuing your business or occupation you can deduct your expenses. If I had been in the contracting business I could deduct my travelling expenses." But he said, "No, you cannot deduct your expenses." Then I said, "How do you get around that sentence in the law? Is not my business as a member of parliament an occupation?" He said, "No, it is not." Then I said, "What is it?" And he said, "It is an honour." And for that honour I have to pay all these expenses out of my own pocket. That was seventeen years ago.

The question was raised again more recently because the pressure of taxation brought it home to hon. members. Some of them consulted a high official in the taxation branch and he laughed at them. He said, "Of course, you are entitled to make the deduction, but you have been standing for it for so long that it would not look well to make a change now just before an election."

Two years ago I brought this question up on the legislation items in the estimates, which I thought was the proper place, but I got no support, and I left the house rather disgusted. I met some members and said to them, "You know blamed well I was right, why didn't you back me up?" They said, "That's all very well for you, Neill, but you are not going to run again and we are."

The government has been accused of a lack of courage. The blame is not altogether the government's. It is the members who did not have the courage to demand what was coming to them. They were afraid of public sentiment. It is not good to be afraid of public sentiment. The fear is wholly misplaced in this case. The common people, the working people, the union people never want their members to be cheap. The idea of doing something cheap will not get anywhere with them, and they will always stand for a reasonable explanation.

An election was coming off in Nova Scotia some years ago, and the government of the day, in order to popularize themselves, just as our hon. friend opposite had in his mind perhaps, reduced their salaries by two or three hundred dollars. The next day the newspapers came out with great big headlines—I remember one paper, a Labour paper had this headline: "Legislators cut down their salaries." But the next line read: "Cheap Skates! They knew what they were worth." That is all the applause they got from the working man. The working man wants good wages for himself, and he is willing that those who do good service for others shall get paid for it.

I remember once talking to a group of working men along the same lines. It was at a logging camp. I said that I was not being paid enough and that I would vote for an increase. One of the men said, "You say that you are not getting paid enough. Then why do you run? Nobody asked you to run." "That is perfectly true," I said, "but the reason I run is the same reason that brings some of you to town to get drunk. I get a kick out of it, whether I get paid properly for it or not." I would love to run again, but the state of my health forbids it. Let me tell the committee that I might not be so frank if I were running again; I would be accused of ulterior motives; but I am thinking of the people who are coming after me, good men who may be prevented from running because of existing conditions.

Last year I kept a fairly close record of my expenses. Everyone who knows me—my fellow members and my neighbours at home—know I live in a very quiet way. When a man works thirteen hours a day he has not much time for a frivolous life. My hours at home are eight a.m. to ten p.m., with an hour off at noon, and that does not leave me much time to go in for riotous living. So that I live quietly and inexpensively. But I was just $575 out by being a member of parliament last year. I must say that I included in my expenses the sum of $1,000 toward my election expenses, because that generally costs me between four and five thousand dollars, and each year I take off a thousand dollars of my indemnity to make up that amount. Even at that I would be glad to go on doing it, for the honour of it; as I say, it is the only job I know; it has been my recreation and my hobby, as well as my occupation for twenty-eight years.

There is just one other point I wish to make. If we go on the way we are doing a new system will develop; indeed it is developing now. The hon. member who sits behind me said that he knew of two members who for that reason were not going to run, and certainly there are other members who will be deterred on the same grounds from standing again. I asked a man whom I know if he would run to take my place. He had very good qualifications, but he lacked private means. He said that he would have been willing to stand, but he could not afford it; he had a wife and family. Here is what we are going to develop—and heaven forbid that it should come in Canada: we are going to have a parliament of rich men or the stooges of rich men; it will be either one or the other. The rich man can afford to be a member of parliament; and perhaps would desire to be one, wholly from a sense of honour and responsibility; nevertheless he is a rich man and, when it comes down to the point, he looks at things through the eyes of the rich man. The poor man looks at things through the eyes of the poor man. Either you are going to have rich men who can afford to be out of pocket, or poor men who will be tools of rich men or companies or interests. It does not necessarily have to be engineered by some company; there may be nothing actually improper; but the man who pays the piper sets the tune, and the man or interest that finances a campaign will have an awful lot to say about its policies.

I therefore think that the proposed change would be a fair thing. I do not ask for any increase of indemnity, although it may be remarked that in the United States their representatives are paid far more, but simply that every member should be entitled to deduct his legitimate expenses, and I would not put them at a high figure so that the system could be abused. Let the allowance for expeness be a reasonable one, taking account of the fact that a man may have to give up his business, as we in British Columbia have to do. I would ask any lawyers from British Columbia what their businesses are worth to-day. This would be fair for business and good for democracy. I submit also that it would be a good thing for the people, who want to be represented not by rich men or by stooges but by people just like themselves who can afford to come and represent them. I hope the minister will take some cognizance of the suggestion to make some allowance for expenses legitimately incurred, as we all know they must be. I do not believe the government would suffer by it, and I do not think any hon. member who suggests it or votes for it will suffer either, because the people are sound, commonsensible folk, who do not want any more than is coming to them, and they want everyone to get a square deal.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, I am going to surprise you and also the minister, because I intend to speak on an item. We have been almost four hours on this subject, and I think we should get on an item, unless the minister would like to speak first.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to speak some time on this question of taxation of members' indemnities.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Speak now, then.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps before the minister speaks I may be permitted to say a few words. The reason why I ask the privilege of speaking first is that I should like to anticipate one argument he may use, in case one of the interjections which the parliamentary assistant made this afternoon reflects some of the thinking of the minister. I do not hold it against the parliamentary assistant for the interjection he made; he may have been provoked by the nature of the remarks at that moment; but what he said was something like this, if I remember correctly, "It is very nice to be relieving ourselves of taxation." If I felt that that was what we were asking for I should be opposed to any such move, just as other hon. members have stated their opposition to an increase in the amount of the indemnity. But what I feel we are doing here to-day is directly in line with the third basic consideration which the minister outlined in his budget speech. As reported in Hansard, at page 4174, he said:

> A third consideration is the desirability of relieving cases of special hardship which very frequently arise when tax rates are heavy, and of removing some anomalies which experience has revealed in the working of our laws.

I would say to the minister and the parliamentary assistant that under the terms of that consideration members of parliament, by correspondence, by interviews with the minister, by raising cases in the house, have fought hard in connection with a number of anomalies and conditions which they considered unfair and unjust. The minister, in the very speech to which I have referred, made announcements to take care of a number of these anomalies. Let me take a moment to refer to some of them. First there is the proposed change with regard to undue medical expenses, so that the amount over five per cent is now allowable as an exemption, whether expended in Canada or the United States. He made a new provision with regard to the expenses of the blind. He brought illegitimate children and in-laws into the exemption classes. He made provision for exemption in the case of payments of alimony. He suggested a new provision with respect to the maintenance of self-contained domestic establishments.

There are some other matters which the minister has not adjusted as yet, such as meeting a request which hon. members have made for an exemption to parents of student nurses. There was also the matter which I mentioned the other night, namely, that of granting sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters the same away-from-home expense allowance which is allowed to brakemen, firemen, engineers and train conductors.

The point I am trying to make is that in connection with all these cases what members of parliament on all sides of the house have fought for is not relief from taxation; what they have fought for is equity, for an adjustment of what they considered anomalies; and I feel, quite frankly, that we are only at this stage of the game doing something on behalf of ourselves which we have done strenuously on behalf of those whom we represent.

I know that in our own group, when we were discussing this matter one day, my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South made the comment that if a case similar to that of members of parliament were brought to our attention from outside the house we would rise in this chamber and fight like the mischief on behalf of such people. So that I do not think we are asking for any concession or any relief from taxation; we are simply asking that the third consideration which the minister laid down in his budget speech should be thought of as applying to these cases.

A number of sets of figures relative to this matter were given to the minister to-day. I was interested in the figures given by the hon. member for Trinity, but other figures might be added to those, because he gave the figures for a member who has another income before he comes here, one which is still his after he becomes a member. There are some of us here who, whatever the reason may be, have no other source of income once we are elected. I am not complaining at all, I am quite satisfied, I may say to the hon. member for Brant and others. Even if no adjustment is made, or even if the taxes are increased, I intend, so long as the electors of Winnipeg North Centre are satisfied, to continue coming here as a member of parliament. I wish to render such service as I can in this capacity, so that there is nothing in the nature of a threat or a promise, as my political opponents might suggest, in this connection. However, may I state my own case. Apart from any profession I may have followed, I am a member of the International Typographical Union. If I were working at the trade as a linotype operator in Winnipeg, working at the present scale of wages, subject to the taxation now in effect, living in Winnipeg, and having only one home to maintain, it would leave me better off financially than I am under present circumstances. Once again let me say I am not complaining. But I do feel that just as on the one hand I do not want to be better off than the people whom I represent, because of my work as a member of parliament, so I know that the people whom I represent do not want me to be worse off than I would be if I had not gone in for public service in this way. I think the minister should take into consideration the case of members who give their full time and have no other income, as well as cases of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Trinity.

Speaking of interjections, I thought I heard the minister interject at one point that he doubted whether in the past, at some stage of the game, there had been very great unanimity in the house on this matter. If that was so in the past, one of the reasons I am speaking to-night, although as a matter of fact the position of this party was sufficiently well stated by our leader, is to add, what I feel the minister should realize now, that there is practical unanimity on this point. That does not mean that in the view of some of us it was ever right that some consideration along the line we are now urging should not have been given. It simply bears out the correctness of what the minister said in that sentence to which I have referred, that when tax rates are heavy some of these anomalies are brought to light. With the experience of laws of this kind there are revealed things that were not caught before; and because of that experience, because of the way the tax rates operate, members feel the justice of putting up this fight for themselves, comparable with the fight which we have put up for others, and to which the minister in many cases has responded. There is great unanimity at the present time. In fact, I believe the committeee is unanimous; the only member who has offered any reservations having been the hon. member for Brant; But even he did not oppose the suggestion that there should be some adjustment along this line, and I hope that factor, if it was one that was sticking in the minister's mind, will now be taken into consideration by him, namely, that all parties in the house, members on all sides, are agreed that it is a just request which we are making.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no regrets for having brought up this matter to-day, and I do not believe that I have in any way overstated the position. I was rather disturbed at an interjection made by the parliamentary assistant, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred, because the parliamentary assistant intimated that it was nice for us to relieve ourselves from income taxation. On reflection I do not think he will persist in that position. I do not believe there has been any disposition on the part of anyone to benefit oneself in the course of this debate to-day. Certainly I made no claim for relief myself. I want to make that abundantly clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand that. I understand that what the hon. gentleman suggests, and what many others have suggested, would relieve members of parliament from many hundreds of dollars of income taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be the effect of it, but that was not the motive underlying my position. I am quite content to pay income tax. I have paid it from the beginning and I expect to pay it until I die, but I want to pay only on true income, and members of parliament are not paying on true income. That is the difficulty which the minister has not met.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not spoken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I know the minister must have had this matter under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why, certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government must have had it under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: For years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am informed that it has been the subject-matter of discussion within the party itself. I will not go farther than that. It has not borne so hardly until the war, until the high rates have come into effect, and then it has come home to hon. members that they are being taxed on their gross income without allowance whatever being given to the cost of procuring that income. The net is what should be taxed. I have had this matter up with the department. The department took the view that parliament itself has the remedy and I am trying to get parliament to apply the remedy. I do not want anyone to take from any remarks I made this afternoon that I was advocating an increase in indemnity; I am not. I am asking the government to put the taxation of parliamentary indemnities on the true basis, exactly on the same basis that they put me as a practising lawyer, where I charge for postage stamps. A practising lawyer charges up every item of expense—telegraph and telephone tolls, rentals, and so on; every time he has to move, travelling expenses are charged up. Nobody could earn income on any other basis if he did not do it in the way I have suggested. But a member of parliament, because of lack of courage of members of parliament in the past—I can only put it in that way—is now legislated into a position which is not only an anomaly but much worse than that. It is cruel to members of parliament to tax them on their expenses in earning their sessional indemnity.

I take a constitutional view of this question, and if it were fought I do not think these indemnities would be regarded as income. I know the only case that has been tried in Canada was one in reference to the salary of a lieutenant governor where it was held that the expenses of the lieutenant governor in entertaining, owing to the position he occupied, were disallowed. The expenses which a member of parliament has to incur are on an entirely different plane.

I should like to impress upon the Minister of Finance and the other members of the government that members of parliament do not object to paying income tax on true income. They do object to paying income tax on gross income, without any allowance for the cost of earning that income. Could I state it in any shorter form than that? That is the principle upon which I base my objection. I did not offer any suggestion this afternoon as to quantum, nor do I now. I suggest that consideration should be given by the government to this whole problem. If they do not want to put it into effect for this parliament, put it into effect for the next one, so that this thing which has rankled in the breasts of members of parliament for twenty-three years, to my own personal knowledge, and about which they have been afraid to move for fear of criticism, may be rectified. I ask for justice for members of parliament. I am not asking justice for myself in that regard. It does not matter a bit to me; I may not be back in this house. But I should like to see my successor, to whatever party he may belong, who may be a man without private means, in a better position. How can he leave his business in Fredericton, come here for six months of the year and maintain and educate his family as he is bound to do, on $4,000 a year, taxed at the rates in force to-day? The thing just does not add up to common decency, and certainly it is not democratic. I am sure my electors will support the position I have taken. I am sure the electors of this country, if they understand the position, will support any reasonable action taken by the government with respect to this matter. I should like to know of any other class of people in the country who are taxed on gross income. I do not know of any; none comes to mind at the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are hundreds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There may be, but none occurs to me at the moment. If there are others, that is another case of injustice, although of course each case has to be analysed and must stand on its own feet. The debate this afternoon has demonstrated the injustice of the present position, and the government ought to pay heed to what has been said.

Mr. PICARD: I am told that up to the present no member from my province has spoken on this question. While I have no brief to speak for the members from Quebec generally, I thought it would be unfortunate if the committee should understand that we are not interested in such representations as have been made on this question.

I am sure most hon. members from Quebec would be in agreement with much of what has been said during the day. If I understand the situation correctly the indemnity to members of parliament is given in order to permit people without private means to render public service by coming to Ottawa and representing their constituents, people who also take an interest in public affairs and who delegate one man to come here and speak for them. When taxes are collected at the present rates so little is left that it is impossible for most members to maintain the standard of living expected of them. Some hon. members come from remote districts; it is impossible for them to move their families to Ottawa, although they would like to do so, with the long sessions we are having now. So that it is necessary for them to keep up two separate establishments. They must maintain their homes, and on the other hand they must have apartments or other living quarters in Ottawa. I think we must admit frankly that under present conditions many hon. members are forced to live in a way that would not be considered proper in any country for those holding such important posts. I do not think it is fair to expect an hon. member to leave his personal affairs, his profession, his trade or his farm to come to Ottawa, and then have to live meagrely here in a small room, taking his meals in cheap restaurants, in order that he may so reduce his expenses as to leave a little something for his family at home. I do not think that was ever intended when an indemnity was granted to members of parliament.

Take the position of professional men. Formerly, when sessions lasted for perhaps four or five months, it may have been possible for a physician to maintain his practice after a fashion, but now we are here for almost eight months in the year. It is the same with a lawyer. With the exception of those of us who come from Toronto, Montreal, or other nearby places, hon. members do not go home except at Easter, Christmas, and for the summer holidays, so that professional men lose contact with their practice and thus lose their source of revenue. The same thing would apply in the case of a college professor. He could not be here and at the same time carry on his profession out west or down east, so that he has to give it up entirely.

I do not believe it is fair to ask a man to devote his life to public service and not insure him of means at least to live decently, in accordance with the position he occupies in this, the federal capital. I believe it is admitted that three-quarters of our members have to live in a way that is not up to their ordinary standards or commensurate with the duties which they perform here in behalf of the nation. In England, before a small indemnity of £600 was voted a number of years ago, only the landed gentry and people with private means could enter parliament. That was completely contrary to the spirit of democracy, for it meant that people without private means were prevented from representing their people in parliament. After long discussions that difficulty was overcome; an indemnity was provided to permit people without private means to enter parliament. Some way should be found here in Canada so that we shall not return to an era in which only men of private means can sit here. As things are going now, we are heading for that situation. I know many people who are so discouraged with the present situation that they feel their duty to their own families compels them to leave public life. At present, unless a man has made a fortune before coming here, or unless he has inherited some money, he cannot carry on. I submit to the minister that some way should be found to lighten the burden upon members of parliament, either by exempting from taxation a certain portion of the indemnity, or by allowing an hon. member to deduct the amount of his personal expenses here in Ottawa. Some way should be found to get around the difficulty.

According to what we have heard here to-day from members representing all provinces and all parties, such action should be well received by the people. I know some people say that this is the wrong time to do anything like this, while so many of our young men are making great sacrifices in connection with the war. Of course that has to be considered. It may be said that this would be a dangerous time to take such action, but I do not agree. When the time comes I am going to make the same representations in regard to the salaries of judges. I am glad to know that my remarks in that connection are in accord with views expressed by the labour unions, who have already passed a resolution stating that the judiciary should be able to carry on their duties without any fear of financial difficulty for themselves and their families. If I am not mistaken the same resolution also included members of parliament. So that it is encouraging to realize that at least in some quarters this situation has been recognized. I want to go on record as supporting what has been said in this connection to-day by members who have advocated that relief be granted one way or another to members.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not think I can add very much to what has already been said, but I wish to go on record as endorsing the proposals that have been advanced by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and others. However, I believe we should look at it perhaps a little differently from the point of view of the advantage it would be to members in the present house. After all, this session is pretty close to an end; I understand there will be an election before very long, so that there may be quite a change in the personnel of this house. Who are they to be? Are they to be the young men who have come home from overseas? Are they to be able to come here and represent their constituents—and probably represent the men alongside whom they have fought overseas? I doubt if they can possibly do so, because it is impossible to break even on the present indemnity.

The way I look at it is this: What class of men are we to have representing us in Ottawa in the future? I think of my own riding, and many others, and then I think of the many young men I would like to see coming here to Ottawa, probably in preference to myself. They are welcome to it this time, and I would be glad to support a younger man. But I cannot ask them to take the risk, because there is not sufficient in it for them.

I wonder how many men in this house who have sons would recommend to them that they make politics their business with the present outlook in that career? Unless there is something more than just a living, I am sure we are not going to ask them to do it. And if we cannot ask our own sons to do it, are we going to ask the sons of other people?

I probably spend more money than some. I know I come a long way from having anything left over, after paying for my accommodation and expenses while in Ottawa. Probably, as the hon. member for Brant has said, the high cost of living has something to do with my expenses; but let me tell the committee that last year I spent forty nights in a sleeping car—and I am not going to spend forty nights in an upper berth, or forty nights cramped up in a lower berth, either, if I can get a compartment. Therefore it cost me a considerable sum of money to come here and to return.

I do not think I am in the poor man's class, nor am I in the rich man's. But for the remainder of the time I have left to me, I think I am entitled to a little bit of comfort. Therefore I think, with the others, that some remedy should be brought about to enable young men to enter this life. When I think of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I think of a splendid example of what a man can do in public life, when he devotes his whole time to it. And as one of the three members from Vancouver island I regret very much that he has made a definite decision that he is not going to return to this chamber. I say that because the whole island of Vancouver will lose a very valuable servant.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: As one of the more recent members to come to this chamber, and one who must live entirely on his indemnity, I think I should add a few words to those already spoken. First, to make my position clear, as the hon. member for Brant pointed out, I was under no compulsion to accept the nomination for York South. I may say this, though, that men in that constituency who had given many years to public service—many more years than I had given—were offered the nomination I accepted, and reported themselves unable to accept because they could not educate their school-age families with what would be left of the indemnity they would receive by coming to Ottawa.

I, myself, would not have been willing to accept the nomination until I had reached an age in life when my family was educated, and as a result some of my family responsibilities had decreased. On what is left of my indemnity, I could not to-day maintain my home in Toronto, and rear and educate my family, and also at the same time pay my bills in Ottawa.

As the hon. member for Brant said, I realize there is some honour attached to being a member of parliament. Unfortunately, however, that honour is not legal tender in the commercial banks of our country.

Mr. WOOD: Honour is greater than legal tender.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: When I wish to make an instalment payment on the principal sum of a mortgage, or to make an interest payment, or when I wish to pay premiums on life insurance I find that those people insist upon being paid in something more than honour. I can understand that anyone who is in business or on a farm, a type of occupation which could be carried on just as profitably in his absence as when he is there, and from which he might receive an income, might possibly afford to live on what he gets at Ottawa.

But I did not come to public life from one of the better paid professions; I came from the lowly profession of schoolteaching. For twenty years I had worked in that profession, had gained promotion, and had reached a point where I was within a very few hundred dollars of being one of the best paid teachers in Canada. That was my position when I came to Ottawa. At that time I was receiving almost identically the nominal amount we receive as indemnity.

I find that living in Ottawa costs me a considerable amount of money. I am not attempting to overstate what I am saying. I am not like the hon. member for York-Sunbury, an ex-cabinet minister, and I have not yet reached the stage where I insist upon travelling in a compartment. But I find that, while receiving almost identically the same salary I received as a teacher, that salary is worth a thousand dollars a year less to me in Ottawa, as a member of parliament, than the same amount would have been to me as a schoolteacher in Toronto. That is the condition, living on the scale on which I live, in one room in Ottawa, and with most of my meals in the cafeteria, at thirty-five cents each.

In other words, I am paying taxes on at least a thousand dollars I never see, except to pass it out in expenses which I am forced to incur by reason of my work here. And those additional expenses, together with expenses required to get around my riding—and probably to get around some other ridings—are not taken into account.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word. Two hon. members have made reference to an interjection I made this afternoon. Before I proceed, may I say that I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury and most of the other members who have spoken this afternoon and evening have done a real public service by bringing right out in the open and to the attention of the people of Canada the position of members of parliament at the present time. My difficulty in considering this question is and has been—this will explain the interjection I made this afternoon—that the indemnities we are paid to provide for expenses existed in 1940 when I was elected. The only difference between then and now is that we in this parliament of Canada have drastically increased the tax rates on a great many other people besides ourselves.

As has been indicated, we may have been proceeding for a good many years on a false basis, but the fact is that the only thing that has changed since 1940 when I stood for election—I knew then that the $4,000 I would receive would be subject to taxation—is that we have raised the taxes. I find it pretty difficult to convince myself that I should take care of my own case when I am not giving relief to other people who presumably are hit just as hard.

Mr. ADAMSON: What about the cost of living bonus?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is for that reason that I am impressed with the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that whatever action we now see fit to take to correct our own position should be taken not for this parliament but for the next. We have been here for four years, and during two of those sessions the high tax rates have been in force. This is the first time we have had a full-fledged debate on the matter, the first time we have really brought it to the attention of the people of this country. I for one would hesitate to vote myself what would be in effect a reduction in my taxes, but I am in complete sympathy with the opinions which have been expressed—I am speaking personally—by so many hon. members that we are proceeding on a false basis when we consider the $4,000 we receive as income which should be subject to tax.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I presume the parliamentary assistant is aware that some of us who came here in 1940 with a given indemnity have had it doubled since then?

Some hon. MEMBERS: The taxation doubled.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is what you have left, not what you pay that matters.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two in order to associate myself with what has been said so ably by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others. I think they have made out an admirable case that relief should be given to members of parliament. After all, it is not a salary that the members receive; it is supposed to be a sum of money to indemnify the members against losses incurred by their having to leave their businesses to come here. All we ask is that the situation be considered by the Minister of Finance and the government, and necessary relief given.

I am concerned about the type of men who will be induced to run for parliament in the future. Reference has been made to the young men who are serving our country overseas and who will be returning home. Many of these men will be without occupation and some will have a flair and a desire for public service. Will they be able to afford to come to parliament? Will they be able to raise a family in decency, to educate their children and maintain themselves on the indemnity now given?

I would not ask for relief from taxation, but I think it is improper to tax the expenses of members. I hope that no man will be prevented from entering public life for financial reasons. We do not want this house to be made up only of rich men. I think the quality of the house and of the legislation passed would suffer materially if that were the case. I hope that this house will be representative of every class in the community. We must make it possible for everyone in the community who wishes to do so to offer himself for public service. It is true that this is attended with a certain amount of honour, but the member should be free of financial worry if he is to do his duty to his constituents. We want to attract the best brains in the community to the House of Commons, and therefore I hope that the minister will consider the removal of taxation from money paid out in expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister replies I should like to crave the indulgence of the committee in order to speak on the legal aspect of this matter. This has not been touched upon before, and I am going to attempt to clarify the legal position for hon. members. I have before me the Income War Tax Act, office consolidation down to July, 1943, which I believe is the latest edition. If hon. members will look at page 6, part I, section 3, covering taxable income, they will see the following:

> 3. For the purposes of this act, "income" means the annual net profit or gain or gratuity, whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount, or unascertained as being fees or emoluments. . . .

I skip a few lines which I do not think have anything to do with it, and then continue:

> (d) the salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of
> (i) members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada and officers thereof.

That is a section under which this tax is levied and I call particular attention to the inclusion of the word "net". It is not the gross that should be taxed; it is the net. If I had to stop there I probably would not be able to make out a case, but I call the attention of hon. members to section 5, to be found on page 13 of this consolidation. This section covers deductions and exemptions allowed, and it reads:

> "Income" as hereinbefore defined—

That is in section 3 to which I have referred.

> —shall for the purpose of this act be subject to the following exemptions and deductions:
> (f) travelling expenses, including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging, while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

We are taxed on our indemnity as a trade or business.

Mr. ILSLEY: What makes the hon. member say that? Why does the hon. member say that we are taxed on our indemnities as a trade or business?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you did not tax it as a trade or business it would not be taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under section 3.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is income by the definition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What do you call it under section 3?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is mentioned specifically.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It says, "the salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of members of the Senate and House of Commons." Judges are placed in the same category, but they are allowed travelling expenses free from income tax, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Members of parliament are discriminated against in the operation of this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Members of parliament get their statutory travelling expenses free. That is what the judges get.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know exactly what the judges get. I understand that they get a per diem allowance away from home not limited to actual travelling expenses, but so much a day.

Mr. ILSLEY: So much a day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Whether they spend it or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: So do members of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, they do not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. Members of parliament by statute, if they live more than four hundred miles from Ottawa, get $15 a day when travelling to and from the sessions of parliament, and that is not taxable. That is comparable with the judges' allowance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They get it once.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that the position which the department takes, and this ought to be clarified by the minister, is that because of certain English decisions they do not classify membership as a trade or calling.

Mr. ILSLEY: As a trade or business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore they deny to members of parliament the travelling expenses that are included in the deductions and exemptions provided for by paragraph (f) of section 5 of the act. That is the legal position they take. I challenge that position and that that law is applicable to Canada. We have no Canadian decision that is comparable with that. That decision in England is not binding here. I should like to see the English statute upon which these decisions are based because, when you examine legal decisions based on particular sections of a statute, you will always find that the statutes are not identical. I have not seen the English statute. I doubt if it is identical with this. It may be. But I suggest this, that on a fair interpretation of paragraph (f) of section 5, travelling and living expenses of a member of parliament while away from home attending parliament are a legitimate deduction and should, as a matter of course, be allowed by the income tax division.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether there are other members who want to speak on this but I should like to deal with the matter myself at some length, perhaps for fifteen or twenty minutes, if not longer.

I want to make one thing very clear, that members of parliament and ministers, because ministers have been referred to in the discussion this afternoon and evening, are paid exactly what they were paid before the war and are taxed on exactly the same business on which they were taxed before the war. I want to make that very clear at the outset. The only difference in the treatment of members and ministers during the war and before the war is in the weight of taxation, the higher rates of taxation. There is no other difference either one way or the other in respect of either ministers or members. So that what so many members of the house have asked us to do is to change the rules with respect to taxation which have existed from the beginning of the Income War Tax Act or at least for the last twenty years, and I think from the very beginning of the enactment of the Income War Tax Act. They want us to change the rule that applies to the taxation of members of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So as not to perpetuate a wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed. I am afraid that other hon. members are going to interrupt if he does. That is what happened this afternoon.

I bring myself back to what I was saying when I was interrupted. The request is that, because of the weight of taxation, we now alter the rule which has been applied from the beginning. Is that correct or not? Perhaps it will be said: No, that is incorrect. Perhaps it will be said that we are being asked to change the rule now, not because of the weight of taxation, but because the weight of taxation shows the rule to be a bad one. Nevertheless the government and parliament are in that awkward position that while they are applying practically the same rules now to the great body of taxpayers in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific—certainly the taxpayers that are in our income group such as salary earners all over the country, to whom we are applying the same rules—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are applying the same rules to them as we were before the war, and we are now asked to change the rules with regard to ourselves. That is the request. Let me give the basis for the rule of taxing the salaries of members of parliament. It may be that this should be changed. That I am not arguing now. I am simply stating the facts because a lot of the facts have been overlooked in the discussion this afternoon and evening. Section 3 of the Income War Tax Act reads as follows:

3. For the purposes of this act, "income" means the annual net profit or gain or gratuity, whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount, or unascertained as being fees or emoluments, or as being profits from a trade or commercial or financial or other business or calling, directly or indirectly received by a person from any office or employment, or from any profession or calling, or from any trade, manufacture or business, as the case may be whether derived from sources within Canada or elsewhere; and shall include the interest, dividends or profits directly or indirectly received from money at interest, upon any security or without security, or from stocks, or from any other investment, and, whether such gains or profits are divided or distributed or not, and also the annual profit or gain from any other source including

(d) the salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of

(i) members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada and officers thereof.

That has always been interpreted by the income tax division as meaning that when the taxation of wages or salary was being considered the wages or salary constituted the net profit or gain or gratuity which was being taxed, and that certainly applied to salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of members of the Senate and House of Commons and officers thereof.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister allow me? What effect does that ruling give to the word "net"?

Mr. ILSLEY: The word "net" applies to profit undoubtedly and if it is taken as applying to gain and gratuity, it is explained and defined by the following words, "whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount", in which event the net profit or gain or gratuity is ascertained. There is nothing more to be said about it. It is not to be increased or reduced. Then it goes on to say, "or unascertained", in which event one will have to look at the expenses and what it took to earn the income and so on.

Whether that is the correct legal interpretation or not, that is the interpretation which has been placed on that section uniformly ever since the section was enacted, and the income tax division has been very, very careful not to permit from salaries a deduction for the expenses of earning the salary. They have had hundreds of thousands of claims in the course of their administration for just such expenses by persons, for instance, who have had to move from one place to another in order to take a position and who have claimed the removal expenses as part of the costs of earning the new salary; and claims from persons who find it inconvenient, impracticable, in some cases impossible to move their families from where they have been living to the situs of the new job and who have claimed the expenses which they have had to incur at the situs of the new job as expenses in earning the salary. There are multitudinous cases where claims have been put in by wage-earners and by salaried earners, by those in receipt of fixed amounts, all of which are ascertainable and capable of computation, and they have all been disallowed through the years, just as they have been disallowed in the case of members of parliament. They have been disallowed on this ground, I think, that if I take a job in Montreal, and I continue to live in Ottawa, and have to travel from Ottawa to Montreal and have my expenses in Montreal, I must have taken that into account when I took the job, and the salary of the job is presumed to be sufficiently attractive to cover those additional expenses, which are not allowed as a deduction from salary.

It is an entirely different matter if I am engaged in a trade or business. It may be argued that "trade or business" includes profession or salaried occupation; but here again the income tax division have been thoroughly consistent and uniform throughout in ruling that "trade or business" does not include salaried positions; they regard that as meaning trade or business in a different sense. The line is very fine, but they have tried to draw it between what they called trade or business on the one hand, and salary which is not a trade or business on the other. Most unfortunately it seems to run through the railway employees, and that is the reason for the difficulty which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned this evening, and which involves us in this situation, that persons on a mileage basis are regarded as not in receipt of wages, salary or other fixed amount; yet persons on a monthly basis are regarded as persons in receipt of wages, salaries or other fixed amount; and therefore a deduction is allowed under section 5, subsection 3, in the one case and is not allowed in the other case. I mention that to show how difficult it is to draw a line between those in the class of trade or business where the profit, gain or gratuity is not ascertained and capable of computation, on the one side of the line, and those on the other side of the line where that profit, gain or gratuity is ascertained.

That, as I say, has been the practice through the years. As to members of parliament, I am dealing with the matter just as it is, factually, and not expressing any views as to what ought to be done, and whether the law should be changed. But this is the fact, that all of us who have run elections—I have run them since 1926—have done so on the basis that the income tax division was applying that rule of taxation to the sessional indemnity. I knew at the time I accepted nomination in 1926, again in 1930, again in 1935, again in 1940, that I would get $4,000; perhaps for a few years in the thirties we got less. I knew that I was not entitled to any deduction because of my expenses. The fact that I elected to keep up two establishments, one in Nova Scotia and another one here, was the basis on which I took the position; it was the basis on which I was elected; it was the basis on which I was taxed before the war and through the war, and there has been no change whatever in the basis of taxation.

The question now arises, should that rule be changed? If it is to be changed there are two ways in which this could be done. We could make a special case for representatives of the public; and I do not think we can confine it to elected representatives of the public, I think it would have to apply to members of the senate and, of course, to members of upper chambers. There is an upper chamber in one of the provinces. I think it would certainly have to apply to members of the lower chambers in the various provinces. Also we have had complaints from municipal councils whose members have to be away part of the time to attend municipal council meetings; they have claimed some deduction as well. I do not think we could apply it to this house alone. Nobody this afternoon had his mind on any body of persons but the body of persons within these four walls.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did not mention it, but we all recognized it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nobody mentioned anybody else.

Mr. McGEER: Nobody suggested for a moment that this adjustment should be limited to the House of Commons.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nobody mentioned anything else.

Mr. McGEER: I dealt with the incomes of the lower brackets.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard mentioned the exemptions for the lower brackets, but without any application whatever to allowance of expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we all had in mind that they would have to be treated as a class.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right.

Mr. ADAMSON: I mentioned the taxation in Australia, I think, as being specifically—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I believe every hon. member is anxious to conduct the debate in an orderly manner, and I ask the cooperation of the members in respecting the rules regarding debate. In Beauchesne, 2nd edition, page 103, I find citation 312, as follows:

> Whilst a member is addressing the house, no one has a right to interrupt him by putting a question to him, or by making or demanding an explanation. A member will at times allow such interruptions through a sense of courtesy to another, but it is entirely at the option of the member in possession of the floor to give way or not to an immediate explanation.

I hope hon. members will try to abide by this rule.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I was saying is that there are two ways, if anything is done in this matter, by which it can be handled. One is to make a special case for members of public bodies, and the other is to make a somewhat far-reaching change in our income tax system. Speaking only for myself, I am not enthusiastic about making a far-reaching change in our income tax system, because I do not see much wrong with that system at the present time or the rule upon which it has operated through the years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I prefer not. I find that when I am interrupted I cannot, for some reason, swing back to where I was when I was interrupted. I have listened to everybody—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I question the minister when he is through?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The minister does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all right for the hon. member to ask his question when I am through.

I said, I think, that speaking for myself I would shrink from taking a step which would mean a fairly far-reaching change in the principles of the taxation system as laid down in that section and adhered to all through the years. Certainly it is a matter to which very careful attention would have to be given, because there is no essential injustice that I can see in the principles of the system as they exist. It may be that a special case can be made. It may be on the ground that the getting of young men into public life is so important, or because the indemnity is not very generous compared with the indemnity in the United States, and because it is not an attractive career financially—it may be that for reasons like that we ought to apply a rule here which we do not apply outside throughout the length and breadth of the country. But through this war I have thought that we should be terribly careful before we did things like that.

Since the fall of 1941 we have had in effect a ceiling policy with regard to wages, salaries and prices. It has been a bitter fight to try to hold those controls. We are told, when we warn about the dangers of inflation and great and vast price rises, that these can be controlled: "It is evident that they can be controlled, because you controlled them". It has been a most unpleasant and disagreeable task trying to control these things, and we have made all kinds of enemies in doing so; but the fact is that those who were in receipt of certain salaries in the fall of 1941 are for the most part in receipt of the same salaries, and yet we have moved in on them with higher and higher taxes until they are caught between the salary ceiling on one side and high taxes on the other. The general principle of war finance in that respect has been that those upon whom high taxes have been placed should really bear high taxes. They should not be enabled in some way or another to get higher remuneration of one kind or another in such a way as to leave themselves in just as good a position as before, to have their standard of living in the same shape as before. We thought that was necessary, being in the straits we were in so far as the war is concerned. We must be careful that those who are caught in that vise of high taxes and frozen salaries will not say to us, the representatives of the people: "You found an out for yourselves by the simple device of freeing a part of your salary or indemnity from taxation." I should not call it salary, because it is not a salary, but it is treated in the act, so far as I can see, just as if it were.

Mr. JACKMAN: If we treated it as a salary we would be allowed cost of living expense out of it.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. JACKMAN: He allowed me to say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman will develop that later, I hope, because if it were treated as salary then certainly—

Mr. JACKMAN: Covering a trade or business, I understand.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a different matter. A trade or business is something that yields a profit, which is quite different from a salary. If this were treated as salary it certainly would not be subject to deduction for expenses such as is asked for to-day; that is, if the universal ruling of the income tax division has been correct. I am merely placing these considerations before the committee. I do not think I have shied from this problem from lack of courage. I have been accused of that this afternoon most roughly, while, on the other hand, certain members have been most kind, and in that regard I wish to mention particularly the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). Certainly I have not shied away from it through lack of courage, because I have had to do a great many unpopular things in the last three or four years and I have not refrained from doing them if I thought they ought to be done. I have been, however, very hesitant about this, out of a sense of responsibility, as the hon. member for Trinity observed; and I think we must all have that sense of responsibility. The confidence of the public in their elected representatives must be maintained, and we must not do anything which would give rise justifiably to the accusation that we are treating ourselves better than we are treating the heavily taxed, patriotic public of Canada. If anything is done about this—and I am not shutting out the possibility of it at all—I do not think it should be done for the members of the present parliament. I am giving that as my personal opinion. If I change my mind on that I shall simply have to say that I have changed my mind, but I do not think it should be done on behalf of the present members of parliament. Most of the arguments to-day have been that the reason for the change is to provide that persons coming into parliament in the future, persons now in the armed forces and elsewhere, may find that it is financially possible for them to do so. That consideration at least will be weighed if any change is made with respect to members of another parliament.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to ask the minister a question or two, and I think I speak for the house when I say that we appreciate his frank expression of opinion. It was exactly what most of us expected him to say. First of all, I wish the minister would inform me whether any ruling has ever been given by the deputy minister of taxation, stating that members' indemnity is not subject to taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to give this as a notice of motion, so to speak, because we have that letter. I wish the minister would check up on that and find out if that ruling has ever been given. When he is giving his answer, will he give an explanation for the change in that ruling. That is the first question. I appreciate the fact that he cannot answer it offhand and, as I say, I am giving this as a notice. The second question can also be regarded as a notice, because the minister probably has not the information here. I should like to know whether any of those who are commonly known as dollar a year men, lent by different firms to various departments, have been allowed to deduct living expenses from their income tax? If the minister cannot answer that question offhand I should like to get the answer later.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I know the story about dollar a year men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the first question?

Mr. ILSLEY: The first question was whether an opinion had ever been given that indemnities were not subject to income tax. The answer is no. I have never heard of such an opinion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not ask whether the minister had ever heard of it. There are many records that he has never heard of. I asked whether a ruling had ever been given by the deputy minister of taxation to the effect I have stated. I do not expect the minister to answer that question now; I simply want to find out whether such a ruling has been given by the official in question, that indemnity is not subject to taxation. I have seen the letter. I cannot produce it now; I do not happen to have it. If any of the hon. gentlemen around me are satisfied with the present rate they can speak for themselves, but I know I am speaking for a good many members of the house. The other question is this: Are what are commonly known as dollar a year men, on loan to departments, paying income tax on their per diem expenses, living expense amounting to $20 or $25 a day, or are they allowed to deduct that? I do not ask the minister to answer that now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can answer both questions. The answer to the first is no. The deputy minister of taxation is sitting before me; I am touching him now—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do not touch him too heavily.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and he tells me that he has never given such an opinion. In regard to the second question, with reference to so-called dollar a year men taxed on a per diem allowance, the answer is yes. If the hon. gentleman says, was there ever a case where they were not—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Be careful.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not have to be careful I know there have been cases where they were not, and I covered that whole situation in 1940 and 1941. I made a statement in the house on it and put it in the bill. I think it was in the act—

Mr. KNOWLES: Last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: —covering the whole situation, and gave the reasons for it. The situation was that some came in on the understanding that it would be taxed and others came in on the understanding that it would not be taxed. For a period we made good our undertaking with respect to those by whom it was understood that it would not be taxed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister for his explanation, with which I do not agree entirely, for it is not in accordance with the information that was given me by the chairman of the committee, who fought out this matter last year and who produced the letter. That hon. gentleman does not happen to be here at the present time, so that I accept the minister's explanation. You need not read the rule to me, Mr. Chairman; I do not want to be ruled out of order every time I ask a question, but the minister's explanation is not in accordance with the letter I was shown. I want the minister and his deputies to be very careful about this. Do I understand now that in 1942 or 1943 no one was allowed to deduct his living expenses, under written authority from the deputy minister? That is a straight question. If the minister would prefer to have it stand as a notice, I am quite prepared to do so. I am asking him if no one was allowed to deduct living expenses in connection with his 1942 or 1943 income tax. I believe the minister has been misinformed by his deputy.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer I gave in that regard was not based on anything told me by the deputy; that is in regard to the so-called dollar a year men. My answer to that question was based on my own knowledge of the situation. I covered the whole thing in the house last year by legislation. What was done in administration after that, of course I do not know.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I accept the minister's explanation; in other words, the deduction was allowed. I know it was.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not have any reason for knowing that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do. Hon. members need not come in from behind the curtains. I am prepared to stay here, in spite of the provincial election campaigns, even if other hon. members are not. I should preface my next question by saying that I appreciate the fact that the minister cannot give special consideration to certain classes, members of parliament, commercial travellers or anyone else, without changing the whole system of income tax collection, but what I am going to ask has been referred to by several hon. members to-day. Will the minister not agree that action could be taken by giving members of parliament the same consideration in regard to motorcar allowance that is given cabinet ministers, without interfering with the general income tax law. That is a straight question. The minister has very ably brought in the situation of the salaried worker, the man here and the man there in receipt of salaries. The minister asks why we should bring some special benefit only to ourselves. In other words, for the sake of the newspapers, and the bad publicity we might receive, we must discriminate against ourselves; we must always consider these men on salaries. I am asking the minister if he will not give us this consideration, which will not interfere with the general income tax law. I ask him if a member of parliament could not be permitted to regard $2,000 of his indemnity as a motorcar allowance. I am informed by some of the best lawyers, both in this chamber and in the other place, that this could be done without interfering with any existing legislation. The other question I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not go so fast. With regard to the motorcar allowance I repeat what I have stated before, that ministers have been taxed during the war on exactly the same basis and in exactly the same way as they have been taxed ever since the motorcar allowance was put into force, in 1932 or 1933. Of course, if this parliament wish to carve out part of the indemnity of hon. members, call that a motorcar allowance and make it free of taxation, there is nothing to prevent it from doing so, but the same considerations apply in that connection as apply to setting apart a portion of an hon. member's indemnity as a living allowance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would not be meeting the situation squarely.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate the minister's remark; but if parliament does not want to do that, then parliament has no complaint and certainly I have no complaint, for the majority must rule. I want to make my point clear. I am not complaining about the salaries of the cabinet ministers. At least five of them could make four times what they are receiving now if they were in private life, so that I have no complaint whatever about their salaries. I am asking why we, as private members, who do more running around in one month than any cabinet minister does in seven, should not be entitled to have half our indemnity classed as a motorcar allowance. The best lawyer we have in British Columbia, one of the best in Canada, who sits in that other chamber I am not allowed to mention tells me it can be done. Why can we not have $2,000 of our allowance classed as a motorcar allowance? If the minister says that he is agreeable, nothing in this world can stop it. If he is agreeable, it will be law to-morrow.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman is serious—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am serious.

Mr. ILSLEY: To put the position of the member on the same basis as that of a minister, a car allowance would have to be voted in addition to the indemnity. The indemnity could be reduced—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That's it.

Mr. ILSLEY: —if hon. members wanted to reduce it; but the allowance would have to be voted in addition to the indemnity, and if it were voted in addition to the indemnity and were put in statutory form it would be free of taxation. But just the same you would be changing, during the war, the basis of pay and the basis of taxation that existed before the war.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would you be agreeable to that, then? Would the minister be agreeable to having our indemnity reduced by $2,000, and having $2,000 voted as a motorcar allowance?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be doing indirectly what we should do directly.

Mr. McGEER: Will the minister agree to do it if a resolution is passed by the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: A resolution—

Mr. McGEER: Take your whip off and let us resolve on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under our constitution a resolution for the expenditure of money cannot emanate from the house.

Mr. McGEER: It can if you introduce the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: It certainly can.

Mr. McGEER: Then why not do it?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not the question the hon. gentleman asked.

Mr. McGEER: I asked if you would do it if the house passed a resolution. Your answer was that no private member can offer such a resolution, that it has to come from the treasury benches. You could introduce it yourself.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is simply asking whether the government will—

Mr. McGEER: Bow to the expressed will of parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just where it has been expressed.

Mr. McGEER: You have heard it from all over this chamber to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman made a sharp turn there. First he asked whether, if this parliament passed a resolution, the government would carry it out. I am pointing out to him that only the government could introduce such a resolution. Then the hon. gentleman switches his position and says, "Will you introduce the resolution?"

Mr. McGEER: But my sharp turn was only to catch up to your circle.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is doubtful whether the hon. member caught up.

Mr. McGEER: Well, anybody who catches up to the minister on a sharp turn will have to go fast.

Mr. JACKMAN: The dilemma in which the government seems to find itself may be resolved, if I can put before the committee the following, which I shall attempt at least, by way of two propositions. First of all, the effect of increased taxation since the war where the expense allowance is not incurred, or is not an actual expense. That is the first proposition I wish to illustrate to the committee. Second, where the expense is incurred, but where there is no deduction in arriving at the net taxable income, after allowance for expenses.

The first refers to the motorcar allowance of the ministers, and the second refers to the predicament in which hon. members find themselves. The ministers receive $2,000 as a statutory motorcar allowance. As to the justice or injustice of that, I shall not say anything at the present time, except that probably some ministers cannot spend that $2,000 to-day. They cannot replace their cars, and cannot use very much gasoline.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The ministers can; they have a high rating.

Mr. JACKMAN: If they are patriotic—and I would assume they are—they cannot. Most of the ministers cannot possibly spend $2,000. This $2,000 is not $2,000 any more; it is now $6,000. The ministers get their ordinary indemnity of $4,000, and a salary of $10,000, making $14,000. If a man in that bracket wishes to get $2,000 extra which he can spend, he has to get an additional $6,000, or a total of $20,000, in order to have $2,000 extra above the $14,000.

Therefore that $2,000 has become magnified into $6,000, because of war taxation. Now, then, what is the obverse of that, namely, the condition in which members find themselves? It is simply this, that members get along on the $4,000 indemnity prior to the war, even with, let us say $1,500 expenses. It might be said to be $2,000 of legitimate expense, which had nothing to do with the cost of elections. Those were simply out-of-pocket expenses in connection with being in Ottawa and earning an indemnity. We will say it was $1,500. But we now find that the tax on this $1,500, which $1,500 we do not retain, has risen from year to year, so that the tax is $750 on something we do not get.

Therefore we may say that whereas we received $4,000 in years prior to the war, on which we paid a negligible tax, and which was available for members with which to keep themselves both here and in their constituencies, they now find that they have $1,500 of expenses, and on that expense, being bracketed between $2,500 and $4,000, there is a tax of approximately fifty per cent, or $750.

So that the ordinary member who is relying on his indemnity has $4,000 gross, and $1,500 as expenses, reducing it to $2,500. And on that $1,500 expense is a further tax of $750. He has about $1,750 left to keep himself. So that you have a position where the minister getting $2,000 more as an allowance, is to-day getting the equivalent of $6,000, whereas the member who was paying out a certain amount of money, for which he got no allowance or reduction at all, finds that the taxation on that expenditure has gone up from nothing to $750, and his situation in those circumstances has been rendered more difficult.

The parliamentary assistant said that he knew he was going to get $4,000 when he was nominated to come here in 1940. That applies to all of us. It was possible at that time, probably, for us to live on that amount. But to-day it is impossible, with the incidence of heavy taxation, to live on what is left. So that no poor man can possibly live on what is left, and members of the house are in the position in which no other worker, whether he be a wage-earner or a salaried man finds himself to-day. If the minister has any information to the contrary, I should like to have it.

This is a situation which cries out for some alleviation—I might almost say cries out for mercy. But, whether or not anything is done for us this year makes very little difference. I might say just this, that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said that in coming here he was out to the extent of $575, I believe it was, each year, taking $1,000 off his election expenses, which he paid. I paid my own election expenses, with the exception of $800, which was provided by friends—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Oh, oh.

Mr. JACKMAN: —and unsolicited, may I say to the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario. I find myself serving, after taxation, at a net loss, each year. That will not influence me in making up my mind as to whether or not I shall run again, but it is unfair to a general class of people who might accept nominations to enter the House of Commons. If they were given some relief from the present situation, whereby they got part of their indemnity allowed for expenses, more citizens would be encouraged to offer themselves for parliament.

The situation is just as difficult for members as it is easy for ministers of the crown.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask a question of the minister.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Peterborough West has the floor.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was not going to speak on this subject. When that discussion has concluded, I shall speak on the item.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I have a double motive in the question I am about to ask the minister. While he was speaking he said, if I remember correctly, that during the period of the war there had been no change in the application of the rule with regard to deductions for expenses from certain kinds of income. As an example he quoted a case to which I had referred, namely, the distinction drawn between sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters on the one hand and trainmen, firemen, engineers and train conductors on the other. He pointed out that the interpretation given by the income tax division with respect to this rule ran right through a trade in this instance. I regret I have not my files before me, so that I cannot give the year in question, but I know that Canadian National Railways sleeping-car conductors in Winnipeg were allowed these deductions at one time. I believe they were allowed them up to the taxation year 1941, and possibly the year 1942. I cannot say as to the latter. But a change has been made in their case.

I believe the change came about in this fashion, that the Winnipeg office allowed a deduction in those earlier years, but that more recently, either last year or this year, the allowance made in Winnipeg was rejected by the head office at Ottawa. In any event it appears, if my information is correct, that there was a change made in the application of rules, so far as Canadian National sleeping-car conductors are concerned.

I said earlier that I had a double motive in asking my question. On the one hand I am interested in the subject which has been before the committee this evening, and I am asking whether, if a change has been made in one case, why it cannot be made in another. I am also anxious to know if that change was made, and, if so, why it had to be made to the detriment of this particular group to which I have referred.

Mr. ILSLEY: The deputy minister tells me that it was merely a correction of error in bringing the treatment of certain employees in line with the treatment of others in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was an error before?

Mr. ILSLEY: There was an error in one of the local offices.

Mr. HAZEN: Has there been a legal opinion obtained on the Income War Tax Act as it affects the indemnity of members of parliament? Has an opinion been obtained either by the minister's department or the Department of National Revenue from the Department of Justice or any other legal branch of the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the minister have any objection to putting that opinion on the record? I am thinking particularly of section 3 which says that income means the actual net profit or gain or gratuity. To me it is puzzling.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think my department ever got any such opinion, but I believe the Department of National Revenue did. I do not think opinions ordinarily are produced unless the government has no objection and I shall have to talk the matter over with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would rather press the minister to give us that opinion if there is no insuperable objection. I should like to say one word with respect to the suggestion emanating, I believe, from the hon. member for Fraser Valley that, by means of a regulation or some other method, $2,000 of the indemnity could be treated as a motorcar allowance and the indemnity reduced accordingly. I hesitate to associate myself with a move of that kind, because that would be doing indirectly what you were refusing to do directly and I do not like that approach. I do not like the suggestion and I would not favour it.

Mr. FRASER, (Northumberland): I do not wish to prolong the debate in connection with sessional indemnities, but I should like to make one or two observations. Apparently this afternoon I made the statement that the minister lacked courage, and I want to say that that was in reference only to this particular question. A woman may be very much afraid of a mouse but still have the courage to face death.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or her husband.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Or her husband. This is just a case of not having the courage to face this matter. I would be the last one to insinuate that the Minister of Finance has not plenty of courage. I do not suppose there has ever been a minister of finance who has been faced with problems that demanded as much courage as those faced by the present minister. I have no intention of making any reflection upon his courage, except as I said a minute ago.

It is galling to members of parliament when they see these controllers and government officials who are appointed not by the civil service commission but by orders in council, ex-bank managers, ex-brokers, chaps who have been square pegs in round holes, many of them receiving far more than members of parliament and working only five days a week and about six hours a day. They are travelling to and fro all the time cluttering up our trains. As was mentioned by an hon. member across the floor to-night, they receive living allowances that are not taxed. I do not think we should blind ourselves to that fact.

Some of us who have spent a part of our lives doing what we thought was the proper thing in connection with public service should not be blamed for prolonging this debate this afternoon and evening in order to place before the public the exact financial position of members of parliament. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that not one voter in a hundred realizes that a member of parliament pays his own living expenses in Ottawa, and, in many cases, maintains two homes.

The minister has stated that to do what is suggested would constitute a change in the application of taxation during the war, but the hon. member for Rosedale pointed out that war-time taxation has changed the whole picture. It has shoved many members into different brackets, and it leaves many members with very little with which to maintain their homes or with which to pay their expenses in Ottawa. I think the members have a justifiable case, and I suggest to the minister that he scrutinize carefully the whole matter. As I said a minute ago, there are many officials of the wartime prices and trade board who are running around the country like Greyhound buses and who are allowed living expenses exempt from taxation.

I rose simply to make those two observations, the one in connection with the Minister of Finance and the other to point out that we have a justifiable case. I do not think there will be any change, because I believe the minister has made up his mind, but we have served a purpose by informing the people across Canada that members of parliament are at least not overpaid. We have made it known to the voters of this country that we pay an income tax on our expenses in Ottawa, which means that in effect we pay $2 for every $1 we pay to a hotel.

Mr. ILSLEY: While I was speaking I did not say one word to indicate that I had any appreciation of the difficulties of hon. members, but I certainly have a deep appreciation of those difficulties. I know it is very hard for some hon. members. I was dealing with the thing on a historical or factual basis, but I did not say that some change should not be made. However, my present belief is that it should not be made for the present members of parliament.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If hon. members are all through I think it would be wise if we got down to the first item. When hon. members were talking about their indemnity I was surprised that they did not mention the fact that for the last month we have been suffering from the heat in this chamber. It has been almost 100 degrees in here every day and we have had to put up with it. That temperature obtained not only in the chamber but also in the committee rooms and offices. When you went into them in the morning the temperature was almost unbelievable.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is pretty hot in Africa.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is not from the speeches; it is the heat of the building. The first resolution deals with the refundable portion, and the last two lines read:

> . . . and that for 1945 the total tax on individuals be reduced by the full amount of the refundable portion thereof, less credits for savings.

Why should "credits for savings" be in there if there is to be no refundable portion? What are you going to take out?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is really a technical explanation. Section 7A provides for the deduction from the aggregate tax of payments into any superannuation, retirement or pension fund, premiums on life insurance policies and so on. The section makes no difference, so far as the deduction is concerned, between the pure tax and the compulsory savings. In fact, the whole tax is classified as tax. So that if you are taking out a portion of the tax which represents the refundable portion, which is half the tax in the case of the smaller taxpayers and a maximum of ten per cent in the case of the higher taxpayers, you must at the same time deduct the insurance premiums, superannuation and mortgage payments which the taxpayer would otherwise be entitled to deduct as well from his tax. It may be that in revising the section of the law for 1945, another section may be drafted, eliminating this reference to deductions on account of particular savings. It is purely a technical matter. In allowing the removal from the total tax of the savings portion you have also to eliminate the provision for taking members of the house this session. What I credit for the voluntary savings such as life insurance premiums and mortgage payments made by the taxpayer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is misleading to the taxpayer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree. It misled me when I read it first and I had to ask for an explanation from the officials. The resolution is misleading, but my hon. friend will find that it will be made clear when the legislation comes down.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The resolution reads, in the first part:

> That for 1944 the total tax on individuals be reduced by one-half the amount of the refundable portion thereof, less one-half credits for savings.

Do these savings have to come in the first half of the year, or can they be spread over the whole year?

Mr. ABBOTT: They are spread over the whole year. The tax period is the twelve months period. The savings, therefore, are the savings which are made during the tax period. In other words, if your mortgage payment happens to fall due on November 1, it would still be available but only to the extent of one-half in the year 1944.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A different impression was left on my mind by the minister's budget speech. I am glad to have that point cleared up, because I had the impression that the thing automatically stopped on the first day of July and that you could only offset against that, accruals in the form of mortgage payments, life insurance premiums and so on that occurred in the interim. But the parliamentary assistant has made that quite clear. I think that is a concession.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the misunderstanding arose because it is the withholdings which are cut from the first day of July.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask if the department will give consideration to the suggestion I made with respect to the assignability of this amount to the credit of taxpayers by a husband and wife to one another and to dependents. I think that is a reasonable suggestion and should be complied with. I am not going to argue the reasons for it since I have already given them as simply and as concisely as I could. I do not think there could be any valid objection to doing it, and I can see quite a good deal in its favour.

I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but with respect to the question that we have debated all day the Minister of Finance did not quite close the door, but gave it as his opinion that he was not favourable to giving any such consideration to the members of the house this session. What I should like him to say to the committee is that he will review with his colleagues the debate that has taken place here to-day, give it sympathetic consideration and see if something cannot be done to alleviate the situation which members universally feel demands some kind of relief. I believe that the membership of this house is 100 per cent in favour of some kind of relief being given. That is the last word I have to say on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I will review the debate to-day with my colleagues and with the government give the requests that have been made consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And you will let us know?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does the minister know of certain other cases where there is an item of expenses that could be a proper deduction in arriving at the true income which was taxable? He rather implied that in the debate this afternoon. I cannot recall any such cases myself. It must be admitted that members have to incur expenses before arriving at the true income from their indemnities. Are there somewhat similar cases? I thought we were exceptional.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are the cases which I put. There are many cases where persons at least have argued that they have to incur expenses in order to earn the salary that they are paid.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are they as clear as our case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would think just as clear, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: What are they?

Mr. ILSLEY: Their case is not quite as clear as some members think, because these expenses that are incurred are living expenses, and living expenses ordinarily are not regarded as expenses in earning an income. I am not making any statement to-night as to what the law is. I am simply going on what the uniform interpretation has been by the income tax division. Even they may have been wrong; I do not know. I think opinions have been given by lawyers that the expenses could be deducted because members of parliament were similar to a trade or business, or for some other reason. But even if that hurdle were taken, the question remains whether hotel expenses and restaurant expenses and room expenses that a person incurs are expenses incurred in earning the indemnity. I suppose that, strictly speaking, a member could change his place of residence during the time of the session if he wished to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would not help him at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask a question with respect to this item. The minister has indicated that the withdrawal of the compulsory savings feature will result in an annual loss of revenue to the government of about $110,000,000. That would seem to indicate that there has been some figuring done about this, and I am wondering if the minister can give any break-down of that $110,000,000 among the various income brackets.

The reason why I ask that question is this. The minister and the Minister of Justice, in opposing the idea of raising the income tax exemption levels, pointed out, and I say quite rightly, that unless you make adjustments in the tax rates it would mean a greater saving to those in the upper income brackets than to those for whose benefit the proposal was made. The point we tried to make was that if you raise the income tax exemption levels you would have to adjust the rates in the upper brackets, and we asked that that be done. The minister has made it clear that it was not his policy to give greater relief to those in the upper brackets than to those in the lower brackets, and I am wondering if he can tell us how the two classes would be affected here. Is it not the case—or has he figures to refute what I am saying?—that the greater part of this $110,000,000 of relief will go to those in the upper income brackets?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be very hard to make an estimate as between income groups. Everyone who is acquainted with the matter believes that it is the taxpayers in the highest income groups who have the offsets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I tried to suggest.

Mr. KNOWLES: That may be. That is the reason why I was asking whether the minister had the figures or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is true that after you hit a certain medium income taxpayer, for the most part the people above that are not having any compulsory savings deducted, because it is covered by insurance premiums and payments of that kind. Therefore the cash benefit of removing the compulsory savings is, we think, largely in the low income groups.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the theory I advanced myself—although, of course, I had no data to come and go on—for the same reason the minister is now giving. I should like to point out that it is coming under my observation that old people nearing the age of sixty-five, in the higher income tax brackets, who have no mortgages against their property and no life insurance, have to pay up, and I have the most strenuous objection from that class. I have an instance in my own connection of a lady who most strenuously objected to this income tax because, she said, she would never see the money; she hated to pay it, and she was not going to buy any victory bonds because this money was being taken from her. After all, it is just a guess on the part of the department and the minister. There is no calculation.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is the theory, based on the reasons which have been suggested. All right.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That dependents as referred to in the said act be extended to include parents-in-law, grandparents-in-law, brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law in the same circumstances and subject to the same conditions as parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters respectively.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know what considerations actuated the minister in bringing in all this "in-law". I remember pleas made here last year, and probably in previous years, for the mother-in-law, and in a good many cases there was a great deal of merit in those requests. But why in the world should a taxpayer be permitted an allowance for his son-in-law unless it can be shown that he cannot support himself? I do not believe anybody ever asked that this long list of exemptions be added. My recollection is that it was the older people who could not support themselves and had to be supported by in-laws for whom consideration was being asked. When you get down to sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law I think you are going the limit. I am willing that the older people should be taken care of, that an allowance should be granted to the taxpayer for his mother-in-law or his father-in-law or his grandparents-in-law, but I think the minister owes us some explanation for having taken in sons-in-law. If I had a son-in-law who could not support himself I would kick him out and make him go to work; that is what would happen to him; and to give a tax exemption for a son-in-law, unless there is some specific class of reasons of which I am not aware, seems to me objectionable. I believe every hon. member who gives consideration to the clause will say that this is opening the door too far.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am half convinced by what the hon. gentleman says. These are made parallel to the—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For the sake of uniformity.

Mr. ILSLEY: —parents, sisters, sons and daughters. I should like to let that stand, to consider that "sons-in-law."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have gone too far, I think.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does it not say, "subject to the same conditions"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, they have to be dependent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Dependent sons-in-law.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is my trouble.

Mr. COLDWELL: May not a son-in-law be an invalid?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He might.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not that the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let it stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What we wanted to do was to take care of the poor old mother-in-law. That is what we were trying to do before.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): With regard to "brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law," after this war, in fact at the present time, a great number of these people are or will be between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one. Under item 2 of the 1943 tax form I find it says, "son, daughter, grand-child, brother or sister between eighteen and twenty-one years of age any time in 1943 who attended a secondary school or university or other educational institute during that year." There might be such cases, and there is no doubt that they should be looked after, because the son or the daughter might be overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the state is looking after those.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It may be looking after them, but there are many cases where boys and girls have returned, and in the event of the death of the husband there should be some consideration given, for educational purposes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before you leave the item it seeems to me that this is the only resolution among the number before us on which I can ask a question which was raised by at least three hon. members during the debate on the budget motion; I refer to the question of an allowance to parents of student nurses under the reference just quoted by the hon. member for Peterborough West with regard to educational institutions. It is a matter about which I wrote some time ago to the Minister of National Revenue and also to the Minister of Finance, and as I say, other hon. members joined me in speaking about it during the main debate; they are not in the chamber just now, or I am sure they would support me in asking this question. I know the answer that is made, namely, that these student nurses are supposed to receive certain remuneration and certain assistance while they are in training. But the parents of all of them, at least those who have written me, are terribly conscious of the expenses to which they are put in order to assist their daughters in going through for the nursing profession. I have in mind also the fact that the government considers in its whole taxation policy the things which are desirable, such as full production and the encouragement of people to go in for professions which are needed. Here is a very important and necessary profession, and parents who have written me in cases like this feel quite discouraged because they are not allowed an exemption for daughters between eighteen and twenty-one attending nursing schools. They claim that this should be granted under the heading of "educational institutions," and I feel they are right. Could the minister make a statement on the matter?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Representations having been made to me by students, I wrote to the department in fulfilment of a promise I made, and I received the answer, if I recall rightly, that it was a question of degree. When students over eighteen years of age go to college the expense is much more substantial—travelling, clothing, board and lodging. Students in a nursing school get board and lodging free, and washing as well, but the allowance is pitiful. At least, that is my experience in a hospital I know something about. While nurses are in training they do not get enough to clothe them.

An hon. MEMBER: Some of them do not get anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would be astonished if there were nursing schools now where they do not get anything, because these girls work strenuously and work long hours. I have observed them as a patient in a hospital and I know exactly what the labour is. It is a question of degree of drain on the parents and I quite agree that the situations are different. Nevertheless the principle is the same. Perhaps some limited allowance should be made for this and I should like to know the reaction of the department. I add my voice to that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because of the insistence of some of my own constituents who have experienced some difficulty in this matter. There is a great shortage of nurses and we ought to encourage nursing. We are encouraging doctors to go into the army, and we might encourage girls to go into nursing schools on the same theory by which we are helping the doctors. There is some merit in the matter and, as I stated, in my opinion, it is just a matter of degree.

Mr. COLDWELL: While, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury says, it is a matter of degree, the girls who go in for nursing are engaged for the whole year, whereas many of the students who go to university are able during the summer vacation to assist in the payment of university fees. The girls who are nursing are employed the full year and they receive a very small amount. If you inquire at the hospitals you will find that it is usually about $10 a month, and out of that there are certain levies that are made by the hospital, which reduces it to about half that amount.

An hon. MEMBER: In some cases to nothing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. If a girl happens to break a thermometer or some other equipment she must pay for it, and quite often the girls find that at the end of the month they have nothing coming to them. The parents have to buy their uniforms when they go in—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And boots.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and they must clothe them throughout the course, which is three years. There is a very strong case, apart altogether from the necessity of encouraging girls to go into the nursing profession, for the treatment of girls in training as students in other educational institutions are treated. I add my words to those that have already been spoken in this regard.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the budget debate the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) spoke on the matter. I followed him, and at page 4506 of Hansard I read from a letter in which the statement was made that at Kingston the student received no allowance, so that the parents pay for clothing and other necessities.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is true of Toronto.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There are other places where the nurses get nothing at all. There should be some allowance for that, because the parents have to supply them with clothing and look after their laundry.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is quite a difference between the responsibility that the parent has to assume in the case of a child in a university and in the case of a daughter training as a nurse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only in degree.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the daughter goes to university the parent supporting her pays for board and lodging and tuition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And books.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and books. Of course, the child going to university gets no pay.

Mr. JACKMAN: On holidays of course.

Mr. ILSLEY: As regards the daughter training as a nurse, she gets board and lodging, and tuition is provided, so that she is not a dependent to anything like the same degree as in the other case. I think I am correct in saying that for a child over twenty-one attending university there is no allowance as a dependent. What I am saying is that you cannot maintain perfection in these things. The speeches to-night would indicate that there should be some allowance. Certainly I do not see why the parents should get the same allowance for a nurse in training as for a daughter going to university. After considering the whole question, we do not think we should extend that, although there is quite a widespread demand for it. We have had a number of letters, but it opens up other classes who sooner or later would probably claim the same treatment as nurses in training. The whole field of apprenticeship comes up there.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Thursday, July 13, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN ARMY

AWARD OF VICTORIA CROSS TO MAJOR JOHN KEEFER MAHONY OF THE WESTMINSTER REGIMENT (MOTOR)

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on March 6 I had the privilege of submitting to the house the names of almost five hundred members of the Canadian Army who had been awarded honours for deeds of gallantry in this war. With the unanimous permission of the house, these names were given a permanent record on Hansard. Among the names were two recipients of the Victoria Cross, Lieutenant-Colonel Cecil Merritt and Major Paul Triquet.

A few hours ago there was announced concurrently in the United Kingdom and in Canada that another officer of the Canadian Army has been awarded this highest honour for gallantry which can be conferred on a member of the armed forces by His Majesty the King. The recipient is Major John Keefer Mahony of New Westminster, British Columbia. His regiment is the Westminster Regiment (Motor). The award to Major Mahony is for great gallantry while leading his company in establishing and holding an important bridgehead across the river Melfa in Italy.

The citation appears in a special issue of the Canada Gazette published to-day, and I am sure the house would want it recorded in Hansard. The citation reads:

The King has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross to:

Major John Keefer Mahony,
The Westminster Regiment (Motor).

On the 24th May, 1944, a company of the Westminster Regiment (Motor) under the command of Major Mahony was ordered to establish the initial bridgehead across the river Melfa. The enemy still had strong forces of tanks, self-propelled guns and infantry holding defensive positions on the east side of the river. Despite this, Major Mahony personally led his company down to and across the river, being with the leading section.

Although the crossing was made in full view of and under heavy fire from enemy machine gun posts on the right rear and left front, he personally directed each section into its proper position on the west bank with the greatest coolness and confidence. The crossing was made and a small bridgehead was established on ground where it was only possible to dig shallow weapon pits. From 15.30 hours the company maintained itself in the face of enemy fire and attack until 20.30 hours when the remaining companies and supporting weapons were able to cross the river and reinforce them. The bridgehead was enclosed on three sides by an 88 mm. self-propelled gun four hundred and fifty yards to the right, a battery of four 2 cm.

anti-aircraft guns one hundred yards to the left, a spandau one hundred yards to the left of it, to the left of the spandau a second 88 mm. self-propelled gun and approximately a company of infantry with mortars and machine guns on the left of the 88 mm. From all these weapons Major Mahony's company was constantly under fire until it eventually succeeded in knocking out the self-propelled equipment and the infantry on the left flank.

Shortly after the bridgehead had been established the enemy counter-attacked with infantry supported by tanks and self-propelled guns. The counter-attack was beaten off by the company with its piats, 2-inch mortars and number 36 grenades, due to the skill with which Major Mahony had organized his defences.

With absolute fearlessness and disregard for his own safety, Major Mahony personally directed the fire of his piats throughout this action encouraging and exhorting his men. By this time the company strength had been reduced by sixty men, and all but one of the platoon officers had been wounded. Scarcely an hour later enemy tanks formed up about five hundred yards in front of the bridgehead and in company with about a company of infantry launched a second counter-attack. Major Mahony, determined to hold the position at all costs, went from section to section with words of encouragement personally directing fire of mortars and other weapons. At one stage a section was pinned down in the open by accurate and intense machine gun fire. Major Mahony crawled forward to their position and by throwing number 77 smoke grenades, succeeded in extricating the section from its position with the loss of only one man. This counter-attack was finally beaten off with the destruction of three enemy self-propelled guns and one panther tank.

Early in the action Major Mahony was wounded in the head and twice in the leg, but he refused medical aid and continued to direct the defence of the bridgehead despite the fact that movement of any kind caused him extreme pain. It was only when the remaining companies of the regiment had crossed the river to support him that he allowed his wounds to be dressed and even then refused to be evacuated, staying instead with his company.

The forming and holding of a bridgehead across the river was vital to the whole Canadian corps action, and failure would have meant delay, a repetition of the attack, probably involving heavy losses in men, material and time and would have given the enemy a breathing space which might have broken the impetus of the corps' advance. Major Mahony, knowing this, never allowed the thought of failure or withdrawal to enter his mind and infused his spirit and determination into all his men. At the first sign of hesitation or faltering Major Mahony was there to encourage by his own example those who were feeling the strain of battle. The enemy perceived that this officer was the soul of the defence and consequently fired at him constantly with all weapons, from rifle to 88 mm. guns. Major Mahony completely ignored the enemy fire and with great courage and absolute disregard for personal danger commanded his company with such great confidence, energy and skill, that the enemy's efforts to destroy the bridgehead were all defeated.

The great courage shown by Major Mahony in this action will forever be an inspiration to his regiment and to the Canadian army.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the house and the country will join very heartily in sincere congratulations to Major Mahony and to his family and to his regiment upon this worthy recognition of his superb soldierliness.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on an occasion such as this a word of comment might properly be added to the congratulations which have been so eloquently paid to Major Mahony of the Westminster regiment. I am sure it is a matter of satisfaction and gratification to the province of British Columbia that two out of three of the Victoria Crosses which have been awarded to Canadians in this war have been awarded to men from the great coastal province. I would like to add the congratulations of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition to those which have been extended by the minister to Major Mahony and to his family and regiment.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house may I rise on this occasion to pay homage to one of Canada's great fighting men, Major John Keefer Mahony? The story of his gallent service has just been made public. Major Mahony has brought honour not only to New Westminster and British Columbia, but to all of Canada as well.

Since war started three gallant Canadian soldiers have been awarded the Victoria Cross: Lieutenant Colonel Merritt, of Vancouver; Major Paul Triquet, of Quebec, and now Major Mahony of New Westminster. It is not mere chance, Mr. Speaker, that two of Canada's Victoria Crosses have been won by men from British Columbia, and to us in New Westminster Major Mahony's achievement comes as a proud inspiration.

May I remind the house that it was a New Westminster company which was led by Major Mahony in the attack and victory obtained at the bridgehead; and so New Westminster shares a deep satisfaction in the deeds of Major Mahony and his valiant men. To gain a vital objective is a great thing; to hold on to that objective is still greater.

The achievement of Major Mahony and the men of the Westminster regiment should make those of us who remain in Canada more determined than ever to back up and support to the utmost of our strength and ability those who are fighting our battles overseas.

Briefly, I should like also to join with the people of New Westminster in congratulating

Major Mahony's family, and likewise the families of the men who fought with him and made his achievement possible. In acclaiming and recording the heroic deeds of the Westminster regiment we should not forget to sympathize with the relatives of those who fell in the battle, and likewise to wish the wounded a speedy recovery.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FLAX PROCESSING—W. R. CARPENTER (CANADA) LIMITED

Mr. BENCE:

On what date was the W. R. Carpenter (Canada) Limited flax processing plant at Vancouver, B.C., completed?

Mr. MICHAUD: The final payment was made to the contractor February 8, 1943. The work was completed a few weeks prior to that date.

WAR SUPPLIES AND SERVICES—PROFITS ON CONTRACTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER

What have been the maximum and minimum percentages or rates of profit fixed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply in each of the years 1940 to 1944 inclusive, in contracts for, (a) the production of munitions or other war supplies; (b) the supply of services, wherein provision is made granting the minister the discretion of fixing same?

Mr. MICHAUD: A categorical answer to this question would involve examination of several hundred thousand contracts and expenditure of time and staff which is not considered to be warranted at this time.

In the case of cost-plus contracts, which are those in which the minister fixes the percentages or rates of profit, the great proportion are at 5 per cent, with rates running as low as one-half of one per cent and as high, occasionally, as ten per cent, depending on a wide variety of differing circumstances. In general, this policy has remained unchanged since the inception of the department.

Services are bought almost invariably at a price fixed by competitive tender or negotiation.

See also statements of Mr. Chevrier, M.P., Hansard for June 15, 1943, pages 3644, 3645, and 3646; and for March 23, 1944, pages 1757, 1758, 1759 and 1760.

[Mr. Graydon.]

FLAX—PRICES AND BONUSES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many bushels of flax have been sold to the United States by the Canadian wheat board during the months of January to June, 1944, inclusive?

2. What was the average price per bushel in each month?

3. During said period have any bonuses on flax been paid to the processors of flax? If so, how much per bushel?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. January, 250,000 bushels; February, nil; March, nil; April, 2,998,000 bushels; May 88,168·44 bushels; June, nil.

2. January, $3 per bushel; April, $3.30 per bushel; May, $3.30 per bushel. All basis No. 1 C.W. in store Fort William/Port Arthur, Canadian funds.

3. By order in council P.C. 7325 of September 27, 1943, the Canadian wheat board is required to buy flaxseed at $2.50 per bushel for No. 1 C.W., basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur and to sell for domestic processing (to domestic crushers. feed, breakfast or cereal food manufacturers and manufacturers of pharmaceutical products) on the basis of $1.64 per bushel for No. 1 C.W., in store Fort William/Port Arthur. The board is further required to fill domestic demands before selling for export.

CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY—MCPHEE INVESTIGATION

Mr. BENCE:

1. On what date was the advisory committee, headed by Judge G. W. McPhee, appointed to recommend the mode and manner of the release, by the official custodian, of the properties taken over by the official custodian?

2. Who were the members of such committee?

3. When did they commence their work?

4. On what date were their recommendations placed before the official custodian?

5. What was the total cost incurred, as a result of the setting up of the said committee?

6. How much was paid, by way of salary and expenses, to each of the members thereof?

7. What has been done to implement the recommendations of the committee?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. October 20, 1943.

2. His Honour Judge McPhee, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, chairman; George A. Campbell, Esq., Edmonton; W. Gordon Thomson, Esq., Windsor.

3. October 25, 1943.

4. The committee made interim reports and recommendations from time to time and submitted a more comprehensive report on February 16, 1944. Supplementary reports were submitted by the chairman on specific matters at later dates.

5. $15,435.24.

6. Judge McPhee, travelling and living expenses, $3,913.35; George A. Campbell, Esq., fee $2,200; expenses $1,403.86; W. Gordon Thomson, Esq., fee $1,260; expenses $842.80.

7. (a) As reports were received properties which had been under the control of the custodian were released in accordance with the recommendations of the committee. This included 143 parcels of real estate.

(b) Claims for alleged damages to property were investigated and, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, were allowed in an amount of $10,828.70, which amount has been paid.

(c) Payments were made to municipalities for taxes in cases where the revenues had not been sufficient to cover taxes for the period the properties were under control. These payments, amounting to $16,834.40, have been made.

KINGSTON, ONT., COLD STORAGE

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. Has the dominion government paid any subsidies, loans or grants, for cold storage purposes in the city of Kingston, Ontario, since August 4, 1943?

2. If so, to whom were they paid, and on what dates?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. Kingston cold storage; October 4, 1943; $280.11.

PRISONERS OF WAR—MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has the government knowledge as to the number of Canadian merchant seamen who are presently prisoners of war in Germany? If so, how many?

2. Have any of the Canadian merchant seamen who were taken prisoners of war been repatriated? If so, what number?

3. What steps, if any, are being taken to repatriate Canadian merchant seamen presently held prisoners of war?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. (a) Personnel of ships of Canadian registry held captive in Germany, 94; (b) Canadian merchant seamen taken captive from ships of other than Canadian registry, 34.

2. (a) Personnel of ships of Canadian registry repatriated from German prison camps, 26; (b) Canadian seamen taken captive from ships of other than Canadian registry and repatriated, 13.

3. Everything possible is being done under the Geneva convention to repatriate Canadian merchant seamen detained by the enemy.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SIXTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

How much has been paid by the government and the national war finance committee to each daily newspaper in the province of Quebec in connection with the sixth victory loan campaign?

PURCHASE OF VESSEL "THE ARISTOCRAT"

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Did the government purchase a vessel named The Aristocrat?

2. If so, when and from whom?

3. What was the total purchase price of the vessel?

WOOL SUBSIDY

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is there a subsidy being paid on wool?

2. If so, does it cover all grades of wool?

3. Is the subsidy paid in all provinces?

4. If not, why is it not paid in all provinces?

FARM PRODUCTS—PRICES AND SUBSIDIES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What are the farm products that can only be sold under a price ceiling?

2. What are the farm products that are supported by a floor or minimum price?

3. What are the farm products that receive a subsidy?

LAUNDRY SERVICE IN HALIFAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Did the government since the outbreak of war take over a civilian laundry plant in the city of Halifax? If so, what is the name of such plant and on what date was it acquired?

2. What provision, if any, has been made to provide laundry services for civilians deprived of laundry service by the action of the government in taking over this laundry?

3. Is the government aware that there is an acute shortage of laundry facilities for civilians in the city of Halifax?

4. Has the Department of National Defence contracts at present with any privately owned civilian laundry operated in the city of Halifax? If so, with what laundries and what are expiration dates of present contracts?

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SALARIES OF MINISTERS OF VETERANS AFFAIRS AND RECONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Salaries Act to provide that the salaries of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and of the Minister of Reconstruction shall be ten thousand dollars, respectively.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, July 17, 1944, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPORTS AS TO KILLING OF ALLIED AIRMEN IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister take the necessary steps to make full inquiries through the protecting power into a report carried in to-day's edition of the Globe and Mail written by Ralph Allen and datelined "With the Canadians in France, July 11". A copy of this report I have already given the Prime Minister, but in order that the house may be aware of the subject matter of the report I shall read the first paragraph of it:

> Two Canadians and "several" American prisoners of war who refused to work for the German war machine were killed by their guards at Stalag IIB near Hammerstein last February, a repatriated French prisoner who was in the camp at the time of the killings said there to-day. The allied soldiers, all new arrivals from Italy, were shot in their beds when they refused to report for labour details, the French soldier asserted. A number of others, he said, were executed at various times by the staff of the same camp for trying to escape.
>
> Anyone seeking to build a larger case around recent disclosures of the massacre of allied airmen in Germany could find plenty of evidence in Caen.

I should just like to make this remark, if I may, to the Prime Minister and to the government before the Prime Minister answers my question. When one couples such a reported incident with the cold-blooded murder of Canadian and British airmen about which the Prime Minister spoke a couple of weeks ago, it makes one's blood boil and call loudly for the kind of punishment that these murderous vandals so richly deserve.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my answer to my hon. friend's question is that the report was noticed by the government when it appeared and inquiries were immediately instituted.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

2. That dependents as referred to in the said act be extended to include parents-in-law, grandparents-in-law, brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law in the same circumstances and subject to the same conditions as parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters respectively.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister was going to make a statement on this.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I do not know about a statement, Mr. Chairman. I think some question was raised last night as to the inclusion of sons-in-law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. The minister said he would like to consider the inclusion of all these in-laws. I was merely indicating the position of sons-in-law. Perhaps we could go on with another item pending the decision of the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: He has considered it, but I have no objection to going on with the next resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the minister's conclusion? We are widening out the scope of the aid given to taxpayers to include not only the direct progenitors and descendants of the taxpayer but also their collaterals and collaterals-in-law. How much demand has there been for this?

Mr. ABBOTT: During the last two or three years in particular a good many representations have been received that an allowance should be made, as my hon. friend indicated last night, particularly in the case of the mother-in-law. The position under the law is that in respect of blood relations, that is to say, son, daughter, mother, father and grandparents, if they are wholly dependent upon the taxpayer, the taxpayer may claim the tax deduction set out in rule 3 of the first chedule of the act. If the son of the taxpayer were wholly dependent upon his father for support the taxpayer could claim a deduction from his tax with respect to that son, but if, on the other hand, the taxpayer were required to maintain his daughter-in-law, as is frequently the case, he could not claim a deduction.

Similarly if a man were called upon to support his own mother, who was completely dependent on him, he could claim a tax deduction, but on the other hand if he were required, as often happens, to support his wife's mother he could not claim a tax deduction. I am advised that in certain jurisdictions—I know it is the case in my own province of Quebec—there is a legal obligation on a man to support his in-laws under certain circumstances. The primary obligation rests on the blood relation, but if the blood relation is unable to give his support, or if there is no blood relation, there is a legal obligation on the in-law to support his wife's mother. It was felt after a good deal of consideration that, whatever the legal position might be, it was certainly equitable that a man who could claim a tax credit for supporting his son should be entitled to claim a similar credit for supporting his daughter-in-law. So that the effect of the proposed amendment is to extend the tax credit not only to the blood relations but to the in-laws, though not to the collaterals, of course, as my hon. friend suggested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have never had any objection to extending this concession to the parents-in-law or to the grandparents-in-law, because presumably they may be in really dependent circumstances in a given case and they must be taken care of, although in the common law provinces there is no legal obligation I believe at all. But the extension of this alleviation to the collaterals is of course another matter. I wonder if there has been much demand for this. I understand that there was a very substantial demand to extend it to the parents-in-law and grandparents-in-law, but how much demand was there for extending it to sisters-in-law, brothers-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law? Has any estimate been made of the number involved and of the cost to the treasury?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that there has been any great demand on behalf of the other classes to which my hon. friend referred. On the other hand it was felt that in extending this to the mother-in-law, for instance, it was logical to extend it to the other in-laws. Let me give an illustration. Take the case of a man who is married and goes overseas and is killed. I suggest that in a great many cases the father of that boy would feel morally responsible at any rate to support his daughter-in-law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the nation ought to support her.

Mr. ABBOTT: She would get some pension. Perhaps a better example would be that of a young man who marries and dies before he has had the opportunity to make full provision for his family. His father for a period supports his daughter-in-law. If the son had been disabled during his lifetime the father could have claimed the tax credit, but because the son had died he is not able to do so under the law as it stands. Mind you, this concession is subject to the same restrictions which pertain with respect to the other dependents, that they must be wholly dependent and so on. This is not widening in any unlimited fashion the claim which can be made for dependents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course what the parliamentary assistant has said is an indictment of the inadequacy of the present range of pensions. That is exactly what it spells to me.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was only citing that as an example. I could have given a better illustration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The interpretation to be put on the illustration is this, that in the case of the soldier who gave his life for his country, leaving behind a daughter-in-law for his father to support, an inadequate pension is provided.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is quite correct. I am afraid that my example was unfortunate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My understanding of the position was that the demand was in respect of the parents-in-law and did not extend beyond them downwards. It might include the grandparents-in-law but not the others. I understood from a remark made by the minister yesterday that brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, were put in to carry out the parallel in the present law, for the sake of uniformity. I would like to know if there has been any real demand or any real necessity for this. If there has been, if this is justifiable on the ground of necessity, I shall not oppose it. I am favourable to granting assistance in respect to the parents-in-law, because I have known of many cases where assistance would be absolutely necessary and a deduction should be allowed. But is not this based on the theory that the department thinks there ought to be a parallel?

Mr. ABBOTT: There has been some demand, I am told, in the case particularly of men who are maintaining a daughter-in-law. That is perhaps the case which arises most frequently. But it was felt that as we are making this change in the law, it was both sound in principle and logical to extend it to all classes of in-laws. So far as I know, there has been no demand upon the government for it, but it was felt that in extending this to some classes of in-laws, which has never been done before, if we did not include them all we should inevitably create a demand from the others which it would be hard to resist on principle. They will say, "Well, you extend it to the father-in-law and the mother-in-law. I am obliged," a man will say, "to support a daughter-in-law; she has no other means of support. If she were my own daughter I could claim the tax credit, but because she is my daughter-in-law I cannot". It seems to me that that is what we should be faced with. But if the committee would prefer, we can let the section stand. The committee may prefer to have the views of the minister on it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to ask that the section stand. I am in accord with the principle of the parents' and grandparents' allowance, but I think these other collaterals stand on a different basis. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the government has made this proposal and it has to make a case in support of it. The only case I can observe is a desire to parallel the present law in respect to these in-laws.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we might let it stand; or if we want to pass the resolution it can certainly be given further consideration when we come to the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all right.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That the provision under which a tax credit is allowed in respect of a child of the taxpayer be extended to include an allowance in respect of any person under eighteen years of age and dependent upon the taxpayer for support, including an illegitimate child.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad that the government has granted the request which has been made by hon. members to make the definition of "child" wider than it was. For a number of years there has been hardship to persons who have children in their homes who have not been legally adopted. Also, of course, there is the case of the illegitimate child; some mothers with an illegitimate child have been penalized all through life. After all, the child cannot choose the circumstances under which it shall be born. This is a worth-while reform, and we approve it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in accord with what the hon. member has said with respect to children under eighteen years of age dependent upon the taxpayer for support. That is quite right. With respect to the illegitimate children, I assume this will be granted or should only be granted to the mother who is a taxpayer, and that it would not go any farther than that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Certainly that is the case it was intended to meet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the legislation will be so guarded that the father of such a child would never be given any tax concession.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had not given that any consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite possible he might claim it, and I think he is the last man in the world who should get it.

Mr. GRAYDON: You might have trouble in finding him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I don't know. The courts pin him down, you know.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wish to follow up what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said. Numerous representations have been received on this matter, and I am pleased that this proposal has been adopted. I have had many letters from welfare societies saying that it will be a real godsend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest to the minister that when the legislation is framed it be made absolutely clear that this provision for the illegitimate child shall go only to the mother. Under this resolution it would be quite legitimate for one to argue that it covers both parents. I am sure the committee does not want to put a premium on a man who is the father of an illegitimate child. The mother cannot help herself, and I want to help her.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will certainly give consideration to my hon. friend's observation. The provision is that a credit should be given to anybody who is supporting the child. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred it would be the mother. I am not prepared to say at the moment that if the father was supporting the illegitimate child he should not benefit from this provision. However, that matter can be considered.

The hon. member for Peterborough West has indicated that there have been a great many representations from all sides of the house and from social service organizations throughout Canada that an amendment of this kind should be introduced. I want to point out, in view of the rather general terms of the resolution, that the legislation will provide in effect that the dependents must be in the custody of and wholly dependent on the taxpayer.

Mr. BRUCE: I assume that this would cover British war guests.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes.

Mr. BRUCE: For several years we have pleaded that this exemption should apply to them, and I am glad to see that that has been done.

Mr. ABBOTT: That assumption is correct—where, of course, they are wholly dependent on the taxpayer.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The parliamentary assistant said this would cover the case only of a child who is in the custody of the taxpayer. Does he mean actual custody or constructive custody?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not mean physical custody, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Actual or constructive custody?

Mr. ABBOTT: Custody, I am advised, is the language used in the corresponding section of the British act. I do not know that that will be the exact language used when we come to draft the legislation. That is the substance of the requirements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then if the child were being supported by the mother in another family, she would get it?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the intention.

Mr. GREEN: Would the tax credit be allowed in a case where the child has been placed in the custody of strangers, people who are not relatives at all, but is being supported by them?

Mr. ABBOTT: My understanding is that where a person supporting the child is, for instance, paying board for the care of the child, the person who is doing the paying would be entitled to get the tax credit. That is my understanding of the intention which will govern the drafting of this law.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is why this was asked for.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the deduction in respect of unusual medical expenses be extended to include such expenses incurred outside of Canada.

Mr BENCE: On this item, I desire to make a representation to the administration in connection with the amount of deduction for medical expenses which is permitted at the present time. My understanding is that where the medical expenses are in excess of five per cent of the taxable income, so much as is in that excess may de deducted provided the total amount does not exceed $600, plus an additional sum of $100 for each dependent, provided also that the amount which is allowed for dependents does not exceed $400. In many cases people to-day are incurring heavy medical expenses over and above the $600 limit which is provided by this legislation If the principle is a correct one, that over and above the five per cent some relief should be given—and I assume that that relief was allowed in the first place because of the present high rate of income tax—the ceiling on these unusual medical expenses should be lifted, because in some cases of which I have personal knowledge men have incurred considerably more expenses than the $600, and find themselves in straitened circumstances.

Take for example the case of a man whose wife has become an invalid, or whose dependent is dying, and the time which elapses between invalidity and death is considerable, say months. During the course of that time doctors' and hospital bills are heavy; frequently trips have to be taken to other centres, particularly if the afflicted person happens to be living in an out-of-the-way place. Under such circumstances the expenses in many cases exceed the limit allowed by the law.

This matter, I understand, has been taken up with the department; representations have been made to it, and the replies which have been received are that it is a matter which will have to be dealt with by parliament, that the department itself has no jurisdiction to create any extension.

In addition, we find men in receipt of what may be termed a reasonable income, but with no capital ahead of them, going very heavily into debt to provide for these unusual medical expenses, and then, because of the continuation in after years of the heavy rate of taxation on their incomes, they are never able to get out of that debt.

In addition to considering seriously the raising of the ceiling, the administration should include the services of doctors, nurses and dentists and should also provide for drugs and medical necessities which are prescribed by the doctor. We might run into a great deal of difficulty because people might take advantage of this exemption if we allowed for every kind of expenditure, but certainly if it were confined to the type certified by the doctor attending the case, I suggest that we could reasonably add such expenses to the amount permitted at the present time. Actually what happens now is this. The doctor's fee and the hospital bill are allowed but no incidentals in the form of medicine and X-rays and matters of that sort are permitted. If a person lives in an outlying district in Saskatchewan, say, and has to go to Winnipeg or Saskatoon for treatment, he or she is not allowed anything to take care of travelling expenses or the extra money spent in going to that centre to receive badly required services. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the whole matter be reviewed in the light of the experience which has been gained since the exemption was included in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. GILLIS: I endorse what the hon. member for Saskatoon City has said. There is no necessity for repeating it except to suggest that this particular question requires a general overhauling. The only thing that is classified as medical expenses under the present regulations is what is purchased directly from the medical authorities. All the expenses outlined by the hon. member for Saskatoon City are incidental to persons getting to a centre where medical assistance can be provided. There are many other considerations also that must be taken into account. Suppose a man has an artificial leg. In the interests of his health the doctor orders him to have that leg changed, and he is obliged to spend $250 or $300 replacing it. That is a medical expenditure, but to-day it is not allowed for taxation purposes. Let me give another illustration which I have brought to the attention of the department on several occasions. A woman has an ear condition and her doctor advises her to purchase appliances costing $200. That is an order from her medical doctor, but there is no allowance for taxation purposes for a purchase of that kind. If we are going to do anything about this I think we must go the whole way or not bother with it at all.

The arrangement as applied to the lower income groups is far from satisfactory. Take a man with a $1,500 income. He is allowed to deduct if the medical expenses are in excess of five per cent of the total income. Five per cent is $75, so that he is allowed only in excess of $75, and then it is only for something that is purchased directly from the medical fraternity. I am far from satisfied with that provision, and I could elaborate on the disabilities that arise from it. It should be overhauled and made all-inclusive, or eliminated altogether. I do not think it serves much purpose in its present form. I am not so much concerned about the man who can undertake a $1,500 expenditure to go to the United States, because a person with such an income is able to take care of his expenses and the hardship is not so great. But if this is designed to assist those in the lower income groups, then I repeat, it requires overhauling.

Mr. McILRAITH: Considering the item of unusual medical expenses, I would refer particularly to amputation cases. The section makes allowance only for unusual medical expenses if the payment is made to any qualified practitioner, and so on, and to one full-time attendant upon the taxpayer in certain circumstances. As regards amputation cases, there is no provision for the purchase of an artificial limb or limbs required. It seems to put an unnecessary burden on this particular section of our population, a burden that should not be imposed on them. I have personal knowledge of one particular case. A married man without any dependent children has a salary of $1,500. He has two artificial legs and is required this year to have new limbs or he must cease working. He simply cannot carry on without them. The estimated cost of the equipment is $500, but there is not that amount of money available from his salary after he pays ordinary living expenses. If he does not buy these artificial limbs he cannot work. This and similar cases represent a genuine hardship, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant to consider widening the resolution with regard to this group of persons.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to say a word in support of the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon City and the hon. member for Cape Breton South regarding this term, "medical expenses." I think the wrong impression may be given, that the doctor gets all this money. As a matter of fact his bill is very often the small end of the stick. If a person is seriously ill he may require special nurses, and under the present regulations one nurse is not enough because they work an eight-hour day and therefore it is necessary to have three nurses. Three nurses at $7 a day each means $21. There are a number of other incidentals such as those mentioned by my hon. friends. I suggest therefore that this should be more specific, and should cover a wider territory than is indicated by the term "medical expenses."

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is aware that nurses are covered.

Mr. BRUCE: Under this?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, yes. Hospital expenses include nurses.

Mr. BRUCE: Does it include special nursing in the hospital?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BRUCE: I know it includes hospitalization.

Mr. ABBOTT: It includes all special nurses in the hospital, provided they are registered. In fact it even goes further than registration.

Mr. HOMUTH: Nurses in the home?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the limit under the present law?

Mr. ABBOTT: Five per cent or $400 in the case of a single person and $600 in the case of a married person, plus $100 for each dependent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not proposed to change the limit?

Mr. ABBOTT: The member for Saskatoon City has suggested that the limit should be raised. I would point out, with reference to the remarks made by the member for Cape Breton South, that this was introduced to cover unusual medical expenses. It was never intended that the income tax act should serve as a health insurance or a sickness insurance measure. Because the rates of taxation were put up very steeply in 1941 it was felt that in the case of unusual, exceptional medical expenses some measure of relief should be given to the taxpayer. Under ordinary circumstances a good many men who run into unforeseen and heavy medical taxes have either to dip into their capital, if they have any, or try to borrow money if they have none. It was not felt that the income tax act could be used as a vehicle to provide for universal health or sickness insurance. This was an alleviating measure to give some relief in exceptional circumstances; therefore I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that it should be wholly revised in order to take care of every possible case. Perhaps it does not go far enough, but I am not prepared to say that. Perhaps there should be some raising of the ceiling as suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon, although my view is it is undesirable under existing circumstances. But with that reservation I do not think this section can be used to provide for all kinds of medical or hospital expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the opening of the door inevitably paves the way for all kinds of demands.

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The decisions have to be pretty arbitrary, and in fact they are arbitrary. When the parliamentary assistant says this is for unusual medical expenses, I say to him that hospitalization is the order of the day—

Mr. ABBOTT: When I said "unusual" I meant they have to be in excess of five per cent of the taxpayer's income, five per cent being considered normal medical expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not at all opposed to the principle of an allowance of this kind, because persons who are ill have very heavy expenses. When they become ill their earning power ceases and they have to have some consideration. The question is how far it should go. Personally I am willing to see the limit raised and relief given; but that was not the purpose for which I rose to speak. I want to talk about the concession contained in resolution 4, as follows:

> That the allowance in respect of unusual medical expenses be extended to include such expenses incurred outside of Canada.

I never could understand why, if it was a sound principle to grant to a taxpayer an allowance for unusual or usual medical expenses, there was a geographical limitation to its application. Take the case of people who live along the border near Boston or New York. In exceptional surgical cases in my part of the country it has been the usual practice to send patients not only to Montreal but to certain clinics in Boston and in the city of New York. Up to the present time there has been no allowance made to a Canadian taxpayer. Apparently the department has had a change of heart, and I am going to ask that they make it retroactive. It ought to have been done from the beginning. If the principle is good now, it was good last year, and those who have to pay unusual expenses should be given some consideration in the circumstances I have mentioned.

I am going to give a concrete case. I suppose concrete cases are those that come to our minds and impress themselves upon our memory. A lady from Charlottetown visited her brother who was a physician in New York. She was suddenly taken ill and had to undergo an intricate and expensive operation which cost her husband a good deal of money. While she was convalescent her husband, after a good deal of difficulty, was able to get enough money from the foreign exchange control board to go across the line to see her. I am not complaining about that, because he should have been able to get the exchange very easily in the circumstances if he had gone about it in the right way. The banker, I think, could have given him the money very quickly, but there was some delay. When he got there—it was in the winter time—the brother, who was a physician, decided that the lady should not return north, with the result that arrangements were made to take her south to spend the winter. When they came back in the spring, after having this expense for her surgical operation in the city of New York, the husband as a taxpayer put in a claim for the hospitalization of his wife, and was refused. There is an illustration of people who are just caught in a circumstance. If she had taken ill at home, her husband automatically would have had the allowance; but she was taken ill on a visit to New York, and he gets no allowance. The thing is not reasonable to me. I do not think the fact of where the surgical or medical attendance was given should be the determining factor as to whether there should or should not be an allowance. There is no answer to that. I know there will be an attempted answer, but there is no logical or reasonable answer as to why it should have been denied. It must have been because it was just a concession dragged out of the department at the time. It ought to be made retroactive and go back to the time when the principle was first acknowledged and established in the tax structure. I am going to ask that this be made retroactive. The government is making other things retroactive in these resolutions. They are making the question of charitable donations retroactive, and I consider that is definite breach of faith and reprehensible, just as reprehensible as—

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing retroactive about that. It was announced before it was made effective.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not care if it was announced. It was an ignoring by a departmental official or a minister of the crown of the law of parliament.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not care when it was announced or by whom it was announced. It was the law on the statute book when the Minister of Finance made the announcement. It was announced without telling parliament that he was not going to carry out the will of parliament. It was a defiance of the law of parliament itself.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me correct my hon. friend on that. The minister announced that he proposed to recommend to parliament—

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well.

Mr. ABBOTT: —an amendment to the act that after such-and-such a date a certain thing would be done. That has been done.

Mr. HOMUTH: And make it retroactive.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not made retroactive. It was made effective only after the date the minister announced it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We shall meet that when we come to section 32. I had not intended to speak about that at the moment; I was diverted into doing so. I am suggesting that if this is a good principle to-day, it was a good principle when adopted last year, the date on which the principle itself was first brought into legislation. I do not think it would amount to very much, but it would take away the rankling sense of injustice that a limited number of taxpayers feel when they think they are discriminated against because they happen to be taken sick over an imaginary line on this continent. I am asking that this be done.

Mr. KNOWLES: First of all I should like to express support of what the government has proposed in this resolution by way of extending this principle to include expenses incurred outside Canada, which, of course, refers particularly to the United States. The hon. member for York-Sunbury has referred to people in his part of the country who on occasions find it necessary to go to the New England states. It is also true that in certain parts of the west people find it necessary to go to Rochester, Minnesota, to attend the Mayo clinic. I know that this matter was felt quite keenly by people in and around the head of the lakes. Representations came from trade union organizations in Fort William to the government on the matter, and they are appreciative of the action that has been taken in this resolution. I feel, too, with the hon. member for York-Sunbury, although I do not wish to say anything provocative, as perhaps he did—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, don't be afraid. The hon. member is not usually afraid of saying something provocative.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not mind, if there is anything to be gained by it. Sometimes however, I find it pays to speak in appealing language.

Mr. HOMUTH: Honeyed words do not catch any flies around here.

Mr. KNOWLES: I still hope that the department will give consideration to the idea of making this retroactive, at least to some extent. So far, the forms for 1943 have not been assessed, and I am not sure whether the department has completed the job of assessing the forms for 1942. It seems to me that at least to some extent the retroactive feature might be introduced with respect to this principle. As the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said, if it is right to do this now, then the principle was right a year or two ago.

There is another phase of this subject of allowances for unusual medical expenses upon which I should like to speak. I believe the point was raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, and referred to by other hon. members. The expenses in connection with illness are by no means confined to the kind of expenses allowed under the act. Those include hospital, doctor and nursing bills. Every time a person incurs medical expenses of $100 that he can charge up under the act, he has at least $50 or $75 of additional expenses he is not permitted to charge. I realize that administrative difficulties are involved, and that it is always a problem to draw a line. I would point out, however, that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the floor be lowered might take care of this situation. If the parliamentary assistant has not thought the matter through, he might feel that to reduce the percentage from five per cent down to three or two per cent would be getting down to a level of medical expenses which could not be described as unusual. My contention is that if the floor were placed at two per cent of the taxable income of the taxpayer, the government could rest assured that for all the money for which exemption was being allowed there were other sums of money the taxpayer had to pay out for which no exemptions were allowed. It would help a great deal if some step along this line could be taken. By lowering the percentage rate from five per cent to two per cent the minister would not be changing the principle—if indeed it wishes to stick to that principle—of giving consideration only for unusual medical expenses. Expenses of such an amount are still unusual if one takes into consideration the incidental amounts already referred to.

There is one other type of case to which I should like to refer, and possibly the easiest way to bring the matter before the committee is to state a concrete case. This is one I have already taken up with the department, but, I regret to say, one concerning which they have not seen fit to make the adjustment I have suggested. A working man in Winnipeg has a family of several children. It is necessary for him to maintain one of those children in a private nursing home. He receives for the son he maintains elsewhere the ordinary allowance for a dependent child. But as hon. members will readily recognize, his expenses in connection with maintaining that child elsewhere, paying his board and room, buying his clothes, and the other disbursements involved, are actually much greater than his expenses in connection with the maintenance of his own children in his own home. This taxpayer felt he was justified in putting in, as unusual medical expenses, the amount he expended in the care of that child over and above five per cent of his total taxable income. The ruling of the department in this case was that that was not a medical expense.

Mr. ABBOTT: What kind of institution was it? Was it a private nursing home?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. It was not a home organized as a hostel, but rather a private home where a private person has taken in a few people who are mentally deficient. Those people are being looked after and the expenses are being paid by the parents of the children concerned. One realizes that people in those circumstances face an unusual burden in more ways than one. When they accept and discharge that burden it seems to me they should be given every consideration, or at least they should be given the same consideration that is given comparable cases. My feeling is that the kind of case I have described involves unusual medical expenses.

The government would not be asked to take over all expense. All we are asking is that the expenses in excess of five per cent of the total income be allowed as an exemption against that income. I should be glad if the parliamentary assistant would do what he can to have that kind of case considered further.

Mr. McCANN: I am in accord with the principle of allowing a tax deduction for unusual medical expenses. I believe in some instances this provision has shown considerable merit and has provided considerable relief for a number of families. But I cannot see any reason whatsoever for extending that allowance to include expenses incurred outside of Canada, except where expenses are incurred by reason of an illness which takes place when one is out of the country.

Many people have the obsession that when they are ill or require surgical attention they must go to some other country, and that in that country they can receive services better than those they can get in Canada. That is not so. This country is relatively as full of neurasthenics as is any other country, and when those people become obsessed with the idea that they must go to the Mayo clinic, or to Baltimore, or somewhere else, and that when there they will receive medical or surgical attention better than they could receive in their own country, I submit they are entirely wrong. This is borne out by the policy which has been followed by the foreign exchange control board. If one wanted to go to the United States for hospitalization or treatment it was necessary to apply to the foreign exchange control board to obtain the necessary funds, and those funds could not be obtained unless accompanied by a certificate from the assignment and procurement board in Canada to the effect that equally good services were not available in this country.

Perhaps no more crippling event than death could occur in any family which has been attacked by a great illness. In the case of death there are most unusual expenses which in many instances cripple men with small incomes and families. If the department wishes to extend exemptions for unusual expenses in connection with sickness, it is my submission that funeral and undertaking expense might well be included.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may be unusual, but it certainly is inevitable.

Mr. McCANN: They are not provided for.

Mr. LEADER: May I offer a word in connection with what the hon. member has just said in allowing deductions for medical services incurred outside Canada? I have much respect for the hon. member, but what he has said strengthens my belief that we have a monopoly at the top of our medical associations in Canada. The hon. member is an experienced surgeon and he is mentioned as the possible minister in charge of the new department we are to create. I am sure he will perform his duties with credit to himself and the nation. However, he has declared on the floor of this house that he is opposed to any additional investigation into Doctor Davidson's work at Winnipeg, and he now gets up and tells us that there should be no deductions allowed from income tax for medical services incurred outside of Canada.

Mr. McCANN: On a point of order, I never made any such statement, that no more investigation should be made. I took the stand which I think was perfectly correct, that the federal government were not warranted in making a further expenditure in carrying on that particular investigation when one had been made already by the provincial authorities.

Mr. LEADER: I think what the hon. member said was that the taxpayers' money should not be spent on making a further investigation. But that is by the way. I commend the minister for bringing in this amendment to the income tax act to permit deductions for medical expenses incurred outside Canada. In the past I have made representations to the minister on behalf of people who have written me asking why this was not possible. The minister pointed out quite correctly that it was not done because it was not in conformity with the income tax act. No doubt he has received representations along the same lines from other hon. members. If my support is worth anything, I want to say that the minister has it wholeheartedly.

Mr. HOWDEN: Mr. Chairman, I am in a peculiar position. I am a medical man myself but I cannot agree with the attitude taken by the hon. member for Renfrew South. I think the people of this country have personal rights that should not be interfered with. This is a rather personal matter with me. I had a brother who required an operation last spring. He had plenty of money and he applied to the foreign exchange control board to obtain United States funds to go down to Rochester to be operated upon. He was denied that privilege, and he was operated upon in Winnipeg and died. Just as sure as I am standing here as a medical man I believe that if he had been permitted to go to Rochester he would be on this earth to-day. That is a good deal for a medical man to say, but I believe it is right. I do not believe this government or any other authority has the right to deny a man the privilege to go where he wants to go for medical attention; therefore I am bound to take issue with the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a question of the liberty of the subject.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is a question of the liberty of the subject. I have something to say on the Davidson cancer cure, but I am not going to say it now because this is not the place.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does this deal only with medical expenses, or does it include dental expenses?

Mr. ABBOTT: It deals with any expenses covered by the present section, which I believe covers dental expenses.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It would cover chiropractors and chiropodists and others as set forth in the section.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have to be registered the same as they are in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in the law as it stands with respect to the class of expense which may qualify. The only purpose of this resolution is to authorize an amendment to extend the exemption to like expenses incurred outside Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What section is it?

Mr. ABBOTT: Section 5, paragraph (n).

Mr. HOMUTH: I should like to give my support to the several hon. members who have spoken on behalf of this resolution. I believe, along with other hon. members, that we could very well lower the ceiling in order to bring some easement to people in the lower income brackets. We usually think of members of the Liberal party as being potential free traders, and I was amazed this afternoon to see one get up and defend a very high tariff on his profession. I was pleased to see the hon. member opposite get up and take issue with him. People should be allowed the right to go where they will and get whatever medical attention they desire.

Mr. McCANN: This has nothing to do with their right; this is a matter of tax exemption.

Mr. BENCE: When I asked a question a while ago the parliamentary assistant said that this was an unusual departure in connection with income tax law in this country and that it was done because the rates were so high that it was felt that some relief should be permitted when the expenses were over five per cent of the income. However, I do not see why it should be limited to $600. If the principle is that expenses over five per cent should be exempted because of the high income tax rates, then surely as the expenses are increased the principle should be all the more applicable. A man finds himself in a much more difficult position when he has to pay $1,000 than when he has to pay $600. I should like to know upon what principle it was determined that the ceiling should be placed at $600, and not $800 or $1,000. Why not make it unlimited as far as the excess over a certain minimum is concerned? I agree with those who have suggested that possibly the minimum is too high and should be lowered, but the point I was trying to make is that the principle had been accepted that unusual medical expenses should be exempt.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not entirely exempted; that some measure of relief should be given.

Mr. BENCE: Why $600 and not $800 or $1,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: Some figure had to be taken, but at a given point expenses of this kind are really capital expenditure. As I said in my earlier remarks, the income tax act was never intended as a means whereby a man's total medical expenses, whatever they may be, should be covered by the other taxpayers of Canada. This was intended as some measure of relief in unusual circumstances, so that if the expenditures were such that they went far beyond what would ordinarily be incurred in a single year, some would be exempt. This is the type of expense to which all of us may be exposed at some time or other, but I suggest that we cannot expect the state to assume that type of capital expenditure for one taxpayer. The figure of $600 may be too low, but some figure had to be taken, and I suggest that this perhaps is not very far from the mark.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There should not be any allowance at all if the parliamentary assistant is logical.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a considerable amount of logic in what my hon. friend says. As I said, it was felt that in applying high rates of taxation rather suddenly some measure of relief should be given. It may be illogical, if you like.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why this measure?

Mr. ABBOTT: This measure was decided upon after careful consideration as the measure which in the judgment of the government was the most satisfactory and reasonable one to put forward.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just arbitrary.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it is arbitrary. It could not be anything else.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the average amount allowed in the budget for medical expenses? May we have that in order that we may see what reasoning was behind this fixation of the five per cent rate?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that investigations were made when this provision was under consideration and after looking into the budgets of working class and average income families such as are prepared by social workers it was found that five per cent per annum on the average was included in these budgets to include medical and dental care. Some arbitrary figure had to be taken. That is the answer to the question of the hon. member for Rosedale as to how the figure was arrived at.

Mr. McCANN: What amount of money in the last year of which the parliamentary assistant has a record was deductible for medical expenses?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not kept as a separate record. Perhaps it could be obtained, but certainly not before this committee will rise.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are millions of returns to be looked through.

Mr. BRUCE: We have had an illustration this afternoon of how there may be differences of opinion even in the medical profession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Doctors differ, they say, and the patient dies.

Mr. BRUCE: I was just going to say that the remarks made by the hon. member for Renfrew South in my judgment are perfectly proper, and that he expresses a view which I think would be supported by the majority of medical men in this country. I would certainly support what he said when he remarked that as good surgical work can be done to-day in Canada as in any country in the world, and that applies to other specialties. I do not think it is necessary for anybody in this country to go to another country to get surgical assistance. If the hon. member for St. Boniface finds that in a particular case better work could be done elsewhere in his opinion—

Mr. HOWDEN: I am sure of it.

Mr. BRUCE: He may be in that regard mistaken. At any rate I believe that there are excellent men in Winnipeg capable of doing any surgical work as well as it can be done by men in any other country. But if he thinks it is necessary to go out of Manitoba I suggest then that he come to Ontario, where he would find in Toronto surgeons equal to any in the world. If that is not sufficient, I suggest that he journey to Montreal, where he would find some of the leading surgeons of the world. The point that I think the hon. member for Renfrew South made was this. I would not oppose, and I do not think he would oppose, a deduction for medical services for a Canadian visiting in the United States who met with some emergency requiring immediate attention so that he could not get back to his own country. I think that would be a real case for relief from taxation. But for a Canadian to leave his own country and go to the United States to have surgical work done which could be done just as well in Canada I suggest is not a case for relief.

Mr. GIBSON: Who is going to judge that?

Mr. BENCE: Will the parliamentary assistant bring our representations in connection with the matter of raising the ceiling to the attention of the minister, and will they be considered before this resolution is finally passed?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have said that I would bring the representations to the attention of the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: When this clause was first before the committee a year ago I suggested that it might be well if the five per cent of the family budget, which we now understand is the average amount which the ordinary family is obligated to pay for medical expenses in a year, were based on the net rather than on the gross income as it is at present. In other words, there is no use in saying that a person is allowed five per cent of his income when perhaps thirty or forty or more per cent is taken from that income in taxation. If the administration would consider basing the five per cent on the net rather than on the gross income, that would help to solve some of the difficulties.

The CHAIRMAN: Some of this discussion is out of order, because there are clauses dealing with these subjects. The committee should wait until we come to the proper clause.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister please answer one of my questions, that about a child who has to be cared for in a private home?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will bring that to the attention of the minister. The language of paragraph (n) of section 5 is quite clear. It says that only expenses incurred "in a public or provincially licensed private hospital" shall qualify. As my hon. friend appreciates, if that were extended to include expenses on behalf of children who were cared for in private homes it would be exceedingly difficult to administer, and the department would have great difficulty in checking to ascertain whether these were bona fide medical expenses. The act as it stands restricts the provision to those who are cared for in some publicly supervised institution.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the case I referred to, that would have been much more expensive for the father. As a matter of fact he submitted a doctor's certificate as to the necessity of the child being cared for, and it seems to me that that certificate should carry weight.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the minister. But my hon. friend will appreciate that it would be exceedingly difficult to open the door quite as wide as that and allow expenses of this kind to be deducted on the certificate of a doctor that they were necessary.

Mr. COTE: A few minutes ago I heard the parliamentary assistant admit that chiropractors and osteopaths were covered by this resolution and that expenses incurred with these practitioners were considered as medical expenses for the purposes of the resolution. I think that when this resolution came before the committee last year the practitioners in these groups were not intended to be covered. May I ask the parliamentary assistant if they have made a specific demand to be covered and whether that was the reason for the recent ruling of the department?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that they made a demand, but of course to come within the act they have to qualify as medical practitioners registered under dominion or provincial legislation. I am advised that an investigation was made and the charges of chiropractors and some others have now been admitted as medical expenses.

Mr. COTE: Has the department received a similar request from the optometrists, and if so what has been the outcome?

Mr ABBOTT: It is impossible for me to give an unqualified yes to that question, because I am advised that the optometrists fall into two groups, one the group that provide the glasses, the materials, and the other the group that prescribes whether or not glasses should be worn The second class is performing what the department considers a medical service, and these expenses are claimable as a deduction, but not in the other case. The question is perhaps of an academic nature, because expenses of this kind do not as a rule run into very large figures, and unless they were added to some other medical expenses it is unlikely that they would run over the amount where a deduction could be claimed.

Mr. COTE The department has admitted the principle in the case of two or more groups of irregular practitioners, generally known as such; though without any specific standing in the whole country they may be recognized in one or two provinces, and that is all. The optometrists are now considered a professional group, a scientific body of professional men, all across the country. They have in each province a statute law authorizing and governing the practice of their profession. All of them must be graduates of a university before being admitted to practise. So that rather as a matter of principle than anything else, because I agree with the parliamentary assistant that these expenses may not reach a very high amount, I am surprised that chiropractors and osteopaths are recognized for the purpose of this resolution and that optometrists with a statutory and nation-wide professional status are denied the same privilege.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say that optometrists were denied the same privilege; I said it was a matter for the administration to decide as to whether, in common with the osteopaths, they were able to bring themselves within the language of the section, namely, a qualified medical practictioner registered under any dominion or provincial legislation; and in the case of the second class of optometrists to which I have referred, my own view, for what it is worth, is that they could bring themselves within the definition.

Mr. COTE: So far as I know there is only one class of optometrist, consisting of those who have taken a special course in a Canadian university and are fully qualified to examine the eye and to prescribe and supply eye glasses or lenses. That is what an optometrist is. There may be a class of opticians, who are the ones who make the glasses; but when I spoke of the optometrists I had reference to university graduates who are authorized under a provincial statute to practise that profession as such. If no definite decision has been arrived at by the department I would ask that the minister give special attention to this, taking into account the fact that this group is recognized in the whole country and is rendering valuable services.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some little time ago it was asked that clause 4 be retroactive. The income tax form for 1943 has this to say with regard to medical expenses: "if the accident was incurred in 1943 or within one year prior to the date of payment" to a doctor, dentist, nurse, et cetera. That would mean it would run back to 1942?

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will look at resolution 5 he will see that we are making some change in that this year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That does not cover No. 4 then; it covers only No. 5?

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me see if I understand my hon. friend's question. The law at present is that a man may claim credit for medical expenses which were incurred and paid within the taxation period or incurred within one year prior to the date of payment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He might pay his medical bill in January of this year after an operation he had, it may be, in January of last year. Am I right?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then you are changing it now in section 5, but you are not changing it in section 4?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, resolution 5 will authorize a change in section 5, paragraph (n) of the act, with respect to the condition as to the time of payment. We can discuss when we come to section 5, perhaps, the point my hon. friend is raising now.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the deduction in respect of unusual medical expenses be extended to allow as a deduction in any taxation year such expenses actually paid in any twelve-month period ending in the taxation year.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No. We are to discuss No. 5 now.

Mr. ABBOTT: We might discuss the two together and pass the two together. They are related subjects.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister say what he intends to do on the matter I have just mentioned?

Mr. ABBOTT: The law provides, as it stands now, that in order to obtain the credit the expense must have been incurred and paid within the taxation period or paid within the taxation period and incurred within one year prior to the date of payment; and the language used in the form, I am advised, is in order to obtain information as to just when the expenses were incurred and paid. The law is clear as it stands now, and the form is so drafted in order to obtain the necessary information to enable the minister or the deputy minister and assessors to determine whether the claim comes within the provisions of the statute. We propose to give some relief, as my hon. friend will see, in virtue of the provisions of resolution 5.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It applies this year as in 1943, that if an operation was had in July of last year—

Mr. ABBOTT: The rules are not being changed.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): —and it is paid for this year, then you are covered?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That in lieu of the deduction in respect of unusual medical expenses of the amount of salary or wages paid to a full-time attendant upon a taxpayer who is totally blind, the taxpayer shall have the option of deducting $480 from his income in the taxation year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister explain this a little more fully? Also I should like to say, with regard to the reference to a "full-time attendant", that there are blind people who now have a full-time attendant who perhaps will be getting a "seeing-eye" dog, which costs, I understand about a thousand dollars. That dog is a "full-time attendant". Would that be included?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a new one, I must confess.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know the question will crop up.

Mr. ABBOTT: The legislation contemplates, I think, human attendants.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know it does, but the blind deserve anything in reason.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the question might be determined if we could find out whether the "seeing-eye" dog is paid any salary or wages. I realize that a capital expenditure for the dog is required, but I take it that its upkeep consists of food, not actual salary or wages.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That the basis for taxation under the normal tax and the tax credit against the graduated tax allowed to an unmarried person who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment and actually supports therein a person wholly dependent upon him and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, be extended to a married person separated from the spouse.

Mr. STIRLING: May I on this clause make a plea once more for the simplification of income tax returns?

This is a matter which is very seriously bothering a very great number of income tax payers. It does not interest them in the least that an official of the income tax division says it is now quite a simple matter, that all they need is a pencil, and they have to sit down and answer some questions. That is not the way the public see it.

The minister referred to this in passing in his speech at the end of the debate, and drew attention to the fact that the complexity which has crept into the forms is largely due to the desire of the minister to give as much equity to the taxpayer as he can. But that really does not give any hope for a further simplification. The fact that the compulsory savings are no longer to be followed, he considers, is going to be of very great assistance in this regard. Although it is going to help, I have no doubt, it comes near the end of the list of questions which have to be answered and statements which have to be made, and it does not seem to me that it will affect in simplification the whole questionnaire which each taxpayer has to answer.

Various incidents have been brought to the attention of members, and I have taken several of them up with the Minister of National Revenue. Let me cite one. In the city of Vernon an accountant, to assist in the difficulty of shortage of forms, handed some of his T-1 forms to the postmaster on the understanding that another supply of these forms was on the way from Vancouver and he would have his forms replaced. These forms arrived on April 29, by which time the accountant had collected the facts and figures in regard to the cases of his clients and it was a physical impossibility for him to fill in the returns on these forms and get them in to satisfy the due date and avoid the penalty. He took the matter up in the form of a letter, I believe, to the minister. He received a reply that the penalty was mandatory and there would be no way of assisting him. If his facts are correct, this was a matter that was in no way either his fault or that of his clients. I remember, in discussing the matter with the Minister of National Revenue, he drew my attention to the fact that if in such a case the taxpayer would put in an interim return and, I presume, accompany it with a partial payment it would reduce his liability for penalty at least by that amount. But I wonder whether the taxpaying public are aware of the fact that they can avoid a portion of the penalty by filling in a partial return; or are the public aware that a letter to the department under these circumstances would suffice so far as the full penalty is concerned. That is one type of trouble which these accountants have to meet.

There is another one that came to my attention from another accountant who had considerable difficulty in completing the returns necessary for his clients and endeavouring to avoid the penalty. He makes the point that the taxpayer, if he falls short in what he ought to do, is mulcted in a penalty, but the taxpayer who has sent in by mistake too large a sum of money for his needs may have that amount returned to him one year or two or three years after that. He argues that the government therefore has the use of that money of the taxpayer without paying interest, and he is of the opinion that this is just one of the instances in which the taxpayer is out of luck. He considers that it is not fair to those who may be endeavouring to fulfil the requirements of the income tax act.

I drew this matter also to the attention of the department and in the accountant's subsequent letter to me he says:

> I note that he does not say anything about how long it takes his department to prepare the forms from the closing of the session until they are available to the public. If he would speed up the distribution of the new forms, lots of forms could be filed sooner.

I quite agree, as was pointed out to me by the minister, that in many of these cases the taxpayer is at fault by delaying the matter too long, and in many cases he delays it too long because he is not able to understand what is required of him, and then the accountant has the information from many clients lying on his desk and he cannot get the things filled up in time. He calls attention also to the fact that he reads in the newspapers that the national selective service does not consider that office help is a necessity and he has to do what he can to fill in these many forms. I continue with the letter:

> If there was any truth to his statement as to filing of these returns, I wonder why the department is still requesting information on 1938, 1939 and 1940 returns. A few 1942 assessments are trickling in, but any number of taxpayers have not yet received their 1941 assessment. I myself have received nothing since 1940. Possibly he could explain why there are no explanations attached to the additional assessments sent out on T-1 general returns. No one will pay on something he does not understand, and this only means a letter back to the department for an explanation when the assessor has to look it up and prepare a reconciliation, an unwarranted waste of time for the assessor, a stenographer and the accountant who has the returns in hand and finds it necessary to request further information. According to the papers, the government officials have declared office help non-essential, so how do they expect to have the forms made out in time? Does the department intend to penalize the taxpayers the full five per cent of their assessments for late filing where they, the department, have had excess payments in hand for two and three years?

That is an amplification of the remark I made just now. I replied to the accountant and had a subsequent letter from him from which I quote a couple of sentences:

> I have just returned from Vancouver, where I spent the best part of three days at the income tax department on various matters. While there I was advised that the 1943 returns of individuals—business returns—were not even filed, which was borne out by files produced. Apparently very few 1942 business forms have been assessed and the assessors appear loath to assess any particular one when asked, preferring to have them come in rotation.

With regard to the inability of the public to follow the requirements of the forms, it does not apply only to the general public, but is strikingly so in the case of agricultural returns. I have always been of the opinion that one of the reasons why so few farmers come into the income tax paying class, according to the statistics, is the fact that as they do not keep the books which a firm keeps they find it extremely difficult to supply the answers demanded of them in the questionnaire and make them fit in with the return they should put in.

I make my plea for further consideration of this difficulty, so that simplification may be arrived at which in the long run will be of great assistance to the minister in getting in returns for income tax.

Mr. GIBSON: I have not the letter that the hon. member has been reading from, so that I may find it difficult to deal with all the points that he has raised. First of all, he dealt with the simplification of the tax forms. As the Minister of Finance has said, we can do little to simplify the forms further while our tax structure remains as it is. The department, in preparing the form, has to make provision for the numerous allowances made to ease the burden on the taxpayer, and every new form of relief granted the taxpayer must be included on the form; otherwise the taxpayer himself may not have the knowledge that he is entitled to such relief. That was brought to my attention the other day, when it was pointed out that we had not mentioned on the form that alimony payers were entitled to some relief. We have extended the relief this year granted to those who pay alimony, and I presume that this further provision will have to be added to the form. This year, while we are removing the compulsory savings feature, it remains for half the year. I conclude from that that it will also have to be provided for on the form for the coming year. That is the difficulty of the income tax department. We have had representations made to us—I think I have mentioned this before—that agricultural returns should be simplified. We had a meeting of agricultural representatives, representatives of the farm journals, the agricultural societies, the Department of Agriculture. They conferred for quite a considerable time in order to devise a simplified form that would be satisfactory to the farmer. As a result of their labours they brought in a form that was considerably more complicated than the one our own experts had already produced. That shows the difficulty. It is easy to criticize, but it is not easy to devise a form that contains all the information that must be included in it.

We now come to the question of the filing of the returns. Now that the tax structure has become more complicated, and there are a great many more taxpayers than in former years, many people have adopted the policy of going to an accountant to have their tax returns prepared and filed. The result has been that particularly just at the closing date for the filing of the returns the accountants find themselves flooded with work. They have far more clients coming in than they can deal with, and we get emergency calls saying, "For heaven's sake extend the time for filing returns." If that is done one year it would be expected every year. While we have endeavoured to meet the public as far as possible, and particularly in times when there have been changes in the tax structure and we have been late in preparing the new tax form, we cannot start the practice of setting a date for the filing of returns, and then extending the date when that date is reached. Where there is reasonable excuse for not having all the details of the tax return completed we have authorized the taxpayer to file an incomplete return which will act as a substitute for the final return when the full information is available. That has been done in order to avoid the incurring of a penalty through causes over which the employee may have no control.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that generally known?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not think it is generally known, and it is not the general practice. We do not extend that privilege to all taxpayers so that they may simply file a blank return and complete one at their leisure. There must be some reasonable excuse or a valid reason for not having the completed return filed when it is due.

Mr. STIRLING: Therefore the taxpayer must first of all get in touch with the district inspector and get the permission.

Mr. GIBSON: Give reasons.

Mr. STIRLING: Would a letter do?

Mr. GIBSON: No; we must file a form.

It has been mentioned that when we assess the taxpayer we do not always give details of the amendments that have been made in his assessment. We do give details where a change is substantial, but we realize that with the limited staff we have to-day in many cases details are not required if the change in the assessment is a dollar or two. If it is only a small amount we make the change in the assessment notice and we do not give details unless the taxpayer asks for them.

Mr. STIRLING: They are simply informed that they owe so many more dollars?

Mr. GIBSON: How many more dollars have been added to the income. If they want full details they are supplied.

Reference has been made to the fact that the income tax department is behind in assessing of the returns. I am sorry to say that that is true, and although we are doing everything we can to keep up to date, the very large increase in the number of taxpayers—it has increased from 200,000 to roughly 2,000,000—has created a tremendous load on the income tax department. At the same time we have not been able to secure the staffs that we require. It is necessary to secure qualified or experienced accountants, and unless we can get experienced accountants we cannot keep up with the assessing. No matter how many stenographers or clerks we have they are not able to go ahead with the assessing of the returns until they have been dealt with by the assessors; consequently we have had difficulty with regard to personnel. In many districts we have had difficulty in getting income tax premises. In some centres where we have district officers we have the greatest difficulty in securing space, and members of the staff are so crowded that they can scarcely move. These are some of the difficulties with which we have been contending, and that is the reason why practically all of our offices have fallen behind in the assessing of returns. They are certainly making every effort to pick up ground that has been lost, and as men, particularly qualified accountants, are released from the armed forces we are making every effort to secure them on our staffs so that the work in each district office can be proceeded with as rapidly as possible.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister deal with the question of no interest being paid on the amount of money the taxpayer has overpaid the government, whereas a penalty is exacted if he pays too little?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that at one time—I do not know whether or not they still do it—the United States used to pay interest on overpayments of tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: Six per cent.

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, I think that was the rate. That became a very valuable form of investment, and there was nothing to prevent a man from overpaying a tax by any considerable amount that he had available, and drawing six per cent on it. From that point of view it has not seemed to be a very wise measure. If we were keeping our work up to date, as we normally do, it would not take as long to make assessments and the taxpayer would not be without the use of his money for long periods.

Mr. TUSTIN: I should like to urge upon the minister the necessity of seeing that the income tax forms are more simplified, particularly in regard to agriculture. At the back of the blue sheet which is attached to the farmer's return there is a paragraph which reads:

> Produce raised on farm and consumed in the farm home.

The farmer is asked to estimate the amount that he takes from his farm to be consumed by his family. Another paragraph reads:

> Produce used from "family garden" and small sums usually termed "pin-money" obtained by the wife, sons or daughters, by their own effort, need not be taken into account.

The other form goes on to say that the vegetable garden does not count. I have a particular case in my own riding where a family of four persons estimated that they had consumed $90 worth of produce from their farm in 1942. After making their income tax return to the district office they found themselves in this position. They were charged $500 for the produce that they had consumed from the farm, or a difference of $410. The point I should like to emphasize is this: Why ask the farmer to estimate the amount he has consumed from his farm if there is to be an arbitrary amount set? Why not tell him in the first place that he is to be charged $125 per person for the vegetables and the milk or whatever is consumed from the farm? If that is done he will know immediately. But to ask a man to estimate the amount he takes off his farm and consumes in his own household; then put an arbitrary amount, as in this case, $410 more, and then send an assessment to him and charge him interest at the rate of five per cent is not fair to any farmer, nor do I think is it fair to any person in the country.

Mr. GIBSON: Does the hon. member think the farmer made a fair assessment?

Mr. TUSTIN: I certainly do, and I have a list in my hand showing what he used off his farm. In the first place, he does not make butter in his own home; he purchased all of it. He does not kill his own meat; he purchased all of it. He keeps seven or eight hundred hens, and has for consumption in his own home all the eggs that are not salable.

This form says that he need not estimate them at any cost. Yet in this case the farmer did estimate that he used at least three dozen in his home every week, and put them in at the market price. He shows the amount of milk he used—two quarts a day, which I think the minister must admit is a fair amount. The form says that he shall estimate it only at the price for which he sells it wholesale. Well, when he appeared at the district income tax office and asked those in charge to make up a statement showing how he could possibly get $500 worth of commodities for consumption in his own home, they took into account milk at twelve cents a quart, chicken at forty cents a pound, and so on all down the line.

There is certainly something definitely wrong somewhere. Either the form should be simplified, or some standard amount should be set for each and every person on the farm. There should be no attempt to make a fool out of a man by asking him to estimate what is used, and then, when he does it with perfect honesty, say to him, "You are all wrong; you are not even twenty per cent right."

Mr. GIBSON: But farmers do not all produce the same commodities. That is one difficulty.

Mr. TUSTIN: That is true. If the farmer knew he was to be charged $100 per person or $125 per person a year for commodities he consumed he would be privileged to consume that amount if he so desired, because he would know that he would be charged with it. But in this instance, and in every instance where the farmer has to make a return, he is asked to give an estimate. Then, after he makes the estimate, and that estimate goes to the income tax office, he is reassessed, and an arbitrary amount of, I believe, $125 per person is put on.

I urge the minister to see that this form is simplified, so that men who are honest and who are endeavouring to make their returns as farmers will not be faced with this condition.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, but it did seem to me we were wandering far afield from resolution 7. I hope what has happened will not necessarily be taken as a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with what the parliamentary assistant has said. There is no doubt that the discussion has been far afield and away from the resolution.

Mr. PERLEY: I was going to associate myself with what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox has just said. I know of many farmers in the west who have found great difficulty in making out their forms, and evaluating the products used on the farm. Apparently no ordinary farmer can make out a proper statement, nor can any two farmers make out statements which will arrive at the same conclusion. I have had, I may say, the same difficulty.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to rise to a point of order but while I refrained from interrupting the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, because it appeared to me he was hanging his hat on the simplification of the form, I do not think the discussion should continue. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox pointed out the difficulty farmers have in showing what produce they should account for as being part of their income. I understand that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle heartily endorses what has been said. The hon. member has placed himself on record, and perhaps that is sufficient.

Mr. PERLEY: I have just arrived from a committee which is sitting this afternoon, and which has decided to sit mornings and evenings—and I hope it will decide to sit Saturdays and Sundays. It is impossible for anyone to keep track of what is going on. When I came into the chamber the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox was speaking on a matter concerning which I have considerable interest. I did not know whether the hon. member had covered the point I had in mind.

Mr. ABBOTT: This discussion started when the hon. member for Yale referred to the simplification of the tax form. In doing so I believe he was in order. But to proceed from that point to develop the difficulties of one class in the community in connection with estimating a particular type of income is, in my view, going too far, and something which should be discussed under some other resolution, or under the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Yale made it clear that he thought he was out of order. However, I would ask hon. members to keep to the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: With regard to resolution 7, would the parliamentary assistant indicate whether or not either he or his minister have given consideration to the problem of the widower who has a self-contained establishment?

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be discussed under resolution 8.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think so.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps it might come under either resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should think so. I believe most members from time to time have had this condition drawn to their attention, and no doubt it has come before the parliamentary assistant. What is the governing reason why a widower who must pay a housekeeper, and who has a self-contained establishment, is ruled out and finds himself discriminated against?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, as I had anticipated, that comes under resolution 8. However, perhaps we might discuss it now. My hon. friend will see that under resolution 8 the law at present allows a tax credit of $150 to a widow or widower with a son or daughter who is wholly dependent. But in claiming that $150 the widow or widower, as the case may be, cannot claim the $108 tax credit for the first child. That is the discrimination, if it may be so called, which has existed with respect to the widow or widower.

As my hon. friend has indicated, a number of representations have been made to us to the effect that this was a discrimination. Perhaps it was. In any event, under resolution 8 it is now proposed, as the resolution states:

> That, if a taxpayer maintains one of his children in a self-contained domestic establishment in which he employs a full-time housekeeper or servant, the tax credits of $80 against the graduated tax and $28 against the normal tax be allowed to him in respect of the child, notwithstanding that he is entitled to the tax credit of $150 against the graduated tax in respect of that child.

As I have said, in the past the law has been that the $150 was allowed him, not because of his status as a widower, but because he was supporting a child in a self-contained domestic establishment.

Mr. HOMUTH: It also means more than one child.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. If the widow or the widower had more than one child he got, in effect, $150 for the first child, and $108 for the additional children.

Mr. GRAYDON: And supposing he had no children at all?

Mr. ABBOTT: Was my hon. friend raising that question, namely, that the widower or the widow living in a self-contained domestic establishment and who has a housekeeper, should get the $150?

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just inquiring as to what consideration has been given.

Mr. ABBOTT: Where a man has no children, do you mean?

Mr. GRAYDON: In one of the complaints I hold in my hand it is pointed out that the man is a widower, whose wife died a short time ago, and whose establishment has been carried on. His is a fully self-contained establishment. He has had to hire a housekeeper to look after things and, in addition, he states that he is penalized, as against the single man. He finds himself in a position where he has an exemption only as a single man, instead of a position in which many people who are in the marital stage find themselves.

Mr. ABBOTT: I apologize to my hon. friend; I spoke too quickly. I assumed that the hon. member was speaking of a widower with children. In the case which he has cited, that would be a mode of life, as it were. The man has had married status and the exemptions which go with married status, but after the death of his wife, in effect he was in no different position from that of a bachelor who maintains an apartment or has a house with a housekeeper, and therefore he is given no special tax consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not clear from the letter I had in my hand as to whether he had children.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he has children he will receive additional relief as is proposed in resolution 8.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is that exactly fair? Many men in that category maintain homes simply because they want to have some gathering place for their children who have married and left the home. There is always that place for them. I feel that that type of man should receive some consideration under those circumstances. He does not maintain a home simply because he wants some place to live by himself; he maintains a home so that his children may gather there at times. There is a good deal of family complexion about that type of home.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be pretty difficult to give consideration in a case like that and not give it to the old bachelor who has a lot of nephews and nieces who like to gather around him in a family circle.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no comparison. The bachelor did not have those nieces and nephews; they just happened.

Mr. GRAYDON: With regard to the question of the simplification of forms there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. This has been pointed out to me by a member of a group in a city on the west coast who have made a special effort to see what can be done to simplify the income tax form. He points out that one difficulty they have come across in their group discussions is the fact that item 17 on the income tax return asks whether or not the marital partner is in receipt of an investment income of over $660.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend; but while it may not be clear from the terms of the resolution, resolution 10 deals directly with the question of whether the wife has an income in excess of $660.

Mr. GRAYDON: The point I desire to raise has nothing to do with the actual amount. My correspondent points out that in some circumstances there is no way by which the marital partner can ascertain the exact income of the other partner; and he thinks a justifiable complaint can be made about that question being asked. I simply draw the matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suppose if the husband cannot find out what his wife's income is he would have no alternative than to put in the form, "Unknown to me." I must confess that the point had never occurred to me, but it is well taken.

Mr. GRAYDON: Apropos of that, this group which has been making a study of income tax matters held a miniature Gallup poll and found out that of those in the lower income brackets, sixty-eight per cent of the husbands did not know their wives' incomes and thirty-two per cent of the wives did not know their husbands' incomes. Of those in the higher income brackets, thirty-five per cent of the husbands did not know their wives' incomes and sixty-five per cent of the wives did not know their husbands' incomes. I only offer this as a matter of information for the parliamentary assistant. I have no recommendation to make.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad to have that information.

Mr. HOMUTH: When I referred to the widower who is keeping up a home the parliamentary assistant mentioned the bachelor. supposing a bachelor had an illegitimate child which he was keeping in his home, he would be entitled to exemption.

Mr. ABBOTT: He would have to have a housekeeper.

Mr. HOMUTH: Depending on the age of the child. Nevertheless the fact is that a bachelor with an illegitimate child in his home receives an exemption, while the widower who maintains a home because he wants it as a gathering place for his family, cannot get an exemption. I have no references to make.

Mr. KNOWLES: Like some other hon. members, the hon. member for York South had to leave the chamber to attend the meeting of the banking and commerce committee, but he asked me if I would raise a point in connection with resolution 7. I understand that he has been in touch with the departmental officials about this and has been told that the matter is being looked into. As I understand it, the situation is this. A single person maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment and supporting therein, we will say his mother, is granted the status provided by this section only if that mother's income is less than $400. My colleague suggests that there seems to be discrimination as between that man and the married man whose wife's income does not exceed $660.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does not get the $150 exemption if his wife's income is over $660.

Mr. KNOWLES: The only point my colleague asked me to raise was the difference between the $400 and the $660. I do not suggest that the same allowance should be made widespread for all classes, but I think a single man maintaining his mother might be given the same status as a married man.

Mr. ABBOTT: The language of the statute is that the dependent must be wholly dependent. I am informed by the income tax division that that is taken to mean if the income of the dependent does not exceed $400 per annum. I suppose under a strict interpretation of the law, if the mother had any income at all she would not be wholly dependent. There had to be some standard and I am advised that the $400 figure was fixed. In other words, a person may still be considered as a dependent although he has a private income of $400 a year.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that no change is contemplated?

Mr. ABBOTT: No change is contemplated under the present resolution.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is one question I should like to ask under this item, with reference to tax forms. I spoke about this the other night in the general budget debate. The receipts issued by the income tax branch show the amount only in figures. I cited a case which had given the department some considerable difficulty in straightening it out, and I feel that that would not have happened if the receipt had showed the amount both in figures and in words. It may be that the work involved would be too great, but it seems to me that receipts for income tax payments might well be made up in such a way as to show the amount both in figures and in words.

Mr. GIBSON: I agree with the hon. member, but when millions of receipts are going out, if we had some, for example, for $2,222.15 and they had to be written out on the typewriter in full, it would slow down the getting out of receipts very considerably and we would not be able to get them out as quickly as we do by simply showing the figures only on the receipts. I agree that it would be preferable to show it both ways, but with the shortage of staff I do not think it is practical to adopt that method at the present time.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much income is a child allowed to have before it is no longer classified as a dependent, and does it make any difference whether that income forms part of the family budget or is allowed to accumulate for the child?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the same rule is applied as is applied with respect to the mother, $400. There might be some modification in sheer infancy but, broadly speaking, that is the general rule. The child is considered as wholly dependent on the father.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the $400 applicable to the wife? I thought it was $660.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are talking about children.

Mr. JACKMAN: It makes no difference whether the child's independent income goes into the family budget or is simply accumulated on behalf of the child?

Mr. ABBOTT: We do not distinguish.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There are deductions allowed if the taxpayer has a child in a self-contained establishment and employs a housekeeper. He gets a tax credit of $80, plus $28, plus $150 for his married status.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is covered by resolution 8. We are still on resolutiton 7, but the two really go together.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on resolution 7. I have called it carried.

Resolution agreed to

8. That, if a taxpayer maintains one of his children in a self-contained domestic establishment in which he employs a full-time housekeeper or servant, the tax credits of $80 against the graduated tax and $28 against the normal tax be allowed to him in respect of the child notwithstanding that he is entitled to the tax credit of $150 against the graduated tax in respect of that child.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If a man has a housekeeper he is allowed a tax credit of $150, but if he is earning a salary and his wife has an income of over $660 they are both classed as single and do not get the $150 tax credit. That does not seem quite right. I think that the man and wife should be allowed that $150.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Both of them?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Certainly.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under the law as it stands and has stood for some time, if both husband and wife have an income, let us say the wife has the smaller income and that it exceeds $660, both then lose the $150 tax credit as having married status. It may be arbitrary, but I assume that the justification for it is that the total income is so large that they should not have this special exemption. It is intended primarily for the spouse who is the entire support of his family.

Resolution agreed to.

9. That the basis of taxation under the normal tax and the tax credit against the graduated tax for a married person be limited to a married person who supports the spouse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does this cover?

Mr. ABBOTT: At present the law by definition automatically allows a married person as such to get $150 tax exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Whether he supports her or not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The husband can obtain this $150 tax credit although he may not have been contributing a dollar to his wife's support and the wife is supported by the son. This credit of $150 for a married person will go to the person who supports the spouse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It takes it away from the man who does not do the supporting.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is it; and as you realize, under the other section, the son would get the $150.

Resolution agreed to.

10. That individuals may reduce income for taxation purposes by the amount of gifts made in money to His Majesty in right of Canada if such gifts are made within the year when the income was received or within four months from the end thereof.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would this language, "gifts made in money to His Majesty in right of Canada if such gifts are made within the year", cover gifts of corvettes to His Majesty's Canadian navy?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; they must be gifts to the crown.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Outright cash?

Mr. ABBOTT: Outright cash. As I indicated in answering a question by the leader of the opposition, this provision is really intended to give relief to a marginal case where the wife's income is, let us say, $665 a year, and as a result of having that $5 over $660 her husband has to pay an extra tax of, say $200. Under these circumstances there is no benefit to the husband and wife in having that extra $5, and under this provision she can make a donation of $5 to the crown and the husband will then retain his exemption as a married man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that that is a very funny formula. It is some amelioration. I suppose it is a difficult situation to meet by draftsmanship.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was an extremely difficult situation to take care of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I give to His Majesty in right of Canada a Red Cross ambulance, do I get the benefit of this provision?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I can illustrate it best by taking the case of a married woman who has an income of, say $1,000, and whose husband happens to have a very large earned income. As a result of the $340 of income which the wife has over the $660, her husband may have to pay a tax very substantially in excess of the $340. It was felt that that was unfair, and we have had a number of representations to that effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is unfair.

Mr. ABBOTT: In a number of cases the wife would convert her resources into cash, leaving her without taxable income, but where her income was received under a will or trust that might not be possible. It is now provided that if the wife wishes to do so she may surrender to the crown the amount of income she receives in excess of $660, and in that case her husband will be taxed as a married person and get the tax credit and be taxed at the rates that apply to a married person. I think this is a fair and reasonable and justifiable concession to the class of taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the wife would escape taxation altogether?

Mr. ABBOTT: She would pay roughly $300 in taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that that is the objective, but this resolution is wider in scope than that. I put this to the minister. Let us say that I give $1,000 to His Majesty, and in the early stages of the war a good many people did donate whatever amount the army said was necessary to buy an ambulance. Under this resolution I could get a reduction in my taxation by the amount of that gift. Is that the law now?

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder if my hon. friend would just repeat his question? I was having a word with the deputy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that the objective is to give relief to the husband and wife where the wife's income is just a little over $660.

Mr. ABBOTT: Primarily to give relief to the husband, or to give joint relief.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It gives relief to both, or it should at all events. But the scope of this resolution is wider than that. It is not limited at all. As I read it, any individual may reduce his income for taxation purposes by the amount of the gifts he made to His Majesty in the right of Canada if the gifts "are made within the year when the income was received or within four months from the end thereof." This is new law.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the position with respect to gifts before? Was there any allowance made?

Mr. ABBOTT: They would have to be included under charitable donations and be subject to the limitation of ten per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That clears my point up.

Mr. STIRLING: Under this wording suppose somebody makes a patriotic gift such as was suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. He might give it in the form of a deduction from his capital; yet under this phraseology he would be allowed to reduce his taxable income by the amount of the gift he made in that year.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair enough too.

Mr. KNOWLES: Resolution 10 represents a provision which has been drafted to take care of an anomaly which has developed in connection with the situation of a man and wife both having earned income. There is another anomaly in the case of a man and wife both having earned income which this provision does not take care of, and which I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant.

I may say that we do not seem to be getting along very well this afternoon; we have made a large number of suggestions, but I am afraid our batting average is very poor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You mean you do not get any concessions. You never do.

Mr. KNOWLES: None of our suggestions has been accepted yet to-day. I hope we can change the rule. I realize that most of the suggestions we make one year are accepted the next year, but let us get this one this year.

Let me state the case to the parliamentary assistant in concrete form. Here is the case of a man and wife, both of them medical doctors; and the parliamentary assistant knows that medical doctors are needed in this country and should be encouraged to carry on their practice.

Mr. ABBOTT: My own doctor is in that position; his wife is a doctor.

Mr. GRAYDON: Which one do you go to?

Mr. ABBOTT: I said, my own doctor's wife is a doctor.

Mr. KNOWLES: The purpose of the provision that a married lady may have earned income of any amount—is not that the case; at least it may go over $660, anyway, without its affecting the married staus of the husband—is to encourage them to work. Now, put the two together. We need doctors. The general desire of the government is to encourage married women to work. These two things add up to this, that the government should encourage lady doctors to practise their profession. In the case I refer to—and maybe my hon. friend's doctor's wife is in the same position—here is the situation. The wife, who is a practising physician, has, as a great many doctors have, her own clientele and receives her fees individually from her patients. Because she receives her income in that way as fees from patients and makes over $660, her husband is put on a single status, on the ground that what she receives is not wages or salary, but something else.

As I understood it, the reason for drawing the line which was established was to distinguish between earned income and unearned income, such as invested income from various sources. But take again the case of the lady doctor. If the person to whom I refer was working for a clinic, supposing the clinic consisted of only two or three doctors and the fees were paid to that clinic as such; if she were on salary, even though she received more than she gets now, that would be treated as wages or salary and her husband would be given married status.

That is true not only for married lady doctors, but for married nurses. I think I am correct in this, because I have been in touch with the Minister of National Revenue about it, and I have his letter to this effect: if a married nurse goes on to the staff of a hospital and receives a monthly salary, no matter whether it exceeds $660 a year, her husband is allowed a married status, but if the married nurse takes special cases and receives her fees individually from the patients, either in hospital or in the home—and I put in by way of parenthesis again that we need nurses and that the government is anxious to have these married nurses practise their profession wherever possible—in that case the husband is forced to take a single status if his wife makes over $660. For the life of me I cannot see the reason for the department sticking to that technicality. The letters I have seen, both those addressed to me and copies I have had of letters which have gone to people who are affected by this ruling, simply say that the fees a married lady, be she doctor or nurse, receives on special cases are fees, not wages or salary as defined by the act, and that therefore the husband cannot have a married status. But it seems to me that this business of applying a rule and sticking to the line has been carried a little too far in this case; bearing in mind that the government time and again has said that one of the things it takes into consideration in formulating tax policy is its desired ends, bearing in mind that one of the ends is to encourage doctors and nurses to practise their respective professions, I feel that this line of discrimination should not be drawn, and that we should get away from the practice the parliamentary assistant has followed thus far of only receiving our suggestions and filing them; I hope something will be done with this suggestion.

Mr. ABBOTT: On that point, this was a piece of emergency legislation, and it was introduced because it was found that we needed women workers in the factories pretty badly and for some reason or another they were not willing to go and work—perhaps we cannot blame them—if it meant that their husbands were going to be penalized by a somewhat higher income tax; they would stop when they got to $660 a year. So that on grounds of expediency, if you will, this measure was introduced last year. Incidentally it would appear to discriminate against the lady doctor, for instance—

Mr. KNOWLES: And the married nurse.

Mr. ABBOTT: —and the married nurse. But my view is that we probably should not have had it in the legislation at all, on the strict ground of principle. Nevertheless we have had to put it in so as to ensure the services of these workers. I will bring the remarks of my hon. friend to the attention of the minister, but my belief is that the principle should not be extended.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is not a case of intimidation, but I want to give the actual case in human terms of two doctors I know. The lady in question has indifferent health; it has been touch-and-go with her whether to continue in practice or not, and I am afraid that this may be the deciding factor. I do not say it is the whole cause which may lead her to discontinue her practice, but in the situation as it has been, the considerable difference which it makes to their total tax may be the deciding factor. If that is the case with the married lady doctor, I imagine there must be a good many cases similar to that so far as special nurses are concerned, because special nurses are in a little different situation from that of the lady doctor who has her office and an established practice. A special nurse might take cases or she might decide not to do so, because she would be in exactly the position described by the parliamentary assistant with respect to war workers. Once she gets up to $660 she may take the view that working will result in a loss rather than in a gain to her and her husband. She may decide that there is no point in doing it. We are dealing with human situations. The parliamentary assistant has admitted that this is a matter of expediency and I cannot see any sense in drawing the line where it has been drawn. I hope that when the parliamentary assistant takes the matter up with the minister and his officials they will give favourable consideration to my representations.

Mr. JACKMAN: I had hoped that the parliamentary assistant, who is new to his position, would bring a fresh point of view to bear upon it and not so easily succumb to the chill atmosphere, the love of theory and of easy administration, which to my mind has permeated both these departments for some considerable time now. There is nothing anomalous about the situation mentioned by the hon. member who spoke before me. No wife will take on work in any field, whether in home nursing, in medical practice, or in a munitions factory if it will have such an effect on the joint income of husband and wife that the family as a unit will secure no return from her efforts. That situation will obtain whether in war or in peace, and this committee is not very much concerned with the theory of taxation as suggested by the parliamentary assistant. The question is whether we can get goods and services produced for the Canadian people; and in my opinion, instead of being bound by some slight technicality, as the department is permitting itself to be bound at the present time, the parliamentary assistant should take a broader view. Surely he is allowing himself to succumb to a technicality. Even if the whole rule were changed a year or so ago, after insistence on the part of the opposition, being finally adopted by the administration, even if it were changed as a matter of expediency, I believe the expedient is a sound one; even though it may be against some theory of taxation, it is one which should be embodied as a principle of taxation under the laws of the country and carried into the post-war period. Otherwise we shall find our taxation laws keeping goods and services from being produced for the Canadian people. I maintain that the taxation laws should be made for the people and not the people for the taxation laws. The thing is entirely unfair, and I am not content to have the parliamentary assistant say that he will carry our grievance to the minister and perhaps obtain some redress. I simply wish to reassert what has been previously said, that suggestions made in this house one year, or two or three years ago, have been pigeon-holed and filed by the administration, and finally they are brought out as amendments to the income tax act, but long after the necessity for them has made itself felt—and, as my hon. friend says, on the eve of an election, although I do not think that refers to this particular case. Here we have an urgent need for more nurses in the field, more lady doctors, greater production of all types and more services; and yet the government is adamant about the matter, although it merely carries out an expedient which it adopted in a previous year and which, I submit, should be put into the form of a principle applicable throughout our taxation in Canada, in war time as well as in peace.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the objection to going the whole way?

Mr. ABBOTT: We want more workers in the plants. I suppose, if there are not enough nurses or lady doctors we may have to add additional financial inducements to get them, but somebody else will have to pay the taxes that they do not pay.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not at all. That is where the parliamentary assistant is wrong. He says that somebody else will have to pay the taxes; nothing of the sort. The money will not be earned because the goods will not be produced and the services will not be rendered.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend takes a lower view of the professional classes than I do.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have the floor for the moment. These goods will not be produced, nor will the services be rendered because it will not be worth a person's while. It is no use advancing theories about morals and practicality. People must have some inducement. The minister himself said so. Why does he remove the compulsory savings? It is not to remove taxation at all; the object is that people shall have money. And they must have it in their pockets. That is the only effect which the removal of the compulsory savings provision will have so far as the people are concerned. In this case no one will pay the tax, because the value of these goods and services will not be created and therefore there will be no tax and no increase in the standard of living for the people. It is this sort of thinking that keeps the country behind, and it is high time that the income tax department and those who are supposed to be dictating the laws of the country in that regard, or presenting them to us for our consideration, decided to listen to what members of parliament have to say, speaking from their experience.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am all for lower taxes, but I think it is a little too early to go at it too hard.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am asking the parliamentary assistant a question. If these people do not work, what will happen? We had it from my hon. friend that this is a definite question, from a practical case which he brought before the committee, of a nurse who, if her husband is reduced to single tax status, will not find it worth while. People do not work without making some sacrifice, and they must be given a reward for working in war time just as well as in peace time. The parliamentary assistant said that someone else will pay the taxes. If these people do not work, for the reason that there is no incentive for them to work by reason of the effect which this taxation will have, is somebody else going to pay the extra taxes?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Someone else is going to pay the taxes. We know what our budget will be. I do not believe that a concession of $150 to a married woman, or two per cent in the tax rate, will prevent any self-respecting doctor or self-respecting nurse from working under existing conditions when the country needs their services. My hon. friend may think so, but I do not.

Mr. JACKMAN: The parliamentary assistant does not understand much about life.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I understand as much as my hon. friend does.

Mr. JACKMAN: If a lady doctor or a lady nurse goes out she will have to get someone to look after the house. There are always expenses that must be incurred in earning income. I know situations where people have had to get someone else to look after the children. A woman may have left her profession for a few years and now decides to answer the call for nurses or doctors, but if there is absolutely no monetary incentive for her to do so she may not feel it worth while. I do not see what objection there is from the point of view of administration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Strange as it may seem to the parliamentary assistant, human nature is very much as suggested by my colleague. Not many weeks ago I had an illustration of a lady residing in this city, who was a competent stenographer and who had an opportunity to take a position with the wartime prices and trade board, shall I say—I have forgotten exactly. She was in receipt of a substantial dependents' allowance because of the service of her son. She was in a quandary to know whether she should take the job and lose the dependents' allowance or not. I tried to figure it out mathematically to show that she would be better off, but she said, "What about the taxes I have to pay if I take the job? I can sit back quietly and live on the dependents' allowance, or I can work eight hours a day for the government and have them take from me so much out of my pay cheque—so much deduction for this, so much for deduction for war saving certificates, and what-not." She said, "I had better be an idle fool." I tried to controvert that frame of mind. It was a frame of mind. I am not sure that I was successful. Therefore there is something in what the hon. member for Rosedale has said. The parliamentary assistant cannot just toss it off by saying that people will be patriotic. People want an incentive. I think he will recognize that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I recognize that. My contention is that the incentive is not completely removed.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am sorry that I missed a part of the discussion. Do I understand that resolution 10 has a provision whereby an individual may make a gift of a small sum to the government in order to avoid paying a larger sum?

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is, I think, fully aware of the purpose of this resolution. It is to enable a wife, which is a typical case, to make a gift to the crown of the amount of income she has in excess of $660 in order to prevent her husband from losing the benefit of the tax rates applicable to a married person. In other words, it may happen that a wife whose income happens to run over $660, say $665, may involve her husband in the payment of some $150 or $200 additional tax. It was felt that was unfair. The wife, of course, could obviously correct that by selling something or by reducing her income to $660. It was felt that it was unreasonable to expect that sort of thing to be done.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is there anything to prevent a taxpayer from making a small donation to the government that would get him in a lower income bracket?

Mr. ABBOTT: But I assume he would derive no benefit from that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to call the parliamentary assistant's attention to the language he just used in referring to what is now the government's own proposal. He said the government felt that what resulted from the working of the law was unfair. Because it was unfair the government has brought in this adjustment; and yet when we on this side bring up points which we feel are unfair the parliamentary assistant says we are trying to get concessions, trying to stop people from doing their patriotic duty and so on. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that he take a more reasonable attitude. We are making our appeals in the spirit of the third consideration the Minister of Finance gave to this house in his budget speech, that these high tax rates have brought out certain anomalies, certain cases of injustice, and so on. All we are doing is bringing to the attention of the administration some that they have not yet seen, and we urge that, if it cannot be done on the floor of the house, the department give some further favourable and reasonable consideration to these requests.

Resolution agreed to.

11. That payment by an employer to an employee upon retirement, other than a payment out of a superannuation or pension fund or plan, if the Minister of National Revenue is satisfied that such payment is in recognition of long service, be deemed to be income of the retired employee over a period of five years rather than income in the year when received.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think this resolution is satisfactory as far as it goes and represents an improvement in what existed before. Nevertheless, if an employee, let us say, were to receive $5,000 or, in some cases $10,000 as a retirement allowance in a lump sum, which, I presume, is to keep him for the rest of his life, it will come into only five taxation years, not over the period of his whole life expectancy which may be fifteen or twenty years. I am wondering why the department is not taking this sum, say $10,000, and spreading it over his life expectancy. If he does not live that long I presume some adjustment could be made in the final year On the other hand, unless the employee receives it for a period of service the period in which it will be taxable has no relativity to the length of time he took to earn that amount. Why does the department fix the period at five years, which is by no means the period contemplated by the employer or the employee to receive the benefit of the superannuation fund?

Mr. ABBOTT: If I have understood my hon. friend's inquiry correctly, under section 3 (c), as he is aware, where payments are now made out of a superannuation fund or a plan or a lump sum payment—maybe I had better read the section:

Any payment out of any superannuation or pension fund or plan, provided however that in the case of a lump sum payment out of any such pension or plan which is paid upon the death, withdrawal or retirement from employment of any employee or former employee in full satisfaction of all his rights in any such fund or plan, one-third of such lump sum shall be deemed to be income.

That is the rule where it comes out of an established superannuation fund or plan, but a good many firms do not have any established regular superannuation pension or plan and on the retirement of an old employee they make a lump sum payment, not perhaps with the view that this payment will support him for the rest of his life, but rather in the nature of recognition of his service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A gratuity.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the nature of a gratuity. Up to the present that would be taxable in its entirety in the year in which it was paid. The proposed provision would spread the payment over five years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest to the minister that the scientific method of handling this amount is the expectancy of life. That is easily ascertained. Five years is purely arbitrary. I would press strongly for the adoption of the principle of the scientific method of doing it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to look into that. A good many of these payments are made to old or elderly men, and if they are over a certain age the mortality table does not apply.

Mr. JACKMAN: It always applies.

Mr. ABBOTT: They may get it all in one year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would have to be pretty old to get it all in one year.

Mr. JACKMAN: They are retiring people at sixty-five now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they are going to retire them at sixty.

Mr. JACKMAN: You would be getting from four to ten times the amount by reason of this rule.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee would care to have this resolution stand I am satisfied. I see some objections and some advantages to the suggestion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you not see some merit in the suggestion?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I have indicated that I see some merit in it.

Mr. JACKMAN: The parliamentary assistant has gone so far with us; I wonder if he would grant that there is something in the suggestion that life expectancy is the principle that should be taken. A man may be employed in a business that has folded up, and he may be given a substantial amount in lieu of his expectation with the company, but he may still be a young man of only forty-five or fifty years of age. There are cases like that. Why cannot we frame something which at least has a relation to the life expectancy of the man?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to give consideration to that. I can see, of course, where certain men would get advantages. An elderly man whose life expectancy was three, four or five years would have an advantage over a younger man whose life expectancy may be twenty years.

Mr. JACKMAN: I accept the amendment of five years as far as it goes.

Resolution stands.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on resolution 11.

Mr. ABBOTT: Stands.

Resolution stands.

12. That an employee be allowed to deduct from income the amount, not exceeding three hundred dollars per year, paid by him to an employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan approved by the minister with respect to service rendered previous to the taxation year when he was not a contributor to the fund or plan.

Resolution agreed to.

13. That a member of a trade union be allowed to deduct from income the amount, not exceeding three hundred dollars per year, paid by him in the form of union dues to a superannuation or pension fund or plan approved by the minister.

Resolution agreed to.

14. That the refundable portion of tax in respect of which a taxpayer is entitled to repayment be refunded to a taxpayer when he reaches the age of sixty-five years in the case of a taxpayer whose income is less than five thousand dollars.

Resolution agreed to.

15. That, in respect of the taxation year 1939 and subsequent years, the time for serving a notice of appeal upon the Minister of National Revenue, in the case of members of the armed forces overseas, be extended to one year after the date of mailing of the notice of assessment or for such further period as the minister may allow.

Resolution agreed to.

16. That any amount paid pursuant to a decree, order or judgment made in an action or proceeding for divorce or judicial separation, or pursuant to a separation agreement, as alimony or other allowance for the maintenance of the recipient thereof or of children of the marriage, be allowed as a deduction from income of the payor and that he be not entitled to tax credits in respect of the wife or children to whom or on whose behalf the payments are made, and that the present provision whereby he is entitled to deduct from tax the tax paid by his spouse or former spouse on the amount so paid as alimony or other allowance be repealed.

Resolution agreed to.

17. That exemption from taxation be granted to any limited-dividend housing corporation organized to construct, hold and manage houses built as a low-rental housing project and subject to conditions as to limitation of dividends set out in or pursuant to the National Housing Act, 1938, or any subsequent act of the parliament of Canada designed to encourage the building of houses or the providing of adequate housing accommodation at low rentals.

Resolution agreed to.

18. That with respect to returns filed in 1944 and subsequent years the penalty for failure to file a return be reduced to a penalty of 5 per cent of the amount of the tax unpaid at the date when the return was due with a minimum penalty of $5 and a maximum penalty of $500.

Resolution agreed to.

19. That the deduction in respect of tax paid to Great Britain or any of its self-governing dominions or dependencies or any foreign country for income tax in respect of income derived from sources therein, be made from the tax other than the refundable portion.

Resolution agreed to.

20. That the right of the minister to reassess or make additional assessments in respect of any tax year be limited to a period of six years from the date of the original assessment, except where the taxpayer has made any misrepresentation or committed any fraud in making his return or supplying information under the act

Resolution agreed to.

21. That the interest payable on taxes not paid when due be reduced from five per centum to four per centum.

Resolution agreed to.

22. That losses sustained in 1944 and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods by any person carrying on a business may be deducted from profits derived from the business either in the year immediately preceding or in the three years immediately succeeding the taxation year.

Resolution agreed to.

23. That expenditures in respect of scientific research directly or indirectly related to the taxpayer's business, whether of a current or capital nature, be allowed as a deductible expense, in the case of expenditures of a current nature, in the year when the expenditures are made and, in the case of expenditures of a capital nature, over a three year period commencing with the year of expenditure.

[Mr Abbott.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no objection to proper appropriations or concessions being made for scientific research, that is a field in which we as a parliament, have been negligent to some extent. We have not encouraged scientific research in this dominion as we should have done.

Particularly I would say a word on behalf of our own national research council. As I said the other day, many young scientists who enter the employ of the national research council find the salary conditions unattractive. As hon. members know, the salaries paid are comparatively low. It seems to me that we might well consider a very much larger appropriation for the national research council, particularly to maintain the services of scientists who enter its employ.

I have put in a plea of this kind for several years, and I wish to do so again to-night, because this is a new country with undeveloped resources. In time of peace, before the war, we had resources which were not used as they might have been, because we had not made the experiments which would have enabled us to use them. I am thinking at this time of the manufacture of alcohol for industrial purposes from field grains, and the distillation of oil and gasoline from coal, which has been developed to such an extent in Great Britain and some of the European countries. I make this plea again to-night, and say that we should not be bonusing private corporations to do this research work. We should be doing a great deal of it ourselves, through our own research council. It seems to me that we have been thoroughly negligent in that field.

The same applies to the field of medicine. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie brought before us very forcibly the other day the necessity for further inquiries into cancer cures. A great many scientific proposals are being made at the present time, and we are not using the facilities we have, nor are we building up facilities to inquire into such proposals, and to develop them for the good of the Canadian people. We should be urging the Department of Finance and the government to appropriate a much larger sum of money for research in Canada, and to build up, not only on a national but also on a regional basis, research enterprises directly responsible to the government, which would assist us in developing our resources, and in the use of many of the products we have not been able to use in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the committee rose at six o'clock we were at resolution 11. I entered this chamber at three minutes after eight o'clock, having been detained temporarily in the elevator, and I find that we have jumped to resolution 23. I suggest that that is railroading.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I object to it; you can call it what you like.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were passed as fast as they could be called.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If I may be allowed, as chairman, I must object to the term "railroading."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I withdraw that, then. But I will say—

The CHAIRMAN: May I explain what happened? I was in the chair at one minute to eight o'clock. The bells rang at eight o'clock. At one minute after eight o'clock we had a full quorum, and I called each resolution in order. I called all of them, and all were passed with the exception of resolution 11, which was allowed to stand. However, I did call all the other resolutions, one by one, up to resolution 23, and they were passed by the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, you called them one by one and declared them carried before the members were really here to go to work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; there was a quorum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I wish to speak to resolution 15, which refers to notice of appeal from an assessment. I should like to make some observations with respect to that resolution, and I would ask the committee to revert to resolution 15.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is the pleasure of the committee, we shall revert to resolution 15.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Resolution agreed to.

15. That, in respect of the taxation year 1939 and subsequent years, the time for serving a notice of appeal upon the Minister of National Revenue, in the case of members of the armed forces overseas, be extended to one year after the date of mailing of the notice of assessment or for such further period as the minister may allow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act, if a taxpayer is dissatisfied with his assessment, within thirty days he serves notice of appeal directed to the Minister of National Revenue. That is not just the ordinary notice of appeal that one visualizes in connection with court proceedings. It is not only a notice of appeal; it is a statement of fact, and one has to incorporate with that the grounds of his appeal. In other words, it is equivalent to a factum on appeal, in the appeal courts of this country.

I am not objecting to that very much, because while it may have to be done rather hurriedly, there is a provision for a subsequent and fuller statement of facts and other grounds which may be submitted at a later stage. What I object to is that the notice of appeal, under the procedure laid down in the statute, is from Caesar to Caesar. It is not in accordance with the principles of British justice.

Here we have an assessment made by a Minister of National Revenue. That, of course, is notice to a taxpayer as to his position with respect to his income tax return as filed. Unless he takes action, of course that automatically goes into effect, and he is bound by the terms of the assessment. Should he be aggrieved, either on a point of fact or on a point of law, it is his inalienable right, under every principle of British justice, that he should have an appeal. The statute recognizes the principle, but sets out what I consider to be a non-British system of appeal. You appeal to the man who was your judge in the first instance, and you appeal on the same set of facts. Unless there has been a clear omission on the part of the taxing authority in the first instance, you appeal to the same taxing officer who previously assessed and judged. That is not an appeal at all. If it ended there it would be disastrous. As far as I understand, there is no opportunity to argue the appeal before the appellate court, if you can so call it; that is the minister. You are judged on the statement of facts and the grounds for appeal which you file in writing. As I said before, it is an appeal from Caesar to Caesar. That is bad in principle. If I have adequately stated the principle for which I am contending, I am sure the membership of this committee will agree with me.

I object that you are appealing to the tribunal which has already judged you, which has already imposed an assessment upon you. It is not an appeal except in name. It is not even another trial, because there is no opportunity, except in the written submission that has to be made rather hurriedly, to argue your case on appeal. I say that to have that kind of appeal is a travesty on justice.

Fortunately the administration of the day provided an additional system. When the minister gives his second decision, which he does ex parte, and refuses the appeal—I assume that is done in 99-9/10 per cent of the cases—there is a provision that the appellant may file notice of dissatisfaction and ask that the case be set down for hearing before the exchequer court. I should like to know just how many appeals the minister has allowed.

I am going to give the minister a constructive suggestion. I have already intimated that I do not consider this to be an appeal at all. The appeal ought to be to a judicial body of some kind. I have discussed this matter with more than one person and have come to the conclusion that the appeal should not be to the Minister of National Revenue. He has already judged the case on the same material. The appeal should be to an independent body, judicial in character, which would have the right to hear the parties to the appeal, including the crown. In my view this body should consist of a judge of a high court with the necessary character and ability and capacity. He should be surrounded with what in shipping law we would call nautical assessors; that is, he would have one or more chartered accountants, men who were versed in income tax law and who understood the principle of the income tax structure.

The appeal would be to a body which would be receiving de novo the proposals of the appellant and viewing them dispassionately in the calm light of the facts and the law applicable thereto, and in accordance with the allegations set out in the factum filed by the appellant. Of course consideration would also be given to the right of the crown to reply in writing and to have the matter argued. That is the only way by which I can see that we would have a proper appeal. To-day the position is really a travesty on justice. It may be that that is too strong a term to use. There is no personal reflection on the minister, as he will understand, and if he objects to the term I will withdraw it. But to me it is not an appeal at all. It is not fair to the subject whose rights are in question. It is a loaded court. A decision has already been reached on the same set of facts that will be before the appellate jurisdiction. I think all I have to do is to state the facts and this committee will agree that we ought to set up a new jurisdiction this session to hear these appeals. I believe that if the minister will consult with his officials in the income tax division he will find that there is a volume of opinion there to support the position which I take.

I do not see how the provision can be defended. I cannot recall having discussed this matter in parliament before when the provisions were put there. If I were in the house and did not do so, I would say that I was recreant in my duty as a member of this house in allowing that sort of thing to go on the statute books. The only parallel I can find is in the customs department. In days gone by I used to have a considerable experience in connection with customs assessments and what-not, and I would appeal from the decision of the commissioner of customs to the minister of customs. I can remember only one case in a long line of cases that I handled before becoming a member of this house where the minister of customs reversed the decision of the commissioner of customs; I was successful only once in a series of cases.

You have to have such an overwhelmingly strong case that it would be a denial of justice to do otherwise than to grant the appeal. That is the only parallel I can find in the laws of Canada. I am not suggesting that the minister does not give some consideration to these appeals, but I wonder just how much consideration he does give. Does he sit down calmly with his advisers in a judicial atmosphere and consider the merits of these appeals? I am going to ask the Minister of National Revenue to tell us how many appeals have come before him since he has been minister of that department. I am going to go farther than that and ask him how many appeals have come before the department since this procedure was placed on the statute books and how many have been allowed.

Why is it that the appellant has not the right to be heard? To me the very essence of an appeal is the privilege that goes with it for the appellant or his counsel to state his case and argue it, as he would before a court of justice. Otherwise it is just going through the motions and form of an appeal. I suggest that in a democratic country like Canada that is not good enough. I hope I have not overstated this case because I do not want to do anything like that. I am arguing now for the revision of the procedure relating to appeals.

Let us have a real appeal from the decision of the minister. The only analogy I would draw is an appeal from the judgment of a trial court. To appeal to the judge of a trial court against his own decision would be to me just so much futility. Let us have a real appeal, and I suggest a method which commends itself to my judgment.

There may be other methods that are perhaps better. Why should there not be an appeal direct, we will say, to the exchequer court of this country from the original assessment? It is not easy to make an appeal. You have first to put up security for costs in the sum of $400. That will prevent frivolous appeals. I suggest that that is a substantial sum to put up for security for costs in an appeal. In the ordinary appeals in my part of the country from the judgment of the trial court of king's bench to the court of appeal you do not have to put up any security for costs. I realize that if there were not something in the nature of security demanded there might be all kinds of frivolous appeals in the hope that perhaps some of them would stick and the appellant might win. They would incur no risk, and it would cost them only their out-of-pocket expenses. But here you have to put up $400 as security for costs when you give your notice of dissatisfaction with the assessment after the minister has formed his own judgment. That is a substantial sum. It certainly prevents frivolous appeals.

I do beg the minister to give consideration now, at this session of parliament, to reforming the law—and reform is long overdue—so that there shall be an appeal that will be in fact an appeal, to the end that justice may at least have a chance to function. I do not want the minister to take any wrong interpretation from that statement. He is a lawyer, and those of us who belong to the legal profession know that you cannot have a real appeal to a man who has already decided the matters at issue. What kind of appeal is that? It is just a pro forma appeal. It is not an appeal in fact at all or in essence. We ought to have something better than that in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: The worst you can say of it is that it is a piece of waste motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should we have to go through empty motions and forms? I am glad that the parliamentary assistant has made that remark because I think his mind is following me sympathetically.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say that I agree with you. I said that the worst you could say of it was that it was a bit of waste motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is praising it faintly.

Mr. MARTIN: And condemning it forcibly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appeal to the hon. member for Essex East if I am not absolutely right.

Mr. MARTIN: I agree with you.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am delighted to hear that response. I should also like to get some response from the members on the treasury benches. I appeal to the Minister of Fisheries, an eminent lawyer, who has no doubt practised in the high courts of his native province, if he does not agree with me.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am sorry, but I came in too late to hear the hon. gentleman's argument.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry, too. I do not want to repeat the argument just for the minister's benefit, but I am sure that if I did I would have a sympathetic ear. I see the Minister of Labour looking at me across the way. He has been following me very intently and I am satisfied that he is 100 per cent with me. He is not a lawyer, but in most things he has a large share of common sense. I am going to pay him that compliment, making some reservations, of course.

To come back to my thesis, I earnestly implore the Minister of National Revenue to wipe out what I think is this blot on the administration of the income tax laws of this country. Eventually you get to the exchequer court, but you have first to go through such a lot of empty gestures as the parliamentary assistant has suggested. I want to see a real appeal put on the statute books. It is the right of a citizen to have an appeal. Let me go farther and say that it is a principle of law that the crown has no right to tax the subject unless by express terms in a statute. That is something we have retained since the days of Magna Charta. If there is any doubt about the right of the crown to tax the subject, the crown loses; the benefit of the doubt is given to the subject. But our taxation legislation is continually shifting the burden from the crown, which seeks to impose the tax, on to the subject to show that he should not be taxed. That is not the true principle of taxing legislation. What I have just said is really elementary and will be found in any work on the interpretation of statutes.

I ask the minister to give consideration to the important subject that I have brought up to-night, which it has been in my mind for some time to do, and I ask him that before the bill to be founded on these resolutions is introduced into this house he give consideration, and adequate consideration, to the proposals I have made to do away with what I believe to be a false kind of appeal and give us a real appeal in law. I am sure that any other jurisdiction, if it were brought to the attention of the people of this country, they would be shocked by the present kind of appeal. I earnestly request the minister to give consideration to what I have said. I believe that with his sense of justice and equity he will agree with the proposal I have made here to-night.

Mr. GIBSON: I am very largely in agreement with much of what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has just said. I do not agree altogether. He said that at present the appeal is to a man who has already decided the matter in issue. Theoretically that may be so, but in ordinary practice the assessments are made in the district offices and, while made in the name of the minister, they do not in the ordinary course come to his attention. When an appeal is made it is made to the minister. It is not altogether a happy situation, as the hon. member has suggested. We have dealt with other cases by the setting up of boards. We have, for example, the board of referees to deal with standard profits. That board consists of a supreme court judge, an accountant and a business man, and I think that throughout the country that board is highly respected. The taxpayers who appear before it have not always got exactly what they wanted, but they have felt that they had very fair treatment, and I have heard nothing but commendation for the work of the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The public consider it an impartial tribunal.

Mr. GIBSON: Quite. I have given consideration and am at present considering the advisability of securing authority to set up a similar board which would advise the minister on appeals that are taken under the act. I think that would be a more workable solution than having an independent board set up to deal with the case after the original appeal has come before the minister. It would be just one more step if a board were set up to deal with the case after the minister had passed upon it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not what I suggested. I suggested that there be no appeal to the minister at all once the assessment is made.

Mr. GIBSON: It would amount to very much the same thing if a board were set up to advise the minister because, if the minister had confidence in the board, he would undoubtedly accept its recommendations. The taxpayer would then have the right to appeal further.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case, then the minister and the Minister of Munitions and Supply are arguing exactly opposite.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On principle.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Minister of Munitions and Supply said absolutely the opposite to that.

Mr. GIBSON: I am just dealing with the income tax division at the present time. It has been suggested that while these appeals must be filed in writing the taxpayer has no right to appear in person. I would say that while the act does not say that he has the right to appear, actually in very many cases he does come down to state his case before the minister; and cases under appeal, in some of which the appeal had not actually been filed, have been dealt with by having a personal interview so that a hearing can be given to the taxpayer himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is news to me. There is nothing in the statute which provides for that. Nobody ever told me that an appellant had the right to appear before the minister.

Mr. GIBSON: Many taxpayers do come down and ask for a hearing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, by courtesy.

Mr. GIBSON: It is given by courtesy yes, but certainly it is given in a great many cases.

With regard to the number of appeals which have been heard, I could not of course state how many have been made in the past few years. That can be ascertained. There has been quite a large number, but I do not know offhand how many have been allowed and how many refused.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am certainly encouraged by the frame of mind of the minister, because it shows that he at least is impressed with the injustice of the present procedure and wants to establish something better in lieu of it. I congratulate him upon that, because, as a rule, you do not find him very receptive to suggestions from this side of the house, and I must have great merit, I think, in what I am advocating to get that far. So that I am pleased with the minister and rather pleased with myself.

The minister says this, that in practice the assessment is not made by the minister. I suppose that is correct; he could not possibly attend to it. But the minister or the statute has designated a person to act for him, and of course the act is a ministerial act and is his act. I think he will agree with me that in law the making of an assessment itself is a ministerial act.

Mr. GIBSON: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore it is his act, and to go back to him is futile. I think we had better by-pass that, even though he has a good board of referees to assist him in making decisions. What I want to do is to get away from the atmosphere of the department, from a point of view which is already asserted when you are going to judge something a second time.

There is merit in this suggestion. We all know what the administrative mind is. The administrative mind is to conform as near as may be to what has already been asserted by the department concerned. We ought to get away from that. Let us avoid that atmosphere by putting the matter in the hands of an impartial and competent tribunal. It may very well be that, except on questions of pure law, there should not be any further appeal, to the Exchequer Court of Canada; but I should like to give consideration to that proposal even though I am making it at the moment, that on questions of fact the decisions of the tribunal to which I refer would be final, but that on questions of law, questions relating we will say to jurisdiction to tax, which is a question of law, there should be an appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

I should like the minister to go a little farther than he has gone. He is thinking about it; I can see that. It has been a subject-matter of discussion in his department; I think I know that; and I am pressing for action at this session of parliament. It is not a very big job to draft amendments to the statute to take the place of those already existing. I believe I could do it myself very quickly if my ideas were allowed to prevail, or I would be glad to sit in and help draft an appropriate section. I am in earnest about this, and I think I am right; I believe that thereby justice will prevail in a greater degree than it does under the present system. I say that, again without any reflection on the personnel; but I am impressed with the fact that you are appealing to the same jurisdiction, and that is not a good form of appeal. I would ask the minister if between now and the time these resolutions are finished with, before the introduction of the bill to be founded on them, the department will give consideration to amending the statute along the lines I have suggested. If we cannot agree on the details of what the new tribunal is to be, we can fight it out here in the chamber at a later date. But let us do something in the way of real reform. There is an opportunity to reform the procedure, an opportunity to do real justice, and I am going to ask any hon. member who has had experience in taxation appeals to give me the benefit of his views and let me know what he thinks of the principles I am trying to establish here this evening. I feel that I am on very sound ground, and I am encouraged to think the minister himself, in his heart of hearts, believes that I am on sound ground and that a reform should be had.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say a word on this question of tax appeals? In days gone past I have had some considerable experience in this matter, and as my hon. friend probably knows I have a good deal of sympathy with the views he has expressed.

What he is suggesting is, in effect, that we set up something in the nature of a board of tax appeals, such as they have, I believe, in other countries. The Minister of National Revenue has indicated that he has been giving consideration to a form of advisory board to advise in connection with appeals to the minister. That is a new thought to me. It has some merit. The hon. member for York-Sunbury will appreciate that the question of cost is involved. If we set up a board of tax appeals before which counsel will appear as in the procedure upon a regular appeal, and there is a subsequent appeal to the exchequer court, there might well be some additional costs involved, but many appeals might be disposed of satisfactorily by an advisory committee to the minister in the way he has indicated. To me the thought is a new one and personally I should like to give it some consideration. I cannot, of course, speak for the Minister of Finance, but I will bring to his attention the discussion which has arisen this evening. I know, as the Minister of National Revenue has already indicated, the matter will be given further consideration before the bill is brought in, and probably the hon. member for York-Sunbury and other hon. members who are interested in the subject might also give it a little more thought in view of the discussion which has been raised at this time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank the parliamentary assistant for so much; not much, but something. He raised the bogey of costs. Well, every appellant takes the risk of having his appeal disallowed; and in the present instance you have to put up security for costs in the amount of $400 if you go on to the exchequer court. I am satisfied, as I think I said, that in a bona fide appeal some security for costs should be given to the crown. That is to prevent frivolous appeals, and there will be frivolous appeals unless there is something at stake.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a fine way to get away from paying your taxes too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, they carry interest, and fairly heavy interest. That ought to be penalty enough, I think, so far as the crown is concerned.

Mr. ABBOTT: For the man who is financially uncertain it has great attractions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everyone knows if he has a bona fide case for an appeal or not; that is, if he is well advised, if he employs a competent lawyer or tax expert. Nowadays, with every provincial legislature setting up commission after commission, the lawyers have half their practice taken away. The business of the lawyers has been cut in two by reason of the actions of provincial legislatures in taking away from them the work they used to have. Have a heart so far as the lawyers are concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: Or by a trust company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, or by a trust company. I do not sympathize with the point of view that the question of costs should be an issue at all. I do not think that consideration should be mooted in parliament. It must be done on principles of justice and not on the question of expediency, because that is what the interjecting of this question of costs means.

Mr. ABBOTT: My only thought was whether we should set up a procedure which would necessarily impose considerable costs on the appellant when another procedure might give him the remedy without these costs. He has always recourse to the exchequer court, and I am proceeding on that assumption.

Mr. CHURCH: There is nothing that is causing the soldiers overseas more worry and trouble, and their families at home as well, than the principle involved in the assessment and the notification of assessments as well as appeal to the minister. We have two ministers in charge of this bill to-night—the parliamentary assistant and the Minister of National Revenue, both distinguished soldiers. I was in hopes that now we have reached the end of the fifth year of the war there might be some more just and equitable way of dealing with this matter and sometimes at the base from the point of view of the men serving overseas. In the first place, the relatives at home get the assessment and they do not know what to do with it. A good many of them have come and asked me what they should do with it. This section does not go far enough, or in my opinion it should be struck out altogether. The municipalities have a different way of approaching the principle of assessment and appeal contained in this system so far as the soldier overseas is concerned. When it comes to the men fighting in Italy and in France, and in the invasion, under the circumstances that obtain now, how will you reach the soldiers by notice of assessment? The municipalities do not sell property or real estate in arrears of taxes for anything less than three years arrears of taxes. The larger municipalities, in fact nearly all the municipalities, have some provision, and in some provinces through provincial legislation in regard to the taxation of men overseas and the penalties imposed upon them. The principle of the assessment is an important matter, and the soldier whose income is less than $4,000 should in my opinion be exempt for the period of the war. We should have a more modern system of assessment for civilians and soldiers alike, and you would get as much money out of the taxpayers as you do now. We have an excellent commissioner, a man who is unexcelled anywhere, but he and his staff are given an impossible task to perform, under the provisions of this bill.

I object to the last four or five words of the section extending the time of notice. The last words give the minister power to make the extension and these words should not appear in a revenue bill. The executive should not be given power to make rules and regulations. It is the duty of the House of Commons to examine revenue and all other control bills, every line of them, especially when they take these matters out of the control of parliament and vest them in the executive power. The same thing appears in every piece of legislation that has been presented to the house in war time; powers of this sort are left to the executive. That in my opinion is most objectionable. I do not see why we do not abolish this whole method of taxation and adopt the old income tax methods of the municipalities. Take a man with a small amount, say $4,000. Why not tax him 5, 10, 15 or 20 per cent, or what is for war necessary on a percentage of the net income. In my opinion this whole system is wrong. This tax system is too long. The creation of the world is written in less than 600 words, and the Lord's Prayer is contained in sixty words, but here we have this long bill amended year after year. I do not blame the officials. Parliament is to blame for the present complex act and system. In my opinion we should adopt the old principle we had years ago. If a man has an income of two or three or four thousand dollars you should put an aggregate tax of 5, 10, 15, 20 or 25 per cent, or what is needed, on him. You have to get the money in any event for war purposes, and about fifty-five per cent of the revenue is being obtained through the income tax.

There should be a more reasonable method of assessment for men overseas because it worries the life out of them and their wives and relatives at home. Moreover, a lot of these men cannot pay. Where is a soldier to get money to pay as herein for taxes in arrears starting in 1939, all through 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and up to the present time? Where will the soldier get the money even if he does get the assessment? It is going to be mailed to him overseas, but they do not get all the letters sent them by their families. I know the ministers and officials have laboured long and hard on this subject and know more about it than I do, but I have seen the application of some of these rules and regulations, and if lawyers at home cannot advise their clients how to make up their assessment, how will the soldiers in the invasion, with no one to help them, manage? There should be a stay for a year after the war so far as soldiers are concerned, to give them time to pay up arrears of taxes. A great many of them do not want to be in arrears because they will have to pay that money some time or another, but there should be some reduction in the rates charged men serving overseas, as compared with those who are not in the service. There should be some allowance in that connection, and a revision should be made all along the line. You could not have a simpler system of assessment than the old system we had years ago. There used to be three systems of taxation, federal, provincial and municipal, and I suggest that we should go back to the old method. Soldiers should not be worried in this way. In the case of those under $3,500 or $4,000 no interest should be charged until their return.

Mr. GIBSON: It is the policy of the income tax division not to send notices of assessment to taxpayers when it is known that they are serving overseas. It does happen sometimes that notices are sent to men who have gone overseas without the knowledge of the department, but every consideration is given to men serving overseas.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) invited others in the house, who have some experience in the matter of appeals to the minister, to express themselves in this connection. I think the hon. gentleman has performed a service in bringing this matter before the committee, just as he did yesterday when he brought another matter to its attention. I have had some experience in the matter of appeals to the minister, and I may say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury and to my other fellow members that my experience has been entirely happy and satisfactory. I have taken as many as four appeals to the present minister in a single day, where the clients all lined up outside the door and one after another was heard. And in every case, although they were not successful, the clients went away feeling that they had had a fair deal; that their case had been heard and judicially handled and decided quite satisfactorily. At the same time I am of opinion that the system is not satisfactory. I do not suggest that we should abolish the appeal to the minister. For those who wish to take it, it is all right, but there are others who do not wish to take it. I think we should have some system of judicial decisions that is separated entirely from the administration of the department. No minister responsible for the administration of his department can entirely separate himself—he may do it in his own mind, but it is in his own mind only—from the conditions under which he approaches the question.

There is some talk of an appeal to the exchequer court. That is all right. There is only one official in the exchequer court who would be acting. There might be more than one judge in the court, but only one would be engaged and the expenses do not need to be great. I have no sympathy with this business of charging a litigant $400 as security for costs as is done in the Supreme Court of Ontario in certain circumstances. I have no sympathy with that at all. The public has an interest in this matter and it is the duty of the crown to decide questions of this kind. The officials should not be so taxed with business that they cannot attend to the matter of appeals of this kind. I do not see any reason for charging a man $400 security for costs in order to have some dispute between himself and the department adjudicated by some judicial official. As far as costs are concerned, we can argue that in every infringement of the criminal law; and yet we set up officials all over this province, scores of them, in Canada hundreds of them, who hear disputes between the subject and the crown, usually the issue being as to whether the individual is guilty. We do that with small costs, and we never think of charging costs or security for costs against anybody who appeals to a police magistrate for a mere decision. We ought to be able to have a judicial authority to whom the minister can refer questions which he does not himself wish to decide or to whom those who have questions which they do not care to leave to the minister may appeal. Expense would be slight; the principle would be good. I am satisfied the work-out would be satisfactory, and I support the idea of a judicial appeal in addition to the appeal to the minister.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for York-Sunbury has brought up a very important point to-night, and I think he has put the situation clearly before the committee. He was, of course, dealing with the customary type of appeal; but since this war began there have been hundreds of thousands of Canadians paying income tax for the first time; many, many more people are affected by the income tax to-day than there were before the war, and very seriously affected. Has any consideration been given to providing some sort of appeal for the small businessman or for the individual who perhaps is not taxed a great deal, looking at it against the background of our billion dollar budgets, but from his point of view it does look large? He is simply out of luck. He does not have this appeal, for he cannot raise $400 and pay his own lawyer besides. It is an impossible situation for him. I mentioned it when I was speaking in the budget debate last week. I have had representations from men who feel that they have been unfairly treated in their assessments; they go before the assessor and complain and sometimes they are treated in a rather cavalier fashion. In the course of my speech I quoted from a letter from one of those small businessmen; he pointed out there were those who felt that they were getting a raw deal in some cases and yet could do nothing about it. He put it in this way:

> And yet, after a short time, they paid the assessments so that they could get the worry off their minds and get on with their business, knowing well the difficulties and costs of appeal.

That statement shows a very unfortunate situation with regard to our Income War Tax Act. It is a very important act. It is an important act not only for the years of the war but also for far into the post-war years. The Canadian people should feel that they are being fairly treated under it. If they get what they consider a raw deal, then they should have some proper method of appealing. I suggested that consideration be given to providing for a cheap and summary appeal where smaller amounts are involved; it might be to a county court judge, or perhaps to a judge of a superior court. Has any consideration been given to setting up some appeal court, making some arrangements for an appeal of that type?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend came in a little after the hon. member for York-Sunbury—

Mr. GREEN: I know about the proposal to set up a board.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

Mr. GREEN: Would that be of a nature to help the small man?

Mr. ABBOTT: As to that I am not prepared to say. As I mentioned a moment ago when I was speaking in reply to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, before I became involved in my present duties I did a considerable amount of this work. I know that in practice —and no doubt this applies to a good many other lawyers in the committee—what happens is this: a client who is dissatisfied with his income tax assessment would come in. I invariably took the case up first with the inspector in the local income tax office. I discussed it with him and in some cases would get an adjustment there and then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He does not have much authority.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend allow me to finish? After representations were made it was sometimes settled by the local inspector. If the case was important and I did not get satisfaction in the local office it would be referred to Ottawa. I would sometimes write or come to Ottawa and discuss it with the commissioner as he then was, the deputy minister as he now is, or one of the senior officials here, and finally if I could not get satisfaction, and felt that there was some injustice, shall we say, I would file a notice of appeal under the section which has been referred to, but now, of course, there are no costs involved for that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Up to that point.

Mr. ABBOTT: As the Minister of National Revenue has indicated, that would bring the matter to the attention of the minister himself. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that it is not the ideal method of appeal, but it is an inexpensive method of appeal for the taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It keeps the matter alive, anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. If his appeal is still disallowed he has the right to take it to the exchequer court, and it is at that point that he is obliged to put up the $400 security to which my hon. friend has referred. As the lawyer members of the committee no doubt realize, my own experience in appeals has been that in ninety per cent of those cases the question involved is one of law. It is rarely a question of fact; nearly always it is a question of law, shall we say, an interpretation of some provision of the Income War Tax Act, and I frankly in my own experience do not recall any cases where I had a disputed question of fact involved in one of those appeals.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am speaking of my own experience. I think the hon. member for Trinity will agree that in the vast majority of cases it is a question of law.

Mr. ROEBUCK: As a rule one concedes the facts with the officials and argues the law. You have to concede the facts. But if you had a method of bringing out the facts, perhaps there would be more contest with regard to them.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be so. My only purpose in rising again was that I did not think the hon. member for Vancouver South was in the house when the hon. member for York Sunbury commenced his remarks.

Mr. GREEN: Yes; I heard them all.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then I misunderstood the hon. member. There is at the present time this method of appeal, which involves no real cost. It has been suggested that the method is inadequate. Nevertheless that method exists, and the costs are not incurred until the appellant feels it necessary to take the case to the exchequer court.

Mr. GREEN: Why would it not be possible to provide a summary appeal, a cheap appeal that could be heard out in the districts? It is all right where a person lives in Montreal, and has to come to Ottawa to argue an appeal; but it is an entirely different matter when one has to come from Vancouver or Halifax. The result is that people in those more distant parts of the country do not have the same facilities for appeal. Why cannot something be done to provide for summary appeals?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the main reason is the desirability, at any rate, and probably the necessity of having some uniformity in decisions in these matters. I do not know of any advanced country where the ordinary county court, shall we say, or district court, hears these tax appeals. I know that is not so in England or in the United States. I do not know of any country where appeals of this kind are left to the lower courts. They are almost invariably decided either by special courts set up in the first instance, or by a high court. Here we have the exchequer court.

Mr. GREEN: Could there be a taxation appeal board which would sit in different parts of the country? What would be the objection to that?

Mr. GIBSON: And they would move across the country?

Mr. GREEN: I do not mean the exchequer court. Why not set up a taxation appeal board?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury this evening, namely, that a special appeal tribunal be set up to hear tax appeals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some consideration ought to be given to geographical situation. It is all right in a big case to have counsel come to Ottawa to present their arguments. But I can imagine cases, minor in amounts, where it would be cheaper to pay than to proceed, if one had to come to Ottawa.

However, I did not rise to argue that point; I shall leave that to my hon. friend. One interesting point has been disclosed by this discussion to-night for the first time, namely, that appellants would have the right to go before the minister, after having filed notice of appeal. That is news to me. I did not know it was the practice or the custom, or that that courtesy was extended to an appellant. Certainly there is nothing in the statute to provide for that. It must be a matter of courtesy.

Of course, I can understand coming before the deputy minister, arguing out the matter informally, and trying to convince him that you are right. But I do not consider that an appeal. That is just a sort of preliminary interrogatory. Usually it is done in a very different manner, off the record, and usually one comes away just the same as when he started. If it is the custom of the minister to hear counsel, or to hear parties without counsel, then I think the public ought to know about it. I would suggest to the minister that if that became widely known he would be swamped. He had better not encourage it, because I can see where his time would be taken up completely by that sort of thing.

What I am arguing for is to get away from the administrative atmosphere once the assessment is made. Then the function of the department is exhausted, the minister is functus officio, and the matter ought to go to some outside tribunal. I hope consideration will be given to the suggestion made to-day, and that something substantial will be done before the bill founded upon these resolutions is passed. I shall not labour the point further, because the position has been made clear.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There is no secret about the procedure. It is necessary to file formal notice of appeal, lest your rights go by the board. That is particularly so in connection with income tax appeals, where the appeals are strictly limited. Therefore a formal document is filed. But that is not changing one's relationship in any way with the minister. The document stands, and negotiations continue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there is no right to go before the minister.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes; it goes before the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a no right for an appellant to appear before the minister. There is nothing in the statute about that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: And there is nothing in the statute to prevent it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is statutory jurisdiction.

Mr. ROEBUCK: One does not proceed with it while the discussion continues before the minister. If the minister's decision is unsatisfactory you then reserve your right and proceed with your appeal in a formal way.

I should like it understood that what I have said at all events—and I think what the hon. member for York-Sunbury meant—was that this applies to income tax appeals and also to customs appeals, because customs appeals are in the same position. Many little questions arise, not big ones, where thousands of dollars are involved.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same principle.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There are little questions from little people, some of whom, as has been pointed out, may live long distances from Ottawa.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that this resolution has to do with appeals by or on behalf of members of the armed forces in connection with income tax matters. I am not a lawyer, but I should like to make an appeal right now on behalf of one particular group of service men. They are a group for whom I have spoken in the house on perhaps half a dozen occasions this year. I imagine the answer to my appeal must come from the Minister of National Revenue. I am referring to the men of the Kiska force, and the argument which was made earlier this year in connection with the application of the taxation rules to those men.

The minister will recall that they were taxed originally, through the method of deduction at the source, at the fifty per cent rate, as though they were in the western hemisphere but outside Canada. The appeal I made was that actually they were outside the western hemisphere, and that they were overseas, just as much as the men who had gone to England. I said that they should not be taxed at all for the time they were in Kiska or, according to the rules, for the period of six months thereafter.

After several appeals on this matter—with the hon. member for Vancouver South, who sits to my right, along with other hon. members, giving their support to my contention —the Minister of National Revenue made a satisfactory announcement in March, and at that time he tabled an order in council dated March 17—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —advising us that—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order; the hon. member cannot refer to a debate which has already taken place in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was not referring to a debate; I was referring to an announcement made by the Minister of National Revnue. However, I do not need to refer to that at all, but rather to an order in council. Surely orders in council can be referred to in the house.

By this order in council the government decided to accept our representations and to treat these men as having gone outside the western hemisphere. So far so good; that was fine. Then came the question of applying that order in council. In the case of these men, so far as the six months of 1943 were concerned, during which time they were in Kiska, deductions had already been made. The decision made by the department apparently was that the rebate now coming to them under the order in council tabled on March 28 should be received by the men making out this year their 1943 income tax forms, and claiming such rebate. I understand that that has been done by the men who were taxed erroneously in 1943.

Mr. GIBSON: They were not taxed erroneously; the regulations were changed.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a matter of opinion as to definition. At any rate the plan was that these men would file their returns. They have done so and in due course they should get their rebates. Under the present pressure on the income tax division it takes considerable time to get these forms assessed, and it may be some time in 1945 before the rebates are paid to these men for deductions made in 1943, which I claim should not have been made at all. I think I speak for these men when I say that they are prepared to accept that so far as 1943 is concerned. They do not like it, but they appreciate the administrative difficulties and those who have been in touch with me say that they are prepared to let it go at that as far as 1943 is concerned. But they feel quite differently about 1944.

When they came back to the Canadian mainland their income was still treated as subject to these deductions for the months of January, February and March of this year. After the order in council was passed in March the deductions were not made in April and the subsequent months. Representations which were made to me on behalf of these men were made while many of them were still in Canada. Most of these men are officers who have now gone overseas and are participating in operations there. They feel quite keenly that it was not found possible to make the rebates to them on account at least of the amounts deducted in January, February and March of this year.

I have been in touch with the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance and I believe also the Minister of National Defence about this matter and, of course, administrative difficulties have been presented to me in the correspondence I have received. But here is the position. The men feel that in the light of the decision of the government as evidenced by this order in council these taxes should never have been deducted. As I say, deductions were made in January, February and March of 1944. Apparently these men will have to wait until 1945 to file their returns and claim a rebate for January, February and March, 1944. It will probably be 1946 before their 1944 returns are assessed and the rebates paid to them.

I am fully aware of the many administrative problems facing the income tax division. I did not press one or two matters this afternoon because I was impressed by the minister's statement as to the problems they have to cope with, but I raise this matter because representations have been made quite frequently to me on behalf of these men. I think a special effort should be made to find a way of making the rebates for the deductions made in January, February and March of this year as quickly as possible. I appeal to the minister to do this.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member suggests first of all that the tax deductions were improperly made. I deny that entirely. The deductions that were made, were made from men who were taxable at that time owing to the fact Kiska is in the western hemisphere. I recommended an order in council which was passed, which provided that for tax purposes Kiska would be treated as being outside the western hemisphere.

When we talk about the Kiska force I do not want it to be assumed that all the men who took part in that action were subject to income tax deductions. It was only the officers and the senior warrant officers who earned over $1,600 a year who were liable to the tax. Arrangements have been made to make speedy rebate of the deductions that were made from the 1943 income after taxpayers filed their returns. The deductions that were made for 1944 are in a different position. The income tax department cannot tell what the taxes for each of these individuals will be on his 1944 income until the end of the year. We do not know what rebates he will be entitled to until the end of the year when he files his return. We can ascertain what deductions have been paid into his credit, but that does not say that all of those will be refundable. It will depend to some extent upon the private means of the taxpayer. Consequently we would just be making a guess if we refunded to the various officers of the Kiska force all the 1944 income deductions that were made during 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: Without arguing the point as to whether Kiska is in or outside the western hemisphere, I understand that the provisions are that when a man is overseas for six months or longer he is entitled to exemption from income tax for the first six months after he returns to Canada.

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: Am I correct in assuming that these men were entitled to complete exemption from income tax for January, February, March, April, May and June of this year?

Mr. GIBSON: If they came back at the end of December and had been away for six months.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was the case. I have communicated with men of that force who are still in Canada and they cannot understand why these deductions were made.

Mr. GIBSON: They were liable for tax when the deductions were made, and there are still six months of 1944 in which they will be earning income.

Mr. KNOWLES: According to the order in council no deductions of any kind should have been made for the first six months of 1944

Mr. GIBSON: No tax would be payable on that income.

Mr. KNOWLES: No deduction should have been made on the income earned by these men in the first six months of 1944. If no tax should be payable, why should there be any deduction? I hope the minister will give this matter further consideration. I have referred to the correspondence I have had from him in which he has indicated that it calls for some cooperation or getting together with the Department of National Defence in order to work it out.

Mr. GIBSON: These deductions are made on account of the 1944 tax that they will be due at the end of the year.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister takes that attitude it means that you are asking these men to make payments in January, February and March on account of the taxes that they will owe from the period July to December, 1944. You are asking them to pay something on their income tax six months in advance because, as far as the six months after they came back from Kiska are concerned, that income was free from taxation under the order in council. I appeal to the minister to give this matter further consideration.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if the hon. member is in order in bringing this matter into the discussion on this resolution. The resolution reads:

That, in respect of the taxation year 1939 and subsequent years, the time for serving a notice of appeal upon the Minister of National Revenue, in the case of members of the armed forces overseas, be extended to one year after the date of mailing of the notice of assessment or for such further period as the minister may allow.

I do not think the question the hon. member is now discussing would come under this resolution.

Mr. KNOWLES: The subject-matter of the resolution has to do with appeals by members of the armed forces overseas in connection with income tax matters. I am making an appeal with respect to such a matter on behalf of certain members of the armed forces who are overseas. However, I will not argue with the Chair because, as a matter of fact, it will take only a sentence or two for me to finish the subject. It is really up to the minister to finish the matter, but I wanted to be clear on one point. The minister said that arrangements were made for a speedy refund of the deductions made in 1943. My information is that those refunds have not yet been received. What does the minister mean by arrangements for a speedy refund?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. GIBSON: Get them refunded as quickly as can be arranged. The individual returns are filed in different districts throughout the country, and it was necessary to find out from the Department of National Defence who the men were and where they filed their returns, and obviously it could not all be done within two or three weeks.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, these cases will be taken care of some time this summer ahead of the time when the normal cases will be taken care of?

Mr. GIBSON: Oh, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think that will be quite satisfactory to the men, so far as 1943 is concerned. But I hope that the minister will get to work on the 1944 matter too.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss this resolution, but I am looking for information.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This resolution has been passed but we reverted to it by consent, and we must not go beyond it.

Mr. PERLEY: I think, Mr. Chairman, that you might permit a question for information. I can possibly discuss on this resolution what I want to say.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: The Chair would like the cooperation of members in sticking to the resolution.

Mr. PERLEY: Then I will say what I have to say after the resolution is disposed of.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister whether the members of the auxiliary services serving overseas are treated as being in the armed forces for the purposes of income tax? I refer to the men of the Y.M.C.A., Canadian Legion, the Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus and the Salvation Army. Until recently at any rate they were not given the same exemptions from income tax as the men in the armed forces. But now they are in Italy with the troops and in France with the troops, and I suggest that they should be treated on exactly the same basis as the men in the armed forces. Will the minister explain how they are taxed at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: I should be glad to do that, but I think we ought to adhere to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, since this matter has nothing to do with the resolution before us. Briefly, the members of the auxiliary forces are now subject to tax on a special basis under an order in council which was passed some little time ago. They are treated on much the same basis as the merchant seamen, in that a portion of their remuneration is treated as war risk remuneration and is exempt from income tax.

Mr. GREEN: Do they have to rely on the order in council? Have they no statutory protection?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is so. They are a relatively small group, about 200.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister said that no notices of assessment had gone overseas at all.

Mr. GIBSON: No; I said that it was the policy of the department not to send notices of assessment to men serving overseas.

Mr. LOCKHART: When did that practice stop?

Mr. GIBSON: Some notices have gone because the department had no record of the men who had proceeded overseas. But we do not press a man who is overseas.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the position of a man who has been overseas for two or three years and receives a notice of assessment? I know of men who have been over there for two or three years and have received notices of assessment. What will be the position of these men when they come back? The situation is confusing, and it seems to me that a large number of these men will be piling on to the minister when they come back and that it will be an endless task to straighten these things out.

Mr. GIBSON: Under this amendment a soldier overseas is given a year from the date of sending the notice in which to appeal and such further period as the minister may allow. An extension would undoubtedly be granted to the men who remained overseas.

Resolution agreed to.

24. That the minister may allow depreciation at double the rates normally allowed in respect of bona fide new investments made after a date to be declared by the governor in council; and, in such event, the taxpayer will be required to charge in any subsequent year at least one-half the rates normally allowed: Provided, however, in the case of a sale of assets in respect of which special depreciation has been so allowed, the minister may revise the assessments of the vendor for the years when the special depreciation was allowed, by disallowing as a deduction a pro rata portion of the special depreciation allowed, to the extent of the excess of the selling price over the depreciated cost of the said assets, less the amount of the depreciation normally allowed on the said assets, and less the excess, if any, of the selling price over the undepreciated cost of the said assets: Provided further that the portion of any loss attributable to the allowance of special depreciation shall not constitute a loss for purposes of resolution number twenty-two.

Mr. PERLEY: If I may proceed now, Mr. Chairman, the bells were just ringing when I was on my way down to the chamber, and when I entered you had just carried resolution 23, ten or eleven resolutions having been passed very quickly. The hon. member for York-Sunbury was in much the same predicament and asked to be allowed to revert to resolution 15, which he was permitted to do. I should like to have said something on resolution 22, and to have got a little information from the minister. May we revert to resolution 22?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There was a quorum present when the committee resumed and the resolutions were called and passed.

Mr. PERLEY: There is no precedent for passing the resolutions so hurriedly, Mr. Chairman. Six or seven resolutions were passed in three minutes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We can revert to resolution 22 only with the consent of the committee. Has the hon. member consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Resolution stands.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We will revert to resolution 22.

22. That losses sustained in 1944 and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods by any person carrying on a business may be deducted from profits derived from the business either in the year immediately preceding or in the three years immediately succeeding the taxation year.

Mr. PERLEY: This resolution gives the taxpayer the right to deduct losses from profits either in the year immediately preceding or in the three years immediately succeeding the taxation year. This resolution, as indeed all these income tax resolutions, are based on the budget presentation of the Minister of Finance and no doubt were printed at the time the budget was presented. I suppose the bill to be based on these resolutions is also printed and ready to be considered. During the budget debate certain suggestions were made and an amendment was offered by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, and when the minister spoke in closing the debate he spoke quite favourably with respect to one of the suggestions that had been made to the effect that the farmer should not have to include the proceeds from dispersal sales as part of his income. The suggestion was also made that losses might be spread over five or six years instead of the three years mentioned in the resolution.

Certain suggestions were also made that higher exemptions should be provided for those in the lower income brackets. The amendment proposed an exemption of $800 for single persons and $1,600 for married persons, and I made the suggestion that that apply particularly to single and married farmers.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member asked for the consent of the committee to revert to this resolution and the committee consented unanimously. But he is not confining himself to the resolution at all.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand that these resolutions and the bill to be based upon them are to be passed just as they are and that we cannot make any suggestions or offer amendments along the lines I am proposing? If that is the case there is no use in my continuing. As I said, the minister was quite favourable to one suggestion that was made with respect to the farmers. I should like to ask him, will there be any change in resolution 22 when the bill is brought down, and will provision be made for certain exemptions? Also, as I have said, will there be any change in resolution 22, or how shall we go about getting a change in order to have the average extended to five years?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member wishes to oppose the resolution or suggest that it does not go far enough, that is a proper matter for debate on the resolution. The hon. gentleman was talking about exemptions, whether they should be higher, and so on. That has nothing at all to do with the resolution.

Mr. PERLEY: I would suggest then that the "three years" in the resolution be changed to "five years". Is a motion required to that effect, or what is the procedure; and is the minister favourable to it? From what he said when he closed the debate I gathered that he was; he also referred to permitting the farmer not to have to account for dispersal sales, but I suppose it is too late to consider that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are two different questions.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, on what resolution can that be discussed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not just sure at what stage. I should think it would be when the chairman of the committee says, "Shall I report the resolutions?" Perhaps on the second reading of these resolutions. The hon. gentleman would then, I should think, have an opportunity of urging that we add to the resolutions. He certainly could do it on the bill or the preamble of the bill. Of course he cannot himself propose resolutions; no private member can propose resolutions which increase public expenditure or affect the revenues, except within certain limits which are laid down in the rules; I forget just what they are; but it is all clearly set out.

Mr. PERLEY: Would it be in order to move now that in resolution 22, the fourth line, the word "three" be changed to "five"? If it is in order I would do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think what the hon. gentleman is suggesting carries out what he says is his intention. His intention, I think, is to suggest an averaging of profits and losses over five years.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if he merely proposes the changing of "three" to "five," the resolution would then provide for the carrying forward of losses to the next five years. Perhaps that is what he would like to have done.

Mr. PERLEY: That is what I want, and I should like it more particularly to apply to farmers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I doubt whether that is in order. It is a matter for the Chair to rule upon. I should think that would have the effect of reducing the revenue.

Mr. PERLEY: Then could the resolution stand until the minister considers it further to see whether it is in order to move a resolution of that kind, that this be changed so as to apply to the farmer for a five-year period instead of three years?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I shall have to oppose that. If the hon. gentleman wants to propose it for the sake of putting himself on record, and if he is in order, of course he has the right to do so. But extensive consideration has been given to the proper period here, and we came to the conclusion that we should provide for the carrying of losses back one year and forward three years, and that that was far enough to go.

I notice that the hon. gentleman has a tendency when we propose a five per cent rate to suggest a four per cent rate, and so on, to shave it just a little all the time, as he says, in favour of the farmer. That is what he is proposing here. I do not know why he prefers "five" to "three," except that it is a little more advantageous; that is all. I do not know what principle he is going on.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister suggests that I am proposing "four" instead of "five". I suppose he has reference to my amendment on another bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has done it several times.

Mr. PERLEY: With respect to this, I suggested it when speaking on the budget; I suggested the same principle last year; and I am doing it again, because I think it is right and just, and if I had the time to go into the figures to show the number of years say over the past fifteen-year period, in which the farmer has sustained losses rather than profit, you would be able to judge whether I am sincere in doing it. But the fact that I did it last year is evidence that I am not doing it now merely for the reason suggested by the minister.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not sure that I understand whether this resolution 22 covers the case of the ordinary return to the farmer. Can I read from this that in future the farmer's taxation is to be computed on the average of his three years' revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is not correct. This provides that if in any year a farmer has a loss, that loss may be subtracted from the profit of the previous year for purposes of taxation in that previous year, or subtracted from the profit of any one or more of the three following years for purposes of taxation in those years; but it does not mean the averaging of the profits of three years. If the farmer is in profit all this time, every year, he is taxed on his profits every year without an averaging.

Mr. STIRLING: As the minister knows from his experience in fruit growing in Nova Scotia, it is a case that is continually arising in the fruit-growing sections of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Some devastating pest or otherwise occurs and a man may very easily make a loss in this year and next year make a profit, and the next year make a profit. From my understanding of it, it seems to me that it is possible for him to average the revenues of this year and next year and the following year and arrive at the taxation for those subsequent years with that in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: If he has a loss the effect is that, or very nearly that; I am not sure that it is exactly that. The only point I was making is that unless he has a profit there is no averaging or anything like averaging, but if he has a loss his loss may be deducted from the profits of the previous year or the profits of any one or more of the three following years.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to be clear before we leave resolution 22. Does this alter the present regulations now with regard, say, to a farmer having an auction sale, where he has not paid any income tax previously; can he take that return for his auction sale and file a return for the previous five years. Is that done away with?

Mr. GIBSON: This resolution does not deal with that at all but only with the case where a man in business—a farmer or a businessman —has a loss in any one year. That loss can be applied against the profits of the previous year or any of the following three years, but it does not affect the regulations now in force.

Mr. BRYCE: The same regulations are in effect?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Resolution 24.

Mr. JACKMAN: With the consent of the committee might I revert to resolution 20?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Unless the committee agrees, that cannot be done.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not quite sure, Mr. Chairman, but my understanding was that resolution 23 had not passed. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had spoken on resolution 23. He made a few short remarks and, as he concluded, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, who had just come into the house, asked to revert to resolution 15. My understanding is that resolution 23 was not passed.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Resolution 23 was passed and the hon. member asked to revert to resolution 15.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I suggest that what the parliamentary assistant has said is in accordance with the facts. Resolution 23 had not been passed when we reverted to resolution 15.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I was not in the Chair when the resolution was passed but it is recorded as passed, and then a request was made to revert to resolution 15. I wonder how many times we are going to go back to resolutions that have already been passed?

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order which you have raised yourself, Mr. Chairman, may I say that those of us who have been in the house for a considerable time recognize that we do not make much speed by rushing at the wrong time. There are certain things that have to be discussed and if there are still some points outstanding, I suggest that the Chair might be especially lenient and allow some measure of latitude, because discussion that does not take place here will perhaps take place at a more inappropriate time. These resolutions have taken perhaps the minimum time I have seen income tax resolutions take in the past, and I suggest that the Chair be lenient, because there were special circumstances to-night which might readily deprive some member of his right to take part in the discussion.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I simply wish to repeat that these resolutions were passed—

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no doubt about that, technically.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Just a moment. It is not a matter for the Chair but for the committee to say whether we will revert to resolutions that have been passed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate of course that the record shows resolution 23 as having been passed. I was in charge of the resolutions at the time, and I think that entry was made by mistake, because my understanding was that all the resolutions but 23 had been passed. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had made a few short remarks; before anyone else spoke the hon. member for York-Sunbury asked leave to revert to resolution 15; consent was given, and it was by mistake that the entry was made showing that resolution 23 carried. I suggest that in the circumstances we might delete that entry and revert to the consideration of the resolution.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is understood then that we are considering resolution 23.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to say a few words with regard to resolution 23, which provides that expenditures in respect of scientific research directly or indirectly related to the taxpayer's business, whether of a current or capital nature, be allowed as a deductible expense. I want to ask the Minister of National Revenue a few questions. Can he give the approximate estimated revenue derived from the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act?

Mr. GIBSON: I could not do that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not even an approximation?

Mr. GIBSON: This resolution deals with expenditures of a capital nature; and I cannot estimate what expenditures of that nature will be.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wanted to know what was the estimated income to the department from these sources.

Mr. GIBSON: What sources?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: From all this taxation. Under this particular resolution every business in the country can undertake scientific research, spend practically the whole of its profits on that work and thus deprive the department of tremendous revenues. If every business in the country is allowed to make expenditures for scientific research, directly or indirectly related to the taxpayers' business, and have that allowed as a deductible expense, then I suggest that the department will be robbed of eighty per cent of its revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: The taxpayer is robbing himself every time he robs the government in that way and he is not likely to carry it to excess. Moreover, he is doing a good thing for the country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the point. Suppose he has a business with an income of $13 million, with costs of operation amounting to $10 million, so that he has a profit of $3 million. His ordinary taxes are, say, $1 million. To what extent would that $1 million reduce his income tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he were paying on the forty per cent rate it would reduce it $400,000 and reduce his profits $600,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is, on the $200,000 excess profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: If he is paying forty per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On his excess profits he pays eighty per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. If the whole $1 million were excess he would lessen the revenues $800,000 and he would deprive himself of a refund of $200,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And he would have a million-dollar research undertaking.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the whole thing were excess it would be subject to 100 per cent excess profits tax.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That would be considered pretty good business by such a concern.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it might be very good business for all concerned, for the country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To what extent would it benefit the country. Take the various industries—steel, textile, tobacco, distilleries, cement and so on. If eight or ten of them undertook, each in its own way, research of this kind would there not be tremendous duplication, and would that be efficient? Would it not be better to allow the income to go to the government? The government will suffer loss of revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to be spread over three years.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Just the capital expenditure is to be spread over three years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The ordinary expenditures of operating in each year are allowed; the running expenses are paid each year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The capital expenditures are carried over three years?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that there is terrific duplication here. More than that, the benefits of the research will go more to the company than to the country. Because a particular company is carrying on research work it does not necessarily follow that the people are to get the benefit from it. It seems to me that if the same amount of revenue were brought into the consolidated revenue fund and spent on research enterprises such as we have in Toronto, or more money concentrated on research in Ottawa and the benefits of that research made available to companies, it would be not only more economical but a finer principle for the people of Canada as a whole. At the present time the benefits of research go largely to the companies themselves. Suppose research work results in the lowering of the cost of the manufacturing of a product. It does not necessarily follow that the people are going to get a lower priced article. If the government research people were to carry on that work and make the results available to a certain company, saying to them, "Here is a way of saving $2 on each article; go ahead and use that and reduce the cost of your article to the public by $1.60," the country would benefit from such research. In reading through the item it seems to me that it allows a tremendous leeway; it does not seem efficient, and the costs are to be borne by the government, because if it results in a reduction of revenue the people of Canada are going to pay for it. If that is the case they should be sure that they will get the benefits from it.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to say a word or two on this resolution. I have no intention of elaborating on it, but I see the matter in exactly the same way as does the hon. member for Yorkton. There is nothing in this particular resolution to stop every section of industry across Canada from setting up small pilot plants and carrying on research, with the result that there will be great duplication across the country, and then that will be all charged back for tax purposes. Personally I do not think a great deal of research in any direction is necessary in Canada. I think it has been done.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GILLIS: On two occasions I had the privilege of visiting the research council here. I saw the pilot plants in operation. I will say that they are understaffed, and that the remuneration paid to the capable people is too small. Because of that we lose a lot of these very capable people to industry. I do not think there is a formula necessary for pushing forward industry, agriculture or any other potential development in Canada. I think that has already been done. I think the formulae have been developed. But in the past we have been carrying on this work at government expense and making the results of that research work available to industry at no cost to it. This resolution, in my opinion, merely sets up machinery that will take advantage of the work which has already been done in the national research laboratories. Experiments will be handed over to them with the result that we shall lose revenue in the country. If we want to do something along the line suggested then we should increase the appropriation for our own research council, get an adequate staff and pay them a sufficient sum so that they could carry out research development at the central laboratories. The results of that research could then be sold to industry, to those who are going to make money out of it; that is, if we want to continue the system of private enterprise.

To-day they are getting the benefit of this research for nothing and have been for many years. Take fuel as an example. I am particularly interested in that and only a few days ago paid a visit to the research council. The low temperature carbonization formulae are all there; the high temperature carbonization formulae for coking are there. The hydrogenation pilot plant has been established. They know exactly what they can do with it. That work has already been done. It is merely a matter of making it available and applying it to our resources. Personally I think we are being fooled when we make a provision of this kind that reduces the revenue of the country on the assumption that industry has a job to do in research work with the object of pushing industry forward in the future. That job has been largely done. It is merely a matter of understanding what we have here and staffing our laboratories adequately, applying the knowledge to our resources. Those in industry who want to make profits from it should pay for it. We have a wonderful research council here. The plant is doing a good job under difficult circumstances. I think they have done a wonderful job, although short-handed. I am a little sceptical about this. I am not prepared to argue it at the moment. I think the government-owned facilities have everything necessary in the field of research if they would only control it and apply it to our resources.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a very important subject and I welcome discussion on it within limits. I should not like it to go on too long, but it is worth while discussing and I am very much interested in the views expressed. I do not think the government have the facilities, nor do I think they can furnish themselves with the facilities to do the kind of work they want done in this country in the next few years. If my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply were here, he could deal with this much more competently than I can; but I know in a great many lines of industry the facilities for research work are near the factories; and they are in a position to do research in certain lines more competently than the government can do it without an enormous capital expenditure, a large part of which has already been done by private enterprise.

Mr. GILLIS: You already have it out here. I was amazed at what I saw.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, just on certain lines, but on others we do not have it. There are thousands of lines, and industry can be very, very efficient in research and has been in the past. They have developed marvellous processes and made great technological advances, but they cannot do this even though it is really for the benefit of the business. It is in the line of their business. It is not allowed now as a deduction from income for taxation purposes, and the reason why it is not allowed is that on ordinary accounting principles it cannot be regarded as expenses wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning income. In many cases these research expenditures do not come within those words. The resolution does not cover many research expenditures which are naturally connected with the interest of the business, with the earning of the income, and which I think could properly be allowed. Of course we do go so far as to allow capital expenditures. They can be spread over a three-year period, but what I should like to do is to have this provision about expenditures for research properly safe-guarded in the act, because I do not want to lose revenue any more than does my hon. friend—I was going to say, not as much—I certainly do not want to lose it any more. On the other hand it is most important that we take a leading place among the nations of the world in scientific and technological progress. This is one way in which we shall make quite a spurt ahead.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to make one observation on this resolution which deals with research. I am afraid hon. members to my left are not on a sound basis when they argue against research. If there is one thing in connection with which we are backward in Canada, it is research. Our annual expenditures on research amount to about fourteen cents per capita, whereas annual expenditures in the United States run to several dollars per capita for the same purpose. If we need anything in this country, certainly it is more research. That is one of the few things about which we are extremely backward.

While the national research council may be housed in an amazing and very large building, nevertheless the percentage of research done in that building, or by the national research council, is infinitesimal when compared with the terrific research carried on by private industry, and in our individual plants throughout the country. Those plants should be encouraged. I do not think any industry in Canada is fulfilling its function unless it does a certain amount of research work.

I was pleased to see this provision in the British budget, and this was one of the features which received the greatest amount of praise from the trades union council. The minister may correct me if I am wrong, but I think the English allowed actually up to sixty per cent of a reduction of gross revenue for expenditures on research. I have not the figures before me, but I believe the percentage I have given is correct.

If there is one thing we need more than anything else, surely it is research, and we are going to need it in the world of the future. We shall need it in connection with new light metals and plastics. Where would we have been if RDX (Radar) had not been invented? Where would we have been, had it not been for the invention of the new explosive now being used by the united nations in their heavy bombs? These were both Canadian inventions; and I submit that while one of them was largely the subject of research at McGill university, nevertheless they were not discovered at the research council.

Let us consider the research being done in connection with plastics. Some of the pioneering work was done at the research council, but it dove-tails in with the work being done by Massey-Harris, by the Bakelite company, and a number of other companies. That is the essential part of the work, and private industry is face to face with the problem twenty-four hours a day.

These people in Ottawa are doing pure research, but the people in industry are facing the problems, and are right up against those problems every day. What we need is a dove-tailing of the work of the national research council with the work done in industry, and I am of the opinion that this resolution will go a long way toward doing that. We should have had it some time ago; I have advocated it before. This is the one thing in connection with which we are backward in Canada, and I believe that every individual and every company should be encouraged to take more interest in the matter.

Mr. MARTIN: This matter is one which deserves comment from several members, instead of being restricted to one or two. Actually, I do not think there is much real difference between the views of hon. members who have already spoken. The minister has recognized the need for a safeguard to avoid the possibility of abuse. I think all of us would agree that no industry should be allowed, in the absence of any real intention to promote research, to use that as a means to escape tax obligations. The minister now proposes to provide in the bill the necessary safeguards.

But I think the observations made by the hon. member who has just spoken and by the minister wth respect to research, on the part of both the government and industry, would generally commend themselves to hon. members. I live in a section which is highly industrialized, one which competes very closely with a great city having industry on a large scale, and just on the opposite side of the river. There tremendous research enterprises are undertaken, and to an amazing degree. If hon. members ever have an oportunity of visiting the General Motors Corporation in Detroit, for instance, and look through their research laboratory, they will be amazed. I doubt if any university in this country has anything to compare with those laboratories.

We have to compete, and will have to compete with that sort of thing. One must recognize, then, the great need for research in our own plants. I have seen many of our graduates from our universities forced to go across the river and to take jobs over there because there were no adequate opportunities in these lines for them in Canada. If we can encourage industry, and particularly industry where there would be opportunities to engage in research, and to hire many of the products of our own universities, nothing but profit can ensue.

The national research council has been supported by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and quite properly so. I think we cannot spend too much on the development of research, through government agencies. But government agencies alone cannot do the job. In that connection I remember a statement made by Doctor Tory in one of his reports of the national research council, wherein he pointed out the need for coordination between the work carried on by the national research council and that carried on by industry. So that, with safeguards preventing anyone from escaping tax responsibilities, I strongly support this resolution.

My main purpose in rising, however, was to suggest this, that not only is there an opportunity for industry itself in this provision, but there will be an opportunity in another direction, because the resolution provides that—

> . . . expenditures in respect of scientific research directly or indirectly related to the taxpayer's business . . .

—are to be made deductible. This affords to industry an opportunity to do something which industry in this country has not done, and that is an opportunity to assist in scholarship endowments and, through direct financial grants, to assist the research work of our universities.

There are in this country universities which are carrying on research of tremendous value to industry in Canada, but which receive no assistance whatsoever from industry. I have one large industry in mind which was approached within the last six months by a university in connection with a grant to cover a certain scheme of research. It was a type of research from which the industry in question had profited for a period of eight years.

Under this resolution many of our universities, none of which is over-heavily endowed to conduct studies of this kind, would be afforded an opportunity. I have received a communication recently from Dalhousie university, through the social science and labour school established there. Here an opportunity was afforded individuals who wanted to assist in the development of social science research. The labour school is something that would commend itself to anyone interested in labour.

However, the department took the view that contributions made by individuals to assist in these efforts were not deductible.

I hope the minister will find it possible under resolution 23 to permit contributions by individuals, companies or otherwise, in connection with the prosecution of the kind of thing concerning which I have spoken, and as it applies to Dalhousie university. I should hope this might properly come under the resolution now before us. I trust the commissioner who has this matter in hand will bear in mind what I have said, and that in interpreting resolution 23 he will afford Dalhousie university in the setting up of its labour school something which I think it deserves by way of encouragement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will this be available to farmers? Will farming be considered a business?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is no limitation suggested by the department with regard to the amount which any person can deduct in this manner?

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration will be given in the bill to providing safeguards and restrictions. I do not know just how far we should go. In Great Britain one of the reasons given by the chancellor of the exchequer for making a similar provision, going at least as far as this, was that he wanted to provide for buoyancy of revenue in the future. It is by no means a total loss of revenue when you engage in industrial research. You are casting your bread upon the waters.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I agree with that.

Mr. GILLIS: As I pointed out to the minister, I am not going to argue this at all because I do not know enough about this. Our research laboratories have been practically at a standstill since the outbreak of the war in so far as research into peace-time requirements are concerned. They are doing a wonderful job on war work for national defence, the army, the navy, the air force and munitions and supply. They are handling practically everything in that field that they are asked to do. But their staff is small, and attention should be focused on the necessity of staffing our research laboratories and getting ready for peace-time requirements.

When a private company develops anything new it may be put on the market, but it is sold at a price at which ninety-eight per cent of the people of this country cannot buy it. When anything is turned out by a private company it is sold at a price which does not permit the great majority of the people to benefit. I have worked in one industry for thirty years, and what research have they carried on? What improvements have they made? None.

An hon. MEMBER: It would have been better if they had.

Mr. GILLIS: It would have been better if they had. They are carrying on a little research now at the Sydney steel plant. The federal Department of Agriculture has an appropriation for the development of a fertilizer and the provincial government is assisting. However, I noticed the other day that one of the provincial men who is working with them had to spend three or four days with our national research people getting the necessary information and polishing up on the thing in order that it might be completed. In the final analysis the real work is being done here.

I do not see any solution of the future of this country in research. No doubt a lot of it has to be done. We are in an age where we are in the hands of the scientists. But if these things are to be developed in such a way that they will not be available to the majority of the people, we shall be wasting our time. I do not think the people of Canada realize the extent of our research facilities in Ottawa, and they should be extended and expanded so that we could make these things available to the people.

These private companies tie up the patents after they develop these things. They would not release the method of processing fuel. A senate committee in Washington is trying to break the monopoly of the oil companies in this connection. This research was done many years ago, but the patents are held internationally by the oil companies and will not be used until those companies are ready to make them available. I have no intention of delaying the minister any longer, but I just wanted to make that one point. These things should be made available to the people in order that they can use them, but if you depend upon private industry they will lock them away in their vaults until they are ready to release them.

Mr. JACKMAN: With the consent of the committee I should like to revert to resolution 20, which reads:

> That the right of the minister to reassess or make additional assessments in respect of any tax year be limited to a period of six years from the date of the original assessment.

I wonder if the minister would consent to making that six years from the date of filing the original return.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no, I do not think so.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a long period, six years of uncertainty. I think it is a condemnation of the department if the minister does not accept the situation. I had occasion to look at a company circular recently, and I think the return had not been returned or the assessment made final by the department going back to 1938 or 1939. After five or six years they may finally get the assessment from the department, and then there will be another six years during which the assessment can be considered and before it is made final. That would make a total of ten to twelve years. Surely six years after the filing of the return should be adequate for the department to make any necessary check-up, subject always, of course, to any fraud or the other reservations in the section. Otherwise I think it stands as a shocking condemnation of the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: My first reaction is not favourable, but the hon. gentleman may think that is temperamental. This is a problem for the Department of National Revenue rather than for the Department of Finance.

Mr. JACKMAN: The resolution is brought forward for one particular reason, to give some certainty to business. I am pointing out that there is the possibility of defeating the whole purpose. In the case I have mentioned, they are already six or seven years behind and now they want an additional six years before the assessment will be considered as being final. The department need never give an original assessment unless they see fit. This is one of the outstanding matters of administration in connection with our act and one of the cases where there is, shall I call it a loophole against the taxpayer and in favour of the government. This does not occur in the British and United States acts. We have never had a limitation in our act and now it is proposed to make it six years from the date of the original assessment. The Minister of National Revenue has stated that his department is not so far behind, and if he is correct then there should be no harm in saying that the tax return shall be final six years after filing, and not after the date of the original assessment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can think of cases, perhaps not numerous, where litigation has extended over several years and you could not make a new assessment. However, I do not think that is the main argument against the hon. gentleman's submission. At the present time there is no limitation; the Department of National Revenue could go back to the beginning of the Income War Tax Act and make assessments if facts came to light which showed that a tax was payable. We are taking a long step in advance when we put a limitation on.

Mr. JACKMAN: You are catching up with other countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be. But we are taking a step in advance and I think we had better go a little slowly about this. We had better try the six years at any rate, and then if we can get the assessing machinery which can function very promptly, possibly the time could be counted from the date of the return. But we have not that machinery at the present time. It is impossible to get the staff and it is impossible to make the assessment with great promptness.

Mr. JACKMAN: There has not been much pressure brought upon the Department of National Revenue because the same delay was in existence before the war. Then we had unemployment and accountants were seeking jobs. There is now the excuse that you cannot get additional accountants. Evidently there has been no pressure on the department up to date and it is high time that it should not longer be administered like a country grocery store.

24. That the minister may allow depreciation at double the rates normally allowed in respect of bona fide new investments made after a date to be declared by the governor in council; and, in such event, the taxpayer will be required to charge in any subsequent year at least one-half the rates normally allowed: Provided, however, in the case of a sale of assets in respect of which special depreciation has been so allowed, the minister may revise the assessments of the vendor for the years when the special depreciation was allowed, by disallowing as a deduction a pro rata portion of the special depreciation allowed, to the extent of the excess of the selling price over the depreciated cost of the said assets, less the amount of the depreciation normally allowed on the said assets, and less the excess, if any, of the selling price over the undepreciated cost of the said assets: Provided further that the portion of any loss attributable to the allowance of special depreciation shall not constitute a loss for purposes of resolution number twenty-two.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. ABBOTT: As explained in the budget speech, the general purpose of this proposal for depreciation up to double the ordinary rates is to allow companies to proceed with planning for post-war expansion or conversion of existing plant to peace-time needs. It is impossible for the government to state at this time when the excess profits tax will be removed, but this feature will enable the income from peace-time projects to be applied against the cost of making the new investments at a time when the excess profits tax may still be in force. This, of course, does not mean that the profits from such new investment will escape taxation. It merely means that depreciation charges which are a proper charge against profits before tax may be taken at an accelerated rate from the beginning of such investment.

The measure is safeguarded by requiring an adjustment in profit and loss account in the event of subsequent sale of the assets in respect of which speedy depreciation has been allowed. Furthermore, any loss shown in profits and loss account as the result of this depreciation in excess of normal rates shall not be carried backward or forward as provided in resolution 22. A company is not compelled to take the double rates, although it must take at least half the normal rate allowed.

A similar provision exists with respect to accelerated depreciation granted by the war contracts depreciation board.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister always has the power of revising his assessment?

Mr. ABBOTT: The point I am making is that if accelerated depreciation is approved by the minister, there is a provision that if the assets depreciated are sold, and sold before they would have been fully depreciated under the ordinary basis, then a portion of the special depreciation which has been granted is taken back into profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the full import of that clause in regard to subsequent years, that it must take at least half the ordinary depreciation? I do not understand just what bearing that has.

Mr. ABBOTT: Inasmuch as depreciation is going on anyway, you must start with something, and a business should not have the option of waiting four or five years until it has a profitable year and then plugging it all into that year. It must take some depreciation in each year.

Mr. JACKMAN: Even though they operate at a great loss they must take at least half the ordinary depreciation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and they have the option of taking double.

Mr. JACKMAN: At the present time, without this section being in force, if a corporation does not show any profit at all what is the ruling as to taking depreciation? May they take it or not?

Mr. ABBOTT: They must take half the rates.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall not discuss the resolution at the length at which it might be discussed. As the minister and his assistant realize, it touches very closely the basic issue between the economic philosophy represented by the party to which my hon. friends opposite belong and the economic philosophy of this group. During the course of my speech on the budget debate I joined with others in offering certain congratulations to the Minister of Finance. I believe that he was not in his place at the time so that I might repeat one of the things on which I congratulated him quite sincerely, and that was the clarity with which I feel he states his position so far as his economic philosophy is concerned and as regards what he feels should be the post-war policy of this country. He made it clear during the debate on the budget and in the debate on the second reading of the Bank Act that he feels that post-war Canada should be founded on the principle of strengthening private enterprise. It is an old idea—at least that is the way we characterize it—that if assistance is given to private enterprise, somehow or another the benefits of that assistance will filter down through to the community as a whole. The position we take is that that system has been tried and found wanting, and that the time has come, particularly in view of some of the experiences which this government and other governments have had during this war, to turn to the principle of wider public control of industry and of our economic life.

Further, I want to congratulate the minister on his consistency in this respect. From the position that he takes, this resolution represents a perfectly logical course to pursue. It is, as the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, very similar to the course that has been pursued during the war in the granting of huge amounts for special depreciation to certain firms about which we have spoken in this house from time to time.

I rise at this point only to say that we in this group feel that the country is taking a backward step if it is still held that we can depend on private enterprise or that assistance of this kind can give us progress in the post-war world. I hope that the day will come when we shall have a government that will follow a different policy.

The minister when he referred to these resolutions in his budget speech on June 26 said that this provision would permit private industry to transfer some of its income from a period when war-time tax rates may still be in effect to a later period when the taxpayer may expect normal taxation. In other words, I think the minister will agree that it is correct to say that private industry is being given a chance to gamble on lower tax rates at a later period. That gamble has to be within certain limits, in that the depreciation may not be greater than double the normal rates nor can it be less than half the normal rates. But within those limits private industry is given this chance to gamble that tax rates are much higher now than they will be later on, and to say, "therefore let us get as much depreciation now as we can, while the tax rates in effect are quite high." I confess that from the minister's viewpoint that is at least consistent; it is a consistent way of encouraging private enterprise to try to build this new Canada which we hope will come after the war. My contention is that private industry has been tried and found wanting, and that, consistent though this may be with the minister's philosophy, it will not do the job which needs to be done in the post-war period.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to undertake now to reply to the hon. gentleman. He has, I think, made a fair statement of the issue. We are doing this to encourage investment by private enterprise; that is right, and we think the country will need it. He thinks the investment should be made by government, I presume, or some agency other than private enterprise.

Mr. KNOWLES: Substantially that is so

Mr. ILSLEY: We will not pursue that. But his leader made a speech on the budget to which I just want to refer. He said this, as reported in Hansard, at page 4351:

> Here is another instance of the familiar subsidizing of private enterprises that cannot stand on their own feet. Its plain meaning, as I take it at least, is that the taxpayer is to put up one-half of the new investments but will get nothing in return.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is as far from the truth as possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: The statement is incorrect, and I do not need to elaborate its meaning. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) who has just spoken knows the meaning of these matters pretty clearly, and I do not think he will contend that that statement is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: I might point out that the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is entirely wrong, because he talks about these alleviations of hardship on business in some cases, and in other cases about certain incentives, as being something handed out to business. To me it has always been amazing that business has been able to stand the taxation put upon it, because business does not eat or consume the product which it has or it gets; it is simply an aggregation of people, who have got together in the form of a cooperative, if you like, and have pooled their resources and created work for other people.

Mr. KNOWLES: Aluminium Limited.

Mr. JACKMAN: Certainly if it had not been for United States enterprise coming over here we would never have given twenty-five thousand Canadian workmen jobs, and as one of my colleagues on the committee said, all you could see was that there was a lot of water going to waste up there. No raw materials were taken out of Canada, but we have given twenty-five thousand men employment in doing a great job. One of the most wonderful contributions in the world has been made to the production of aluminum, and the water is still flowing down to the sea. It is a wonderful job which the Aluminum company has done. I do not think it would have been possible for either the Canadian government or the people of Canada to have accomplished that great project without the assistance of this United States company. I may tell the hon. member that the company can produce in three days enough aluminum for Canada's requirements; the rest is all for export. What right would the people or the goverment of Canada have to go into that business under such conditions? However, I do not want to be drawn aside on that particular topic. We have talked about it before; we may talk about it at another time.

I wish to point out that business in this country is not left to itself; it is very heavily taxed; and in many cases there are—I will not call them penalties—exactions made upon business which make it almost impossible for business to go ahead. It was the purpose of this government, when war broke out, so to intensify taxation that it was impossible for any business dealing with civilian production to go ahead or expand. It was meant that these should be throttled, and they were throttled by the rate of taxation we have to-day. No measure could be more socialistic in peace times than a continuance of the taxation policy of the present government and I assume that it will not be continued. But I want to point out, contrary to what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F., in his remarks on the budget, that these are not a hand-out to business; they are a certain measure of relief because business is very heavily taxed in this country. To my mind it is wrong to tax tools. Business is simply a tool, and you cannot have employees unless you have employers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I did not understand he was contending that we were making a hand-out to business, but if he was so contending I would not have agreed that that is what we are doing.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not what he said, either.

Mr. KNOWLES: No. The minister understood me correctly, but the hon. member for Rosedale did not quite get it.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the committee will permit me for just a minute, the hon. member for Rosedale is correct in saying that we have put on very heavy taxation; and we have certain rules about depreciation which may be regarded as normal rules applicable to business as a whole. In cases of new investments there is a relaxation of these rules to some extent. That is not a hand-out to business.

The attitude taken by the C.C.F. generally is that when you get heavy taxes on business, no matter how heavy they are you should keep them there; you should never relax. We are always criticized, I think, by the C.C.F. whenever we relax taxation on business, and that is consistent with the policy, as I understand it, of the C.C.F. party, because they regard it as in the public interest that burdens on private business cannot be too heavy because private business is old fashioned; the way to build a new country is to have an entirely different organization of business; therefore it is in the public interest to make the burdens very, very heavy, and it is always against the public interest to lighten those burdens in any way.

It is not making a hand-out to adjust your taxation to some extent in order to encourage the expansion of business, and I do not think the hon. gentleman accused us of trying to make a hand-out here. But that is what I understand to be the issue between us. I do not complain about the C.C.F. when they come along and say, as the leader of the C.C.F. did in his budget speech, that we should not lighten those burdens no matter how brutally heavy they are, that they should stay there; that these people should not be functioning in that way and that the heavier the burdens the better. That is the belief of my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party. It is not mine.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to say, despite such disagreement as there may be between the minister and myself, that his understanding as to the issue between us is quite clear. But there is just this change in emphasis in what he has said now by way of describing C.C.F. policy in this respect to which I should like to point. The minister spoke as though our only interest so far as taxation of business is concerned is to impose upon it the heaviest possible burden. Now, so long as you have the system of private enterprise, capitalism, in effect as we have it to-day, we feel that the taxes should be sufficiently heavy to drain off to the community as a whole the wealth of the community which in the first instance is getting into private hands.

Mr. JACKMAN: It does not get into private hands. It is double taxation.

Mr. KNOWLES: That policy must be distinguished from the positive policy which we feel should be taken under the kind of government we ourselves advocate. In power, our concern would be, not with what the minister feels to be negative forms of taxation, but with positive means of developing the economy of this country and increasing production. The difference between the minister and me, between the Liberals and the C.C.F., is that he and his party feel that production can be encouraged and employment increased by assistance to private industry such as the minister consistently provides; whereas we feel that these things can best be accomplished by the government itself in the name of the people taking the initiative, somewhat after the pattern which has been followed during the course of this war.

Resolution agreed to.

25. That the provision permitting a taxpayer to deduct from tax the amount paid to any foreign country for income tax in respect of the income of the taxpayer from sources therein, be amended by deleting the requirement that such foreign country in imposing tax allow a similar credit to persons in respect of income thereof from sources within Canada.

Resolution agreed to.

26. That the provision whereby a special payment by an employer to make up a deficiency in an employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan may be deducted from income over a ten-year period be amended to permit annual payments of one-tenth, or less, of such deficiency to be deducted from income in the year of payment.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate the arguments which the minister made about the taxation of annuities and also exemption from taxation in regard to payments into annuity funds, and I noted with interest his intention to set up a commission to study the whole matter. In the meantime, employees who make payments into superannuation funds find it difficult to understand the line of distinction drawn between some of these funds. For example, in the Canadian National Railways set-up, according to the information I have, payments into some of the pension funds are allowed as exemption from income before taxation, while payments into some other pension funds of the Canadian National are not allowed. I understand from a large group of electors I represent in Winnipeg North Centre, men employed in the Weston shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that payments they make into their pension fund, although they were allowable in connection with compulsory savings when that provision was in effect, are not allowable as deduction from income before taxation, and employees who are denied that right know that certain other employees who apparently are paying into the same kind of funds enjoy that right, and feel that there is an unfair distinction there. Can the minister give some explanation? While he is speaking on that point, he might give us some information as to his intention to have that commission set up.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the setting up of the commission, that will be done at the earliest possible date. I cannot say more about it than that, but we intend to get ahead with it. With regard to the distinction between the treatment accorded certain groups of employees and that given some others, roughly speaking it depends upon their own election. The best way for the hon. gentleman to get information is to apply to the Department of National Revenue, because the provisions are complicated. The general principles, however, are these. If the payments in are free from tax the payments out are taxable, and if the payments in are taxed the payments out are free from tax. That is the general principle and it is up to the employees to make election as to which they prefer. In this city the payments into the superannuation fund of the Bank of Canada are taxed and the payments out are free of tax, but the reverse is true of payments into the superannuation fund of the civil service. There the payments in may be deducted from income of civil servants for taxation purposes and the superannuation payments out are taxable. Apparently, one group of civil servants preferred the method applied to them, whereas the employees of the Bank of Canada, or the authorities of the bank, I do not know which, perhaps both, preferred the other plan. It is a question which is the more advantageous.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do employees in all cases have a say in the matter? Take the Canadian Pacific employees to whom I refer.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the trustees of the fund that make the election.

Mr. KNOWLES: A difficulty arises from the fact that most people live in the present, and the employees in one railway shop who are paying taxes when the rates are high feel that it is quite a discrimination against them that they do not get exemption where some employees in some other shops do. I suppose the best one can hope for is that the commission will get to work soon and iron out some of these differences which are perplexing to the people affected, and which they feel to be quite unfair.

Resolution agreed to.

27. That dividends paid by a wholly-owned subsidiary non-resident company to a Canadian parent company be exempt from tax when received by such parent company.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not wish to revert to a previous section, but I should like to inquire with respect to a particular matter and I am not sure that it is covered by any section so far as the resolutions are concerned. I have no desire to take up any considerable time, but could the minister indicate the present situation with regard to the commuters of Windsor district? This is a matter that has been drawn to the attention of a number of members of the house. There are 2,500 or 2,800 of these commuters.

Mr. MARTIN: Three thousand.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend knows that better than I do. I should like an explanation from the minister as to why the government has seen fit up to the present time to refuse application for some adjustment with regard to these people who are working in Detroit and living in Windsor. I take it there are other districts that may be similarly affected, but my information comes entirely by correspondence and the minister will be able to clear the matter up quickly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see how in fairness we can permit the introduction of questions that have no relation to the resolution before the Chair, even by so distinguished a member of the house as the leader of the opposition. This may be brought up on other occasions. I, too, have had correspondence. I do not know that I can recall from memory the points at issue, but certainly they have no relation to this resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was called out on some business for a moment when resolution 25 was being passed, and I felt that perhaps resolution 25 had a closer relationship to the subject which I wish to discuss than any other resolution, and it was with that that I was about to deal.

Mr. MARTIN: I had hoped—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. MARTIN: I was speaking to the point of order. I simply wish to say I desire very strongly to speak on this matter, and I should like to know under what resolution it may be discussed.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the point at issue?

Mr. MARTIN: The point at issue, among others—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It has nothing to do with the resolution we are now discussing. I think we should try to keep to the resolutions as they are.

That dividends paid by a wholly-owned subsidiary non-resident company to a Canadian parent company be exempt from tax when received by such parent company.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is related to the resolution that I spoke on a while ago, resolution 24. I shall not take undue time, but I should like to make a brief statement and I will be concrete about it. Last year some of us had a good deal to say about the Aluminum Company of Canada and the provisions made to that company under the terms of P.C. 11745 of December 31, 1942. The Aluminum Company of Canada is part of the Aluminium Limited set-up, which owns to the extent of 100 per cent the Demerara Bauxite Company of British Guiana. It owns many other companies as well. I believe that comes exactly under the terms of this resolution which reads: "wholly-owned subsidiary non-resident company to a Canadian parent company." The Canadian company is Aluminium Limited, the wholly-owned subsidiary non-resident company is the Demerara Bauxite Company Limited of British Guiana.

Mr. ABBOTT: If that subsidiary were in Canada its dividends would be exempt from taxation when received by Aluminium Limited?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, I understand that; at least I know that the law provides exemption in certain cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of company dividends.

Mr. KNOWLES: Whether this one would fit the details of the act I am not too sure myself. What I wish to point out is when the special depreciation allowance was made under the order in council to which I have referred it provided for $117,000,000 which covered items of expenditure in Canada and also items of expenditure in Newfoundland and in British Guiana for the Demerara Bauxite Company Limited. The schedule attached to P.C. 11745 lists those works in considerable detail, but it does not give the cost of each one. Therefore it is impossible to compute how much of this depreciation was for construction of works in British Guiana, but I made a dead reckoning sort of computation. I simply took the total number of items and set against that the number of items in British Guiana. In using that as the proportion, recognizing that it might be some millions of dollars out, it would seem to indicate that somewhere around $45,000,000 of this depreciation was allowed for the construction of works in British Guiana. Now, the works constructed down there with the assistance in this form include some pretty extensive items.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not assistance.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are right back on last year's argument on that point.

Mr. ABBOTT: They did not build whatever they built in British Guiana out of taxes that had not yet accrued, did they?

Mr. KNOWLES: They built it with money that they were going to get and some of which they had already got in advance on contracts that were due to the war and that were being paid for by the people of the united nations.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not by money provided by the people of Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then in turn they were permitted to deduct from their profits the total cost of this construction. I want to point out that this construction in British Guiana included some pretty extensive items, a great number of railroads and bridges, and the main item of course is the plant and equipment to produce 1,500,000 tons of bauxite per annum. Last year I checked on this matter in the library and found that that figure is more than three times the total annual production of bauxite in British Guiana before the war. In other words, through this means we have helped to make possible the building in British Guiana of a very extensive plant which is the entire property of Aluminium Limited, the parent company in Canada. Up to the present I take it the dividends on the operation of the Demerara Company which have come to Aluminium Limited have been taxable and yet, despite that arrangement Aluminium Limited has got along very well in the profits that it has been able to pile up year by year, and the dividends it has been able to pay. Entirely apart from any argument there may be between us as to the theory behind it, I cannot see the necessity for granting relief on this point to a company such as this, particularly in view of the kind of assistance it has received. I say that recognizing the difference there is between us as to the definition of that word. I see that the Minister of Mines and Resources is interested in this. He and I had some arguments about this very subject last year relating to the question as to what the Canadian government could do about the bauxite company since it was outside Canada. I now call to his attention the fact that it is wholly owned in Canada by a Canadian company and that these extensive developments were financed by this arrangement that we have detailed several times.

My point is that with all that assistance, with the arrangements that we have behind it, I feel that it is going a little bit too far to add to that this further relief from taxation, which, apart from whatever theoretical differences there may be between us, apparently is not necessary because of the profits that Aluminium Limited has been able to show on the old basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only relief from what in effect is triple taxation. This is not relief to shareholders of Aluminium Limited from taxation.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 14, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

MEAT

CONTRACT WITH UNITED KINGDOM FOR SUPPLYING OF BEEF, 1944-45—FLOOR PRICES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that negotiations have been completed for a contract to supply the United Kingdom with a minimum quantity of one hundred million pounds of beef during the two-year period 1944 and 1945, and in addition to this minimum quantity all further surpluses of beef as they become available. The negotiation of this contract has the effect of assuring floor prices for beef on a revised scale.

In the case of special "Red Brand" beef and commercial beef of "Blue Brand" quality, the meat board will purchase for export to the United Kingdom an agreed quantity at prices 25 cents below their respective ceilings. If further surplus quantities of "Red" and "Blue" brand beef are offered to the meat board, the board will purchase all such additional quantities at prices 50 cents below the ceiling.

Other qualities of beef will be purchased on the following basis: Choice and good quality cows, 75 cents below the ceiling; commercial quality not qualifying for "Blue" brand, $1.25 below the ceiling.

Accumulations of beef of lower qualities will be avoided by inclusion in the exports of substantial quantities of boneless manufacturing beef.

The above prices constitute in effect floor prices since the meat board will be prepared to buy all quantities offered to it.

If present trends of marketings continue and if high quality cattle come to market in an orderly manner, it is expected that the minimum quantities provided for in the United Kingdom contract will maintain the prices of "Red" and "Blue" brand beef at a point not lower than 25 cents below the ceiling. In any case, however, no matter how heavy or irregular the marketings may be, the producers of "Red" and "Blue" brand beef will have the complete assurance of the protection of floor prices at not less than 50 cents below the ceiling.

These new floor price arrangements will come into effect on August 21, 1944, and will replace the variable and graduated floors which have been in effect during the 1943-44 season. Under last year's arrangements, the floor prices ranged from $2.25 below the ceiling during the late summer and autumn months to 25 cents below the ceiling in the late spring and early summer months. The new floor prices will remain level throughout the year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION OF CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to drop the order of business now standing under the heading of motions, namely, the further consideration in committee of the whole of the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Neill. Speaking for myself and myself alone, I would regret the abandonment of this order. The committee was set up in a perfectly non-partisan way; it was a good committee and it did a lot of hard work. During the debate ensuing on the report of the committee it appeared that there was objection to the proposals, but I hope that will not deter the Prime Minister from proceeding or endeavouring to proceed with this order of business before the close of the session. If the proposal had merit at its inception, it still has merit, and I suggest that it has.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say to my hon. friend that I share his views about the importance of the work of this committee. There is no one in the house who would have been more pleased than I to see the recommendations of the committee adopted without much in the way of debate. Unfortunately, as my hon. friend knows, when the matter was before the house the last time there was a protracted debate. I was absent from Canada at the time, but on looking over the proceedings I find that the discussion occupied an entire day and that no progress was made. It was apparent to me that if the matter were brought up again the same obstruction would be encountered. I felt it would be advisable, in the circumstances, to allow the matter to stand at least until we had got along as far as we could with the work of the session. It did not seem advisable to risk having important measures held up by another protracted debate. I would think that before the present session is over we might find time to consider this resolution, so that at a subsequent session of parliament the business of that and subsequent sessions might be expedited, but I would not like to give any definite undertaking to my hon. friend at this time.

CANADIAN FORCES

QUEBEC ELECTION—INQUIRY AS TO DISFRANCHISING OF PERSONNEL OUTSIDE THE PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, early this week I directed a question to the three ministers of national defence asking them if they had taken any steps to protest or to urge the premier of the province of Quebec to make some arrangement for the taking of the vote in the provincial election those in the armed forces now outside of that province. Two of the defence ministers indicated at that time that they had not taken any such steps, and I urged that they should do so because this is the only instance, I think, of a provincial election in which that has not been done. Can the ministers indicate whether they have taken any steps in response to my urging of Monday last?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Speaking for the army, I have not taken any further steps in connection with the matter. I have considered it a distinctly provincial matter, one in which I do not think I have any official status to interfere in any way. I felt that my proper function was to allow any considerations which may influence the provincial authorities of Quebec to have such weight with them as they think proper. They are responsible for that.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I have given consideration to the matter, and my views coincide with the views of my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston).

Mr. GRAYDON: The only reason I raised the question is that the three ministers of national defence are the only spokesmen here of the men in the armed forces in such an instance, where a provincial government deprives them of their franchise; and may I pause to say I do not think any provincial government should deprive our No. 1 citizens of their franchise.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has no right under the rules of the house to discuss matters exclusively of domestic concern to provincial governments. He is discussing a matter which is entirely within the jurisdiction of the province and which should not be discussed in this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to transgress any of the rules of the house, and I am not doing so when I ask the three defence ministers to draw this matter to the attention of the government of Quebec. I think that that is a fair request to make, and I make it again because the three ministers are the only three I know of who can be spokesmen here for the armed forces.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that he has been the one in the last few days who has been objecting to having anyone here have anything to say about provincial governments and provincial elections. He should be the last to suggest that there should be any interference by this side or by those inside this house in a provincial election.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just say to the Prime Minister that when he accuses me of taking a certain stand with respect to the relations between the dominion and the provinces, there is no parallel at all. When the premier of Quebec says one thing, and this government on two occasions says directly the opposite, I think that justifies the stand I took.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Leave the election to Quebec.

Mr. GRAYDON: The official interrupter.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AND CONSOLIDATION—ADAPTATION OF UNITED KINGDOM NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT, 1866—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 112, respecting the Naval Service of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister to give a full explanation of these amendments? I understand that they have been included in the bill after certain suggestions were urged by the senate and by the department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend is correct in that statement. The amendments will be found at page 518 of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons. Three amendments were made in the senate, some of which were suggested by the department and all of which were agreed to by the department. The first amendement defines the phrase "Commander-in-Chief" as follows:

"Commander-in-Chief" means an officer appointed as such to the chief command of a fleet, squadron, or station, or, in the case of any station for which no officer has been so appointed, the Chief of the Naval Staff."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that a change in the present definition, or is it creating a new definition?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is new. It will appear in the bill between paragraphs (a) and (c) of clause 2. The phrase "Commander-in-Chief" had inadvertently not been defined in the bill as presented, and it was thought well to have a definition set out in the bill. This definition has been suggested as an amendment by the senate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, there is such an officer as "Commander-in-Chief" but the position has not been defined heretofore.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is correct. The second amendment is purely a matter of wording. The present definition of "man" in clause 2 of the bill reads:

"man" means a person in the naval forces holding the rating of chief petty officer or below;

It was thought better by the draftsman to say:

"man" means a person in the naval forces holding a rating of or below chief petty officer.

It is merely a transposition of certain words.

Mr. ADAMSON: You do not use the word "rating" any more?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The word is not used any more in the bill. It has a meaning in the service.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do you refer to warrant officers, petty officers and men as ratings?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): "Man" includes anybody holding the rank of chief petty officer or below, so that the two words "officers and men" would include the whole field of personnel.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is a simplification.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. The next amendment is to section 74 of the bill, page 17. The present clause sets out that "Any person who designedly or negligently" and so on "strands or hazards any of His Majesty's Canadian ships" and so on and so on "shall suffer punishment". It occurred to us after the bill had passed through this house that there might be ships in the navy, not His Majesty's Canadian ships, but say ships chartered to the navy, supply ships or that sort of thing, which might not be properly speaking ships belonging to His Majesty, and we wanted to have it clear that an officer negligently stranding or losing one of these ships would subject himself to the penalties provided by the clause. I so move.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

CREATION OF DEPARTMENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL OF SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 27, consideration in committee of bill No. 149, to establish a Department of National Health and Welfare—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Deputy minister. Officers and other employees.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this provide for the officers, clerks and employees of all kinds being under the civil service commission, or are there some exceptions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are all under the commission.

Mr. GRAYDON: All under the civil service commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Duties, powers and functions of minister.

Mr. LEADER: Before this section is carried I should like to offer a few remarks. It is an old subject to many in the house, and I expect there are a number here who think that I am more or less of a nuisance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nobody thinks that.

Mr. LEADER: Thank you. I do not believe that individual members think so, but I am not so sure that the government does not consider that I am a nuisance. When I make that statement I include members of the government as individuals; they have the authority, they have the responsibility, and they have not taken any action. It is just one year to-day since this question was brought up in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that he has not yet mentioned what the question is to which he refers. He has something very much in his mind, and I sympathize deeply with him in his wish to discuss it at this time; but when he says that the government thinks he is a nuisance I would tell him that I have always regarded him as quite the opposite, and wish to thank him for the cooperation he has given me time and again. But I have a duty in connection with the leadership of the house, which is to see that the rules of the house are observed. If, in any way, I should have occasion to interrupt my hon. friend it would simply be to draw attention to the fact that we have before us a bill which deals with the creation of a department of government, and with nothing else. It does not deal with the question of individual diseases, a subject that would quite properly come up on some other occasion. So far as I am personally concerned, if the committee is agreeable, and I think it is, to allowing my hon. friend latitude to discuss anything he may wish, I am perfectly agreeable to have him accept that latitude, but I would not like it to be regarded as affording a precedent by other speakers who follow him; and that is the difficulty I have. The subject which he is bringing up is a very controversial one. I was taken much to task the other day after my hon. friend spoke, as I had said to some hon. members, not to pursue the matter any further by taking exception to what had been said. The other side was to have been presented on the part of some, but they deferred for that reason. That is the only objection I have.

Mr. LEADER: I thank the Prime Minister for his kind words. It is because of lack of government action, which I am trying to point out, that I feel it is necessary for me to bring this matter before the committee again. I hate to be considered to be even half out of order; I want to obey the regulations of parliament and adhere to the rules in all cases; but I believe this is the proper time to bring up the subject which is in my mind, namely the investigation of a scientist—some doctors would not call him a scientist—a research worker who has given the best part of his years in research work endeavouring to find a cure for cancer. The man I have in mind is Doctor J. R. Davidson, of 232 Somerset block, Winnipeg. I hope that is definite. You have the subject of the remarks I am now going to make. I hope I am not going to be too long; certainly I do not wish them to be controversial, but if it should happen that they are, I shall try to uphold my end.

As I pointed out when I commenced speaking, it is just one year ago to-day, since this question was first brought up in the House of Commons and no definite action has been taken. There has been some superficial work which has really aggravated more than it has helped the situation. We have heard from one side only, and that is as a result of the superficial investigation which was made by the medical committee of the research council. We have heard nothing with regard to the government's attitude; and because it is so vital to me I have taken it upon my shoulders to acquaint the people of Canada with the true situation, and 10,000 pamphlets have gone out throughout this dominion. I am getting hundreds of letters every day; I know that public opinion is behind me; and I dare to bring a matter up of which I am supposed to have no knowledge.

Just last night I had a telephone call from Windsor. A friend who was operated on for cancer, had been sewed up and for whom nothing could be done, wanted to get the address of J. R. Davidson of Winnipeg. The other day I read a letter from the northern part of Manitoba. I get letters by the hundred from both the western and the eastern parts of Canada; I receive some from England, some from the United States, some even from South America. So that when I make the statement that public opinion is becoming aroused, it is true. Circulars are being sent out from the city of Calgary addressed to ministers of the gospel urging them, if they have at heart the interests of the people of Canada, to back up this request for an investigation.

I am trying to be as temperate as I can, but I want to make my position clear. I said at Portage la Prairie—by the way, my speech was recorded; anyone can hear it, and I expect it is being heard all over this dominion and perhaps beyond it—that the medical committee of the national research council was developing monopolistic tendencies. I wish to prove that statement to-day. I do not want to make a statement and let it go at that; I want to prove what I say.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I know the hon. member realizes that I would be the last person to try to curtail any member's speech, and particularly his. However, we are now dealing with a particular clause of the bill, and if we are to open up a general discussion with regard to various matters not related to the bill or to the clause—the national research council and so on—there will be no end to the discussion. It is a definite rule of the committees of the house that speeches should be confined to the subject matter of the clause before the committee.

Mr. LEADER: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I made a statement at Portage la Prairie and I make it here, that the medical committee of the national research council is developing monopolistic tendencies, and I am prepared to prove it. If it is not the wish of the committee that I should do so, I will say no more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of making a statement. The Chair has to be governed by certain definite rules that are laid down, and if I do not follow those rules I myself shall be open to criticism, and properly so.

Mr. LEADER: May I point out that subsection (b) refers to "investigation and research into public health and welfare." There is not a doubt in my mind, and I hope there is no doubt in any hon. member's mind—I do not think there is a doubt in the Prime Minister's mind—that I am in order. That is the way I feel about it, but I do not want to transgress the rules of the house, and unless I have permission to go on, in the condition I am in today I do not wish to say any more. I do not want your sympathy; we have had too much of that. It takes more than sympathy to cure this disease. I am either in order or out of order, and if you insist that I am out of order I will ask for the decision of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I am bound to abide by the rules that are laid down; if I do not observe those rules I am remiss in my duty. There are other opportunities open to the hon. member. The discussion must be confined to the clause before the committee.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I point out, on the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my decision. If there is—

Mr. McGEER: A point of order can be argued, and the point is this—

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my decision.

Mr. NEILL: It is customary to allow members to express an opinion before a decision is given, and I would like your permission, Mr. Chairman, to make a few remarks on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my decision. There are rules that I must abide by. If we do not observe the rules, then we leave the discussion wide open.

Mr. NEILL: It is the established custom in this house to allow any member to discuss a point of order, but you gave your decision in this instance first and refused to allow anyone to discuss the point of order. That is not fair and is against the rules of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not think any member wanted to speak to the point of order.

Mr. NEILL: I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the Chairman to be calling the attention of the hon. member to the rules of the house. That was the extent to which he went. The hon. member himself raised a point of order. That is still open for discussion, but as far as I heard the Chair, the Chair merely directed the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he was going beyond the rules of the house in discussing the question he did.

Mr. HOWDEN: If the point of order has not been definitely decided, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that we are considering Bill No. 149, and we have reached section 5 which provides:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada. . . .

If the consideration of cancer is not something that has to do with the preservation of public health I would like to know what is.

Mr. McGEER: Subsection (b) reads:

> Investigation and research into public health and welfare.

What the hon. member was discussing was the medical committee of the research council of Canada in relation to public health. Surely that is in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee. If it is the consensus of the committee's opinion that the discussion shall take place, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. LEADER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wish to give some evidence to prove the statement I made that the medical committee of the research council has developed monopolistic tendencies. Most members, perhaps all, have read in the Ottawa Citizen articles written by R. E. K. Pemberton. These were reprinted by permission of News of Toronto, and I quote the following:

Recent discussions in News have highlighted the fact that organized medicine, at least in the United States, can be a menace to public health. To how many will it be news that similar conditions prevail in Canada? This is the truth, and it is a truth much more harmful than merely hateful. It may mean unnecessary sickness and premature death for very many among us—perhaps you or me, or one of our children or more. Much is very wrong right here, and right now, even in Canada, even in Ontario. I write, of course, as a layman; not as a technical expert in any field . . . experts, by the way, are often wrong, and sometimes silly; it is for you and me to use them, not to be ruled by them; to weigh them against each other; to be, as democrats, their masters, not their slaves.

In a succeeding article the same writer deals with the Davidson cancer treatment at Winnipeg, and he draws to the attention of his readers the fact that the Kiwanis club of Winnipeg saw fit to appropriate $2,500 to help Doctor Davidson in his research work. He tells of a mass meeting held at Portage la Prairie, and about a resolution passed there asking for a full and fair investigation into Doctor Davidson's work. Evidently this writer, of whom I know nothing, is imbued with the suspicion, if not belief, that a monopoly does exist in the medical profession. I want to submit some evidence which I also submitted at Portage la Prairie. May I tell you that when the committee was sitting on social security—I refer to No. 22, held on Wednesday, June 16, 1943—the medical committee of the research council was represented by Surgeon Commander C. H. Best, the opening paragraph of whose statement reads—and listen to this evidence, because it should be irrefutable:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen: The associate committee on medical research, of the national research council, wish to lay before the special committee on social security of the House of Commons, evidence that the national research council should be entrusted with the direction of any medical research program which will spring from the application of a national health insurance act.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, that is sufficient evidence. Now I want to say something in reference to what I said the other day. I am quoted in the Journal as saying that the member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) is mentioned as a possible minister of this new department of health which we are creating. That is all they say about it. If they had printed all my remarks I would not have said anything about it here. With all due respect to the hon. member for Renfrew South, I wish to say that if I were making the choice of a minister for this new department of national health, he would not be the one I would choose. If I were to make the choice—I do not think the government will grant me that privilege—I would choose a minister from the hon. members sitting nearer to me than the hon. member for Renfrew South. I just want to say that by the way. I have no fault to find with the newspapers, but sometimes they print these little articles which do not tell the whole story. This particular article seems to imply that I would support the hon. member for Renfrew South as minister of national health. I just want to make it plain to my hon. friend the member for Renfrew South and to all hon. members that he has not my support as a possible minister for this department.

Mr. SLAGHT: Does the hon. member confine himself to medical men? He speaks of those sitting nearer him. Have any of the rest of us any consideration in the matter at all, or is it confined merely to medical men?

Mr. LEADER: I let it go at that. The hon. member may have his hopes aroused, as other hon. members all over the house.

What I am about to say is said with all due respect to the hon. member for Renfrew South. He has not exhibited any desire to have Doctor Davidson's work further investigated. When this bill was before the house a while ago he said he thought that the federal government, the department of health and the national research council had gone far enough. Speaking personally he said he did not think the situation warranted the federal government or the national research council or the department of health spending the taxpayers' money in making further investigations. Then yesterday he said this, or words to this effect—I am not quoting, but hon. members can look it up in Hansard and see if I am wrong. If I am I expect I shall be called to order. He protested against the taxpayer deducting from his taxable income the medical fees he had paid outside of Canada. If that is not a tendency to a monopoly I do not know what it is. In fact one of the hon. members on the other side said that coming from the Liberal party, who he believed were more or less free traders, it was really illuminating. It was asking for a tariff for a certain profession.

I wish to suggest to the government that they cooperate, as this bill intends, with the provinces; cooperate by giving a grant to every province in the dominion to help them to set up some kind of clinic that can look into Doctor Davidson's work. That can be done and should be done in every province.

I mentioned a gentleman who telephoned me from Windsor, Ontario. I do not think that he would get near Doctor Davidson's office, because hundreds are being turned away from all parts of Canada, and some from the United States. You can understand that only a few of the people of Canada will have the privilege of coming in contact with the doctor. Therefore if the government is anxious and willing to exploit this possible cure it should help the provinces to set up these clinics in at least every capital city of the dominion. That is something I proposed before. I am deeply conscious of the fact that the Prime Minister is sympathetic, as are all hon. members of this committee, but for God's sake let us have action. Approximately fourteen thousand people have died from cancer since I brought up this matter one year ago. The people are expecting action. That is all I have to say on this very important matter.

Mr. HOWDEN: I have heard it said that a drowning man grasps at a straw. For many long years the disease of cancer was considered, and it is still considered, largely hopeless. We never cure cancer; we cut it away, and if we cut away enough good tissue with the cancer sometimes we cut the disease away entirely and we get relief. More recently they burn it away with radium and X-ray. Fortunately the radium and the X-ray have a predilection for the diseased tissue rather than sound tissue, and sometimes the individual survives the application of radium and the X-ray, but it does not always cure cancer

There is a lot of ambiguity and misunderstanding with regard to the Davidson affair. I will not even go so far as to call it "the Davidson cure for cancer"; but I would like to tell the story about Doctor Davidson, because I know it. I do not know whether the committee is interested in knowing about this little man, but I know about him personally and I can tell you about him. I have been talking to him personally and comparatively recently, and I know most of the facts in connection with this case. Thirty-five or forty years ago Doctor Davidson was a leading doctor in the city of Winnipeg and has been ever since. He was on the staffs of two or three hospitals there. He was a trusted and leading man, and he still is a trusted and leading physician, although he is an old man now. As the attendant on the staff of the Winnipeg general hospital he had frequent cause to observe cases of new growths, cancer and sarcoma that entered the wards in a hopeless condition. In the ordinary course of his treatment in this hospital he had discovered cases that when they were fed on abundant full nutritional vitamin diet the disease was retarded or slowed up. So definite was this fact that he decided to work on it and to follow it up. At that time there was in the city of Winnipeg a prominent, outstanding surgeon by the name of Doctor J. E. Lehmann, who has since died. I got this story directly from Doctor Davidson's lips, and I think it is well that the committee should know it. A case came into the wards of the general hospital. That case was saturated with cancer that was called carcinomatosis, little cancer deposits growing in the skin of the arm, the shoulders, the scalp and the abdomen. She was full of cancer. She had been an operative case of Doctor Lehmann, and he also was an attendant of the surgical wards. When she dropped into the public ward, apparently to die, Davidson called Lehmann in in consultation to see his former patient. Lehmann said: "There is nothing you can do for the woman, Davidson. You may as well send her home to die." You see, hospitals do not like to have people dying in them. That is not what they are for. Hospitals are for curing people. Lehmann advised that the woman be sent home to die. Davidson kept her there for two or three weeks and he treated her with his idea of a high nutritional diet. Let me tell you what it is. It is chick embryos that have been incubated for thirty-six hours. He takes the fresh egg and he incubates it for thirty-six hours, and then he takes the chick embryo, the beginning of a new life and feeds them to the patient. Thirty-six of those embryos were fed to that woman every day for three weeks—not for three weeks all the time—while she was in the hospital. She appeared to recover, pick up strength and improve. She was sent home, and good word came back to the doctor from her at home. After eight months she came back to the hospital and presented herself to Doctor Davidson. He saw her, and behold, the carcinomatosis had disappeared, the little lumps of cancer in the abdomen, on her arms, her back, her head and so on, and the lumps in her integument had apparently largely disappeared.

I know that there are a lot of sceptical men who would laugh at that. I would just as soon take Davidson's word as anybody else's. He called in Lehmann to look at the woman and he said, "I thought you were dead." She said, "No, I am very much alive, thank you." Lehmann said to Davidson, "I think you have got something; you had better go ahead and work on it."

That was the beginning of experimentation with rodents. Doctor Davidson has definitely established two principles. He has definitely established that he can retard the advance of cancer by a high nutrition diet. That is something definite; that is a principle. Let me explain the experimentation with rodents. They take a mouse and shave the hair from the back of its neck. Then they put a little spot of tar on the shaven place, and the mouse scratches away at that tar until he causes an ulcerating sore, which eventually becomes cancerous. As I told this house previously, Doctor Davidson experimented with two families of mice, one on ordinary nutrition and the other on high nutrition. He discovered that the mice fed on the high nutrition diet did not develop cancer after they had tar put on the back of their necks. Then he went a step further; he decided to experiment with the serum of the healthy families of mice, on the unhealthy families of mice, and actually discovered that when the unhealthy families of mice were injected with the serum from the healthy families, their cancerous sores cleared up. So that another principle was established. Those two principles cannot be denied by the research council of Canada or anyone else, because they have been definitely proven and shown.

Before leaving that point, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has recited in this house the testimony of a great many people concerned with this matter. The other day I received a letter from a lady whom I do not know, who is not a patient of Doctor Davidson, and who is not known to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. She is a Mrs. Florence N. Farwell, of Toronto, and she says:

> In the last issue of Diet Digest an article appeared on cancer written by Dysen Carter telling of Doctor Davidson's work on cancer. I think I can be of help, as my sister developed cancer and went right back to natural foods. It took us eight years to conquer the disease, but we did it. I am enclosing an article which will tell you a little of our struggles during those eight years, that is if you are interested in one's experiences and researches of her own life.

[Mr. Howden.]

On another page I have a statement from this woman, who claims to be the sister of two doctors and who was told by her medical adviser that there was nothing for her but an operation. She decided against that, preferring death, and proceeded to give herself treatment by nutrition and diet. That woman is now living and well. Let me read just one paragraph from her letter:

> When I developed cancer the doctor said it was a carcenoma cutis. As I did not know what he meant I looked in the medical dictionary and found the meaning of carcenoma cutis to be "a malignant cancer." I was stunned. Where could I turn for health? The doctors here said "operation", but I could not bring myself to consider that form of treatment, and my own doctor brothers said, "to leave it alone and live quietly and you may live a few more years." I told them that I could not sit quietly by and let it eat my life away, so, taking my life in my own hands, my sister and I went to work.

I am not going to read the rest of the letter, but it was in 1920 that she was told she could not live more than two years. This is 1944; she is still alive, and has done nothing but follow a strict diet. Apparently she has cured herself of what would seem to have been cancer; at least her brothers were ready to believe that it was cancer, and her medical adviser stated it was cancer. Here we have another instance along the same line as Doctor Davidson's idea, indicating that a high nutritional diet with abundant vitamins is antagonistic to the development of cancer. All right; let us go that far. If we have not actually established those two principles at least we have had them brought prominently to the attention of the people at large, so for God's sake let them hang on to them. As I said a moment ago, a dying man grasps at a straw. If there is anything at all in it; if there is anything to be followed up, let us follow it up.

But what are we doing? What investigation have we had? There has been none. I believe a Doctor Meltzer and a Doctor Campbell, both of Manitoba, were delegated by the Manitoba medical association or the Winnipeg medical society to investigate Doctor Davidson's cancer experiments. They followed up some of the earlier experiments with mice, and reported that they thought there was a good deal of merit in Doctor Davidson's work, but they could not substantiate his findings. That was their report, and there has been no investigation since. With all due respect to the national research council I know they did not investigate Doctor Davidson's work, because I have been talking to Doctor Davidson about the matter and no one spoke to him personally about his work. They did send him a questionnaire: what did you do about this, what did you do about that, and so on, a matter of some ten or fifteen questions. Doctor Davidson answered a few of the questions but he said there were a few he could not answer because he was not able to keep the data, and perhaps was not sufficiently versed in the sort of information they required. An investigation of that kind is not what we want. Here we have the testimony of fifteen or twenty people who declare that they have been benefited—some say they have been cured—by Doctor Davidson's treatment of cancer. I will bet you there are hundreds of people with cancer all over Canada who would jump at the chance to be given that treatment. Why, we should establish small depots in hospitals here and there all over the country and get all people afflicted with cancer to come along and be treated in this way; I will bet there would not be a square inch to spare in any such clinics that might be established.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I hope I have not bored you to death or needlessly taken up the time of the committee, but for heaven's sake let us take some decent action in regard to this matter, so that we may relieve people dying of cancer. That is all I have to say.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, you have heard from a farmer and from a student of medical science. Now you will hear just a brief word from a student of the queen of sciences, theology. I think that will give you a good cross-section of the intelligence of this house. We do not want to find fault with the research council or to hurt any individual. I introduced this matter in the house a year ago, and all we ask is that the findings of Doctor Davidson be preserved. I do not care whether that is done by a committee of the research council or by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, whom I trust absolutely. Let us make some progress, that is the point. Doctor Davidson is one of the finest doctors in greater Winnipeg. I am sure he knows his stuff, to put it in everyday English. There is no sham about him. We must see that his findings are preserved and handed down, for Doctor Davidson is over seventy, and he is not as young as some of us who are around that age. I am sure the Prime Minister and particularly the Minister of Pensions and National Health will not allow this matter to be ignored very much longer.

Mr. McNEVIN: Would the Chairman permit me to ask a question which may be answered either by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie or the hon. member for St. Boniface? What assistance, if any, has been given by the government of Manitoba, through its department of health, in connection with this matter, which I recognize as all-important?

Mr. HOWDEN: If that question is put to me, so far as I know Doctor Davidson has had no assistance from the government of Manitoba.

Mr. LEADER: I might reply to the hon. member by saying that at one time the government of Manitoba did expect the dominion government to make a grant in order that the medical faculty of the university of Manitoba might undertake an investigation. That investigation was not to be a sham. It was to cost money, because they were going to summon witnesses. It was the intention to call people who had taken treatment from Doctor Davidson and had been helped or cured, and to call other patients who had not been helped. It was going to take some money, but they expected to get this grant and they were prepared to go on with the work. The premier of Manitoba, with that in mind, said that it would not be within their responsibility to make a grant until this investigation had taken place. But the investigation has not taken place. I want to say in the shortest possible way that I do not think any action is going to be taken. I hope I may be pleasantly surprised and find that I am wrong in that assumption. If this government fails and if the Manitoba government fails, they will have to answer to the people; I am sure of that.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that certain members of this committee are ready to lead a discussion on the question of cancer cure. I can give my whole-hearted support to that. Our endeavour should be to see that the people of Canada are given the results of any investigation that can be carried on in this direction. What I intended to speak about this afternoon was in continuation of what I said a little while ago when this bill was under discussion and when I supported the general principle. I mentioned at that time that in my opinion it was a great pity that section 5 of the bill did not state definitely in one of its subsections that there would be in this new department a group of officials whose sole duty would be to care for the health and welfare of children. Of course the Prime Minister, who is sponsoring this bill, will say that under the general provisions of section 5 the health of children would automatically be cared for. I must insist that child welfare is a specialized subject and should be dealt with by specially qualified officials who would devote their time to that service alone.

I do not think any hon. member of this house will disagree with me when I say that in war time the nation's best and first care should and does go to the armed forces. Our slogan is everything for the fighting front and for the men who fight, and rightly so. Can we ever forget that during the last war we lost around 60,000 of our men, who were killed in battle, in four years of war, but that during four years after the last war we lost no less than 70,000 of our children, who died before they were a year old.

Upon different occasions and at different times hon. members of this house have risen to urge that the natural resources of Canada shall not be wasted, that we should preserve them for the national good. If we continue to allow this criminal waste of young Canadian lives as we have in the past, I say we are not worthy of the good earth which we inhabit; we are not worthy of the sunlight or the fresh air or the rich stores of food with which this land is blessed. Canada will never be great among the nations of the world if we continue to neglect to give the greatest consideration possible to the care of our children, our greatest national resource in times of peace.

To-day the armed forces are given all that it is possible for us to give. We give them adequate food, proper rest and sleep, good fresh air and exercise, medical treatment when needed, and mental training. That is only right, because these armed forces are defending the honour of Canada among the nations of the world; they are fighting to preserve the freedom not only of ourselves but of all mankind. That is in war. In peace should we not recognize that it is to our children we should transfer our greatest care?—for they are the army of peace.

I have tried to gather together the most recent figures available from the Department of Pensions and National Health having to do with the care of women and children. Some of these figures fall far short of the point where they give confidence to the nation that the best is being done at the present time, although some of us are apt to make allowances because of the war situation. Here is what I found.

In these days, to more than 279,000 families in Canada, in a single year the birth of a baby is the most important event of the year. Out of that number of families, in more than 22,570 the death of the mother or the loss of the baby brings tragedy. In 1942 there were 7,127 stillbirths, 14,637 infant deaths under one year, and 806 mothers who died. Each year more than 800 mothers die from causes connected with childbirth, leaving more than 2,000 children motherless. Each year more than 7,000 babies are stillborn and more than 7,600 die in the first month of life. In addition an unknown number of women are injured in health, and children are handicapped in growth and development, because of conditions associated with maternity.

In Canada about 20,000 confinements take place annually without the services of a doctor. In some provinces one birth out of every six is unattended by a physician. Out of every thousand births—these figures are still for the year 1942, the most recent I could get—25 children are stillborn and 54 more die in the first year of life, while 3 mothers are lost. In 1942, 2,842 Canadian babies died from premature birth. It is quite logical to assume that simple incubators would have done much to save the lives of many of those babies. We lost 2,048 babies from pneumonia, 380 from influenza, 1,249 from diarrhoea and enteritis, and 964 from congenital debility. The loss of life from whooping cough was 559; from diphtheria, 256; scarlet fever, 128 and measles, 130. The figure for measles covers children of all ages. There is no doubt that with proper care and the use of preventive measures a great proportion of this stupendous and unnecessary loss need not have occurred.

I would say that the group of officials in this new department charged with the special care of children should see to it, first, that just as we do for soldiers in the army we should provide for children, irrespective of the rank or position of their parents, those certain essentials which are necessary to build strong and healthy citizens.

First, and this is important, we should see to it that when men and women are about to become parents they should be examined to see if there are any hereditary diseases. This department should carry on work in all parts of Canada to see that mothers receive adequate food and rest and medical attention during the period of pregnancy and at the time of birth. These services should be the same for rural areas as for urban areas by the provision of travelling clinics.

Where mothers are working there should be edequate time allowed from employment without the loss of the job. There should be pay allowance for some weeks before and after the birth of the child. We want our birth rate to go up. We want children who are born and raised on the soil of this country to grow up in the traditions which we cherish. We must not discourage working mothers from having children by penalizing them with the loss of their jobs. They should be permitted to carry on their work whatever it happens to be.

In a recent survey made in all plants in Canada where the united automobile workers' union is operating it was shown that 86 per cent of the women now working in war plants want to continue working after the war is over, for one reason or another. Of the women who answered the questionnaire, 50 per cent were married, 45 per cent single and 5 per cent widows. Seventy-five per cent of all the wives of men in the armed services who answered this questionnaire wanted to continue at work. We must recognize the right of women to continue in the industrial field if they wish to do so. I see no reason why men should determine what women should do. Women should have the right as citizens to continue to work if they feel that they have reasons for doing so.

I believe that such a branch should set up and correlate with other sections of this department channels of social services whereby every child in Canada shall receive adequate supplies of milk, fruit and other food requirements as supplements wherever they are needed. That is not forcing anything upon anybody; it is merely giving them the opportunity to avail themselves of these things where they are necessary. This of course most usually would be done, I suppose, through pre-school creches and through the school lunch plan.

Again the branch could arrange for special clinics to deal with children's diseases, for we have seen that, contrary to popular belief, many infectious diseases of childhood are fatal. The education of mothers could be done through this branch, and certain aspects of child psychology and the care of special types of children could be dealt with adequately. Special open-air play and organized sports centres for little children could be organized; for quite often the little children do not have the opportunity for free play which they should have, because of the presence of older children on the playgrounds. All these and many other activities could rightly come within the purview of such a group of officials of this department or in correlation with other branches of this ministry.

We have had a slogan in war time: Everything for the fighting forces; everything for victory. Now that peace is coming I would like to have as the peace-time slogan of our nation, "Everything for our children and the coming generation." I am not overlooking for one moment the importance of the rehabilitation of our returned men and the responsibilities we have to them and to other sections of our society who may be in need of attention. But I do feel that the investment of public money is something which has to be most carefully considered. I ask the members of this house, as I did when I spoke previously: where is there any natural resource in Canada in connection with which every investment made by the nation would bring as great a return as would come from proper care of the nation's children? Who can estimate the loss to Canada of those young lives so needlessly lost in the years that have gone by. What fine minds, what ability, what character as a nation we have lost in these young ones who might have made not only to Canada but to the whole world a contribution of inestimable value. Can we afford to run the chance of losing a Mendelssohn, a Madam Cure, an Einstein or a Canadian Shakespeare? How do we know that amongst those who were not born alive, or who died before reaching the age of one year, we did not lose some immortal Canadian who might have given, not only to us but to the whole world, of the riches of their minds? Because of our lack of concern for the health of mothers and the preservation of the life of mothers and their children, much has escaped us that can never be recaptured. Do not let us lose any more! Let us see to it that we have for them everything that is possible.

I wish the government had included a provision for such a thing as I suggest right within section 5 of this bill. If the government had drawn up such a section, it certainly would have received unanimous assent from all sides of the house. Often when amendments are introduced by an opposition member or even by some member on the government side of the house, they are automatically voted down because they are regarded as indication of a lack of confidence in the government. To-day I do not want to speak as an opposition member. I do not even want to speak as the representative in this house of North Battleford. I just want to speak as a woman. There are only two women members in this great chamber. The question that I have raised is one that is dear to the heart of women all over this country. I believe that there is not a woman anywhere but would agree that her heart was bound up in the welfare of the children of this nation. I speak not only for myself but for the women of Canada. I say also that I would try to speak on behalf of those many little mouths which have been stopped by death through carelessness and lack of care in Canada, and which, had they the power to speak, might have spoken more eloquently than I ever could on this and many other matters of vital importance, and might have given the leadership to us that we so badly need.

I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a political question. It is not even a question of asking for a further expenditure of money. Therefore, sir, with your permission

I wish to introduce an amendment, moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Cartier, as follows:

That section 5 be amended by adding the following as paragraph (j):

(j) the setting up of a branch of child welfare to deal specifically with all matters relating to the health and general welfare of children, some administrative officials of which branch shall be women.

I hope this amendment will have support from all sides of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, in view of the amendment I think I should speak on it first and then deal with the matter raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie.

May I say at once that I appreciate the contribution made by the hon. member for North Battleford to the discussion of the prenatal, natal and post-natal care of Canadian children. But if the hon. member will look at section 5 of the bill she will find in the first two or three lines that the duties, powers and functions of the minister "shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction." My hon. friend will realize that there are many matters in relation to child welfare over which the parliament of Canada and the government of Canada have no jurisdiction.

One would infer from some of the remarks of my hon. friend, beautifully expressed as they were, and very sympathetically—and I agree with their general tenor—that there was no provision at the present time in the department of health in regard to child welfare. There is a separate division of child and maternal hygiene, and that division will be continued. It is one of the ablest divisions to-day in the department of health. My hon. friend will find at page 48 of the report on the work of the Department of Pensions and National Health a comprehensive description of the functions and duties and scope and responsibilities of that branch of the department. No finer official work has been accomplished in the health field of Canada in the last twenty years than the work of Doctor Couture, who is at the head of the department. His publication entitled "The Canadian Mother and Child" is famous all over Canada. We have issued a hundred thousand copies of that publication in English and in French. Every day of my life I receive from humble homes throughout Canada applications for that publication, and letters of thanks when it has been received.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Everyone in the chamber will endorse that statement, I believe.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am grateful to my hon. friend for his remark. I want to remove this afternoon a twofold possibility of misapprehension. One is that the department of health is not paying attention to this important phase of child welfare, as far as child welfare comes within the competence of this parliament or of this government. Our hearts are all with the ideals expressed by the hon. member for North Battleford. Every hon. member wants conditions improved. I have been looking at the comparative figures relating to Australia and New Zealand, and we in Canada compare with them very well. We are far ahead of some other countries in regard to infant mortality and live births, and so long as we have men like Doctor Couture in charge, so long as we have a sympathetic government, and a kind-hearted parliament, as we have here, I have no doubt that Canada will go ahead from year to year in this most important field.

While I am on my feet I wish to say a word or two with regard to the very moving appeal of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. He made one last year which had a deep impression upon me.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one question before he goes on? Regarding the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for North Battleford, which consists in the addition of another subsection to the bill, "the setting up of a branch of child welfare to deal specifically with all matters relating to the health and general welfare of children, some administrative officials of which branch shall be women,"—the qualifying words at the beginning of section 5 would eliminate the minister's argument, I think, with respect to the question of jurisdiction. After all, the setting up of this particular branch as suggested by my hon. friend would involve only these special matters which actually come within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament. The minister seems to indicate in his argument that the hon. member is asking parliament to legislate on some matter which is not within its competence. I do not think it could be so construed, because the first sentence or the first paragraph of section 5 precludes any possibility of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have only heard the amendment read; I have not had it before me in writing, but as I recall it, it refers to "all matters" relating to child welfare.

Mr. GRAYDON: Within the dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If it means that, we have that organization now, and that organization will be continued specifically as a branch of the new department of national health and welfare, as we have it now in the Department of Pensions and National Health. The amendment is therefore either unconstitutional or unnecessary—whichever my hon. friend chooses it to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to raise a point of order for a moment. It may help to clear up this matter. My understanding of section 5:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada. . . .

—is that it is quite broad enough to include everything which would relate to child welfare over which this parliament has jurisdiction. If the amendment which my hon. friend has moved is something additional to what is there implied, for example, the creation of another branch, for which provision could not be made under this section as it is worded, such an amendment would involve an expenditure of public money and would be out of order. It is not within the competence of a private member to bring forward an amendment or a motion which involves an expenditure of public money. It is well I think to draw this to the attention of the committee at once. I do not raise the point for the purpose of trying to preclude discussion on the importance of the federal government interesting itself as fully as it may with matters pertaining to child welfare. It has been repeated over and over again from different sides of the house, that we should not in this federal parliament seek to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces; and it is well known that many, if not, indeed, all of the provinces regard child welfare as coming specifically within their jurisdiction.

I do not wish to raise any question of jurisdiction, but what I would say is this. The creation of this department of national health and welfare, contemplating as it does very close association with the provinces, will help to remove many difficulties which now arise out of jurisdiction. On these questions of child welfare, it is to be expected that what, in the end, will best serve the interests of the provinces and the dominion, alike, will be furthered by having a federal department which can keep in touch generally with all of these matters, and the duty of which will be to help coordinate them with the provinces, and in that way avoid overlapping as well as ensure that there will be no omissions of essential services.

I would ask the Chairman to rule on the question as to whether this amendment is in order. I contend that it is not, if it contemplates additional expenditure other than is intended to be met under this particular measure.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I would say first to the Minister of Pensions and National Health that I had no intention whatever of leaving the inference that I was not aware of such provisions as are already being made with regard to child welfare under the department which now exists. The last time I spoke on this matter I mentioned the book for mothers and children and recommended it very highly. But I feel that unless we definitely and specifically state that a certain group of officials within this department shall have the sole assignment of these matters relating to child welfare, it may be that in the general scheme we shall not have just what I would envisage. On the other hand I do not wish to have any group of officials in this department overriding the rights of the provinces; that of course would be wrong. But we find a great deal of inequality among the provinces, and I would hope that such a group of officials in this department could do something to equalize the chances for mothers and children in the various provinces.

I will quote a few figures to prove that inequalities exist. In 1942 the number of infant deaths per thousand live births, by provinces, was:

British Columbia	35
Alberta	38
Ontario	40
Saskatchewan	43
Prince Edward Island	50
Manitoba	51
Nova Scotia	58
Quebec	70
New Brunswick	77

In some of the smaller and poorer provinces the opportunity or the likelihood of a child getting good care is not as great as in other provinces; and I believe that some correlation on the part of officials could do something to eliminate that condition.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health has said that so far as our infant mortality rate is concerned we do not stand badly in comparison with other countries. Let me again quote figures to show how we do stand in that regard. In 1942 the number of deaths per thousand live births was 54, which is a record for Canada. I will say this, that ever since 1926 the mortality rate has progressively decreased, yet the number of deaths per thousand live births was 54, as compared with these figures in other countries: United States 40·4; New Zealand 28·7; England and Wales, 49. So that the Canadian death rate is considerably higher than that of these other countries. We still have need to continue and to do more than we are doing for the preservation of the lives of our children.

I did not envisage by this amendment the expenditure of any further moneys. The purpose of the amendment is merely that within the provision made for this department of health we should have certain officials whose efforts should be directed specifically to questions of maternal and child welfare, that they should carry on under the department, using only such sums out of the general funds of the department as might be allocated to them. They should be specifically given that work and their job should be to correlate their efforts with those of the provincial health department in an endeavour to bring about a general betterment of conditions and to establish greater equality of opportunity in the preservation of life in the various provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy that the object of the hon. member for North Battleford will be met by treating this not as a means of interfering with dominion and provincial jurisdiction—because I would be the last to suggest that anything of the sort should be done, for I think there has been too little consultation and cooperation between the dominion and the provinces in this matter of health and welfare to begin with. If that is the objection that the government has, and if it feels that it is not covered by the beginning of the section, I suggest that if the government has in mind accepting the intention of the amendment it might readily be accepted in this form, "that there be set up a branch of child welfare to deal specifically with all matters relating to health and general welfare of children within the jurisdiction of the dominion, some administrative officials of which branch should be women." There cannot be any suggestion that there is an increase of expenditure so far as this amendment is concerned. All the hon. member does is to emphasize by the amendment the necessity for special attention being given to child welfare within the purview of and under the roof erected by this department itself, because she says "some administrative officials of which branch shall be women." May I ask the minister whether there are at the present time administrative officials of this particular branch who are women? I can readily understand that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions and National Health, neither of whom is even married, might concede that the question might properly be brought before the house by the hon. member for North Battleford, who is a mother.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does not the hon. member think that these matters will be largely taken care of if and when we adopt the national health legislation?

Mr. GRAYDON: When are we going to adopt the national health legislation?

The CHAIRMAN: Before I give my ruling, a question was asked the Minister of Pensions and National Health by the leader of the opposition, and perhaps he will answer it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe there are, though I have not the details at the moment. However, there is no objection in the world to having women there. It is fitting that they should be there, though it need not necessarily be put on the statute book.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking to the point of order, the Prime Minister suggested that the amendment proposed by the member for North Battleford would involve additional expenditure. It seems to me that under the terms—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I did not say it would involve additional expenditure. I said I thought the purpose of the amendment was already covered by what was provided for in the bill, but if it was intended to go beyond that, it would involve additional expenditure. If the amendment meant the creation of another department not contemplated by the bill, it could not for that reason be moved by a private member.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, the apprehension that it might involve additional expenditure was the basis on which the Prime Minister raised the point of order, suggesting that it was not within the competence of the hon. member to move the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point was that if the hon. member thought it was necessary to create an additional branch of government, she was proposing something that in her mind was not already covered by the bill and something, therefore, that would require additional expenditure. As such she could not make an amendment of the kind proposed, because it would involve additional expenditure, and would have to receive the approval of the governor general before the house could consider it. That is merely following the rules of the house. My real point.

however, is that provision for all the member has asked for is already made in this bill. In fact, at the present time, as has been shown —the hon. member said she had not known it—there is in the Department of Pensions and National Health a branch dealing with child welfare, and this bill takes over all the functions that are in the present department.

Mr. KNOWLES: It strikes me that the Prime Minister is confusing two arguments. I was trying to deal with one at a time.

Mr. CLAXTON: He is putting them in the alternative.

Mr. KNOWLES: He is using two arguments. Either there is already such a department, or, if the hon. member thinks there is not, this motion would involve in her mind an additional expense. The point I wish to make is that if (j) were added as proposed by the amendment it would only give authority to set up such a department, and that authority would still depend upon a grant of money enabling the minister to carry it out. It seems to me that what we have here is similar to what we have in a good many motions, namely, an abstract statement of something that might be done, provided that the money is voted on another occasion. If the money were not voted for this or for the items under (b) in connection with investigation into research, that work could not be carried out. The amendment on the basis suggested by the Prime Minister does not contravene the rules of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, it has been stated by the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the Prime Minister that section 5 covers entirely what is intended in the amendment submitted by the hon. member for North Battleford. On that score alone the amendment should be nullified. If, on the other hand, it would mean some increase of expenditure, then the amendment on that ground would be out of order. I would refer the committee to standing order 60, Beauchesne, second edition, page 164, citation 551:

> It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the Speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister on behalf of the crown.

In my opinion the amendment would involve additional expenditure, and moreover, as the Prime Minister has stated, all that is asked for in the proposed amendment is already covered in section 5. For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to go back to the subject which was introduced at the beginning of the debate by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, supported by the hon. member for St. Boniface. Perhaps this hour will go down in history as one of the most momentous in the life, not of this session only but of this parliament, altogether transcending in importance even the question of the war. For while the war is a terrible disaster, involving a terrible loss of life, it does not go on for ever, whereas this dread disease will continue for ever unless a cure is found for it, and it will take an ever-increasing toll. I think the house owes a great debt to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and the hon. member for St. Boniface for having introduced the subject. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie spoke with the intensity of a man who was himself a victim; yet I realize just what it cost the hon. member for St. Boniface to take a stand opposite to that of many of his colleagues in the house.

I think it cannot be denied that this man Davidson has, what they call in the vernacular, got something. Take these two hon. members of parliament. I have known them for many years. They have established a reputation for their probity and intelligence. Are we to suggest that they are crooks or humbugs, that they do not know what they are talking about? One of them is a medical man who has enjoyed a long career, and the record of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, who went to, I suppose, the highest authorities in the world, the Mayo Brothers, is well known. It is common usage for some doctors to say that when So-and-so says he was cured by this treatment or that, he did not have cancer; it was just a mistake in diagnosis, he only thought that he had it, or something of the kind. But when men and women, as recorded by the hon. member on a previous occasion, have gone to and been certified by men like the Mayo Brothers to be definitely suffering from incurable and inoperable cancer, then surely we must agree that the resulting recovery was due to something more than idle chance.

Doctor Davidson has spent a long time in that city and is well known. He built up a practice for himself and engaged in the ordinary practice of healing people. He spent his own time and money in developing what perhaps came to him originally by chance in the line of cancer research. Are we to suggest that this man is a crook? If so, then he ought to be exposed. If his methods are good and his statements are true, or even if there is the shadow of a possibility of his being able to produce a remedy, certainly he ought to be surrounded with every comfort and men to learn at his feet. Far better to do that than keep him curing children of mumps in order to make a living.

Why say that we cannot afford to spend a little of the taxpayers' money on this? Look back into history. I do not want to attack the medical men. That would be very foolish when I am trying to get their support in this matter. It is a notorious fact—I do not know why it is so—that history tells us medical men are, in the dictionary sense, not in the political sense, extremely conservative. It has to be demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt, not in hundreds of cases but in thousands of cases, before they will admit the possibility of any startling discovery. That was true of the man who discovered anaesthetics, and the man who discovered the use of vaccine in smallpox, and later on, Pasteur. They were not exactly prosecuted, but they were sneered at. It was said that they were cranks, and it was impossible that it should be so. I read just the other day a story to the effect that in Boston a number of years ago they proposed to prosecute a man because he had been advocating the selling of shares in a ridiculous company which proposed to operate what is now known as the telephone. An editorial in one of the papers said how ridiculous it was to think of such a device, that such a device could not possibly succeed; and even if sound could be sent over a wire, of what practical use would it be? There is a man who was not crucified, but he was prosecuted because he had a little greater vision than perhaps other people.

Davidson was sent a questionnaire, a real official questionnaire, the same as you get when you apply for a passport. They want to know what your wife's father-in-law mother's name was, and so on, bearing strictly upon whether you can get a passport to go to the United States or not. When you have it all filled out and get it certified by a notary public they write to the notary public and say: "Jones said that you signed that paper. Are you a notary public, and did you sign it?" That happened to me. Doctor Davidson got the questionnaire and I suppose—I did not see it but I got the gist of it—they went thoroughly into the situation. Perhaps they asked him: "When did you first begin the investigation of this particular case, or of that particular case? Was it on a Tuesday or a Monday?" The doctor, being a busy man and having to make his own living, and being near the end of his life, replied possibly more curtly than he need to have done. To some particular questions he answered: "I did not keep the data. I did not presume twenty years ago or ten years ago that I would be subjected to this investigation, and I did not keep the data; but I do know that such-and-such results have ensued." The answer then was, "We do not feel we are justified in recommending that public money be spent." That was the recommendation, and yet we are squandering it by the millions every hour in the prosecution of destruction.

This afternoon someone passed a remark—I did not get the exact wording of it—at the expense of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. The committee smiled—smiled in this day and generation at this tragedy. There should be no doubt as to whether we need to investigate this thing. If Doctor Davidson has anything at all, let us pursue it to the utmost. This man is going to die. He is an old man, and he is going to carry his knowledge and information to the grave with him. Then we shall look at each other and wonder why. Somebody will blame somebody else, and ask, why did we not do something? I know it will be said: What have I to do with it? What do I know about it? He is only an ignorant layman anyway. I am not dealing with medical matters as a medical man. I am dealing with them as a layman. If we do not continue this discussion, someone else will get up, as did the hon. member for North Battleford, and introduce another subject, and that will be the end of the presentation made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie; but if we talk long enough the government will say, of course, that a private member cannot introduce any proposal looking to the expenditure of public money. If that is to be the case, the opportunity will be gone and we never know when it may be recovered.

Parliament is going to adjourn shortly, and perhaps a parliament of new men will come back. Some of the present hon. members may not be here. In the meantime this man will die. It is said that God helps those who help themselves. I have a suggestion to offer to this committee. If the government in their narrow-minded fashion will not hold this investigation, how about our doing it? There are 245 members here. If we each put up $50 that would be enough to keep the thing running for a year. Some of us could not afford to put up the $50, but others could easily put up more. I suggest that we take it on ourselves. I should be glad to put up $50 in cooperation with other hon. members in order to help this thing out in the meantime. We will not stand on the order of our going but we will start something, and we will do it. I am sure the press would endorse it. If the members of the government saw that we were willing to attempt it, perhaps they would take an interest in it and investigate it.

This is something much bigger than just a petty amendment to a bill. It is a question that means the lives of millions of people in the future. To what better use could we and the government put our money than that of having this matter investigated? If this man is found to be a crook, I will not begrudge the money; it will be well spent in finding out the facts. I am not suggesting that he is a crook. The people who made the recommendation against him did not suggest anything of the kind; they simply say he is not proceeding along the old standard lines. They say he did not answer the questions in the exact way they were drawn up, and therefore they do not recommend the spending of public money. I suggest that we have the courage of our convictions, and if the government will not do anything, let us do it ourselves. It would be a fine gesture, and we should be giving a lead to the house and the country in doing something which would be more justified than a lot of the measures we have been debating this session.

Mr. McILRAITH: I desire to make reference to paragraph (e) of section 5. In order that there may be greater clarity I think I ought to read the section as it now stands in the bill. Section 5 reads:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters:
>
> (e) the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting the health of the civil servants and other government employees therein.

If the subject matter dealt with in paragraph (e) had not been set out particularly, the point I desire to make would have been covered adequately by the general provisions of the early part of the section, but since it has been particularly mentioned I feel that I should make some reference to it. This is a very narrow way of expressing the problem that we hope will be dealt with. It would seem to limit the minister's jurisdiction to the actual buildings in which public employees work and would appear to exclude such matters as recreation, nutrition and so on. I am sure most of us hope that the matter of the recreation of our citizens will be taken up much more extensively in the post-war era than has been the case heretofore. Already the employees of the dominion government in Ottawa have a recreational association of their own which is doing splendid work in this respect. The programme envisaged and undertaken by this association promises to be most helpful, and I think has been advanced sufficiently to indicate its beneficial nature. Certainly it is an important part of the social welfare of the people of Canada. It is my hope that, as we go on, the government, and particularly this new department and its minister, will take active steps to advance that work with respect to government employees. I do not desire to elaborate on that subject at the moment, but I wish to emphasize its importance.

There are other, similar subjects to be dealt with, such as nutrition. In future years I hope the government will extend its activities in those fields of public health and nutrition. Nevertheless the clause as it now stands expresses the authority of the minister in very narrow terms. If there is no legal objection—and I see none according to the rules of the house—and no objection on the part of the government I would suggest that the words "the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting" be struck out and these words substituted: "the conservation and promotion of", and that the word "therein" at the end of the subsection be deleted. It would then read: "the conservation and promotion of the health of the civil servants and other government employees." I think that would more adequately describe what is intended to be covered by this subsection and we would be left in the position that it could not be argued at some future time that the jurisdiction of the minister was limited to the narrow question of the supervision of public buildings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend no doubt has observed, the clause to which he has just referred is in the existing act as subsection (e) of part 2. As has been stated several times, that act was passed some twenty or more years ago. I think the hon. member has rightly drawn attention to the circumstance that as it now stands the section is narrow and restricted and doubtless would be improved if the words he has suggested were substituted for those now appearing. I am quite agreeable to asking my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health to move as an amendment what my hon. friend has suggested; to substitute for the words "the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting" the words, "the conservation and promotion of" and to strike out the word "therein" at the end of the subsection. Then subsection (e) would read: "the conservation and promotion of the health of the civil servants and other government employees."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not wish to oppose this amendment, but at present the section covers "the supervision of federal public buildings and offices" for certain purposes. Perhaps this is not the correct place to bring up this matter, but I must say I was surprised the other day, when I went into the east block, to discover that it had no adequate modern fire prevention appliances, particularly no sprinkler system. It seems to me that if we are going to supervise or promote the health of civil servants we should also look after their lives. It may be said that this is properly a matter for the Department of Public Works, but I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of installing a sprinkler system in each block, because in my opinion conditions are not satisfactory as far as fire hazards are concerned.

Mr. BOUCHER: I would not want to oppose the extension of power suggested in the amendment, but it seems to me that the amendment lacks something in reference to the supervision of public buildings by the ministry of health. In my humble opinion this government has no cause to be proud of the situation in regard to ventilation, fire protection and general health conditions in the public buildings of the city of Ottawa.

Mr. GRAYDON: Even in this chamber.

Mr. BOUCHER: Such buildings as the Langevin block, the east block and many of the temporary buildings, with their poor ventilation, would not do credit to any employer, let alone the dominion government. As a matter of fact, conditions even in this house, during these warm days, do not contribute to the comfort, well-being or even the mental equilibrium of hon. members. I believe the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa West is exceptionally good, but it should include some part of the original subsection, to cover the supervision of public buildings in regard to matters of public health. Right now, with this hot weather, we hear many complaints in regard to ventilation from civil servants who are working under conditions of congestion. I have had some particular cases brought to my attention, one of which I might mention. An employee of the government entered the service in 1938 with a first-class health certificate, but when he attempted to join the army in 1942 he was discovered to have a lung condition which was diagnosed as tuberculosis. He went to the hospital in Ottawa, where I believe he still is, where it was discovered that he had contracted his tuberculosis by contact while in the government employ. After a considerable time he was able to get a pension. On investigating the case I found that the conditions under which he was working were, to say the least, such as would make the contraction of tuberculosis quite possible. In other words, the ventilation was quite bad.

We hear complaints nearly every day from civil servants working in the temporary buildings, particularly those along the north side of Wellington street. For security reasons it is necessary that the windows be locked at night, and when the staff come to work in the morning they find their rooms have been closed without being properly ventilated. The result is that the rooms are overheated. This new department should have the special responsibility of supervising the working conditions of government employees. The government should be a model employer, and should provide healthy working conditions rather than the haphazard system we have at the present time.

I suggest that the amendment is a good one, but it should carry with it some special direction as to the supervision of public buildings and offices for health purposes.

Mr. REID: Do not overlook the ventilation in some of the rooms in this building.

Mr. BOUCHER: I felt that I should discuss you and me last, rather than first.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think we all agree that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West is a good one, particularly since it shifts the emphasis in the language of this section. As the section was worded, it would seem to put public buildings before the health of the people. With the rewording of the clause we have the health of a certain group of people brought out in the forefront. My reason for rising is to suggest that what is now proposed in this amended section for civil servants and other government employees ought to be provided for other groups of people, indeed for the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend will look at the commencement of section 5 he will see that that is provided for.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have studied the beginning and all of section 5 a number of times, and I have also reread the speech which I heard the Prime Minister deliver when this bill was last before the house on June 27, in which he tried to answer the arguments that had been made that there was not much that was new in the bill. The Prime Minister gave the story of the opening up of the Department of Labour many years ago and he told us of what had come from that small beginning. He tried to suggest that here, too, we had a small beginning which might grow into something great later on. I think it is becoming quite clear as we continue to discuss this bill that there is nothing new in it, that it is simply an administrative shuffle.

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing an amendment dealing with paragraph (e) of section 5, and the amendment should first be dealt with before we go on to a general discussion of the section.

Mr. KNOWLES: I bow to your ruling, although I think that what I have to say is relevant. I shall make my remarks at a later stage of the debate.

Mr. BRYCE: I want to take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the minister some letters and recommendations I have received from my constituency.

The CHAIRMAN: I must tell the hon. member for Selkirk that we are dealing with an amendment to paragraph (e) of section 5 and we should dispose of that first.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I would like to support the view expressed by the hon. member to my left in connection with the fire hazards that exist in the east block. I was over there some fifteen years ago and I had occasion to go up to either the second or the third floor. Someone took the trouble to show me the conditions that existed and they were—I cannot use the appropriate word because you would rule me out of order. Along the middle of this corridor immediately under the flooring was a big wooden box about four feet wide and, I suppose, about eighteen inches deep. It was wood, not tin. This ran along the whole length of the corridor and this was the means by which the building was heated. I said to the clerk who showed me this, "You will have the place burning down." He said, "That is what we expect because this comes right from the ground floor and the draft that would be created would be enormous." It had been there for fifty years and you can imagine how quickly it would go up. I was young and innocent politically at the time and I took it up with the proper department.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be quite a little while ago.

Mr. NEILL: It was; I have learned a lot since then. I was told that it was not feasible to change it, that it would cost many hundreds of thousands of dollars to fix the upper storey and it was not worth while, that it would be better to let it burn down and build a new building. I said, "What about the men and girls who are in there?" Perhaps there was a certain amount of logic in the answer I was given, because they said that the people were never there at night, that if a fire should break out in the daytime it would not make much progress before they would have an opportunity to get out. It was not as though they were sleeping there at nights or living there. I am not sure that the west block is much better. The condition of these buildings must have been known to some department for some length of time, but the answer I got was that it would be cheaper to let this one burn down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ought, I think, to thank hon. gentlemen opposite for their solicitude for the lives of members of government, because it is in the east block that we assemble day after day, and in particular for myself as my offices are located there. I do agree with what has been said about the condition of the east block. That building is greatly overcrowded. As to the atmosphere or quality of the air in some of the buildings that have been referred to, if hon. members could have shared with my colleagues and myself the humidity of the council chamber one day last week when there were sixteen or eighteen of us in that small space they would realize the necessity for some improvement.

I should perhaps mention that the government had anticipated the need with respect to the departments at present housed in the east block before the beginning of the war, and plans were made for the erection of another building which would house the Department of External Affairs, the Prime Minister's office and the privy council. Those plans are in existence now. They would have been proceeded with but for the fact that the war rendered impossible proceeding with the construction of that particular building. It may not be adding anything essential to the discussion to mention these things. I did so because I believe there is a real necessity for a close examination of existing conditions in practically all public buildings. Things have become worse than ever under war conditions. As soon as the war is over I hope that some of these situations may be immediately relieved.

Mr. BOUCHER: Does the Prime Minister not think the reference to buildings in the section which is being amended by the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa West should be retained?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the words of the amendment, "conservation and promotion of the health" and so on are so broad that it would cover the supervision of public buildings. Supervision rather suggests something to be done by the Department of Public Works. I agree with the hon. member who has proposed the amendment that the emphasis ought to be more on health conditions.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to bring something to the attention of the minister as a result of representations that I have had from my riding. They all emphasize the value of preventive medicine. We have heard a lot about cancer to-day. Some members of the medical profession have asserted that eighty per cent of cancer is curable if treated in the early stages, and I would ask that the minister give this his consideration. People in the riding of Selkirk are very much concerned about it. The state of health in Manitoba is not very good. We have one person in that province dying every ten hours of cancer and one person dying every twenty-four hours of tuberculosis.

I want to support what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and the hon. member for St. Boniface have said regarding Doctor Davidson. I have living in my constituency a lady for whom all hope was given up. Then she took treatment from Doctor Davidson and she is living to-day, after three years. So that again I appeal to the minister to do what he can in the field of preventive medicine. The hon. member for St. Boniface spoke of trying everything, like a drowning man clutching at a straw. I feel very strongly on the subject of cancer. We have many people in Manitoba who when they cannot do their day's work and suspect that something is wrong go to see a doctor, and the first thing he tells them is, "If you had only come earlier I could have done something for you. I cannot do anything now." Preventive medicine will help cure that situation and I earnestly appeal to the minister to lay emphasis upon it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was starting to say a few minutes ago, when we were dealing with the amendment which has just been passed, that I believe clause 5 of the bill should have had something new written into it so far as powers are concerned. As the bill stands, while the idea of shuffling the departments around and bringing related matters under one ministry is a good one, really that is all we are doing in this bill, namely, providing an administrative reshuffling. Already during the debate to-day a number of new services have been proposed, and one amendment has been ruled out of order, but they suggest some of the powers and functions and duties which I think should have been provided for under clause 5. May I name some that I have jotted down?

First of all there is the subject which my colleague the hon. member for Selkirk has just mentioned, preventive medicine; second, powers in connection with the training of medical personnel; third, powers to coordinate our medical services and see to it that they are properly distributed throughout the country according to the needs of our people, particularly those in the outlying areas. Then, too, I think there should be included in this clause powers with respect to the building of additional hospital facilities. I believe also powers with respect to the subjects mentioned by the hon. member for North Battleford should be included here in more positive terms, namely, powers to deal with child and maternity care.

I would add that in this day and generation it seems to me that some real initiative should be taken in the matter of nutrition. We have heard a good deal said to-day about the possibilities of the nutritional treatment of cancer. It is also well known that there are tremendous possibilities of improving the general health of the whole community by research in the field of nutrition with a view to improving the diet of our people. We know as a matter of fact that under the most trying circumstances during the period of intense attacks upon Great Britain the health of her people has been maintained, and this enabled them to stand the strain of the war, largely because of the work which the British government has done in the field of nutrition. It seems to me that in the post-war period we ought in the name of health to be taking the initiative in this field.

My whole point is that if this bill is to be more than just an administrative reshuffling, we should have something new added along the lines that I have proposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend will examine the introductory part of clause 5 and then examine paragraph (a) he will find that every single thing he mentioned is already covered by the bill. Take, for instance, preventive medicine. That is now a function of the department and it will be retained in the Department of National Health and Welfare. The training of medical personnel is not altogether within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, as my hon. friend knows. The coordination of medical services and their distribution is definitely a provincial responsibility, but is being carried out in war time through the federal government by means of the medical assignment board. Ordinarily it must be done in time of peace in cooperation with the provincial authorities.

The provision of additional hospital facilities relates itself, of course, to any national scheme of health insurance.

Child and maternal care is amply taken care of now in the department.

In regard to nutrition, there is a special branch of the department, nutritional services, which has been carrying on excellent work, particularly in the last year or two, throughout the dominion. It has received the commendation of every single province.

Every one of the services mentioned by my hon. friend that comes within the jurisdiction of the federal authorities and of this new department is provided for in clause 5 as now drafted.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why not set them out in the bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: For this reason among others, that it is far better draftsmanship and far more comprehensive to set out the purposes in general words rather than in specific words because, when you start to enumerate things, you are almost bound to leave out something or else set out a class of things which will be found to be inadequate with the progress of medical science and with the development of cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. For that reason enumeration is always dangerous. General words are far more sweeping unless you have an elaborate enumeration.

Mr. GILLIS: I am afraid that I have to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I had thought that this bill was going to mean something new, but as I see it now it is merely transferring everything of a civilian nature in the Department of Pensions and National Health to this department and assigning veterans' affairs exclusively to another department. I agree absolutely with the purpose for which the department is being formed, but we are not going to make much progress if all that is involved is a reallocation of functions between different departments.

The parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister is right to a certain extent in saying that it is sometimes dangerous to try to be too specific in legislation, but on the other hand if all our legislation were couched in general terms you could not pin anyone down to anything and as a result you would get nothing done. It is a very odd way of shifting responsibility. In this field of social security generally we are setting up a lot of departments, and unless we are specific about some things there will be a tendency on the part of one department to shift to another things which should be their own responsibility. I thought the hon. member for North Battleford made a very strong case this afternoon for the setting up of a branch in this department and holding it absolutely responsible for the better care of our children in all its phases. This is a matter about which we should be specific. While we have a department—we realize that—and this new machinery is taking over its functions, let it not be forgotten that the minister's department has been in existence for the last twenty years, and the figures cited by the hon. member would lead anyone to believe that the job which has been done is far from satisfactory.

In the next place, I believe that we have fallen down in the field of research in preventive medicine. Although the minister's department has included for some considerable time a branch of research into industrial diseases and so forth, its operations are largely confined to the laboratory. Its work has not got through to the people. As I visualize the new department, unless the discoveries which have been made in the laboratories are made available to the people we shall have accomplished nothing more than a mere reshuffling of machinery.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie a year ago in this house, and again this afternoon, is of great concern all over the world. I thought he made a very strong case. He is a living example of the absolute necessity for an investigation, and I say, an investigation by the dominion government. We are merely shelving our responsibility by throwing it into the lap of the medical profession. The medical profession have something to sell, and so long as the rules of the game are as they are, it is their prerogative to sell it; but it is the responsibility of the government, particularly the health department, to make available to the people anything which will alleviate misery and distress. That is their function. If Doctor Davidson of Winnipeg has something of value to the people of Canada, it is the responsibility of the health department to investigate that without any reference to medical societies throughout Canada. There are competent medical men within the department who should examine it and report direct to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have not the authority.

Mr. GILLIS: Somebody should cut that red tape once and for all in a matter of this kind. It is making the department look rather ridiculous. The matter has been raised in this chamber time after time; hundreds of people are suffering, and this discovery may afford them relief. I could not understand the position if I were outside the house, and I believe that ninety per cent of the people cannot understand it.

Mr. McGEER: Why have we not the authority?

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I cannot understand.

Mr. McGEER: Surely we have the authority to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: In the matter of silicosis, which is quite a prevalent disease, jurisdiction has been had by the department for many years to examine into methods of treatment. I am not quarrelling with them on that matter at this time; I know that during this process of fighting the war many things must be left in abeyance for the time being.

Mr. LEADER: May I interrupt to say that there ought to be an authority which can try that thing out and pronounce whether it is any good or no good.

Mr. GILLIS: I am absolutely in accord with that. It should be the responsibility of this department; the authority should be theirs, and if something stands in the way it should be removed. There is no doubt about that, and there is no trouble about passing an order in council.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Put it in the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, or put it in the bill. I mentioned some time ago the possibility of making available a serum which would give great relief to thousands of people, particularly ex-servicemen across Canada. It is known as A.C.S., and according to the reports we have received it is working miracles in Russia. I understand that there is some available in the United States for experimental purposes. I wrote the minister the other day about it. I am not going to press the question, but I am doing what I can to find out about the availability of supply.

There is no use in developing medical science unless its discoveries are made available to the people. The purpose is to relieve misery and suffering. If we are going to develop a lot of things to relieve pain and then lock them up in a laboratory somewhere or sell them at a price which is beyond the means of the average individual, we shall not have accomplished much.

Further, to segregate problems of a general nature from those which relate to the veterans of the last war and this war, without the intention of expanding under the new department our work in the field of national health, will not be of much value. If the minister is handicapped by certain limitations from pushing his work for the health of the Canadian people as it should be pushed, he should let us know, make appropriate proposals in this house, and have the house grant him the necessary authority before the present session closes. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out, a number of hon. members who are here to-day and have discussed these matters for the past four years will not sit in the next parliament, and it will take the new house perhaps four years to understand exactly what the problems are. Now is the time to do these things. I do not believe anyone in this house is in disagreement with any other member on matters of public health. Everyone is prepared to support the government to any extent they want to go with respect to making medical science available to the people of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend raised two questions in his remarks. He referred to a certain serum which was discussed in this house some time ago. I think I informed him at the time that we had taken every possible course in regard to having some supplies available for Canada, and we were informed at that time through the usual channels that there was none available. Since then I have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the minister to Canada of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics. We are getting in touch directly now with regard to what can be done, and what can be done will be done.

As regards the question which came up last year and was again raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, concerning Doctor Davidson, the inference has been left by certain speakers to-day that the Department of Pensions and National Health took no action with reference to his request. No one in the house knows better than the hon. member who introduced this matter that the department has done everything that could humanly have been done. I believe that he saw all the correspondence in our department with reference to it. Immediately the matter was raised it was brought by us to the medical research committee; that is, the associate medical committee of the national research council. The chairman of that committee is one of the best-known surgeons and medical men in Canada—Doctor Best, who was associated with Doctor Banting in the discovery of insulin; and members of that committee—I am not speaking as a medical man; I am only a layman—are some of the most brilliant scientists in Canada to-day. Before his death Sir Frederick Banting went thoroughly into this whole question and, I believe, discussed it with Doctor Davidson personally. In any event his opinion was that this was not a proper scientific formula.

An hon. MEMBER: Will the minister tell me whether this treatment has been tried out by any person other than Doctor Davidson?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I did not say so at all. I do not think my hon. friend understood what I was saying. Then the associate medical committee of the national research council, as was said this afternoon, sent out a questionnaire. Their finding was that the formula was not scientific. Whether that is correct or not I am not competent to say. The opinion of medical men in the house varies in regard to the most important questions, but there should not be and there is not any difference of opinion with respect to the desirability—

Mr. NEILL: What did the minister say about the formula?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was not a scientific formula.

Mr. NEILL: So the people can go on dying.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is an unfair remark. I am not opposed to anything that can be done towards finding a formula for the cure of cancer, and I believe that everyone in this house is of the same mind in that regard. The question came up again; I endeavoured to obtain an investigation in the province of Manitoba, through the university of Manitoba, and they were approached by the department. I took the matter up and was told by the Department of Justice that we had no authority to investigate such questions since they were entirely within the provincial sphere. I have the written documents in my files to that effect. When, therefore, it is said that nothing has been done by the Department of Pensions and National Health, I assert that I did everything that was within our constitutional power. Take the province of Ontario. For years they have been carrying on cancer research, and any province in Canada can properly, within the ambit of the constitution, carry on cancer research; but the dominion authority cannot, except by cooperation or invitation, step into the provincial field either in the matter of cancer or in the matter of any other malady, and carry out an investigation on its own.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister sure that he is right in that regard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Except in certain specific matters, health is essentially a provincial concern under the British North America Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the act which prevents the dominion authority from carrying out investigations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the province.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What would prevent the dominion from doing something through our own national research council in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was done by the national research council in Ottawa, and, according to the evidence I have from them—as my hon. friend knows, it comes under another department, the Department of Trade and Commerce—they investigated the matter and rejected it. Whether their finding was right or not it is not within my competence to say, but that is the situation. If hon. gentlemen wish to pursue the matter further, the only course would be to have the British North America Act amended so as to give us the power to go into the province for research work such as this.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I make a suggestion? Every layman in the house finds himself somewhat confused about this matter because we know so little about it. We are all agreed that if there is something in this treatment, if it is good, it should be made available to the general public, because cancer is a disease that concerns the Canadian people of all mature ages. There is one way, however, by which the matter can be dealt with without any of the difficulties which the minister mentions with respect to the constitution. There is Deer Lodge hospital, Winnipeg; there is Christie Street hospital, Toronto, and there are many other military hospitals in the country. Cancer is not confined to civilians. It is a disease that has afflicted many of those who have been discharged from or are at present connected with the armed forces. If my understanding is correct, one of the things which those who support Doctor Davidson's treatment desire is that he shall be given an opportunity, in some hospital ward, to have his experiments carried out in a practical manner. I suggest to the minister, so far as constitutionality is concerned, that he would have the power as Minister of Pensions and National Health to have this done in any of the military hospitals in Canada. I do not know whether this is practical, and I have hesitated all along to pose as in any degree an expert in this matter, because I know there are none of us laymen who are experts. I have heard some laymen in debates like this speak as though they were experts, but for myself, I do not pose as one. At the same time, I should like to make sure that nothing is being overlooked because of the point of view of the constitution, for I do not think red tape should be allowed to stand in the way of further experimentation toward the end of helping humanity.

Mr. LEADER: My name having been mentioned, I should like to make a few remarks with reference to what the leader of the opposition has just said about Deer Lodge hospital. I have had some correspondence with the department with reference to a particular case in which Deer Lodge plays a part. This man, through injuries received in the last war, developed cancer, and he is now getting treatment for it in that hospital. The treatment, he thinks, is doing him no good whatever and he is taking treatment from Doctor Davidson, but the department refuses to continue his pension, I believe, certainly not to pay medical expenses if he goes to Doctor Davidson. It is not because it is Doctor Davidson; I am aware of that. It is simply a matter of red tape, which insists that these men shall have the attention of a doctor selected by the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who said that—the doctors of the department?

Mr. LEADER: Said what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That he could not consult Doctor Davidson.

Mr. LEADER: It was not the doctors of the department. I do not know whether the minister is aware of this case, but certainly the man was refused treatment. I will not say that it was the department that said it; perhaps it was said at Deer Lodge hospital. At any rate, that is the situation. There is red tape that must be cut and a new arrangement must be made before we can get definite results. The minister mentioned my name and said that I knew what the government had done. There is truth in that, because I have kept myself posted on the progress that has been made in the investigation of Doctor Davidson's work. What the minister says is true. His department has tried to do something, but, as he has himself said, they are powerless on account of the British North America Act. Well, this parliament is supreme; if it is not, we are a nonentity. This is the last court of appeal in the dominion and, if authority is required to change the British North America Act, I am sure Great Britain would be very glad to accede to our request. I am not afraid that if a vote were taken in this house to-day every member would vote that we should find some means of getting around the British North America Act so that the dominion might be enabled to make a grant to the provinces to carry on this work.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I had hoped, when this bill was first introduced setting up a separate department of government whose responsibility would be the national health and welfare of the people, that it would mark the beginning of a new day in Canada so far as the health of the nation was concerned. As I have listened to the debate this afternoon, and observed the readiness of the minister of pensions and the Prime Minister to give way to constitutional and other difficulties and to allow them to prevent progress, as has been evidenced in this debate, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this bill means nothing more than the reshuffling of departmental machinery and that the hope of those who had believed that this would mark a new beginning in matters of health is likely to be disappointed.

Certainly two things are needed if this new department is to be effective. In the first place the government must be prepared to ask parliament, and parliament must be prepared to vote more money for this Department of Health than has been either asked for or voted in the past. The health of this country has suffered because we have been more ready to spend money on almost any material object than on human welfare. In the matter of research we have been ready to spend money on industrial research, on the improvement of machinery, on the improvement of our live stock in the field of agriculture. We have been ready to spend money on research into anything except human welfare.

In the second place I suggest that the minister and his associates who head this department accept the general principle that the health of Canada is a matter of concern to the Canadian parliament, regardless of the British North America Act or any other act. When the provincial governments, whose authority it is to safeguard the health of the Canadian people, have not been doing it, and there have been statistics presented to this committee this afternoon to show that they have not been doing it, then it is time that some steps were taken whereby the federal government can not only provide more money but more leadership—leaders who will recognize the importance of national health and find ways and means of cooperating with the provinces to give that leadership where it is required and to provide the necessary funds to augment those that the provinces are themselves able to provide in order to improve the health of the Canadian people.

Unless this new department is set up with the objective, that from now on the federal government is to maintain a greater interest, and play a greater part in improving the health of the Canadian people than has been done in the past, then we are just wasting our time in discussing this bill.

With regard to the matter brought up by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, I am rather disappointed that the federal government, having had this matter in their hands for twelve months, have been unable to find any way in which they could provide the means for testing the merit of this experiment. I am not impressed by the fact that this matter was sent to the national research council's medical branch and rejected. I am not unmindful of the fact that when Pasteur first gave his discovery to the world the greatest medical scientists and members of the medical and scientific profession of that day scoffed at him, and that he had to fight his way up alone in opposition to the best medical science of that day in order to establish his claim. I am satisfied that if Doctor Banting had made his discovery as a practising doctor in the backwoods somewhere, that discovery would not yet have been recognized by the medical profession of this country. It was fortunate for Canada and the world that the man who made that discovery was employed by one of our provincial universities and had some official recognition before that discovery was made. I think the members of the medical profession will agree that it is extremely difficult for any member of that profession who is not a recognized specialist, who does not hold some official position in a university or in a medical association, to get recognition for any discovery that he believes he has made.

It seems to me that this government has solved many more difficult problems than the finding of some means whereby funds could be made available to prove whether this experiment is sound, whether it has anything to offer humanity. The point is that afflicted people all across this country are anxious to be assured that no possibility has been overlooked in finding a remedy for this disease, cancer.

I am sure that the committee will approve any measure the government may take to lend assistance in this field. During my short stay in the house I have been surprised at the number of occasions on which the government has persisted in disregarding what was the obvious desire of the members of the house. I have witnessed a number of such instances where matters before the house seemed to have the obvious approval of all private members; yet the government has refused to budge an inch, no matter how the members appealed to the government. I believe we are bringing democracy into disrepute. If we are to allow trivial obstacles, red tape, if you wish to call it that, to retard progress; if we are to have a government continuing to disregard the obvious desire of the majority of the members of the house, there is no surer way of bringing democracy into disrepute than by following that procedure. I would ask the minister to reconsider this matter. I cannot believe that the minister cannot find any way or means of making funds available for an experiment to be carried out at some of the hospitals, either under the direction of his department or with the cooperation of the provinces, in order to find out for all time whether this experiment has in it anything worth while or anything of any merit. In pursuing this object has the minister investigated the possibility of cooperating in this field with the health officers of Manitoba, or are we to understand that the federal government has no authority under the British North America Act to vote money for research into a matter of public health? Apparently the statement just made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health would indicate that under the British North America Act the federal government has no authority to vote money for research into such matters. I believe that the government has authority to vote money for research in the industrial field, and if it has not authority to vote money for this other purpose, then steps should be taken at once to secure for this government the right to make grants of money for research into matters of public health.

Mr. CLAXTON: The minister did not say we had not power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for York South has brought my name into this discussion on matters of jurisdiction. I made no reference at all this afternoon to the matter of cancer, which was under discussion, and I want to make it perfectly clear that when the hon. member says I have been seeking in any way to prevent the greatest possible research into that or any other disease he is not correctly stating the situation. I believe he will agree with that.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I apologize, Mr. Chairman, for bringing the Prime Minister's name into it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend. I should be very sorry indeed to have this discussion conclude without placing myself very clearly on record as to where I stand on this matter of health. I have not introduced this bill in order that nothing or as little as possible may be done in the way of improving the well-being of the people of this country. The purpose of this bill, and the reason why I as Prime Minister have taken it under my own ægis, is to make it apparent that the government is very much in earnest about going just as far as we possibly can in the matter of helping to improve the health and welfare of the people of Canada. But I ask hon. members to look at the beginning of the debate and see the line that was taken against the government on the motion for second reading, if indeed not before that. The whole line of attack on this measure on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite. was that we were seeking to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces, that we were seeking to centralize everything in the federal government. Let us be honest and see what are the effects of arguments of the kind. Hon. gentlemen know that at the present time election campaigns are being carried on in three provinces in this country. We know that each of these provinces is going to assert its rights as against any authority which would seek to invade them. Already in each province this argument is heard: "They are endeavouring at Ottawa to centralize everything there." I have had to be particularly careful in presenting this measure to make it perfectly clear, in order that the measure itself may not be prejudiced, that we are not seeking to centralize matters in Ottawa, nor are we seeking to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces. I have made it very clear, I think, that the only way real progress can be made in matters of research and the like, where there is a debatable jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion, is to have a department of health at Ottawa that will be in a position to associate closely with it representatives of the different provinces, to go into these questions and between them work out some method of coordinating the different services being rendered by the provinces and the dominion, in such a manner as will prevent overlapping and at the same time guard against anything in the nature of omission of necessary services. That is one of the reasons why I am most anxious to see this particular department established.

I have been in parliament for a good many years. When I came here first I was not unlike a good many other hon. members who have come into this house for the first time; I inveighed very strongly against any question of jurisdiction being permitted to interfere with anything we wished to do. But the longer I have been in this House of Commons the more clearly I have seen how very careful we have to be if, because of disregard for matters of jurisdiction, we do not want to make the last state of the condition we are striving to improve worse than the first. These matters can be met effectively only in a right and proper way. I recall very well what I am sure is in the minds of a good many hon. gentlemen opposite at this moment; how the leader of one of the parties opposite introduced in this parliament a lot of social legislation and, in the words of one hon. member who spoke this afternoon, said, "The great majority of hon. members are in favour of this. so why should we not do as we wish?" That legislation was introduced and placed upon the statute books, but what happened? The matter was appealed to the supreme court, which held the whole body of legislation ultra vires. I ask my hon. friends whether that was helping social order in the country, or whether it was the sort of thing that was calculated to provoke social unrest. For that reason, if for no other, I feel that it is part of the duty of a government to anticipate all possible consequences of the kind.

So far as this measure goes I would feel that in the matter of research into various diseases, this bill affords the government an opportunity to go just as far as our jurisdiction will permit. I am not at all sure that our jurisdiction will not permit us to go much farther than some people have thought, but at this moment I am not going to say that we have jurisdiction to do a particular thing and that we are going to do it, and to-morrow have the press of the country come out and say, "The federal government has undertaken to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces in the matter of health; behold, this is only the thin edge of the wedge. They are doing it now in regard to public health and welfare; next they will do it in regard to something else, and then something else." That is why the measure has been carefully drawn to make clear that as far as we have jurisdiction we can do anything in the way of research to prevent disease and help improve public welfare, but that there is no intention to go beyond our jurisdiction. The bill says:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend to and include all matters—

Not some matters, but all.

> —relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction. . . .

That section is intended to give this new department the widest possible scope in matters of research and the prevention of disease, the only limitation being the degree of jurisdiction. I draw particular attention to this point, to which attention has not been drawn thus far. This clause, which has been taken from the existing legislation on national health, contains reference to two matters not included in the present act. It adds social security and social welfare. The existing act only extends to "all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health." This legislation includes matters relating to social security and social welfare. Under social security, as I pointed out the other day, will come the administration of family allowances; and under family allowances will necessarily come matters pertaining to child welfare and the like. It is therefore perfectly clear that under this legislation we should have the fullest possible authority to go into these questions affecting the well-being of children, families and the like. Then, to carry the matter a step farther, the section continues:

> . . . and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters;—

I shall skip the first paragraph and go on to the second:

> (b) investigation and research into public health and welfare.

I would regard the question of cancer as something immediately pertaining to public health and welfare; and under this section as it is now worded, unless some obstacle is discovered by those whose duty it is to interpret the statutes, I can see nothing that precludes this federal government from investigating that particular disease if it decides to do so. I happen to have in my folder here something I obtained from a newspaper only yesterday. I was surprised to see it in another connection, but it bore so directly on what was in my own thoughts that I put it aside in case it might prove to be an appropriate quotation to use to-day. Reference has been made to Louis Pasteur. I think I hold as great regard as any one in this house for the work of Pasteur. I believe humanity has had no greater benefactor than Pasteur. I therefore quote these words, which are his own:

> Take interest, I implore you in those sacred dwellings which one designates by the expressive term: Laboratories. Demand that they be multiplied, that they be adorned. These are the temples of the future—temples of well-being and of happiness. There it is that humanity grows greater, stronger, better.

I hope that one of the effects of this measure will be that we shall realize in this country, as we have not realized heretofore, the importance of laboratories and the work that is carried on in laboratories. I want to see the work of research extended, and I believe it will be extended and expanded very fully under this particular measure.

Do not let anyone say that the government is seeking to evade doing anything that should be done. If jurisdiction permits it, I think this question of cancer ought to be investigated by a federal department or authority. If jurisdiction does not permit, then I shall be prepared to join with those who will work to obtain an amendment to the measure which will give us the necessary jurisdiction. I think we ought to have it. That is my position.

I am not at this moment, however, going to embarrass the enactment of this measure by committing myself to any specific matter which will give ground to those who are interested in defeating the measure by permitting them to say that we are invading provincial jurisdiction and are trying to centralize everything in Ottawa. That I hope will make clear, not only my position but the position of the government and the position of the Liberal party.

My hon. friend says that the majority in this house are always in favour of this or that, and that the government is continually opposing what the majority wants. May I tell him that he belongs to a minority. He mistakes it for a majority. The majority are on this side of the house. Where has the government opposed what the majority has wished? We have not opposed any measure that the majority wished to have. If we had, we would not be here. We are as anxious as anyone else in this house to further all the measures for social welfare and human well-being we possibly can within the time that is at our disposal so to do.

I regard this measure as one of the foremost measures to permit the doing of those things which are necessary for improving the health of the people.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: The right hon. the Prime Minister, speaking before six o'clock and answering an hon. member on this side of the house, said that there was a certain subsection of this section which was sufficiently wide in its terms to cover all research and consequently it might cover research into cancer. But I could not help noticing that he qualified his statement by a reference to jurisdictional conditions. The minister of pensions, speaking shortly before, said the very opposite. An hon. member was speaking and the minister challenged him to name the authority under which the federal government could act in a matter arising within a province in connection with medical research, and he quoted the justice department as having given a definite decision to that effect, founded on the British North America Act, in a particular case that had arisen in one of the provinces.

There is not much trouble in getting somebody to cooperate with you if the other party is solely obligated to making the expenditure and you are willing to put up a part of it. You will generally find that most individuals and municipal governments and provincial governments will not mind cooperating with you if you offer to pay part of the obligation which is wholly theirs. That is the situation in this case. If the minister wants a precedent I refer him back seventeen years ago when the old age pension question was before the house and we got a definite ruling from the justice department in writing, just as the minister has now, that the dominion government could do nothing about old age pensions because, according to the British North America Act, it was solely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. That held the thing back for one or more years. The same situation is here exactly. We know that in spite of that judicial ruling seventeen years ago millions of dollars have been spent since by the dominion government in cooperation with the provinces for old age pensions. It shows that where there is a will there is a way. While ostensibly there is this constitutional difficulty, it could be got around. If we offered to pay part of the cost or put an item in the estimates for research, the provinces would not kick about it.

I will approach the matter from another angle. The minister asked where you could get authority to justify it. I submit that the authority is in the will of the people of Canada. If the minister put an item in the estimates for this purpose, nobody in this house would object to it, and certainly the provinces would not either. The amount could then be used for research into cancer in general or into Doctor Davidson's treatment in particular. There is a maxim or postulate in constitutional law—perhaps it is only a tradition—that the people under a democratic form of government always get what they want if they want it badly enough or if enough of them want it, and if this question went to a plebiscite there is no question what the public would want. They would not stand on a matter of form or be deterred by any red tape. They would say: "Do something about it." If an item were put in the estimates there is no question that it would go through, and it could be used to help any research into cancer or, if found advisable, to aid in Doctor Davidson's research.

I am reminded of an anecdote, and the minister of pensions will be able to tell the Prime Minister what collops are. It is a favourite Scotch dish. The Duchess of Atholl wanted to hire a maid and so she went, as housewives do, to a friend of hers who had employed a particular woman and inquired about her. The other lady, who was also Scottish, said that the woman was an awfully decent lassie, a fine girl, a decent lassie. She kept repeating how decent the girl was. Decent has a different meaning in Scotland from elsewhere because there it applies not only to morals but to the general background of a person. It means a reputable person, a person you would like to have dealings with in your home. Well, this lady kept repeating that the woman was a decent lassie, perhaps because the maid was none too expert in the culinary art and she did not want to hurt her too much. Finally the duchess lost patience and said: "Damn her decency. Can she make good collops?"

We have been told this afternoon that the board turned down the application of Doctor Davidson because he did not submit "scientific" formulae. Let us drive a worthy spear through red tape and medical tradition by saying: Damn the formulae. Can this man cure cancer? That is the point. If he can or thinks he can, let us have an investigation.

I want to say that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has made a very gallant effort in a worthy cause, and I am extremely sorry that the matter has been postponed for at least a year. But we can all agree that the hon. member has done his best in a very deserving cause.

Mr. GERSHAW: I spoke on the question of cancer a few days ago and do not wish to repeat. The medical profession in Canada is most anxious to find any cure it can possibly get for cancer. No one is resisting anything in the way of improvement in treatment of cancer. A few years ago in Alberta a great many people were going to a certain place where they thought they could get a cure for cancer. The provincial government finally sent men from the university in the north to that place in the south to investigate the whole layout. They did so and decided against it. The people then were satisfied that no benefit could be received and they stopped going there. We do not want to raise false hopes in the breasts of people who are in a hopeless condition with cancer, and that is why I feel that some organization should investigate this question thoroughly and bring in a finding in this particular case for the satisfaction of the public.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has not been any reflection on the medical profession by anybody, has there?

Mr. GERSHAW: Probably not, except that it was mentioned that they had something to sell. The minister has been very sympathetic. He has taken the matter up with the medical board of the research council, and apparently they have decided against it. I spoke to the minister and he was kind enough to refer the matter to the Rockefeller institute. In the state of New York there is a heavily endowed institute with many specialists and experts who have been making investigations along these lines for years. I am glad that the minister got in touch with them in regard to this particular case. It seems to me that the evidence produced here should be referred to men in Manitoba on the ground who are capable of investigating and possibly after that something further could be done. But that seems to be the immediate step.

I wish to emphasize that cancer is curable by well standardized methods if it is caught in its early stages. Cancer of the lip, of the face, of the breast, of the cervix—places which are accessible to X-ray or radium or surgery—can be cured, and a great deal is being done in Canada by cancer associations from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Pamphlets are published, articles printed in the magazines, and people urged on all sides to get advice if any little sore does not heal, because according to present knowledge the hope of complete cure is very good, almost perfect, under those circumstances. I want to praise and pay tribute to those people throughout the country who are devoting time and money to spreading news of the curability of cancer and urging people to take precautions while there is yet time. I again appeal to the minister, in view of the new evidence which has been given, to take further action along lines which will bring results and satisfy the public. We do not want people to be going without help when help can be obtained; we want help to be given in a big way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One point should be made perfectly clear. From the discussion here to-day it may be assumed throughout the country that, because of decisions given as to jurisdiction, the dominion government is preventing Doctor Davidson from making certain investigations which might be made at the instance of government authority. What I cannot understand is this: Doctor Davidson having the reputation which he has, hon. members from Manitoba believing in him as they do, why the province of Manitoba itself does not undertake the work of research in relation to cancer and retain Doctor Davidson for the purpose. It should be made perfectly clear that the province of Manitoba, if it wishes to do so, can undertake all this work of research so far as Doctor Davidson is concerned. In Ontario the provincial government has undertaken similar kinds of research.

To show at least the sympathy which the federal government has had with research in a case where success has been proven, I recall very well that, when Doctor Banting had found a cure for diabetes with insulin, I myself had placed in the estimates and headed a discussion in this house to have Doctor Banting given a life endowment of $7,000 a year, and it was so voted by this house. That surely is an indication of the sympathy which the federal parliament has with the work of research where it has reason to believe that matters have proceeded sufficiently far to justify making a special grant and special endowment. If the province of Manitoba were to have Doctor Davidson undertake to make a research into cancer at the instance of the province, and he were as successful in his subject as Doctor Banting was in his, I for one would be prepared to ask this house to adopt toward him by way of endowment the same course which it adopted toward Doctor Banting.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Coming into force.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister indicate, even approximately, when this may be expected to be brought into effect?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should think, very soon. The desire is to have the department established at an early day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will it be proclaimed before the dominion-provincial conference which will deal with these matters as well as others?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say at what particular date the conference will be held, but I hope to see this department established very shortly after the adjournment of this parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it the intention of the government to provide in the case of a department such as this a parliamentary assistant, or just a minister alone?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will have to receive consideration.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SALARIES OF MINISTERS OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS AND RECONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Salaries Act to provide that the salaries of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs and of the Minister of Reconstruction shall be ten thousand dollars, respectively.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: This raises a point which ought to be cleared up. When the bill providing for a department of reconstruction was before the house the explanation given by the right hon. gentleman was that the minister in charge of this portfolio would not be a new minister, but one who had already a portfolio and a special position in the cabinet, and that this portfolio now to be created would be a sort of roving portfolio for the purpose of correlating the reconstruction work of the various departments of government. That being the case, I fancy there arises at once in the minds of hon. members the question why there should be a salary attached to the department of reconstruction, unless one man who is to receive the appointment is to be paid two salaries, and I know of course the government has not that in mind.

While I am on my feet with respect to this matter I would ask the government, as I have done before, whether consideration has been given to the question of combining under one minister some of the other, lighter departments of government, so that there will not be more members of the cabinet than there are now. This will add two more salaried ministers to the cabinet, and I think there is a general feeling that in some of the lighter portfolios there might be a doubling up so that this would not be required. I should like the Prime Minister to enlighten the committee on those two points.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it were possible to foresee all the circumstances it would be quite easy to give my hon. friend a concrete and definite reply. In a word the position is this. As he has stated, it is the intention of the government that the minister who will be appointed minister of reconstruction will at the outset be one of the ministers of the crown who already is a minister of another department. How long that situation will continue I am unable to say. It would depend among other things on the duration of the war. There are, for example, two departments related immediately to the war, the departments of war services and munitions and supply. Each of these will cease to have important functions to perform once the war is over. They will gradually be eliminated and in that way two existing departments will disappear. If the minister who happened to hold either of these portfolios were the one appointed as minister of reconstruction it would be necessary to provide a salary for the portfolio of minister of reconstruction because, as soon as he ceased to be the minister of the department that had been eliminated, there would no longer be a salary for him to receive. I cite those two but, in doing so, I do not mean to imply that it will necessarily be the minister of either of those departments who will be appointed minister of reconstruction.

Mr. GRAYDON: Neither would be barred though?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be either, or both, or neither—I should not say both.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could not be both. That is taking in too much territory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the explanation. The government has no desire to have a larger number of ministers than necessary, and where the public interest will be served by having departments combined the government will follow that aim.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The situation is that there will be no new additions to the cabinet. The minister of reconstruction is to be one or other, but not both, as the Prime Minister indicated, holding a portfolio in a department that now exists. As regards the minister of veterans' affairs, is that to be a new portfolio, or is the present minister of pensions to be transferred to that department?

Mr. GRAYDON: That is an embarrassing question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a matter of good behaviour.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister of reconstruction is not to have a large staff? I rather gather from the Prime Minister that they are patterning this portfolio after that held by Lord Woolton in the old country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the beginning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the cabinet is already too large and ought to be reduced. We have more cabinet ministers in Canada to-day than ever before in the history of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to see fewer cabinet ministers and better ministers and have them paid better.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we should all like.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister did not do me the honour of being in the house on Wednesday last when I brought up the question of indemnities of private members. I will not rehash anything I said then except to say that I deplore the treatment which the public of Canada has given to its public servants in the way of meagre salaries. In my view we have too many cabinet ministers and those that we have we do not pay enough. I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister should raise their salaries now, but this country ought to look forward to the day when it will pay its Prime Minister and the working members of the cabinet decent salaries commensurate with the ability necessary to fill the position and with the labour involved in filling the position full-time, especially having regard to the very heavy weight of taxation which now rests upon us. It is not creditable to this country that a cabinet minister should have very little more than $500 a month to live on after paying income tax, and if he happens to have some private means I suggest that possibly, like private members, he finds his entire public remuneration wiped out in taxation. I am not speaking for myself, because there is nothing I would loathe more than to be a cabinet minister at my time of life. I have no ambitions and therefore I am speaking for posterity, if that is the right word. I think we ought to do something about the matter. We ought also to do something about judges' salaries. Perhaps this is out of order, but I make this observation, that in the smaller provinces we ought to have fewer and better judges and pay them better. As regards the larger provinces, I doubt whether you could get first-class men to accept positions on the bench at the remuneration now paid. That is in line with the observations I made in respect of cabinet ministers.

I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister should do anything now, but the whole position should be reviewed. I spoke strongly on Wednesday afternoon urging that the discussion which took place in the house over the plight of private members be reviewed. I did not suggest to the Minister of Finance that there should be in any degree an increase in indemnity, but I did suggest that some relief not only might but should be given. I quite appreciate the force of one statement he made in reply, that it would not do to give tax relief to members of the House of Commons at this time when there are frozen salaries in other walks of life and other people are suffering equally from the high burden of taxation. That argument is an impressive one and carries great weight in my mind. But we should do something for the members of a new parliament, and I doubt if the members of a new parliament, I doubt if the government in power at the beginning of a new parliament, would not feel embarrassed in raising salaries or indemnities immediately after an election. The time to do that is now, to take effect at a future date. I offer these observations to the Prime Minister in the utmost good faith and in the interest of those who will come after us and not of ourselves.

Mr. KNOWLES: For the sake of information and in the interests of equality among our hon. friends in the cabinet, may I inquire whether the car allowance is automatic or whether it requires another resolution? It does not appear in the estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: Certainly it does.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have just checked the book and it appears with "S" in the left-hand corner.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is statutory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand, but my impression is the car allowance is automatic. It is in the estimates for ministers of the crown.

Mr. KNOWLES: I point out to the Prime Minister that I am looking at page 9 of this year's estimates. The first item reads:

Minister of Finance—salary and motor car allowance.

In the left-hand column there is a capital "S" in brackets, which stands for "statutory". In other words we never discuss it. The amount is $12,000. The resolution now before us calls for a salary of only $10,000. I would not want any of these men to have anything less than any of the other men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is not automatic my hon. friend may count on a supplementary estimate being submitted to meet what he has in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the explanation is that the salary of $10,000 is statutory and that the $2,000 is voted. The way the estimates are made up may be a little deceptive.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the Prime Minister would check it up before the extra $2,000 is brought in?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall look into the matter, and if what is being provided now for salary and what is provided in some general estimate for car allowances do not put all ministers on an equality in that respect I shall endeavour to see that they are put into a like position by a supplementary estimate.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that I think there is some point to the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but this is only the resolution stage. The bill will come later, and the Prime Minister will have an opportunity of including that if it is necessary. If it is not necessary, then it does not have to be put in.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 160, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Stirling.]

TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1944

CANADA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION SIGNED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 8, 1944

Hon. C. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 159, respecting a certain tax convention between Canada and the United States of America.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to ask the minister some questions not so much with respect to the provisions of the bill itself as to the convention which is attached to and forms part of the bill, but perhaps not in this order. The short title is not important. The second section approves the convention and I wish to discuss for a few moments some of the articles of the convention.

Mr. GIBSON: We shall come to these articles one by one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we approve section 2 we approve the convention. Perhaps we might leave that to the last and take up section 3. Will that be all right?

Mr. GIBSON: We can do that.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 stands.

On section 3—Inconsistent legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 3 provides:

In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act or of the said convention and the operation of any other law, and in particular the law relating to the taxation of the succession to property, the provisions of this act and the convention shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, prevail.

If we turn to article VII of the convention, which is found on page 6 of the bill, we find the following:

1. With a view to the prevention of fiscal evasion each of the contracting states undertakes to furnish to the other contracting state, as provided in the succeeding articles of this convention, the information which its competent authorities have at their disposal or are in a position to obtain under its revenue laws in so far as such information may be of use to the authorities of the other contracting state in the assessment of the taxes to which this convention relates.

I suggest that in view of that article and section 3 of the bill the principle of secrecy which now surrounds income tax returns of Canadian citizens is thrown entirely into the discard, and the principle is being violated on public authority.

Mr. GIBSON: That same section is in the income tax convention too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it is. It was put in a while ago. I protested then as I protest now. The provision of secrecy which we have had in the income tax act ever since the first act was passed in 1917 remains inviolate so far as the Canadian public is concerned. I do not know what the provision of the United States statute is, but they certainly have not the same degree of secrecy with respect to income tax returns in the United States as we have here, because from time to time we see in flaming headlines the salaries and incomes of so-called important people in the United States published, I think, to satisfy the curiosity of the public more than anything else. I object to the dissemination of information by the government of this country to a foreign government, because I know that you cannot have secrecy. If the principle is good—and I know there are some people in this house who have approached consideration of this subject matter with the theory that the secrecy provisions of our law should no longer be operative—it should be respected. I have always objected to that theory.

I think that what is my private business is not the business of any of my fellow-citizens. I have always appreciated that there was secrecy so far as Canada is concerned in respect of income tax and that sort of thing, save and except, of course, the fact that a certain number of trusted officials have to know what the income returns show. But I strenuously object to the invasion of that principle by international arrangement. We deny that principle to the Canadian public; we give it to a foreign government. That is a bad thing. I suppose the minister will answer by saying that the intention is to guard against the evasion of taxes; that would appear to be the object of the article in question. Nevertheless I do not think this is a good principle to introduce into a treaty with a foreign sovereign state, and I wish to register my objection to the invasion of a principle which I consider should be held inviolate.

Mr. GIBSON: Most of the information that would be required by the United States would be in connection with their own taxpayers. They would not be interested in the Canadian assets of a Canadian citizen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I suggest that the convention should contain that limitation. The government of a country, such as the United States or Canada, should and of necessity must have this information with respect to its own nationals, but they are not limited to that, and to the extent that it does not contain this limitation the treaty is defective. I object to it, and I do not think the convention should go as far as it does. If it were limited to this country giving the United States government information about United States nationals, and conversely to the United States giving this government information with respect to Canadian nationals, there could not be so much objection. Perhaps that might be a salutary thing to have in a convention, but this is far wider than that.

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, it is wider.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This will leave the door wide open, and if that was the intention of the convention it should have said so in express terms. It does not say anything of the sort.

Mr. GIBSON: No; it says:

> . . . in so far as such information may be of use to the authorities of the other contracting state. . . .

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, who is to judge—the authorities of the other contracting state?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my principal objection to this convention. While I am dealing with the convention, perhaps the minister could tell me something with respect to article III, which provides:

> Shares in a corporation organized in or under the laws of the United States of America, of any of the states or territories of the United States of America, or of the District of Columbia, shall be deemed to be property situated within the United States of America.

That is to say, no matter what may be the situs of the shares they are deemed to be situated within the United States. Conversely:

> Shares in a corporation organized in or under the laws of Canada or of any of the provinces or territories of Canada, shall be deemed to be property situated within Canada.

Then article IV states:

> 1. The situs of property shall be determined in accordance with the laws of the contracting state imposing the tax, except as otherwise provided in this convention.

If I understand that, it means that the situs of property, other than shares in the companies mentioned in article III—

Mr. GIBSON: And real estate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, of course, real estate has always followed the situs. I am not dwelling on that.

Mr. GIBSON: We deal with real estate in article II, with shares in article III and with all other property in article IV.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Real estate, of course, is exempt. Has it not always been the rule that real estate is dealt with in the country in which it is located? Is there anything in here which would affect real estate in connection with ascertaining the value or the return? I know that for succession duty purposes it would affect the quantum of the tax. That would not apply here, I suppose, because the rental values would be assessed in the country in which the real estate is situated. I think that is the general rule, and always has been, but article III alters the effect of international law, does it not?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes. There were different methods of treating the handling of shares in the two countries. If the United States had any justification at all they claimed that the shares were located in that country. Even if the unsigned certificate were in that country they claimed that it was taxable in the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was our attitude?

Mr. GIBSON: Well, the matter was dealt with in various ways. If the stock could be effectively dealt with in this country we held that it was taxable in this country. In the case of companies having only one share transfer register, it depended upon the location of that register. Sometimes a company had two transfer registers, and then we had disputes, particularly if the share certificate were not in the jurisdiction in which either share register was located.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What would be the position prior to this of a share the situs of which, we will say, was Bermuda, with a stock register in New York and another in Montreal? What was the situs of that share previously, and what will it be in future?

Mr. GIBSON: Of course if it were registered on the Montreal register and not in the New York register there would be no question at all. It would have to be registered on one register. It would generally be located where the register was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the situs would be in Montreal?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now there will be no anomalies arise under this convention, and perhaps it is all right. I wonder why it has not been extended to other classes of securities, such as registered bonds. The minister is aware, of course, of certain decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in the National Trust Company against the provincial treasurer of Quebec, in what is commonly called the Sifton case, where the securities, being specialties, were locally situated in the province of Ontario. The Quebec government sought to tax them because they could only be unregistered in the province of Quebec. Has consideration been given to the situs of that class of property?

Mr. GIBSON: They were all taxable at their location at the time of death.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the situs was where the instruments themselves were actually located?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yet the province of Quebec claimed and still claims that because they can be dealt with effectively only where they are registered, they are still taxable in that province.

Mr. GIBSON: This is the same law both in Canada and in the United States; we are agreed on that point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have agreed on that point?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: I suppose there is no question that the phrase "any other law" in section 3 of the bill means any other law within the provinces or anywhere else? It reads:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act or of the said convention and the operation of any other law, and in particular the law relating to the taxation of the succession to property, the provisions of this act and the convention shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, prevail.

I suppose "any other law" does not mean any law passed by this parliament, but any law passed by any of the provincial legislatures or this parliament, particularly in regard to the taxation of succession to property.

Mr. GIBSON: This means any inconsistency with the Dominion Succession Duty Act. This would override any of the provisions of our federal succession duty act.

Mr. MARTIN: It may be a question of draftsmanship, but it says:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act or of the said convention and the operation of any other law. . . .

Why could it not be the law on succession duty in the province of Ontario, for instance?

Mr. GIBSON: Well, the common law is affected by the convention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to me that the inclusion of the phrase "and the operation of any other law" would appear to be an attempt on the part of this legislature to abrogate the law of a sovereign province. For instance, the province of Quebec might pass the law—remember shares are civil rights—which would run foul of this convention and this treaty. The minister does not mean to tell me that the passing of this bill will override provincial law with respect to property and civil rights?

Mr. GIBSON: This is dealing only with taxes, so that this would apply only to laws affecting dominion taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is contemplated by the words "any other law"?

Mr. GIBSON: The common law as to situs of property. That is dealt with in this and it would override any other decisions or—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should not the section say that? The terms here are very wide and you do not know what interpretation may be put upon them. If it is intended to relate only to any other law relating to the situs of property, then should it not say so?

Mr. GIBSON: That was an example.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What other possible thing could it relate to?

Mr. GIBSON: It is really all-embracing to make sure that the convention will be operative in respect of any law that is in existence dealing with dominion taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It goes farther than dominion taxation because it operates on the situs of property.

Mr. GIBSON: For taxing purposes only.

Mr. MARTIN: Article I covers it. It reads:

> The taxes referred to in this convention are:
> (a) for the United States of America: the federal estate taxes;
> (b) for Canada: the taxes imposed under the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are not talking about taxes; we are talking about the effect of the overriding provisions of this convention. We are not talking about taxes in section 3; we are talking about the effect in law of the convention. I had intended to refer to that before the hon. member for Essex East rose. I suggest that the words "and the operation of any other law" are too wide. You cannot legislate here to override laws relating to the situs of property passed by a province. I lay down that general proposition.

Mr. GIBSON: I quite agree with that, but for the purpose of the Dominion Succession Duty Act we can lay down what property is to be taxed. That is all we are doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In so far as the tax is concerned, but here you are passing a general statute. Have the law officers of the crown considered this section?

Mr. GIBSON: This has been submitted to the Department of Justice and has been approved by them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that is true, but has this particular feature been called to their attention? Have they reviewed it fully? After the statement, "in the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act or of the said convention and the operation of any other law", the section goes on to state, "and in particular the law relating to the taxation of the succession to property". That should be limited to the taxation by the dominion of the succession to property. You cannot pass a law here that relates to the taxation, by the province, of the succession to property, and that is what is being attempted here. The provisions of this section are too wide.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 3 is not attempting to override provincial legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the effect of the general language.

Mr. MARTIN: The section states that if this convention is inconsistent with any other law, and if we assume that that includes provincial legislation, then the provisions of this bill and the convention shall to the extent of the inconsistency not prevail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Shall prevail.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not heard the whole discussion, but I am wondering if the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the minister would feel that the problem they are considering now would be solved by adding after the words "any other law," the clause that we found in section 5 of bill No. 149, which was considered this afternoon and which reads, "over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would that not solve it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it would. I am pointing out that this legislature cannot deal 100 per cent with the whole question when it must limit itself to its own jurisdiction.

Mr. SLAGHT: If inconsistencies in the Ontario succession duty act cropped up they might pass something that did not conform with this convention.

Mr. GIBSON: This does not deal with the Ontario succession duty act.

Mr. SLAGHT: It says, "any other law."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It deals with the succession to property.

Mr. SLAGHT: The phrase I had in mind was, "over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction." If it is needless we should not put it in, but I believe it would clarify beyond question the point that has been raised.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I urge the minister to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Mr. GIBSON: Property and civil rights is a matter for the jurisdiction of the provinces, and if we put that in they might say that that is a matter over which the dominion parliament has no jurisdiction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have taken jurisdiction under section 91 over the succession to property in your succession duty act. You have the widest possible powers of taxation. I am not raising this point just for fun or for the purposes of obstruction; I do so because I really think there is objection to the form of the section as drafted. In the light of the discussion I think the minister would be well advised if he reviewed the situation. I am not going to labour the point any farther. I believe we have made our position quite clear. If you try to override provincial statutes you will run foul of Mr. Duplessis and a lot of other people.

Mr. GIBSON: Whatever we would be overriding would be only for the purposes of avoiding double taxation between Canada and the United States, not to change the general law of this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The object might be excellent, but the language is not appropriate. I think the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Parry Sound is a sound one. That phrase is included in the health act, and I think we should limit our attempts at taking jurisdiction to the constitutional powers of the dominion.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is now pending in Ontario some important legislation in connection with the Ontario succession duty act as to the right of taxation of mining shares where a resident of New York dies owning mining shares in an Ontario company and there are transfer offices of the company in Toronto and in New York. Important questions are pending now as to the right of the province to levy a tax upon shares where the deceased died in the United States and was a resident of that country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a vexed problem.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is in my view.

Mr. GIBSON: I would not want to limit this in that way because it might limit us more than is desirable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I would take advice on it.

Mr. GIBSON: I cannot agree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You cannot hoist yourself by your own boot-straps and you cannot seize jurisdiction just by putting it in an act of parliament; you must have inherent jurisdiction under the constitution. I would play safe and limit it to the constitutional powers of the federal authorities, but I am not going to argue the matter any farther. I think you will run into trouble if you do not do as has been suggested.

There is just one other point I want to refer to under section 4 and then I shall be through. What are the orders and regulations which the minister has in mind and which are, in his opinion, necessary for the purpose of carrying out the convention? Powers to make orders and regulations should not be so general as this. They should be limited in scope and extent. But this is wide open, within, of course, the terms of the convention. I should like to know what orders or regulations the minister has in mind which, in his opinion, may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the convention.

Mr. GIBSON: That really refers to the administrative work of carrying out the convention, the preparation of forms, for instance, and providing for whatever other action is necessary to carry out the convention's terms.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why not say, "necessary for the due administration of the convention"? That has a narrowing effect. Under this section the minister has very wide powers to make any kind of regulation he likes so long as it is made in carrying out the convention. If it is meant to be purely administrative, why not say so?

Mr. GIBSON: It is really the same type of form that we have in the bill respecting the income tax convention. It is more or less a routine section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I took the same objection then. It is no answer to say that because we did it in a previous statute we are going to do it in this. On principle that is no answer at all. Because you have done it over a period of thirty or forty years even does not constitute an answer. Bad legislation should not be placed on the statute books at all, and I think this is bad draftsmanship. The powers to make rules and regulations should be limited strictly to the purposes of the administration of the act. Some minister may come along and say: I have power under section 4 to make a regulation that goes beyond administration.

Mr. GIBSON: Only "for the purpose of carrying out the said convention."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that it must be with this subject-matter in view. That is all that that means. I deprecate the practice that is becoming more and more prevalent in departmental legislation of giving these extraordinary powers to ministers to legislate, because that is what it is. I shall never cease, so long as I am a member of this house, to raise my voice against this delegation of power except for purely administrative purposes, and the language of the section is not within the ambit of that statement.

Mr. SLAGHT: I cannot share the view of the hon. member in that respect. Let me put it in this way. The minister who makes any regulation under the authority of section 4 must confine himself to the necessities of carrying out the convention which we are about to approve as law. The minute he made a regulation which stepped outside of the purpose "of carrying out the said convention", he would be travelling outside section 4.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He may make such regulations as are in his opinion necessary. It is only his opinion.

Mr. SLAGHT: In all these matters where a minister is given power to make regulations to carry out a statute—and I suppose we have a dozen like this—it is always a matter of opinion by the minister, advised by his advisers, as to whether a particular regulation that he thinks ought to be put into effect is one which comes within his authority given to him by statute. So that I would not be alarmed because it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But he is the sole judge.

Mr. SLAGHT: But the courts will set him straight if he makes a regulation that he has not the right to make. You run that risk, I say with all respect to my hon. friend, whenever you authorize the making of regulations by order in council to provide the machinery for carrying out a particular piece of legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I am in agreement with a certain part of what the hon. member for Parry Sound has said, but he will agree with me that this is a delegated authority and that the powers are wide open within a certain ambit. Should they not be restricted? That is the only point I am raising.

Mr. SLAGHT: What sort of language would the hon. member restrict it to?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would restrict it by express words, "necessary to the administration of the convention". But I am not going to do the drafting.

Mr. GIBSON: We are restricted by the wording to carrying out the terms of the convention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. It says, "in his opinion, necessary for the purpose of carrying out the said convention." They may find that the convention lacks something which they want done, something outside the ambit of the convention.

Mr. SLAGHT: We could well drop out the words "in his opinion", and make it definite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is another question I should like to ask. Who is going to attack any of these regulations? That is a poser. The subject is not going to attack them unless they are clearly without jurisdiction. Once you give power to an executive to legislate, and that is what we are doing here—

Mr. GIBSON: Somebody must have authority to make regulations to administer these laws.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not necessarily. I can remember that when the discussion over the mobilization regulations was taking place in the house I pointed out that the government was taking power to legislate under a general authority, whereas on a previous occasion the regulations were brought down and submitted to parliament. That is the way it ought to be done. We are too prone in this country to-day, as they have been in days gone by in England, to delegate authority to legislate to the executive. It is the principle I am contending for. I know that in war time there must be a relaxation of the rule to a degree, but there certainly is a principle involved. I am not going to labour the point. I suppose that this will go through if I were to stay here until to-morrow morning, and I do not propose to do that on a hot night. I have pointed out what I consider to be a weakness in the section as drafted. I think the principle is bad and the minister would be well advised if he restricted his powers to pure matters of administration of the subject matter of the convention.

Mr. HAZEN: These regulations do not have to be printed in the Canada Gazette or tabled. In similar statutes I have noticed that provision is made that the regulations must be printed in the Canada Gazette and also be laid on the table within a certain number of days after parliament meets. But these regulations will just be hidden away. Nobody will know what they are until they spring at the people right out of the blue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unless publicity is given to them how is a lawyer to know what the law is?

Mr. GIBSON: I quite agree that there must be some publication.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think the point is well taken.

Mr. HAZEN: If I may read from the bill we had before us this afternoon, bill No. 149, an act to establish a Department of National Health and Welfare, section 10 reads:

> Regulations made under this act shall forthwith after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. GIBSON: I should like to read section 58, subsection 2, of the Dominion Succession Duty Act:

> (2) The minister may make any regulations deemed necessary for carrying this act into effect, and in particular may make regulations:
> (a) prescribing forms and providing for the use thereof;
> (b) prescribing the amount, form and manner in which security shall be furnished;
> (c) prescribing what rule, method and standard of mortality and of value, and what rate of interest shall be used in determining the value of annuities, terms of years, life estates, income, and interests in expectancy; and
> (d) authorizing the commissioner to exercise such of the powers conferred by this act, as may, in the opinion of the minister, be conveniently exercised by the commissioner.

These regulations are provided for in the succession duty act and they are published in the Gazette.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By authority of statute?

Mr. GIBSON: Not by the authority of statute, but the succession duty branch does do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By custom?

Mr. GIBSON: By custom.

Mr. HAZEN: But there is no provision in this bill before us?

Mr. GIBSON: No. There is no provision for it in the Succession Duty Act either, but it is the custom to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister will observe that while the Succession Duty Act provides in the opening paragraph for general powers of order and regulation, yet the effect of the whole section read together is to limit the powers of the minister to the particular subject-matters enumerated, and I think he would find that the court would hold him to that. At least that would be my interpretation of the section. I think the minister ought at least to publish these orders and regulations.

Mr. GIBSON: I can assure my hon. friend that we do that as a matter of course; we publish them in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think we should depend on "matter of course." There should be a provision in the bill itself so that we shall know that it will be done. I move:

> That another section be added to this bill to read as follows:
> "Orders and regulations made under this act by the Minister of National Revenue shall be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made, if parliament is then sitting, and if not, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof."

Mr. SLAGHT: Would it not be well to put in the word "forthwith"?

Mr. HAZEN: I intended to put that in.

Mr. GIBSON: That could be added to section 4 without creating a new section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, that is a matter of form.

Mr. GIBSON: I have no objection to adding that to section 4.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Will the amendment be put in writing?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member has not had time to put it in writing. We will do so if you demand it. Will the minister go back and give the same consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parry Sound, to put in the words, "within the jurisdiction of this parliament," where he suggested it?

Mr. GIBSON: No. I do not think I would be willing to do that.

Mr. HAZEN: Has this convention been approved and declared to have the force of law by the government of the United States?

Mr. GIBSON: No, it has not been approved yet. It has been signed of course. But it is before congress.

Mr. HAZEN: Does the minister know the approximate date when it will be approved?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that congress has been adjourned until the 1st of August.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If congress does not approve it, what then? Is there a provision in the convention for approval?

Mr. GIBSON: Article XIV states:

1. This convention shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

Mr. SLAGHT: Should we not add a clause to this bill that it will be brought into effect when it is promulgated by order in council?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): After ratification by the United States.

Mr. SLAGHT: Suppose congress never approves it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not believe that the proper consideration has been given to this whole matter. This may never be ratified by the United States; yet it is the law of Canada. Somebody has slipped.

Mr. GIBSON: It comes into effect after it has been ratified by both countries.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It is deemed to have come into effect in 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It says it shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged as soon as possible. The convention shall be deemed to have come into effect on June 14, 1941; and the minute this bill passes the Canadian parliament it is binding on Canada, and it is not binding on the United States until it is ratified by the United States Senate. It is in the form of a treaty. It looks to me like very loose workmanship.

Mr. GIBSON: Article XIV covers it. It does not become operative between the two countries until it has been ratified by the legislative bodies of both countries.

Mr. STIRLING: It does not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it does not say that. Paragraph 2 of article XIV states that it—

. . . shall be deemed to have come into effect on the fourteenth day of June, 1941. It shall continue in effect for a period of five years from that date and indefinitely after that period, but may be terminated. . . .

And so forth. It must be ratified—"shall be ratified", it says. It is binding on us the minute we ratify it.

Mr. GIBSON: A treaty cannot be binding on one country unless it has been ratified by both.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the law of Canada, unless you say otherwise. What we have done with previous treaties, I think, is to say that the treaty comes in effect as of a certain date when ratified by both the contracting parties. That is the way it ought to be drafted.

Mr. GIBSON: This is in exactly the same form as the previous one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I say the previous one is faulty for the same reason.

Mr. BURTON: Just why is the date, "fourteenth day of June, 1941", set as the date upon which the convention is said to come in force?

Mr. GIBSON: That is when the Dominion Succession Duty Act was first brought into force. It goes back to the origin of that act.

Mr. HAZEN: If a person domiciled in Canada dies leaving an estate of $30,000 consisting solely of shares in Standard Oil of New Jersey, what dominion succession duty would the estate have to pay in this country?

Mr. GIBSON: That comes under article VI. If a Canadian dies leaving an estate in the United States?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON: First of all, Canada would tax the whole estate of the man, as he was a resident of Canada. Then Canada allows a proportion of the tax which is paid in the United States: it is worked out under the formula in paragraph 2 (b).

I should like to say a few words on article VI. It provides first of all that there shall be a credit; then it provides that the credit shall be proportional; and then, in subparagraph (c) of both paragraphs 1 and 2 it is provided that the proportion shall be limited. In this case, in view of the fact that the value of the United States property liable to taxation in Canada and the value of the property taxed in the United States is the same, Canada would allow the entire tax that has been paid in the United States as an off-set. If that did not amount to the full Canadian tax there would be a balance to pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An offset against the Canadian tax?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the purpose of the convention is good on the whole. What I have been criticizing or rather suggesting is a certain deficiency in procedure and so forth. I approve the convention because I think it will ease things for certain people, and I am all for easing taxation as far as I can—that is, double taxation. I am for eradicating double taxation; I want that understood.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Orders and regulations.

Mr. GIBSON: I have this amendment to propose, that section 4 of the bill be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Such orders and regulations made under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made, if parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

193. Canadian travel bureau service, $77,950.

Mr. GRAYDON: This item, coming as it does in the civil appropriations for the Department of National War Services, involves what I might call one of the major peace-time industries and a very important one both from the national and from the international point of view. I refer to the tourist trade of Canada. The Canadian travel bureau service is one which, prior to the war, had functioned in a way that was generally acceptable to the people. Up to the time the war broke out, the tourist trade in Canada had assumed year by year greater and greater proportions. Encouragement was lent to it by the dominion government, the provincial governments, and in certain sections of the country by municipalities where the tourist trade was one of the major sources of revenue of the people in that particular district. During the war-time period, of course, tourist travel had pretty well diminished to a point where only a skeleton was left of what it was in pre-war days. It was one of the war's casualties so far as peace-time activity is concerned. That was particularly the case with respect to tourists coming from the United States and other countries. The reciprocal arrangements which existed in pre-war days whereby our people went south and their people came here had to be temporarily suspended and practically abandoned.

I have found, and I think the minister has found, that as the war reaches the point where it is at least nearer to its climax, if one may put it in that way, the attention of the public begins to be focused a little more on the peace-time activities which will follow. It is essential that in any move we make so far as reconstruction or making plans for the peace-time period are concerned we never let our eye wander off the ball, so to speak, as far as the winning of the war is concerned. Yet I think there is always in the back of the minds of the people this thought. It has cost us a lot in men, money and materials because we were unprepared for war. There are many people who believe that had we been prepared for war at an earlier time perhaps there would not have been any war, but I will leave that to those who know much more about international complications than I. However, it does rest with us when this war is over—and I pray and I think we all pray that that time may not be too far distant, although most of us have fears that perhaps we are not as near that time as some would have us believe—the responsibility of making sure that the peace-time period is prepared for so that we shall not have the helter-skelter arrangements that were necessary for us to make in the preparation for this war. That responsibility rests upon the government and upon the people. The helter-skelter arrangements that we had to make in preparation for the war were not confined to this country. The whole democratic free world found itself in the same position in trying to convert its peace-time activities and enterprises into a war-time economy.

I think I shall have some corroboration and support from hon. members of the committee when I make this statement. When peace comes there will be a desire on the part of people generally to do some travelling that has been accumulating in their minds during this period of great stress and strain. I suppose there is scarcely an hon. member in this committee who has not given some thought—and he does not have very much time for leisure—to what kind of travelling he is going to do as a means of relaxation when the war is over. That, of course, is in the minds of people generally. When this war draws to its close the tourist trade no doubt will assume greater proportions in this country than ever before. I do not often indulge in prophecy, but were I so tempted I would say that the tourist industry of Canada before the war will look puny and insignificant alongside the tremendous business that this country will do when the days of peace come. This means that we must be prepared. We cannot expect to reach this period unprepared and still do our duty to our nation and to those from other lands to whom we are acting as hosts. Therefore I welcome at least the approach to the problem as is indicated by the increase in the estimates in this civil appropriation.

I am not in a position to say as to whether or not the money which has been increased by some $23,000—it seems small—is put in the right place; but in any event it does indicate that there is a consciousness on the part of the director of the Canadian travel bureau services that in the future there will be an expansion in a business which was a very important one to us in the past. When this country is making its preparations for the tourist trade I am hopeful that it will make sure that the preparations are of such a nature that they will fit into the place which we trust this nation will fill in world affairs. I am hopeful that as a nation we shall see to it that we put our best foot forward in this business. It means a lot to the people of Canada. It started out as a business which was a sort of sideline; it then developed into a business of major proportions.

When we talk about the planning for reconstruction in the years to come I think those plans will not be complete unless the reconstruction of the tourist business of Canada is fitted into that general programme. No doubt the minister of reconstruction will have a goodly share in the plans for the period that lies ahead; but I wish to point out to the minister and to the government that they ought to be in a position now to tell us something about the plans. I am going to ask the minister to describe in some detail the plans which this government have already laid out with respect to this portion of our country's reconstruction programme, because this is a programme which can be worked out quite a distance ahead. Some programmes, such as the reconversion and changing over of industries from war time to peace time, must of necessity be delayed because conditions may arise in this country which may interfere seriously and perhaps change the plans altogether. But that does not apply to the same extent to the tourist trade, because the general basic factors I think ought now to be fairly well known to the government. It is true that there may be some influences and factors which will be changed; but the minister has received briefs from various organizations; many people have given a great deal of thought to the matter of tourist traffic after the war and what it will mean to this country, and I hope that the minister will come along with a programme for this country for the post-war years. In the details given for this item I notice that the amount for advertising and publicity has been increased this year by some $15,000, while the amount allocated for publications has been increased from $3,000 to $6,000. Other than the cost of temporary assistance I believe those are the most noticeable increases in the item.

I wish to impress upon the minister the necessity of drawing up this plan at an early day, for this is something the government can get at now. I believe the programme laid down in this connection will occupy a position of great importance as far as our national economy is concerned in the future. One of the things that will be very important in connection with the promotion and advancement of the tourist industry will be the means of transportation. I suggest to the minister that we are entering an era of air travel. Those who lived in the nineties saw the transition from horse-drawn to motor-driven vehicles. I think we who were brought up in the automobile era will live to see the day when automobiles will be largely displaced by aeroplanes, helicopters and other forms of air transport. So that I think it is very important that in making plans for the tourist traffic we should take into consideration the new types of conveyances that will bring people to this country. I suggest that the country most far-sighted and most advanced in getting tourists to visit it, and in providing the most comfortable and convenient forms of transportation within it, will have a great advantage over other countries in competing for this valuable business.

I suggest to the minister that we must also complete our highway system by constructing the links necessary to do away with the dead-ends that exist at the present time. It is a national duty and obligation to prepare in every way possible for this tourist trade. We shall have to consider our highways more than we have considered them in the past. We shall have to see that proper facilities for landing, refueling and repairing planes are provided. Let us not be caught unprepared for this new era, as we have been caught so often before, for I am sure even this government can see the development that is coming.

I am going to ask the minister, if I may, to unfold the details of the programme which I am sure the government must have in hand concerning this great business in the post-war years.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have just a word to add in connection with the important item now under discussion. I believe the leader of the opposition is to be congratulated upon the vision he has displayed and his real grasp of the situation in regard to the task which lies ahead as far as Canada is concerned in connection with the development of our great tourist industry. The constituency I represent is particularly interested in that industry; through the hand of fate, and through an extraordinary occurrence some nine years ago, that constituency has probably had as many visitors from across the line as any other constituency in Canada, so that my people are deeply concerned with this matter. I believe the minister is to be congratulated also upon his thorough grasp of the situation, although he took over this task only a comparatively short time ago. The committee may not know that early in December of last year he called a conference in the city of Quebec to which were invited the officers in charge of the tourist industry in all nine provinces. A report of that convention was issued; I have read it from cover to cover, and it shows that not only this government but the provincial governments are awakening to the increasing importance of this industry.

There is another factor to which I might properly refer. I believe the minister is fortunate in having as director of the travel bureau Mr. Leo Dolan, who has occupied that position for some years. Hon. members may not recall that some three years ago there was a meeting in California of representatives of the United States, Canada, and the twenty-one South and Central American countries for the purpose of forming an international travel association. Canada was represented by the director of our travel bureau. At that meeting Canada was accorded the signal honour of having Mr. Dolan elected as the first president of the association, for a two-year term.

Mr. GRAYDON: A good choice.

Mr. SLAGHT: A very good choice. He carried on his duties for the two-year term, and then attended the next meeting of the association, which was held in Buenos Aires. I believe his efforts, and the prominent position he has occupied, have started Canada off on the right foot in regard to the tremendous future development that we may expect in this connection as far as our good neighbours of South and Central America are concerned. Therefore I believe the government has a full appreciation of the importance of this industry. I want to endorse everything that has been said by the leader of the opposition in reference to not slackening our efforts, so that we may be prepared for the future when peace comes.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Chairman, may I thank hon. members who have spoken so far for their eulogies of the work done by the staff of the travel bureau and their acceptance of the desirability in the national interest of building up as quickly as circumstances permit this industry which before the war meant an expenditure in Canada in one year, the highest of which I have record, of $185,000,000, which expenditure dropped as the war went on to below $100,000,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that American dollars?

Mr. LaFLECHE: American dollars. I think I am safe in saying that before the war the tourist industry in Canada was worth more to our national economy in the way of foreign exchange than our great timber operations. This comparison gives us an idea of the great importance of the tourist industry to Canada. I trust there will be no objection to my taking a few minutes to place on the record some information which I think this committee should have and which should prove of interest to the public.

The reasons for this estimate are to keep alive during the war interest in our tourist trade and to protect our heavy investments in highways, railways, bus systems, steamship lines, air lines, hotels, eating places, popular resorts, the gasoline and oil distributing trades, the tourist trade generally and foreign exchange. There is one item of great importance internationally, that of good will, and there is also the question of the nation's health in mind and body. While we want visitors to come to Canada in large numbers when circumstances will permit, I should like to see the Canadian public travel and enjoy themselves in order to keep up their morale and improve their physique and health.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the present gas ration?

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend has brought up a subject of which perhaps he knows more than I do. At the present time it has been considered by many authorities interested in the tourist trade in Canada that it would be untimely to attempt at this time of war to stimulate tourist travel generally.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that is the proper policy.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was my intention to call another meeting of the advisory committee on the tourist trade which I created not long ago. The nine provinces are represented on this committee. As soon as the invasion broke out I decided that it would not now be proper to call in these representatives, and early last month I wrote them as follows:

It had been my intention to invite the members of the national tourist advisory committee to a meeting some time in July. However, in view of the situation which has developed in Europe, it seems advisable to postpone the meeting.

Upon reflection, I hope you will agree that it is not wise to assemble the committee at this time. At this moment when the hearts and minds of Canadian people are focused upon the course of the invasion of Europe, such a meeting might not be understood. It may be that our forces in France will have dealt a crushing blow to the enemy later in the summer. If such be the case—and God willing we all hope it will be so—it may be possible to assemble the committee late in the fall.

In the meantime it would be very much appreciated if you would care to express any thoughts you may have to Mr. D. Leo Lolan, executive director of the committee. It might be well at your convenience, if you would make known your views to Mr. Dolan as to the points you believe should be discussed by the members of the committee when they meet.

We had replies from nearly all the members of the committee. A report on the consensus of the opinion expressed in those replies reads as follows:

In connection with the letter issued by the minister, under date of June 17, to the members of the national tourist advisory committee, I beg to make the following report.

We have now received replies from practically every member of the committee. These replies indicate unanimous approval of the minister's action in not holding a meeting of the committee at the present time. Further, the members have indicated their desire to agree with the minister's proposal that we should meet late in September or October.

The leader of the opposition asked that I outline the plans for the future, and I shall do my best to satisfy him on that point. It is the opinion of many persons in Canada directly interested in the tourist trade, such as hotel-keepers, resort owners and other people in the trade, that immediately after the war is ended we shall not be relieved of the traffic rush which exists to-day and that therefore that it would be inadvisable to attempt to increase the passenger traffic. At the moment our trains are filled with passengers, and of course as far as road travel is concerned we are hampered by the scarcity of gasoline and rubber. I hope the rubber situation will be corrected very quickly, owing to the synthetic plants that are now going very well, but gasoline is another matter. However, that is one of the things which will be in greater supply I believe as soon as the peak of the war has been reached and passed victoriously.

As to the future, I shall be glad to send my hon. friend a copy of the report of the proceedings of the national tourist business meeting held on my invitation at the Chateau Frontenac, Quebec city, November 29 and December 1, 1943. About 250 Canadians and Americans interested directly in the tourist trade met to discuss matters of mutual interest, and I believe they were in unanimous agreement on all subjects. It was my pleasure to address the delegates and outline to them what I considered the principal features of a successful tourist trade. I invited them to give these their attention and to work along the lines I suggested.

The committee sat and passed resolutions, which resolutions will be considered by the advisory committee when it meets. I am anxious to meet these gentlemen because they are all keenly intent upon advancing the prosperity and happiness of Canada. They appreciate the value of this industry to the national economy, and they can do an immense amount of good in creating international good feeling because many of them are hosts to many visitors who come to enjoy Canada's climate and beauty.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many are on that committee?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There are sixty-one members.

Mr. GRAYDON: How are they chosen, geographically?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They come from the nine provinces. I attempted to find persons to act on this committee who would represent not only a province but also the larger tourist regions such as the Laurentian resorts not far from here. If I picked my own province it is not because I did not do the same thing with the other provinces. In this matter I have had the full support of all provincial governments, municipal governments, boards of trade, resort associations, tourist associations, hotel-keepers associations, the steamship companies, the railways and the air lines—indeed everybody. This is one matter in which I am very happy to say during this war time I found unanimity.

Mr. STIRLING: Are the fish and game associations throughout the provinces represented?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. If it please the committee I would be very happy to put on Hansard a list of the members of this advisory committee. I would read it, but there are sixty odd names, and with the consent of the committee I will place it on Hansard. The list is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Canadian Government Travel Bureau

The following is a complete list of our National Tourist Advisory Council as constituted by provinces:

Major-General the Hon. L. R. LaFleche, D.S.O.—Chairman.
D. Leo Dolan, Executive Director.

Prince Edward Island

Hon. J. Walter Jones, Premier of P.E.I., Charlottetown, P.E.I.
Mr. B. Graham Rogers, Supervisor, Prince Edward Island Travel Bureau, Charlottetown.
Mr. Justice A. E. Arsenault, Charlottetown.

New Brunswick

Hon. Dr. F. W. Pirie, LL.D., Minister of Lands and Mines, Fredericton, N.B.
Mr. D. W. Griffiths, Director, New Brunswick, Government Bureau of Information and Tourist Travel, Fredericton, N.B.
Mr. James D. McKenna, Saint John, N.B.
Mr. T. C. Macnabb, Regional Superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Moncton, N.B.

Nova Scotia

Hon. Harold Connolly, Minister of Industry and Publicity, Halifax, N.S.
Mr. A. J. Campbell, Director, Government Bureau of Information and Publicity, Halifax, N.S.
Mr. Jason Creed, Mill Village, N.S.
Mr. John M. Campbell, M.L.A., Baddeck, N.S.
Mr. A. I. Lomas, Halifax, N.S.

Quebec

Hon Adelard Godbout, Premier of Quebec, Que.
Mr. Maurice Hebert, Director General, Province of Quebec Tourist Bureau, Quebec.
Mr. C. W. Honey, President of the Laurentian Resorts Association, Ste. Adele.
Mr. Kenneth T. Dawes, President, Montreal Tourist and Convention Bureau, 1010 St. Catherine St. W., Montreal.
Mr. Frank Levesque, President, Province of Quebec Hotel Association, 1434 St. Catherine St. W., Montreal.
Col. Wilfrid Bovey, Member of the Quebec Legislative Council and an outstanding educationist, McGill University, Montreal.

Ontario

Hon. Leslie M. Frost, Provincial Treasurer, Toronto, Ontario.
Mr. D. R. Oliver, Director, Ontario Travel and Publicity Bureau, Toronto.
Mr. Geo. A. Martin, Secretary, Muskoka Tourist Development Association, 204 Richmond St. W., Toronto.
Mr. Arthur Widnall, Supervisor, Fort William Civic Tourist Bureau, Fort William.
Mr. T. H. R. McNally, Manager, Toronto Tourist and Convention Bureau, Toronto.
Mr. H. A. MacLennan, Past-Pres. of the Canadian Hotel Association, Toronto.

Mr. Len Hughes, Pres., Northern Ontario Tourist Trade Association, Trout Mills, Ont.
Mr. C. C. Manore, Secretary, Blue Water Highway Association, Sarnia.
Mr. W. J. Wilson, Thousand Islands–St. Lawence River Rideau Lakes Association, Gananoque.

Manitoba

Hon. J. S. McDiarmid, Minister of Mines and Natural Resources, Winnipeg.
Mr. H. E. Beresford, Director, Manitoba Government Travel and Publicity Bureau, Winnipeg.
Mr. C. A. Tanner, Managing Director of the Manitoba Hotel Association, Winnipeg.
Mr. C. D. Shepard of Winnipeg.
Mr. Frank J. Schlingerman, Winnipeg.

Saskatchewan

Hon. W. F. Kerr, Minister of Natural Resources, Regina, Sask.
Mr. S. J. Latta, Publicity Director, Saskatchewan Tourist Bureau, Regina, Sask.
Hon. C. M. Dunn, Branch Manager Mutual Life, Regina, Sask. (Former Minister of Highways.)
Mr. E. S. Forsythe, Fish and Game Commissioner, Regina, Sask.
Mr. Stephen B. McEachern, Secretary-Manager, Saskatoon Board of Trade, Saskatoon.
Mr. L. J. Longpre, Saskatchewan Motor League, Regina.
McIntosh, C. H., Manager, The Royal Bank of Canada, Prince Albert, Sask.

Alberta

Hon. Ernest G. Manning, Premier and Minister of Trade and Industry, Edmonton.
Mr. D. E. C. Campbell, Publicity Director, Publicity and Travel Bureau, Edmonton.
Mr. Chas. Grant, K.C., Edmonton.
Mr. R. A. Godson, President of the Alberta Motor Association, Edmonton.
Mr. James Brewster, Banff, Alberta.
Mr. S. W. Cameron, Sec'y-Treas., Alberta Motor Assoc., Edmonton.

British Columbia

Hon. E. D. Carson, Minister of Trade and Industry, Victoria, B.C.
Mr. E. G. Rowebottom, Deputy Minister of Trade and Industry, Victoria, B.C.
Mr. Rowe Holland, Chairman of Vancouver Parks Board; Director of Vancouver Tourist Ass'n., Vancouver, B.C.
Dr. G. H. Worthington—1st Vice-President of the Canadian Association of Tourist and Publicity Bureaus; Past President, Vancouver Tourist Association and Evergreen Playground Association, Vancouver.
Mr. M. Leo Sweeney, President, Vancouver Tourist Association, Vancouver.
Mr. Geo. I. Warren, Secretary-Manager, Victoria & Island Publicity Bureau, Victoria, B.C.

Mr. J. Murray Gibbon, General Publicity Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Montreal, P.Q.
Mr. W. S. Thompson, Public Relations Counsel, Canadian National Railways, Montreal.
Mr. C. C. Bonter, Passenger Traffic Manager, Canada Steamship Lines Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
Mr. R. G. Perry, Passenger Traffic Manager, Provincial Transport, Montreal.
Mr. H. J. Symington, President of the Trans-Canada Air Line, Montreal, P.Q.
Mr. E. H. Frappier, President of the Hotel Association of Canada, Montreal, P.Q.

Mr. A. McD. McBain, representing the Canadian Bankers Association, Manager, Foreign Relations Dept., Bank of Nova Scotia, Toronto, Ont.

Mr. R. A. Gibson, Director, Lands, Parks and Forests Branch, Department of Mines and Resources, Ottawa.

Mr. A. L. Jolliffe, Director, Immigration Branch, Department of Mines and Resources, Ottawa.

Mr. P. L. Young, Executive Assistant, Customs-Excise Division, Dept. of National Revenue, Ottawa.

The list is not closed. I shall be very happy to name other members to the advisory committee, should there be good reason to do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am afraid I have drawn a blank so far as getting information with respect to the government's plans for the tourist industry. The minister may have overlooked that part of my question. We have now had quite a long period of inactivity so far as the Canadian travel bureau is concerned. We are now in the sixth year of the war, and during this period of relative inactivity in the tourist trade it seems to me that the government ought to have prepared some constructive programme to be placed before this committee with respect to the policy which is to be followed in the post-war period with respect to the tourist trade.

I rose to find out what plans the government has made, because there is criticism across the country to the effect that we talk a lot about reconstruction but that when it comes down to having plans ready we do not get much more from the government than statements that inquiries are being made and advisory committees are being set up. Advisory committees are all to the good and I am not intending any reflection at all on the personnel of the advisory committee. But anyone who talks to those in the tourist industry knows they are not entirely satisfied that we have proceeded far enough or vigorously enough with a tourist programme for the post-war period. Whether the minister realizes it or not—and I fancy he does—the tourist business is something that ought to occupy a major part of his attention at this time. But we seem to go blithely along talking about reconstruction in the post-war period and here is a definite part and parcel of the reconstruction programme. This is one case—perhaps there are others—where a programme should have been prepared for developing and promoting the tourist industry in this country. This committee ought to have before it now the tourist programme which the government proposes to inaugurate in the period of peace. I think I am not asking the minister too much when I ask that. I think I am but reflecting the thoughts of a great many people engaged in the tourist industry who are not sure that there has been any more than words and talk with respect to this part of the government's activities in the reconstruction period. I do not want to seem unduly critical of the minister. What I am saying is rather a reflection of the complaints and criticisms that I have heard myself with respect to the programme or lack of a definite constructive programme with respect to the tourist industry in the post-war period.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am indebted to the hon. leader of the opposition for having spoken so frankly. In return he will not mind if I speak equally frankly. The hon. gentleman tells this committee that his words reflect the opinions that have been brought to his attention. May I tell him that I am in direct communication with the tourist trade all over this country, and I have not heard one single word or suspicion of a thought such as the leader of the opposition has expressed to-night.

The words which have been used by the leader of the opposition to describe the thoughts of those with whom he has been in contact are not what has been said to me. May I tell him that the suggestions contained in the report have been adopted and followed and applauded by the tourist trade of Canada. A moment ago I read a letter which I wrote to the advisory committee on June 17, and gave the consensus of leaders in the tourist trade in Canada, approving my suggestion and sharing my hope that we could meet in the fall. I cannot conceive that that is of the nature of the reaction described to us by the hon. leader of the opposition, because everything that I know and everything that I have heard is definitely to the contrary.

A moment ago I said that I would send to the leader of the opposition a copy of the report of the proceedings of the national tourists' business meeting which was held in Quebec last winter. May I also table a copy of that report this evening, with the consent of the committee. In that report the hon. gentleman will find my suggestions, which I was told at the time cover a very wide field and, if I may say so myself, cover it well. He will see there the programme. He will see mentioned there things of vital importance to the tourist trade and to the national economy of Canada.

We have set up an advisory committee and I shall get them together as soon as war conditions make it seemly and possible. In telling the leader of the opposition that, I hope that I have given him a very full reply, unless he wishes me to read this report of some nearly fifty pages, and I do not think that he would want me to inflict that upon the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I quite understand that. May I ask whether the report which the minister is now tabling sets out the government's tourist policy for the post-war period? I am trying to find out what the government's tourist policy is. If the minister says that the government's policy is contained in the report we shall be prepared to peruse it and see if it is adequate.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I point out to this committee that the people who own and operate the tourist trade of Canada know their own business, and all that the government can do is to give them encouragement and assistance and leadership. That is the way my department has proceeded in this matter. At this meeting in Quebec city I did not lay before them a government policy; I laid before them my considered thoughts as to what they should do with their own businesses and I promised to help them to the full extent of my capacity. As an earnest, but only as an earnest, the estimate for this year shows a small increase of $23,000. It is not so small when one remembers that last year the total estimate was only $54,000; I have increased it by nearly fifty per cent. It is nothing compared with what we shall require when we can go "full-out" in encouraging the tourist industry of Canada after this war is over. It is an earnest, an indication. I stated what I wanted to see in Canada, and my words are to be found in this report. If my hon. friend wants me to read the whole thing I will, but really I would blush with shame if I had to do so; it is too long.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am having difficulty, I think, in making myself clear to the minister on this point. I take full responsibility for that. What I am trying to find out, and I think what I am entitled to know, is the policy of the government on this subject. The minister now indicates that the report he is tabling is not necessarily the government's programme but rather a symposium of ideas of the government represented by the minister, and others who are in the business. I know something about what the men in the business think about these things, because from time to time I am in contact with them. I am anxious to know, and this is the time, I think, when we are entitled to the information, what is the policy of the government with respect to this reconstruction period. The tabling of a symposium of remarks at Quebec city is not sufficient to indicate the government's policy. Practically every minister of the government from time to time is asked for his policy on matters relating to his particular department, and as a matter of course he gives it. We may not always agree with it, but at least the policy is there. I do not think the minister is doing himself justice by merely saying that the government policy is still in the air and that the best we can have is a summary of the ideas of several people in the business whom he addressed and with whom he was associated in his work. I may not be quite fair to the minister on this; I want to be, because I am not trying to put him on the spot or embarrass him; but he ought to give us something more than he has done so far as the policy of the government on post-war tourist trade is concerned. I may be entirely misinterpreting his remarks, but I should like him to clarify the position.

Mr. WOOD: Before the minister answers that question may I say that I am interested in the attitude the leader of the opposition takes with regard to this and other departments of government, when he asks them to define their post-war programmes. I have often marvelled at the insistence with which opposition groups make this kind of demand, when in my view the formulating of plans for the post-war period is dependent upon the results of the peace conference, which in turn will depend a great deal upon who sits at that conference, the ideals which are promoted there, and how they affect the people of the various countries involved. It is unfair to insist that various ministers should state a special and particular programme. One has to face facts. You cannot mark out a blueprint which can be applied five years from now. This war is not over. We do not yet know who will sit at the peace conference, whether nationialism or internationalism will rule, whether the Atlantic charter will be implemented. One of the greatest contributions to the promotion of tourist trade prior to the war was the reciprocal arrangement for the admission of $100 worth of goods duty-free at the border, which induced millions of people from the United States to patronize our market. Is the leader of the opposition prepared to say that we shall implement the ideals of the Atlantic charter in having freer trade, not only in tourists—

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, we have some plans about that for use when we get in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why defer them that long?

Mr. WOOD: I am afraid they are rather remote from being implemented.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member himself seems to be pretty uncertain about things.

Mr. WOOD: I am certain that this country of Canada cannot survive with a closed-door policy, and our future in this respect is likely to depend a great deal upon the attitude at the peace conference, what programme is decided upon there. I feel that the minister would be wise not to commit himself to anything. I think, of course, that he is wise, and that he is not going to do it. Sitting here as a humble back-bencher, I often listen to these men who seem to have knowledge superior to my own, and as they get on a high and lofty plane and talk about the quality of their contributions, I marvel that they should be so sure of their future proceedings when it is so plain that they do not know what can be done. We shall have to face realities when the war is over.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It may be that I did not understand the leader of the oposition; it may be that he did not understand me or catch what I said a moment ago. I take it he wants to know the policy of the government. Well, I have already given it. Our policy is designed for the protection of widespread and heavy investments in highways, railroads, bus systems, steamship lines, air lines, hotels, eating places, popular resorts, gasoline and oil distributing trades, trade generally, foreign exchange, and international good will, as well as the nation's health of mind and of body. Behind that I stand and to that end I have worked. It will not displease the leader of the opposition to learn, perhaps for the first time, that I gathered together those who own these businesses, and therefore cannot be regimented and told what to do, except to invite them to think of the future and to be prepared for it, and to offer them assistance in carrying out the policy I read a moment ago. I think that sufficed, and perhaps all the better because nothing like it had ever been attempted before I did it. If the leader of the opposition were to read this report which I am tabling, and of which I am sending him a copy, perhaps he would realize that there is more to it than he seems to believe.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had a special interest in this because I was in the district in Quebec at the time when this took place.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Why didn't you come?

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not invited.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Well, had I known—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say that, so far as the work of the minister in this respect is concerned, while I criticize where I think criticism is required, I think the minister merits commendation for bringing in practical people to advise him and to discuss these many matters with him. While perhaps in the early part of my remarks I was critical in regard to certain things I thought ought to be done for the improvement of the industry, nevertheless I think some other members of the cabinet might follow the minister's example and get the views of the average person in business instead of taking the views of someone who has never been in business at all. They might take a leaf out of the minister's book. It would make for harmony and better relations and would be more effective in the prosecution of any policy that might be adopted. I hope the minister will take this as a compliment from one who is not inclined to give compliments unless they are deserved.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I thank you, kind sir.

Mr. FURNISS: I represent the most popular summer resort in Ontario, and I am wondering where the leader of the opposition finds reason for anxiety over the future of the tourist business. My information this summer, more than a month ago, was that every tourist house in Muskoka was booked up. I have not had a single complaint. They are enjoying the best summer in the tourist business since 1929.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have no objection to my trying to continue it?

Mr. FURNISS: Not a bit. The hon. member takes very great delight in visiting some of the resorts himself. I do not think the impression should go out that the tourist business is suffering from any lack of interest on the part of the travel bureau. Last summer I had some complaints in regard to rationing and so on and I went to the department. They assured me that they would feed all the people who went to Muskoka last summer and thereafter I had no complaints; nor have I had a single complaint this summer. I think the future of the tourist business is as bright as ever it was and I believe it will so continue after the war.

Mr. STIRLING: Now that there has been a slackening in the restrictions on foreign exchange, has the minister noticed the beginning of any movement in the tourist business from the United States to Canada? I notice that one of the air lines in the United States has been advertising cheap rates on its planes as far as New Brunswick. One line goes from the United States to Eire, and since priorities rule in the transatlantic passage, I would gather that there were vacancies on those planes, because they are advertising cheap rates as far as New Brunswick. I must presume that would be with tourist intent. I wonder if the minister or his department had a hand in that arrangement. If so, has it also a hand in similar arrangements in other parts of Canada with regard to tourists coming from the United States by air in small numbers?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I had heard, I believe, of the case mentioned by the hon. member, but I understood that it was an isolated one. As regards the new regulations in connection with financial matters between the two countries, I have not the statistics, but for some considerable time the trend of thought on the part of travel authorities has been to keep passenger traffic at the present level and not to attempt to increase it. I do not think they are ready to take on a heavier load than is being carried now—not as a general rule.

Item agreed to.

194. National film board, including the motion picture bureau, $678,806.

Mr. GRAHAM: I thought this was an opportune time for me to bring to the attention of the minister a thought I had for some time. In my opinion we should be making more and more use of the national film board to educate the public in a visual manner regarding the task and function of government. Our system of government is a democratic one. That, of course premises a partnership between the people and those in public office, and the activities of government have expanded to such an extent that I am quite certain one of the real dangers to the democratic way of government is a growing apart of the people from their own government. The amounts that governments now handle, the amount of the budget and the range of activities, are so immense that the average person on the street is inclined to think of government as some agency completely apart from himself and from the things which affect his life and in which he has a vital partnership.

Government, after all, is but the agent chosen by the people to conduct their business, and I am much alarmed as I notice the chasm that separates the people's mind from the activities of government. One of the things we must do is to realize that such agencies as the national film board can interpret government to the people and help them to be fully informed of the details of different regulations and laws that affect them in their daily life. I often think that the many pamphlets and other forms of literature distributed do not accomplish the purpose intended. I know they are excellent in form and material, but there are many people who have not the time or interest to peruse all the different forms of literature sent out by the various departments.

During the war some of the films produced by the national film board to bring home some lesson of war, and the practical necessity of some regulation or rule or restriction, have shown the ability of the board to present these things in a vivid manner that quickly brings to the person seeing them the purpose of some particular regulation and the manner in which it is beneficial to him as a citizen of the country. Therefore I believe in Canada that more and more must be considered and solved if we are to make democracy what it should be, a matter of close interest on the part of our people. Knowing the ability of this national film board—and I say to the minister that I highly compliment that particular board on its ability to produce in a visual form government pictures of very great interest, and, in my opinion, of very great technical skill—I think it is an agency that Canada could well be proud of, and that we should use it a great deal more than we have been doing in order to perform the national duty of interpreting Canada and its activities to the people of this country.

Mr. JAQUES: Would the minister explain to the committee the activities of the film board? Personally I know very little about it. I should like to know just what it does.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask another question of the minister, and he could answer my question while he is answering the question of the hon. member who has just spoken. The item on page 138 of the estimates reads as follows: "Development of international circulation of films." I think that is a very important thing. I am glad to see it there. As I understand it, the film board is sending Canadian films to other countries, giving them a visual demonstration of some of the things we have in Canada, such as our natural resources, our manufacturing abilities, some of the things we have to trade and some of the beauties of our Canadian scenery to encourage tourist traffic. Would the minister give us some details of what has been done with respect to the exchange of films with other countries along these lines.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I may get a little mixed up here, among the three hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Swift Current suggested and urged that the national film board bring to the people of Canada in greater measures the workings of governmental departments. May I explain to this committee that during the war the national film board has been doing a very great deal of work for the several departments. It has been very busy doing work for war purposes, and war purposes has had, as it should have, the priority. But in the programme I bring to the committee this evening I should like to say that the majority of films which have been produced up to date by the national film board are of a specific departmental nature and in a very large majority having to do with the prosecution of the war. The need has become evident of films of a more general national nature for use in Canadian schools and by Canadian groups, and to bring to the world the realization of Canada's development. The need for such films for distribution abroad has been brought to the attention of the national film board by many trade commissioners and other Canadian representatives aboard. I think that explains to the hon. member for Swift Current what has been done, and the policy of the national film board. His words will be very carefully noted and given all possible consideration.

Another hon. member asked about the foreign distribution of films made by the national film board. May I acquaint this committee with the following information. During the fiscal year ending March 31, 1944, 525 sixteen millimetre and 169 thirty-five millimetre prints were sent to twenty-seven different countries, territories of the British empire and other places outside of Canada, not including the United States. Distribution is effected generally through offices of the Canadian high commissioners, embassies, legations, consulates and offices of the Canadian government trade commissioners. They are our contacts in these foreign countries. In addition to the above-mentioned media of distribution, we have an arrangement with the British ministry of information for the circulation of our films in the United Kingdom and fifty-two places abroad in the British commonwealth, empire and other countries. We also have an arrangemeent with Sterling Products International Incorporated, with head office in Newark, New Jersey, in the United States of America, for the circulation and showing of selected films through their agencies and sixty-nine mobileciné sound units in fourteen Latin American countries. I suggest that the hon. member will obtain information from that statement which will interest him very much indeed. If the names of the countries are desired I can put them on the record, or read them into the record.

Mr. WRIGHT: It would be all right if they were placed on the record.

Mr. LaFLECHE: With the consent of the committee I shall table a list of the countries I mentioned a moment ago. They are as follows:

Number of prints sent, by country or place, for the past fiscal year 1943-44, is as follows:

Place	16 mm.	35 mm.
Argentina	21	..
Australia	..	14
Melbourne	34	..
Canberra	19	..
Sydney	23	..
Vacuum Oil	9	..
Tasmania	6	..
Brazil	20	..
British West Indies	8	15
Chile	18	1
Colombia	4	..
Cuba	12	..
Egypt	24	..
England	36	49
Russia	..	4
China	..	2
St. Pierre et Miquelon	..	54
Greenland	6	6
Iceland	7	..
India	10	14
Mexico
Filmotecas	11	..
T.C.	20	..
Newfoundland	33	..
New Zealand	..	2
Auckland	22	..
Wellington	27	..
Panama	10	..
Peru	9	..
Puerto Rico	13	..
South Africa	..	7
Dept. of Educ.	1	..
Johannesburg	23	..
Pretoria	17	..
Capetown	4	..
Messrs. Sterling Products Int. Inc.
Chile	9	1
Dominica	1	..
Colombia	10	..
Nicaragua	1	..
Uruguay	2	..
San Salvador	2	..
Costa Rica	1	..
Venezuela	6	..
Ecuador	3	..
Honduras	1	..
Guatemala	1	..
Peru	4	..
Mexico	26	.
Total	525	169

Another question was asked, but it escaped my memory. Would the hon. member repeat?

Mr. JAQUES: I asked the minister to give the committee a general description of the activities of the national film board. I have to confess I know nothing about it. I should like to know something about it because I am interested in it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The break-down of the vote is on broad lines and answers the hon. member's question. I shall read it, and then I shall give as many details as are desired. Apart from the question of staff which is always necessary, we have items for national film programme, national film programme rural circuits, a very interesting development, I may say; the development of international circulation of films. I have already said something about that. Supplies, materials, printing and stationery; acquisition of equipment and travelling expenses. I believe that the hon. member wishes information about the work performed by the national film board. I shall read from the National Film Board Act of May 2, 1939. The duties of the commissioner, which in a sense cover the activities of the entire staff, are as follows:

The commissioner in carrying out the duties imposed upon him by this act shall at all times be under and subject to the directions of the board and shall

(a) advise upon the making and distribution of national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts;

(b) coordinate national and departmental film activities in consultation with the board and the several departments and branches of government work;

(c) advise as to methods of securing quality, economy, efficiency and effective cooperation in the production, distribution and exhibition of government films;

(d) advise upon and approve production, distribution and exhibition contacts and agreements in connection with film activities of the several departments of the government and, in respect of these, act as intermediary between such departments and the bureau and between such departments and commercial firms;

(e) advise upon all departmental expenditures in the production, distribution and exhibition of films;

(f) represent the board in its relations with commercial newsreel and non-commercial film organizations;

(g) advise as to the distribution of government films in other countries;

(h) coordinate and develop information services in connection with government film activities.

Those are the authorities.

Now, if I may, I should like to answer to an even greater extent the question put by the hon. member. I have here a list headed, "National film productions completed during the fiscal year 1943-44." There is no better way to answer the question put by the hon. gentleman than by giving him the names of the films completed under the authority I have just read. Again this is a very long list, and while I have no objection to reading it I am afraid you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee would think I was taking too much time. Therefore with the permission of the committee I shall be very happy to put this list on record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask a question in regard to the item for temporary assistance. I notice that last year the estimate was $25,276. First I should like to know if that money was all spent. There has been a marked increase this year, to $65,152, or an increase of $39,876. I should like the minister to tell the committee why there should be such a large increase. Then further down I see an item for short-term employment, for which $29,000 is appropriated. What is the difference between temporary assistance and short-term employment?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The increase in the amount provided for staff reflects but the estimate of the increased need for this fiscal year. The hon. gentleman asked whether the entire amount voted last year had been expended, and the answer is yes. I would point out that the work of the national film board has increased very greatly and is still on the upward trend. The peak will be reached as the war ends; at least the war has caused a very great increase in the production of the national film board. The hon. gentleman asks the difference between temporary employees and short-term employment. Temporary employment is equivalent to what is generally understood in the civil service by the term "temporary civil servant." Do I make myself clear in that respect?

Mr. HAZEN: That is temporary assistance?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes; temporary employees are what are regularly understood in Ottawa when one speaks of temporary civil servants.

Mr. HAZEN: But one item is for temporary assistance and the other is for short-term employment.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have tried to explain the first item; it is a very prosaic explanation, well understood here. Short-term employment is perhaps not so well understood. It covers those persons who are employed by the national film commissioner to carry out a specific piece of work; in other words, to do a particular job. They may be taken on for a short time, for the production of a particular picture, for instance; that is the exact explanation. A short-term employee is taken on for the production of a particular film.

Mr. HAZEN: How many more persons do you expect to have employed under the item for temporary assistance than you had last year?

Mr. LaFLECHE: In the estimates for the fiscal year 1943-44 the sum of $28,424 was recovered from production and other projects. However, because of the many difficulties involved in the matter of an equitable distribution among the various projects, it was the considered opinion of the officials of the film board that this amount be not included and shown as recoverable for the year 1944-45. Consequently the cost of all temporary personnel employed in administration is included in the civil estimates. The increase of $39,876 for the temporary staff is made up as follows: transfer of C. S. Bagley; transfer of Erva Hodgins; transfer of A. Cloutier; new positions, Jean MacMillan, Frank Curry, Muriel Gogo; increases to Lucian Chartrand and Lucille Quevillon. Then there is the recovery from production and other projects for the fiscal year 1943-44, which is not included this year.

Mr. HAZEN: As I followed the minister, he mentioned six people who were not employed last year, and two other persons who received increases in salary. If that accounts for the $39,000 they must be receiving rather large salaries. Am I correct in my figures?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The salaries are as follows:

C. S. Bagley	$3,600
Erva Hodgins	1,200
A. Cloutier	2,820
Jean MacMillan	1,380
Frank Curry	1,252
Muriel Gogo	1,080
Lucian Chartrand (increase)	60
Lucille Quevillon (increase)	60

The recovery from production and other projects for the fiscal year 1943-44, which is not included this year, amounted to $28,424.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not clear on this yet. Those figures do not total $39,000. I should say they come to only $10,000 or $12,000, roughly.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If the hon. member adds them he will see they come to $39,876, but that includes a bookkeeping entry of $28,424 covering the recoveries. You will find that that balances to a dollar.

Mr. PERLEY: I notice on page 138 of the estimates where the details are given that there is an increase in a number of these items. The national film programme is more than doubled, but I notice that in connection with the rural circuits there is no increase over last year. Would the minister explain what is covered by that item and why there is no increase?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Since March, 1943, the number of rural circuits financed completely by the national film board has remained at the maximum figure of fifty-four. I may say in passing that that is largely due to a lack of demand for additional circuits. The number of circuits financed jointly by the film board and various cooperating organizations has increased from fifteen to thirty-one. This makes a total of eighty-five, which is an increase. This means that well over 1,500 rural points are served regularly each month.

Mr. HAZEN: Are there rural circuits in each province?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There are. If local or regional authorities care to band together and appoint some one to look after it locally and if they communicate with the national film board, every effort will be made to extend to that new region a rural film circuit.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister give us the number of rural circuits in each of the three prairie provinces?

Mr. HAZEN: In all the provinces.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The number of circuits does not indicate the number of places served, since one circuit would serve many places. The circuits are as follows:

British Columbia	5
Alberta	11
Saskatchewan	19
Manitoba	10
Ontario	15
Quebec	15
Nova Scotia	5
New Brunswick	5

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 17, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN ARMY—PERSONNEL ENLISTED FOR OVERSEAS BUT STILL IN CANADA

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men who enlisted in the army for overseas service are there at present in Canada?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) members of the veterans guard; (b) in categories which render them unsuitable for overseas service; (c) are necessarily retained in this country for organizational or staff duties?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Including those in territories adjacent to Canada, approximately 140,000 of whom probably 50,000 or more are or can be made available as reinforcements for overseas service.

2. (a) Approximately 8,500.

(b) Excluding those in the veterans guard there are approximately 50,000 who are of an age or military category such that they would not normally be sent overseas. Individuals among these may be sent overseas for special duty.

In addition, there are approximately 25,000 who, while not definitely unsuitable for overseas service, are in age groups, medical categories, or ranks such that only a limited number of them can be absorbed within establishments of the army overseas.

(c) Excluding those referred to in (a) and (b) above, there are approximately 10,000 employed on the staffs of administrative, training and servicing units in Canada.

As many as possible of these are being withdrawn for overseas service, but some will no doubt have to be retained permanently in Canada because their duties require fit general service volunteers or because of special knowledge and experience which makes it difficult to obtain suitable replacements.

VICTORY BONDS PURCHASED BY SOLDIERS

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. If a soldier purchases a victory bond on the instalment plan and is posted as missing, what happens in regard to the unpaid balance?

2. If a soldier purchasing victory bonds on the instalment plan is killed before completing the transaction, what happens to the amount paid on the bond?

3. Is it refunded to the next of kin?

4. If so, is the interest allowed?

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. When a soldier is missing or dies.

(a) If the casualty occurred prior to the end of the fifth month of the instalment period and advice thereof is received prior to the end of the sixth (and final) month of the instalment period, the assignment of pay for the purchase of the bond is cancelled retroactive to its commencement and the instalments so far deducted are recredited to the soldier's pay account. Where such advice is not received prior to the end of the sixth (and final) month, purchase of the bond would be completed.

(b) If the casualty occurred during the sixth (and final) month of the instalment period purchase of the bond would be completed.

(Note: Under article 83 F.R. & I. (Canada) the pay and allowances (except subsistence allowance) of a soldier who dies or is reported missing are credited to the end of the month in which the casualty occurs. Therefore, the purchase of a bond is completed only in those cases where the casualty occurred during the sixth month or where advice of a casualty which occurred prior thereto is received subsequent to the end of the sixth month. In the latter case, an overpayment of assigned pay results which may be recovered from any credit balance accruing in the soldier's pay account.)

3. In those cases where the death, etc. of the soldier necessitates cancellation of the assignment of pay, the deductions recredited to the pay account form part of the service estate of the soldier and are transferred to the administrator of estates for distribution to those entitled thereto by law. This procedure is in accordance with the terms of the soldier's application for purchase of the bond.

Where purchase of the bond has been completed the person entitled thereto will receive the bond in accordance with the instructions given by the soldier in his application for purchase of the bond, or if the bond is deposited with the Department of Finance for safekeeping, that department will surrender it to the administrator of estates for inclusion in the service estate of the soldier.

4. Where purchase of a bond is completed, the interest accrues to those entitled thereto, either by receipt of the bond itself, or through distribution of the soldier's service estate.

In those cases where the purchase of a bond by assignment of pay is cancelled owing to the death, etc., of the soldier, pro rata payments of interest on the instalments recredited to the pay account are not made as no authority exists for such payments, nor are they provided for in the terms of the soldier's application for purchase of a bond.

*RADIO BROADCASTING—COMPLIMENTARY DINNER TO THE PRIME MINISTER ON AUGUST 7

Mr. DORION:

In view of the fact that, on the evening of the 7th of August next, there will be a political rally at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa, and a provincial election will be held in Quebec on the 8th of August, what means will the government take to prevent, on those two occasions, infringement of section 22, subsection 4 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better answer this question. It evidently relates to the recognition of the twenty-fifth anniversary of my appointment as leader of the Liberal party by my fellow members in parliament who are generously tendering me a complimentary dinner on that evening at the Chateau Laurier.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not a surprise, then?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that it was a surprise to me to see references in the papers to matters pertaining to this occasion of which I had no knowledge whatever. Among others was a reference to the fact that a nation-wide broadcast would be made by myself on that evening.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): National headquarters got the wires crossed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No—if my hon. friend will just be courteous and allow me to make my statement. I should like to have the position made perfectly clear. When I saw in the press the statement that at the dinner there would be a broadcast by myself I immediately felt that some persons, perhaps a good many more than I had reason to feel might so regard it, might think that the occasion had been arranged from some political motive and that any address or remarks by myself on that evening would be made for purposes of furthering some political end.

I immediately ascertained who among my friends had the matter more immediately in hand. I not only spoke to them, but I put myself on record in a letter in which I stated that much as I appreciated the compliment of the dinner I felt I would have to decline to make any broadcast on that occasion, that were I to do so my own motives and the motives of the party would most certainly be mistaken. I asked that as some announcement had been made in the press to the effect that I would be broadcasting on that evening, a correction be made. I gave as my reasons not merely the possible misconstruction that might be placed on a broadcast at that time, but also my feeling that with the war at the stage at which it is at the present, I was the last one who would wish to be responsible in any way for possible further political controversy at this time. Moreover I pointed out that there was likely to be a provincial election; in fact, a provincial election in the province of Quebec had been mentioned. It was some days ago that I spoke of this matter. Since then it has been decided to hold provincial elections in both Alberta and New Brunswick. It is natural that some persons should have minds akin to that of the hon. member who has asked this question. I pointed out such persons would assume of course that there must be something sinister and ulterior about the proposed recognition of the occasion in the manner suggested.

I have noticed in this morning's paper the following statement which I think puts the matter in its true light. I shall quote it as I believe it has been sent to the press generally throughout Canada:

A speech Prime Minister Mackenzie King is scheduled to deliver August 7 at a dinner marking the 25th anniversary of his leadership of the Liberal party will not be broadcast, it was announced last night.

The committee in charge of arrangements for the dinner said in a statement that an earlier announcement that the speech would be broadcast over the national network of the C.B.C. was made before consultation with the Prime Minister.

The statement added that Mr. King felt that any broadcast which might be made "would almost certainly be construed as having a political motive and as such might give rise to political controversy." This, Mr. King is most anxious to avoid . . . particularly at this stage of the war and at a time when elections are being held in three of the provinces of Canada.

(Elections will be held in Quebec and Alberta August 8 and in New Brunswick August 28.)

I hope that what I have said and what appears in the press will be sufficient to make perfectly clear that neither the committee in charge of this complimentary dinner nor I myself have any desire to make political capital out of this recognition by my fellow members in parliament of the 25th anniversary of my election as leader of the Liberal party of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps I may be given the opportunity to add a word which the Prime Minister himself could not say because he did not know anything about it. The arrangements for the complimentary dinner for the Prime Minister were taken in hand over eight months ago. The Prime Minister knew nothing whatever about it, but from the beginning it was contemplated that it would be a proper occasion on which he might make a speech to the country over the radio. These assumptions and inferences, that this is something that has been arranged to influence the present political situation, are wholly without foundation whatever.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to add this word. I saw in one of the papers of this city a statement to the effect that on that occasion I was to be made a certain presentation. May I say that I had no knowledge that the presentation there referred to was being considered in relation to myself. I knew of course that some steps had been taken to have certain things done but as to any presentation to myself of the character which was mentioned in that paper I had no knowledge whatever. When I saw the announcement I immediately recognized what I thought was a mischievous intent behind it and I wrote at once to members of the committee and said that I hoped no presentation of the character mentioned would be made to me on that occasion. I expressed the hope they would not feel that I was not fully appreciative of the compliment that was being paid to me and of the recognition which my party was seeking to give the 25th anniversary of my leadership, but that I would feel much happier if that particular feature of the occasion might be omitted.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POST-WAR MEDICAL SCHOOLS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any plans been made or any funds appropriated by any department of the government for the building of medical schools or colleges in the post-war period?
2. If so, what amounts have been proposed for such an expenditure within each province?
3. If such plans have been made do they provide for any increase in the number of medical students? If so, to what extent in each province?

MOTOR LAUNCHES—PROTECTION OF TRAVELLING PUBLIC

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken to prohibit the sale of gasoline for motor launches that carry passengers for hire or otherwise, which have not been licensed and have not been inspected by any federal authority as to navigation safety?
2. Who is in charge of the enforcement of navigation or other federal laws herein to protect the public travelling in this form of transport?
3. Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply any control over small motor craft, and what has been done to regulate such craft?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SOLDIERS' GRATUITIES AND SOLDIERS' INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have two questions to direct to the Prime Minister. I would ask him whether the government proposes to introduce at this session a bill with respect to soldiers' gratuities or mustering-out pay, and secondly whether there is any truth in the rumours that there is to be a bill this session covering soldiers' insurance.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give my hon. friend a definite reply to the two questions asked as both matters at the present time are still under consideration.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPORTS AS TO THREATENED EXECUTION OF ALLIED AIRMEN IN JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, of which I have given him notice. The newspapers of Saturday last carried a dispatch from American news sources which indicated that the Japanese government had renewed its threats to execute any allied airmen caught landing in Japan. If substantiated, this latest evidence of callous disregard for international conventions would seem to call for a strong protest from the governments of the united nations. I would be glad, therefore, to have the Prime Minister's comments on the situation; and perhaps he will indicate what steps Canada may take.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say in reply to my hon. friend that the press report to which he has referred has still to be verified, but I would agree entirely with him not only as to the desirability but the necessity of the strongest protest from the governments of the united nations being made should there be any grounds for believing that these reports are correct.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO REPORTED EVICTIONS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. This morning I have received two telegrams from Toronto to say that a woman and her five children are to be evicted from their home in that city on the morning of the seventeenth. She is the wife of a service man who has been serving overseas for four years. Does the government propose to take any action to prevent such disgraceful things happening again?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I heard over the radio this morning a reference to the matter which she states at the present moment has been referred to her by telegram. My intention was to have the representations considered by the cabinet at its first meeting, but I now have reason to believe that the eviction will not take place. At any rate at its first meeting the government will consider what was stated this morning.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

MEASURE TO ENABLE WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL TO VOTE IN GENERAL ELECTIONS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to bill No. 135, to provide regulations enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, and Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy, at any general election held during the present war, also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, consequential to such regulations, or made necessary by the advent of the said war.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the other house has returned this bill with two amendments. I shall not at this stage deal with them at any length but might explain them briefly.

The first amendment is to section 5, by adding the words, "at the time of the passing of this act". The intention and effect of that is that in the event of any provincial legislature deciding that it should disqualify electors by reason of racial origin between the time of the passing of this act and the next election, this amendment will not prevent the affected parties mentioned in such measure from voting.

The next amendment is to section 11. That section deals with those clauses of the bill that will apply only to an election held within the present war and within a period of six months thereafter. I think from the wording of section 5 it might be argued, in fact it is made clear that it could apply only at the time this country is at war, because it states specifically that any disqualifications are those of a country which is at war with Canada. Members of this house, especially legal members, will agree that a statute always speaks in the present tense, but notwithstanding that, the endeavour has been made to make it clearer. I believe, Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to concurrence in the amendment. It might be argued that it makes assurance doubly sure and there could be no exception taken to that. Consequently I am prepared to move concurrence in the amendment. But I also wish to move another amendment consequential to the senate amendment, and that is:

That the following words be added to the words "at the time of the passing of this act": "namely, July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war resided in a province in which on those dates."

The effect of that is simply this. There has been some criticism of the disqualification of certain members of the Japanese race even though we are in the midst of a bitter and grim war, and the result of this amendment will be that no one who has enjoyed the right to vote will be disqualified. In other words, the right of the Japanese race to vote will be unimpaired in so far as they previously enjoyed that right. I believe this will meet the situation. I do not think, no matter how broad-minded we may be, that at a time of war we should consider extending the franchise to those of an enemy race, and any other provision in the act will unquestionably have that effect. This leaves the right of those of the Japanese race who had the right to vote unimpaired, untrammelled, and uninterfered with. I believe that will meet with general approval in all sections of the house, and I consequently move that the senate amendment be concurred in as well as the motion I have proposed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would ask the minister what the rights were previously so far as the Japanese are concerned. Were they in any degree impaired except in one province?

Mr. McLARTY: I am not sure that I get the exact significance of the hon. member's question. British Columbia is the only province in which any person is barred on account of his being a member of the Japanese race.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that in other provinces there has been no barring and there will be no change?

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps it might be well if I were to read the amendments and the effect of them as I have them here:

That the amendment made by the senate to section 5 of Bill No. 135 be agreed to with the following consequential amendment:

That the following words be added to the words "at the time of the passing of this act": "namely, July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war, resided in a province in which on those dates"; and that as a consequence, for greater clarity, paragraph (n) of the said section be made to read as follows:

"Every person residing in Canada whose racial origin is that of a country at war with Canada, if such person, at the time of the passing of this act, namely, July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war, resided in a province in which on those dates a person of his racial origin was disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918 or in any subsequent war in which Canada may be engaged."

That the senate amendment to section 11 be agreed to.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): It is unfortunate at this stage of the session that we are obliged to take part in a debate on this measure. I am speaking as a member of the committee that assisted in drafting the war service voters regulations. I had hoped that the amendment the government would propose would not make it necessary for members of this group to precipitate a debate on this bill. Unfortunately I cannot agree that the amendment proposed by the Secretary of State consequent upon the amendment made by the senate to section 5 of this bill meets the situation as I understand it.

Perhaps it is just as well to have a brief review of matters leading up to the passage of this particular bill. I wish to make it quite clear that as a member of the elections committee who helped to draft—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. member is proposing to give a history of what has happened prior to this.

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that we have before us amendments made by the senate and a motion proposed by the Secretary of State. I would ask hon. members to confine themselves to the terms of these amendments as we have them.

Mr. GILLIS: I had no intention of doing that, Mr. Speaker. I merely wished to review the matter before the house because I think it requires clarification both here and in the country so far as the amendment now under discussion relates to clause 5 of the bill. What I wish to make clear as a member of the committee who drafted the war service voters regulations is that we had nothing to do with the drafting of the amendment that is now before the house.

Mr. McLARTY: I made that clear in the debate in committee of the whole.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. The committee on dominion elections presented their report in the house on April 28, but that report had simply to do with war service voters regulations. When the Secretary of State introduced his bill he informed the house in a brief statement that the committee on war service voters regulations were unanimous in their approval, which was quite correct. Most of the members who served on the committee drafting war service voters regulations had no knowledge of the matter now before the house.

Mr. McLARTY: I made that quite clear.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. Therefore, when the Secretary of State introduced the resolution in the house on June 8 there was no bill. Second reading was given to the bill on June 9. There was still no bill in the hands of the members of this house when it was given second reading. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked whether it had been printed or not. The reason I mention this is that every member of this house is desirous of correcting a mistake that was made at that time. At the time I spoke on the bill I had not seen it. I came to the house at a moment's notice. The matter was under discussion. I thought the bill merely had to do with the matters that the committee on war service voters regulations had passed on; and without any reservation I gave my support to the bill. After getting a chance to sit down and go over the bill I was surprised to see that this addition had been made. What I am concerned with is something that should not have been done in this bill, namely, to include amendments to the elections act which greatly change the exercise of the franchise in a federal election. I think it was the wrong place to make the amendment. It should not be pinned to the war service voters regulations. As one member of the committee who studied that question, I merely wish to make it clear that had we had knowledge of that proposal and if there had been an opportunity to discuss it it certainly would not have received my support in any way, shape or form.

The amendment made by the senate does not, in my opinion, cover the objection, and the amendment now made by the Secretary of State does not clarify it to my satisfaction. What I am concerned about is that in the exercise of the franchise in Canada we are still practising racial discrimination, as the bill now stands. While we know that the war with Japan is a serious matter and that many atrocities have been committed by the people of that country, there is no reason why we should try to duplicate the performances of that country. Canada is a country that is made up largely of minority groups. From day to day we read of the atrocities committed by Germany against our prisoners, people who are helpless to defend themselves. No one has ever suggested that we should interfere with the exercise of the franchise by German residents of this country.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. McLARTY: Is he urging the extension of the franchise to the Japanese at the present time—that the franchise be widely extended?

Mr. GILLIS: What we are urging at this time is that while British Columbia has seen fit to deny the exercise of the franchise to persons of Japanese origin, this House of Commons should not extend that racial discrimination to the rest of Canada through the medium of an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment meets the very point my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. McLARTY: In the amendment we are not denying the franchise in any way.

Mr. KNOWLES: The prohibition is being extended throughout Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: It certainly has not been made clear that we are not. We received this amendment only a few moments ago. The wording of the amendment now before the house is as follows:

> Every person residing in Canada whose racial origin is that of a country at war with Canada, if such person, at the time of the passing of this act: namely, July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war, resided in a province in which on those dates a person of his racial origin was disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918, or in any subsequent war in which Canada may be engaged.

That is a pretty ambiguous amendment.

Mr. McLARTY: No, it is quite clear. If he resided in a province until the date of the declaration of the war then no other province is affected; no one residing in any other province is affected.

Mr. GILLIS: This is the way I understand the amendment. No person of Japanese racial origin who resided in British Columbia on the date mentioned in this amendment and has since moved to another province in Canada may vote. He is deprived of the franchise in that province.

Mr. McLARTY: Not on the date mentioned; on the declaration of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He never had it.

Mr. McLARTY: I hesitate to interrupt; I will not do it again. You cannot take away from a person something he did not have. You are not depriving him of any right that he had because he never had the right. To keep the record straight the date is July 1, 1938, which is the date of the passing of the general elections act; but the effective date is the date of the declaration of war with the Japanese empire.

Mr. GILLIS: You are taking something away from him. It is true he did not have the vote in British Columbia, but if he moved to Ontario or Quebec, where that kind of law is not in effect, he would have the right, if it were not for this particular bill, to exercise his franchise in a dominion election.

Mr. McLARTY: He has the right if he moved before the war.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the change. Most of these people have moved since the outbreak of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May we understand clearly what my hon. friend is asking? Is he asking that Japanese who had no right to vote in a federal election prior to the war shall now be given the right to vote if they happen to be in some part of Canada other than British Columbia? That is the point. Does he want that? If that is what he wishes, let him state it. Let him explain what he means. Is he asking for the conferring of the right to vote on a large number of Japanese who would not have that right had they not been moved for reasons connected with the war and for the security of Canada during the war?

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what I am asking, Mr. Speaker, and I am going to state my opinions on the matter, very briefly. I believe that any person who was permitted to enter this country and become a citizen of it should have the full rights of citizenship. That is my opinion, and that is particularly so in regard to those born in Canada, who are Canadians because of that fact.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If the hon. member will permit a question, is that the hon. member's personal opinion, or is it the official opinion of the party?

Mr. GILLIS: That is official, from the party.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does that apply to British Columbia, too?

Mr. GILLIS: I hope you will note these interruptions, Mr. Speaker. I am not speaking for British Columbia; I am speaking for the members of this group.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member does not so wish, he may not be interrupted.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you. I am not concerned about the Japanese only; I am concerned about the people of every racial origin in this country.

Mr. McLARTY: The Japanese are the only ones involved.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; you are practising racial discrimination so far as this particular group is concerned. There is something else I want to make clear. I remember vividly the fight that was put up thirty-five or forty years ago when the Japanese were brought into this country; certain sections of Canada did their best to keep them out. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other employers in this country were concerned with bringing them in so that they might obtain cheap labour to serve their purposes.

Mr. REID: Not the Japanese; the Chinese.

Mr. STIRLING: That has been denied time and again.

Mr. GILLIS: It would not be very hard to dig back into the records and prove that statement. The present attitude is a surprise to me in view of what I find in Hansard, in booklets and pamphlets issued by the Liberal party, and in official statements by the Conservative party. These statements are very liberal, and I think they indicate the policy that must be followed if we are to make progress in the future. This country has to be populated. We have no Japanese in Nova Scotia—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No; that is the reason.

Mr. GILLIS: If we think we, eleven and a half million people on this half of the continent of North America, can set ourselves up as a super race and bring in slaves to work for us, at the same time denying them the rights of citizenship, certainly that is not in accordance with statements made in this house by both the Liberal and Conservative parties. I am much concerned, Mr. Speaker, when those who are conducting the affairs of this nation can make a statement this year and twist it around next year, particularly when it has to do with basic principles, without any regard to what was said the year before. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is a British Columbia member. I should like to quote the opinion he expressed on a former occasion. I refer to page 4487 of Hansard for June 29, 1934, when the Dominion Franchise Act was under discussion in relation to the Doukhobors. The minister had this to say:

> If these people refuse to obey our laws they should be punished, but I think disfranchisement is the wrong form of punishment. It is an invidious distinction. I hold no brief for these people as I think they deserved the punishment which the attorney general and the government of the day in British Columbia meted out to them, but I think it is a bad precedent for this parliament to follow.

The minister was very anxious at that time to protect the right of the franchise with respect to a minority group. Again, at page 4530 of Hansard for June 30, 1934, I find this discussion:

> Mr. Bennett: . . . If they are not willing to become citizens of Canada and openly defy the law, then they should not be permitted to vote as citizens.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: In view of what the Prime Minister has just said, may I ask him this question: Would not a better way to proceed have been to enact in the franchise act that any person who defies the law to the extent of refusing to be enumerated as a Canadian citizen shall not be qualified to vote?
>
> Mr. Bennett: That cannot be done.

The portion of the discussion with which I am concerned follows:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: Then innocent parties should not be discriminated against, or as Burke says, you cannot indict a nation; no more can you indict an entire race or all members of any religious sect.

I agree with that statement. In the last thirty years I have had some considerable experience with many minority groups in Canada, and I think I am safe in saying that most of such groups, and this includes the Japanese, came to this country as refugees from the order of society which has developed in those countries. Hon. members may say that is not so. Discuss the matter with them individually and personally. They are prepared to obey the laws of Canada. Many of them have taken out citizenship papers. Thousands were born in this country. To-day many of them are fighting in the army of the United States. They are not in the Canadian army because they are not permitted to join it. During the last war I served with a unit which had as reinforcements part of a battalion of Japanese raised in British Columbia, and we considered them to be very competent soldiers. At least five Purple Hearts have been won by Japanese soldiers with the American armies fighting the legions of Mussolini in Italy.

Mr. NEILL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there was never a battalion of Japanese raised in British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Only seventy-four Japanese enlisted in all Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; over two hundred.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue with hon. members, but I remember distinctly getting reinforcements in October, 1916, which consisted of about 175 Japanese from British Columbia.

Mr. GIBSON: Japan was our ally then.

Mr. GILLIS: That is all right. Thousands of Japanese who are in Canada to-day came here at or about that time, and they have been living here ever since, making their contribution. As I said before, when you start to interfere with the liberties of one section of the people of Canada the time is coming when it will apply to every section. It is really a matter of setting a precedent. My stand is that if we permit a man to enter this country, give him the right to work and accept him as a citizen, we are under an obligation to go all the way with him. If we keep these people segregated in their own groups, refuse them the right of citizenship and so on, how can we expect to make citizens of them? If we are not going to make citizens of them certainly we should not have them in the country. Either they should be here on the basis of full citizenship or they should not be here at all.

I have no doubt it was in the rush of business that this thing got through the house. I should like to see section 5 deleted completely, but I know that cannot be done at this point. The only thing we can do is attempt to correct the senate amendment in the best way possible to meet the situation. In that connection I am going to move a subamendment, seconded by Mr. Knowles:

That all the words of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State after the word "that" be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

"the motion for concurrence in the senate amendment to clause 5 be amended as follows: That the word 'the' after the word 'at' in the proposed amendment be struck out and the word 'a' substituted therefor, and that all the words after the word 'time' be struck out and the following words substituted therefore: 'subsequent to the next general election'."

I have no intention of going into a long debate in the matter. I merely wish to make it clear that we are opposed to racial discrimination in any way, shape or form as applied to any section of Canada where minority groups are accepted as citizens. This subamendment merely means that section 5 of the present bill would remain inoperative in the next general election. The matter would remain as it is, or as it was prior to the passing of this section of the bill. By the time this house convenes again there may be a new parliament. But if it is not a new parliament, the members of the house have the right and privilege of going into the elections act and tightening the act as they may wish, or changing it completely. What I wish to make clear is that we are not satisfied with it, and we want to try to undo any harm that was done in the rush of putting this bill through the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a point of order, from what my hon. friend has said at the very conclusion of his remarks it would seem that his amendment is intended to leave matters as they were prior to the carrying of section 5. That, as I understand it, is the intention of my hon. friend's amendment. If that is so, its effect is the same thing as that of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State. Therefore, being to all intents and purposes the same amendment in its effect, it could not be considered by the house.

In what I am saying I have referred to what I understood the hon. member to have said about his amendment. I am not referring to anything he may have had to say with regard to the general question of the right of all persons to vote. That is another matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall read the subamendment. It is as follows:

That all the words of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State after the word "that" be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

"the motion for concurrence in the senate amendment to clause 5 be amended as follows: That the word 'the' after the word 'at' in the proposed amendment be struck out and the word 'a' substituted therefor, and that all the words after the word 'time' be struck out and the following words substituted therefor: 'subsequent to the next general election'."

This would mean that the following words be added: "At a time subsequent to the next general election". That is the effect of the subamendment.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, would you read section 5 as amended?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, let us have that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Section 5, as proposed, would be as follows:

Every person residing in Canada whose racial origin is that of a country at war with Canada, if such person, at the time of the passing of this act, namely July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war, resided in a province in which on those dates a person of his racial origin was disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-18 or in any subsequent war in which Canada may be engaged.

Mr. HOMUTH: That extends the franchise.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, would you read the amendment again?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, let us have it again.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is:

That all the words of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State after the word "that" be deleted—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): From what?—from the amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suppose that would mean from the section of the bill. It states:

That all the words of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State after the word "that" be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

"The motion for concurrence in the senate amendment to clause 5 be amended as follows: That the word 'the' after the word 'at' in the proposed amendment be struck out and the word 'a' substituted therefor, and that all the words after the word 'time' be struck out and the following words substituted therefor: 'subsequent to the next general election'."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The intention of that amendment is therefore obvious. The disqualification does not refer to a disqualification previously existing from July 1, 1938, or at the outbreak of war. The disqualification would refer to a time after the holding of the next election.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is destructive, completely, of the principle now before the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad to have that admission. This is a direct negative, and therefore I submit it is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not inclined to agree that the hon. member intends a direct negative. I take it that it would read so that all the words of the amendment moved by the Secretary of State would be deleted, and it would substitute therefor "at a time subsequent to the next general election."

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to another point of order, if you have decided the first one. I would refer to citation 589 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition. We are now dealing with an amendment to a vote for concurrence, which is rather an unusual thing. It is laid down in this citation that—

No amendment can be proposed to the senate's amendment save an amendment strictly relevant thereto; nor can an amendment be moved to the bill, unless the amendment be relevant to or consequent upon either the acceptance or the rejection of a senate amendment.

I suggest that this proposed amendment is not relevant to the amendments, nor is it consequent upon them. The word "consequent" means following upon. Taken literally, "consequent" would mean that if a motion were proposed to strike out section 4, and in the event of that section being stricken out it became necessary to renumber the following sections, an amendment to renumber would be "consequent." It would be a trivial correction consequent upon having accepted another amendment. We might then have to renumber certain sections. The proposal of the hon. member for Cape Breton South is not consequent, nor is it particularly relevant. It might be relevant, but it certainly is not consequent. Then, let us look at the bill. Hon. members know that explanations are written on the right hand pages in the bill. That is the law. The explanation appearing opposite this section reads:

This provides a disqualification from voting at a dominion election of persons of the Japanese race.

Those are the words which explain what section 5 means. The speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South indicates that he wishes that the Japanese shall vote. Therefore it cannot in any sense be held to be consequent. I suggest therefore that it is not consequent, that it is not relevant, and that it is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment which I have read already, and the amendment to the amendment, would read as follows:

Every person residing in Canada whose racial origin is that of a country at war with Canada at a time subsequent to the next general election—

That is the amendment. Then the amendment moved by the hon. member deletes all the words following and its result would be that the section would then convey no meaning. It would not mean that any person of that racial origin would have the right to vote, because it deletes the following words:

—and on the date of the declaration of such war, resided in a province in which on those dates a person of his racial origin was disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-18 or in any subsequent war in which Canada was engaged.

Those words are struck out and therefore the amendment as proposed conveys nothing. It makes no provision for voting, and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you have ruled the amendment out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking then to the motion of the Secretary of State for the adoption of the senate amendment as amended by the Secretary of State, I should like to make a few comments. It seems to me that what is at stake here to-day is not so much the rights of certain Japanese Canadians who have moved from British Columbia to other parts of Canada, as the basic concept of democracy and our integrity as a nation so far as our belief in the franchise is concerned. I feel I should take a moment or two to place on the record some quotations relevant to this question of disfranchising a group of people by race.

I hold in my hand a bound volume of political pamphlets which I obtained from the library and which includes a musty document entitled, "The Liberal Point of View. Current Comment on the Proceedings of the Parliamentary Session of 1920." I should like to read from that document, as follows:

The great principle underlying the present franchise law is that all men and women shall vote—that the basis of the franchise shall be humanity. Still there are members and members of parliament who cling to the notion that they are dispensing a sort of charity when they allow men and women to vote—that they are political almsgivers—that they have the right to pick and choose and say who is to vote and who is not to vote.

I will skip a sentence or two which had to do with the political situation existing at the time, then I quote further:

The franchise law—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend had better read the part he is omitting, so that we shall have the full text.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the Prime Minister is right. The part I intended to omit reads:

The pretension is all the more ridiculous when it is remembered that the present government and the members of parliament upon whose support it relies are mere usurpers, who in a fair and democratic election would be shorn of their power by the voice of the people.

I was sparing the right hon. gentleman that sentence. I continue:

The franchise law contains a lot of pedantic rubbish about "aliens", which the Liberals—

My whole point in speaking to-day is that many liberals—I use the small "l"—are with us on this. I continue:

—and other progressive members of the house have tried to clear away. The House of Commons, not as a despotic ruler, but as a trustee for the people, may have a right to associate good citizenship with the franchise. Good citizenship is not a matter of race or birth. It is a matter of conduct. It is a matter of the relationship of a man towards his family and his neighbours and the community in which he lives. Any one of the constituencies which elect representatives to parliament is probably a better judge of these qualifications than parliament itself. The duty of fixing the qualifications is assigned to parliament in a general way. But parliament is only a referee and should do its duty modestly, not in an arrogant fashion.

The man of foreign or alien birth or descent is in a peculiar position. He came to us with traditions that are European rather than Canadian. He came upon our invitation. We ought not to have invited him unless we expected to make him a good citizen of Canada, for we do not want men and women in Canada who, as Mr. Pardee says, are in no man's land.

There is a great deal of talk of Canadianizing the foreigner and make him a good citizen. All right if we are sincere, and if we carry our ideas to their logical conclusion. If we desire to educate the foreigner or the alien, we must assume toward him an attitude of sympathy and confidence, not of suspicion. We should invite him to our councils. We should tell him that the institutions of our country, our legislative bodies and courts are his institutions too, that they are intended to protect him and promote his interests and that we want him to take his part in framing and maintaining them.

It is an extremely foolish notion that by depriving a man of alien birth or descent, of the vote, we can keep him out of mischief. If there were a really vicious malignant enemy of Canada in our midst, he would not care whether he had a vote or not. He would take no pride in citizenship. He would not desire to have a part in working the institutions of the countries. He would prefer to see those institutions destroyed. The man or woman who is really hurt by defranchisement is the man or woman who is friendly to Canada, who wants to be a citizen, who desires to have a part in working the institutions of Canada. Deprive such a man or woman of the franchise and you may convert a friend into an enemy, or at least quench the flame of friendship and patriotism and create a class of man and woman who will be indifferent to Canadianism. Let us take the opposite course. Let us kindle the flames of Canadianism and patriotism by a policy of friendship and confidence toward men of every race and creed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend made some reference to myself. Was he intimating that I had written that particular document?

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not believe that I associated the Prime Minister's name particularly with the authorship of this document.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that he was sparing my feelings for some reason. It is a very good document.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was referring to the sentence I had left out, to the effect that the government had not the confidence of the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the document my hon. friend is reading from?

Mr. KNOWLES: Here is its full title:

The Liberal Point of View.
Current Comment on the Proceedings of the Parliamentary Session of 1920.
National Liberal Committee, 115 Sparks Street, Ottawa.
Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, M.P., Liberal Leader.
Andrew Haydon, National Organizer and General Secretary.
John Lewis, Editor of Liberal Publications.
Publication No. 4—Issued June 15.

I suggest that my right hon. friend look it over himself, because there is a lot of good stuff in it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a document written by the late Senator John Lewis, and I think it is an excellent document.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would remind the Prime Minister that in 1917, when somewhat similar circumstances prevailed before the house, his former leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, moved the following motion on September 10 of that year:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the abridgement by this parliament of the electoral franchise now enjoyed in any province of the dominion by any class of His Majesty's subjects would be contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Had we caught this clause on the second reading of the bill nothing would have been more proper at that time than to move the amendment moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917 and in exactly those words. Unfortunately with the way things happened on June 9 it is now necessary for parliament to try to fix this up in the best way possible. My hon. friends who know me sometimes criticize me because I watch things in too great detail. I confess that I do it, but I missed that one completely. Why? Because we were given assurances inside and outside of the house that what we had before us in bill No. 135 was the enactment of the work that had been done by the special committee on which my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) sat.

Mr. McLARTY: I must correct the hon. member in that. In my remarks before the committee of the whole I made it perfectly clear that the part which the committee had dealt with, and the only part, was schedule 1 of the bill; that the committee had made a recommendation in regard to schedule 2 but had not considered it clause by clause, and no reference of it to the committee had been made.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly the trouble. No reference was made to it. What happened was this. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) on June 8 asked this question—

Mr. McLARTY: It is a misconstruction to say that no reference was made. It was made quite clear that no reference was made to the committee of the wording of the bill itself. I do not mean that no reference was made to the bill, but no reference was made to the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: At no time was any suggestion made that there was such a clause in this bill. I doubt if any private member of the house knew that that clause was in there. We took these assurances because we were not of a suspicious frame of mind. We should have been. People outside the house who now read Hansard and see what happened think that we were asleep. They read Hansard and see that this bill was brought down with this clause in it and that we passed it without saying a word about it.

I go back to the resolution which was introduced by the Secretary of State preceding the introduction of the bill relating to the war service voters, and it reads—now I quote—"to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, consequential to such regulations." Consequently when the bill came before us from the committee, we did not read it in detail because we thought that the only things to be found in it were things consequential to the regulations to provide for the taking of the soldiers' vote. But subsequently the Toronto Saturday Night, the Winnipeg Free Press and other papers began to look through the bill and drew this clause to our attention and to the attention of other members of the house and the country generally.

I was going on to point out when I was interrupted that the hon. member for Vancouver South on June 8 asked this question in the house at page 3643 of Hansard:

Will the minister tell us whether or not the recommendations have been accepted in full and, if not in full, in what way they have been varied?

Mr. McLarty: I wonder if the hon. member is referring to the specific regulations adopted by the special committee dealing with war service electors. If he is, they have been adopted in full, as have the provisions which were recommended by the special committee in connection with granting votes by proxy to prisoners of war and those interned in neutral countries. I wonder if that answers the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Green: Apparently the regulations have been adopted in full?

Mr. McLarty: That is correct.

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, it is correct, but look how we were put off the track by it. Then the hon. member for Vancouver South went on to ask this question:

Mr. Green: Without any variation?

Mr. McLarty: There might be the change of a word, but nothing material.

When the Secretary of State stated that there was nothing but the change of a word, nothing material, so far as the regulations are concerned, we thought that that covered the whole story. But instead of that here we have this bill with this clause in it which I submit is a violation of the basic traditions of Liberalism down across the years.

Mr. GREEN: On a point of order, there were further questions which I asked of the Secretary of State, and if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will read them he will see that they put a different construction upon the matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am willing to take the time to read them, but you will find nothing there that makes reference to any clause in the bill having anything to do with other than amendments to the soldier vote regulations and consequential amendments. Then we find that there is something that was not consequential at all, and that makes me suggest that the resolution itself was not properly worded in the first instance.

Mr. REID: Had not the members of the house the bill before them at the time of the second reading?

Mr. KNOWLES: I was just coming to that. On April 26 the report of the committee was tabled. We in our group had studied that report. We held two or three special caucuses upon it, and so we knew just what was in that report. We were satisfied with it. Now to come back to the question which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked, the resolution was passed and the bill introduced and given its first reading on June 8. On that occasion the leader of the opposition asked the Secretary of State if the bill had been printed, and the Secretary of State replied in the affirmative. The next morning several of us tried to get copies of the bill but were unable to do so. Later that day, in the afternoon at three o'clock, the leader of the opposition rose on the orders of the day and called the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that he had been told that the bill had been printed but that the members of his group were not able to get a copy of it. The Secretary of State replied that he thought he was stating the facts as he knew them when he made his reply the day before, but that he had found out since that although the bill had been printed it was not yet bound or made available to hon. members. So that we still did not have the bill on June 9. The bill was placed on our desks at the actual moment that second reading was called on the night of June 9. I was here and I have a vivid recollection of it. I had not read the bill and I doubt if any members of the house had read it. We had for six weeks studied the details of the soldiers' vote regulations, which we were assured was all that the bill dealt with, and so long as we were satisfied with the regulations we felt that we were doing our full duty.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but he will find at page 3643 of Hansard that it was made amply clear that the committee had dealt only with schedule A, and not with schedule B, and there was no suggestion that the bill was at any time before the special committee. I therefore feel that my hon. friend's suggestion that in some way the thing was hidden from the house is not an honest one or a fair one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have not said that the bill was before the committee. I have said that it was not before anybody.

Mr. McLARTY: The bill was in the hands of the hon. member both at the time of the second reading and in committee of the whole. It was right there in the form in which it is at present.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have often had occasion to object in the house when bills were called for second reading and we did not have a copy of the bill in advance, but I felt that I was making a nuisance of myself always to ask to have these bills before us.

Mr. McLARTY: There was no suggestion of urgency on the part of the sponsor of the bill. It was not suggested that there was any hurry or any urgency to get the bill through. It was there just the same as any other bill.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) had the bill before him, because he said it contained one and one-half pages and then the schedules. That was on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. McLARTY: Had the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre read the explanatory note on section 5 of the bill?

Mr. KNOWLES: We only got the bill when the second reading was called. We did not have it the morning before, as we should have, and we were not suspicious. We did not have any reason to go into the details of the bill because we had gone into the details of the lengthy schedules attached to it.

Mr. McLARTY: Explanatory note to section 5, consisting of two lines, was perfectly clear. It reads:

> This provides a disqualification from voting at a dominion election of persons of the Japanese race.

There was no suggestion of trying to influence the house improperly. The explanatory note was there and it would not take more than a few seconds to read.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am satisfied that I am not the only member of the house who did not see it in the rush and feels this way about it. There are a good many members with good liberal blood in their veins who, if they had noticed this clause, would have had something to say about it on this occasion. As soon as the bill had been given its third reading it was given publicity and there has been a good deal said about it throughout the country. I have already referred to some of the publications, such as Toronto Saturday Night and the Winnipeg Free Press, which have done particularly good work on it. The Free Press has dug up not only the quotations I have referred to but others back in Hansard across the years. The Free Press has this interesting statement to make:

> It is certainly to be hoped that British Columbians who call themselves Liberals will not sink to this apostasy of Liberal principles, and it will be a sorry day if the Liberal party has to learn its Liberalism from the socialists.

That comes from an editorial in the Free Press, the title of which is "The C.C.F. Shows Courage", and everyone knows that the Free Press does not go out of its way to hand compliments to the C.C.F. In this matter, however, they have carried on a consistent fight to have this business changed before parliament rises.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do you always believe what the Winnipeg Free Press says?

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no. More often than not it is wrong, but when it is right I do not mind saying so. Even the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) is right on occasion, and when he is I do not hesitate to say so. But not only are newspapers and periodicals working on the matter. Organizations covering a wide range of public thought have been interesting themselves in this question. In this instance I have received communications from boards of trade and trade unions, and frequently when you get communications from these bodies they are on opposite sides of the fence. But this time they are on the same side. I have had communications from a number of church organizations. The United Church of Canada has been particularly active in the matter, and we have seen activity on the part of the National Inter-church Advisory Committee on the Resettlement of Japanese Canadians. This is headed by five of the largest Christian communions—the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Toronto, the United Church of Canada, Church of England social service, the Baptist convention of Ontario and Quebec, and the Presbyterian Church in Canada. All these people have written about this matter and have made representations to members of parliament and senators, and they feel exactly as we do about it, that what is really at stake is not what is happening to a few individual Canadians of Japanese origin. What we are concerned about is maintaining in Canada, sound and undisturbed, the principle that the franchise is based upon humanity and that there should be no racial discrimination so far as the franchise is concerned. Documents that I have read from years gone by state the Liberal position. The Prime Minister has stated that position even as recently as the outbreak of this war, for during the war session of September, 1939, he expressed the hope that there would be no racial intolerance or bigotry during the period of the war, and he welcomed support along that line from the then leader of the opposition, the late Doctor Manion. The Prime Minister mentioned the fact that he himself had been born in a town which was known at that time as Berlin, Ontario; he referred to his own education in Germany, and he expressed the hope that we would maintain that genius of our Canadian democracy which is the ability to rise above any racial discrimination whatsoever.

Something has gone awry, and what we have before us now is not in keeping with the policy of the Liberal party. It is not in keeping with its traditions down through the years. I think a definite attempt should be made to correct this error, not simply for the sake of a few Canadians of Japanese origin but for own own sake, so that we may not descend to racial discrimination of any kind but keep ourselves a nation in which the highest principle is the principle of humanity.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members should bear in mind the exact nature of the amendment and the side of the house from which it has been proposed. The amendment is intended to remove any possibility of racial discrimination with respect to the franchise and equally any possibility of racial favouritism. The amendment also, as I have said, has been moved by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) who is a member of the government, and has made the motion he has on behalf of the government.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Knowles) might well have made the speech he has had the government been indifferent in this matter, and he were seeking to arouse its members to a remembrance of their past assertions and of their duties and obligations. But everything that he has said about the importance of not countenancing racial discrimination with regard to the franchise merely supports what this amendment is intended to effect.

Let me make it perfectly clear that, if this amendment carries, the position so far as this general election is concerned, in relation to Japanese, will be in practical terms what it would have been if clause 5 had never found a place in the bill. It leaves the matter of the right of voting on the part of the Japanese just where it would have been but for changes in the place of residence of some of them which have taken place as a consequence of the war.

I must take my share of credit or blame along with all my colleagues for anything that may have been done from this side of the house by way of omission or commission, to which exception may be taken. I therefore wish to say at once, what I believe was in the mind of the administration in having the amendment to the elections act proposed in the words it was by the insertion of section 5. It was to prevent the possibility of racial favouritism in the exercise of the franchise and of racial favouritism shown to members of the race whose country to-day is at war with our own.

Under clause 5 the right of all Japanese, even those not previously resident in British Columbia, would have been taken away, because that right is denied to Japanese resident in British Columbia. What would that mean? It would mean that the government was recognizing the franchise as existing in one particular province as being the one which should determine the franchise for the whole dominion. That is something that would not be entertained for a moment by this house once the implication is apparent. Hon. members will ask, why was that not foreseen? The answer is very simple. The purpose of the bill as it went to the senate was to prevent Japanese who would not have had the right to vote had they remained in British Columbia from having that right in different parts of Canada simply because they had moved or had been moved from that province for reasons connected with the war. Let me make the position clear according to the facts. So far as the Japanese were concerned they had no right to exercise the franchise in British Columbia. Their citizenship was limited in that province; and for as long as I can remember where a province has had a franchise that restricted for racial reasons the right of certain classes to vote in that province the dominion has with respect to federal elections taken cognizance of that fact as regards that province. But it has never held that what any province might do in the matter of the franchise in its own province should be made to govern the franchise as it would be exercised in other provinces of Canada.

What happened after Pearl Harbor? For purposes of security to the nation, particularly for purposes of security to British Columbia, this government arranged the transfer from British Columbia of large numbers of Japanese. It transferred these Japanese to different provinces. It did that, as I have said, as a measure of security. It was never intended by the government of Canada at the time that that step was taken that the Japanese who were being thus transferred would be given a right in a general election which they would not have had had they remained in British Columbia, or would give them a right which the Japanese remaining in British Columbia would not have in this election. The purpose of the bill was to remove any possibility of favouring that large number, but what was the effect of it? There was an effect which was not apparent to anyone at the time, or it would have been pointed out at once. It had the effect of taking away from the Japanese who were in provinces other than British Columbia a right which they would have had to vote as citizens of Canada in those provinces, and as such was in the nature of racial discrimination. By this amendment we are seeking to make it clear that such was never the intention of the government. It was never the intention to exercise racial discrimination. The intention was simply to prevent certain Japanese from being favoured in the matter of the exercise of their franchise in a manner which they would not have been but for the war. What are the facts? Take the numbers that are concerned. The figures that I have are approximate, but prior to Pearl Harbor the 1941 census gives the number of Japanese who were outside of British Columbia as a thousand. Of that thousand less than 650 were twenty years of age or over. A large number of those were not naturalized; consequently the voting strength of the entire Japanese people outside British Columbia was negligible. In addition they were scattered throughout the dominion and for that reason their vote, if exercised, would not have been likely to affect one way or the other the result in any constituency.

This was the position that had to be dealt with. To prevent the thousands of Japanese who had moved or been moved out of British Columbia from voting at this election in other provinces some measure had to be taken to make it clear that they were not to have that right, and the bill as it was drafted was aimed at those particular Japanese. But, as I say, it overlooked the fact that in the taking of that step there were a few in the other provinces who were Canadian citizens who would have been disfranchised as a consequence. The best evidence that the government has held determinedly to this view that there shall be no racial discrimination as such in connection with the franchise is that at this moment we are proposing the amendment we are to the bill as it has come back to this house from the senate. I might mention one other matter. Had the large number of Japanese, those who had moved or been moved out of British Columbia, had the right to vote at an election where they would not have had that right had they remained in British Columbia I am pretty sure that had they sought to exercise it there might have been riots at some of the polls at the time of the election when Japanese presented themselves. It was exercising the part of wisdom to see that nothing of the kind should take place.

When the plebiscite bill was put through this house it contained a clause for the purpose of preventing the very possibility of riots arising because of the Japanese voting on the plebiscite. The clause was inserted in the bill and approved by this house and by the senate, by all parties in parliament, that they should not have the right to cast their votes in that plebiscite. It was done not for reasons of racial discrimination, it was done for purposes, if you like, of protection of the Japanese themselves. Instead of discriminating it is a means of saving them from possible injury that they might have suffered had they attempted to vote.

What has been done with respect to this measure was to have a clause inserted in the bill similar to that which was in the plebiscite bill and for precisely the same reasons; but the point that I wish to make clear at the moment is that the effect of this amendment is to prevent thousands of Japanese who are now in the different provinces of Canada, but who had been residing in British Columbia at the time of the war from having any right in the matter of the franchise which they would not have had had they remained in British Columbia at this time. I think the house will agree that we should not discriminate on racial lines at any time, but equally we should be doubly careful, and particularly at a time of war, not to give to those of a race with whose country we are at war rights which they would not have except for the exigencies of war itself.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): In the light of all that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said about the government's determination to prevent the exercise of discrimination I think we should look at the clause we are amending. This bill must have had the approval of the cabinet before it was introduced into the house. It was introduced by a responsible member of the cabinet. As I understand it, the effect of the clause would have been to disfranchise at a federal election any group of people of alien race that had at the time of the election been disfranchised by any province. It did not refer to this particular war, but to any war in which Canada was engaged. Therefore it is quite obvious that it was the intent of the government, or certainly the intent of those who framed this bill, and the intent of those who sponsored this bill, that we should give over to the provinces the right to determine who should vote at a federal election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I rose to make it perfectly clear what the intention was, and I made it perfectly clear that the intention was not to take away a right from any one who had the right but to see to it that rights were not given to persons who had not previously enjoyed them, particularly when they were of a race with whose country we are at war.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Perhaps instead of using the word "intent" I should have said the effect of this clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is why the amendment is being introduced, to remove that effect, which was due entirely to an oversight on the part of hon. members on all sides, as is quite apparent this morning.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Certainly there was a storm of protest across the country and an amendment was adopted in the other house which brought this bill back to the House of Commons. I am doubtful as to just how much credit the country will give the Liberal government for the reintroduction of this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not looking for credit. We are looking for justice, that is all.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That will remain to be seen. The amendment adopted by the senate would have the effect of disfranchising at a federal election only those who at the time of the passing of this act had been disfranchised by a provincial government, which in effect would mean the disfranchisement of all people of Japanese origin in Canada. The government has sought to patch up the evident mistake it made by inserting clause 5 in the bill in the first place, by easing the situation a little more and leaving the right to vote with those who were not resident in British Columbia before the war, the number of whom the Prime Minister indicated was very small. What he is doing now by the amendment introduced, and I think we must understand it, is this. Formerly a province had the right to determine who in that province would vote in a provincial or federal election. Now the government is making it possible for one province to determine not only who in that province shall vote in a federal election but who in all provinces may vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; we are doing the very opposite.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: We have not a copy of the amendment, but is it not true that the effect of the amendment is to disfranchise the Japanese who were residing in British Columbia, whether at the time of the election they were residing in British Columbia or in any other province?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, but it does not give the legislature the power to determine that now; the power must have been exercised six years ago. No fresh power is given.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: But it does extend beyond the borders of British Columbia the provisions which that one province has made with regard to its electors. A number of statements have been made as to the circumstances under which the bill was introduced. The Prime Minister himself has admitted that there was an oversight on the part of some of the members of the government. The minister responsible has indicated that never was desire for haste indicated by the government in connection with the passing of this bill, but on that occasion apparently a number of circumstances occurred which as far as I can remember have not occurred on any other occasion. To begin with, the bill was not printed and in the hands of hon. members until it was called for second reading. Then the assurance was given by the minister that schedule A followed the recommendations of the committee. It is true that the minister did not refer to the bill itself, and apparently no hon. member had the foresight to ask him if there was anything in the bill that had not come before the committee.

Mr. McLARTY: It was read clause by clause.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Clause 1 was read; then, according to Hansard for June 9, clauses 2 to 11 were called together. As far as I remember this is the only instance since I have been in this house when a bill has not been called clause by clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, what nonsense!

Mr. McLARTY: My recollection definitely is that every clause was called specifically. They were not carried en bloc in that manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend was in the house last week when the measure concerning national health and welfare was under discussion. Half a dozen clauses were called and put through without debate.

Mr. BRADETTE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was chairman of the committee, and I say here and now that the clauses were called one by one and the marginal notes read.

Mr. REID: And Hansard proves it.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: According to page 3692 of Hansard section 1 was agreed to. The next item is "Sections 2 to 12 agreed to." Then a discussion ensued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hansard may record it in that manner, but the Deputy Speaker has just mentioned to my hon. friend that the marginal notes were called. Hansard does not put down everything that is called, but the word of the Deputy Speaker should be sufficient to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. STIRLING: In connection with that point of order I would direct attention to page 3696 of Hansard where I see, "Section 5 agreed to."

Mr. REID: And the bill was before the house four days.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am not excusing myself, Mr. Speaker; I have to take my share of blame along with other hon. members of the house. I am satisfied, however, that if hon. members had been given the opportunity of reading that bill clause by clause objection would have been raised to clause 5.

Mr. BRADETTE: Again I must raise a point of order. The hon. gentleman is casting a reflection upon the Chair. I was chairman of that committee and never, at any time, have I tried to railroad any bill or any clause through. I am in the judgment of the committee as to the bill in question, but I repeat that every clause was called by itself and the marginal notes read. If the committee had asked me to read the clauses in full I would have done so gladly.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Reference was made to page 3696 of Hansard, where it is said that section 5 was agreed to. May I call the attention of the house to the fact that the section 5 there has reference to the schedule and not to the bill itself.

Mr. McLARTY: The provisions of the bill and the schedule were gone over, section by section. It does refer to the schedule. But the whole bill was gone over in the ordinary and regular way. The suggestion is that in some manner—and I do not know how—the bill was treated in an extraordinary fashion. So far as I am aware—and as Mr. Deputy Speaker has made clear—it was treated in the regular manner of a bill passing the house. If hon. members did not see it, of course that is not our fault.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Apparently the hon. member is not the only one who did not see it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did I understand the hon. member to say the bill was not read section by section? Does he not accept the word of Mr. Deputy Speaker that it was dealt with in that way?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Let him withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did I understand the hon. member to say it was not read section by section?—

Mr. CASSELMAN: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and that the bill was not gone through in the regular way, as Mr. Deputy Speaker has intimated?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I was calling attention to the fact that Hansard reports that sections 2 to 12 were agreed to, en bloc.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out that Hansard is only a record of the proceedings of the house, but it is not the official record. Mr. Deputy Speaker has called attention to a statement made by the hon. member, and has pointed out that the only inference which can be drawn from the hon. member's observations is that Mr. Deputy Speaker did not read the sections of the bill, when it was before the committee, and that in some way the bill was not properly before the committee. Does the hon. member wish to convey that meaning to the house?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: No. My suggestion was that the bill received hurried consideration by members, including myself—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw any implication or inference that Mr. Deputy Speaker did not conduct the passage of the bill, when it was before the committee, in the ordinary fashion, and the fashion in which he says it was conducted. I would ask the hon. member to make a withdrawal, and to make it clear, so that it may be recorded in Hansard, that there was no improper procedure on the part of Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I withdraw anything that may imply that the chairman of the committee was lax in his duty, or attempted to railroad anything through the house. I am putting the blame where I think it belongs—on myself, and on other members of the house.

I believe I can say that the government's amendment offered this morning is more generous than that proposed by the senate, and that both are more generous than the original section. Under those circumstances we shall have no choice but to support them, since Your Honour has ruled our subamendment out of order. But we still feel that the section is not sufficiently generous, and that there is still an element of discrimination on racial grounds, of which we believe this country does not approve.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I should like to make my position clear to the house and to the many people who have given me responsibility in this matter, and who look to me as a defender of democracy.

In the first place may I congratulate the government upon the amendment brought in. May I concur in many statements of regret which have been made with respect to the events which took place when the bill was first before the house. I too am one of those who failed to catch the significance of this section. The reason I think is clear, and is the fault of no one. It will be observed that section 5 of the bill has the effect of adding subsection (n) to section 14(2) of the act. To be clear on what the amendment really involved, it was necessary to read section 14(2). True, one could have looked at the explanation, and gained from it the meaning of the amendment. It was perfectly plain to anyone who looked at and considered it. But everyone who knows about the bulk of material which passes through this house, and is familiar with legislation, can understand how a section of this kind might pass without its effect being fully realized.

The effect of the section as it went to the senate was a threat to disfranchise all Canadian citizens whose racial origin was that of a country at war with Canada. It was a complete racial discrimination against Canadian citizens of Japanese origin. Fortunately the other house debated the bill and made some excellent changes. Unfortunately however the other house and the present amendment have not entirely satisfied my conscience.

There are two principles to which I think the Liberal party has always held firmly. One is against racial discrimination, and the other is that all members of the party shall be perfectly free to express themselves when fundamental and basic issues are at stake. In this instance I see these two things: I see, first, that the government has no intention of embarking upon legislation involving racial discrimination, and that apparently it believes the amendment now before the house accomplishes that purpose. Far be it from me to attempt to teach other members of the house the fundamental principles of liberalism, good government, racial equality and all that sort of thing. We are all agreed upon that.

At one oclock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Mr. Speaker, I was making the observation that it was not for me to attempt to teach Liberalism or democracy to any other member of this house, and particularly to the members of the government. The head of the government has been preaching and working for democracy even longer than I and under much greater difficulties and larger responsibilities. I said also that there were two main principles in Liberalism, the first being racial equality, and the second that complete freedom be accorded to all members of the party to express their views when fundamental and basic principles are at stake, as in my judgment they are in this instance. I am sure that all will accord me the liberty of saying what I feel it is my duty to say and what I am impelled by conscience to say.

The government thinks, and the government says it thinks that the amendment now before the house is in line with the great principle of racial equality. The Secretary of State has said that every one who had a vote will vote. If that were entirely so I would be satisfied; if I could be made to see that that is so, I would be satisfied. But is it so?

All Japanese in Ontario and other provinces, with the exception of British Columbia, who are British subjects and who are twenty-one years of age right now have the right to vote. All Japs who left British Columbia and came to Ontario at any time in the history of Canada, now have the right to vote in every province of Canada other than British Columbia. The Japs who stayed in British Columbia have now the potential right to vote in every other province so soon as they satisfy the requirements of residence, provided, of course, that they are British subjects. There are thus three classifications.

It is not necessary to argue the complicated details of these amendments and this section. The fact stands out, and nobody wishes to controvert it, that those rights which I have just mentioned are by this bill to be taken away. To my untutored mind, to my simple way of thinking, that is race discrimination, in regard to which I could not remain silent in this house and keep proper relationship with my own conscience and with my own constituents. It is not in keeping with my mandate from the constituents whom I represent, the people with whom I must live I hope for many years to come. It is not in keeping with the fact that I have to live with myself, I hope also, for many years to come.

What the government has done is to refrain from disfranchising those Japs now resident in all provinces other than British Columbia and who were not residents of British Columbia from the year 1938 to 1939. For that concession, and it is a great one, I am thankful. I will vote for this measure and I will vote for it gladly. When the amendment of the Secretary of State has been passed it cannot then be said, as it could have been said had his amendment not been brought in, that all Japanese in Canada who are British subjects are disfranchised upon racial grounds. All Japanese in Canada who otherwise are entitled to vote are not disfranchised upon racial grounds.

Putting it conversely, it can be said that certain Japs can vote in Canada notwithstanding their racial origin. If there is some disfranchisement, it is limited, and for that I am thankful. But unfortunately it will be said, and it can be said if this bill becomes law, that some Japanese are disfranchised in Canada on grounds of racial origin, and this is so expressed in the law itself. It is that residue of disfranchisement that affects my mind in approaching this matter.

On the other hand, those who might take fright because they are members of a racial group which is a minority, should bear in mind that what we are doing now is no precedent. It in no way indicates what we may do upon some other occasion. It must be remembered that the situation arises partly because of a legislative accident and partly because we are in a time of war.

Personally I know very little about the Japanese. I lived in British Columbia many years before the Japaneses arrived. I remember clearly my associations with their great enemies the Chinese and I developed in those days as a child a certain affection for the Chinese which I have carried into my adult years. But, as I say, this was before the Japanese colony arrived and accordingly I know very little about them, as compared with members who come from British Columbia and who have voiced on many occasions, I think unfortunately, their intense antipathy. I bow my head to their superior knowledge in that regard.

I know little about the Japanesee, other than the reports that I have read of the horrors committed by the military clique of Japan; their absolute barbarity, their meanness, their unfitness to live among civilized mankind. There is nothing that can be said in this house denouncing the military clique or the military actions of Japan with which I will disagree. I know little about the Japanese as such, but I know a lot about democracy. It is unfortunate that this incident should have arisen. It is so utterly unnecessary and has placed on the spot those who stand for democracy and who would fight for her, who would give their very lives for sound principle. It has placed them in a position of defending democracy and of appearing to defend the Japanese. I know a lot about democracy, and I know that if you can disfranchise yellow men on racial grounds, other groups may be disfranchised in the same way for the same or other reasons. If you keep that up, it will not be long before Canada will be Hitlerized. In Germany they started with the Jews; then came labour, then liberals; after that it did not matter—democracy was a thing of the past. I am apprehensive when we touch something which even smells of racial discrimination and I am ready to oppose it with everything I have.

I have received a telegram from the Board of Home Missions of the United Church of Canada. This is what it says:

> On behalf Board of Home Missions United Church protest strongly against clause 5, subsection 2, bill 135, on the ground of disfranchisement of all Canadian citizens of Japanese race now in process of satisfactory resettlement outside of British Columbia. The resentment aroused among these thousands of Canadian citizens of Japanese race who know no other home and who had hoped to live and die in this country and who by this bill will be left without nationality will be shared by thousands of fair-minded Canadian citizens. Believe this undeserved disfranchisement of Canadian citizens will reflect on the honour of Canada long after the war has been won.

That is the end of the telegram. The writer continues:

> We who have had to do with the Japanese Canadians for a number of years feel especially strongly about the injustice of this proposed amendment of the election act. We feel the Japanese Canadians are surely worthy of exactly the same treatment as the German Canadians and Italian Canadians. To penalize one group of Canadian citizens purely on the basis of race is to us undemocratic and unchristian.

I read from a communication from the national inter-church advisory committee:

> It seems to us absolutely unfair to put upon the backs of these Canadian Japanese, particularly of the guiltless Canadian born young people among them, responsibility for the actions of the military clique in Tokyo. The majority of them have never seen Japan, they have been brought up and educated in Canada, and their life and loyalty are here.

Someone said from across the floor this morning that most of us belong to minority races. I should like to correct that. In Canada all of us belong to minority races, and even did we not, far be it from me to ever use a majority to deny to a minority its natural rights. I remember when I was a boy my father used to tell me, "Never hit a boy smaller than yourself, because", he said "he may grow". I have always felt that we in the province of Ontario who seem to enjoy a majority in Canada should be very careful indeed never to abuse that power of numbers, lest the others might grow. I could not face the minority groups in my own city—the Ukrainians, the Poles, yes the Italians, and many others—if I allowed this occasion to pass without making myself absolutely clear before this house and the country that, when it comes to racial discrimination of any kind against anybody, count me out.

In my humble opinion, expressed with deference to everyone else who looks at the matter in a slightly different light, there is only one class who should be disfranchised in this country. I refer to men and women who are not British subjects. We never have, and we never will, extend our franchise to those who are not British subjects. So, Mr. Speaker, I shall move:

That there be inserted in clause 5, subsection 2(n), in the first line after the word "person" the following words, "not being a British subject".

You will observe that thereby the viciousness of the clause will be entirely eliminated, because then the franchise will be extended to British subjects who qualify by residence and age and other things of that kind, and will be denied only to those who are not British subjects. Anybody may second it who pleases. I have asked no one.

Mr. FULFORD: I would like very much to second that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Paragraph (n) of subsection 2 would then read, "Every person not being a British subject residing in Canada whose racial origin" et cetera.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): If I understand this amendment correctly, it is one of which I am in favour, and I shall give it my support. I think I am right in believing that its purpose is to give any Japanese citizen who is a British subject the right to vote in a federal election. The principle involved in this discussion to-day is one which appears to me to be so important that no hon. member can possibly forgo the opportunity of expressing himself on it or of taking sides on this issue.

In this federal house we cannot in any degree be responsible for laws or decisions made in the province of British Columbia, but definitely it is our duty to preserve an impartial judgment on all matters regarding the franchise in the federal field and see to it that the basic principles of democracy are not in jeopardy for one moment by any act or ruling of a provincial government. In war time the rights of minorities, the rights of people who happen to belong to a nation with whom we are at war, must be regarded more carefully than in times of peace.

Undoubtedly, in wartime, hysteria among our people is more easily aroused and can become very dangerous. Personally I am not concerned with the reason why the legislature of British Columbia has made such laws as it has with regard to the Japanese in that province. I am of the opinion that the feeling towards the Japanese did not originate at the beginning of this war. It did not have its basic causes in the fact that we are at war with Japan and that the people of British Columbia feared action on the part of some Japanese nationals within their province. It is far more deepseated than that. The reason has its basis in the economy of that province. But I cannot help saying that I fail to see why this federal house should take the attitude that British Columbia still has the right to decide whether Japanese in the rest of Canada should vote in a federal election. First of all, who was it who wanted the Japanese removed from British Columbia? It was the people of that province and that government who made the request to the federal government that certain numbers of Japanese be removed from British Columbia. If that province no longer wanted the Japanese there, if they did not want responsibility for providing a livelihood for these people and having them thrown instead on the back of the federal government, by what right has the province of British Columbia now to say what shall be done with regard to these Japanese people outside their province voting in a federal election?

To-day the Japanese who are living in Canada outside British Columbia come under the jurisdiction, I believe, of the Minister of Labour. He was responsible for their removal, responsible for seeing that they had the means of livelihood, and therefore the government of British Columbia, in my opinion, loses all right to consideration on this question of the franchise of these Japanese people. She threw them outside, deprived them of the means of livelihood and refused responsibility for them in that respect, and now she wishes to exert rights over them in the matter of federal franchise. If the people of the province feel that way about it, I think that we in the federal house should assert our responsibility towards the Japanese and see that they are treated as any other people should be treated.

The people of British Columbia are the only ones who can decide what should be done with regard to the Japanese who remain within the borders of that province, but I would like to know if there is a federal member in this house to-day who has a mandate from his constituents to prevent any person—mind you, apart from those who are not British subjects, apart from those who are charged with sabotage of the war effort—from exercising the franchise in the federal field. I do not believe that any federal member has a mandate from his own people so to disregard the rights of a minority people in the federal field of franchise.

To support the amendment which has just been offered seems to me the only means of expressing the democratic rights of people within this country. The amendment made by the Secretary of State still acknowledges the right of British Columbia to dictate regulations with regard to people whom she refuses to have within the borders of her own province, and I really cannot see how any federal member could possibly support such an idea. The number of Japanese citizens remaining in this country is quite considerable. I believe the figures from the Department of Labour are roughly these. There still remain in British Columbia, 15,733 of these Japanese, of whom 73 per cent are Canadian citizens. Outside British Columbia we have only about 4,835 in the prairie provinces, of whom 79 per cent are citizens of Canada, and in eastern Canada there are 3,065, of whom 81 per cent are Canadian citizens. Taking all those east of the Rocky mountains, there are roughly about 6,000, and of that number 4,000, I believe, have the right to vote. But it does not matter how many there are. Were there only 400, were there only 40 or only 4, the principle remains. It is a question of their rights as citizens.

I cannot see where these Japanese citizens are any different from the citizens of any other racial origin residing in any part of Canada. On what grounds can any member in this chamber dispute their right to vote? It seems to me that if British Columbia still wanted to exercise rights over her Japanese people she should have thought of this before throwing them outside the province and on the hands of the federal government. But once she has done that, I cannot see what right she still has in the question of their voting federally. It may be that this refusal of British Columbia to keep all her Japanese people within her borders will do great good to the Japanese, because as long as they were in that province the rest of Canada did not know much about them. Many of us took our opinions about them from what we heard from citizens of British Columbia; but since many of them have been removed and have gone into the prairie provinces and Ontario, the Canadian people are beginning to realize that it is not the colour of a man's skin that makes him a good or a bad citizen, but his training, his upbringing and the question whether he is proud and happy to belong to Canada. Many of these Japanese who have gone to live in eastern Canada, as we read in many magazines to-day, have been accepted by the people among whom they live as decent, honest, fine citizens only willing and anxious to abide by the laws of this country and to do everything they can to make themselves like other Canadians.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Of course the Japanese are the same as any other of the peoples with whom we are at war. I believe we have had a few among them who have been charged with subversive activities. We have had some among the Germans and some among the Italians whom we have had to place in internment camps. We have also had a few hundred Japanese who have been placed in internment camps and naturally they would be debarred from voting. That would be a very natural thing for us all to agree to. But do we debar either Germans or Italians in this country from the federal vote? Certainly not. As far as I know, even some of those Germans who have been in the internment camp because it is known that they did indulge in subversive activities, but who have since been released by the Minister of Justice, have the vote, and certainly hundreds of these Japanese are not in the same category. So that if we do not debar such German people from the vote, how can we possibly deny the vote to Japanese people who have never at any time given us the same cause or reason to believe that they would indulge in subversive activities in Canada?

The Prime Minister's argument about Japanese going to the polls and getting mobbed was one of the weakest I have ever heard him put forward. He was afraid of allowing the Japanese the franchise because in going to the polls the rest of the people of Canada might mob them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Pardon me; I did not say anything of the kind. I indicated certain considerations that had to be taken into account, but I made no statement of my own to that effect.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am sorry, but I must say that the Prime Minister left the impression with me that he thought that if some of the Japanese went to the polls to vote there might be little riots—I believe the word riot was actually used in that connection—at the polls.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that was a consideration that governed when the plebiscite bill passed this house and passed the house without any exception being taken to it. The clause to which exception is now being taken is, I think, a duplicate of that which appeared in the plebiscite bill.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Of course it is some time since the plebiscite was taken, and I think a good many of us have a very different idea on these matters now from what we had at the time of the plebiscite. We have had reason to see how peaceful and quiet have been the Japanese who have been moved in to other parts of Canada. I realize that they voted in the Ontario election, and I certainly did not hear of any riots in the Ontario election on the part of people who did not like to see the Japanese going to the polls. I see no reason to believe that in a federal election there would be anything of that kind. Perhaps at the time of the plebiscite it may have been in the minds of some people, but after all is said and done, even if we do fear that some of the Canadian people would not like to see the Japanese people going to the polls, in my opinion that would be no reason for preventing them. Mob violence has no place in a democratic country. Law-abiding Canadian citizens do not indulge in such things unless they are incited to do so by those who wish deliberately to promote race hatred. Race discrimination is a fascist trend which should have no place in our country. It should be guarded against by our police. We have federal and provincial police in this country to guard the rights of citizens, and if there was any fear that the rest of the people of Canada might indulge in little riots at the polls because Japanese people were going there to vote, then I would say it was our duty to protect the Japanese by seeing that the police were there to stop others from rioting. It would definitely be appeasing such fascist trends to deny the Japanese people the right to vote just because we think such a thing might happen.

So far as the police have been able to tell us, the Japanese people themselves have not been responsible for making any disturbances. I quote from the Vancouver News-Herald of Monday, July 3, 1944, as follows:

> Not a single act of sabotage has been attempted by any Japanese in this province since the outbreak of war with Japan, Deputy Commissioner John Shirras of the provincial police told the annual business conference of the Pacific Coast international association of law enforcement officials. Mr. Shirras spoke on "The Japanese Problem on the West Coast."
>
> "It is a problem that requires care and tolerance," he said, criticizing persons who have "rushed into print" on Japanese matters.
>
> "The public has been unnecessarily inflamed by such individuals," he added. "The problem is an international one that cannot be dealt with by individuals."

I have already had occasion to speak in this house on what I considered to be the lack of democratic action within the department of the Secretary of State, particularly the selling of the property of the minority group of Ukrainians in this country. I consider that to be an outrage. I also consider it a wrong thing for the department of the Secretary of State to dispose of the property of the Japanese people in this country, as has been done recently, and for sums of money that are not really anywhere sufficient to cover the cost of the buildings and property concerned. It has more or less resulted in giving this property away. I am very much against this kind of thing. I believe it is a tendency which we should be very willing to correct, and we should see that it does not happen again.

I certainly am against the idea of the army refusing to take Japanese soldiers. I see no reason why hundreds of these young Japanese men, physically fit and well, should not be allowed to go and fight, if they wish to, for the democratic ideals of this country where they were born and which they now call their home. How are we ever to make them into good Canadian citizens unless we give them a chance to fight and work for the things which they have been brought up to believe in, in our schools, colleges and universities? It seems that in the United States they are taking a very different attitude on this whole matter, and I am led to believe that we should be better off were we to follow in their footsteps. In the United States they have 12,000 young Japanese fighting in their armies. One group of roughly one thousand of them went into action in Italy. Numbers of them were wounded and as a result of their gallant fighting many medals and commendations were given to that particular regiment. The property of the Japanese people has not been sold in the United States, and that again is one more protection of their rights which I would like to have seen in this country. In the United States they seem more anxious to maintain the citizenship and the rights of their Japanese-Americans.

I should like to quote to the house a brief paragraph from a speech which was made by the Secretary of the Interior of the government of the United States, Mr. Harold Ickes, when he spoke at San Francisco on April 13, 1944, because his words are the words and the sentiments that I myself would like to have uttered. He said:

> I hope that the clamour of those few among you who are screaming that this situation (i.e. the Jap American problem) should be resolved on the basis of prejudice and hate will soon be overwhelmed by the stern remonstrances of those among you—an overwhelming majority—who believe in fair play and decency, Christianity, in the principles of America, in the constitution of the United States. . . .
>
> The War Relocation Authority—make no mistake about it—has been criticized for not engaging in this sort of lynching party. Under my jurisdiction, it will not be stampeded into undemocratic, bestial, inhuman action. It will not be converted into an instrument of revenge or racial warfare. . . . I am particularly grateful to those groups and individual on the west coast who have been brave enough and Christian enough to speak out against the vindictive, bloodthirsty onslaught of professional racemongers. . . . .

We must all face the problem of the eventual status and treatment of those Americans of Japanese descent who were taken from their homes and transported to evacuation camps. Most of them, after a thorough investigation, the doubts being resolved in favour of segregating them, have proved to be loyal and devoted to their nation (i.e. U.S.A.). It is intolerable to think that these people will be excluded from a normal life in this country for long. It is intolerable to think that merely because they resided on the west coast—in California, or Washington, or Oregon—they must be wards of the government for one moment longer than the necessities of the war require. I know of no virus in these three states which has infected them so that they must be treated differently from the Japanese Americans who reside in other states.

I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, what virus has infected the Japanese who have remained in British Columbia and who have been recently brought out to the rest of Canada that makes them different from any Japanese who may have lived in Ontario or any other part of Canada since before the war? There is no difference in those people—none, whatever, so far as I can see.

The purpose of this amendment will, I believe, commend itself to hon. members of the house. I myself cannot agree to depriving any citizen of Canada of any right, believing that if I do so my own rights and the rights of future generations are thus jeopardized. The people who belong to the Japanese race who reside in other parts of Canada—who reside anywhere in Canada, I will go that far—are in my opinion innocent of any sabotage against Canada and Canada's war effort until they are proven guilty. On these grounds I believe that the fullest democracy should be granted to them. I cannot help but think that the government is making the jurisdiction of British Columbia rather an excuse for denying the rights to those Japanese people in other parts of Canada, and I cannot find myself in agreement with such an idea. I whole-heartedly support the amendment which has just been introduced.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been considering the amendment which has been introduced. I am of the opinion it is not consequential. If any hon. member wishes to speak on it I shall be glad to hear him now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order which Your Honour suggested, may I say the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) would be to confer the franchise not only upon Canadian born who have left the province of British Columbia but actually upon those who are still in British Columbia. I submit that it is not relevant to the bill as it passed this house on third reading, nor is it consequential upon the amendment as introduced by the other house, and therefore it is distinctly out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. ROEBUCK: As to the question of the constitutionality of the amendment I should like to make one point. I take issue with the minister in his statement that the amendment I have placed in Your Honour's hands would extend the franchise to the Japanese of British Columbia. As I read the act and the amendments before us, that is not so. I direct attention to chapter 46 of the statutes of Canada, 1938. Section 14, subsection 2 reads:

> The following persons are disqualified from voting at an election and incapable of being registered as electors and shall not vote nor be so registered, that is to say—

This is the paragraph in question:

> (i) every person who is disqualified by reason of race from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of the province in which he or she resides and who did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-18.

That clause is not affected by the amendments contained in bill No. 135, so that irrespective of what we do with regard to the senate amendments or with regard to section 5 of the bill, paragraph (i) of subsection 2 of section 14 still stands. I should like to make it perfectly clear that I am not arguing in favour of that section. I think the principle I have stated should also apply to that section, but it is not before the house. The principle stands as I have stated it, but from a legal point of view the fact remains that the minister must have overlooked this subsection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is another point, in addition to the question I raised, that of whether this is a consequential or relevant amendment. The additional effect just mentioned by the hon. member for Trinity makes the amendment now moved ridiculous, because you would have two sections in the Dominion Elections Act of 1938 completely contradicting each other. That is the effect of the amendment now being moved.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) referred to section 14 of the 1938 act, saying that his amendment would not affect it and that it would still remain in force. Let us read what is proposed in section 5 of this bill. It refers to "subsection 2 of section 14 of the said act," which is the act of 1938, which I have in my hand and which the hon. gentleman says is not affected. That is the very section. It is idle to say that it is not affected. I entirely agree with the statement of the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I did not say that. I said it did not affect paragraph (i) of that section.

Mr. NEILL: Well, that is part of the section; that is a paragraph of subsection 2. The principle of amending is set out in citation 589 of Beauchesne, which says an amendment must be relevant or consequential. This amendment is neither.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of fact two points of order have been raised by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, though he regarded one as more important than the other. The first point was as to inconsistency between the amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity and the other sections of the bill. In that connection I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Trinity. It seems to me that the limitation on the disqualification which the hon. member for Trinity would write into paragraph (n) would apply only within the terms of paragraph (n) and would not affect the other paragraph referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It destroys the other paragraph.

Mr. KNOWLES: As to the other point, it seems to me that if the words inserted by the hon. member for Trinity had been inserted as an amendment to the senate amendment they would have come within the senate amendment and would have been consequential. I offer this suggestion to the hon. member for Trinity if his amendment should be ruled out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I indicated when inviting the opinions of hon. members, I was of the opinion that the amendment offered by the hon. member for Trinity was not consequential upon the amendment moved by the senate. It imports something which was not dealt with by the senate amendment. That amendment dealt with the question of the time of disqualification. The amendment of the Secretary of State was intended to clarify a section which might be ambiguous. As I say, the amendment offered by the hon. member for Trinity has broadened the scope of the senate amendment, and introduced a new principle into both the senate amendment and the bill itself, which has been discussed by the house on third reading. In my opinion the scope of the amendment so broadens it that it is not consequential to the senate amendment, and I therefore rule it out of order.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken on the bill and Your Honour has given a ruling on the point of order. Now the hon. member cannot speak on the point of order, and he is out of order in rising to speak again on the motion for second reading.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I do not think my hon. friend knows what I am going to say.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not care what the hon. gentleman is going to say. He is out of order in rising to speak again on this bill.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Surely the Chair will hear what I wish clarified. One of the previous speakers suggested that my amendment would have been in order—

Mr. HOMUTH: I would ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman insists upon it, I have given my ruling and I am not likely to change my mind.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am not asking that you change your mind. I am asking for clarification.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must resume his seat.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Is it necessary that I move—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Trinity should take his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered what the hon. gentleman had to say. I have given it very careful consideration and have come to the conclusion which I have announced. Having given a ruling I cannot allow any discussion of it.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): If no one else has a point of order to raise I should like to make a few remarks. I have listened patiently all day to ladies and gentlemen from parts of Canada other than British Columbia talk on a subject which is vital to British Columbia and on which the people of British Columbia surely should be best informed. I have offered no objection to their lack of knowledge of the subject, though their ignorance was as pitiful as it was profound, but now perhaps it might be well for the country and the house to have at least some of the facts made known. The hon. member for Battle River will excuse me if I do not follow her argument, because our seats are so far apart, and I have an infirmity in my hearing, that I could not follow all she said.

Mr. FAIR: I would like to contradict that. The lady is not from Battle River. Her constituency is North Battleford.

Mr. NEILL: I beg the pardon of both hon. members. I trust I would be too gallant to criticize her remarks. But the hon. member for Trinity is more on my level, and I hope I may be able to answer some of his remarks.

I am sorry that through rotten draftsmanship this trouble has been imposed upon the house. I am no lawyer, but I am told that this matter was in the hands of a committee of fifteen capable men, who sat at a number of sittings. I believe it is ten or twelve years since I have been given the opportunity to sit on any of these special committees appointed by the government. Probably they think I do not know enough about the situation—or perchance that I know too much. But I do know that if I had been on that committee I would have at least striven—I might not have succeeded—to avoid the horrible mess we have before us to-day.

This business passed the lawyers of the senate and the House of Commons, and I do not suppose there are three men who could state what the latest and best amendment is, after so much confusion. If I understood the hon. member for Trinity correctly, he said that the Japanese could vote in British Columbia. Well, that is such a stupendous departure from fact that I do not know where to begin, so perhaps I had better give a little sketch of the situation.

It is often said that it was the C.P.R. who brought them all in.

That is bunk. What happened is this: Possibly the Chinese were brought in to build the C.P.R., but it was not the Japanese at all. They were put on the voters' lists in some by-election—I think it was one in Cariboo. Some enterprising politician had filled the list with Chinamen and Indians. In 1875 in British Columbia they passed a law by which all Indians and Chinamen were struck off the voters' list. That was that.

Then the Japanese began to immigrate, and in 1895 the local legislature added the Japanese to the prohibited list which were not to be put on the voters' lists. Then the question came up as to the dominion franchise.

This question does not appear in our dominion statutes until 1919, and for that reason some people argue the prohibition did not begin until then. But that is not right. The right way of it is this: Prior to 1919, I do not know just how far back, but probably about the time of confederation, the dominion government had a system in connection with the dominion franchise of adopting provincial voters' lists. Therefore this question of our making the dominion franchise never arose at all, because the dominion just took the provincial voters' lists. And as we took these voters' lists they never contained Japanese or Indians, because they had been struck off. It was only in 1919 that that was necessary.

And, by the way, there is a point there I might just put in, because it is often alleged —"Oh, these poor Japanese, coming here with their hearts bleeding with the desire to vote, the same as we do. The white man is allowed to vote, but they are not allowed this priceless privilege." Pure bunkum! There was a discussion in committee some years ago in connection with voting, as to whether we should not compel the white man to take advantage of this "priceless privilege".

A delegation of Japanese came to Ottawa some years ago and appeared before a committee of the House of Commons which was dealing with the franchise. They were very capable people. One was a professor, one a dentist and another a schoolteacher. I do not remember what the fourth was, but I do remember they were able and cultured people—far better educated than I was, because I never saw the inside of a high school let alone a college. However we were allowed to ask them questions. At this point may I say that the Japanese has a very peculiar mentality. When he gets his piece off by heart, he will make a good yarn of it. But if he is confronted with an unexpected question he will probably break off and tell you the truth. We cross-examined them, and they gave us their story, and then we asked them some questions—the one to which I have just referred. We asked them when the Japanese were prohibited. The witness said, "Well, it never applied to us, because we were prohibited before ever we came here." I said, "Well, you were aware that those were the conditions to which you were coming when you came here?" And he said, "Yes". So that all this sob story about the poor Japanese being deprived of their rights is all bunk. They knew the conditions which existed, just as one hon. member pointed out the other day in connection with our indemnities. We knew what we were taking when we took the job; and the same applies to the Japanese, because they knew perfectly well that the law was against them. So that they are not being deprived of anything they ever had.

I was going to mention the dominion franchise. In 1919 the dominion government adopted a different method of making up the voters' lists. Instead of taking the British Columbia list, or the provincial lists, they made special lists. A registrar was appointed and he was compelled to make a list of all who were qualified in a certain area. Then it was necessary to do something about these prohibitions. It was in 1919 that the government of the day enacted into law the words which have remained ever since, and which I believe the hon. member for Trinity quoted from the 1938 statutes. It said that where a body of people on account of its racial origin was excluded from the provincial franchise, that prohibition would be carried on into the dominion franchise in that province. That became established in 1919, and it has been carried on since then. They never had the vote. They never were promised it, and never had the possibility of having it. That is how it comes that there is this connection between the dominion and the provinces. That was the way it was in 1919, and it has been continued year after year, with this same prohibition.

This thing which has been started up is all for political effect. It is not as though they were suddenly deprived of a privilege, because the Japanese never had a vote in British Columbia. At least it has been this way since 1895, so far as the Japanese are concerned, and since 1875 in connection with the Chinese and Indians.

The hon. member for Trinity admitted quite frankly—and I give him credit for it—that he knew very little about the Japanese and the situation in British Columbia. He told us that frankly. He said he knew a whole lot about democracy. Quite so; and I am pleased to listen to him when he discusses something about which he is so well informed. But would it not be a good idea to let those who do know what they are talking about deal with the situation in British Columbia? I am the first member who has stood in his place to-day—the first of sixteen members, to express the views of that part of the country from which we come, and with which we are thoroughly familiar. Does the hon. member not think it would be a good idea to give us just a little extra weight in the debate, because we know local conditions?

My hon. friend from Trinity said he had received a telegram, I believe it was, from a church body, protesting against this legislation. Probably they sent a circular around to all the members some weeks ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I know one member—it was not myself—who wrote back and said, "I have received your letter; it is clear you do not know the first thing about what you are talking about. Yours truly." I was more courteous, and went into a little more detail. However, the principle was exactly the same. I expressed regrets that the head of the church to which I belonged would squander our money in putting out Japanese propaganda—because it is nothing else. It drew a picture of the beautiful conditions under which some Japanese family had been discovered in Ontario, and it was written up to a fare-thee-well—the nice, respectable man, and the lady-like woman with the humble aspect, and the beautiful children, and all the rest of it! This circular said, "We appeal, we the people at the head of our church and your church and all churches appeal."

Mr. HOMUTH: Not mine; mine was not in it.

Mr. NEILL: You must be a Unitarian.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am a Lutheran.

Mr. NEILL: You can thank God that you belong to such a church. I expressed regret that I was paying out good money to subscribe to a church that was used for that purpose. They got out the circular and they appealed to the people in Ontario and Quebec, people who did not know the conditions in British Columbia along these lines, to take care of these people who were God's chosen people. They were asked to take them into their homes at a time when our men are being massacred and murdered by them in foreign lands. Our people were asked to take them into their homes and get them jobs because they are God's chosen people.

God's chosen people! The Japanese government held a convention, or whatever you call it, several years ago in connection with religion. They tried to decide what would be the most profitable religion to adopt because there was some talk that the old religion was getting a little threadbare and it might be a good thing to tie up with the other nations and adopt some other religion. They discussed the matter and they decided that the most profitable thing to do was to continue with the old Shinto religion because that would be the most profitable to the ruling class. Under that religion the emperor was the god and it was a beautiful thing because in war time men could be made to believe that if they were killed they would go to the heaven of which their emperor was the god. They would prefer that to being taken prisoner.

These people are being moved out of British Columbia and they are being spread all over Canada like the smallpox disease. They will create little centres and groups of heathens in Ontario, Manitoba and so on. They will not fit in with their Christian surroundings because it is a set policy of the Japanese government to foment that religion. They must belong to it. Some of them have left British Columbia and they will create little propagandist centres for their pagan religion all over Canada. I suggested to these people who sent me these letters that that is not what we paid our good money for in preparing missionaries. We have been sending them to Japan but we could save a lot of money by having them try to convert these people at home. We could send these missionaries to Toronto or Montreal as the case may be and it would save considerable money. They are simply setting up propaganda centres for the spread of heathenism.

If I could take the time I could describe conditions in British Columbia that would make your hair stand on end—that is those of you who have sufficient hair to stand on end. I have never seen members from British Columbia pro-Japanese, but yes—I must be fair and say that there is one member from British Columbia who is at present in Australia. He was elected by the C.C.F. and all the time, in season and out of season, he loyally supports his Japanese, shall I say connections, or whatever it is; I do not know. The late Mr. Woodsworth, who used to sit down near where our friends are sitting now—the Minister of Pensions and National Health will bear me out in this—once said in connection with some bill that he believed in giving the Japanese votes. I asked him if he said that in the last election and he said, "Yes, and I will say it in any election." My friend opposite said, "Is that the view of the C.C.F.?" and he said, "Yes, that is the view of the C.C.F. as a body."

I know the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said last year that that was still his view and that he would not continue to be a member of the C.C.F. if that view did not prevail. Of course that was a statement by a party. It was a small party, although it has grown smaller since then. It had seventeen members then, and now it has only ten. Naturally that attracted attention and I have no doubt it was wired to Tokyo that night. Inside of three or four weeks that gentleman and his wife sailed for Japan on a Japanese vessel and I have no doubt that they treated him well while he was there. On his return he had hardly set his feet on the wharf at Vancouver before he was asking for votes for his brown friends and so on. I leave that nasty insinuation; you can take it as you like. It is bad politics. There are few politicians in British Columbia who are willing—

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you, I will have a rest.

Mr. KNOWLES: I speak on behalf of a member of this house who, as Your Honour knows, is absent because of the visit of the empire parliamentary association to Australia. If I heard the present speaker correctly he described something he said against the hon. member for Vancouver East as a nasty insinuation. I suggest if that is so, that it should be withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: I think my hon. friend's point is well taken. I did not say anything about him, I said it was I who was making a nasty insinuation. If you think that I should not have called it that, I will withdraw.

Mr. REID: I think the hon. member's reference was to the late Mr. Woodsworth and not to the member for Vancouver East.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought that was the case, and I thank the hon. member for New Westminster for his correction.

Mr. NEILL: I never argue with the Speaker no matter what my private opinion may be. But he has not pronounced anything so I think I may continue my brief rambling remarks. In fact I had finished. I could go on for another four or five hours and attempt to draw the true picture. I agree it is natural that eastern men cannot get the viewpoint we have in British Columbia. I am sorry that more weight is not given to the views of those who live in British Columbia and know what they are talking about.

The amendment before the house is simply an attempt to pacify, to remove the possibility of some injustice being done to people in the east. I thought the amendment suggested by the senate was sufficient, but the government in their wisdom have proposed an amendment which sounds a little more intricate. I will not say what is wrong with it because I do not understand it sufficiently. But I do hope we shall not have any more amendments like the one we had this morning which just added the words, "and when" or like the one this afternoon which has been ruled out of order.

Some kind friend placed a copy of the United Church Observer on my desk. It contains a picture of Mr. and Mrs. Umehara and daughter Millie in their farm home. I read most of it and really it would make your heart bleed. I am not attacking the Japanese. I have met some decent Japanese and no doubt some of them would be loyal. But if you put five tons of potatoes in your cellar in the fall and you find many of them rotten in the spring, how can you tell which is which? You must say to these people, "We are sorry, you may not be all you are depicted to be, but we cannot tell, and the innocent must suffer for the guilty." This is a white man's country and we want it left a white man's country.

I suggest that we cannot accept amendments to this amendment unless they are shown to be consequential, and no one as yet has shown me the consequentiality of this one.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has suggested that the people from other provinces should be prepared to listen to British Columbia opinion because the people there are so much closer to the situation. But I think he will understand that it is very hard for hon. members at this end of the chamber to hear everything that is being said at the other end. I think he will also agree that, while people from other provinces should be prepared to listen to what is being said by members from British Columbia, nevertheless the decision should surely rest with a province whether or not citizens resident within its boundaries should be disfranchised, and the people of British Columbia should not expect any other province to bow to their decision in that regard.

An hon. MEMBER: You ask us to do it with social credit.

Mr. QUELCH: I did not catch what the hon. member said. The amendment before the house undoubtedly removes many of the objectionable features of paragraph (n); nevertheless racial discrimination will still exist as a result of it; we shall still have a condition whereby the laws of one province will dominate the actions of certain Canadian citizens in other provinces, that is to say, Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry who were residing in British Columbia at the time of the declaration of war and who have removed to other provinces will still be subjected to the laws of British Columbia rather than of the province in which they reside. Therefore as a result of this amendment we shall continue to have a violation of the rights of minorities on racial grounds.

In my opinion no loyal citizen of Canada should be debarred from exercising his responsibilities as a citizen merely because of his ancestry; and that, it seems to me, is the situation which will exist as a result of this amendment. I understand that a number of Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry and Japanese nationals were interned on the ground of subversive action at the start of the war; on the other hand, I understand that none of these Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry who have been moved have been guilty of any acts of sabotage since the war started. I understand that in the various provinces to which these people moved their record has been exceedingly good. We have had statements from the Minister of Labour giving us a very favourable record in that regard. I believe several hundreds of these Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry have attempted to enlist in the Canadian army and have been refused, and I think that is a pity, because no doubt they could have been of tremendous value. I recall that during the last war we had Canadian citizens of German ancestry in the army fighting against the Germans, and these men were of tremendous value because they had a thorough knowledge of the language and could be used to advantage. I understand also that some twelve thousand people of Japanese ancestry have been enlisted in the United States army; and surely if good use of them can be made there, we could make similar use of them in the Canadian forces.

We are not fighting to-day merely to defeat Germany and Japan; we are fighting in defence of definite principles. We are fighting for a peace based on justice, and justice must be granted to minorities as well as to majorities. It seems to me that this legislation is a negation of the declaration of principles contained in the Atlantic charter and accepted at Teheran.

I cannot understand, either, why we should single out Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry, why this is not applicable also to Germans and Italians. In saying that I do not suggest for one moment that it should be applied to either of those races; I am opposing the idea of making it applicable to Canadian citizens of Japanese ancestry or any other. Once we start enacting discriminatory racial legislation of this kind it is very hard to know just where we shall stop. In view of the tremendous sacrifices which are being made to-day we cannot afford to make mistakes of this kind which may have such serious consequences in the future. The cost will be too great. I am sorry that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity has not been allowed.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): In anything I may say I shall be only echoing the remarks so well made by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). I do not hold any particular brief for the Japanese; in fact, I do not see how anyone can, after the atrocities, of which one has read, that have been committed by them in this war. But to me the matter transcends considerations of race. It is a discriminatory act against one particular race of people; and, like speakers who have preceded me, I do not see how, if you penalize the Japanese in this matter, you leave the way open to discriminate against Hungarians, Bulgarians, Roumanians or other racial groups in the same way who are at present our enemies.

I see in this proposal a great danger to our entire democratic system. We pride ourselves on being an enlightened people, but by this discriminatory action we are trying to make a right by committing a wrong. It is not that I am without sympathy with the position of hon. members from British Columbia. I lived as a child for four years on the Pacific coast, in the state of California, and I know that people on the Pacific coast have a good case. At the same time are we, by singling out the Japanese for this kind of treatment, helping to make those who are naturalized or are second or even third generation Japanese, good Canadian citizens? Are we showing them the light of democracy and trying to get them to break away from old principles of the Samurai? I do not think so. I believe that by denying the vote to the Japanese outside—I repeat, "outside"—the province of British Columbia, who have migrated to other provinces since the outbreak of war on Japan, you are actually driving them back to old and alien principles which may have been instilled into them. In other words, instead of guiding them to enlightened citizenship and enabling them to realize their duties and responsibilities to Canada, you are encouraging them to revert to emperor-worship, to the code of Hirohito.

I strongly condemn any act or subclause of an act which discriminates in any way against the Japanese as a race, not only because I think we are thereby defeating our own purpose, but we are setting up a dangerous precedent by depriving British subjects of the rights to which they are entitled under the laws of the Dominion of Canada as a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. NEILL: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. FULFORD: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Is he aware that the Japanese have a dual nationality? They remain Japanese, yet have all the advantages of being British subjects; and they do not assimilate with us. That is why we put them in a different class from Germans and Italians.

Mr. FULFORD: Perhaps I was not very clear in what I was trying to say. I say they will continue to have a dual nationality so long as you discriminate against them. What we should do in this country is to try to lead them away from having a dual nationality, and make Canadians of them.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): It is not my intention to take up very much of the time of the committee. I believe that hon. members of our group who have already spoken have made it clear that what we are fighting is not the matter of whether the Japanese shall vote or not; it is the principle underlying this bill, whereby the franchise of certain minority groups in this country is being curtailed, to which we are opposed. That it happens to be the Japanese who are the particular group is merely an accident. It might be any other group, as stated by the member who has taken his seat.

The Prime Minister states that what the government wishes to do is to see that there is no extension of the franchise at this time to any enemy aliens. To do this, it seems to me, he is accepting the principle that because one province disfranchises a certain group of people that disfranchisement shall follow those people into some other province and prevent them from voting at the next federal election in the particular province in which they may then happen to reside. What the Prime Minister is doing is not to prevent the extension of the franchise but to accept a new principle, which means a direct curtailment of the rights of the franchise, and he is using the fact that one province has already done this as a screen to hide behind.

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member rather indicates that it is a new principle. I think he will agree that it is a principle that has been generally followed in section 14 of the general election act, to which clause 5 constitutes an amendment in the recognition of provincial limitations.

Mr. WRIGHT: It does not follow in the election act that because one province disfranchises a certain group of people, those people are therefore disfranchised in any other province. But that is what this bill does. It accepts the principle that because this particular group of people are disfranchised in British Columbia now, they shall be disfranchised in other provinces.

Mr. McLARTY: We accepted that principle in subsection (k) of section 14 of the election act, the same thing exactly.

Mr. WRIGHT: No. I cannot agree with the Secretary of State. We are accepting it in this bill, but it has not been a principle that has been in force in Canada until this time.

Mr. McLARTY: It was included in the election act.

Mr. WRIGHT: The Japanese in British Columbia have been disfranchised. It was within the right of that province so to do. I am not arguing their rights in that matter. But because they did that, it does not follow that the Japanese should be disfranchised in any other province. These people have moved from British Columbia to other provinces and have come under the jurisdiction of these other provinces and automatically they should obtain the franchise in those provinces unless this bill is passed in the form in which we have it at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The persons of whom my hon. friend is speaking are still citizens of British Columbia. They have moved or been moved from British Columbia temporarily for reasons connected with the war. They have been moved through arrangements effected by the government as a war measure which was deemed necessary for reasons of security and in part for the protection of these very Japanese themselves. In most cases they are not persons who have voluntarily left British Columbia to reside in some other province. They are still citizens of British Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT: Some of these people did automatically leave British Columbia themselves when this question arose. They moved to other provinces without waiting for the government to move them, and they are being automatically disfranchised along with the others whom the Prime Minister states the government moved, and who are now residing elsewhere. These people themselves moved to these provinces and by vrtue of residence in those provinces for a certain length of time they automatically become eligible to vote therein. I do not think the Prime Minister's arguments are sound, because ordinarily if these people had moved to a province and were Canadian citizens they would have the vote automatically. Section 5, however, prevents this. It prevents the Japaneses in other provinces from voting, or it did before the senate amendment. The government amendment simply allows Japanese who were Canadian citizens and living in other provinces than British Columbia prior to the war, to vote, but prevents Japanese Canadians who have been moved from voting.

Mr. REID: Would the other provinces of Canada have accepted the Japanese if they had not been requested by the government to do so?

Mr. WRIGHT: As far as I know, the other provinces had no laws on their statute books preventing Japanese from entering their boundaries. They never had any law on the statute books to that effect. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) moved an amendment which we believed would change the effect of this bill, but you, Mr. Speaker, did not accept that amendment for the reason that it changed section 5 of the original bill. We propose to move a further amendment, which will be a consequential amendment in that it simply changes the time factor in the amendment to the amendment. It does not change the amendment except with respect to time. The amendment we now propose is this:

That the words "at the time of the passing of this act", namely "July 1, 1938, and on the date of the declaration of such war resided" be deleted from the amendment and the following words substituted therefor:

"At a time subsequent to the next general election resides":

Also that where the words "on those dates" appear substitute "at that time".

Also for "was disqualified" read "is disqualified".

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to speak to his amendment I shall be glad to hear him, but I would ask him to address himself to this question. The amendment as moved by the Secretary of State deals with persons who are disqualified, and in the amendment which he is now proposing the hon. gentleman is disqualifying all persons except in relation to a later date, "subsequent to the next general election." I am afraid the hon. member has not seen the implications of the amendment. He would disqualify all at the next general election and entitle them to vote at a subsequent general election. If the hon. gentleman himself wishes to speak to the amendment, or if any other hon. member wishes to do so, I shall be glad to hear what is said.

Mr. KNOWLES: As one who seconded the motion, I think it is fairly clear—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to address a few remarks to the mover of the resolution. I ask him to address himself to the question I have raised with regard to the amendment. If he should like to do that I shall be glad to hear him. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already spoken in the debate and therefore cannot speak again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is there a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak on his amendment I shall be glad to hear him, but he must address himself to that question.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, if you understood the motion that I made, I do not think you would rule it out of order. It simply changes the date of the coming into effect of a particular section of the act until after the next general federal election. It does not change the qualifications or disqualify anyone who was qualified to vote. All it does is to change the time of the coming into effect. Individuals affected will still be disqualified after the next general election, as they would be under this act in its present form. All this does is to say that prior to the next general federal election these individuals shall not be disqualified. It simply changes the time factor. It will be further changed by section 11 of the act. Section 5 will then go in its place, and it will automatically die with the ending of the war, but it will not change the qualifications of the voters. It will simply postpone the time of the coming into effect of certain disqualifications. These will not come into effect until after the next general election and will die six months after the war, according to section 11. Because it only changes the time factor it is a consequential amendment and therefore can be accepted. If it changed the qualifications of the individuals who could vote, then I consider Your Honour would be perfectly justified in ruling it out. But where it is a consequential motion and changes only the time factor, I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it can be accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order, I submit that there is no difference whatsoever in principle between this amendment and the one that Your Honour ruled out of order some time ago. In the second place I submit that not only does this amendment seek to do certain things by a question of time; the effect of the amendment that is sought is this: it changes the whole principle of this bill. It changes the whole principle of the bill which passed third reading in this house; it changes the principle of the amendment that came back to us from the other place, and therefore is not relevant. Certainly it is not consequential. It is the direct opposite to the principle of this bill. It means that these people are going to vote after the next general election, and after that they can be disqualified. Apart from the point of order, this is the most unethical amendment that I ever heard moved in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: After reading this amendment I have grave doubts as to its relevancy as being consequential to the amendments made by the senate. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, paragraph 589, reads as follows:

> When a bill is returned from the senate with amendments, the amendments are read and agreed to, or agreed to with consequential amendments, or disagreed to, or the further consideration thereof put off for three or six months, or the bill ordered to be laid aside.
>
> No amendment can be proposed to the senate's amendment save an amendment strictly relevant thereto; nor can an amendment be moved to the bill, unless the amendment be relevant to or consequent upon either the acceptance or the rejection of a senate amendment.

I must come to the conclusion that the amendment submitted by the hon. gentleman is not consequential upon the amendments that have been made by the senate. I think I pointed out—

Mr. WRIGHT: Pardon me. May I point out that my amendment is an amendment to the amendment submitted by the Secretary of State; it is not an amendment to the senate amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are dealing with the senate amendment which the Secretary of State has accepted, with an addition to it and therefore consequential to it; but in the amendment the hon. gentleman has submitted he is postponing the date of the disqualification to a period in the future, which is subsequent to the next general election. The principle that he is placing in the amendment is one which was not dealt with by the senate or by this house when the bill was before it. I must rule unhesitatingly that it is not consequential and therefore out of order.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SALARIES OF MINISTERS OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS AND RECONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 160, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of ministers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When this matter was before the house on Friday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked whether the new ministers named in the bill would automatically receive a car allowance in addition to their salaries. The answer is yes. Each minister of the crown in charge of a department of government is by statute entitled to a motorcar allowance of $2,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is one other matter about which I should like to ask a question at this point. I think I shall be understood perfectly when I say that I have no axe to grind, nor has any basic principle been violated, as far as I am concerned. However, something has occurred here to which it seems to me one might call attention more easily in connection with this bill than in some other cases. In view of the experience in connection with the bill with which we have just dealt, members of the government will perhaps appreciate that we are combing through the bills much more closely than before. When the resolution preceding this bill was introduced on Friday last it read:

> That it is expedient to amend the Salaries Act to provide that the salaries of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs and of the Minister of Reconstruction shall be ten thousand dollars, respectively.

That is all that was in the resolution, and on the basis of that resolution the bill to be introduced was to provide for two points, salaries for two ministers. When I received the bill in my mail on Saturday morning at first I thought it was the wrong bill, but when I looked it over I discovered that it contained six provisions instead of the two mentioned in the resolution. Those six provisions are: the two salaries named, the salary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a provision that the salary of the Minister of Pensions and National Health shall continue at the rate of $10,000 as long as he occupies that office and two other provisions which change the Minister of Railways and Canals to the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Interior to the Minister of Mines and Resources. There is nothing wrong in any of these changes, nor is there anything we did not expect or anything that should not have been done. It did strike me as strange, however, when we looked over the bill, to discover that on the basis of a simple two-point resolution we were presented with a six-point bill. I only hope that in the dying days of the session the bills will conform a little more closely to the resolutions that are introduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is nothing in this bill which was not covered by the resolution, as far as voting an additional dollar is concerned. It is the amount of money that is the consideration there.

Mr. KNOWLES: The resolution names two ministers but the bill names three, so that the difference is as between $20,000 and $30,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me explain to my hon. friend. The law clerks who have to do with the drafting of these bills every now and then, when the opportunity occurs, take advantage of the chance to do what they call a little tidying up; that is to say, they bring up to date in one bill changes that have taken place in previous years but which have not been noted in that particular legislation. The designation of the portfolios of two or three of the ministry have been changed. For example, there used to be a Minister of Railways and Canals. His portfolio was changed to that of Minister of Transport. Since the Salaries Act lists several ministers my hon. friend will see cited the Minister of Transport, but he will not find anywhere in the list mention of a Minister of Railways and Canals. Attention is drawn to these changes in the explanatory note; it explains everything. As will be seen there, the person who was known formerly as the Minister of Railways and Canals to-day does not receive a salary under that designation; he receives his salary as Minister of Transport. The same is true with regard to the Minister of Mines and Resources, who was known previously as the Minister of the Interior. When the bill creating the Department of Mines and Resources was introduced it stipulated that this name should be substituted for that of Minister of the Interior. Previously the new minister had been drawing his salary as Minister of the Interior. After that bill was enacted the minister drew his salary, and is drawing it to-day, as Minister of Mines and Resources. So that no additional money is being voted in connection with those two ministers. To-day a salary is voted for the Minister of Pensions and National Health; I am happy to say that my hon. friend to my left has been getting his salary under that designation. However, we have created a new Department of Veterans' Affairs, which takes away part of the scope of the department of pensions and health. We have also put through this house, and I have no doubt it will pass the other chamber and be assented to, a bill with respect to national health and welfare, which takes care of the remainder of the pensions and health department. There will be no Department of Pensions and National Health. My hon. friend will see that what is being done here is to make provision for the salaries of new Ministers of National Health and Welfare and of Veterans' Affairs. The moment the new departments are created the salary of the present Minister of Pensions and National Health will be dropped entirely from the salary list. In order in the meantime that the minister may be assured of his salary section 2 provides:

> Until such date as the Department of National Health and Welfare Act and the Department of Veterans' Affairs Act, passed at the present session of parliament, come into force by proclamation of the governor in council, the salary of the Minister of Pensions and National Health shall be ten thousand dollars per annum.

In other words, he is continued on the list until the two new departments come into being. It simply comes down to making provision for the portfolio of reconstruction and one other additional portfolio.

Mr. GRAYDON: It may be that the point I desire to raise has been dealt with while I have been out of the chamber; if so, perhaps the Prime Minister will indicate that to me and I will look up the answer in Hansard. However, I note that the list provides a salary of $15,000 for the member of the king's privy council holding the recognized position of first minister. It also provides a salary of $10,000 for the president of the king's privy council for Canada, and, in addition, a salary of $10,000 for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course the Prime Minister occupies all three positions. I do not raise this matter because I desire any change made as far as the salary of the Prime Minister is concerned, but I just want to make sure there is nothing in the bill which offends the principle that there shall be only one salary paid to each cabinet minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The auditor general looks after that. I can assure my hon. friend only the one salary is paid. The provision for the president of the king's privy council goes back I think to the last war, when the late Hon. Mr. Rowell was made president of the privy council. I believe there was also some thought of having a separate minister for the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs. I can assure my hon. friend that no minister of the crown can draw more than one salary. Fortunately in this case one salary is larger than the other, so that the minister if he holds all three has a choice.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a good thing the Prime Minister has the choice, because otherwise he might not fare very well.

I have no doubt the Prime Minister has considered a different arrangement in connection with the portfolio of Secretary of State for External Affairs. One must consider the heavy burdens a Prime Minister must bear, not only as first minister of the land, but also as President of the Privy Council. Added to that has been the work connected with the Department of External Affairs. Indications are that, as time goes on, that work will be more extended.

I am wondering if the Prime Minister would care to comment on the possibility of having a separate minister for the portfolio of Secretary of State for External Affairs? I do not raise the matter as one of immediate possibility, but I do so having in mind the fact that the Department of External Affairs will undoubtedly become more important as time goes by. I take it the Prime Minister has in mind, perhaps not for his government, but for succeeding administrations, the possibility of recommending a change in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe it was about a year ago I spoke about this matter, and indicated that, personally, I would greatly welcome having at an appropriate time the portfolio of external affairs held by another minister of the crown. But since the war began, it has been almost impossible to separate some of the questions which come before the government for consideration from the Prime Minister's office and the Department of External Affairs. It would have been very difficult for the Prime Minister from day to day to have done other than have most of his time taken up with matters relating to external affairs.

For this reason I have assumed the burden, one which I believe is heavier than anyone would wish to assume, unless he thought that in doing so he would serve some really helpful and useful purpose. Everything considered, I think it has been just as well not to have the change made at the present time. However, I do agree entirely with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that in a subsequent parliament whoever may have to do with these different positions would be wise if he were to seek a minister to fill the portfolio of external affairs, with duties apart altogether from those of the Prime Minister.

The President of the Council raises another matter. I believe this office was billed in the first instance by Sir John A. Macdonald, while he was Prime Minister, so that, in that way, he might have before him something in the nature of a survey of the work of the government as a whole. In the position of President of the Council, I have found that it has worked out in that way. The Prime Minister does get a knowledge of the work of the cabinet as a whole, through presiding at meetings of council. I should think he could not obtain much of that knowledge otherwise. There may be occasions, however, when it would be desirable also to have that position held by a separate minister. I can assure my hon. friend that the duties of these respective offices are certainly heavy enough to warrant their being held separately.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not wish to delay the passage of this bill in committee, but I would make a few remarks with respect to new appointments to be made. In my years in public life, which go back some considerable time, I have always felt that in the choosing of cabinet ministers, prime ministers have too often paid more attention to geographical appointments than to making appointments with due regard to the callings of the men affected.

In this chamber, like the Prime Minister I am surrounded by lawyers, doctors and other professional men. To my left we see the party which is hoping to gain a few seats, if possible, and they are overwhelmed with schoolteachers and ministers of the gospel.

Mr. BRYCE: Do not forget the farmers.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are one or two. But they do not farm—except the people. I realize, of course, that anything we say would have very little effect on the Prime Minister's choice. But in the present cabinet—and I do not say this in any unkindly spirit—I do not see the representation I should like to see. In the dominion we find industry, agriculture and labour. These three groups compose the major part of our population. In my view the labour portfolio should be administered by one who knows labour, and agriculture by one who knows agriculture. The portfolio of national revenue is not, in my opinion, a legal portfolio at all. It has been my view that that is a portfolio suited to a business man, because the minister would deal with industry, with tariffs, with regulations connected with customs duties, and matters which are connected solely with the industrial life of the country.

The Minister of Public Works—and again I say this in the most kindly spirit—should be someone who is a builder, or who knows something about building. I do not think a lawyer is particularly well fitted to hold the portfolio of public works, simply because he has a legal mind. In the whole cabinet at the present time I do not find one man who has been engaged in industry. The nearest one would come to an industrialist is to be found in the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who was a contractor, builder and engineer.

It is my belief that the men who should administer departments in the post-war should be men who have not been particularly trained in law or medicine, but men who have been trained in the hard way in the departments over which they would have to preside. I believe the people would have more confidence in the new departments if men with practical knowledge of the various subjects involved were chosen to head those departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the matter of the selection of ministers in a country as broad as Canada, and with interests as diverse in many parts, it is always necessary for a Prime Minister to have regard to questions of geography, race, religion and other considerations. The hon. member has introduced an additional consideration, namely that relating to callings or occupations. Within certain bounds it is true that considerations of the kind he has mentioned should weigh. But the weight to be given to them must necessarily largely depend upon the personnel of the house, and the number of persons of different occupations who are elected.

In choosing ministers of the crown I believe the best administration is to be achieved where regard is had first and foremost for the intelligence and integrity of the persons appointed. A man of ability, sound judgment and high attainments would to my mind fill much better any portfolio of government that might be allotted to him than could possibly be the case with others who might seem to have qualifications on the grounds of calling or occupation, but who did not have the required attainments in other ways.

Perhaps I may say something that I have said to my colleagues many times. I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend opposite, the hon. member for Yale. If I were asking him to come into the government and he were prepared to come I would be prepared to put him into almost any portfolio because I think he would administer it with a high degree of intelligence, integrity and ability. I do not know whether I could say quite the same about my hon. friend.

Mr. HOMUTH: We were both born in the same county.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say just one word to the Prime Minister? I hope that in stating the qualifications for men who might enter the government he was using that word in its broadest sense.

Mr. BURTON: The hon. member for Waterloo South has opened up an issue which I for one do not intend to follow. I have always been of the opinion that it was the responsibility of whoever might be called upon to carry out a government to select their own ministers for the cabinet. I can assure the hon. member for Waterloo South that when we in this group form a government we shall have a cabinet with which he will have very little to do.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will have to shove your whiskers back when you do that.

Mr. BURTON: I notice that section 4 lists the various members of the cabinet and their salaries, and the list includes the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of National War Services. Apparently these two departments are to continue to be recognized as full-fledged departments. But the list mentions only one Minister of National Defence, and I was under the impression that the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services were two separate departments. It seems strange to me that they should be left out of the list when it would be expected that the other departments would disappear from the picture much earlier.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the salaries of the Minister of National Defence for Air and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services are covered by the war appropriation act. These portfolios were created since the commencement of the war and the salaries have been provided for in that way. If it is decided to continue both of these departments after the war provision for the salaries will, I assume, be transferred by some subsequent amendment to the Salaries Act. If the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of National War Services should disappear, the salaries now being paid will also disappear.

Mr. STIRLING: I was called out of the chamber a few minutes ago and just before leaving I thought I understood the Prime Minister to say that the $2,000 motorcar allowance is statutory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: In what statute does it appear?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is covered by the Appropriation Act, No. 5, 1931, which is chapter 61 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That in order to ensure a greater measure of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity, it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

1. That family allowances, effective as from the first day of July, 1945, be paid in respect of each child in Canada under sixteen years of age, in accordance with the following scale:

in respect of a child less than six years old, five dollars per month;

in respect of a child six or more years old but less than ten years old, six dollars per month;

in respect of a child ten or more years old but less than thirteen years old, seven dollars per month; in respect of a child thirteen or more years old but less than sixteen years old, eight dollars per month;

Provided that the above rates shall be reduced: by one dollar per month in respect of the fifth child;

by two dollars per month in respect of the sixth child and seventh child; and by three dollars per month in respect of the eighth child and any additional child or children;

2. That the reduction in tax under the Income War Tax Act allowable to a taxpayer by reason of a child shall be reduced by an appropriate amount based upon the family allowances payable under the said measure;

3. That the amounts required under the said measure be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund;

4. That the expenses necessary for the administration of the proposed act be paid out of the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purpose.

He said: A few moments ago I mentioned in the house, in the temporary absence of the leader of the opposition, that if the house were prepared to have the debate on family allowances take place on the second reading of the bill rather than on the resolution I would be prepared to proceed this afternoon with the resolution, but that if it were the desire of hon. members to debate the resolution at length I would prefer to allow it to stand to-day and proceed with some other order and then debate the resolution on a subsequent occasion. The hon. member for Yale stated that he understood the leader of the opposition expected me to make a brief statement on the resolution and that the leader of the opposition desired to make a statement, but that beyond that it was not the intention or desire of the official opposition to have a debate take place on the resolution. I mentioned also that I had asked the whip to have inquiries of the leaders of other groups in the house, and he had obtained their assurance that they would prefer to have the debate take place on the second reading and have the bill introduced at as early a moment as possible.

The bill based on the resolution is intended to implement the following paragraph which appeared in the speech from the throne:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

I believe it would be much easier to acquaint hon. members with the several provisions of the bill by having the bill immediately before them, and if before attempting an explanation at length, they have an opportunity to study its sections. The resolution is necessary as the bill involves the expenditure of public moneys. I imagine that what hon. members will be most interested in ascertaining immediately is the estimated necessary expenditure should the bill be enacted. The Department of Finance and the bureau of statistics have made an estimate of the annual cost of the family allowances on the basis set forth in the resolution. The estimate of the gross outlay is something over $250,000,000. The amount that will be recovered due to the corresponding reduction of present income tax allowances, estimated at the present tax rates, is from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000. That would bring down the net cost to approximately $200,000,000. That is all I wish to make in the way of a statement at the moment. If there are questions hon. members wish to ask in committee I shall try to answer them.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few brief observations with respect to the resolution. No political party and no group of citizens in Canada can validly claim to have a monopoly on the determination to see that the children of this dominion, who constitute by far our most valuable national asset, are given a square deal and the fullest of opportunities in the new and better era of to-morrow.

The Progressive Conservative party takes a determined and vigorous stand in favour of meeting immediately the health and welfare needs of the people of this country, especially of our mothers and their children. Let that be clearly understood right at the beginning. We take second place to no party in this parliament in the advocacy, promotion and execution of the necessary measures to assure decent, wholesome life, social justice and equality of opportunity to all of Canada's cititzens. That, we contend, calls for governmental programmes which not only will make possible equality of opportunity and decent levels of self-support for those capable of providing for themselves and their dependents, in a civilized Christian state, but means also a fair and just bearing of the burden of meeting adequately the needs of those who, by age, condition or circumstance, would otherwise falter and fall in this race of life.

The resolution indicates only in skeleton form the nature of the bill which will be founded upon it, and only when the bill is introduced will the plan and objectives of the government be fully disclosed. There is no occasion for a duplicate debate, and we prefer to allow the resolution to pass quickly in order that the house shall be fully informed of the government's policy before a comprehensive discussion is initiated.

May I suggest to the government, therefore, that the bill be introduced without delay so that its provisions can be thoroughly analysed, after which our course of action will be made known in the light of what, in our opinion, will best promote the interests and welfare of the children of Canada and the life and destiny of this dominion.

With our rights thus reserved, we are content to allow the resolution to be carried, on the understanding that the bill will be introduced to-day.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

The house resumed from Friday, July 7, consideration in committee of bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act—Mr. Michaud—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Licences.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On several occasions I have referred to section 12, subsection 1, wherein the following words appear:

Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

I am not going to deal at any length to-day with the arguments heretofore advanced with regard to this section. Suffice it to say that the attitude which we on this side of the house have taken is that what should be a free and independent board set up for the purpose of determining rights in a quasi-judicial manner will in fact be a board entirely under the control of the minister, and we feel that to vest power in the minister such as will be vested under this section is arbitrary, dangerous and autocratic. I am not going into the arguments advanced in that behalf except to say this, that the board set up to grant licences as between various claimants will be a board apparently possessing powers but in fact having no powers except subject to the minister, with the result that any decision which this board would come to would be in effect the minister's own decision. The board, finding itself in the position of having three or four applicants for a licence, and determining that one certain applicant has the proper qualifications and is the most entitled to the licence, would make a decision thereon subject to the minister's approval; in effect the board would be a pawn in the minister's hand and a body which, while appearing to have powers, would be in effect merely a stooge of the minister.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I wish to move:

That section 12, subsection 1, be amended by deleting the words in the first line thereof, namely "Subject to the approval of the minister",

—so as to set up a board which will have powers, a board which can make judicial or semi-judicial decisions without the control of the minister. An analogy would be to set up a court of law with power to make judgments but whose judgments would be effective only if the Minister of Justice agreed therewith; there would be in effect a denial of every principle on which our jurisprudence is founded.

This section is different from any section in corresponding legislation in either the United States or Great Britain. For that and other reasons which have been heretofore advanced I move the amendment in order to take away from the minister the right, in fact, to control decisions, judicial and semi-judicial, made by the board to the end that the board shall be free, impartial and uncontrolled.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain why he deems it necessary to take this extraordinary power? Why is it not sufficient to leave in the hands of the new board the discretion to issue licences?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The amendment proposed and the government's policy represent two wholly opposite views of responsible government. The amendment proposes that the domain of air be taken out of the hands of government, taken away from parliament, and turned over to a board of three members appointed for a long term. This board, quite independent of the minister and of parliament, would then distribute the empire of air as would seem wise to the board. The view of the government is that responsibility for the domain of the air is a federal responsibility, having been so determined by the privy council of the United Kingdom, and that it shall be the responsibility of the government of the day. This board is intended to advise the government, to examine various applications and to determine points for or against each. The government will hardly act against the advice of the board. If it believes that the board has not chosen wisely, it may ask the board to reconsider. That is quite within the realm of possibility, and that has been the attitude with respect to appeals from the board of transport commissioners throughout the years. The privy council, while it has the right on appeal to reverse decisions, has never done so. It has never taken action on appeals from the board of transport commissioners except to refer a matter back for rehearing. My hon. friend says that this differs from legislation in the United States. That is not so. In the United States the authority considers applications from air lines and makes recommendations to the executive power. The executive power may accept such recommendations or refuse to accept them, but the power in the United States is in the executive, and not in the board. In the United Kingdom the matter of air line franchises is dealt with by a department of government just as had been the practice in Canada up to 1938. This is not an abrogation of power on the part of the minister. He has always had the power. He abrogated it to the board of transport commissioners, with certain restrictions, in 1938, but experience since that time has shown that it is desirable that the government should itself retain responsibility and exercise its judgment, in matters affecting air routes. As I say, we are presented with two totally different viewpoints, and if my hon. friend presses his amendment the committee must choose which is preferable as a means of carrying on democratic government.

Mr. GREEN: For the last six years the power to issue licences has been in the board of transport commissioners, as the minister knows, according to section 13 of the Transport Act of 1938. Will the minister explain in what ways that provision has presented difficulties?

Mr. HOWE: The position since 1938 has been rather the reverse, The government has had the responsibility for proclaiming air routes. After the government has proclaimed a route, the board of transport commissioners chooses the operator of that route. The method of choosing the operator is laid down completely in the Transport Act, which was drawn primarily to cover railway problems. It was amended to some extent when the board was given responsibility for selecting operators of air routes.

Mr. GREEN: The Transport Act was not drawn to cover railway problems.

Mr. HOWE: The Railway Act was amended and called the Transport Act at the time responsibility for air was included in the act. The Railway Act is a comprehensive one and was drawn to cover the operation of railways, but it was amended in a minor way when provision was made that it should also have jurisdiction over inland water navigation and over air transport.

Mr. GREEN: The Transport Act was a brand new act; it was not an amendment to the Railway Act.

Mr. HOWE: It was an amendment to the Railway Act.

Mr. GREEN: The Transport Act is chapter 53 of the statutes of 1938.

Mr. HOWE: The Transport Act was an amendment to the railway act. The amendment included a change in the title.

Mr. GREEN: The Railway Act is still in existence.

Mr. HOWE: No. The Railway Act is not in existence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Railway Act not in existence?

Mr. GREEN: The minister is wrong in that.

Mr. HOWE: I have just been advised that the hon. member is correct. I was given the effect of the Transport Act. The Transport Act is a short act which is an addition to the Railway Act rather than an amendment, but the effect of it was to amend the Railway Act; as witness the fact that the name of the board was changed from the board of railway commissioners to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. GREEN: It gave them wider powers.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It has been called to my attention that the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), speaking in the debate on July 7, 1944, made this statement at page 4618 of Hansard:

> What did it add up to in the past? A board sat behind the scenes, never reporting to parliament, and franchises across the country were sold to their friends on the basis of patronage. . . . We are beginning to drag out from behind the scenes a very good business that has been handled on the basis of patronage and in favour of monopolies.

That is a wholly improper statement and it is wholly incorrect. The board of transport commissioners have dealt with air matters exactly in accordance with the provisions of the act. Any decision it has made has been based on sound law as drawn up in the act, and I know of no decision that could have been made under the act differently from the decision given by the board of transport commissioners. If anything, they were too tightly bound by the act, and made decisions that must have seemed of doubtful wisdom to the board; nevertheless the board have acted wholly within their jurisdiction in any decisions they have made in the matter of air franchises. I wish to make that quite clear. I do not know whether I have answered my hon. friend's question.

Mr. GREEN: I asked what the difficulties were that had arisen. Apparently there were great difficulties, and as a result the government is now changing its policy and taking away all power over air transport from the transport board.

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that the matter of developing air routes and assigning them involves questions of policy rather than questions of law. The board of transport commissioners have been simply judges interpreting a law. The board exercises no initiative in suggesting air routes, or in planning the development of the air system. That practice was a mistake. The fault was not in the board of transport commissioners; the fault was in the act which bound them too tightly to certain procedure. My hon. friend will observe that in this case we have not attempted to bind this board by elaborate procedure. Rather we have asked the board to develop its own procedure through experience, which I think is the only sound way to proceed.

The purpose of this bill is to set up a board of three men who have a knowledge of air transport work, who have a knowledge of Canada, who have a knowledge of the problems which they will be expected to deal with. That board will be asked to advise the government on matters of policy, to study the maps of Canada and the maps of the world, to attend to every detail on air matters. I can assure my hon. friend that the pressure of problems arising in the air takes a very considerable part of any minister's time, and, with only the advice of the department officials available, I will say quite frankly it is not getting the attention at this moment that it deserves. As a result of this bill, we hope to bring in three men of sound judgment and solid background, of air transport knowledge, and we hope to make progress much more rapidly in the future than we have in the past. However, when this bill becomes law the government will continue to be responsible to parliament for any franchise in the air that may be awarded in the future.

Mr. GREEN: Why was it necessary to give power to this new board to decide between applicants for a route? I can quite see that an advisory board might be of great assistance particularly since under section 15 of the Transport Act the governor in council had power to decide what routes should be flown. Why go farther and give this new board, which is not really a judicial board but an advisory board, the job of deciding between A and B as to who is to fly a particular route. Would it not be far better to leave that to the present board of transport commissioners, who would exercise their judgment in a judicial way, having in mind that there should not be undue competition and who was best qualified to fly a route and so on? It seems to me that would be a far wiser way to handle the matter.

Mr. HOWE: A decision of that kind is usually not a judicial one. There are a great many facts to be marshalled. The procedure in the United States is as follows. A certain route is opened for award. Applications are usually filed by every air line in the country. It takes many months, sometimes years, to sort out the applications. Each applicant must present a brief, which comes before the board. That brief gives reasons why the route should be awarded to the applicant's air line. We have been applicants at Washington ourselves; we know something of the procedure and something of the time element involved. The most careful study is made of the relative merits of each applicant, and in due course a finding with reasons is brought down as a recommendation to the executive that the route be awarded to one of the applicants. I think the executive has always acted on the advice of the aeronautics authority, and I presume that the executive here will act on the advice of this board. The board has its own experts to advise it and has the time and the means to study the relative merits of each application, and is thus able to give the government a sound reason to support its recommendation. But to me the great important duty of the board is to study the development of air transport in Canada and to advise the government on a sound policy to be followed in that development, and to make sure that the development is pressed as rapidly as the equipment situation will permit.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I touch on one matter in connection with the control of aeronautics by the dominion? The minister referred to the privy council decision, but the privy council did not make a decision on question No. 3, which was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, and regarding which there was no decision made by the privy council; therefore the matter as to whether or not there is exclusive control in so far as regulation and control in the dominion parliament is concerned has not yet been decided by the privy council. Question No. 2 was as follows:

> Is legislation of the parliament of Canada providing for the regulation and control of aeronautics generally within Canada, including flying operations carried on entirely within the limits of a province necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada, or of any province thereof, under the convention aforementioned, within the meaning of section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867?

That question was answered by the Supreme Court of Canada, but was not answered by the privy council; therefore the privy council judgment 1932 AC54, does not decide the proposition that the minister has just stated. The answer of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada was:

> No if the word "generally" in the question was equivalent to "in every respect."

The minister by his own answer has advanced the strongest possible reason why this board should not be controlled by the minister. Under the Transport Act the board of transport commissioners are a semi-judicial body. The statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton South indicated that this body had acted in a way that was contrary to the law of this country; in fact, that it had acted improperly. The minister now says that suggestion is unfounded, but he does find fault with the board of transport commissioners.

I would point out that the reason why he finds fault with them in so far as aviation is concerned is that their decisions were based on law and on the act and therefore were not satisfactory. What the minister tries to do by section 12, subsection 1, is to secure in his hands a board which inferentially will not be bound too tightly by the law or by the provisions of the act. In other words, he wants to have a board set up which ostensibly will be required to carry out the law in the act, but when it does, on occasion its decision may not be ratified by the minister in the decision arrived at. The minister may say that there is a similar principle in the United States. Let me say to him that there is no such principle in the Aeronautics Act of the United States; in the United States the executive and the legislative are separate; hence the provisions of that act.

The minister says that in Britain the department of government controls. Let the department of government control here. Why have a board to go through the motions? Why pay a board $10,000, $12,000, $14,000 a year for the purpose of going through motions, for the purpose ostensibly of carrying out the law but carried out only when the minister believes it should be carried out, while in other cases stretching the law or entirely disregarding it when the minister believes it is a matter of policy to do so?

I object to the setting up of a board whose powers will be limited; who will not be permitted to comply with the law if the minister believes the law ought not to be complied with, and whose creation will permit the practice of discrimination in the awarding of valuable air franchises. The main function this board will perform, as far as the minister is concerned, is that it will recommend something that should be done. A board of three members, drawing large salaries, will be set up although we have a board now, the board of transport commissioners, who are far from overworked. They receive very considerable salaries, as they should in the position they occupy. We are to set up a new board, depriving it of the privilege of exercising judicial functions. We are going to take away from it the right to carry out sound principles of law, and of exercising sound discretion. We are going to set up a new board, whose members again will receive large salaries, for the purpose of making recommendations which cannot be carried into effect without the minister's approval. The minister speaks of ministerial responsibility, but that is not what we have here. This amounts to judicial irresponsibility, if the board is set up in this form. There is nothing like this under any act of the parliament of Great Britain.

The minister says the administration of aviation concerns matters of policy, which is the responsibility of the minister and the department. Then why set up the board, unless it be that we are creating a number of new positions at very fancy salaries, to be distributed at this time. I object to the setting up of the board in the first place as unnecessary; but if it is to be set up, then it should have power, responsibility, discretion and, as the hon. member for Carleton says, independence. Think of the possibilities of the position of this board. I am not in any way suggesting that the minister would have any ill-feeling against any group or applicant who might come before this board, but human nature being what it is, if a minister disliked any company or any individual he could arbitrarily refuse a licence, regardless of the qualifications of the company or the individual applying. If parliament grants the minister that power, in effect parliament thereby abdicates its right to the assurance that individuals appearing before a board set up by parliament shall not be denied justice.

The minister's only reply is that this novel change is introduced because we must look at the air situation throughout the world as well as in Canada, and matters of policy must be considered. Well, Mr. Chairman, policy is considered to-day. The governor in council sets up the routes, which means in effect that they are set up by the government of the day. They make the policy, as to where aviation facilities are to be provided, and the board decides as between various claimants for licences. I am going to ask the minister one very pointed question in regard to the board of transport commissioners. He stated that the criticism of the hon. member for Cape Breton South was ill-founded. Now I want to ask the minister whether the board of transport commissioners ever awarded a licence which the minister himself would not have awarded if he had been in the position of the board. I should like the minister to answer that question.

Mr. HOWE: Never having been in the position of the board, I cannot say.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then what is the criticism of the board? The minister says he does not know that they have ever made a mistake, which inferentially means that as far as he is concerned any licences they have awarded would have been awarded by him. Yet now he wants to continue the present board, restricted to the narrow field of railway and steamship transportation, and asks parliament to permit the setting up of another board which will cost this country $30,000 or $35,000 a year and which will have no power to do anything except subject to the minister. Why should it be supposed that the minister would have any better facilities than the board for ascertaining whether an operator had the necessary finances and equipment to take over a route? The board would certainly learn that after making an examination. But so anxious is the minister to have complete control, that the board may not issue licences without his approval and in addition, even after he gives his approval, subsection 4 of section 12 provides that the board shall not issue any such licence unless and until an operating certificate has been issued by the minister. I submit that these provisions constitute the greatest abdication of the principles of responsible government, in which we believe, ever to have been asked by a minister in this country. We are asked in this bill to give the minister power to say what shall be done and who shall do it. We are asked to give him the arbitrary right to decide that the findings of a board of three, after having considered all the evidence, shall not be put into effect unless the minister approves. Included in the powers of the governor in council is the power of removal of the members of the board, should the board go contrary to law or to the policy of the government. Then why, in addition to all these other powers, should the minister have absolute power and control such as have never been asked for in any other connection? I submit that the acceptance of the amendment will go a long way toward eliminating the suggestion of there being improper considerations in the award of licences and ensuring that the government is endeavouring to assure the widest development of aviation in this country in that it may not be stifled or strangled or interfered with by the arbitrary rulings or edicts of any minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does not the minister think the policy the government now seems bent upon pursuing will bring about in this country a rather chaotic condition in the days that lie ahead, with respect to transportation and communication? After all, there must be some integrating of the transportation facilities of a nation such as Canada.

The minister appears to be taking a retrograde step, if I may say so, because first of all he is separating the railways from air transportation and, in addition to that, he is taking away from the board of transport commissioners any powers connected with air routes. This involves at the same time a further step in separating these two systems. I think the minister and government might very properly review and reconsider their position in this respect.

While I am not an expert in transportation matters, yet I believe even laymen who will look at the transportation problem in Canada cannot help seeing the difficulties, and I believe may justly express some fear of the future when there is no reasonable amount of integration among the various kinds of travel. If we are giving this new board certain powers and taking away from the board of transport commissioners any jurisdiction it might have over air transportation, this board would have lesser powers, and would actually be just a good and obedient hired man for the minister. In plain, ordinary terms that is what the bill means. It will further emphasize the cleavage between two great modes of transportation.

The problem of general communications also comes to my mind, and I have in mind radio particularly. The suggestion has been made this year in the committtee or radio broadcasting that, in view of the fact that Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in competition with privately owned stations, an independent board should be set up to adjudicate between the two. If in Canada we are to have a board of transport commissioners to handle matters connected with railway travel, and at the same time to have another board to handle air transportation, and another to handle communications, the government should watch carefully to see that this does not proceed too far. I would urge that the minister give this matter serious consideration before we embark upon setting up a variety of boards, the integration of which would become increasingly difficult in the years which lie ahead.

I raise my voice against the proposal of the minister as contained in section 12, and I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre. This board must be one thing or another, as I see it. The minister is attempting to make it a part of several things, and when he gets finished with it it will end up, not as a board, but rather just another department under the minister.

There is no other way in which this can be interpreted. Certainly it is not the kind of board that the board of transport commissioners has set out to be. In effect this board is simply the chore boy of the minister. Air transportation, in its present condition, deserves something more by way of independence. It should have an independent board whereby everyone would be able to receive a fair deal. I am not suggesting that the minister would intentionally give anyone an unfair deal but, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre, human nature is human nature. I do not think it should be necessary for an applicant to have to approach any particular political party when he wishes to take action in this respect. He should be in a position to go to an independent body. That body would then give its decision, in the light of existing circumstances.

I would ask the minister to consider where all this is leading, from the point of view of a wide distribution of authority, and a wide distribution of the various measures controlling our transportation and communications. I would ask him, after having made a survey, to see if there could not be some better means of integrating these various factors and influences which to so great an extent enter into our normal national life.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, I might not know much about transportation in the air, but I think if the hon. member for Broadview had been here he would have put in a word for responsible government. This board is not to be made up of members of parliament. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is right.

Mr. McIVOR: They are not to be responsible. If the amendment offered by the hon. member for Lake Centre is approved, the board will not be responsible to the minister. Therefore the minister would not be responsible for the board. Therefore the electors all across Canada would not have any say in it at all. If any mistake is made, the minister would not be responsible and would not be held to account. I have no doubt the leader of the opposition believes that if the present minister were in charge everything would be all right. If there were a change there might be some risk. But any man who has charge of aviation will be responsible to the country. The minister should have that responsibility, and the board should be responsible to the minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the hon. member have our judges elected?

Mr. BOUCHER: Mr. Chairman, I believe I should say a few words at this point. I am not conversant with civil air transportation, but I would look at that feature of the air transport board which establishes it as a judicial body deciding judicial questions.

Let us consider three different events. First, an applicant wants to get a licence. Instead of going to the air transport board directly he must go to the minister, to see that the application meets with the minister's approval. The transport board must approve, too. If the applicant went to the board for instance, their decision would be governed by the minister's approval.

Those of us who believe in British institutions are proud of one thing, perhaps more than another, and that is the independence of our judicial bodies. Hon. members must keep in mind that a decision by the air transport board must meet with the approval of the minister of the day. When an applicant applies for something from the board he knows that the board must make a decision which will meet with the approval of the minister himself. How can an applicant expect an impartial ruling from the board such as we would expect from our judiciary, under British institutions? How can an applicant expect to get an opinion purely non-political and non-partisan, and purely judicial, when that opinion is subject to the control of the minister?

Some talk about the control of parliament. Well, control of parliament is one thing, but control of the minister is another. There is a vast difference. I say that for the sake of efficiency a board must be independent. It must be assured that it cannot be accused of political influence, and it must not be subject to the approval of any one man or any one set of circumstances. Such a board should have the privileges extended to a judicial body. It should be their minds that speak; it should not be the mind of the minister that gives the verdict.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot understand why the government considers it necessary to adopt a totally different method of administering travel by air or air transportation from the one it has to administer travel by land and water. It is realized by all that when the end of the war comes there will be a considerable increase, a surge forward in transportation. A hundred years ago the United Kingdom went through such a surge forward in transportation by land. Sir Robert Peel or whoever was prime minister in those days did not see fit to put the administration of transportation into the hands of one of his ministers. Schemes were considered on their merits before a parliamentary committee.

We carried on somewhat in the same way in this country. Where a railway extension is contemplated a bill comes before this house and is sent to the railway committee. I do not understand why it is necessary to have a totally different form of government for schemes by air as compared with government for schemes in connection with other forms of transportation. Why is it necessary for so much power to be put into the hands of a minister; it does not matter who the minister may be? I think the minister should explain this essential difference in connection with the government of transportation by air.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, speaking to the amendment I would remind my hon. friend, as he has already reminded the committee, of the method of granting franchises for surface transportation. A bill is prepared, brought to parliament, sent to a committee which in turn reports to parliament, and then parliament decides whether the franchise shall or shall not be granted. The purpose of this amendment would be to take that power, exercised by parliament in the case of railways, and in the case of our airways turn it over to a bureaucracy not responsible to parliament. It has been said that the members of the board can be dismissed for cause, but I wonder what the public reaction would be if the board were dismissed because it departed from the wishes of parliament in the placing of franchises. I hardly think that that would be considered as good cause for the dismissal of high placed public servants, under the practices of a British parliament.

Perhaps I can explain why bills for air lines are not brought to parliament. The practice is not new, dating back to 1918 or 1919. Air is a much more fluid means of transportation than transportation by land. A railway franchise is a permanent thing. Rails are laid down, and the operator is bound to operate trains over them until relieved of his responsibility by the board of transport commissioners, or by some other authorized body. An air line operates into an area. In the case of mining developments, a service may be required one year and not be required the next year. It would hardly be practical to require that bills be presented to parliament to establish air lines, particularly into remote areas.

Since 1918, when the Aeronautics Act was passed, it has been the function of the minister responsible for the administration of that act to allocate franchises. As a matter of practice the minister has functioned by obtaining orders in council. That practice was changed in 1938 by a bill which was presented under my sponsorship, and that authority was placed in the hands of the board of transport commissioners.

The difficulty is that the board of transport commissioners are in essence a judicial body. They have no staff to help them to form policies. They were attempting to deal with airway problems in a purely legalistic way. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and the proof of the pudding has not been in the interests of the development of our airways, at least in my humble opinion. This bill is an attempt to set up a strong advisory body to deal with policy matters, and also to act as a semi-judicial body for the final determination of matters that are judicial in character. We are adopting a form that has worked well in the country to the south of us, which country has seen the greatest development of airways of any country in the world.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not in effect there.

Mr. HOWE: It is in effect there, if my hon. friend will not interrupt. We are following a pattern which has worked well on this continent. My hon. friend states that in the United Kingdom there is no board, that these matters are dealt with departmentally. I would remind him that the United Kingdom is a small area and that internal civil aviation there is not a problem of great magnitude. Canada is a country of tremendous distances, and it is thinly settled. After having struggled with this problem for some eight or nine years, I can assure my hon. friend that our problem is a huge one. Any minister administering the Aeronautics Act to-day needs expert advice; he needs the help of men who are able to concentrate on one problem, the development of airways.

The purpose of this bill is to set up that sort of support for the minister who will be responsible for the Aeronautics Act. I am satisfied that this is a constructive measure. I believe it to be a measure that will make for the development of our airways, a measure that will make for a sound air policy to guide that development. Therefore, I must oppose the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre. If his amendment were adopted, I believe there would be no course open to the government but to abandon the bill now before the committee.

Mr. BOUCHER: In so far as this air transport board being an advisory board is concerned, the fact is that they will have to rely upon the expert technicians in the department. All they will be doing will be to accept the advice that the minister would accept. Then in connection with the judicial part of their duty, as I said before recess it would seem that the hands of the commissioners are tied down. They cannot use their independent judicial judgment; they will be governed by the approval of the minister. They will be almost part and parcel of the Department of Transport because they must and should rely upon the officials of that department for the data upon which they would form their opinions.

The difficulty is that we are creating something that is neither fish nor fowl. This board can have neither an independent viewpoint nor independent judicial powers. This board will not have an independent technical staff to give advisory support to the minister concerned. As I say, we are simply building up an organization that is neither fish nor fowl, an organization which will have no function that it can exercise in the independent way we would like to see it exercised as far as judicial decisions are concerned.

Mr. GREEN: There are two questions I should like to ask the minister. First, who will be responsible once this bill becomes law for deciding what routes are to be flown? Under section 15 of the Transport Act of 1938, which is the governing statute at the present time, that decision is made by the governor in council. In the present bill I do not see any provision which sets out how those routes are to be decided upon, although I take it that that will be done by the minister on the advice of his new board. I would ask him to explain how these routes are to be chosen.

Then, once a route has been chosen, what will be the procedure to decide between A firm and B firm who are applying for a licence to fly that particular route?

Mr. HOWE: The routes will be assigned, as they are to-day, by order in council. That will be covered in the amendments to the Transport Act which will shortly be considered by the committee. The governor in council will decide the routes to be flown, with the advice of the air transport board. As to the question of who will fly the routes, that also will be decided by the minister upon the advice of the air transport board, in the form of a report from the board giving reasons for the selection.

Mr. GREEN: Should not that provision for deciding the routes be put in this bill rather than left in the Transport Act, because the board of transport commissioners, once bill No. 133 becomes law, will have no jurisdiction over the air. Surely that provision should be in the new bill.

Mr. HOWE: The whole matter will be in the hands of the air transport board. The minister has the power: except for the period of delegation to the board of transport commissioners he has always had the power, and will continue to have it; that is, the governor in council will continue to have the power to decide the air routes.

Mr. GREEN: Will it be the minister or the governor in council?

Mr. HOWE: The governor in council.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 43.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment to section 12, subsection 5, in the second line, which I will ask my colleague to move; namely, that the clause be amended by inserting the words "or the areas to be served" after the word "followed". With that change the subsection will read:

(5) In issuing any licence the board shall prescribe the routes which may be followed or the areas to be served and may attach to the licence such conditions respecting schedules—

And so forth.

Mr. MICHAUD: I so move.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the cooperation of the minister and the chairman with respect to dealing with this particular section subclause by subclause, if we may. The minister has gone on to subsection 5; originally we were discussing subsection 1. I have no objection, so long as we keep within some sequence on it. That is the only reason I rose.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend may recall that several subsections were read before the amendment was proposed. However, I have no objection; I think it is quite logical, to take this subsection by subsection.

Mr. DIEFEBAKER: In regard to section 12, subsection 2, which provides—

The CHAIRMAN: If I may be allowed, I believe it may be in order to pass this amendment and then to revert to subsection 2 of section 12. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on section 12, subsection 2,—"Not to be issued to persons engaged in other than aircraft transport."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This subsection provides that no licence shall be issued to any person engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

Originally the position taken by the minister was that railway companies would be required within one year after the end of hostilities to divest themselves of any interest in the operation of aircraft companies. Since the original announcement was made, there has apparently been some change of attitude on the part of the minister, for the section does not carry out the expressed and determined intention of the minister denying to transportation companies the right to operate air transportation and civil aviation companies; and I should like to know the reason for the change in that regard. If I remember aright, the last time this matter was before the house the minister indicated that nowhere were railway companies or transport companies operating air transportation; but I find that in Britain to-day preparations are being made for the post-war period and that railway companies, operating in the United Kingdom, are to be given an opportunity to operate air companies alongside and as auxiliary to railway transportation. As a matter of fact I have here an article which I clipped from the press as far back as February 21 last, and written by a Canadian Press staff writer, wherein it is stated that Sir Harold Hartley, chief of Britain's railway-owned air services, made a statement at that time when the war is over:

"There will be a network of air lines over Great Britain—feeder lines. . . . That will be the first step to give and increase services where they now exist. I envisage the next step to be the expansion and the speeding up of air services to the continent. . . . I know that the railways gave an exceedingly good service to the continent by rail and boat and they have every right to take a hand in the new way of transport after the war.

That Sir Harold Hartley had some foundation for the expressed hope that after the war, within Britain itself, within the confines of the United Kingdom, railway transportation companies, bus companies, and the like would be permitted to secure licences to operate air lines, is borne out by the fact that on April 3 last Mr. Kenneth R. Wilson, Ottawa editor of the Financial Post, following a visit to Great Britain made a speech on post-war Britain and the hopes and prospects of the post-war period. In that, among other things, he said:

Many Britishers with whom I talked deplored the fact that Britain had, in the past, made the mistake of giving her overseas "air transport" to a single government-controlled monopoly. This monopoly was given originally to one government-sponsored concern, now called B.O.A.C. —British Overseas Airway Corporation. It has proved a considerable disappointment and seems almost certain to be replaced by a broader arrangement, which will in all probability permit great British shipping organizations such as Cunard-White Star and others to participate.

Mr. SLAGHT: What is the date of that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: April 3, 1944. Following his return from the old country, Mr. Wilson, who is known for his acute observations, made that statement. Realizing that it is to be a matter of government policy that there is to be a separation—at least that was the policy when first announced—unless the governor in council is of the opinion that it is in the public interest that licences should be granted to transportation companies, I should like to find out why the alteration in the minister's attitude and whether or not it was due in any way to conversations, exploratory or otherwise, which the minister had with Lord Beaverbrook. Separation is now a matter of government policy, and all I wish to do is to ascertain from the minister why he has receded so far from the stand that he so valiantly took a matter of two months ago, and which to-day has been softened down and retreated from to such an extent that the governor in council now enjoys the right to do that which the minister stated would not and could not be done.

Mr. HOWE: The government's policy was stated very clearly in this house and there has been no change whatever in it. The wording of this section is parallel with the wording of a similar section in the aeronautics act of the United States, and the same latitude is given there as is given here. The reason why that latitude is given is that there may be borderline cases where a strict interpretation of the rule with regard to government policy would defeat a desirable project. An example was given in this house by hon. members opposite of the case of Consolidated Mining and Smelting. The question was asked whether that company could be permitted to operate an airline under this act. Consolidated Mining and Smelting was a pioneer in air transport. Its operations are such that air transport may be a logical part of them, and this act gives the board power to determine whether an operation on the part of that company would be in the public interest, regardless of the fact that control of Consolidated Mining and Smelting probably rests with a railway company. That latitude is necessary in order to carry out the spirit of the act, but it involves no change whatever in government policy.

Mr. KNOWLES: I feel that the minister used some sense in what he said just now with regard to the necessity of some latitude in this clause. Nevertheless I believe that the hon. member for Lake Centre is right at this point in asking the minister for a more definitive statement of government policy at this time. I say that for this reason—if I may refer again to the statement which the minister made on March 17—that he said without qualification:

Steps will be taken to require our railways to divest themselves of ownership of air lines, to the end that, within a period of one year from the ending of the European war, transport by air will be entirely separate from surface transportation.

The words in that statement to which I would call attention are these, "within a period of one year from the ending of the European war." I would accept this latitude which the minister has put in subclause 2 for the reason he has given, but at the same time there should be some interpretation somewhere in the bill of that statement which he made on March 17, that this definite step would be taken within a year after the ending of the war. I wonder if that part of the policy announced on March 17, to the effect that this change will be made within a year after the end of the war, stands.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There is a slight misprint in the bill which I intend to correct when we come to it, but my hon. friend will see that section 14 is mandatory.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to be as strict with shipping companies as with railway companies? Take a shipping company with ships plying up the Pacific coast of Canada. It might wish to open an air route in connection with its shipping service, which would be very useful. Is it the intention absolutely to prohibit companies of that kind from operating air routes?

Mr. HOWE: Shipping companies will be treated extactly the same as railways or other surface transportation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will bus companies be treated similarly?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They will not be allowed to extend their service into the air?

Mr. HOWE: That depends on the question of public interest. There has been as yet no serious study of the relation between bus companies and air transportation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the minister think that the government company we now have operating air lines will have proper competition unless he allows the bus companies to step in?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, they should have competition, because the outfit we have now, T.C.A., although it is good, is always late in its schedules owing to the absence of competition. At least I imagine that is the reason. There certainly should be competition.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister has over and over again reiterated the point that he has divorced all surface carriers from air carriers because it was the practice in the United States to do so and because that was found to be satisfactory. What is the other evidence that it is advisable that surface carriers and air carriers should be divorced? Do we know enough yet about air transportation to say that it is a good thing or a bad thing for surface carriers and air carriers to be separated, whether they be surface carriers, water surface carriers, bus surface carriers or rail surface carriers? If there is evidence I should like to know it. The minister has always said that the United States had that policy and that it proved a very satisfactory one. I do not accept that. While it may be satisfactory to the United States, are we sure that we can follow in toto their programme? We have a much more sparsely settled country, and a country which in many ways has an economy which is quite different from that of the United States. Would the minister enlarge on the United States policy?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is quite wrong in stating that the reason for adopting this policy in Canada is that it was adopted in the United States. I mentioned that the experience in the United States had been similar to the experience in Canada. The need for divorcing the two has arisen out of our experience in Canada. The decision to be made therefore is, as I have said before, whether we shall have a monopoly of the air ways in the hands of the railways. The railways are naturally interested in developing transportation by rail. The question is, with complete monopolistic control of the air, would they be equally interested in developing our airways? Another question is whether we should turn over the empire of the air to those who control the empire of surface transportation? We must recall that pioneering of the airways has been performed by small operators. The railways never have been pioneers of the air. The small operator, serving a territory with area within his capacity to serve, has proved to be a very satisfactory means of developing air transportation. In my opinion, this small operator should have a chance in the air, and steps should be taken to see that our airways do not drift into monopolistic control; that is a matter of convenience to the public rather than benefit to any interest.

I believe that the public is better served by the small operator whose well-being depends on giving good service to his area. That is the purpose behind the bill; it is a purpose that experience has dictated to be sound policy, and that is the reason why this provision is in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to continue this same line of argument, Mr. Chairman, and it will not take more than a minute or two. The minister has said that he does not want to give a monopoly to the railways. I am in complete accord with him on that because, as I tried to point out when I spoke on this bill before, it has been the old bush pilots, the small operator, the fellow who had two or three aircraft who built up Canadian aviation. The big transcontinental operators come later. Because we do not want to give the railways a monopoly, is it necessary to divorce the railways from the long haul aircraft business? Surely traffic whether by air, sea or rail will flow to the most efficient and cheapest method. It seems to me that in the long haul transportation, the transcontinental field, the railways are singularly equipped to dove-tail their operations in with the operations in the air; whereas the company that does nothing but fly aircraft into the north country, where there is no other method of transportation, does not and cannot fear competition by the major companies, because the small company can always beat the big company due to its flexibility.

I think this bill is based on the wrong premise. The small company with a few aircraft and low overhead can give service to an outlying mine or an outlying community, or they can start a service to a new mining area or a new agricultural area. Once that is established and heavy traffic moves in, it becomes the duty of the railways to go in and haul that heavy traffic. But at the present time, because of the peculiarity of our great as yet untapped resources, the bill says that we will divorce the railway companies from all air transportation. I say that there is room for both of those operators, room for the railway operators operating on the main trunk lines, and I think they can be dove-tailed quite efficiently into railway operations; but the small feeder lines that perhaps have no accurate schedule—and remember we gained first place in the world in air freight by these small companies—will not be injured by the railways. The railways will never be able to compete with these small companies because the small companies will provide a flexibility of service with which the railways could never compete. They will be able to take you in whether you arrive at eleven o'clock or at any time, whether you want to take in a boiler or a piece of machinery. They will take you in and let you off anywhere. They are like a taxi service; they will take you anywhere you want to go. No railway company is going to be interested in that type of service; but that small company is not going to be interested in and could never be interested in the major transcontinental or heavy traffic air arteries. I have never yet had it explained to me why the railways should be divorced from the major traffic arteries of this continent. I know they have done it in the United States and have made a success of it. Because they have done it is no reason why we should do it. The minister has not explained why it is good policy for us to follow completely the United States practice. The bush pilot, the small individual operator, is, I grant, the main operator. We have to look after him.

Mr. HOWE: Who is he to-day?

Mr. ADAMSON: He is the man who built Canadian aviation.

Mr. HOWE: Name two or three.

Mr. AD[illegible] because they have been put out of business by the failure of the mining industry. I tried to talk about the mining industry at some length in the committee a while ago. The Canadian Pacific took certain of them over.

Mr. HOWE: Took them all.

Mr. ADAMSON: No, it did not. It took over the northwest staging route, route to Alaska, the Ginger Coote Airways in Vancouver island, all in the Patricia mining area. In the great gold mining belt of northern Ontario there are no aircraft running, "no birds sing", as the poet said. That is where the railways can never compete with private enterprise. I do not see that allowing the railways into the transcontinental aviation business is going to hurt in any way the small operator. It is to the small operator that we must look for the development of aviation in Canada; and whether he is a small operator hauling week-end traffic in Ontario, or whether he is a small operator who operates out of northern lakes hauling mining machinery for engineers and prospectors in the mines does not matter; the small operator is the man who is going to build up Canadian aviation, because his is and will continue to be a more flexible operation than that of any great transportation system. He is the man who is going to give employment to air and groundcrew. He is going to employ the aircrew who are to-day bombing Germany. The big operators, the transcontinental lines, are going to employ only three or four hundred of these men, at the most. It is the small operator, the man with initiative, who will provide employment for the others. I believe that we must rely on him.

However, I do not feel that if we allow the railway companies to enter the transcontinental field we are in any way jeopardizing the future of the small feeder transport company.

Mr. HOWE: I wish that my hon. friend would suggest how a small operator would start in the north country to-day. All the area is preempted by the railway companies, as far as I know. The hon. gentleman says there are no operations into northern Ontario. I could point to the very considerable number of planes operating out of Hudson, for example.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, into Norway House in the Patricia district; but there is nothing operating—

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend were a small operator, would he care to serve any of that territory to-day in competition with the railways?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, I would operate such an air line to-day—and I am sure I could find the money—if the taxation policy on mining and prospecting operations were revised. I am quite certain that you would find small companies operating out of the great gold camps, such as Porcupine, Kirkland Lake, Noranda, Patricia, Matachewan, Flin Flon, Yellowknife, and so on. I am quite sure you would find an air service from Toronto serving the mines—

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend applied for a licence to-day he would find a railway application filed alongside his. The matter would come before the board of transport commissioners, who would have the option of giving it to a company with a few hundred million dollars of capital or to my hon. friend, with the money he would raise. What does the hon. gentleman think the board would decide to do, under the present legislation?

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not see why they should not decide to have competition.

Mr. HOWE: It was competition that wrecked all the small operations in the north and allowed them to pass into the hands of the railways.

Mr. ADAMSON: It was not competition but the destruction of the prospecting business that ruined the air transportation business. The line from Rouyn to Montreal had, at one time, more passengers than it could carry.

Mr. SLAGHT: But the Canadian Pacific took that over, did they not?

Mr. ADAMSON: The C.P.R. did not kill it. The air line would get you to Montreal in two hours, while on the C.P.R. it was an overnight trip. Even the hon. member for Parry Sound would agree that it was better to get into Montreal in the evening than in the morning.

Mr. SLAGHT: But when the C.P.R. took it over that was the end of it.

Mr. ADAMSON: The C.P.R. did not take it over. If my hon. friend would spend as much time as he should in the north country I think he would realize what happened to the bush pilots and how they have been forced out.

Mr. McNEVIN: I want to offer the minister my full support in this proposal to set up an aeronautics board to control civil aviation and grant licences for any additional interurban or intermunicipal air lines. There is a distinct similarity between the provisions of this measure and those in effect in Ontario, and perhaps other provinces as well, in regard to the granting of franchises for the operation of bus lines. The net result has been to eliminate vicious and destructive competition in the operation of the bus transport system throughout this province. In addition, if the surface transportation companies were granted these licences freely we would build up in Canada one of the greatest transportation monopolies in the world. If these franchises or licences for the operation of air lines had been granted freely, by the time the war is over the whole system would have been bottled up by the great and powerful transportation companies. We should keep these franchises free and untrammeled for the gallant personnel of the Royal Canadian Air Force who are now bearing the burden of this country's air war. We must give these brilliant and capable young men a chance to get into this business, not only as employees but in control of both the financing and operation of many of these important services. I only hope the minister and the administration will hold to this sound policy.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On subsection 5—Routes and conditions.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not clear as to the minister's reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South with regard to designating the routes. I understood the minister to say that it will remain the duty of the governor in council to prescribe aerial routes, and I also understood him to say that this authority would be found in the Transport Act. Is that the case? This bill takes part III out of the Transport Act entirely, and the only reference I can find is in the Aeronautics Act of 1938.

Mr. HOWE: That is true.

Mr. STIRLING: There power is given to the minister, not the governor in council, to prescribe aerial routes, under section 3(f).

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that the way it is to remain?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. My hon. friend is quite right; the provision is in the Aeronautics Act, and has always been there. It is true that the Aeronautics Act gives the power to the minister, but it has been the practice, at least during my term of office, that the route is actually determined by order in council on the recommendation of the minister.

Mr. ADAMSON: Here again the route is definitely prescribed, as I gather from the section.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will recall that it was amended by adding the words "or the area".

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 6—Licence to T.C.A.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this subsection?

Mr. HOWE: Under the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act the Postmaster General and the Minister of Transport jointly recommend to the government a route for T.C.A. The question of jurisdiction has arisen in the past, as to whether the order in council passed by the government assigning a route to T.C.A. was a final designation. In the case of the extension of the T.C.A. from Vancouver to Victoria the board ruled that in spite of the designation by the government the operation of the route was subject to the regulations of the board of transport commissioners, and as my hon. friend will recall, the board ruled that the line could not carry local traffic between Vancouver and Victoria. The purpose of this section is to make it quite clear that the designation of a route by order in council under the T.C.A. act is a final designation and is not subject to review.

Mr. GREEN: And the issue of the licence becomes automatic?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 7—Different licence may be issued.

Mr. GREEN: Is this a new provision?

Mr. HOWE: It is simply a clarification. The present practice is either to accept or to reject a licence. This gives the board power to modify a licence. The board may accept, or may modify, a licence and issue it accordingly.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 8—Appeal to the minister.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Under the existing law, appeals lie to the governor in council, in respect of discretionary matters. What is the reason for the change as set out in this subsection? The transportation committee of the Calgary board of trade have been giving this matter careful study, and they seem to think that this change is extremely dangerous and objectionable. They believe it is extremely dangerous to have appeals of this kind decided by the minister alone. They feel such appeals should go to the governor in council, as the law at present provides. They are conscious of the fact that in nearly all cases appeals to the minister would probably be satisfactory, but they also point out that in the odd case there might be hardships. For that reason they would like to see this clause stand as it stood originally, namely with appeals to the governor in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why would there be hardship?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Is it correct to assume that very few if any appeals were made in the past? If I am correct in assuming that, then I cannot see that the governor in council has been crowded with appeals, or that any undue burden has been imposed upon it. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to explain.

Mr. HOWE: Under the Aeronautics Act the practice is that the minister is designated as the recipient of such authority. As I said earlier, it has been that way since the act was first passed in 1918. Under licensing, a great many appeals occur. It is true that under the Transport Act appeals are addressed to the governor in council. The practice is to gather together a committee of council and formally to hear the appellants. Considerable delay is involved in that procedure, usually a matter of months, before council could deal with an appeal. Appeals are very infrequent. The history of appeals to the governor in council is that, during the lifetime of the board of transport commissioners, none has been granted. When action is taken, it has always been confined to referring back to the board for further study.

There are likely to be a great many appeals in connection with the issuing of licences. A man has his licence cancelled, and he immediately wishes to appeal. I think it would just delay matters to carry such appeals to the governor in council. I believe an appeal to the minister, who is in touch with the situation, and who, if necessary, can consult council, is the more expeditious manner of handling the matter. The minister had sole authority up to 1938, and the minister is designated in this bill as the court of appeal, for the reason that it is felt that in connection with air transport matters the minister can handle appeals much more expeditiously and more satisfactorily for the appellant than could the governor in council.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Section 52 of the Railway Act deals with appeals. If the minister will refer to it he will see that those appeals lie, not with the minister, but with the governor in council.

Mr. HOWE: That is the Railway Act?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes, and these appeals were taken under the provisions of that act. It governs appeals of this kind.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, since 1938.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Have there been many appeals since 1938?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Have there been any?

Mr. MICHAUD: One appeal dismissed.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Is there any reason why the minister could not let this stand? If there has been only one appeal in so many years, would the minister consent to this subsection being changed so that appeals would be taken to the governor in council?

Mr. HOWE: If I believed that in practice an appeal to the governor in council would be more satisfactory than an appeal to the minister, I would certainly change the subsection. I am convinced, however, that the satisfactory method of handling appeals is to the minister.

Mr. GREEN: There has been a widespread demand that this change be made. I move in amendment thereto:

That subsection 8 of section 12 of Bill No. 133 be amended by substituting for the word "minister" therein the words "governor in council".

After all, there is a principle at stake here. In subsection 1 of section 12 the minister is given very wide powers. No licence can be issued without his approval. There is no point in having an appeal to the minister. In my opinion that is not sound. It might work out with the present minister—although I am not so sure it would; but certainly it is not sound in principle.

These boards of trade are right when they say that an appeal should be to the governor in council. It would mean that the whole cabinet must share the responsibility. Of course it would be an appeal only where an application had been refused. I urge that the minister agree to accept this change. Let the appeal be made to the governor in council.

The last time the bill was before the committee for discussion the minister took an arbitrary stand, and made some rather slighting remarks about boards of trade across Canada. I had read a telegram from the board of trade of Vancouver. They have now issued another statement, as a result of what the minister said. This is what they say:

The telegram outlines in full the position our board has taken and will continue to take in regard to matters in which such an important principle is at stake, particularly in the instance of the amendments to the Aeronautics Act, which involves one of the most important and far-reaching industries in Canada.

It does not look right for the minister, who is piloting this bill through the house, to insist that there be no appeal to anyone but himself. I suggest that my amendment should be accepted.

Mr. HOWE: The government has carefully considered whether appeals should lie with the governor in council or with the minister, and has decided that they should lie with the minister. I have heard nothing in the discussion which would indicate that the amendment now proposed is in the interests of sound administration, and I would ask hon. members to oppose the amendment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I desire to join with the hon. member for Vancouver South in support of the amendment proposed by him. All the way along in this bill we are departing from parliamentary principles. Aviation will be one of the largest post-war developments and it is to be placed almost entirely under the minister. The hon. member for Calgary East pointed out that under the Transport Act the appeal was to the governor in council. There is an appeal in name, provided for in this bill, but not an appeal in fact. Section 12, subsection 1, reads:

Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

Subsection 4 reads:

The board shall not issue any such licence unless and until an operating certificate has been issued by the minister to the operator.

And subsection 8 reads:

Where the board refuses to issue a licence,—

Which would have to be done at the request of the minister.

—issues a licence which differs from the licence applied for,—

The minister is the one whose approval must be secured before the board can grant a licence.

—or attaches conditions to which the applicant objects.

Again a licence issued with conditions can be issued only with the approval of the minister. A licence is applied for. It may be issued as applied for or differing from the application, but it can be issued only with the approval of the minister. When a person is dissatisfied with the licence issued or the refusal to issue a licence, his appeal is to the person who originally determined that the applicant could not have a licence or could have a licence only with qualifications. It is not a case of an appeal from the hired man to the hired man's boss; it is an appeal to the person who made the order, to the person who directed the issue of the licence.

The acceptance of that principle would mean in effect the denial of the right of the individual. It places the minister in a position where he would control every person in this country in so far as that person's right to have a licence is concerned. If a case is brought up in the house will an hon. member be able to ascertain why the licence was turned down? Will the minister hide behind his board and say that the board made the decision and that, generally speaking, that decision was accepted by the minister, and beyond that would information be denied? To accept this section without the amendment suggested originally by the hon. member for Calgary East will mean in my opinion that parliament will have no right to investigate, to ascertain the reasons, if there be any, for any arbitrary order that has been made and the order will stand and will not be subject to investigation in parliament.

I ask the support of hon. members on all sides of the chamber for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Why should not the governor in council have the right to determine the question of appeal? What will actually happen will be this: a decision, arbitrary though it may be, once made against an applicant will be final and he will be denied any recourse, or right of appeal. All that is provided for will be a semblance of an appeal whereby the decision will be made behind his back on evidence which will not be made available to him and which had been gathered together by persons he does not know anything about.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Within the last two weeks in the House of Commons in Great Britain the Right Hon. Mr. Morrison on behalf of the government agreed that the time had come when the perpetuation of the making of arbitrary regulations should be controlled or, in any event, be made subject to review by parliament, and agreed that a committee be set up composed of members from all sides of the house to review orders made by bureaucrats often hidden behind closed doors and cloaked in anonymity.

I support this amendment because it will bring to the light of day within cabinet council any arbitrary act or any unfairness or any denial of justice. It is not so much that there may be injustice, and some of the provisions of this bill certainly permit of injustice being perpetuated, but whether there is or not, it is important that persons affected should believe that they are receiving justice. If an order is made against them few will believe that they are receiving justice when denied the right of an appeal to some person who did not make the order complained of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to add a word on this point. If the minister had been in his place on Thursday evening last or if he has perused Hansard he will know that on that occasion I made an appeal to the Minister of National Revenue against the present law relating to appeals from income tax assessments. Under the law as at present the appeal is from Caesar to Caesar. I elaborated at considerable length against that as a non-British practice. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance admitted at once that it was an empty gesture and a waste of time. Upon my pressing the Minister of National Revenue and arguing that the principle was bad, he would not admit it, but he intimated that the department would consider setting up an advisory committee. That does not meet the situation because the appe l will still be to the same jurisdiction. The very fact that the Department of National Revenue is admitting in effect—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member cannot refer to a debate that is already closed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am referring to it merely by way of illustration; I am not criticizing it or anything. I am trying to work up an argument if I have the intelligence to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are having a hard time doing it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am not having a very hard time doing it; I never have a very difficult time.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Citation 293 of standing order 41 states that it is not in order to refer to any debate of the same session on any question that is not under discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not referring to it; I was merely trying to elaborate a principle with respect to an appeal. In that instance the colleague of the Minister of Munitions and Supply in effect assented to the principle for which I was striving. I desire to apply that principle to this bill. That very axiom admits, I think, the injustice of the position taken by the ministry. I beg of the minister to heed the advice and the arguments which are being made with respect to the position that arises by reason of the provisions of this bill. There cannot be a true appeal if the jurisdiction is still confined to the same authority, and that in effect is what exists here to-day. So that I suggest to the minister that, as a matter of common justice to the citizenship of this country, he should give effect to a first and elementary principle of British justice, that an appeal should not be taken from an authority to the same authority. That in effect is what we have here, and it is a violation of an elementary principle of British justice. The minister has control from the beginning to the end, and there is no further opportunity for a citizen or group of citizens who feel aggrieved to get it out of the atmosphere of an administration which has seized jurisdiction and holds on to it like grim death.

I am serious about this. I think the principle involved is absolutely wrong. I should have thought the minister would be glad, once a decision is rendered, to have an appeal vested in a judicial authority which would view the matter dispassionately on its merits and with a view of doing justice as between the subject and the crown, because after all that ought to be one of the fundamental principles of government. With respect, there is a denial of justice here.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is a privy councillor. I suppose he has sat on committees of the privy council that have considered appeals from the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall any.

Mr. HOWE: Probably they were pending at that time: they "pend" for two or three years and then are considered. Perhaps one did not come up in my hon. friend's session. But the purpose of this bill is to set up a workable procedure, and I assure my hon. friend that a workable procedure does not involve an appeal to the privy council, because that just is not a workable procedure. As I have said, since the Transport Act was drawn no appeal to the privy council has succeeded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have been made.

Mr. HOWE: Many have been made; and the farthest that the privy council has ever gone toward reversing a decision is to send the finding back to the board of transport commissioners for a rehearing, with a view to further evidence being made available.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does my hon. friend mean the privy council or the governor in council?

Mr. HOWE: The governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a reason for that, and the reason is that the board of transport commissioners is a judicial body exercising judicial functions. This is not a judicial body.

Mr. HOWE: It is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a ministerial body.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I can read the English language.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will read the English language he will find that on every subject except one the finding of this board is a decision subject only to an appeal to the minister.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The way this is set up it is just like a youngster at school being reprimanded by the teacher and then having to appeal to the teacher.

Mr. HOWE: That may be my hon. friend's view.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think it is right.

Mr. HOWE: If we have a few grown-up people studying the bill we may get different views.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a very improper observation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not think the minister has any call to say anything of the sort. He is too dictatorial.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Too impatient.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think the minister should give our representations a little attention. I am going to vote for this amendment, and I believe the minister will be well advised to consider it carefully. The Minister of National Revenue, with respect to income tax, has a board set up for the purpose of appeals, but he does not sit on that board. If the governor in council looks after this matter it will not be the affair of just one man; it will be the cabinet itself. That is the way it should be, and that is why I am going to vote for the amendment.

Mr. DUPUIS: Listening to the argument advanced by our good friends on the other side—

Mr. GREEN: And the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. DUPUIS: —I recall vividly the days gone by. The hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Lake Centre, in particular, give the signal of so many storms in this house. I say that listening to these gentlemen, and also and especially to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I recall vividly the days gone by, when we were sitting in their places—

Mr. HOMUTH: You will be there again too, in smaller numbers.

Mr. DUPUIS: —and they were sitting here. My good friend the ex-leader of the opposition was at that time a minister of the crown in the Bennett government, and in those days legislation was brought down and submitted to this house which contained powers much more arbitrary than those under discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. HOMUTH: Name one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The marketing board.

Mr. DUPUIS: I will name so many that my hon. friends will be astonished.

Mr. HOMUTH: Name them.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is not a reproach I want to make. I just want to come to this, and I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury will admit what I am going to say. I remember special legislation which was brought down by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Cahan, in which arbitrary power was vested in himself as a minister of the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What bill was that?

Mr. DUPUIS: Being then a young member and having less experience than I have to-day, I took the position which has been taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South—

Mr. HOMUTH: What bill was that?

Mr. DUPUIS: —and the hon. member for Lake Centre. I remember hearing the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, whom everybody will admit was a great parliamentarian, giving us members a lesson.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A lecture, not a lesson.

Mr. DUPUIS: A lecture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He could give you a lesson too. The trouble is you were too obtuse to learn from him.

Mr. DUPUIS: I would go so far as to say that he gave us a lesson. He gave reasons why a minister of the crown should have this delegation of power to himself, and I should like hon. members on the other side to read the remarks made at that time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Name the bill.

Mr. DUPUIS: I have mentioned that legislation brought in by Mr. Cahan.

Mr. STIRLING: What was the legislation, so that we can look it up?

Mr. DUPUIS: It was in 1934.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Never mind "order". The hon. member is referring to a certain bill. We want to know what it is.

Mr. DUPUIS: I know the hon. member is intelligent enough to—

Mr. HOMUTH: We cannot read your mind; no one else could, either.

Mr. DUPUIS: —understand that there is no choice. All this legislation which was brought down by the Bennett government was a hundred times worse in this respect than the matter now under discussion. On the legislation submitted by Mr. Cahan the right hon. gentleman gave a very clear argument in favour of delegating such power to the minister. In this subsection which we are now studying and in connection with which the member for Vancouver South has proposed an amendment, the minister has the power to decide in the last resort—

An hon. MEMBER: Everything.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, but the hon. member must remember that the minister is a member of the privy council. He knows perfectly well, and so does the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that this is so. I am sure the hon. member for York-Sunbury, when he was a member of the round-table, would not be able in those days to pass any legislation which he wished to pass even as a minister unless it had been agreed to by the big boss, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He would not allow anything to pass unless it had been first submitted to him at the council table, and I do not need to be a prophet to know that every time legislation such as we have before us to-night, brought down by the minister of munitions, is introduced, it has been submitted to the cabinet beforehand, and anything that will be decided in accordance with the subsection which is now before us will be decided in the privy council before the final decision of the minister is made. The hon. member for York-Sunbury is a learned lawyer and he knows that very well, so that I think I may quite appropriately repeat the words of Shakespeare, "Much ado about nothing."

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. gentleman has made certain statements with respect to legislation submitted in his day by Mr. Cahan as Secretary of State, and he states that that legislation had even more power than this, or at any rate similar power. So far as most members are concerned, he is talking in riddles. He ought to specify the legislation to which he is referring.

Mr. DUPUIS: All the legislation brought down by the Bennett government.

Mr. HOMUTH: If he is saying that all the legislation passed in those years was of that kind, my hon. friend is talking through his hat. Let him be specific. If he knows of such legislation let him tell us what it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The marketing act.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is entirely different.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is nothing in the marketing act comparable with this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ten times worse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The major piece of legislation introduced by the former Secretary of State was with regard to amendments to the Companies' Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. DUPUIS: And the marketing act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was not brought in by Mr. Cahan at all. The hon. gentleman's memory is bad; he is drawing on his imagination. I am wondering what he rose for anyway, because he has not added to the sum total of the knowledge we have to-night.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As I listened to the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis), I was reminded of the lawyer who, when faced with authorities on the other side, contradicted them, and when the judge asked him that his authority was, answered, "Well, my lord, we can find it somewhere in the books." That is the attitude taken by the hon. gentleman.

There is a question I would ask the minister having regard to the authority which he will have under this subsection and under the other sections if not amended. How soon does the government intend to set up the air transport board? Will the minister permit the board to hear applications for licences before the end of the war? Under this section, if the board were to refuse to issue a licence prior to the end of hostilities, what attitude would the minister take in the matter as a question of policy?

Mr. HOWE: The board will be appointed as quickly as can be arranged, after the act becomes law, and will proceed immediately to receive applications for franchises. Franchises will be granted as soon as the board can be convinced that suitable equipment can be made available to operators. There is no civilian equipment being manufactured at this time available to any air line operator, either here or in the United States. In the United States a few aeroplanes that were taken from air lines in the early days of the war are being returned to those lines, but no new equipment has been sold to any air line, to my knowledge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The proposals are in the dim and distant future, depending on when the war will end and the facilities that are available.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that there is no necessity for this act at this session?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not think so if you cannot get anything to fly with.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend seems to think that applications for airlines are determined by drawing them out of a hat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure him that studies must be made before a route can be designated, or before it can be assigned. Those studies are comprehensive. Applications in the United States usually take at least twelve months to pass through the mill. In Canada, if proper consideration is given, it must be a matter of months to determine whether or not an application should be granted. That is, assuming that we plan to give all air operators a reasonable chance to offer their wares when making an application. That work will be put in hand at once, and operations will commence as soon as the board can be convinced that the equipment and personnel situation is such as to warrant the commencing of operations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, applications will be received from everybody but the railways and the surface transmission lines. The minister some weeks ago made the statement that he knew of no jurisdiction in the world which was allowing railway and steamship companies to operate air transportation.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is he aware of the situation in England and is he willing to retract that statement?

Mr. HOWE: I made no such statement. I said there were certain interior lines in England in which there is a railway interest, not full ownership but a majority interest. I gave that as an example and said I was not aware of a similar situation in any other country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister must have made the statement on another occasion because I was struck by it, and more forcibly struck by the statement that was published almost immediately afterwards that surface carriers, including steamships, control all lines in Britain and that none were national and none owned or controlled by the government. Of course, it goes to show—

Mr. HOWE: Has my hon. friend ever heard of British Overseas Airways?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I have seen them and travelled with some of their pilots. That is international, but that is not what I am driving at. We are dealing here with air communications in the country. That is what this bill will be for. So that the situation is not what the minister represented it to be, as I recall what he said.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will read the debate in full he will find that it was said that the railways in Britain have an interest in the ownership of internal air lines, and the names of the air lines were mentioned in the debate.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rather think that perhaps the government, in spite of the fact that they are threatened seriously, not only by the opposition but by the hon. gentlemen to my left, are trying to swallow the platform of the hon. gentlemen to my left and take full control of any chance that private enterprise may have so far as air lines are concerned. I think back to 1921 and 1922 in the province of Ontario when we had very little control over bus and truck transport, and not as much control over the registration and regulation of private automobiles as we have to-day. I sat on a committee of the Ontario legislature. We spent many months drawing up an entirely new highway traffic act which has been changed very little since that time. We then set up regulations for buses, for private traffic lines, and prepared to give franchises to the bus lines operating on various highways in Ontario. Toward the conclusion of our meetings I suggested that perhaps it might be well if we asked the railways to come in and give us the benefit of any surveys that they might have made of bus and truck traffic. We did approach the railways and they said they had nothing to submit. So far as passengers were concerned the bus traffic was not a particular menace to them at that time, but we see what has happened since. When the buses really became a heavy carrying traffic organization in the province the railways came into the picture and asked for franchises to operate either in competition with existing lines or exclusive lines on certain highways in the province. Those have been granted, and we find that to-day we have built up in Ontario one of the finest systems of bus, truck and railway transportation of any province of the Dominion of Canada. They are doing it in competition with each other; they are doing it in such a way that those who travel by or ship by any one of those means of transportation are getting the very highest type of service. While it is regulated by the government the franchises are not subject to some particular ministerial approval.

I think what we have to watch in this whole picture is that those people who have spent millions of dollars in developing the bus and truck transportation business in this country are not going to be stymied by being subjected to the approval of some particular minister, whether he be the present Minister of Transport or our minister of transport when the election is over.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are getting funny.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is nothing funny about that. You will be inside the tiger. Let me say this, Mr. Chairman. I am very serious about this. The bus companies that are able to serve certain districts and realize that they cannot extend that bus service to outlying districts have spent many thousands of dollars on the development of helicopter service to those particular districts so that they may bring those people into common centres and on to some direct air line, because we are not going to have an air base in every town and city in this country; the thing is impracticable; it is impossible to do. But we can have a central air field where people will come in by feeders, from bus and helicopter service to supply those particular air lines. These things must be worked out, not in competition with each other but in cooperation with each other. Certainly we are not going to be able to do it under this bill. Many of the large bus companies have to-day invested a great deal of money in their business. They are doing a real service to the people of this country. They have been planning for this future development when the war is over, when they can get equipment and supply the helicopter service from one point to another until finally they feed the central point.

This bill puts them in a position where everything is predicated entirely on whether or not the Minister of Transport is willing to let them do it and willing to have them. We are gradually working toward a position in this house where we believe in private enterprise—at least we think we do; we in this group do anyway. We do believe in private enterprise—and the freedom of opportunity, as suggested by my hon. friend—and on the other side of the house they have been so accustomed to regimentation during the past four years, order in council government and the rest of it, that they are trying to out-C.C.F. the C.C.F.ers and bring this whole thing under one control so that private enterprise has no opportunity at all.

Surely hon. members of this committee, not hon. members of this party only, whose ridings are served by private enterprise, whose ridings are served by those people who have invested millions of dollars in truck, passenger and transport service, are not going to sit here and see the whole thing menaced by placing it under the control of any one man whose rule is final and whose judgment may be perhaps, unfortunately, measured by some political expediency. I think what we have to do is to see to it that political expediency does not enter into the post-war period of this country. No cabinet minister should have the power to say "yes" or "no" to something that means so much in the future development of Canada. I am speaking particularly of Ontario and Quebec that have gone far ahead of other provinces in their development of truck and transportation business and that are spending large sums of money on research work, and are trying to build up for the future of this country and the impetus that is going to be given business by immigration and so on, transportation systems that will look after the post-war period. For that reason I think every hon. member who is served by any of those companies, regardless of where he is situated or to what political party he belongs in this house, should see to it that this power is not given to the minister, and that the amendment moved by my hon. friend is carried.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out to my hon. friend that he has chosen a very interesting example in discussing the development of truck and bus franchises in Ontario. That development has been guided by a board, very similar in form to the proposed air transport board, and the authority in that case is exactly the same as the authority in this case.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is an appeal.

Mr. HOWE: An appeal to whom?

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend knows there is an appeal.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did I understand from the minister that no discussions have been held with bus companies in the preliminary study of these matters? I believe that discussions have been held with the railways.

Mr. HOWE: If I remember correctly, one or two applications have been filed by bus companies for helicopter routes. May I explain to my hon. friend that a helicopter route is not a practical matter at the present time. The helicopter has yet to be invented, in a practical form, for running any route. Possibly in ten years there will be practical helicopters and at that time routes of that kind will become important, but at the moment any government would be betraying its trust if it assigned helicopter routes to any bus companies. So far as I know, no bus company has ever applied for an aeroplane route.

Mr. LOCKHART: I made no reference at all to helicopter service, but I understood the minister to say that there had been no discussions with bus companies in connection with any general scheme. I wanted to know why other surface transportation companies had been conferred with, while large bus companies had not been called into consultation.

Mr. HOWE: I think the consultation has been about equal with all forms of surface transportation.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have not many objections reached the minister to subsection 8 of this bill? Have not protests come from all parts of the country that this gave too much authority to any single individual? Would the minister answer that question? I am informed that many protests have been sent in. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: No; there have been very few. As a matter of fact I have had more protests in connection with much less important matters than I have had in this connection. There have been perhaps fifteen or twenty letters.

Mr. ADAMSON: The contention of the Gray Line bus company was that the helicopter was a definitely practical possibility in almost the immediate post-war period, for short hauls.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend know where to buy one?

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand the Stinson company are making them at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: Who?

Mr. ADAMSON: The Stinson company.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the minister indicate why provision should be made at all for an appeal from a board of three to a single individual? Why not leave it with the board and let its decision be final? The hon. member for York-Sunbury drew an analogy which to my mind was compelling, in connection with the operation of the Income War Tax Act. I know of nothing that causes the taxpayer so much dissatisfaction as to find that when he launches his notice of appeal it goes to the commissioner, who gives his decision; then when the appeal is filed it goes directly to the same source. The only justification I have been given for that course of conduct—and I raised this question before I was ever a member of this house—was explained to me in this way. The officers of the department admitted that it was in effect an appeal to the very man who had rendered the decision in the first place, but to their way of thinking it was justified in that the matter came back to the same man, who was required thereby to give more particular attention to it than had been given in the first instance. Of course that was tantamount to admitting that it had not received the attention it deserved in the first place. At that time I was told that by far the greater proportion of those who served notice of dissatisfaction and then pursued their contention to the extent of serving notice of appeal had their grievances dealt with by negotiation. They actually sat down at a table with the interested parties and got down to the merits of the thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had to put up $400 as security for costs, too.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is true. Personally I do not like the theory or the principle enunciated in this bill. I would feel much safer, and would consider that I could justify the position, if the decision of the board in the first instance were made final, with no appeal, rather than to have an appeal to the minister from this board of three men, who have exercised their best judgment. Why should there be an appeal to one man from a board of three? I would much prefer it left with the board. In connection with the question asked from the other side of the house a short time ago, I might add that to-day I received three communications protesting against this principle.

Mr. GILLIS: Evidently there is going to be a vote on this clause, so that I should like to make my position clear. From the discussion that has been carried on to-night it seems to me my hon. friends to my right are very anxious to get the wedge of free enterprise into this bill. I agree with the minister; I think from the start he has taken the proper attitude, in that this very important industry is going to be managed and controlled by the government, and properly so.

Mr. KNOWLES: But not owned.

Mr. GILLIS: He will come to that later. Then I can understand some hon. gentlemen to my right being so anxious about this matter of appeal. You get an appeal in this country under any circumstances if you have enough money. That has been my experience.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no; that is not fair.

Mr. GILLIS: It seems to me that in leaving it with the minister we are making someone directly responsible for seeing that the functions of the board are carried out. If there is dissatisfaction with a decision of the board there is the right of appeal to the minister. The minister is responsible to this House of Commons, which becomes the court of second instance. Then, since the minister has the supreme responsibility for enforcing the act, through the medium of the board, we as members have the right to make him render an account of his stewardship here in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By then the damage is done.

Mr. GILLIS: But it can be corrected. Hon. gentlemen to my right think the appeal should be not to the minister but to the cabinet. I am a little sceptical of that. The cabinet consists of quite a few men, the great majority of whom are not as familiar as the minister is with the workings of this act. An important development might be held up for years awaiting a decision by a body of men who have not the responsibility of administering the act in the first place, and who do not understand it. The next thing you know you will have a commission appointed to find out whether or not you should go ahead with a certain project. In the interests of getting something done I am prepared to place the responsibility, as this bill suggests, in the hands of the minister, who will be handling it through his board. If that board and the minister are not doing the things that should be done to develop the industry, then we in the house are the people to whom they should be answerable.

Mr. HOMUTH: He is handling your coal business in Cape Breton; are you satisfied with it?

Mr. GILLIS: Every once in a while I am going to talk about it in the house. I am glad the fuel business is in the hands of the present minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you satisfied?

Mr. GILLIS: We have made more progress in the last year in connection with exposing the disability of that industry than we have made in the past twenty-five years.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have they cured them?

Mr. GILLIS: We are pulling the smoke-screen from that industry, and getting a fair look at it to-day.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it being changed?

Mr. GILLIS: I am hoping we are going to improve it.

I have risen only to make our position clear. As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to support the minister and place the responsibility in his hands. We are going to hold him responsible in this house, while my hon. friends to the right suggest that the responsibility should be passed along to the cabinet, where no one will be responsible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And then you go out to Port Arthur and defeat him in the next election.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, after the accusations which have been made I think it is only proper that I should satisfy hon. members opposite with respect to certain legislation. My good friends claimed I could not put my finger on such legislation. I say this to them, that I can put my finger on scores of measures like that, in 1934. I would refer first to a section in an act similar to the section we are now discussing. I find one which is a hundred times worse, much more drastic than the one now before the committee. I refer my hon. friends—and what do you call them? Is it "Thomases"?

Mr. HOMUTH: It was Peter who doubted. Your Bible is wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, the hon. member is right; Thomas was the doubter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He had better read it again.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which church did you say you belong to?

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is the hon. member for Lake Centre? I would refer the committee to the statutes of 1934. This is section 9 of the Excise Act passed in that year:

> The minister may for any reason—

"For any reason."

> —which he deems sufficient in the public interest refuse to issue any licence or to grant any privilege authorized by this act, or may suspend, cancel or revoke a licence granted or any privilege given by this act.

Is that similar, or is it worse?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not even a parallel case. It is not comparable. That is the exercise of a ministerial discretion. The two are not the same, at all.

Mr. DUPUIS: And then subsection 2 is as follows:

> The minister may authorize the commissioner to exercise on his behalf the powers, or any of them, conferred on him by this act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a delegation of power to the commissioner.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that not drastic? That is the totalitarian system. Not only had the minister directionary powers; he had full powers.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is the hon. member reading the whole book?

Mr. DUPUIS: No, but I hope my hon. friend will read all the legislation passed by his heretofore friend, Viscount Bennett. If he does that he will be satisfied.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I venture to say that the sections the hon. member has read have been in the Excise Act for fifty years, and have been reenacted. They are only a delegation of power, or a delegation of ministerial authority to a commissioner. In the other case it is the exercise of ministerial discretion. They do not bear the slightest resemblance to the section before the committee to-night.

Amendment (Mr. Green) negatived: Yeas, 22; nays, 43.

Mr. GRAYDON: The majority is getting less all the time.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 9—Cancellation or suspension of licence.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain this subsection?

Mr. HOWE: This subsection gives the board power to suspend or to cancel a licence, in case an operator has not carried out the regulations.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 10—Appeal.

Mr. GREEN: Subsection 10 is even more objectionable than subsection 8. This provides for an appeal where a licence has been suspended. Subsection 8 referred to the issuing of a licence. If an applicant did not receive his licence, he might appeal; but subsection 10 covers the man who has actually received his licence, and has then had it cancelled or suspended. Again the appeal is only to the minister. There is a further power of cancellation or suspension in section 13 of the act, a power which is even more drastic than the one we are discussing. The board is authorized under section 13 to investigate all existing licences, and is given carte blanche to suspend or cancel any of those licences. I presume, if there is any appeal at all in the event of such drastic action, it must be to the minister.

I suggest to the committee that this is a clear case where the appeal should be to the governor in council, and not to the minister. In the legislation being brought before the house there is a distinct trend away from cabinet responsibility, and toward giving ministers absolute out-and-out power in everything. I suggest that is a dangerous trend, and one which should be stopped. I presume this practice has arisen because during the war years the government has passed so many orders in council it has simply got into the habit of doing things by short-cuts.

However, the bill before the committee is not a measure for the war period. This is a measure concerning civil aviation, and it sets out the domestic aviation policy of Canada for the post-war years. We should not have any short-cut war measures in connection with this bill. What it amounts to is this, that anybody wishing to obtain a licence or anybody who, having obtained a licence, has had it cancelled or suspended, will have to go hat-in-hand to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, or whoever is in charge of civil aviation at that time, and try to make a good fellow of himself, in the hope that he may get some consideration. That is not a good enough way to build up a great system of civil aviation in Canada. It cannot be done in that way.

I move in amendment, therefore:

That subsection 10 of section 12 of Bill No. 133 be amended by substituting for the word "minister" therein the words "governor in council".

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, the purpose is to set up a board that will control civil aviation. We will assume that the government intends to place in charge of civil aviation in this country a board that will carefully consider its position and make its judgments after due examination. This bill gives the appellant the right to go to the minister and tell its story. It can go to the minister as a matter of right. If the minister believes that the board has acted too harshly, he can ask the board to reconsider the matter. This is a similar procedure to that explained by the Minister of National Revenue. He can ask the board to have another look at the problem. I think that is as far as any minister would logically go. From my own experience in government, I do not believe that any minister, on his own authority, would reverse the finding of a board.

I think what he would do is just what the governor in council has been doing for years with appeals from the board of transport commissioners. The minister would ask the board to reexamine its finding. The reason why the minister is mentioned in the bill, rather than the governor in council, is to have appeals dealt with expeditiously. Appeals to the governor in council become automatic, because the delay involved works on the side of the applicant. This delay has prevented the removal of rail lines which should have been removed; it has prevented the abandonment of services which deserved to be abandoned. It has simply been another way of getting an extension of several months. An appeal to the minister can be made quickly, and it cannot be made the means of delay, as is the case with railway applications.

Amendment (Mr. Green) negatived: yeas, 17; nays, 29.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 11 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the committee to revert to section 11. At the previous sitting an amendment to this section was moved and carried, but earlier during this sitting the Chairman called section 11 carried, whereas it should have been called "carried with amendment". The amendment was that the section be amended by inserting the following as paragraph (i) after paragraph (h):

Prescribe maximum hours and other working conditions for pilots and co-pilots employed by any air carrier.

The remaining paragraphs were to be relettered (j), (k) and (l). I am just calling the attention of the Chairman to the fact that section 11 should be passed as amended.

On section 6—part II—new section 13—Reviewing of former licences.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before we proceed with this section may I suggest that here is the appropriate place to insert the amendment to subsection 12 to provide an appeal on questions of law to the supreme court.

Mr. HOWE: I propose to insert a new section 18 to cover that.

Mr. GREEN: Section 13 is drastic and I think the minister should explain why it is included in the bill. This section gives the air transport board the power to cancel or suspend any licence in existence at the time the board commences its work. In 1938 when the Transport Act was passed setting up the board of transport commissioners just the reverse procedure was followed. Those companies that had licences continued to operate, but now for some reason or another all licences have to be reviewed and the board may cancel or suspend any of them. Why is it necessary to take such drastic powers? Are there licences outstanding which the minister thinks should be cancelled?

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this section is to allow the board a reasonably free hand to reorganize the air transport services of Canada. I can assure my hon. friend that the section in question will not be used in an arbitrary way, but the board must have power to regroup the air lines in a more orderly way than the present.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any appeal from these cancellations?

Mr. HOWE: No appeal.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the licences are from year to year in any event.

Mr. HOWE: Not necessarily; they are for such time as the minister may decide.

Mr. GREEN: Are not licences granted yearly?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is true; they are renewed every year.

Mr. GREEN: Why the necessity of this section? It could not be longer than a year before all licences would expire automatically. When the licences are renewed the conditions which the minister wishes to impose could be put in the new licences. Why give the board the power to cancel existing licences?

Mr. HOWE: This is just to serve notice that the board have the power. A licence could be allowed to expire and not be renewed, but it has never been the practice to do that. Notice is being served that the board has the right to cancel licences.

Mr. GREEN: Could not that be done by letters to the licencees? There are not a great number of them. It seems to me that that would be a far better way to do it rather than putting an arbitrary section of this type in the statute. This section will be of no value once the board has reviewed all the licences. I suggest that it would be far better to send out a letter pointing out that all licences will expire at the end of the year and that they will not be renewed without further consideration being given to them.

Mr. HOWE: The government believes it desirable to serve notice on all air lines that the new board will have the power to cancel franchises. It seems a desirable way. Simply a letter from an official of the department to the licencees might not be considered sufficient notice.

Mr. GREEN: They all know now that their licence is good only for a year, do they not?

Mr. HOWE: Well, they know that technically, but they all believe that the licences are continuing licences.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a public announcement that the crown is going in for government control.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the government is allowed to regroup the present lines under this section, what provision is there for compensation in case any particular line is damaged?

Mr. HOWE: There is no compensation for a franchise. Franchises are not for sale. They are the property of the crown. There is no compensation for the cancelling of a franchise. Compensation may arise out of facilities installed on air lines or equipment used in the operation of air lines, but franchises are not for sale.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where is the compensation, then, in case the facilities are no longer usable by that company or nothing can be got for them in case they are sold?

Mr. HOWE: That will have to be considered.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister expects that civil aviation in this country is going to develop and there are going to be any number of private lines, whether they be large or small, I certainly believe that the provisions of this bill as we now have them before us will prevent any capital from ever flowing into the civil aviation or transport industry in Canada. It will remain a pure government monopoly, and it will probably wither, as nearly all government monopolies do, because they have not the enterprise, vigour and freedom that private enterprise gives. One of the first things that is going to happen from the passing of this measure is that young men, the ones with vision in this industry, will leave Canada, resign from the existing private air transport companies, and go to the south. Already many of them have had offers from the companies there; and we are going to find that the air transport industry here will be on a much diminished scale compared with what it would be if we allowed free enterprise and permitted these various companies some assurance that the investments which will be made in them will be given a fair opportunity to earn a return. As it is, the minister says that they have a licence for only one year, which may be cancelled at any time; yet as sensible people they believe that the government or this department will adopt a sensible attitude, and that the privilege or the licence will be renewed from year to year. Now the minister wishes to insert in this bill clauses which will allow their facilities to be taken over without any compensation whatsoever. All I can say is that this bill is a complete warning to private capital to stay entirely out of the air transport industry in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—part II—new section 14—Former licences continued.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to correct an error in the printing of the bill, and to amend section 14, line 41, by striking out the words "on or after" after the word "valid" and substituting therefor the words "one year after". "On or" should read "one year."

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. KNOWLES: That explains a lot.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GREEN: In section 12, subsection 2, the minister has provided that no company engaged in any other form of transportation shall have an air line, and when he made his speech in March in which he gave the policy of the government on domestic aviation he said that the railway companies were to be forced out of the air business within a year after the war. This section 14 goes much further than that; not only does it purport to cancel licences which have been issued to railway companies, but it cancels all licences. Why is it necessary to do that?

Mr. HOWE: What others are there?

Mr. GREEN: I do not know. There is one. I understand, in the maritimes. Why should all the licences be cancelled at that time?

Mr. HOWE: It seems the simplest way to do it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Part of your reorganization, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There is, I think, only one licence outstanding other than railway licences.

Mr. GREEN: There might be quite a few others before this date set, which is one year after the termination of the war.

Mr. HOWE: I have great confidence that the board would not issue a licence and then cancel it, except for cause.

Mr. GREEN: The minister thinks there will be no new licences issued before the expiration of this period does he; that is, before one year after the end of the war?

Mr. HOWE: Well, this section refers to the old licences.

Every licence issued under part III of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the air regulations, 1938. . . .

Those are the only licences referred to in this section.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6—part II—new section 15 agreed to.

On section 6—part II—new section 16—Governor in council may grant assistance.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister explain this, please?

Mr. HOWE: As I explained earlier in the debate, the practice in the past has been to assist the establishment of a new line by granting a subsidy through the post office—a subsidy, rather than a payment for services rendered. The post office objects to the principle—I think the principle is not very sound—of paying too high a price for the transportation of mail simply for the purpose of assisting the establishment of a new air line. The policy which the government intends to follow in future is that the post office will pay a reasonable amount for the carriage of mail. If a further subsidy is required, to permit the establishment of the line, the subsidy will be paid as a subsidy from funds voted by parliament for that purpose. We believe that is a much more honest way of subsidizing new operations, than to do so by giving an abnormally large rate for the carriage of mail.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does this change in principle mean that the T.C.A. contract with the post office will now be revised according to the new principle?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend, as a member of the committee on Canadian National Railways, should not suggest that the T.C.A. is subsidized. My hon. friend knows very well that the T.C.A. turns in a very large profit to the post office for the carriage of air mail.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am just asking a question.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend sit down, please? We like wisdom, but not too much of it at one time. My hon. friend knows very well that the post office does not subsidize the T.C.A. In the initial stages, it did subsidize T.C.A. to the extent that it paid more for the carriage of air mail than it received as revenue from air mail; but that situation has vastly changed, and to-day T.C.A. is a source of revenue to the post office rather than the subject of subsidy.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am merely asking the minister whether or not this new principle which he thinks is fairer—the post office having objected to the principle of it being represented as subsidizing the T.C.A., even though it may work in reverse at times—will apply to a renegotiated contract between T.C.A. and the post office.

Mr. HOWE: There is no need for such a contract.

Mr. JACKMAN: The old contract will continue?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In so far as men returning from overseas are concerned, handicapped as they will be by lack of capital, is it intended under this section that capital assistance shall be given them to enable them to commence or develop or carry on civil aviation? Recently, in an interview or a statement by the minister, published in Canadian Aviation, he referred to the matter of capital assistance. I rise now to ask whether it is intended to be the policy of the department or of the minister that capital assistance shall be given these men; for if that is not the policy I cannot see how these men returning from overseas, with merely a few hundred or a thousand dollars at the outset, will be able to commence a development of the kind suggested by the roseate picture which the minister drew when he originally outlined the policy with regard to aviation.

Mr. HOWE: I have more confidence than my hon. friend in the men returning from overseas.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know so much about that.

Mr. HOWE: The men returning from overseas after the last war established air lines and did very well for a considerable number of years. I am not altogether sure that the men returning from this war will not have as much initiative as those men. However, this section will give the board the authority to recommend to the government that assistance be given to newly established air lines, whether capital or by way of operating subsidy. The power is there to draw on funds appropriated by parliament for either purpose, but I do not suggest that any group of airmen can expect as a matter of right to have the government furnish all the capital that will be needed for the operation. That is not the intention. The purpose of a small operation is to make sure that investment in the enterprise will be an inducement to the operator to give service to the area for which he is responsible. That financial inducement is a desirable part of any small private enterprise that will have a part in the plan for the future.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it the intention of the minister to make available to the men who return from overseas aircraft that might be used for civil aviation, selling those aircraft on a time basis so as to enable them to finance themselves in the initial stages? When the war is over, large numbers of aircraft owned by the Canadian people will be available for civil aviation purposes, and I suggest that consideration be given to permitting the sale of them on a time basis to these men to enable them to have at least certain facilities available so that they can establish for themselves air services, whether on a small or on a large basis.

Mr. HOWE: It is the policy of the government to-day to sell used military aircraft. It is doing so every day, and arrangements can be made for sale on time, but it would be very unwise for any group of returned men to buy used military aircraft to start a civil line. Military aircraft are not suitable for the purpose, and therefore I would not care to say anything to-night that would suggest to returned men that the way to establish a civil airline is by the use of military equipment. Returning men will be much wiser to buy proper aircraft, built for the purpose, and I have no doubt that the government will find ways and means of giving such assistance as may be needed to enable them to do so.

Mr. JACKMAN: In the wording of the section there is nothing to prevent the governor in council from authorizing the minister to grant a subsidy to T.C.A. The reason why I bring this question up is this. In the Winnipeg Free Press of April 11 there appears the following:

> An extraordinary feature of aviation is the proportion of the total costs borne by the taxpayer on the one hand and the operating companies on the other. Startling examples of this have been given in the Free Press. For instance, the capital of Trans-Canada Air Lines is about $4½ millions, compared with the $96 millions carried by the public in the shape of airports, emergency landing fields, weather services, beacons and the like.

So that T.C.A. shows a small nominal profit on a very nominal capital of four and a half millions, and yet it has a service of $96 million provided for it of a capital nature. One would say, before this bill was introduced, that these services would be available to other air transport companies, but according to the terms of this bill we find that other companies will be divested of their air transport facilities and that any new capital that might enter the field will be frightened away. I would ask the minister the question, coupling with it the question I have already put to him, whether he will be allowed to bonus T.C.A. under this section. I do not often use T.C.A., but at Easter I was at the airport at Lethbridge coming back from Calgary and there I saw a T.C.A. plane being serviced by an American army truck with gasoline. I could not help wondering what an American army truck, no doubt at the cost of the United States, was doing servicing our T.C.A. planes. Perhaps there was an arrangement, but it seemed most extraordinary. When we got to North Bay, where we had to get off, I saw, as a small item of expense, a safe in the office marked "Canadian National Railways". One wonders who pays for what in T.C.A., and whether the profit is a real profit or actually comes from other public sources such as the publicly-owned Canadian National Railways. I would ask the minister how it is that these items can be reconciled with fair management and with a fair table of operating costs which are directly applicable to T.C.A. and not in the shape of indirect bonuses at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: So far as I know, T.C.A. is not bonused by the United States government. Lethbridge is on the northwest staging route, and if my hon. friend will follow that route he will find American trucks servicing Canadian planes and Canadian trucks servicing American planes, but more Canadian trucks servicing American planes than vice versa. I hope that explains why, on the northwest staging route, which handles some eighty per cent American planes to twenty per cent Canadian planes, the situation referred to can take place. As regards the safe in the T.C.A. office, I suppose it is a matter of saving money by buying a second-hand safe or perhaps borrowing a safe. At any rate, that is not a large transaction. My hon. friend sits in the committee that examines T.C.A. affairs each year, and since he is acquainted with the operations of the line I do not need to explain them to him.

Section agreed to.

Section 6—part II—new section 17 agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask my colleague to move an amendment, which will be section 18 of part II?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that the following be inserted as section 18:

> (1) An appeal shall lie from the board to the Supreme Court of Canada upon a question of jurisdiction or a question of law, or both, upon leave therefor being obtained from a judge of the said court upon application made within one month after the making of the order, decision, rule or regulation sought to be appealed from or within such further time as the judge under special circumstances shall allow, and upon notice to the parties and the board, and the costs of such application shall be in the discretion of the judge.
>
> (2) On the hearing of any appeal, the court may draw all such inferences as are not inconsistent with the facts expressly found by the board, and are necessary for determining the question of jurisdiction, or law, as the case may be, and shall certify its opinion to the board, and the board shall make an order in accordance with such opinion.

(3) The court may fix the costs to be paid upon such appeals, and the rules and practice applicable to appeals from the exchequer court shall be applicable to appeals under this section.

We have to renumber sections 18 to 22. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just one question. Would the minister explain subsection 2?

Mr. HOWE: It is taken from the Railway Act, subsection 6 of section 52.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6—part III—new section 19—Regulations to be published.

Mr. KNOWLES: With the renumbering I am not just sure where we are. I wish to ask a question about section numbered 19 in the printed form. Have we arrived at that one?

Mr. GRAYDON: Part III is advanced one in each case.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with what was section 19, which I now take is section 20, may I ask whether the laying of these regulations before parliament gives parliament a chance to discuss them in any way?

Mr. HOWE: Parliament can discuss them on the appropriate occasion. Any order in council tabled in parliament can be discussed, either on the minister's estimates or at another appropriate time.

Mr. KNOWLES: They can only be discussed. They have the force of law before they reach that point.

Mr. HOWE: That is right, yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 6—part III as new sections 20 to 23 inclusive, agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TRANSPORT ACT

AMENDMENT TO REMOVE COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES FROM JURISDICTION OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 101, to amend the Transport Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not recall that the Transport Act was on the agenda for to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was an inadvertence when the business of the house was announced. This is a conjoint bill with the one we have just passed. It has been discussed in the past immediately after the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was not an oversight on our part.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was just an inadvertence.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope that the minister does not expect us to take responsibility for the inadvertence. I did not understand that we were to go on with the Transport Act to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This bill naturally goes along with the one we have just passed. It has been called every night with the other one. Any contentious sections will stand over to another occasion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—"Harbour toll".

Mr. KNOWLES: Before we go any farther may I ask one omnibus question about this bill? Some of the members of the cabinet may wonder at my asking this question after a criticism about the assurance given on the earlier one. I should like to know if there is anything in this bill other than changes made necessary by the bill we have just passed?

Mr. MICHAUD: Nothing at all. This is merely an amputation bill. The Transport Act is being amputated to the extent that all references to commercial air services are removed and repealed as a consequence of the passing of bill 133, which has just been read a third time and which places the control of commercial aviation under the aeronautics board and act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister state definitely that there is nothing new in this bill?

Mr. MICHAUD: All negative.

Mr. GRAYDON: If this bill passes and becomes law it will be removed entirely out of the minister's department?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. Control of civil aviation will be moved from the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the question exactly. I want to know that. From then on it comes under the Minister of Munitions and Supply rather than under the Department of Transport.

Mr. MICHAUD: The administration of the Aeronautics Act will come under the Minister of Munitions and Supply for the time being.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not a question of the time being; it is a question of it being taken out altogether, is it not?

Mr. MICHAUD: No; it was taken from under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport by order in council in June, 1940.

Mr. GRAYDON: And this makes it permanent?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. The bill we have just adopted defines the minister as meaning the Minister of Transport or such other minister as may be designated by the governor in council to administer the act.

Mr. GRAYDON: You do not mean to tell me the governor in council has anything to say?

Mr. MICHAUD: Sometimes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not after what happened in the debate to-day.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Offences of licencees or agents.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the Minister of Munitions and Supply can spare a moment I should like to know whether there is anything comparable with this section in the air transport bill, covering the same situation.

Mr. HOWE: No, Mr. Chairman. As I pointed out to the committee when the air transport bill was under discussion, it has not been the policy to prescribe all the regulations that will necessarily be formulated by the new board. In turning over the administration of the airways to the board of transport commissioners, our difficulty has been that this board was too tightly bound by legislation. All the legislation that had been passed in connection with the railways was brought to bear on the air transport system, and the course of the board was often determined by legal reasons that were not practical reasons, and not reasons that judgment brought to bear on the question would indicate to be desirable. In the Aeronautics Act the purpose is to have the board build up its own jurisprudence as time goes on, meeting each situation as it will arise.

Mr. KNOWLES: By jurisprudence the minister means the regulations to which he referred?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Michaud.]

On section 11—Special rate notices to create trade may be permitted.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Because of the fact that ships are able to pick up freight in central Ontario, take it down the St. Lawrence and around to Vancouver, we have a cheaper shipping rate to Vancouver by water than to Alberta by rail. In some cases it is cheaper to ship to Vancouver by water and then to Alberta by rail than to send a shipment direct by rail to Alberta. What is the reason for that?

Mr. MICHAUD: The rates charged by rail and water transportation companies have been subject to the control of the board of transport commissioners since the Transport Act was enacted in 1938. That was one of the main objects in mind in passing that act. There are differentials of all kinds in the rates for the transportation of goods by rail; there are differentials in the rates for transportation by water, and there are differentials as between rail and water transportation. These rates are established by the board of transport commissioners, who have the advice of the rate experts of different transportation companies, who consult with the experts of the board. I have not before me the details or the schedules of all these rates, but they are made by order of the board and are subject to appeal if anyone is dissatisfied with them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are all the ports of Canada under the jurisdiction of the dominion government?

Mr. MICHAUD: All ports are subject to some control under some laws of the dominion, but I think the hon. gentleman means to ask whether all ports are under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board. The answer is that not all ports are under their jurisdiction.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Aeroplanes are out of the picture now, as far as this board is concerned?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then who is to be responsible for the regulation of air traffic in the various ports? I am thinking of the Toronto harbour, which is under the control of the Toronto harbour commission. Who is to be responsible for the regulation of air traffic in that harbour?

Mr. MICHAUD: The aeronautics board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Might I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply who is to have jurisdiction over the coming and going of aeroplanes in a harbour such as that of Toronto?

Mr. HOWE: The city of Toronto owns and administers the airport under the regulations of the air transport board. All aviation is carried on under the direction of federal authority.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in mind particularly the operation of seaplanes.

Mr. HOWE: They come under the control of the air transport board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Who will have the final say as to how they are to come and go?

Mr. HOWE: The air transport board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The harbour commissioners will have nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. HOWE: The harbour commissioners will operate the seaplane base, just as they operate the land plane base, as the owners; they will direct traffic in connection with both, in accordance with the rules laid down by the air transport board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They will direct traffic of the air boats, not the steam boats.

Mr. MICHAUD: The harbour of Toronto, so far as navigation by water is concerned, is independent in making its regulations for incoming and outgoing boats. I understood my hon. friend to ask whether rates for transportation of goods into that harbour would be under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners. I believe they will continue under the jurisdiction of that board, inasmuch as it has been given jurisdiction by the Transport Act of 1938. This change will not affect the movement of goods into or out of the port of Toronto by water.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As I understand it, the harbour commissioners have the regulation of all traffic in the harbour.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We shall now have two controls in Toronto harbour. The board connected with civil aviation will now come into the picture and, I suppose, will make regulations. I understand that the harbour commissioners will have to carry those out. Is that correct? Who will have the final say in the matter?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought the minister was going to answer.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I thought so, too. I should like to know something about it, as to how it is to be arranged.

Mr. HOWE: May I explain the air matter. The owner of an airport who is also the operator of the airport, has charge of traffic on that airport. But there are certain rules of the air laid down by the air transport board, and those rules must be obeyed. They are made in the interests of safety, and the operator of an airport must carry them out. If an airport is licensed, to maintain that licence it must live up to the traffic and safety rules laid down by the air transport board. Similarly, railroads must operate according to safety regulations laid down by the board of transport commissioners, and marine traffic must be regulated in the interest of safety, according to the rules laid down by the Department of Transport at Ottawa.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

Bill reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 18, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) presented the second report of special committee on social security, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC ELECTION

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MR. DUMOULIN AS TO EXEMPTIONS FROM MILITARY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice —and perhaps, as he is not in his seat at the moment, he may take this as a notice, and also the Minister of Labour, whose parliamentary assistant is in his seat now and would perhaps take this as a notice—to the desirability of investigating a report which appears in nearly all the newspapers this morning and refers to mobilization matters in the province of Quebec, and also, I think, touches upon the question of the defence of Canada regulations. This is the statement which I read in the Canadian press:

Mr. Dumoulin, member of the legislative assembly for Montmorency for the last five years—

And who is Liberal candidate.

—was quoted as saying—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Dumoulin said:

Go to all parishes of this county and you will see that young men are as numerous everywhere as before the war. I have done everything possible in order that you may forget that there is a war on and that we have got mobilization.

I should like the ministers to investigate that, because it seems to me that, first of all, it is an interference with the mobilization regulations, and secondly, a breach of the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question which should not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely if this question cannot be asked in this house no question can be asked. As leader of the opposition I have the right to ask the government to investigate so serious a statement as this, because four years ago a prominent man of the same province was interned for a similar sort of statement. Perhaps this has not been correctly reported, and I am asking only for an investigation, not that anything be done before inquiry is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must reluctantly call your attention to citation 298, Beauchesne, third edition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, now—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would be very grateful if the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) would behave himself.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister said you would have that job only during good behaviour, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The rule states:

Questions asked orally on the orders of the day being called must not be prefaced by the reading of letters, telegrams, newspaper extracts or preambles of any kind.

I think the rules of this house should be observed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The leader of the opposition has some leeway.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leader of the opposition and everybody else must abide by the rules of this house.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: The government must submit to proper inquiry.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO REPORTED EVICTIONS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a matter that was brought to his attention yesterday by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) with regard to a soldier's wife and family in Toronto who received notice that they were to be evicted yesterday. Postponement of the proceedings was procured. The Prime Minister advised that the matter would receive consideration at an early meeting of the cabinet. Is the Prime Minister in a position now to advise what course is being taken by the government to assure housing facilities, particularly for the wives and families of soldiers who are evicted and are unable to secure other housing accommodation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not able to give my hon. friend at the moment the information he is asking for.

TRANSPORT ACT

AMENDMENT TO REMOVE COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES FROM JURISDICTION OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of bill No. 101, to amend the Transport Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms service.

13. Central experimental farm, $633,787.

Mr. SENN: What is the reason for the increases this year?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The increases are: salaries, $2,640; cost of living bonus and other items, $3,662; equipment, $2,065; supplies and materials, $2,185; feed, $1,535; travelling expenses, $2,340. That makes a total of $14,427.

Mr. SENN: As a rule the experimental farms are given up to experiments, but there are some farms that are used for purposes of illustration to demonstrate to the farmers how they should carry on. I know it is difficult for an experimental farm to pay its own way, but I would like to know to what extent the central experimental farm accomplishes this. In other words, what is the income from the sale of different lines of produce from the farm. We have the cost of running the farm, but is there any way of separating experimental activities from other work that is done? If so, how do they come out in separating one from the other?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt very much whether it is possible to separate them entirely. I have here the expenditures on the different activities. Most of these are experimental. Take this particular item of feed. There is an increase of $1,535 and I would assume that has something to do with the experience which farmers have had on all farms in the last year. Crops were poorer than usual and there has been an increase in the purchase of feed. That feed would be entirely used up in carrying on experiments in connection with live stock. In some years they may have a small surplus which is sold—fruit, vegetables, poultry and other commodities. These things are used in experimental work but there may be some products that are sold, though that is not the intention behind the work of the farm. It is not intended that the farm should be operated to make a profit.

Mr. SENN: I understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: You have losses if you do certain things on a farm, and you make a profit if you do certain other things, but I am afraid I have not the figures here. When the officials come we may be able to give that.

Mr. SENN: Could the minister not give us the total sales of farm products from the central experimental farm last year? I understand that a certain number of cattle and hogs were sold.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that I have the figures here at the moment.

Mr. SENN: They operate on a rather large scale.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid I shall have to ask the committee to wait until the officials come; I do not think I have them here. Let the item stand.

Item stands.

Experimental farms service.

14. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $1,396,776.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like information as to what has been accomplished at the central experimental farm and the farm at Summerland with regard to the substance which it is hoped will be of benefit in dealing with the codling moth. It is known at the present time as D.D.T.

Mr. GARDINER: I think we can best utilize the time until the officials come by giving the committee a recital of what is being done in connection with a number of experiments on plants having to do with rubber, dandelion and that kind of thing, at the different farms. I have a review of it here. Questions were asked when I was before the committee last and I think if I put this on Hansard it will probably take up the time until my officials are here and I can answer these questions in detail.

Rubber. We have ten acres at Ottawa, and there are six hundred acres in Peterborough county, this larger area being financed by the Department of Munitions and Supply. We also have plots on almost every experimental farm across Canada. Some of these have been successful and others have not.

Dandelions. Six acres are being grown at Ottawa, and we also have plots on most of the experimental farms across Canada. In some cases we have obtained good stands, while in other cases the stands have been very poor. Some plots of dandelions were seeded in 1942 and the material was harvested and turned over to the national research council for rubber extraction. Research has also been done as to species and strains, and the rubber evaluation is being done jointly by the science service of the Department of Agriculture and the national research council.

Wool research laboratory. This has been anticipated for a number of years as a field laboratory, not in any way to study uses, as that is being done by the national research council. The purpose of this field laboratory will be to study the evaluation of fibre in the fleeces, both before and after shearing, as a basis for our breeding work with Corriedales, Romnolets, and our high class imported Rambouillets. All these sheep are located in south western Saskatchewan and southern Alberta.

It has been agreed by the national research council, the Canadian national wool growers, and the Department of Agriculture, that Lethbridge is probably the most logical place for the location of this laboratory. The establishment of this laboratory will make possible a more intensive study of wool as a basis for breeding than has been possible in the extensive grading of fleeces in the wool growers' warehouse at Weston, Ontario, where fleeces are studied annually by a special wool committee consisting of representatives of the national research council and dominion experimental farms.

Linseed varieties of flax. The standard varieties suited to western Canada are Bison and Redwing, both of which are susceptible to rust which has become more prevalent in recent years. A new rust-resistant strain has been registered under the name Royal, which is as heavy in yield as Bison and Redwing and is sufficient in resistance to rust so that the disease does not materially reduce the yield.

Some newer and even more promising strains of linseed flax are being produced at the central experimental farm to meet western conditions, and it is hoped that at least one of these may be multiplied in the near future to either take the place of Royal or to supplement it in rust areas.

Kapok. At the request of the national research council in 1942, a considerable tonnage of milkweed pods was collected with the aid of school children, largely in Carleton county, Ontario. These pods were matured and the floss was extracted by a small hand machine originated by the experimental farms service and the science service. This floss was turned over to the national research council for study as to its value to replace kapok in life belts and fliers' buoyant suits, and similar purposes. In every test it showed buoyancy and water-resisting qualities quite equal to that of first class kapok.

It is of interest to note that the United States had similar results, and in order to guarantee an adequate supply of kapok substitute they entered into a contract with Doctor Boris Berkman of Chicago, who originated a special machine somewhat similar to a cotton gin for separating the milkweed floss from the seed. It is understood that the contract which the United States naval department entered into with Doctor Berkman called for 1,000,000 pounds of floss in 1943, 2,000,000 pounds in 1944, and 3,000,000 pounds in 1945.

The Department of Munitions and Supply at Ottawa have not signified any desire that the Dominion Department of Agriculture produce this material in quantity.

Rust-resistant grains. The cereal division at the central experimental farm, Ottawa, and through its staff at the dominion rust research laboratory, Winnipeg, is continuing to study the possibility of producing rust-resistant grains of all kinds, of superior quality and higher yields than those already discovered.

Two very promising new varieties of oats are in process of being multiplied for distribution, and these should be superior to Vanguard, which is a stem rust-resistant variety, and to Erban, which is a leaf rust-resistant variety. These new varieties combine resistance to both forms of rust.

The experimental farm at Brandon is specializing in the development of new rust-resistant barleys, and already two new varieties that are exceedingly promising are being multiplied.

The experimental station at Swift Current, Saskatchewan, has developed a variety particularly adapted to the drought areas, namely Prospect barley, which is now so widely used in south western Saskatchewan and south eastern Alberta.

Sawfly-resistant wheats. The experimental station at Swift Current has for many years been studying the possibility of developing a high quality wheat which is of a solid stem character, hence not susceptible to loss from the sawfly.

Remarkable progress has been made, and two strains have been developed with quality comparable to that of marquis wheat but which will have very definite resistance to sawfly damage.

It is probable that in 1945 there may be some considerable volume of these two strains available for distribution. The staff engaged in rust-resistant laboratory work and plant breeding at Winnipeg consists of Mr. C. H. Goulden, agricultural scientist, Mr. J. N. Welsh, agricultural scientist, and Mr. R. F. Peterson, agricultural scientist, as well as junior assistants and seasonal student assistants. Work is being carried on right across the country in connection with these different products. Questions were asked about them at the time my estimates were before the committee previously, and I give this information now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I have to go to the banking and commerce committee, may I ask the minister whether there has been any extension of the research in regard to potato plant diseases in New Brunswick? I regret to see that the amount to be voted for these branch farms and illustration stations again has been reduced. I assume, of course, that this is due to the stress of war expenditures, but it seems to me a bit ineffective to cut down the work and have just a skeleton operation. I refer to the question of poultry at the Fredericton station, where they have a poultryman in charge. He is a full-time man, and under ordinary circumstances I think has an assistant. Since the farm foreman has been superannuated I believe the poultryman has temporarily taken over the farm management, and the assistant is now carrying on, but he has only three hundred hens, and of course that is ridiculous having regard to the size of the division, the housing capacity and so on. I wonder just why this work has been cut down to these skeleton proportions, though the cost remains approximately the same. It seems to me the staff and the quantum of the stock in hand could be kept up if they are going to maintain the division in operation. The minister may not have this information before him at the moment, but perhaps at a later stage he will put on the record just what is the position.

Mr. PERLEY: Like the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I have to go to the banking and commerce committee, but I should like to say a word on this item. At page 97 of the report of the department, reference is made to the work carried on at some of the branch stations, including Indian Head, with which I am particularly concerned. The minister has covered part of the ground I was going to ask him about, with respect to rust-resistant oats and other grain, but I notice quite a reduction in this item. I hope there will not be any reduction in the amount devoted to experimental work at these branch stations. In Saskatchewan we have two or three of these stations doing very excellent work, particularly the one at Indian Head. I was there last year and saw some of the grain with which they were experimenting, and I want to tell the minister I regret to see the decrease in this item. I hope that will not mean that the work of these experimental stations will be affected.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle wants a sort of break-down of the reduction in the cost of operating our branch farms, particularly at Indian Head?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The position is that we have reduced the cost in our estimates this year by $8,010 in total salaries, $14,240 in wages and $38,251 in buildings and lands. The net reduction amounts to $37,438. Practically all those amounts were capital expenditures made last year under supplementary estimates. That is, the $38,000 in connection with buildings and lands was capital expenditure, and these other items cover wages which were occasioned by the fact that we were carrying on certain building activities. I understand there is no reduction in the actual work being done at any of these farms, including the one to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury referred a few moments ago. I believe that at the Fredericton farm the same work is being carried on this year as was carried on last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: A few days ago I happened to notice in one of the eastern newspapers an article outlining the great contribution to Canadian agriculture made by Doctor Newman, of the central experimental farm. Of course I would not want to take away any of the credit due Doctor Newman, but I am sure he would be the first to say that credit also should be given to the staff of the branch farms. I have another reason for speaking this morning. I am extremely proud of the work being carried on at the Swift Current experimental station. As has been so often said in this house, it is an outstanding example of the use that can be made of the dominion experimental station set-up. I know of no farm in Canada that has contributed more to agriculture in the way of research work and the development of proper agricultural methods than has the experimental station at Swift Current.

As I said, I noticed in the article to which I referred that Doctor Newman was incorrectly mentioned as the originator of the sawfly-resistant wheat referred to this morning by the minister. I am sure he would approve my placing on record a brief history of just what occurred in connection with that very important development. Last year, 1943, I believe the cost of sawfly damage in western Canada was approximately $30,000,000, and that is by no means the limit to which that particular pest could damage our western crops. So that you will see the importance of developing a sawfly-resistant wheat in order to overcome one of the hazards which confront the western farmer. The two strains the minister has mentioned had their origin in 1926. Mr. Kemp, now the assistant superintendent at the experimental station, who has made other valuable contributions to agriculture, happened to notice that certain varieties of wheat with solid stems were not damaged by the sawfly pest. This caused him to think there might be some possibility of a solution to the sawfly problem in the development of a hard-stemmed wheat. He began to experiment in the hope that a hard-stemmed wheat might solve the difficulty. In 1937 a slightly more extensive programme was outlined to breed varieties that would be resistant not only to sawflies but also to stem rust. I think we in parliament should pay tribute to the men who accomplish these miracles, who find out the laws which govern these things, and do a work which is so beneficial to mankind.

In ordinary hollow-stemmed wheat the sawfly deposits its egg inside the stem when the plant is in the boot stage. The egg hatches and the young grub feeds on the wheat tissues, later migrating to the base of the stem and cutting it as the plant nears maturity. In solid-stemmed varieties the egg is deposited in the same manner but as soon as the young grub is hatched it is in trouble. It has difficulty in finding suitable food as the pith cells apparently contain little nourishment; it has great difficulty in migrating to the base of the stem and in almost all cases dies before doing so.

The experimental farm staff at Swift Current turned to New Zealand, where they secured solid-stemmed wheats which, while resistant to sawflies, are susceptible to stem rust, leaf rust and smut. They were poor in milling and baking qualities, weak-strawed and shattered readily. The task, therefore, was to combine the sawfly resistance of those with the disease resistance and other desirable characteristics of the best Canadian varieties. Accordingly, these New Zealand wheats were crossed with Renown, Apex, Thatcher and other unnamed hybrid lines.

About three hundred seeds were produced in this manner. As a matter of fact, in discussing the matter with the different officials of the experimental station who were concerned with these experiments, I was astounded by the immense number of seeds and plants, running into the hundreds of thousands, which have to be handled, selected and chosen by those conducting the experiments. It requires a degree of patience amounting almost to genius, and I am sure this is one place where that patience paid substantial dividends. The three hundred seeds produced in this manner were sown individually. All the plants produced were alike and contained certain characteristics of one parent and certain of the other. The seeds from these plants were sown individually—about 30,000 in all. Their progeny was a veritable maze of different types; some resembled one parent, some were more like the other, while all possible combinations of intermediate types were produced. However, out of these plants the desirable ones were again selected, and grown in a short row. This was repeated for two or three years, at which time a portion of the rows ceased to break up. Then, instead of selecting individual plants, whole rows of true breeding plants were selected. These were the new strains about which the minister has spoken. In the programme being described, about three hundred strains were obtained.

The new strains were then tested to make sure they had the recombination of characters desired, and to find out which ones would be best for the districts where they were likely to be needed. Their resistance to sawfly was tested in a series of plots located at Swift Current, Regina, Scott and Shaunavon, Saskatchewan, and Nobleford, Alberta. Nurseries at Brandon, Manitoba, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and Consort, Alberta, have also been used. At each of these points conditions were made as favourable as possible for the sawflies, so that the new strains would get a severe test. Those that failed to stand up were discarded.

Similarly, they were tested for rust resistance at the Dominion Rust Research Laboratory, Winnipeg. Of course, those in charge had to keep in mind that the plant had to be rust-resistant as well as sawfly resistant. Then, finally, in order to speed up the experiment, through arrangements with the department at Ottawa, land was secured for use in the state of California. There they are able to grow two crops in one year, and one can understand that from an experimental standpoint this would be of immense advantage to experimenters making tests.

Incidentally perhaps the success of this particular experiment in research work through the use of the warm, sunny climate of California might well be noted. It might be wise for Canada to secure a suitable plot of ground in California through which we could assist other research workers to speed up their experiments and bring the benefits to the farmers of Canada as quickly as possible. I might add that the hon. member for Moose Jaw, who, as hon. members are aware, is with the parliamentary group in the antipodes, asked me to bring this matter particularly to the attention of the committee, and to point out the desirability of Canada's investing a comparatively small sum to secure suitable land in California for the purpose of carrying on this experiment and others of a like nature which would require the same climatic and growing conditions.

And so out of all these experiments the strains about which the minister has spoken have been finally selected. They are not as yet perfected in every desirable quality. It was interesting to me to note that this is in part due to the fact that light affects their sawfly-resistance. If these crops are grown under continuous shade they are completely hollow, and even when grown in the open they frequently show some hollowness if the crop is thick and tall and the plants shade each other. At Swift Current and throughout the sawfly area they are almost always solid, but in the parklands at Edmonton, Alberta, or Melfort, Saskatchewan, they are frequently hollow. That is an example of one of the difficulties with which our research workers are confronted. Even within the sawfly area some variations occur. They are most solid and most resistant in years when the crop is thin and light, and least solid and least resistant in years when the crop is thick and heavy.

I do not think I need go further in my outline of the work done by these experimenters, to bring to the attention of the committee the immense service these men are rendering to agriculture. When one realizes that the annual loss would be something in the neighbourhood of $30,000,000 he will see at once that if this loss were allowed to continue indefinitely, it would reach astronomical figures.

The point I bring to the attention of the committee is that two men are chiefly to be credited with this work. We realize of course that they secured assistance from the dominion experimental branch. The fact is however that Mr. A. W. Platt, the cerealist at the Dominion experimental station at Swift Current, is the man who has been in charge of this experiment since its inception. The idea was born in the mind of Mr. H. J. Kemp, and Mr. Platt is the individual to whom the idea was entrusted for experimentation. I note with great regret that, until recently at least, Mr. Platt was receiving a salary of only slightly more than $2,000 a year. I am sure he is not the type of man who would complain about his salary; but to me there is something inconsistent in the amounts paid to men like Mr. Platt and the very great salaries paid to say moving picture stars and others, having regard to the contributions they make to society. In view of the contribution to the welfare of mankind made by men like Mr. Platt and many others I think it is time we took stock of our attitude toward these invaluable men. For example I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Prime Minister that they be recognized in our honour lists.

This nation should pay the greatest possible tribute to men who by their work and by the success of their experiments have contributed so largely to the material welfare of this country. I know how sympathetic the minister and the departmental heads are, and hope that the opinion of the members and public opinion generally will urge and support all the recognition by way of salary and otherwise that we can give to these men who make such a substantial and worth-while contribution to agriculture, which after all is and will continue to remain our basic industry.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to support what the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) has just said with respect to a matter I have mentioned on former occasions —the pay we are giving to the men who are doing experimental work in agriculture in Canada. These men have certainly not been given the pay to which they are entitled, and as a result we have lost to the United States, where they find better remuneration for their services, some of our best men engaged in experimental work. These men, as the hon. member for Swift Current has said, have rendered a real service to agriculture in Canada. The development of rust-resistant wheat in western Canada, for example, was one of the things they accomplished in a very short period of time, some three years. It was a development which meant millions of dollars to agriculture in Canada and to the Canadian economy as a whole. I strongly support the idea that the minister give serious consideration to seeing that the men engaged in this type of work are given better salaries and more honours than they have been given in the past.

The minister has mentioned certain experiments which are being carried on in Canada with respect to cereals, rubber and other agricultural products. Are experiments being made with a view to developing alfalfa of a variety which will have better seed setting properties than our present varieties have? I believe some work has been done along this line; perhaps the minister will give us particulars and indicate stating how far the experiments have gone. At present it is quite a gamble to grow alfalfa seed in Canada. In some years the seed will set, and then for two years there will be no seed. The production also varies tremendously from season to season. The development of a better variety of alfalfa is of tremendous importance not only to the areas where the seed is being produced but to the whole of Canada, because alfalfa is one of our main fodder crops in the feeding of live stock.

Mr. SENN: I would like to emphasize what the hon. member for Melfort, (Mr. Wright) has said about alfalfa. For years alfalfa has been one of our main fodder crops in Ontario, and I believe it has extended now to the western provinces. But unfortunately in the last few years there seems to be less alfalfa grown. There are a number of reasons for that. One, as the hon. member for Melfort has stated, is the uncertainty of getting a crop of seed. One year you will have a good crop of seed and the next year the seed will not set at all. Experimental work should be undertaken to ascertain if possible why there is so much uncertainty. I think experiments should be conducted to see if the reason for that cannot be found.

Again, alfalfa as a pasture crop is bad for bloating cattle. I notice in one of the reports of the Department of Agriculture a reference to certain experiments made in that connection on experimental farms, and to the good results obtained from a certain treatment of the cattle. In Ontario every year there is a great loss of cattle from bloating when they have fed on alfalfa pasture, particularly the second cutting. Something should be done to see if that cannot be prevented.

There is another matter in regard to alfalfa which is important. Experiments have been conducted from time to time in the use of alfalfa and other legumes for silage. I believe experiments are being conducted at the central experimental farm in regard to using alfalfa for silage rather than corn. Will the minister make a statement on that? More attention should be paid to the development of this crop than has been given to it in the past.

Mr. GARDINER: In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Melfort, and which he asked on a previous occasion, I would answer in this way. We are carrying on experiments at the experimental farm at Ottawa, also at Saskatoon and Swift Current, in connection with alfalfa. These experiments are for the purpose of trying to produce varieties in which the seed will set to better advantage than in some of the varieties now being used. The hon. member for Haldimand also referred to this matter. The experiments up to date would suggest that probably the quality of the soil upon which the alfalfa is being produced has much to do with the setting of the seed. The experiments are not completed but are being continued and we are getting results which should be helpful. Any information that we gain from time to time is made available to farmers.

Mr. WRIGHT: Are these experiments in the production of alfalfa seed being made at the illustration stations in northern Saskatchewan in the alfalfa seed producing areas? It seems to me that that would be the logical place. What have been the results obtained?

Mr. GARDINER: The experiments are being carried on at the illustration stations indicated, and the laboratory work is done at the agricultural college at Saskatoon.

Mr. SENN: Have any experiments been made with regard to bloating in cattle as a result of eating alfalfa?

Mr. GARDINER: Another question asked by the hon. member for Haldimand was with regard to the use of alfalfa for ensilage. The experiments indicate that there is a higher protein content in ensilage from alfalfa than in ensilage from corn. Ensilage from alfalfa can be produced to better advantage if molasses is available. At present it is not available, but even without molasses the ensilage from alfalfa has a higher protein content.

With respect to bloating, the experiments that have been carried on indicate that there is no great danger from bloating if the stock are handled in the proper way, and are placed on the alfalfa when it is in its proper stage of development.

Mr. SENN: I think that has something to do with it.

Mr. GARDINER: I have fed cattle on clover and alfalfa in the west, and I found that if the cattle were shut off from water in the early part of the day they would bloat if allowed on clover with a heavy dew on it. The only time I have lost cattle on clover is through their not getting to water in the early part of the day. The experiments that are being conducted show that it is largely a matter of handling the cattle, rather than anything having to do with the alfalfa or clover itself.

Mr. WRIGHT: At what illustration stations in northern Saskatchewan are experiments being carried on to develop a better seed setting variety of alfalfa?

Mr. GARDINER: Most of it is being carried on at the experimental station at White Fox, which I think is on the north side of the Saskatchewan river, just across from Nipawin.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am always greatly interested in the estimates for experimental farms and for agriculture generally. I was particularly impressed to-day by the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current, and I want to follow for a few minutes along somewhat the same lines, because I have often felt, as I believe we all have, that in the hurly-burly of the present day we pay very little heed to the men and women of ability and vision who laid so well the local foundations of many parts of this dominion; men and women whose philosophy of life consisted of deeds of service rather than of words.

With this introduction I want to make a few remarks regarding some men who took a leading part in the founding of experimental farms in western Canada. I have in mind three men particularly, only one of whom is still living. That one is Mr. A. C. Fraser, of Brandon. Born at White Lake in the county of Renfrew, Ontario, Mr. Fraser, although now in his ninety-fifth year, is just about as mentally alert as any hon. member of this house. I had the pleasure of visiting with him a few months ago, and I may say that I do not think there is any hon. member who can give a better appraisal of the qualities of the members of our cabinet than can Mr. Fraser, although he has seen only one of them, the Prime Minister. I want to say in passing that the Minister of Agriculture, whose estimates are being considered to-day, seems to be a special favourite of this old gentleman. I have heard in my day, in this parliament and out of it, some very fine speakers, but rarely have I heard one endowed with as great a gift of eloquence as Mr. Fraser possessed in his palmy days, making him one of the outstanding speakers of Canada. He was mayor of Brandon in the early years, and recalls with much satisfaction the urge he made to have experimental farms established in western Canada and his insistence that one of those farms be located at Brandon. That farm is now recognized as one of the most useful and beautiful in western Canada.

A second pioneer to whom I wish to refer in connection with Brandon experimental farm is the late Senator W. D. Perley, whose son so ably represents the constituency of Qu'Appelle, which adjoins my own. The late Senator Perley was born in New Brunswick, but came as a young man to northwestern Canada, settling near what is now known as Indian Head. His work was soon recognized in the fact that he was elected to represent Indian Head riding in the Northwest Council, corresponding to the provincial legislature before Saskatchewan became a province. He was afterwards elected to the federal parliament, and served here until called to the senate. It was during his membership in the House of Commons that Mr. Perley was chosen as one to select those experimental farms, and the fine judgment he showed on that occasion is evident in the splendid locations of various farms in northwestern Canada.

Then there is another who, more than anyone else, contributed to the development of the Brandon farm. I refer to one whose name will be recalled and revered by some of the older staff of the agriculture department, the late Doctor S. A. Bedford, who also took an active part in selecting its location. Like so many contributors to the upbuilding of Canada, Doctor Bedford was born in England but came to this country when quite a young man. He remained for a time in Ontario, but in the spring of 1877 set out for the west. He ultimately took up land in the constituency so ably represented to-day by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler) and the experimental farm at his home town, Morden, remains one of the finest to be found in all Canada. Doctor Bedford, in addition to superintending farming operations, surveyed large tracts of country for the dominion government and acted in an advisory capacity for several land companies. These duties necessitated his going farther west, and he took up residence in what is now Moosomin, Saskatchewan. At that time Moosomin was not even included in any electoral division. Doctor Bedford was requested to lay out such a division, and he was elected by acclamation as its first member and served for two terms in the Northwest Council. He later was appointed first superintendent of the Brandon experimental farm, and he converted that ordinary prairie piece of land into what is now a thing of beauty and a joy forever. His son, Mr. H. B. Bedford, is one of the leading residents and most respected citizens of Brandon.

I had the privilege a few years ago of attending a function in Doctor Bedford's memory, held at the entrance to a beautiful shaded driveway leading from the highway to the farm buildings. The occasion was marked by the unveiling at the entrance of that driveway of a substantial bronze plaque, on which are inscribed these words:

"Bedford Drive, named in honour of Doctor S. A. Bedford, the First Superintendent of Brandon Experimental Farm 1888 to 1906."

It was a quiet function, but it was a sincere tribute by his friends to the memory of a sterling man. There before us were the fruits of his labour—the fertile fields sloping southwards to the Assiniboia river, the herds of pure bred cattle, the poultry houses and the colonies of bees, the trees, the shrubberies, the lawns, a landscape of rare scenic beauty. In looking over these grounds I have felt that the poet Kipling and Doctor Bedford had much in common. One expressed his thoughts in words, the other in deeds:

> Our country is a garden that is full of stately views
> Of borders, beds and shrubberies, and lawns and avenues,
> With statues on the terraces, and peacocks strutting by,
> But the Glory of the Garden lies in more than meets the eye.

I make no apology, Mr. Chairman, for taking up a little of the time of this house to pay my tribute to these three noble men, Mr. A. C. Fraser, the late Senator Perley and the late Doctor Bedford—not perhaps that they are more deserving than hundreds of others of the pioneers of western Canada, but because their duties, being of a public nature, came more directly under the public eye. These are the type of men, scoffers notwithstanding, who have built up this country and made it what it is to-day, the type of men whom doubtless the poet had in mind when, after referring to the material greatness of the west he issued this appealing call:

> Bring us men to match our mountains,
> Bring us men to match our plains.
> Bring us men to match our prairies
> And new eras in their brains.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to support the hon. members for Swift Current and Brandon in what they have said as to the value of experimental substations. I will give a concrete example. Over seven years ago a substation was set up in our district and I was told then by somebody who pretended to know that it was an outstanding waste of money. This person was running a small store and not making a success of it and he said that the farmers of the district knew all there was to know about their farms. However, the farmers were willing to learn and a substation was set up. A young man was put in charge of it and it was established on a firm basis. I may say that he resigned from his position to join the air force and made the supreme sacrifice, so that that farm is now a memorial to him. There is a field day every year and the farmers and their wives as well as city folks come to see what is done on the farm. They see what can be produced on the three types of soil to be found on the farm. They see the value of fertilizer in the growth of small fruits suitable to the different types of soil. They see what can be done with wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax and grasses, and what can be done by cultivation and the proper use of fertilizers. Vegetables of all kinds are grown on the farm, including soya beans. Even the fertilizer is shown five years afterwards in a field of pasture. Now the farmers are benefiting by the work done on this experimental substation and the station has paid for itself many times over. Attend that field day and you will find that even a federal member cannot get in a word edgeways when he tries to say something or to get something explained to him. The farmers are interested in the work and the young man in charge is doing a splendid job. Not only that; he goes all over the community, to district fairs, and so on, giving advice to the farmers regarding the crops on their farms and telling them what their soil is best suited for. If any hon. members would like to see what can be done by the farmers at the head of the lakes I would be glad to take them out. I would say to the hon. member for Brant particularly that the farmers of that district, as I said the other day, were able to raise 140 bushels of ajax oats to the acre, and I would like to see the farmers of any other part of Ontario who can do that. The man employed by the government on that experimental substation is Mr. Knight. He is doing a great job and is held in high respect by the farmers in the community. I would pay a tribute to the Minister of Agriculture for his wisdom in putting in that district a substation that is paying for itself many times over.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister said that there was a plant in Chicago which was separating the seeds from the fluff that is used as a substitute for kapok. Have we a plant of that kind in Canada, or has it been decided that we cannot have one?

Mr. GARDINER: We have no plant here.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do we ship our material there?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, we ship it there.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is shipped there now?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does that come back to Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They use it in the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. We have supplies of kapok here.

Mr. HATFIELD: I agree with the hon. member for Melfort that we are losing our best men to the United States and to private concerns. We are not only losing our best experimental men in the Department of Agriculture, but those in the national research branch are also leaving. Doctor Gallay, one of our best research men in agricultural products, has resigned, I understand, from the research council and has secured a job in private industry.

Is the cost of the pilot plant for dehydration included in this estimate for experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The operating expenses of the pilot plant established in Ottawa are to be found this year in the vote under horticulture.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is the plant completed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is under the supplementary vote.

Mr. HATFIELD: What was the cost?

Mr. GARDINER: About $68,000. The member for Haldimand asked a question with regard to item 13. When this vote carries we will revert to that item.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What disposition has been made of the land and property formerly comprised within the Rosthern experimental farm?

Mr. GARDINER: It was sold to an organization of Mennonites at the price of $20,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many acres are there?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe it is 630.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was it sold for cash or on a crop payment basis?

Mr. GARDINER: It was $5,000 down, but I am speaking from memory. If that is not correct I will correct it on the record. The payments were to be made over a short period of time, $5,000 a year for three years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who were the purchasers?

Mr. GARDINER: An organization of Mennonites. The name of the organization is the Mennonite youth society.

Mr. WRIGHT: When was the sale made?

Mr. GARDINER: About a year ago.

Mr. HATFIELD: How much land is under rental at the experimental farm at Ottawa, and what is the cost?

Mr. GARDINER: About $1,600.

Mr. HATFIELD: Per annum?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to join with others who have spoken in support of better pay for our research workers. Agriculture and agricultural research have been neglected in the past. In future something definite must be done if we are to retain the services of our best workers. Their salaries must be increased, and I hope the minister will give heed to what has been said in this regard.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like again to refer to what has taken place in the sale of this farm at Rosthern, Saskatchewan, to a group of Mennonites, at a time when we have a veterans' board in Canada endeavouring to obtain suitable land for veterans returning from the present war. It seems to me that this farm, which was a valuable piece of property situated in a reasonably good area, instead of being disposed of to any group of individuals, should have been retained for the soldiers returning from this war. The matter of the disposal of agricultural land to various groups in this country has been protested continuously for the last three years, in Manitoba and other parts of western Canada. The government are setting a very bad example in disposing of farm land at this time when it will be required for soldier settlers returning from the war.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister make a statement now with regard to the experimental work on the substance which is being used to cope with the codling moth?

Mr. GARDINER: Probably I should say something in reply to what has just been said by the hon. member for Melfort with regard to the experimental farm at Rosthern. The farm has been sold to an organization of Mennonites which exists in that community. It is not sold in the ordinary sense. It is not to be utilized in the ordinary sense that a farm is utilized when sold by private individuals to Mennonites. I think what is in the mind of the hon. member for Melfort is that in certain sections of the west there is some opposition to organizations coming in and buying up land and settling people on it. That opposition has been expressed by quite a number of organizations, as has been stated; but this organization is an organization of Mennonites associated with the Mennonite colony close to Rosthern, located around that farm. There is no doubt that the farm lands will be farmed, but their main object in wanting the property was to make it the site of a summer school that they operate for their own people, in which they do give instructions on matters having to do with farming. Therefore it was thought that these people, who live in the community where the farm was operated for so long, could perhaps do as good service in connection with it as could be done by anyone else to whom we might have sold it, and it was sold to them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was anyone else given an opportunity to bid on it, and were bids received?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, we called for bids several times, and speaking from memory, $15,000 or $16,000 was the highest bid received.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The buildings on the farm must be worth over $30,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure about the $30,000, but they would be worth much more when they were constructed than the sale price would indicate. The value of those buildings as part of an ordinary farm, would be very low in comparison with the actual cost.

Mr. SENN: Would the farm not have been suitable for breaking up into farms for veterans under the Veterans' Land Act? It seems to me that you are paying that much or more for property of that nature.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it is less than a section. It probably could have been sold to two veterans, but it could not have been sold for anything like the amount of money under the terms of the act, unless the veterans could get the money from somewhere else. It could only be divided into two. It is less than a section of land, and you could not make more than two farms out of it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Representations have been made to the department with respect to the establishment of a beef herd on the Nappan farm, having special reference to the utilizing of the marsh lands, pasturage, hay and grains. Has the department decided on a policy with regard to the establishing of such a beef herd? They have on that farm two herds of dairy cattle, and I believe they are operated with success. The experimental farm at Nappan is one of the original experimental farms in Canada. It has given splendid service to agriculturists in the maritime provinces. Several other farms are now specializing on particular work. I think it is agreed by those interested in agriculture that the area at the head of the bay of Fundy is the best adapted, at least in eastern Canada, to the growing of live stock, particularly beef cattle. In former years most farmers had large herds of beef cattle and utilized the crop from the marshlands for hay and pasturage. But those marsh lands have deteriorated through action of the tides and lack of drainage. We are awaiting a declaration of policy from the federal and provincial governments on the reclamation of this land. I should like to hear from the minister now or at a later date the policy of the department with respect to the restoration of these marsh lands. I know that some work is being done, such as the rebuilding of dikes destroyed in 1943. That is appreciated by those directly concerned, but it does not cover the main problem of the reclaiming of the marshlands and the utilizing of tens of thousands of acres that now do not grow crops but which might be giving the highest yield per acre of any land in eastern Canada. I should like to know when we may expect a statement from the minister as to the policy regarding the marsh lands.

There is one other matter about which I should like to get information, namely, the establishment of a much-needed animal disease research laboratory in the maritime provinces. I understand that representations have been made to the department to this end. Such a laboratory should be based on the experimental farm at Nappan or located in the central part of the maritime provinces. It is much needed for control of diseases and pests in all kinds of live stock—cattle, sheep, horses, foxes, and poultry in the maritimes. I should like to have a pronouncement from the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: So far as the marsh lands are concerned, they have been discussed a number of times in the house during the nine years that I have been here. As the hon. member knows, I have been very sympathetic toward getting whatever could be done to recondition those lands and get them back into use in a manner similar to that of many years ago. We have carried on some experiments in connection with it. Last year we had a vote of $10,000 for that purpose, and the money has been expended for the purposes for which it was voted. This year we are bringing down in the supplementary estimates another amount. At the moment I am not in a position to state how much will be voted finally, but we are asking for an increased amount for experimental work. This year that work will have to do largely with the finding of equipment suitable to put that land back into condition, and of course at the present time it is difficult to get such equipment. Some of it is of the kind used in levelling land generally; a great deal of that work is being done in connection with war activities, which makes the equipment difficult to obtain. Nevertheless whatever work can be done this year is being done. In addition we are carrying on, in cooperation with the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, repair work in connection with the damage done last year, as I understand it, by an extra high tide, which made considerable repairs to the dikes necessary. That work is being carried on; $25,000 has been appropriated for that purpose. Up to date that is the extent of the work. The operations we are carrying on in an experimental way are for the purpose of assisting us to determine what final policy will be adopted. As hon. members from that section know, we have a committee working in the matter, making reports and giving us some advice as to what might be done in connection with these properties. These matters are under consideration at the present time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What about the animal diseases laboratory?

Mr. GARDINER: Representations have been made in that regard, but at present we have nothing in the estimates to take care of it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am sure the people of the maritime provinces appreciate what the department is doing to preserve some of these areas that were recently subjected to damage by the breaking of the dike. We also appreciate the attitude of the minister, as I have said repeatedly. We appreciate what has been done by Doctor Barton, and especially by Doctor Archibald, who has charge of the experimental farms. For years he has been advocating a policy of reclaiming the marsh lands, and very successful experiments have been carried on at the experimental farm at Nappan under his direction, and under the immediate supervision of the superintendent, Mr. W. W. Baird. But the marsh owners for years have been waiting for a declaration of policy with respect to the whole marsh land area. We appreciate the vote of $10,000 last year for surveys in this connection; no doubt that is necessary, but a great deal of work can be done without very much in the way of surveys. It is obvious to anyone and it is desirable that this work should get under way without delay, because at best it will take several years to bring this land into a proper state of production.

I am particularly pleased with the minister's reference to the experimentation in regard to machinery for use on marshlands. The age of hand work is past; these lands must be reclaimed and kept drained by the use of machinery. Fifty, a hundred and three hundred years ago this work was done almost entirely by manual labour. To-day, however, we must rely upon special machinery, and I recognize the desirability of carrying on experiments to determine the different types of machinery required for different kinds of work, in order that these very fertile lands in the bay of Fundy district may be brought into production.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to make a statement in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Yale with regard to the codling moth.

The codling moth is becoming an increasingly serious pest in all the apple growing regions of Canada. It is now the most important orchard pest in the Okanagan Valley, British Columbia, where eventual elimination of the industry is threatened unless effective economic control is soon developed. Two very promising projects are being pursued at the Vernon laboratory. These involve the destruction of the moths by toxic sprays, and the control of overwintering larvae by special dormant applications to the tree trunks of sprays consisting of oil solutions of dinitro-cresol. In general spray practice particular emphasis is being placed on the use of arsenical substitutes. In the warmer parts of Ontario there are two broods of codling moth and the insect is the most serious source of loss to apple growers; pears, too, are affected. Present investigations include improvement of the spray programme, adoption of supplementary measures, and the development of biological control, chiefly by parasites. Until a few years ago the codling moth was not of importance in Nova Scotia orchards. It has increased since then and is locally a severe pest. Both there and in Quebec investigations are in progress to establish improved control practices.

Mr. WOOD: I am sorry I did not take part in the discussion when the matter of alfalfa was brought to the attention of the minister by the hon. member for Haldimand, but I should like to say that in my opinion this is one of the most important matters to be discussed this morning in connection with agriculture in my section of the country. Alfalfa has become one of the most importants crops in Canada. I well remember that in my youth it was a common thing to get seed from the second crop of alfalfa, and there was seldom if ever a failure.

Mr. SENN: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD: I am glad that statement meets with the approval of the hon. member. I am inclined to the view that we are having difficulty to-day because we have followed the recommendation of the department and changed the variety of alfalfa we were growing. Formerly we grew what was known as Ontario Variegated, and we were advised to change to the Grimm variety. The old Ontario Variegated had its disadvantages, of course. One was that it was a coarse, deep-rooted variety which was hard to plough. To-day, however, with tractors to do the ploughing, that disadvantage is not so important. It also grew perhaps somewhat coarser, provided you did not cut it in time, but I have never had the same success since I have been growing the Grimm variety. I am rather inclined to believe that while experiments undoubtedly are necessary, they do not always bring about improvements. I think it was Charles Dickens who had Sam Weller say, when he married the second time, that changes are not always improvements. I have not seen any of the Ontario

Variegated alfalfa for a number of years, and I was wondering if the experimental farms still have that variety and whether the possibility of seed production has been increased. It may be that conditions have changed, and that for this reason we do not get equally good results. It may be that the change of varieties is not responsible. I think the weather conditions have some effect. Speaking as a practical farmer, while I know that the experimental farms do highly technical work, it has been my experience that they often learn from the ordinary dirt farmer certain things which have proven valuable to those farmers. I believe we should try to get a variety of alfalfa which would give us an assurance of seed production such as we used to get. My recommendation would be that the experimental farms continue investigations of the recommended varieties, and those we discarded some years ago.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister reply to my inquiry with respect to the establishment of a beef herd at Nappan, with special reference to hay and pasturage that can be grown on marsh land?

Mr. GARDINER: This matter is under consideration, but there has been no definite decision reached with regard to it.

The question of the hon. member for Haldimand as to item 13 was with respect to a break-down of sales and production on the different farms. All I can give is the allotment last year for the different divisions and the returns therefrom. They are as follows:

Division	Allotment	Returns from sales
Animal husbandry	$73,575	$38,000
Bee	18,125	1,000
Cereals	77,895	No sales
Farm superintendent	44,855	No sales
Fibre	23,810	No sales
Field husbandry	74,895	No sales
Forage	54,350	No sales
Horticulture	113,120	3,000
Poultry	75,975	8,000
Tobacco	27,080	1,000
Cooperative assistance	34,970	No sales
Unallotted	710	No sales

Mr. TUSTIN: Two or three years ago there was considerable experimentation in connection with a new type of tomato. I refer to the Jahnru. At that time we thought we had something really worth while and new, for canning purposes. In the last year or two I have heard nothing about this tomato, and I am wondering if the department is still conducting experiments.

Is there an illustration plot in the county of Prince Edward? If not, will the minister give consideration to the establishment of one at that point? In 1943 the county of Prince Edward produced and processed thirty-two per cent of all tomatoes processed in Canada—an outstanding feat for a county of that size. They should have some encouragement through the establishment of an illustration plot.

Mr. GARDINER: The tomato to which reference has been made, and concerning which we conducted experiments some time ago—I believe there was some discussion of it on the floor of the house—has been abandoned. Experiments have been dropped, largely because it is believed that better varieties have been developed both here and at the Vinelands station in the Niagara peninsula. Persons are being advised to use the other varieties, rather than the one with which we were experimenting.

The hon. member referred to another point. I believe there is under consideration, and probably will be under discussion when our supplementary estimates are before the committee, the possibility of establishing a station in that area. It would not particularly have to be in Prince Edward county, but would be in that vicinity, and would be of assistance to the people in that area. We shall probably have an estimate for this purpose. If we do not, I shall give reasons why not.

Mr. TUSTIN: Can the minister give any further information as to why experiments with the Jahnru tomato were discontinued? Was it because of the keeping qualities after canning? This was really a firm tomato, and I should like to know the reason for abandoning the experiment.

Mr. GARDINER: They were abandoned for very much the same reasons as were outlined by the hon. member for Swift Current a little while ago, when he talked about results obtained from sowing the same kind of seed in an effort to get a sawfly-resistant wheat. This tomato did not produce true to type. I believe the discussion in the house on a former occasion resulted from difficulties many people who had tried to grow it had experienced. It will be recalled that there was a suggestion at that time that we should pay for some of the losses, because the seed had been distributed. The experiments have been completed to a point of being able to prove that it would not produce according to type. Having found that out we thought it best not to proceed further.

Item agreed to.

Production service—Health of animals—

16. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $1,848,648.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to note a slight increase in the estimate, but I would be more pleased if it were still greater. A number of us have been worried for some time in connection with veterinary services for agriculture. In years gone by we have suffered from low live stock prices, with the result that there were many times when it was difficult for the farmer to pay for veterinary services required for his animals. Consequently many of the young men who would have followed the veterinary profession did not do so. They either went somewhere else, or engaged in some other type of occupation. The result is that in many parts of western Canada with which I have been familiar for a long time the veterinary services at our disposal are strictly limited. In fact one could travel in some areas hundreds of miles where there are thousands upon thousands of live stock but no facilities for veterinary services. This condition has a bearing upon the future health of the human population.

The veterinaries working under the Department of Agriculture are to be complimented on the efficient service which they have given in the years gone by. We are indeed blessed that that service has been kept up to the extent that it has been through succeeding administrations. The dominion veterinarians, commonly referred to in many parts of the country as the dominion vets, have always been looked upon as men who knew their business and attended to their business. But to-day in many parts of the country the only veterinaries are those who are working for the Department of Agriculture. They have their own work to do, and the result is that the people generally cannot get veterinary service for their live stock.

On page 62 of the estimates, under health of animals, a break-down is given of the veterinary service, showing veterinary inspectors, associate chief veterinary inspectors and so on. I would ask the minister what is the average age of the men in this service, how many of them are in line for retirement within a short time, and what steps is the department taking to have young men trained to fit into these positions that will be becoming vacant—because I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that at least in my part of the country there is very little opportunity to replace these men from among the profession.

I would also ask a question which I believe is related to this vote. It really comes under the Meat and Canned Foods Act. Many of us appreciate the splendid service which the department has given in the inspection of meats at the slaughtering plants and packing houses. Beef and pork coming through these plants are properly inspected, but while we are spending a considerable amount of money to see that meat is properly inspected, I believe that we are doing only half the job. While beef and pork are inspected, there is no proper inspection of poultry going through these packing plants. They have the poultry there, feathered but not drawn, and they are graded, and that is all the inspection of poultry that takes place. Coming down to the city here on a long trip one often meets people and discusses things with them. This last winter I had the opportunity of talking to a man who has been working for a number of years in a packing plant where they handle an enormous amount of poultry. Knowing what we have to contend with both as raisers and consumers of poultry, and particularly to see that diseased birds are not consumed, I asked this man what sort of inspection took place in this packing plant. He told me that all they could go by was this, that if a bird measured up to certain qualifications as being a finished bird, you usually could judge that that bird was not diseased. I said, and he agreed with me, that that was not an absolutely safe bet, that sometimes you would find a bird which, although apparently well finished, would be too much diseased to be safe for human consumption. He told me that the only safeguard which the consumers had was to buy high-grade poultry. I asked him what they did with the rest of the birds at the packing plant. He just grinned and said, "We put them into cold storage and later on we sell them out to some of the cheaper restaurants."

Any man who is familiar with poultry will know the number of diseases that are to be found in the ordinary flocks of poultry if they are not well taken care of, and even in some of the best taken care of flocks. While we inspect beef and pork passing through the slaughtering houses and packing plants, we allow diseased birds to be put into cold storage and later sold to the public. That is doing only half the job when it comes to inspecting the health of animals in its relation to the health of human beings.

We are indeed concerned that steps should be taken to continue to give us the efficient veterinary services that we have had under the Department of Agriculture, and also that steps be taken to ensure that young men will be trained to prepare themselves to carry on this important work.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to concur in what has been said by the hon. member for Humboldt with respect to the extension of these services. I have not the practical knowledge of the subject that he has, but I do know that there are large sections of Saskatchewan which are not serviced and cannot possibly be serviced under present conditions. The day of the private veterinary is through in this country, and I feel that the only way to meet the situation and to extend the service is to encourage young men to go into this type of work and to have positions open to them in large areas such as we have in Saskatchewan where veterinaries are badly needed. I suggest to the minister that the scale of remuneration provided for these men, in view of the training they have to undergo and the terrific amount of work they are called upon to do, is not as high as it should be, and must be increased if the administration expects to attract men into this type of work.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. WOOD: I should like some information as to the general set-up of the health of animals branch. Having been in personal contact with the department for twenty-three years, I am prepared to say that I believe this is one of the most efficient branches of the agricultural service that we have, and one which has contributed a great deal to the general welfare and well-being not only of live stock but of individuals. The maintenance of good healthy live stock will promote better conditions of health in human beings. If the department is to retain the confidence of those who are most closely associated with it, the live stock producers of this country, it is essential that nothing that is necessary to make the department successful be overlooked. It is perhaps a delicate subject, but I have sometimes wondered whether, in the appointments by the civil service commission to the health of animals branch, veterinary workers who have had a great deal of experience in more subordinate positions are always chosen. For instance, when such a position as that of chief veterinary inspector becomes vacant, I am not sure that every effort is made to get the man best qualified to give direction to those whose business it is to give directions under his control. A certain amount of latitude must of course be allowed to those responsible for making the selection of these officers, but it is well that officials of the department, and in particular the health of animals branch, should know that the type of farmer who is interested in the branch is the pure bred live stock farmer, who represents in large measure the very best element of the farmers, the men who are sincerely interested not only in maintaining production but in producing something which will improve the quality of live stock and the health of animals. These men take considerable interest in appointments affecting this branch, and sometimes they wonder whether the principle of merit is ignored, in that men who have had experience and have been giving direction are occasionally displaced by junior officers with less experience. The farmer keeps a pretty close eye upon the administration of this particular branch.

I do not know that it is up to me to offer any recommendations as to what the civil service commission should do with regard to making these appointments, but we believe that merit should be the title to any promotion, and it has been somewhat difficult for some of us to understand why some men who have filled subordinate positions should be pitchforked over the heads of others who have taken a responsible part in the administration of the branch and the carrying on of its work. I am inclined to think that sometimes a man can be so faithful in a position which calls for hard work that he is kept in that subordinate position because it is a hard job and is not allowed to reap the reward of his efforts and attain a position which would give him some of the credit and reward to which his work entitles him.

I hope I have made myself clear. I am not finding particular fault with the type of men who have been administering the branch, because we have had some splendid men in this particular department. All I want the department to know is that the farmer is interested in the work of the branch and looks with some surprise at some of the things which have been done. I understand that the civil service commission can easily give an answer, but that answer will not satisfy the average farmer. Maybe we are the silent partners in this business, but we observe what is going on. We trust the civil service commission to make appointments, but I am not sure that they are always wise in appointments they make.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Brant has drawn to the attention of the minister the health of animals, particularly cows; but I wonder whether it has been drawn to the minister's attention that protection should be given to animals against the human race. At least it was news to me this year when I read a statement made by Doctor W. R. Gunn, who said in Victoria before the agriculture committee of the legislature:

It's not always the cow that's to blame when human being are infected with undulant fever or septic sore throat and other ailments common in dairying districts and among people who drink their milk raw.

Doctor W. R. Gunn, B.C. live stock commissioner, told the agriculture committee of the legislature to-day that humans are too prone to blame the cow for prevalance of the infection known among humans as undulant fever and among dairy animals as Bang's disease. . . .

"It is possible that human beings may carry the organism of undulant fever around in their blood and if they come in contact with cows, infect them," he said.

"We know that has been the case with tuberculosis. We had one case of a sanitarium herd which we did everything to clean up but we got no results until we traced the T.B. to one of the dairy workers. Similarly with septic sore throat.

"That is definitely a human organism and if some dirty human comes in contact with a herd, the cows get it and are consequently blamed when it is transmitted to other humans."

That is most interesting, especially in view of the fact that we have a farm population of some three million people, with a permanent hired man population of 64,130. Has the minister had that brought to his attention, and if so, have representations in this regard been made by his department to the health branch?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SENN: No, Mr. Chairman. I thought the minister might be waiting to answer the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

I was much interested in what the hon. member for Brant had to say with regard to promotions and appointments. Certainly they should be made according to merit. I do not know however of any appointments which have been made without a certain amount of merit to them, although I think sometimes the principle could be followed a little more closely than it has been in the past.

I recall very well how pleased a number of hon. members in this chamber were, I think it was in 1935, when the United States-Canada agreement was completed, and what was said about the lowering of the tariff on cream and milk which was to enter the United States. I understand that this branch undertakes at all times to inspect the herds and apply the tuberculin test to any herd whose cream or milk they contemplate sending to the United States. I should like to know if that is being done, and if so, how many applications have been made for that type of inspection so that permits may be granted to send milk and cream to the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: A number of matters have been spoken of. The first is the question of promotions within the department, particularly promotions which are related to the health of animals branch. I have only to say that the same practice is followed in respect of promotions in the health of animals branch as is followed throughout the department and elsewhere in the service. The matter of seniority has something to do with it. That is, provided the qualifications are the same, seniority of course would count. The particular positions which were discussed by the hon. member for Brant are positions to which both of those qualifications apply. On one occasion when the gentleman in question was under consideration it was a matter of appointing the man who had seniority in the department as well as considering qualifications which were at least equal to those of others who were available for the position. For the position under consideration at present, the same study will be given to qualifications as was given on previous occasions and selections will be made accordingly.

The hon. member for Humboldt this morning raised a question as to the possibility of filling positions in the department as a result of graduations of veterinarians from different colleges in Canada. I can answer his question best by saying that we have now in the employ of the department 383 veterinarians, though we should have a few more. Our staffs are not fully manned at present because there are great demands upon them in consequence of the increased production of hogs and the present arrangements made in connection with the marketing of beef and so forth. That all requires more men than we have had in the past, and we could use more if they were available. Generally, we require about 25 men each year to take care of replacements. I think this fully answers the questions asked as to how many men go out each year, how many come in, how many we have on the staff and so on. We have only two veterinarian colleges in Canada, one at Guelph, and the other at Oka in the province of Quebec, and from these a year ago there were 41 graduations. This year there will be 19 and next year we expect there will be more; that is, we anticipate a larger number, but of course the students still have to go through their courses.

These figures on the average would probably take care of our requirements if there were no other demands to be met. I pointed out this morning that live stock is worth more now than before the war. There is much more of it and there is a greater demand for veterinarian services than there was a few years ago, and that may have some bearing on the question of salaries, though not so much as might appear on the surface. The salaries of all civil servants are compared right through the service from time to time by the civil service commission. As a matter of fact it is impossible for me to get anyone put on in the Department of Agriculture anywhere, even outside the civil service as that is generally understood. It is difficult to get any man engaged in the department without referring the matter to the civil service commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can you not get temporaries?

Mr. GARDINER: Not even temporaries. The general rule is that they must be submitted to the civil service commission, not on the question whether they will be hired or not but on the question of qualifications as compared with others receiving comparable salary for a similar position. Comparisons must be made with salaries paid in other parts of the civil service, and of course there is the further consideration as to whether a man is going to a job that will last only three or four months, for which there is no superannuation, or whether he is going to take on work that will be permanent, carrying superannuation at the end of a certain period. All these factors must be considered, but an attempt is made to keep the services given in one department paid on a level comparable with the services in another and throughout the department in question. On that basis the salaries paid to veterinarians are possibly the same as salaries paid to others for comparable work, and while I would be most anxious to see those in my department paid higher salaries than at present, I would suggest that in order to get them paid higher salaries it would probably be necessary to have higher salaries paid throughout the other services.

Mr. BURTON: They do however benefit from the cost of living bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. This morning certain persons were mentioned, I believe, by the hon. member for Swift Current. One of those mentioned in the group of three would be a person who would have received an increase had it not been for the war. There is however a general regulation at present whereby increases are not given except under restricted circumstances. But cost of living bonuses are paid, and while salaries have not gone up, the bonus in some cases is paid on a basis which gives a higher return than is indicated by the mere salary itself. The position is related to the other question we were discussing, whether veterinarians can keep themselves in employment in different parts of the country in peace time. The condition was different in peace time from the present condition, as the member for Humboldt understands. For a time the price of live stock was low, and a person would think many times before sending a considerable distance for a veterinarian, but to-day the situation is different. If veterinarians were available in certain areas they would undoubtedly be called much more often than the farmers can get them at the present time. The situation that exists to-day has its effect on salaries. Salaries are not as high as they might have been. In other words, men were quite satisfied to take a job in the department at a salary rather than try to practise outside. All these factors are considered, but the chief factor is the relationship between officials in the department and between those in the department and officials in other departments.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is the cost of living bonus written into the salaries of civil servants as it is into the wages of those working in industry?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not written into the salaries. Every time I am asked for an explanation of increases I have given the increase resulting from salary, which means that there is a legal increase that does take place in some cases, and in addition to that there is the increase that comes about as a result of the cost of living bonus.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why is the cost of living bonus not included in the salaries of civil servants just as it is in wages paid in industry?

Mr. GARDINER: The theory is that the whole matter is to be considered at the end of the war in relation to conditions then existing.

Mr. PERLEY: This is an important branch of the department. The minister has made an interesting statement with regard to veterinary inspectors, of whom he says there are 383 in the department. Looking over the annual report of the department I see on page 106 a statement with reference to orders in council that have been passed establishing restricted areas in connection with bovine tuberculosis. In Saskatchewan twenty-two new municipalities came in within the period covered by this report. There are 300 odd municipalities in that province and I would like the minister to make a statement as to the number that have come in. I notice from this report that certain municipalities are withdrawing from the restricted areas. Why would that be? On the following page there is a table of the percentage of inspected slaughterings in each province to the total for all Canada. It shows that Saskatchewan has almost the lowest of any, only 6·26 per cent of the slaughterings of cattle. Could the minister give us an idea of the comparative health of animals in each province? May we take this percentage of inspected slaughterings in the annual report as an indication of the health of animals in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to the last question, the experience has been that the number of reactors to tuberculosis in western Canada is lower than the number in eastern Canada. That, of course, would be due to different conditions which I do not think I need to enumerate to the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: Has climate anything to do with it?

Mr. GARDINER: Climate may have, but I would think that one thing that has as much to do with it as anything else is the fact that we have not had live stock there as long as other places, and our foundation stock when it was taken out there was probably checked. We have not had live stock there as long as they have had them in other sections. Then, the way in which live stock is housed has something to do with it as well. Quite a number of considerations enter into it, but the fact is there is less tuberculosis on the prairie provinces than in the other provinces.

With regard to the other question, as to tuberculosis areas going in and out, I understand that there are no districts that have ever been organized as anti-tuberculosis areas that have disorganized and gone out. There are districts in which we did have tuberculosis free herds, accredited herds, and those have been disorganized in some cases because the whole district has come under the tuberculosis act. I understand that when once a district comes under the act there is no way in which it can disorganize.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is it not compulsory under the act to have further inspection at certain periods?

Mr. GARDINER: That is quite true. The district has to be rechecked every so often in order to keep it in good standing; but there is a possibility that if the district were not checked over a period of years the herds in that area would not be in good standing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My understanding is that the act compels that check within a certain period. If inspectors are not available, what happens to the district?

Mr. GARDINER: If inspectors were not available and it was found impossible to carry on the inspection for a period of time, people would refuse to accept stock out of that area as being free from tuberculosis. I may have some figures in regard to that. That, if it happened, would be the responsibility of the department, and perhaps a responsibility that the department could not discharge, because of the difficulty for the time being of getting veterinarians in to do the job.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What would happen then?

Mr. SENN: What happens when cattle are sold for export? Is there not a special provision in cases of the kind?

Mr. GARDINER: If they come from an area that is in good standing, they are permitted to go direct. If the district is not in good standing, they must be checked within thirty days of the time they come to the boundary line.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister give us the number of areas or rural municipalities that are in the restricted area, and also the number of inspectors that are operating in Saskatchewan out of the 383?

Mr. GARDINER: There are fifty-five municipalities in Saskatchewan. The numbers and names are here.

Mr. PERLEY: That is not very many out of some three hundred municipalities.

Mr. GARDINER: No, it is not so many.

Mr. PERLEY: How many inspectors are there in the area?

Mr. GARDINER: These are the certified districts; some others have been inspected but not yet certified.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am seeking information, and I am not yet clear on it. Let us presume that a district in British Columbia is in an accredited area and inspectors are not available. What happens to that district? What happens to a district that wants to continue in the area but cannot get inspectors within the period?

Mr. GARDINER: All that happens is this. I know it is an inconvenience to some people, but anyone who wishes to ship cattle out of that area into an anti-tuberculosis area or into the United States would have to have his cattle tested by a veterinarian somewhere within thirty days of the time that they are shipped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position in New-Brunswick; is it entirely within the line?

Mr. GARDINER: New Brunswick is all in. All the maritimes are in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very interesting, and I am glad to hear it. How many inspectors are available in New Brunswick? How many veterinarians are there on the staff in New Brunswick? I think there used to be one at McAdam, on the border, and one at Fredericton, but I am not sure.

Mr. GARDINER: I should have said, all the maritimes with the exception of Cape Breton.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not yet clear to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a minute until I get this information.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I started it; let me finish it. I am not quarrelling with this matter, but I cannot see why a certain area in British Columbia that is accredited but cannot get inspectors should be penalized when shipping out or elsewhere. I may be mistaken, but I think I am correct and that it is happening in British Columbia to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: You would not be penalized other than to this extent: no one would accept your cattle unless they had been inspected, and you would have to have them inspected within thirty days of the time they are shipped out. Suppose, as an example, you are living on the edge of any of those districts or areas. You are not allowed to buy cattle from your first neighbour just across the road and bring them into the area without test. Anyone who brings them in there has to have them tested within thirty days of the time they are brought in, and that is the restriction which compels anyone in a district which has not been checked up to date to have them checked individually if he desires to ship any out within that period of time.

Mr. SENN: How often have these cattle to be tested in a restricted area? Is it once a year, or once every two years? When do they lose their accredited standing?

Mr. GARDINER: If they are below one-half of one per cent. They are certified for a three year period, sometimes it is six years, sometimes it is longer. The periods are three, six and nine years. There are nine veterinarians in New Brunswick.

Mr. STOKES: What are the new areas in Ontario? I understand that several places have been petitioning to be accredited, but have not yet received it.

Mr. GARDINER: At the beginning of the war we were pressing forward the checking of the districts in Ontario. The reason for that was that we had a good trade developing between this country and the United States, and we were most anxious that all the districts out of which shipments were going should be checked as soon as possible. We were working back gradually from the United States boundary line into the north country, to try and get the situation cleaned up. After the war came on, for a short time we almost discontinued the policy, but finally took the position that it should be continued wherever necessary in order to round out a district. We made an exception of some of the areas in Ontario from which breeding stock in particular was being exported to the United States; we tried to cover those districts as quickly as possible. Then we were trying to round out counties or, in the west, municipalities which were hedged in by others, where difficulties would arise because you could not move cattle back and forth across the boundary lines. We have been trying to round out those areas in order to remove that difficulty as much as possible. We have followed the practice of taking them in the order in which applications are received and put through.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the first move have to come from the locality?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. A petition comes in from the district, which must be signed by two-thirds of the people concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words there is a sort of local option. Has the government ever given consideration to making it compulsory? It is such a good thing it seems to me it should be compulsory.

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose we might have that when we get to the time when most of the country is covered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is asking too much.

Mr. GARDINER: At the moment I think it is.

Mr. McNEVIN: I should like to refer particularly to the county of Haliburton, which I think could be classed as one of the areas described by the minister. It is surrounded by accredited areas, such as Peterborough, Victoria on the south and Ontario on the west. These are all accredited districts. The county of Haliburton is a stocker producing county with a comparatively small cattle population. Very few cattle are finished and sent to market from this county. In the fall of the year conditions become congested, and I am sure the local veterinaries and any assistants they are able to secure have more work than they can handle. Would it be possible to have that small area included now, in order to round out the district? I cannot give the exact cattle population—

Mr. GARDINER: It is eight thousand. The matter is under consideration, but we are not working in there yet.

Mr. WHITE: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter having to do with the sale of hogs in Ontario; I do not know whether or not the same conditions exist in other provinces. Since the system of rail grading of hogs has been in force in Ontario the packing companies have been deducting one-half of one per cent of the value of the hogs as condemnation insurance, to compensate for hogs condemned as unfit for human consumption by the inspectors of the health of animals branch. In 1942-43 something like two million hogs were marketed in Ontario, and under this condemnation insurance the packing companies deducted something over $200,000, yet I understand that in the same period only about three thousand hogs were condemned which, at $25 a head, would amount to $75,000. In addition, parts of these condemned hogs were used, so they were not a total loss. I should like to know from the minister if his department has any check or control over the packing companies who deduct this very large sum of money from the returns of the farmers, and whether the packing companies make any accounting in connection with it.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter was discussed when my estimates were last before the committee. I do not know how we got to it, but just the same it was discussed. As I stated then, this is not a fund set up by the department, and it has no relationship to the rail grading of hogs. It has been in existence since about 1907, or in any case since early in the century.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There must be some authority for it.

Mr. GARDINER: It was an arrangement entered into by some representatives of the producers, perhaps by swine breeding associations, and the packing plants under which the packers are permitted to take one-half of one per cent of the value of the hogs delivered. There is an impression, I believe, that a fund was created. No fund has been created. The packer simply deducts one-half of one per cent of the value of the hogs he buys, and whenever there are any losses he pays them. The question that arises from time to time is whether he deducts more than he actually pays out. It has been suggested that the department should take some responsibility in the matter and require an accounting in connection with that fund. So far no action of that kind has been taken. I am not certain in my own mind as to whether it would be a proper thing for the department to do. I understand an investigation was held some two years ago by a number of counties in Ontario, and my understanding is that it was generally considered by those who carried on that investigation that the fee was reasonably taking care of the losses, which were paid by the packing houses. That is my memory of the finding, that no one was making any considerable amount of money out of it.

Mr. SENN: It applies to cattle too, does it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it does. So far as we can make out from the investigations that have been held, the one-half of one per cent pretty well takes care of the losses. Some people argue that they have sent in stock for a long time and had this one-half of one per cent taken off their returns, but they have had no losses and they want to know what has become of their money. That is the argument made from time to time in connection with any form of insurance. A person who never has a fire never draws anything, and in this case the man who never happens to have a hog condemned does not receive anything in return. However, that was the theory when it was started; that when you dumped the hogs of four or five or a dozen farmers into one car and two of them happened to be condemned as a result of some disease, the one farmer should not take the whole loss.

Mr. WHITE: The minister said this system of deducting one-half of one per cent came into effect some time around 1907. He will remember, however, that before the system of rail grading came into operation, when a drover bought and took delivery of hogs, they were then the property of the drover and he was responsible for making delivery to the packing house and therefore responsible for anything that happened in transit. I understand that this fund does not compensate for any injury or damage to hogs while in transit from the farms to the packing houses. It is used only for the purpose of covering hogs that are condemned by the inspectors as unfit for human consumption after they are slaughtered. Will the minister say whether or not that is correct?—because I took from his remarks of only a moment ago that it covered hogs damaged in transit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what he did say.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course there is a difference in the marketing as compared with forty years ago. I think probably the hon. member is right when he says that all the hogs, or nearly all of them at that time, were taken in by drovers, and it was most difficult to follow the hogs back to the original owners. That difficulty does not exist to-day, because the hogs are marked and they can be followed back to the owners.

Mr. SENN: They are mostly trucked.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and it is possible that a change in plan could be made, or a new method of payment could be set up. However I am just saying that what has happened up to date is as I have pointed out. There is just the possibility that someone—whether it be a meeting of producers and packers, or whether it should be done through the department—could devise a plan under which hogs could be followed back. I am not just sure where that would get you. I am not sure whether the people who are asking for this think that a man should take the loss on his own hogs. I should think however that that would be questionable, because if one were to put 50 hogs in one group in a car, and for some reason one or two of those hogs were killed, and they happened to belong to one man, I cannot see any reason why that man should carry the loss and the others should be allowed to go free.

Mr. WHITE: Has the minister ever looked into the legality of this procedure of the packing companies making deductions? The minister said his department has nothing to do with it. I am asking him if the packers have any legal right to make those deductions.

Mr. GARDINER: I think we are probably confusing two things. First of all there is the matter of insurance on hogs killed in transit. I am assuming the reference here has been to diseased hogs which have been taken into plants and destroyed because of their having been diseased.

Mr. WHITE: I think that is the whole point. I am advised by people who certainly know what they are talking about that under the present system when a farmer sells his hogs they remain his property until they reach the packing house, and that if those hogs are damaged or injured in a railway car or truck or other vehicle he must suffer the loss because they are his hogs until they reach the packing plant. This one-half of one per cent which is deducted by the packing companies has nothing to do with compensation for hogs damaged in transit; it is for the purpose of paying for hogs condemned by inspectors from the minister's department. Would the minister comment upon that?

Mr. WOOD: Mr. Chairman, if I might say—

Mr. WHITE: Just a moment; let the minister answer.

Mr. WOOD: May I not add something? This compensation was originally recommended by the swine breeders association of Canada. I am just drawing attention to that fact, because I happen to know it. This recommendation, like many others which have been made to the department, can be traced back. Despite the fact that hog grading was condemned by many farmers, it was recommended by those who were most interested in the breeding of swine, and those people were in the swine breeders association. There is a long story there which I believe the people would find most interesting.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister give me an answer to my question?

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister answers, may I point out that we are discussing item 16, which deals with the health of animals. I doubt very much if this discussion is in order. Of course I am just giving my own impression.

Mr. WHITE: It is my submission that this is the one item under which the matter to which I have referred could be discused. The hogs which are condemned would, I should think, come under the health of animals branch. The minister has indicated that he is willing to have the discussion take place on this item.

Mr. GARDINER: The point has been raised as a matter of health. When we began the discussion I thought it would be related to marketing, but I believe it may properly be discussed here.

The fund which has been mentioned is not in fact a fund. The packers simply pay less for all the hogs which come in. They pay one-half of one per cent less for all hogs coming in. The diseased hog is bought at its full value, and the farmer is paid the same for that hog as for any other. Then the hog is condemned, and the matter becomes one of health inspection and that particular animal is lost. That is the principle on which it operates. The farmer who owned the hog in the first instance is paid on exactly the same basis as is every other farmer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it has no legal sanction. It is just a custom which has grown into something approaching a law. As I understand it, the theory among the farmers is that the packers make a profit out of it, and that they are not rendered accountable to anybody. I do not think that is a proper situation. With regard to transportation, these hogs are transported by common carriers who must have some responsibility. What is the position in Ontario where the hogs are carried by truckers? Do they not have to insure?

Mr. SENN: They are required to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to accidents on railway cars, there must be times when the railway companies will have legal responsibility. The matter ought to be reviewed.

Mr. GARDINER: They do have responsibility. The position is just as has been outlined. The hogs are insured against accident, and that was where I was confusing the matter in the earlier discussion. Those hogs are insured against accident, but my understanding on the other question is that each time an investigation has been made it has been proven that the packer does not get enough money to cover the loss.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is purely a matter of fact, of course.

Mr. GARDINER: If that is the position, then I assume the packers would be just as anxious as anybody else to have some other arrangement. However my officials inform me that on each occasion the matter has been checked it has been found that the amount of money taken in has not entirely covered the loss sustained.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I believe reference has been made to Bang's disease during the discussion on these items. Have the minister and his department given serious consideration to this difficulty with which cattle raisers are confronted? It affects beef herds as well as dairy herds. It is estimated by the federal Department of Agriculture in Washington that the cattle raisers of the United States suffered a loss of between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 through the inroads of Bang's disease in their herds in 1942. It seems to me that there are two definite factors in connection with this incurable disease with which cattle are afflicted. First there is the effect on humans through the consumption of milk not pasteurized, produced by cattle with Bang's disease, and second there is the terrific loss occasioned by this disease which must be borne by the farmers. I submit, Mr. Chairman, and I have some knowledge of the importance of this matter, that Bang's disease as it affects the cattle industry is even more important on the one hand, and more dangerous on the other, than even tuberculosis in cattle. I would strongly recommend to the minister and his departmental heads that a sum of money be set aside in the estimates for the control and study of Bang's disease in cattle, and that veterinary inspectors be employed throughout Canada to investigate this disease and if possible recommend to cattle raisers the precautions that may be taken in order to curtail its inroads.

Bang's disease is not only one of the most insidious diseases with which cattle may be infected, but it is also one of the most easily transmitted diseases. A cat moving from one barn to another may transmit Bang's disease from an infected herd to a herd that is clean, or a truck from the stockyard going into a farmer's yard will carry the infection of Bang's disease into an otherwise clean herd. Up to the present time there has been only one control of Bang's disease, and that is the slaughtering of the cattle. Whether it be a pure-bred dairy herd, a highly priced herd, or just the ordinary herd, the only way in which to eliminate the disease in that herd is to have the herd slaughtered, and then to have a very thorough cleaning of the barns and the barnyard and also of the pasture fields where the infection of this disease lingers. In Great Britain, where they have a milder climate, one of the first questions asked by an intending purchaser of a farm is, "Has there been Bang's disease on this farm?" Because the infection carries over into the pasture fields as well as from one barn or one barnyard to another.

This disease is important because of the terrific loss it occasions to the farmer, and because of the danger to human life, to consumers particularly of unpasteurized milk. I am given to understand, and I believe this is correct, that many pure-bred herds of cattle are infected with Bangs' disease. No restrictions or control under the Department of Agriculture are exercised through the health of animals branch with respect to an animal being sold from one herd into another. There is no obligation, except that of integrity and fairness, upon a cattle owner to advise a purchaser of cattle that his herd is infected with Bang's disease. The result is, and I think I am correct in saying this, that at least fifty per cent of the herds in Ontario are infected with Bang's disease.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a serious statement, if it is true.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): My experience in the three years since I have made a study of this disease is that at least in the territory with which I am familiar approximately fifty per cent of the herds are infected with Bang's disease. That may or may not be known to the cattle raisers because it is an insidious disease and it may have been present with a herd for several years before the owner of the herd becomes aware of it.

May I say this in reference to the statement made by the minister. Where the milk is pasteurized the danger of humans contracting undulant fever is eliminated because the germ from Bang's disease is killed by the pasteurization. The germ, however, not only affects humans through the consumption of unpasteurized milk, but affects also the breeding and the crop of calves from one year to another. A cattle raiser will lose perhaps one, two and sometimes three years in the breeding of his stock through the infection of Bang's disease.

Mr. GRAYDON: To say nothing of the flow of milk.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Quite so. He loses his milk production as well as his cows. Two of the leading dairymen in Ontario were talking to me just a few weeks ago about Bang's disease. I could put their names on the record if that were desired. One of them in particular, the owner of one of the most highly-prized jersey herds in Ontario, told me that he had fought this disease for ten years and ultimately slaughtered his herd. He also stated that in view of what he had learned as he went along he would have been better off if he had slaughtered his herd ten years ago and started all over again.

I am glad that this matter has been mentioned in the house by the hon. member for New Westminster. The matter has also been brought up in the past from the point of view of the health of human beings by the hon. member for Renfrew South. Time and again the subject has been brought up in this house, and it seems to me that from the point of view of cattle raisers in Canada the minister would be well advised not only to have his officials give more attention to the study of Bang's disease, but also to provide a sum of money in his estimates that would make it possible to have a veterinary inspection of all our herds, particularly in eastern Canada. I say eastern Canada for this reason, that it has been found that Bang's disease is an inside disease. As a matter of fact, only one and a half to two per cent of the cattle exported from our prairie provinces and from the plains of the United States in 1942 and 1943 were infected with Bang's disease. Apparently, from the facts we have learned, Bang's disease is an inside disease. It develops much more prolifically in herds that are stall fed, or stall fed part of the season, and particularly it has been our experience that the disease has developed in herds that have been stabled in banked or underground barns. I submit therefore that it is much more important to have the investigation started in Ontario than perhaps in any other part of the dominion. I trust that the minister will put a sufficient sum of money in his estimates to provide for a veterinary inspection, and let us know to begin with what percentage of the herds of Ontario are really infected with Bang's disease.

I do not wish to discuss the matter further, but it does seem to me, from my own experience and that of my neighbours and of the people with whom I have come in contact, owners of pure-bred herds and owners of the ordinary herds, that Bang's disease is one of the most devastating diseases with which our beef and dairy cattle are afflicted. I sincerely trust, as I know he will, that the minister will take full cognizance of this plague, because it is really a plague with which the cattle raisers of Canada have to contend.

Mr. SENN: I am very glad that the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, has brought this matter up again. I think every time the estimates of this particular department have been presented in the last number of years I have asked the minister what advances have been made in the treatment of this disease. What the hon. member says is undoubtedly true, that it is perhaps the most insidious and most destructive disease affecting cattle in the older settled provinces to-day; and I do not believe the hon. member's statement that fifty per cent of the herds in provinces like Ontario are affected is any too high.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): At one time or another.

Mr. SENN: I know that in a great many instances when cattle have been slaughtered threre has been no compensation from the government. The presence of the disease is often concealed when it would be very much better for the man himself and for the cattle industry if it were made known.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): And it is transmitted.

Mr. SENN: It is transmitted from one herd to another through sales, and, as the hon. member says, it can be sent on a man's feet or a calf's feet from one herd to another. It destroys the efficiency of the herd. Nine times out of ten, where the disease has existed for a considerable length of time, the man has to get rid of his herd entirely, and even then he cannot be sure that he is free of the disease for a certain length of time. I understand, of course, that we have some kind of test. I believe certain discoveries have been made in the agricultural college at Guelph, whereby one can tell when a herd is free from the disease or when it has the disease. I understand that when cattle are shipped to the United States in many cases they have to undergo this blood test, and if they are found to be free of disease their entry is permitted.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Northumberland. It is high time that the department did something to curb the disease or to make a study of it in order that it may be curbed in the near future. I do not think there is any doubt that its ravages and the losses it occasions are far greater than those suffered from tuberculosis or any other communicable disease to which cattle are subject.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been some check kept, of course, and some investigations made with regard to the matter. Tests are made at the laboratory at Hull, and blood is sent to that laboratory from all over Ontario. The tests which were made in 1942 showed that 1·7 of those coming in were reactors; that is, the percentage of animals for which the blood was sent in for checking amounted to only 1·7 of reactors.

Mr. SENN: Would not those very largely be from cattle which were destined for shipment to the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: I assume they would be, and I was just going to give some other figures. We have some Bang's disease statistics which I think, in view of some of the statements made, should be put on the record. They are brought up to January 25, 1944. Total herds under test in Canada, 2,660. By provinces: Prince Edward Island, 8; Nova Scotia, 300; New Brunswick, 9; Quebec, 192; Ontario, 2,105; Manitoba, 4; Saskatchewan, 18; Alberta, 7; British Columbia, 17. Of those herds, 1,776 are those which are now called listed herds, that is they are free of Bang's disease. For Ontario the figures are 1,559 out of 2,105. The number of cattle represented in that check is 74,763 head, of which 58,940 were in Ontario. The average number of animals in a herd was 28. The percentage of infection in cattle was 2·8, and in the herds 16 per cent; that is 16 per cent of the herds had reactors, infected animals, in them. Infected herds clear after first test, 62 per cent, after second test 15 per cent, after third and subsequent tests 23 per cent. Time required to complete the report tests at research station, three to four days. That is the record of the checks up to date.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In the light of the figures which the minister has just submitted I would like to make this comment. I assume figures have been compiled from the different tests which have been made, but actual experiences proves this. First, the minister has given the percentage of cattle in a herd which have been infected.

Mr. GARDINER: No, the percentage of herds that have infected cattle in them.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I submit that even that does not give the true picture, and I suggest this to the minister. If one cow in a stable has Bang's disease, and there are 25 head in that stable, you can figure that within twelve or fifteen months twenty cattle will have it, because it is a most contagious disease. While the minister's figures are enlightening as statistics, they not only do not give the true picture but certainly should not be submitted to minimize the conditions.

Mr. GARDINER: No; they are submitted to give the facts. The hon. member said, fifty per cent of the herds are infected; this shows 16 per cent only of those checked, and 84 per cent have none.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Those figures were taken as the minister submitted them, but I repeat, and it is an astounding fact, that when you bring to light the herds which are infected, herds which were infected say in 1939 and have grown out of it as far as the actual effect on the breeding of stock is concerned, still remain carriers and can infect any herd directly or indirectly. These figures in themselves do not reflect the practical effect of the infection in herds.

Another thing: as the minister has said, the department has carried on experiments in the station at Hull in connection with the inoculation of calves. All that is in an experimental stage, and my experience with the department has been that not enough attention has been given to it, not enough money has been spent to be effective and in order that the departmental officials can advise cattle-raisers what they should do.

As I said a minute ago, there is nothing certain about inoculation. It has been tried in calves from four to six, four to eight and four to ten months. With the new serum which I believe the department has developed, they are advising the inoculation of heifers or animals up to twenty-four months and thirty months. In New York state, I believe the minister will agree with me, they have adopted the policy of inoculation of cattle—not only their calves and heifers but their breeding stock. I think that policy has been adopted within the last twelve months, but the import of the whole thing is that we should recognize the devastation that is being caused, the terrific monetary loss, the national loss of food as well as the menace to human beings. In my opinion the investigation of Bang's disease is the most important item in this connection. It is causing greater loss of time and production and greater monetary loss than infection from tuberculosis or any other disease.

Mr. SENN: I do not wish to magnify the difficulties nor do I wish to paint too dark a picture, but I am afraid the statistics the minister has given—

Mr. GARDINER: By way of correction, I did not read the statistics to prove anything except that fifty per cent is a high figure. I do not want anyone to suggest that I am not just as anxious to eradicate Bang's disease as any other member who is speaking here.

Mr. SENN: I would not suggest that for a moment. Perhaps the figure which the hon. member for Northumberland and I quoted is too high. On the other hand, the minister did quote statistics, and I do not think they give a true picture, because I fear that a great many of the herds that were worst affected did not appear in it. There seems to be an inclination on the part of a man who has a herd in which there is Bang's disease to keep it quiet and try to work at it himself.

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the herds I have taken in have been put under the supervision of the department to clean them up.

Mr. SENN: May I offer a suggestion? If the minister wants a true picture there are certain counties, I understand, where they are testing herds for tuberculosis to bring them under the restricted areas plan. Would it be too difficult at the same time—

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

Mr. GARDINER: You cannot do them at the same time.

Mr. SENN: Then you might do them when you came back. At any rate, it would be a good thing if some area were gone over, such as a county for tuberculosis, going into everyone's herd and finding out how many there are.

Mr. GARDINER: The main reason we are not doing that is that the facts are as they have been brought out in connection with tuberculosis. We have not enough men now to do the work. The chief reason for not doing what is being suggested is that we have not the man-power at the moment to do it and have not had for some time. We are cleaning up tuberculosis, and one difficulty is that you cannot do the two operations at the same time. You have to double up on the work.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Could you not make the blood test at the same time?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand not.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I submit that the blood test could be taken at the same time for both diseases.

Mr. GRAYDON: Bang's disease or contagious abortion in cattle is a vital problem that cannot be too strongly impressed upon the people. In the years I have sat in the house, time after time, this question has come up. In our own dairy herd at home years ago we had a plague of Bang's disease and I think I know personally something of what has been described this afternoon by the hon. member for Northumberland, so far as its effects are concerned. It is one of the most dangerous and damaging of all diseases among cattle, not only from the standpoint of loss of production and of calves but also from the resulting scourge of undulant fever, which is induced among human beings by drinking milk of that type. In connection with tests for Bang's disease, as the minister knows, the blood tests are taken and are then sent to the animal diseases research institute in Hull, Quebec. As the hon. member for Haldimand has said, there are also facilities at Guelph agricultural college for tests in connection with Bang's disease, and if I remember rightly in the laboratories at Queen's park facilities are also provided for that purpose. I do not normally cite individual instances, and I do not do so on this occasion except by way of illustrating a situation. But here is the situation that exists, and it is one that should come before the committee. I have brought it to the minister's attention before and I do not want him to think that in bringing it up again here my object is unduly to embarrass him.

In one particular herd, that of Mr. Greenwood, at Woodbridge, which is not far from my own home, three tests were made for Bang's disease. This gentleman has an excellent herd of cattle, pure bred, registered and accredited. These tests were all negative, but a fourth test was made in which one cow showed positive. Shortly after that a test of this cow was made at Guelph agricultural college and perhaps at some other place, although I am not sure about that. At any rate, it was made and showed negative. Of course the herd as a whole was then incapable of being listed as Bang's-disease free. Mr. Greenwood's contention was that at the animal research institute in Hull some error may have been made in the testing. That may or may not be so, but in his mind that was a possibility. Because of the fact that there was a conflict between the tests, the department still holds that in that particular instance the positive test must be the one that governs. I understand from the department that sometimes these tests show at one time positive and at another time negative, but it is hard for the breeder to understand this if the tests are properly made.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It is generally negative and then positive.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had no object in giving precedence to one over the other.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): But it is generally that way.

Mr. GRAYDON: In any event, in this particular instance I know that four cattle were sold out of the herd and allowed by the department to go into other herds which were already listed, although this herd had never been listed owing to the fact that it had not had a negative reaction in each instance. I bring this to the minister's attention again, not because I wish to be merely critical, but because these are things which it is very difficult for the minister or the department or members of parliament to explain to breeders. Here is a single cow in the whole herd showing a positive reaction just once in all these tests and because of that the herd cannot get certification. I suggest to the minister that that instance may be illustrative of others. It may look like going pretty far, and it is a situation which would easily work a good deal of hardship and inconvenience to a bona fide breeder who is attempting to maintain a herd which is a credit to himself and of great assistance to production. I cite this case merely to seek some relief and as an illustration in the hope that the experience gained from it may be utilized to advantage by other breeders who from time to time have like problems.

Mr. FAIR: This question has been brought up on several occasions, particularly by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I brought it up a couple of years ago, and I am not sure that we are making the necessary headway with it. I think it is realized that prevention is better and cheaper than cure.

I have an item here which may be of interest. It was taken from the Western Producer of March 9 of this year. It is headed: "Hopeful of Controlling Bang's Through Vaccine," and reads as follows:

> Two Alberta cattlemen, Dean W. L. Carlyle of Calgary, and Sam Henderson of Lacombe, returned recently from a conference on Bang's disease control, held at Denver, Colorado. They represented Alberta cattle associations, and carried instructions to learn the new methods being tried out in the United States for control of this disease.
>
> The men stated that 97·4 per cent of the pure bred cattle breeders in Colorado were practising calfhood vaccination to control the disease, and that of 500,000 head vaccinated in the last three years, only seven later developed Bang's.
>
> "They are only in the experimental stage, but the outlook for controlling this disease is distinctly hopeful," said Dean Carlyle on his return. "I hope we can get cooperative action of the same kind in Canada."

We have followed the lead of the United States in several other matters, and if they are able to give us a lead in this I do not think we should be slow in following it. I also believe we should not be slow in following some new cures that have been suggested in Canada. If some of the old ones do not give the results then it would be wise to start out on something new. During the year 1943 how many cattle were slaughtered in Canada because of Bang's disease? What amount was paid as compensation by the government, and what is the loss to the owners of the cattle that were slaughtered? I ask these questions because when we get the destruction in dollars and cents it sometimes impresses itself on our minds more than anything else.

Mr. GARDINER: That is exactly the question raised by the hon. member for Northumberland. He has suggested that we ought to be doing the same thing for Bang's disease as we are doing for tuberculosis. As a matter of fact we are not. We are not paying for cattle slaughtered on account of Bang's disease. We do not control their slaughter or pay for their slaughter. He suggested that we should be doing that the same as we are for tuberculosis. In most of the states they are paying for the slaughter of cattle that have Bang's disease, the same as we do for tuberculosis. They may not be paying for them on the same basis, but they are paying for them. The question has been raised, and what I have said with regard to it is that our main difficulty at the moment is man-power with which to handle it. We are facing a difficult problem now with tuberculosis and our men are more than fully employed with that. We are not able to get along with it as rapidly as we would like to. We figure it would take at least fifty additional men to do the work that we think we ought to be doing now. Our main difficulty is to get more men to handle this problem along with the problem we are dealing with.

Mr. FAIR: I take it that as soon as men are available something drastic will be done to curtail this disease.

Mr. GARDINER: Even with the information we have we are not able to enter upon a plan at the moment such as we have for tuberculosis. A great many farmers are very careful about it themselves. Most of the breeders will not admit animals to their farms until they have been tested. Farmers shipping cattle from one part of Canada to another insist upon tests being made. When we bought the cattle in the west in 1937 as a result of the drought, all the female cattle that passed through the pasture at Carberry were tested for Bang's disease and tuberculosis. We have a complete record of those cattle. They were not the best of the cattle, and I would think that their record would probably be as high, at least as high, as it would be for the general cattle population over that area. The actual number of reactors was very low. We have been making checks wherever it is possible to make them, and we have been making them as fully as we can with the staffs available. But we have not undertaken to pay for the slaughter of cattle on account of Bang's disease as we have on account of tuberculosis.

Mr. FAIR: Would the minister give the percentage for Alberta as he did for Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not give the percentage for Ontario; I gave the percentage for all Canada. I hesitate to give the percentage for the different provinces, for this reason. In Manitoba there were only seven herds tested. I would take it from the figure here that the person who asked to have the test made knew that there was some Bang's in the herd, because the percentage is very high. Alberta only had twelve. I would assume the same thing with regard to Alberta. The percentage is very high there; but when you take the percentage from Prince Edward Island across the country of all the cattle the average percentage is 2·7. I think it would give a wrong impression to put out the figure for Alberta and Manitoba, because it is unreasonably high.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister said that he thought the breeders knew there was Bang's in their herds when they asked to have them tested. I think that is the wrong inference to draw. I am inclined to think that the opposite is the fact; that certain herds had been tested locally before they were submitted to the department for certification, and that little if any Bang's disease had shown up.

Mr. GARDINER: It would depend entirely on the individual. I recall the first year I was here the question came up as to whether we were going to mark animals that were positive. I had a strong representation from the cattle breeders objecting to marking them. Hon. members who were here at the time will recall that we had intended to put a big "B" on their cheek so that any one walking into the stable could see that the animal had been tested and was positive for Bang's disease. There was objection to that, and we finally put the "B" in the ear of the animal. We had objection from the breeders and others who said that if a man walks into our barns and sees a big "B" on the animal we will not be able to sell anything.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are using the ear now?

Mr. GARDINER: At the present time we are marking them in the ear with a "B", and anyone who wishes to look over the animals can see that they have been tested and that certain ones have reacted positively for Bang's. The marking is there. That was the question at that time. It has come along from there to where it is at the present time, that nobody questions the marking, and we have an agitation in this house for having them all tested. I think every one would be tested if we had enough men and enough money to go out and test all the herds in the country. With regard to assisting in killing the animals by paying for their slaughter, I am informed by the officials that if we were to undertake to do that, the statement made by the hon. member for Haldimand and the hon. member for Northumberland would be borne out. At least we think the result would be that more animals would be slaughtered for Bang's disease than are now slaughtered for tuberculosis. That emphasizes the problem that will have to be dealt with as soon as we can get the necessary man-power.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to revert to the matter referred to by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask one further question in connection with Bang's disease. Has the minister had any complaints in regard to errors in testing at the Hull laboratories?

Mr. GARDINER: I should have dealt with that point when I was speaking. I would not say it is a common thing, but it does sometimes happen that an animal gives a positive result at one time and a negative result at another, and may continue to do so. You may check that animal one day and get a negative result; another time the result will be positive. I think I am correct in saying that in some cases after a very considerable number of tests they have agreed that probably the animal will continue negative. However, if we are to apply the principle that once an animal tests positive something must be done about it, I do not see how we can pass up any animal that once gives a positive result. I am told, too, though I do not fully understand these matters as I am sure most hon. members do not understand them, that when the blood of these animals is sent in for test there is the possibility of doubt in some cases. A person who is very strict may say that the result is positive; another person may consider it doubtful, and perhaps someone else would even say it was negative, though I am not sure of that. In any case there might be at least two opinions on the case. I understand there have been instances where blood of the same animal has been sent to two places, with slightly different reports from each. However, every care is taken to avoid anything of that kind by having all cases dealt with in exactly the same way at all the stations. If the blood is sent to two official stations, the report from each should be the same, though of course the personal element enters into all these things to a degree. Where there was doubt about an animal the only way to clear up that herd and make absolutely certain of it would be to kill or get rid of the animal. That would put the herd back in position, and that is the argument for the government paying part of the loss. A farmer would be more likely to get rid of such an animal immediately with the government paying part of the loss than he would be if nothing were paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I understand the minister correctly, it is possible that where there has been only one positive reaction followed by a number of negative results, the animal might be declared free of disease.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that once it is definitely classed as positive the department does not retest it. If there is any doubt about it, however; if it is a borderline case and the individual concerned expresses doubt, it may be retested.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems to me that is pretty arbitrary.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I think this question has been covered pretty well, but it seemed to me the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, put the percentage rather high when he said fifty per cent of the herds were infected. As a matter of fact I believe that seventy-five per cent of the cattle in Ontario, either beef cattle or dairy cattle, belong to herds tested and free from Bang's disease and tuberculosis. I doubt very much if a man would buy one of these better breeders and put it in with his herd unless it had been tested for both tuberculosis and Bang's disease. I also doubt whether a man could sell one of the better breeders in the United States, even if it came from an area free from tuberculosis, without an individual test being made. The unfortunate thing is that these tests are not one hundred per cent accurate, that an animal may test positive one time and negative another. That is true in connection with tuberculosis; some of the most advanced cases gave a negative result when the blood was tested, so that these tests are not absolutely conclusive. Many of the herds which become infected with Bang's disease build up their own immunities within a short time. Those cattle may go on and be fairly successful herds of breeders, but they will be carriers and in most cases will react to the blood test. It seems to me one of the things to which the department should give a great deal of attention is the inoculation of cattle with the serum used for protection against Bang's disease. My information is that if cattle are inoculated at a certain stage, perhaps before they are twelve or fifteen months old, they are made practically immune to the ravages of Bang's disease. If that is true it would seem to be the logical way to eliminate this disease.

Mr. BRYCE: Coming back to the matter of condemnation insurance, the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough was not quite sure of his figures. On two previous occasions I have put on record figures obtained from the department. According to these figures in 1943 we killed over six million hogs, and ·19 of one per cent of the value would have carried that condemnation insurance, but we paid one-half of one per cent, as we have paid it ever since 1906 or 1907. I obtained from the minister's records the number of animals killed and the number condemned, and found that one-quarter of one per cent would have carried this condemnation insurance last year. Putting it into dollars and cents, we sold approximately $363,000,000 worth of live stock, on which we paid one-half of one per cent or approximately $1,600,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Over what period?

Mr. BRYCE: That is only for one year, 1943. In that year we paid the packing companies of Canada over $500,000 more than was required to carry the condemnation insurance. When I spoke previously I appealed to the minister to have this matter handled by the government in order that we might have some control over it. On the last occasion this matter was discussed the minister told me that payment of this condemnation insurance was not compulsory. That is correct; I can go to the packer with my live stock and say I do not want him to take off that insurance. He will reply, "Well, you can take your stock somewhere else." That is the position; it is not compulsory, but you cannot sell your stock unless you agree to this deduction. To-day that condemnation insurance takes care of other things than loss through tuberculosis, though on the statement the reason given is for tuberculosis insurance. When I ship my cattle or hogs by common carrier the law of the land requires that they have insurance to take care of them. From the moment the animal enters the truck or the railway car until it comes out again, I have to pay for insurance to cover it. But when you have a cow spread on the killing floor, or a cow breaking its leg on the killing floor, surely that is not the responsibility of the farmer. Yet he is paying for it through condemnation insurance.

I do not wish to dwell on the point; the minister knows my views in the matter. I should like to see it handled by his department or by a board of live stock commissioners. I went back in the records as far as I could trace, to 1906 and 1907, and never in any one year did it take more than half of one per cent to carry that condemnation insurance. And in forty years, a few thousand dollars each year would have been a very handy sum to be used by breeders' associations in their efforts to get better bulls, or better sires of one kind or another. Some might say that it was too small an amount to divide among the farmers, but there were many things for which it could have been used.

While I am on my feet may I touch upon compensation for animal slaughtering? I understand this involves T.B. insurance; is that correct? We have heard about T.B. insurance, and T.B. free areas. Condemnation insurance was begun away back in 1906, because many tubercular cattle were reaching the plants. The Department of Agriculture in those early days—I do not know how early—established T.B. free areas. Those T.B. free areas were established through a two-thirds vote, and when they came in all herds were tested. Retests were made within sixty days and in every twelve months following. In that way T.B. free areas were established. At that time the rate set was two-thirds of the value of the animal. That rate was all right when one could buy a cow for $60 or $70, and received $38 for the condemned animal. That amount was placed on the purchase price of another animal. I come from an area which is to-day established as a T.B. free area, and on a cow condemned for T.B. one receives $38, or the same amount to-day as he did ten or twenty years ago. Yet to-day one must pay about $200 to replace the animal. The minister will realize just how unfair that is.

Mr. GARDINER: I raised the question myself six or seven years ago, when cows were worth about $20 a head. However at that time we continued to pay on the same basis. I doubt very much if it would be advisable to go up and down, or to follow values at all times.

Mr. BURTON: That would have been a good time to eradicate tuberculosis, would it not?

Mr. BRYCE: I am pleased that the minister is interested in this matter, and I am sure he will see at once the injustice of the present practice. No man will ever turn down the offer of cleaning up his herd, to see that there is no T.B. in it; yet he will receive only $38 for an animal worth anywhere from $175 to $200.

In the fall of 1942 in the Red River valley we put a thousand cows into the packing plant for T.B. Look at the loss we took on those cows. If too small an amount is paid it will act as a hindrance to the eradication of T.B. I would ask the minister to give me the assurance that I could go back to Selkirk and tell the people there that he is sympathetic, and that he is going to try to do something. It is most unfair to pay only $38 for an animal which within a few weeks must be replaced in the herd at about $175. It is out of all reason. The test is still being carried on, and it would appear that the department does not intend to pay any more in future, because the amount appearing in the estimates is even smaller than it has been.

Mr. GARDINER: What we pay is not necessarily all that the farmer receives for the animal. The regulation is that on cattle we pay 66⅔ per cent of the value of the animal, with a limitation of $60 on the value of grades. This means that we might pay $40. On pure-bred cattle we pay two-thirds, with a limitation of $150 on the value. That means we may pay $100. But in addition to that, the fact that an animal is condemned does not mean that the farmer cannot sell it. He may send the animal to the abattoir, and it will be paid for on some basis. It may be paid for only as tankage. That would be so if none of the animal is fit for human consumption. It may be paid for on the basis of cutting out a small gland in the neck. That may be the only part of the animal which shows contamination. All the rest of the animal would be paid for. That is, a farmer may receive almost full value for the cow as a meat animal. The simple statement, therefore, that the farmer gets only what the government pays, is scarcely in accordance with the facts. For example, to give an exact case, I know of one animal which within the last two years reached the market after being condemned for tuberculosis. The person who sold that animal got over $100 for it. In that instance, while upon inspection the animal reacted for T.B., there was only a small gland in the neck which was affected, and that was the only part which had to be destroyed. So on that basis the figures given by the hon. member do not cover the whole returns.

Reference has been made to what is sometimes called tuberculosis contamination in hogs. Perhaps the highest figure in the whole list of things for which hogs are condemned comes opposite tuberculosis. But the list covers a page and a half of different things for which hogs may be condemned.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes, but ·19 of one per cent covers all the others.

Mr. GARDINER: One of the bigger groups is contamination. In connection with swine there were 122,865, only portions of which were contaminated. Coming to tuberculosis, we find that 4,726 carcasses were condemned but the number of carcasses of which only portions were condemned was 2,684,386.

You cannot just take the value of the hogs that come in and then take the condemnation figure, and then say that you have a comparison there from which you can draw conclusions. It would not be possible to do that. That is why those who are asking for some change in policy or that some report be made from time to time suggest that there ought to be an investigation made. That is why investigations have been made from time to time. If you just say that so many hogs came on to the market; that so many hogs were destroyed because they were condemned, and that one half of one per cent of the value of the hogs is taken by the packing plants, one could arrive at the conclusion that the packing plants were getting too much. But you cannot do it in that way, and I am afraid that that is what the hon. member was doing. I am not saying that the packers are not getting more than they are entitled to, because I have no reason for saying one thing more than another. I am simply saying that any investigations which have been made have tended to indicate that the fund just about covers the amount.

Mr. BRYCE: I agree in the main with what the minister has said. But take a hog that has a little T.B. in the neck. There is half of one per cent collected for that. The farmer gets the full price for his hog but the packer sells the full hog.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that that is all considered when the investigations are made. They take into consideration what the packer got for his hogs and what he paid out.

Mr. BRYCE: I have taken these things into consideration too. Talk about making a T.B. free area; I have gone through all that. You do get the odd cow which makes beef but they are very few and far between.

Mr. GARDINER: It is really the other way around.

Mr. BRYCE: I was accused of sitting on boards around Winnipeg, but if you had said that I had been in the packing plant, as I have been, finding out things, you would have been nearer the point. When we had that T.B. free area I followed the cattle through the packing plant. When an animal goes into the tank you get only the hide, you have to pay for the killing, and you would think these fellows were carpenters the way they charge you for killing an animal.

Mr. WARD: I agree entirely with what the hon. member for Selkirk says about the condemnation insurance being too high, but he is entirely wrong when he says that it is compulsory. It is not compulsory. I know a great many shippers who have never paid condemnation insurance. If you sell your stock outright to the drover the drover takes the responsibility, but if you ship your stock on a commission basis you are perfectly free to designate whether you want to pay condemnation insurance or not.

I should like to say a word in regard to the treatment we have received from the department with respect to T.B. tested animals. Some years ago I had my herd of pure-bred cattle subjected to the test. I had eleven reactors. I considered them worth about $6,000 and I received in the final analysis a little over $200 apiece for these animals. That does not sound very much like the $38 that my hon. friend spoke about a few minutes ago.

Mr. BRYCE: Were the hon. member's cattle pure-bred Aberdeen Angus?

Mr. WARD: Yes.

Mr. BRYCE: I am just a poor man, mine were grades.

Mr. WARD: I should like to point this out, that of the eleven head, only one went to the tank. All the rest were slaughtered and the meat was used for domestic purposes. I am inclined to think my hon. friend has overdrawn the picture considerably. I spent a day in his district just two and a half weeks ago and I saw a very nice herd of dairy cattle, Holsteins. The owner of this herd was talking about selling them. I asked him what he thought his herd was worth and he said, "I would be glad if I could get $125 apiece." He had some lovely cows. Again that does not sound very much like the $175 or $200 that the hon. member was speaking of. I am inclined to think some of our hon. friends in the C.C.F. would make a little more progress if they were not quite so extravagant in their statements. They seem to think that they must overdraw the picture all the time; that they must stretch their imaginations in presenting a case. Some of us are not impressed by these extravagant statements. I believe that we can make a little better progress if we keep our feet on the ground and just be a little conservative in the statements we make.

Mr. SENN: It is always well to be conservative.

Mr. WARD: I agree with my hon. friend, but I am surprised that he has not had more influence upon hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. They do cooperate with his party at times, but he does not seem to have influenced them in presenting a more reasonable case before the house.

Mr. BRYCE: I would draw to the attention of my hon. friend the member for Dauphin, when he talks about misquoting, that last night he said that he quoted me from Hansard, which was an untruthful statement. He said that I took 280 days to put 300 pounds on a steer. The way I felt when he was speaking was, "where ignorance is bliss "tis folly to be wise," and I held my tongue, but I am correcting him now. I said, and it will be found in Hansard, that I would take 180 days to put 300 pounds on the back of a steer, and you have to be a good feeder to do it—irrespective of what you do yith your Aberdeen Angus. So do not talk about overdrawing the picture.

Mr. STOKES: I thought, Mr. Chairman, we were discussing this item in a non-political manner, but the discussion seems to be getting a little out of hand. I do not wish to prolong it. I just want to say to the hon. member for Selkirk that when he first started to speak he quoted the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough as having been mixed up in his figures. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough was giving the figures for Ontario, and I think the figures were secured from the hog breeders' association. They showed an average collected of $250,000 a year and only about 3,000 head condemned which would bring it to about $75,000. That leaves a large balance running from $175,000 to $200,000. We must remember that fully 15 to 20 per cent of all the parts condemned are recoverable in by-products by the abattoir. To me this seems to be the only class of insurance for which no accounting has to be given, and I should like to hear a word from the minister on that.

Mr. SENN: While awaiting the minister's answer—

Mr. GARDINER: An answer to what?

Mr. SENN: The hon. member for Hastings South wanted the minister to clear up some point. We have had a long discussion of contagious diseases of one kind or another. The discussion has been very interesting and I think it might be of some benefit to the live stock industry.

There is another disease which is quite rampant in the province of Ontario, and possibly in the west, known as shipping fever or hemorrhagic septicaemia. The ravages of that disease are quite apparent. We in Ontario buy a lot of cattle for feeding purposes, and hardly ever a carload comes into the neighbourhood but has to be immediately looked after or some are lost through this disease of hemorrhagic septicaemia. I have no doubt whatever that the department is aware of this disease and knows what is going on, and I should like the minister to make a short statement as to what is being done by the department to overcome the disease.

Mr. GARDINER: The department of course is aware of the disease and has been keeping in as close touch as possible with it from time to time. The organism producing this disease is widely distributed through nature and only becomes pathogenic through exciting influences. Serious losses occur in shipments owing to shipping poorly fed, weakened animals. Losses could be prevented if only animals with normal resistance to disease were shipped and given adequate rest and feeding en route. Vaccination is harmful unless practised a week or ten days before cattle leave the farm. Serum is of value after a movement but it is too expensive to be used in that way. This disease may affect all domestic animals including poultry. It is a disease of the soil and the germs are not normally disease-producing. It is not a suitable disease to include with those for which this act provides compulsory notice and action. The germs are always present in the soil of stockyards and places where live stock are or have been handled. Germs are present in the bodies of healthy cattle, but do not produce disease unless the normal resisting powers are lowered through exposure to sudden changes of temperature and bad feeding methods and care and to fatigue. The department has issued a leaflet giving the best preventive measures, and that can be secured by anyone who is interested in it for the purpose.

Mr. SENN: Some of the ideas which were advanced by the minister seem to me to be peculiar to say the least. I know that for years past, while the Toronto exhibition was going on—it is closed for the duration of the war—some of the best-nourished cattle in the country contracted the disease by going to the exhibition. In fact, in the last three or four years before the exhibition closed no good breeder would dream of sending his cattle to the exhibition without having them vaccinated ahead of time. So that I cannot see or think that it is only dangerous to poorly fed or poorly nourished cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what was stated a moment ago.

Mr. SENN: I think if the minister reads the first part of his statement he will see that is what it says.

Mr. GARDINER: No; it gives a number of things. It says that the germs are present in the bodies of healthy cattle, but do not produce disease unless the normal resisting powers are lowered through exposure to sudden changes of temperature and bad feeding methods and care and to fatigue. That is, the fact that an animal is fat and well fed does not prevent it from being tired, as when it is on its way from one fair to another. As a matter of fact, the way they shoot them around between fairs is the kind of thing which would fatigue them.

Mr. SENN: I am not going to pursue the matter any farther. I am glad that the minister and the department have the matter in hand, and I know they will do everything they can to see proper provision is made.

I asked the minister another question early in the afternoon which, since he was taken up with other matters, he did not think to answer. I asked how many herds had been inspected by this department and given a tuberculin test, so that permits could be granted to send milk and cream to the United States under the existing treaty.

Mr. GARDINER: Only one last year. As a matter of fact, it is not being shipped at present—which is the main reason.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now that this discussion has been completed there is another matter I should like to bring up. I dislike putting forward individual cases unless a principle is involved. I refer to the case of a representative of this department in Saskatoon and Prince Albert, Doctor Turnbull, who commenced his duties with the government under the health of animals branch a long period prior to the war. In March or April of 1943, having applied for leave of absence in order to enlist for overseas service, and that leave of absence having been refused, he tendered his resignation. In or about the beginning of the present year, following an accident, he was discharged from the air force, in which he was serving, and then made application for reinstatement in the position which he had previously held. The minister showed every consideration to this man in his application, but after a very considerable delay the civil service commission decided that under the law he was not entitled to reinstatement in the position he occupied at the time of his resignation in order to enlist.

In my opinion a very important principle is at stake in connection with this matter. Similar cases have occurred in one or other departments; and I believe that the government must give the lead to the end that civil servants and government employees who enlist for service shall be reinstated when their service has terminated. Otherwise private employers may take the attitude that if the government will not follow out that principle they themselves should not be required to do so.

As I say, I know the attitude taken by the minister in this connection: it was fair, and there is no criticism coming to him. I should like a statement from him in regard to this case; for if the law to-day is as was stated by the civil service commission, civil servants who patriotically finding themselves refused leave of absence, and of necessity resign their positions in order to get into military service, will be penalized because of their desire to serve. The minister took a great interest in this case and did everything he possibly could in order to ensure that this man after service should obtain reinstatement. I ask him to make a statement on the matter and inform us what measures are being taken by his or other government departments to ensure that there shall be a change in the civil service regulations, so that men in similar circumstances—and there are a very considerable number of them—will obtain reinstatement when the war is over or upon their discharge from the armed services.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that in this case the department had recommended that he be put back. As a matter of fact, he is back working.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But only in a temporary position.

Mr. GARDINER: He has been put on for the time being at the bottom of the class, whereas the salary had advanced before he enlisted. The department has recommended that he be put on at least as high up the scale as he was when he enlisted, and I have no hesitation in saying that so far as I am concerned as minister that is where he is going.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank the minister for what he says because I realized that was his attitude. Will a change be asked for by this and other departments of government in connection with—

Mr. GARDINER: I have nothing to do with other departments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I finish the question. Will a change in the law be demanded by the Department of Agriculture in the civil service regulations to ensure that this sort of thing shall not be permitted in the future?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GARDINER: I can assure my hon. friend that every pressure which the department and I can put on will be used. I think this is a case in which there should be no quibbling at all. My opinion is that any man who went overseas from a job with this government ought to come back to it, if he is capable of doing so, with at least the same salary as he had before he enlisted. I intend to insist upon that so far as this man is concerned.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

17. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $372,620.

Mr. SENN: What is the explanation of this item in comparison with the former one?

Mr. GARDINER: This is the item under which compensation comes.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

19. Plant products—Seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $558,345.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I wonder if I might refer to the men who produce these seeds, feeds and so on. I have in mind the men engaged for years on steady service at the experimental farms but who are not considered eligible for the civil service. They are doing hard work outside the walls of offices, while their associates do the more comfortable work inside; but whereas one group of men comes within the civil service, the other is not considered eligible. I have before me a statement with regard to the men engaged on the Brandon experimental farm about which I spoke this morning. On that staff is one man who has given thirty-five years of unbroken service with neither holidays nor sick leave, to which he was not entitled. Another has given twenty-two years; another, nineteen years; two have given sixteen years; one, fifteen; one, fourteen; one thirteen; two others, six years, and two others, five years. Putting it briefly, these men have given the best of their lives to this work, and I think it is an unwarranted discrimination that they are not admitted to the same benefits of the civil service as their associates enjoy. I do not think it is really the fault of anyone in particular; it is one of those things that have been allowed to drag along. But it does not savour of fair play or even of common sense. I know these men personally and I can assure the committee that they do not want something for nothing. They are the type of men who have always given an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. I suggest that even now some amendment might be made whereby these men would be entitled to the benefits of the civil service. It is late in the day, but some retroactive step might be taken. Their eligibility should date after two or three years of continuous service. I am not speaking of men who are there only in the summer months but of men who are devoting their lives to this work. I suggest to the minister—and I believe I have his undivided sympathy—that, if possible, something be done to make these men eligible.

Mr. WINKLER: In support of what the hon. member has said, in my experience of the work at Morden, there is a considerable number of those who have not received consideration for years, such as civil service employees enjoy, and it is more a matter of oversight than anything else. There is a principle involved, and I suggest that a check-up be made of those employees who have been steadily engaged for years but who have not received the benefits that accrue to civil service employees. Something should be done to ascertain how many men have been overlooked.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope, Mr. Chairman, you are not going to permit everyone in whose district there is an experimental farm to raise this question. We discussed experimental farms earlier.

Mr. WRIGHT: A few words with regard to fertilizers. The other day Doctor James, President of McGill university, stated that to-day, among the various technical advances made in Canada since the war started, was increased production of chemical fertilizers. He stated that these fertilizers were being produced at the present time at a fraction of their former cost. I do not know whether that statement is correct, but if it is, that reduction in cost has not been passed on to the farmers in the price they are paying for fertilizer.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the statement?

Mr. WRIGHT: That fertilizer was being produced in Canada at a fraction of what it cost to produce before the war started. He said that there had been technical developments whereby chemical fertilizer was being produced more cheaply than formerly. If that is so, why has not the reduction in cost been passed on to consumers? Further, with regard to fertilizers, I believe the minister put certain figures on Hansard in answer to a question of mine regarding an increase in the production of fertilizers. At that time he said that the requirements were being supplied in full before fertilizer was exported. I am afraid I have to disagree on that, for certainly the requirements of western Canada were not met in full last spring. I have received several inquiries with regard to fertilizer, and complaints were made that farmers could not obtain fertilizer last spring. Certainly our exports have increased tremendously in chemical fertilizers. I think our own consumers should be considered before this fertilizer is exported.

Mr. GARDINER: An answer was put on Hansard earlier in the session with regard to the matter which has been referred to by the hon. member for Melfort. However, I would point out that the ingredient of fertilizer which was referred to as being produced at greatly reduced cost is ammonium nitrate. It is produced in the plant at Calgary, but that production is for war purposes. Only a very small proportion of it is being utilized in Canada for fertilizer. Of course, when the war is over it will be possible to take that product and use it for fertilizer purposes, and there should be a reduced cost in connection with it in so far as fertilizer purposes are concerned at that time. At least, I think there should be. I am not familiar at the moment with the volume that is being produced now and with the volume that would be produced then to satisfy any demands that there may be for the use of it as fertilizer, but there should be some reduction in the cost of it, although that would not show in fertilizer to any great extent up to the present.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I am in order I should like to ask a few questions in connection with bulbs. I presume it comes under the item of seed. Have any plans been made in connection with the production of bulbs in Canada? I refer particularly to daffodils and tulips. As I understand it, at the present time bulbs are produced in two provinces in Canada. Everybody knows we used to import a tremendous quantity of bulbs from Holland. That has been cut off and we have a wonderful opportunity to build up that industry. I noticed yesterday that it is reported that 200,000 acres had been flooded in Holland. I presume the crop is entirely lost for years. We in British Columbia, particularly in the Fraser valley and on Vancouver island to a certain extent, grow bulbs and ship several carloads east every year. This is an industry which takes quite a few years to get into. It is an expensive industry to get started. I think we have an ideal chance on the small farms in the Fraser valley to get started so that the soldiers coming back will have something to go into.

That is particularly true of the seven hundred Jap farms that we have taken over. Only certain places are suitable for this crop; the soil conditions have to be favourable. That is the reason why the industry is confined to one area in the Fraser valley, Bradner district which was pioneered by an Englishman. We are rather proud of the fact that we have built up such an industry there. We are shipping several carloads to eastern Canada. Is the Department of Agriculture taking any steps to build up this industry? I believe it is an opportunity to build up something for the future without competing with anything. There is a future market for these bulbs. We all realize that generally we have to compete with world markets in anything we produce. In this particular line I understand there will be a market in Canada for many years to come for anything that we can possibly produce within Canada. What steps are being taken, if any, by the Department of Agriculture to further this industry?

Mr. GARDINER: When the hon. member rose to speak he asked whether this was the proper item under which to discuss this matter. I would say that it is not. There is no provision here for anything like that. When we come to horticulture under which it does come that would be the proper place to discuss it. It might come under experimental farms. There would probably be an opportunity to discuss it under item 26 which deals with grant to Canadian horticultural council. I have not the information before me at the moment, but I shall try to have it here this evening.

Mr. HATFIELD: With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Melfort on surplus fertilizer produced in Canada, I understand that there was a great surplus of ammonium nitrate produced in Ontario and Calgary which was exported to the United States for fertilizer purposes. I refer to a great surplus over and above war requirements.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; while it is quite true that there is ammonium nitrate used for fertilizer purposes, it is part of an exchange which we make between the United States and Canada in order to get potash back from there which we require in order to make our fertilizer mixtures here. There have been some price reductions in connection with it which would have some bearing on the question raised by the hon. member for Melfort; but the main factor in connection with it is the fact that we do make exchanges of the ingredients of fertilizer between this country and the United States. There has been an arrangement which involves the sending of considerable quantities.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. HATFIELD: I understand it was sold cheaper in the United States than in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I am told not; I am not familiar with that.

Mr. SENN: Would I be in order in discussing the marketing of grass seeds and clover seeds under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: I think all matters of marketing come under items 22 to 28. There is nothing in it that deals with grass seeds that I can see.

Mr. SENN: What about the special products board item? I should like to touch on the question of the marketing and growing of seeds which I think was not too well handled last year.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be under this branch here.

Mr. SENN: I do not wish to criticize particularly the department about the matter, but the special products board a little late in the season undertook to deal with all exports of grass seeds and clover seeds of all kinds. I think that was due to an arrangement made with the British food board or some other British board. Unfortunately the special products board did not take action until such time as a considerable portion of the alsike seed had been harvested and marketed in the district from which I come. The result was that a good deal of confusion was created within the trade. Unfortunately the price which they offered for export seed was not in accord with the ceiling prices in Canada. The ceiling prices in Canada were higher than the amount they were offering for export seed. The result of the whole thing was that the initial purchasers, the men who buy from the farmers and clean the seed initially, had to buy on the export basis. The price set for alsike, red clover and alfalfa was lower than the domestic price ceiling, some of which had been purchased and a good deal of which was in the hands of the farmers themselves. There was a good deal of dissatisfaction in the district over the fact that after the order came from the special products board that all seeds to be exported would have to go through their hands, the price was lower than the farmers could get otherwise. It was true that participation certificates were issued, but in the case of red clover at least I do not think these participation certificates will ever be realized.

I made some mention of this matter before, and I do not wish to elaborate it at any length now, but if the same conditions are to prevail this year and if export seed is to be marketed by the special products board they should set a price very soon. Alsike seed is being harvested at the present time in my particular section, and within two or three weeks at the outside some of it will be placed on the market. The dealers will not know what to pay unless the special products board sets the price in time. Unless that is done they will not know what to do. They want to know also whether participation certificates will be issued this year. They will want to know what the grades are to be. I understand that from time to time there is an advisory committee within the seed department which changes the grade to some extent so that the crop can be handled to the best advantage.

I know the dealers themselves are very much exercised over the situation. They are willing to cooperate with the department, not only to see that the farmers get the best possible deal but to see that the seed is properly handled and distributed throughout the country. I am afraid we in Ontario again will have to depend very largely upon the western crop for our alfalfa seed, for I do not think there will be enough of it grown in Ontario to provide for domestic consumption. I believe something should be done to see that we are protected to the extent of getting only alfalfa seed of good quality from the west, instead of the seed that has come down to us sometimes, when I am afraid we got only the skimmings of the crop. The farmers of Ontario should be put in a position that will enable them to grow alfalfa as they have grown it in days gone by. I am not offering any criticism of the department; I am merely pointing out that we would like to have arrangements made sufficiently in advance so that the crop may be harvested and marketed to the best advantage.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter would properly come under the special products board, which made the deals, but my memory is that the item went through without discussion on a previous occasion.

Mr. SENN: No; I spoke of it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that I answered then.

Mr. SENN: The minister said that he was not familiar with the circumstances.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I should place on Hansard a statement in regard to it, and I have here a list giving the sales of alfalfa seed. The seed export office did not purchase this alfalfa from exporters; it was purchased under the directive of the seeds administrator and delivered to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, who paid for the seed and in turn invoiced the office, as instructed by the seeds administrator. The special products board are the sole exporters from Canada of alsike, alfalfa, red clover and also alsike and white mixture. Under interallied agreements Canada has undertaken to export to the United Kingdom or other allies all the surplus of these seeds that can be spared over domestic requirements, and I may add that all the regulations made by order in council were for the purpose of assuring that we would have seed in Canada. We were trying to prevent so much seed from being exported that we would be left short. The special products board has established what is known as the seed export office, located at Lindsay, Ontario. This office, in order to maintain the quality and reputation of Canadian seeds abroad, purchases from qualified and experienced exporters who have heretofore been in the business and who are properly equipped to process and uniformly blend these seeds for the export market. The prices being paid exporters for these seeds, for top quality, by the special products board are as follows:

	Per 100 pounds*
Alfalfa	$31
Alsike	24
Medium red clover	27
Alsike and white mixture	27

* FAS Halifax, bags extra.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister give also the ceiling prices for domestic consumption, so that we may have a comparison?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course these prices are lower than the ceiling prices in order to maintain a supply of seeds in Canada. The prices I have just read are comparable with wholesale prices, while the retail ceiling prices are as follows:

Alfalfa	$37
Alsike	29
Red clover	34
Sweet clover, white blossom	14
Sweet clover, yellow blossom	15

Mr. SENN: Five cents a pound is a pretty good retail spread, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Part of that is covered by participation certificates, on which payments have been made within the last week.

Mr. SENN: To alsike growers?

Mr. GARDINER: On alsike and clover.

Mr. SENN: Could the minister say in what amount?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have not the amount here.

Mr. SENN: I am afraid it is critically small.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure as to the amount. These prices have been named by the board, and are lower than what are considered to be fair wholesale carload prices for No. 1 seed this year in the domestic market; I am referring to the export prices I read a few moments ago. The prices were placed on this basis in order to permit seedsmen to accumulate stocks for domestic distribution under the established retail ceilings and also to prevent wholesalers from selling to the seed export office seed that would be required for Canadian needs. Lower grades are purchased at appropriate reductions in price, depending upon purity, germination and weed seed content. Producers disposing of these clover seeds to an authorized seed dealer in the condition set forth by the board will receive from the seed dealer participation certificates on behalf of the special products board, entitling them to share proportionately in any export profits made by the board. All growers of each kind of seed participate in export profits. The seed export office has purchased to date and sold to the United Kingdom from the crop of 1943 the following:

	Pounds
Alsike and alsike and white.....	678,300
Red clover	60,000
Alfalfa	352,000

Item agreed to.

Production service—

21. Grants to agricultural organizations, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $33,500.

Mr. WOOD: Included in this item is a grant of $18,000 to the Canadian national live stock records. I do not see why this association should receive so much, because it also collects fees from breeders of pure bred stock for registering that stock, and in my opinion those fees should meet the cost of administration, although I will admit that a large proportion of the fee goes back to the various organizations concerned. I would remind the minister that we have in Canada the Holstein-Friesian association which maintains its own offices and staff. It also charges a fee for registration; it does not have the advantage of free postage, as do the Canadian national live stock records; yet it has been able to administer an institution that has become extremely wealthy and is giving splendid service. That is one question I should like the minister to answer.

Then I understand that the idea of the Canadian national live stock records is to maintain records of all pure-bred live stock in Canada; I believe they keep all the records with the exception of those kept by the Holstein-Friesian association, including the records of the horse breeders. There is one regulation which, I believe, has irritated the horse breeders. The horse breeders are obliged to register their horses with the New York Jockey Club. Not only do they have to register in the Canadian national live stock records, but also must register with the New York Jockey Club. Then, if they are going to race their horses they are compelled to register with the Incorporated Racing Association. That seems to be a rather elaborate procedure to go through.

I am not objecting so much to that, if that is considered necessary by the racing associations. What I am objecting to is that horses should be allowed to come from the United States and race on our tracks in Canada, when they do not have to register in the Canadian national live stock records. It seems to me that if our breeders are obliged to register in New York state there should be a reciprocal arrangement whereby they are forced to register in Canada, if they wish to race their horses here.

The difficulty is that the race-horse breeders in Canada find that there is a lack of scrutiny with respect of horses coming to this country. Unless we have some check on them by way of registration we can have no indication as to whether they are registered, even under the New York Jockey Club regulations. The result is that, to use a slang expression, ringers are put on the race tracks, and our breeders must compete against these unscrupulous methods of doing business. Unfortunately we are not giving enough attention to the matter, or protecting our own breeders.

To my mind it is important that we assert ourselves, and that we give the necessary protection to our breeders. True, I will admit that the breeding of race-horses has not become extensive; but it is a hobby enjoyed by certain men. They like to breed that type of live stock. My purpose in raising the question is to point out that, after all, in the main, horse-racing is supposed to be a rich man's game. Fortunately, there are some honest-to-goodness dirt farmers who still like to breed fast race-horses, and I do not think they should be discouraged. It is on their behalf I am speaking, because if one were to go through the records of all types of live stock breeding, and particularly in Canada, he would find that the finest, the very best live stock is produced by the honest-to-goodness dirt farmer.

True, we welcome the wealthy man who enters the game as a hobby. They have been able to make their contribution by bringing together certain families of animals, and producing good results. But even those men find they have to go back to the honest-to-goodness dirt farmer to get the very best results. Let me tell the committee that there is something in the quality of a man's mind that finds its expression in the proper mating together of animals, to bring about certain desired results.

I have in mind a man who happened to be a neighbour of mine, and liked to breed fancy race-horses. At one time he had an opportunity to purchase a sire for the sum of $50. A wealthy man had paid $50,000 for the same sire, but did not use him or mate him with the proper mares to get results. But because this dirt farmer understood the particular virtues of that stallion, and could analyse his qualities and mate him with the proper females, in a few years he was in a position to produce one of the best and greatest money-making race-horses on the Canadian circuit. Then he found out that because he was making so much money the stewards of the Canadian racing association found some excuse to put him off the tracks.

I am not blaming the federal department for that because, after all, the racing association is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. But I do point out that that is a matter which should be looked into as early as possible, and that the racing association should be under the control of a commission. There should be far more jurisdiction over it than there is at the present time.

The whole thing follows out a certain scheme and philosophy. I feel that I am here to protect the interests of the honest-to-goodness dirt farmer. If it were not out of order I should like at this point to analyse some of the results of breeding, as they are set out in the national live stock records. I could show from those records that the greatest cows in Canada to-day were the result of careful mating under the control of honest-to-goodness dirt farmers. If one will analyse the records of performance as they are set out in the Dairy Journal he would find that while some wealthy people own cattle which they milk four times a day, and produce certain records, the average farmer who cannot afford to milk four times a day obtains very good results. As one goes down the list he will find that it is the honest-to-goodness dirt farmer, the farmer who has the cows which milk only twice a day, who has the better record. His record is even better than those fellows who milk four times a day.

I see the hon. member for Haldimand smiling. Well, he has a neighbour in his constituency, an honest-to-goodness dirt farmer, who produced the first 30,000-pound cow in Canada. That was Jemima of Riverside. I could give the committee the history of many other cows, such as Paulina Calantha Posch, whose progeny were the foundation of many Holstein herds to-day. The same blood was the foundation of that great farm, Hudson Heights, owned by Mr. T. B. Macaulay, who sold some of these high-priced cows. Paulina Calantha Posch was a cow bred by an ordinary dirt farmer in my own county, which I have the honour to represent.

Then there were other sires like Prince Calanthus Abberkerk, which was owned by an Oxford county farmer. Those were some of the greatest animals on record in Canada, and were selections made by honest-to-goodness dirt farmers.

We cannot afford to neglect some of these things which give encouragement to ordinary farmers. I am quite prepared to admit that the raising of race-horses is a game for the rich man. There are very few ordinary farmers who can afford to take the risk of going into that line of business. But I say that when a man has the desire and the foresight to go into it, nothing should be put in his way to discourage him. There should be no regulation or reciprocal arrangement which would make it more difficult for him to develop that kind of business, or any development connected with agriculture.

Mr. HATFIELD: I cannot see why this vote for the Canadian national live stock records is necessary, although I believe it has been given them for some years. They charge fees sufficient to cover the keeping of records, and I do not see why such records should be kept outside the Department of Agriculture. In my view they should be kept by the department. I understand that the Canadian national live stock records have a fixed surplus of over half a million dollars. Why should we be granting them $18,000 each year?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know just what I should, or what I can say, in reply to the statement made by the hon. member for Brant. As he said, the matter he was discussing is to a large extent under the control of the provincial government. In addition to that, this Canadian national live stock records association is not a branch of the department. True, we give them a grant of $18,000, as the result of an arrangement entered into many years ago. I believe it was entered into before any of us were members of the house. The records of all breeds but the Holstein are kept by this association. The question of whether we should discontinue this grant has never been discussed since I have come into the department. I know of no reason why the grant should be discontinued. The records are well kept. Those of us who deal with them from time to time find a high degree of satisfaction in dealing with them. I know of no reason why we should discontinue the grant, but if any hon. members have any reasons why we should, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why should they get a grant when they receive sufficient to keep the records? Why should these records not be kept by the department?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that there is no profit. The only answer would be that if they do not get the $18,000 they would have to charge more. That might be the proper way to do it.

Mr. HATFIELD: How did they build up a surplus of half a million dollars?

Mr. GARDINER: The breed associations may have a surplus, but I understand that this particular organization has no surplus.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

22. Marketing service administration, $106,090.

Mr. SENN: There is one increase, which is largely due to a new appointment, that of agricultural commissioner. That is the only addition to the staff. What are the duties of the commissioner?

Mr. GARDINER: The commissioner is Mr. J. G. Robertson. It will be remembered that a few years ago we appointed an agricultural commissioner, who was sent to London. Unfortunately he lost his life in the sinking of a ship in 1940 or 1941, and the vacancy was not filled until this last year. Mr. Robertson is now in London.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to know what work the marketing service carries on at the present time. We have two marketing services, one under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the other under the Department of Agriculture. What work is the latter carrying on?

Mr. GARDINER: The marketing service of this department was set up as a new service in 1936, the year that I took over the department. Prior to that the department was organized into branches associated with different farm products. In 1936 we organized the department into four divisions, as they are indicated in these estimates; science service, production service, marketing service, and special. The terms used to designate these services indicate pretty well what they are. Under science service, scientific investigations are carried on into farming, and the experimental farms service then tries to carry out some of the suggestions made. The production service is concerned with promoting production of the best kinds of farm products, and the marketing service is interested in the marketing of these products. Under marketing service we find such items as agricultural economics, dairy products, subsidies for cold storage warehouses, fruits and vegetable products, live stock and live stock products, and the marketing of agricultural products generally.

Our chief objective in setting up the marketing service was to give first emphasis to the necessity of finding markets for farm products. As the hon. member has stated, there is a service in the Department of Trade and Commerce which attempts to take care of marketing generally, but it was thought at that time, and experience has proved that it was a proper thought, that special emphasis should be placed upon the necessity of finding markets for farm products. It will be recalled that from 1931 to 1935 or 1936, in fact almost down to the beginning of the war, there were piling up in Canada very considerable surpluses of farm products which we found difficulty in marketing. When we found difficulty in marketing any particular product our farmers had to go out of production of that product, and the result was that in many lines of farm production from 1934 to 1936 we were down pretty close to the bottom. We made an inquiry at that time, which was fully discussed in the house and outside. We sent a delegation to Great Britain to examine the whole marketing position in Great Britain and on the continent, and they came back and made a report. That report was not acceptable to everybody. It will be recalled that at the time it was questioned whether any further copies should be printed, and the printing was finally stopped after an almost complete distribution of the report had been made all over Canada If anybody wants to know the history of marketing I recommend a reading of that report, some copies of which can still be found roundabout. That report gives a true picture of the conditions that existed then in the British market and on the European continent. It gives a true picture of the marketing of farm products back over a considerable period of time.

The report recommended that certain things be done, and we have done many of these things, particularly since the war began. As a result we have been able to market a very much greater volume of our farm products than any of us ever had thought might have been marketed from the farms of this country. The whole experience in connection with that service from the time it was set up has indicated that we certainly need in Canada, and I think in the Department of Agriculture, an organization that is intent upon finding markets for farm products both at home and abroad, and that we should proceed to spend, not less money upon it, but more in order to make sure that these markets are found and made available to our farmers.

Mr. HATFIELD: I think the minister is right.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HATFIELD: Before we took recess I was saying that the minister was probably right in setting up this marketing service for the Department of Agriculture, but I do not understand why he has increased the estimate on marketing and decreased the estimate on production, at a time when there is a great demand for supplies and most agricultural products are being rationed.

I should think that now we need a larger estimate for production and a smaller estimate for marketing. No doubt we shall need an increased estimate for marketing services after the war, but at this time it looks to me as though, when the marketing service of the Department of Agriculture opens up any market, the wartime prices and trade board comes along and blocks it. When we had a market for our certified seed potatoes in the United States the export board banned the export of seed, and the result was that a large quantity of certified seed was left in Canada, especially in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and had to be sold at a much lower price, for table stock. Some of this seed was even dumped at the end of the season. During the months of January, February and March we were refused export permits. I believe this was caused by the wartime prices and trade board, and I should like to see more cooperation between the two boards and the department. It looks to me as though in the last two years the wartime prices and trade board has been opposing everything which the marketing branch of the Department of Agriculture has tried to do.

Mr. SENN: I am somewhat in agreement with the hon. member who has just spoken about this matter of marketing at this time. The minister made quite a statement at six o'clock, saying that the marketing services had been set up in their present form about 1936 or 1937, when he first came into the department. I am free to admit that they did very good work up to the time of the war. However, the minister referred to a report which is commonly known as the Shaw report and gave it credit for the increased marketing which has been experienced since that time. In my opinion any increase which has occurred in the marketing of farm products, particularly in Great Britain and other foreign parts, has been due to the war itself and its needs and not to any report which was issued prior to the war by any official of the department.

I doubt very much the necessity of having such a large marketing service at the present time, particularly when one takes into consideration the number of boards which are marketing a large part of our production. We have the wheat board marketing our wheat, the meat board marketing our meat products of all kinds, the dairy products board looking after the marketing of dairy products, the special products board concerned with the marketing of other products. Just why the minister is so anxious to keep the department at its full strength at this time is difficult to understand. I doubt very much the advisability of having so large a department. I think I know what the minister will say, that a number of officials who are in the marketing service here go to make up the boards which are handling these products as they are shipped to other countries. That is very true. But once more I am going to criticize these boards for having no producer representation. I believe we would get along much better and the boards would have to a much greater extent the confidence of the producers if the producers were represented upon them.

I do not intend to pursue the matter farther. The ministers may have information which I have not to support the necessity of keeping up such a large marketing service when we have so many boards organized for the purpose of marketing our products abroad, and when there is so large a demand for those products that, as the hon. member who just sat down remarked, we cannot fill the demands.

Mr. GARDINER: There is one point in connection with a matter which has been raised to which I think some attention should be given. It was suggested that we had this marketing report back in 1936 and that the increase which has come in connection with the marketing of farm products is largely as a result of the war. I would instance just one farm product to indicate the extent to which that is a fact. With regard to cheese, Canadian production in 1907 was 204 million pounds and our exports to Britain were 190 million pounds. Coming down to 1934, we produced 99 million pounds and exported 58 million pounds. In 1935 we produced 100 million pounds and exported 52 million pounds; that is the low point of our exports over the whole reported period. In 1936 we had these investigations made of which I spoke and started trying to encourage in the latter part of that season the production and export of cheese. By 1937 we were producing 130 million pounds and exported 80 million pounds; in 1938 we produced 123 million pounds and exported 75,950,000 pounds; in 1938 we exported 90,945,000 pounds. Before the war started we had increased our exports to Great Britain from 52 million to 90 million pounds, and I think that was largely the result of the activities which were taken at that time, not only on this side but in Britain. We put in Great Britain the representative of the department who was spoken of earlier, when we were asked why we had voted an extra salary this year for agricultural appointments, and we gave him some staff with which to promote the sale of cheese and other farm products in Great Britain, with the results I have just indicated, before the war started. It is true that in 1942 we had got our production of cheese up to within one million pounds of what it was in 1907. The increase in production continued through the war period, until in 1942 we produced between two hundred and three million pounds and we exported between 140 million and 150 million pounds to Great Britain. We were down in 1943 as compared with 1942 and we are up again this year as compared with last year. It is most important to promote not only marketing but production, and we are doing both. We are promoting the production of cheese at present, influencing that production to some extent by our action in connection with subsidies on milk and other dairy products.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Bonuses.

Mr. GARDINER: Cheese production is going up under that system at the present time. Of course, in the earlier years there was no bonus; it was merely a matter of assuring the farmer that there was a market for the product and a certain return for it and he produced the cheese.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The demand must have fallen off in Britain. Was there a question about the quality of our cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was some question, I believe.

Mr. GARDINER: A question arose toward the end of the last war with regard to our willingness to supply cheese at a price. Perhaps I should give the figures which are here before me. In 1907 we produced in Canada 204 million pounds and in that year imports into the United Kingdom from Canada amounted to 190 million pounds and imports from New Zealand to 21 million pounds. Coming to the year I mentioned, 1935, our production had gone to 100 million pounds and our exports to the United Kingdom amounted to 52 million pounds, while New Zealand's exports to the United Kingdom had risen to 197 million pounds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the reason for that?

Mr. GARDINER: There were two or three reasons, and one of the reasons explained in the report we were discussing is this. You could go to London in 1936 and walk down the Strand; you could see on every bus, and displayed prominently on buildings the sign, "Eat New Zealand Cheese".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Sales promotion.

Mr. GARDINER: But there was no Canadian sign anywhere in London at that time. We inaugurated an advertising policy partly through our own department and partly by reason of the good will of the Department of Trade and Commerce, with the result that our cheese was advertised in the same way as New Zealand cheese was being displayed, and then we went on and urged our people to produce cheese in order to meet the demand being thus created.

Mr. SENN: Can the minister give figures showing the prices realized per pound for cheese at the various times he has indicated?

Mr. GARDINER: In 1907 the price was 13·91 cents; in 1935, 11·62 cents; in 1936, 13·44 cents; in 1937, 14·67 cents; in 1938, 15·26 cents. That is the last year for which I have prices here, but since that time they have gone up gradually, from sixteen cents the following year, until now the actual price is twenty cents which, with other premiums and other forms of assistance, is brought up to around twenty-five or twenty-six cents.

Mr. HATFIELD: How are the extra costs accounted for? They should be in these estimates. I am referring to extra costs resulting from the war.

Mr. GARDINER: The cost of the dairy board is in the war expenditures.

Mr. BURTON: Glancing over this estimate here, especially the details given at page 65, I have come to the conclusion that this is about one of the best paid branches the minister has under his jurisdiction. I would not object to that but for a number of reasons. First of all, consider what the hon. member for Haldimand stated a little while ago. We have in operation a number of other boards which no doubt are carrying on some of the work that this branch of the department in other years would be expected to do. But over and above that, my reason for rising at this time is that earlier in the day, when we were discussing another branch of the department, the health of animals, the minister gave us what I thought at that time was a reasonable and logical explanation of the manner in which the salaries were adjusted. Glancing over this, however, and comparing it with the health of animals branch, I find that there are some discrepancies. For instance, the director of marketing service receives $8,500, but when you turn to the health of animals branch you find that the highest figure is $4,320. It may be said that the director of marketing service is a rather more responsible person, being more or less the head of that branch. Well, drop that for the moment and take the agricultural commissioner. There the figure is $5,280, and when you look at the health of animals branch the first person in charge gets $4,320.

Mr. GARDINER: You should compare them with the director of production and the director of experimental farms. The salaries are more nearly the same.

Mr. BURTON: But I submit that even taking that into consideration, when we were dealing with the health of animals, it was pointed out on a number of occasions in this session that the health of animals has a bearing on the health and welfare of human beings as well. I do not see therefore why we should have one class of men underpaid, while those in another branch are receiving a fairly reasonable remuneration. Mind you, I am not complaining, or suggesting that these persons should not be receiving what they are. I am simply pointing out that we have a number of other boards that are taking away from them a certain amount of responsibility in the work in detail and still we leave others, who are to safeguard not only the health of animals but the health of our population to some extent, in an underpaid class. It does not seem fair. While I was more or less reconciled to the statement the minister made this afternoon, as to why they could not pay those in the health of animals branch more than they were receiving, after examining this item I am not quite so satisfied.

Mr. GARDINER: To keep the record straight, there are of course certain things that cannot be fully calculated here. I am not certain whether these items are entirely included in the salary, but take the director of experimental farms. He lives in a house on the farm, and anyone will agree that there are some advantages in having that government house available to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are fortunate to have a house of any kind in Ottawa.

Mr. GARDINER: His remuneration is $7,500, which is not as low as some mentioned by my hon. friend. He is comparable with the director of marketing. Then you go on to the director of production, whose salary is something over $6,000. At the top of page 62 of the estimates there appears the item: "Director of production services, $6,300". He is a new man recently appointed. He succeeded the person who was superannuated and takes on the lowest range of salary when he begins. Then over on the page we are dealing with appears this item: "Director of marketing services, $8,500." The occupant of that position is Mr. A. M. Shaw whom we induced to leave the position as dean of the agricultural college to come to Ottawa to take this position.

Mr. BURTON: I am not saying that these people are getting too much.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand, but I wish to keep the record straight with regard to the heads of the division and with regard to the comparison which was made a few moments ago with the heads of branches in the division of marketing services. So far as the staffs are concerned I think it will be found that generally, as I said this afternoon, these salaries are arranged by the civil service commission in a manner which is intended to give the same value to the different positions which entail similar work.

Mr. REID: Can the minister give any information to the committee as to the possibility of a market for eggs in Great Britain for the future? Most of the provinces have considerably increased their flocks. While it is true that most of the provinces produce more eggs and poultry than British Columbia, still the fact remains that we as a province specialize in the production of eggs. Although the grain comes to us from the prairies, nevertheless the fact remains that the climate is such that the production per head of poultry is higher in British Columbia than in any other province.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member leave that until we come to live stock and live stock products?

Mr. REID: It has to do with marketing.

Mr. GARDINER: Live stock and live stock products includes marketing. I have not the information at the moment, but I shall have it when the item comes up.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is this agricultural commissioner a new position; is it a new appointment on the marketing service?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it is the position that I dealt with this afternoon. It is the position which William Allen, who lost his life crossing the Atlantic in 1941, occupied. We left it vacant until this year. One of the reasons for that was that during the war and up until very recently we thought the position could be left vacant. But now as we think we are approaching the end of the war we thought it advisable to have a man in London and this man is in London.

Mr. HATFIELD: Who is he?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. J. G. Robertson.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was surprised to hear certain members of the committee suggesting that there should be a cut in the grant for marketing service. I know that at the present time there is a market for most of our agricultural products, but I think we all agree it is largely due to the war. This grant should be maintained so that the markets which we now have may be retained and provision made for taking care of surpluses which we are likely to have in Canada after the war. Certainly I should not like to see this marketing service branch curtailed in any way, because we are going to need it and its service in the post-war years. However, I believe that we should have all agricultural products under the Minister of Agriculture, particularly the marketing of them. At the present time our wheat is marketed through the Department of Trade and Commerce. Has any move been made by the government to concentrate the marketing of all agricultural products in the Department of Agriculture rather than in two departments, trade and commerce and agriculture, as they are at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: There was a discussion with regard to that matter which spread itself, I think, over about twenty years or longer. Just at the beginning of the war the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was appointed, and I think the last time the matter was discussed here I intimated to the house that I thought two heads were probably better than one and that we would get along very well together; therefore we have not had any discussion on it since.

Mr. HATFIELD: I was not asking for any cut in the marketing services. I was wondering why there was a cut in the production branch and an increase in the marketing services in war time. I think the marketing services should be increased, not decreased, but I think this is the wrong time to do it. In normal times I believe that seventy-five per cent of our estimates on agriculture should be spent on marketing. I believe that production will take care of itself in normal times.

Mr. SENN: I should like to be clear on the position which the Department of Trade and Commerce occupies with the Department of Agriculture in marketing problems overseas. I think it is true that this famous Shaw report did make mention of the activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce over there and, to say the least, it was not flattering. Since this new agricultural commissioner has been appointed to look after marketing over in Britain to a certain extent, has the Department of Trade and Commerce a representative over there, and, if so, how is the work of the agricultural commissioner in Britain defined in relation to the work being done by the trade commissioner of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been a representative of the agricultural department in London for a long time. I am not sure of the exact date but I think it was 1922. It was during the time, at any rate, that Mr. Motherwell was here as Minister of Agriculture. Shortly after he became Minister of Agriculture he appointed a representative of the Department of Agriculture to London. At a later date, I think it was when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, the agricultural representative was placed under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that position remained in that relationship until Mr. Wilson passed away. In 1936 or 1937 the present position of agricultural commissioner was set up and we sent a man to Britain. One of the reasons for that is that under this service all the grading is done by the marketing branch here. All the activities related to grading farm products such as cheese, butter and hogs and everything else excepting grain comes under this marketing branch.

With regard to some of the comment that was made a few moments ago may I say that the greater part of the staffs who are in the marketing branch were in some of the branches of the department before. When the branches were rearranged to constitute the divisions many of those having to do with grading were there then; they are there now. Speaking from memory, I believe six representatives of the department were in the different ports in Britain. There was one in Liverpool, one in London, one in Glasgow and so on. These persons were all placed under the direction of the commissioner who was sent over there. These men, located at the different ports, checked the commodities that were sent over, checked the grade and the condition of the commodity when it arrived. These men all operate now under this commissioner and have done so ever since he was sent over in 1936 or 1937. During the war, of course, that work probably has not been as important as it was before, with this exception. We are able to keep a check on the great quantities of bacon, for example, that we are sending to Britain. While there is not so much emphasis on the actual grade of the bacon going over, or even on the grade of the cheese, still we get continuous reports in that connection and try to keep our products up to standard. That is the work being done at the present time.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Haldimand asked one of the questions I intended to ask, and the minister has partly answered it. I have in my hand the report of his department, and on page 116 reference is made to the fact that Colonel Robertson was appointed as successor to Doctor William Allen. It goes on to say that Colonel Robertson's duty is to maintain close supervision and inspection of the quality and condition of Canadian agricultural products arriving in Britain. I believe the minister should give us a more detailed report in connection with Colonel Robertson. How are these goods arriving; what disposition is being made of them, and so on? Only a line or two of this report is devoted to this matter. I also have before me a report which was tabled in the house with respect to the production, export and domestic disappearance of certain agricultural products such as beef, pork, butter, cheese, eggs, apples, wheat, oats, barley and so on, and giving a comparison as between 1939 and 1943. This table contains the reference to cheese mentioned by the minister a moment ago, showing an increase in production of 38,000,000 pounds as between those two years. It is also interesting to note that the domestic disappearance has remained fairly constant, the difference being only one per cent on the basis of the percentage of production, while exports have increased by more than 30,000,000 pounds. With respect to beef it is interesting to note that the production in 1939 amounted to 714,000,000 pounds, while in 1943 it jumped to 916,869,000 pounds. On the other hand the domestic disappearance of beef was seven per cent greater in 1943 than in 1939, while the situation is just the opposite in regard to pork. I suppose that results from the fact that more pork was exported. In 1939 we produced 679,968,000 pounds of pork, and in 1943 our production was 1,173,268,000 pounds. The percentage of exports jumped from 28·7 per cent in 1939 to 50·2 per cent in 1943. This is an interesting table, and I would ask the minister to give us a more detailed report from Colonel Robertson as to what is happening over there and what will be the effect on our future exports of agricultural products.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course it is not as easy now to get reports from the other side as it was before the war, and probably not as much can be gained from such reports, even though the amounts being shipped now are so much greater than those sent in peace time. Realizing, however, the necessity and importance of having such reports, we have sent for Colonel Robertson and I believe he is on his way back now. We want a complete review of the situation over there from him personally, in order that we may prepare for what will have to be done when the war ends. We have sent for him with that purpose in mind. At the moment I am afraid I have not a report from Colonel Robertson which would enable me to reply to what has been said.

Much of the information we have with regard to marketing over there does come from Colonel Robertson; and while I do not have a written report in regard to pork products I can say that we have exceeded our fondest hopes in connection with the marketing of pork products in Britain. Prior to the war, as I have said on former occasions, we hoped that we might get our exports to Britain up to something in the neighbourhood of 300,000,000 pounds a year, and that is what we were driving at. We were sending approximately that amount at the time war started. Last year, as hon. members know, we sent 675,000,000 pounds, and during the first six months of this year we have sent 464,000,000 pounds. In other words, during the first six months of 1944 we have sent one and a half times as much as we had hoped to be able to send in the whole year before the war.

Mr. PERLEY: That is all meat products?

Mr. GARDINER: That is bacon and ham. At the time war started we had no hopes at all of being able to send any considerable quantity of beef to Britain. We sent from five or six thousand head of cattle a year to a high of thirty-eight thousand head, during the four or five years before the outbreak of war. In the early part of the war, as is indicated by the figures just quoted, we were attempting to send over the greatest possible quantities of two products, bacon and cheese, and we did decrease our domestic consumption of cheese some years by denying our own people any cheese during the summer months. For two years, I think it was, all the cheese produced during the summer months was delivered to Britain, and the only cheese available for consumption in Canada was that which we persuaded the cheese factories to make during the winter months.

As far as beef was concerned, during the first two years of the war we were selling all our surplus beef on the hoof to the United States. One year we sold in that market something like 200,000 head of cattle weighing 700 pounds or over. In 1942, however, as a result of taking so much pork off the market, we were eating all the beef available for consumption in Canada, and therefore discontinued shipping cattle to the United States. During 1943, as a result of our urgings and also as a result of the fact that the farmers knew they had a market, the production of cattle increased materially. However, as hon. members know, it takes from two to three years to bring about an increase in the production of cattle, and that increased production just began to come on the market in the late fall of 1943. As a result we have sent to Britain, according to the latest report I have, some 55,000,000 pounds of beef, practically all of which has gone over since January 1 of this year, although a few hundred thousand pounds were sent in the last two or three months of 1943. That 55,000,000 pounds of beef represents something like 120,000 or 130,000 head of cattle. A considerable part of it has been in the form of boneless beef, which I think weighs out at something like 375 or 385 pounds a head. The carcasses sent over frozen would weigh between 450 and 500 pounds. If that is figured out it will be found that now we are sending practiically as many cattle to Great Britain in the form of beef as we were sending to the United States and Britain combined just before the war. That beef is being shipped in frozen form. Before the war we did not ship any quantity of beef in any form other than on the hoof. Hon. members will recall that in each session before the war I was questioned with respect to experiments I was carrying on. We were selecting twenty-five head of what we called baby beef each week, and shipping it to the Smithfield market.

We took it from as far west as Saskatoon and Calgary, shipping it in refrigerated cars from there to the wharves at Montreal and Saint John. Then we shipped it to the Smithfield market. We were able to land it there in about ten days' time. In Great Britain, of course, they consider beef ten days old as fresh beef. They believe in hanging it for ten days, before consuming it as fresh beef. Under proper conditions we are able to get it over there under ten days, and sell it on the Smithfield market. Our experience was that that beef topped the market, continuously, during the period of time we were carrying on those experiments. They were brought to an end by the war. It was impossible to ship that type of beef after the war started, and we did not have a sufficient volume of it in any event to make it worth while sending it. It cost us money to try that experiment.

Mr. SENN: It was baby beef.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Now we have an opportunity to demonstrate to the British that we have beef in Canada that can be sold, and if we can set up a market for Canadian frozen beef there is the possibility that when the war is over we may have a market in Great Britain for that product. We are working on it at the present time and, as I told the house the other day, we have an agreement extending over 1944 and 1945 under which the British are prepared to take all the beef in this condition we can send to them. They are providing us with the shipping with which to take it over.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us an estimate of what he thinks they will take in 1944, under the new contract?

Mr. GARDINER: All I can say is that we have covered a little better than six months of the contract, up to date, and we have sent over 55,000,000 pounds. That is more than half of what we have contracted to send in two years; I mean the minimum amount we have contracted to send in two years. If the marketing continues at the same pace we should send them about four times that amount, or somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200,000,000 pounds.

Mr. PERLEY: The report I have in my hand says that last year we sent 44,000,000 pounds.

Mr. GARDINER: Where to?

Mr. PERLEY: To Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: No. There would not be 44,000,000 pounds last year. There is something wrong with that figure. That could not be millions of pounds.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes; to be exact, it is 44,122,042 pounds. That is what the report says.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount shipped last year was 15,000,000 pounds to all countries.

Mr. SENN: Mr. Chairman, the minister told the house yesterday or the day before, and repeated it to-night, about the contract for beef entered into. I suppose, with the British ministry of food. Will he tell the committee whether that contract was negotiated through his department or through the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. GARDINER: Through my department.

Mr. SENN: Was it negotiated in Great Briain, or in New York with the British food board?

Mr. GARDINER: It was really negotiated in Ottawa between representatives of the British food board who are in this city, and representatives of the Department of Agriculture. But there were communications back and forth before an agreement was finally reached.

Mr. SENN: The Department of Trade and Commerce did not enter into it at all?

Mr. GARDINER: The reason has been explained to the house before. I believe the Prime Minister on one occasion back in 1936 or 1937 stated clearly to the house the relationships existing between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. He confined activities in connection with actual marketing in Canada to the Department of Agriculture. In all these contracts we deliver these products to the British at a Canadian port. In other words, all our bacon is delivered to the British at Saint John and Montreal—most of it at Saint John —and the British take the responsibility for it, from there on.

Of course that is not the condition in peace time. We are then under some responsibility to deliver the product in a certain form to Great Britain. But in this period of war the British take delivery of it at a port in our country, and from there on it is their product; it is not ours.

Mr. SENN: The point I am trying to arrive at is this. I am trying to find out, if possible, whether the Department of Agriculture, through its trade commissioner or some other official, is taking over negotiating for the marketing of Canadian farm products on the British market. I should like to know just what these boards have to do with the matter. They certainly have something to do with it. Does the Department of Trade and Commerce enter into the negotiations at all?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they are all carried out through—

Mr. SENN: Then that means that the Department of Agriculture has taken over the marketing of agricultural products in Great Britain, at least for the period of the war?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it means exactly what I said, that right from the beginning of the war we have negotiated contracts, one of the reasons being that the two things are closely associated, namely, greater production and the shipping of production to Great Britain, and the other being that which I have just mentioned, namely, that we are delivering to Great Britain in Canada. These contracts have been made. The first was for bacon under the bacon board. The second was for cheese, under the dairy board. And the beef contract is made under the bacon board, now called the meat board. The beef contract is negotiated through the food board, with the advice of the meat board.

Mr. SENN: What about wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: The wheat is all handled by the wheat board.

Mr. SENN: And that is under the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it is under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. TUSTIN: I was interested in the figures given a few minutes ago by the minister, when he went back to 1907. He gave us figures showing quantities of cheese exported from Canada to Great Britain, and the amount of cheese brought from New Zealand to Great Britain. In about thirty years those figures have almost reversed themselves. I believe there must have been some good reason for that, and I think the minister almost put his finger on the pulse of the trouble when he said that one could go down the Strand and see the products of New Zealand and Australia advertised everywhere, but he could not see where the goods of Canada were advertised anywhere.

I remember being in London a few years ago; I may tell the committee that I searched all over the city of London to find Canadian goods, and the only place I saw the name of Canada was on Canada House. Yet we expect to maintain trade in a country, without even letting them know that there is a country such as Canada!

I walked down many of those streets and saw brilliantly lighted stores. One would see advertised in the windows of those stores, as far as the eye could reach, the products of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. But there was no such thing as that, so far as Canada was concerned. I am glad to note that an agricultural commissioner has been sent to London; in my view that is a step in the right direction. May I say I do not think the minister should allow this country ever to slip back to where we were in the last number of years. We should not allow the buyers of cheese, or the commission houses, to buy cheese f.o.b. Montreal for the old country market. We should see to it that our cheese is put in London, and that there is always a supply of Canadian cheese on hand over there to supply the market.

The fact that we did not do that was the reason why we lost our cheese market in the old country a few years ago. The simple fact was that New Zealand had in London warehouses filled with cheese at all times. When a storekeeper or merchant wanted cheese he simply telephoned to the commission house or wholesaler, and a supply of New Zealand cheese was delivered to him. But on many, many occasions there was no such supply of Canadian cheese.

I remember well an experience I had in a large hotel in London. I was having my dinner. The menu was presented to me, and on it I saw "Canadian cheese". I went out of my way to say to the waiter, "Is this Canadian cheese?" "Yes, sir", was the reply. The cheese was brought in to me and was served very nicely. It was cut in long narrow slabs and wrapped in cellophane. I tasted the cheese and immediately called the waiter and said, "I thought I asked you for Canadian cheese". "That is Canadian cheese", he said. I said, "Send me the head waiter". The head waiter came and I said to him, "I asked for Canadian cheese which you are advertising on your menu, and this is what I got". He said, "That is Canadian cheese". I said, "Now I have a real complaint. Will you send in the manager". Presently the manager came in and I said, "You have Canadian cheese advertised on your menu. I asked your waiter if you had it and he told me that you had, and this is what I got. Then I sent for the head waiter and complained that this was not Canadian cheese. I tell you that I am a Canadian and I know that this is not Canadian cheese". The manager said, "No, this is New Zealand cheese". I said, "Why do you serve me New Zealand cheese when I asked for Canadian cheese?" and he replied, "We cannot get a supply of Canadian cheese in London at all times and we are forced to buy from the supply which is always with us".

It may seem to be a little premature, but I believe that now is the time, when we have got our exports of cheese into the British market up to around 200,000,000 pounds a year, when we should lay a foundation for the post-war period. I think we should arrange to have in London a warehouse full of Canadian products at all times, so that our trade commissioner there can furnish a supply whenever there is a demand for it. But if we go back to the conditions of the old days we shall find in a very few years that we have lost that market. There is no doubt that we can hold that market if we look after it properly. We have the quality. We make the best cheese that is made in this world; there is no argument about that. But we must see to it that the supply is there when the demand is made for our products. We must see to it that our products are properly graded and that nothing but the best grades are sent to the British market. If we do not do that we cannot expect to compete in the markets of the world. New Zealand cheese, for example, can be produced more cheaply than Canadian cheese. It may be that the government of Canada should take up a little of the spread in order to see that the market for our Canadian cheese is maintained. The same thing applies to bacon. I had the privilege of eating bacon three times each day for four days when I was in Denmark and, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared as a Canadian to admit that Danish bacon is equal in quality to our first grade Canadian bacon. It is perhaps true that I was not furnished with the best grade bacon in Denmark, for the best grade of Danish bacon was sent to the British market. Just the reverse of that took place in the old days. We used to keep our first grade of bacon for consumption at home and send our inferior bacon to the British market, and then we wonder why we lost that market.

While, as I said a few moments ago, this may seem to be a little premature I believe that this is the time when our agriculture commissioner in London should start to lay the foundation so that Canada will maintain her place in the British market when this war is over.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the special products board come under the minister's department and, in particular, is it comprised within the terms of marketing under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: The special products board comes under the war vote. We discussed it fully when the war vote was before the house about a month and a half ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It does not come under this?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not know whether my question comes under this item, but could the minister tell us what steps are being taken to market the new dehydrated products, all kinds of fruits and vegetables? Such of these products as have been sent to Great Britain have registered extremely well with the people over there. Would the minister make a statement on that.

Mr. GARDINER: That discussion would come under item 26. We shall have the information here then.

Mr. LOCKHART: All right.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—
23. Agricultural economics, $105,056.

Mr. BRYCE: Is the minister in a position now to make a statement on the progress that is being made with the survey into the cost of producing milk on the prairies?

Mr. GARDINER: Two studies have been carried on in this field. The Alberta project is now in its fourth year and in the final stages of completion. This study is being carried on in cooperation with the Alberta department of agriculture, the public utility commissioner's office and the university of Alberta. Data have been collected in the Edmonton, Red Deer, Wetaskiwin, Calgary and Lethbridge districts. In the year 1941-42, among the Edmonton district wholemilk shippers, costs of production per pound of butterfat averaged 59·1 cents; receipts averaged 63 cents. In the Coaldale district, wholemilk shippers costs averaged 40·8 cents per pound, and receipts were 45·7 cents. In the Rosemary area, shippers of cheese milk had costs averaging 28·8 cents and receipts of 43·9 cents per pound.

In Manitoba a similar study is under way. Excellent cooperation has been established with the Manitoba department of agriculture and the farmers in the Winnipeg milkshed. It is anticipated that results of the first year's records will be available early in the new fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—
24. Dairy products, $388,988.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister give us a statement with regard to the position of dairy butter in Canada; what the storage is; what the production has been over the past three months as compared with that of last year, and what the disappearance has been?

Mr. GARDINER: I have here a statement covering the months of January to May inclusive for each of the years 1938 to 1944, which I think will make a comparative statement as to the general position this year as compared with other years.

I do not think, as regards the stocks of creamery butter, I should attempt to give all the figures for each year; I will take 1939, the last year before the war, when on January 1 the stocks were 44,616,000 pounds; in 1942 they were 44,194,000 pounds, or approximately the same, and in 1944, 46,038,000 pounds. In the last year they are about two million pounds higher than in either of the other years, or one and one-half million pounds higher than in the first named year and almost two million pounds higher than they were in 1942. In 1943, the year we are likely to compare with this year when we are making comparisons, we had stocks of 23 million pounds on January 1. The figures in pounds by months for the last three years are:

	1942 Pounds	1943 Pounds	1944 Pounds
January 1....	44,194,000	23,052,000	46,038,000
February 1...	33,000,000	15,000,000	33,000,000
March 1.....	21,000,000	12,000,000	19,000,000
April 1.....	11,000,000	9,000,000	11,000,000
May 1.....	6,500,000	11,300,000	9,283,000

As to production, taking these same figures again—and I may say that if I went back to 1940 you would get about the same figures until you come down to totals:

	1942 Pounds	1943 Pounds	1944 Pounds
January 1....	10,718,000	13,149,000	11,037,000
February 1...	9,000,000	11,900,000	10,900,000
March 1.....	11,700,000	15,500,000	14,000,000
April 1.....	16,800,000	23,000,000	19,800,000

The important factors there are these, that stocks are lower in 1943 until you get down to the month of May than they were in either 1942 or 1944. The production was higher in 1943 than it was in either of the other years, with the result that you get these increased stocks at the first of May, 1943.

And now so far as domestic disappearance is concerned:

	1942 Pounds	1943 Pounds	1944 Pounds
January 1....	21,000,000	21,000,000	23,900,000
February 1...	20,000,000	14,000,000	23,800,000
March 1.....	22,200,000	17,900,000	22,500,000
April 1.....	21,500,000	21,600,000	21,600,000

That pretty well gives the position.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the reason for the decrease of consumption in 1943 as compared with 1942?

Mr. GARDINER: That is when the rationing restrictions were put on.

Mr. HATFIELD: What are the figures of the exports of butter in those years?

Mr. GARDINER: There were no exports of butter during those particular years, with the exception of last year when we sent about seven million pounds to Britain. There will be some slight exports across the United States boundary line which do not amount to very much—just in localities.

Mr. SENN: When this item was up last year there was some discussion about paying that subsidy on dairy butter. It is paid on the factory butter but not, I understand, on dairy butter. I hold in my hand a copy of the report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization of last year. One of the recommendations they made with respect to the marketing of farm products is, "That consideration be given to paying a bonus on marketed dairy butter." The minister's figures this evening are fairly large; they indicate quite a substantial production of dairy butter. Has any consideration been given or any plan worked out whereby those who make dairy butter would receive a bonus of some ten cents a pound butterfat which producers of the other butter are receiving?

Mr. GARDINER: I think it will be recalled by hon. members that a year ago we had a discussion of this particular matter. At the moment I do not remember the exact figures, but there had been considerable talk about difficulties in handling dairy butter. Provision was made to handle it, but we found very little of it available; indeed I must say that I have not heard anything about dairy butter since we discussed it here last time, which would indicate that there is not much interest taken in it through the country.

Mr. TUSTIN: The minister will remember that under the war appropriation bill I brought up a certain situation with regard to milk being sent to cheese factories and being frozen in the factories, and it could not be taken out of the cheese factory and shipped to any other point. I sent the minister a schedule showing the difference between three cheese factories and a condensery plant. At that time I was able to show that there was a difference of almost two hundred dollars per year in the returns from a herd of eleven cows paid to a man sending to a condensery plant and to a man sending to a certain cheese factory.

I have also in the past urged the minister to give consideration to the control of all milk used for processing, and I have contended that the same price should be paid for all processing milk and that this milk should be sent to the point at which it is most urgently needed. Last year of course we all realized that it was necessary to have the milk going to the cheese factories in order to manufacture and ship the amount of cheese we had agreed to send to the old country. But late last fall many cheese factories in the country decided to remain open in the winter months and in many cases it has been the habit of farmers to ship their milk to cheese factories in the summer and to ship to the condensery plant in the fall and winter months because of the difference in price; and of course in the past there has been very little market for milk in cheese factories. I would ask the minister whether he has given consideration to the suggestions I have offered to him in the past, and whether it will be the policy of the agricultural food board, which controls this matter, to keep milk frozen in cheese factories this winter if the cheese factories decide to remain open, or whether the producer will have the privilege of taking his milk from the cheese factory late in the fall and sending it wherever he decides.

Mr. REID: What do they do in the condensery?

Mr. TUSTIN: Condense it, or it goes into powdered milk.

Mr. GARDINER: The position of course was pretty well set out in the subsidies arranged in the spring. We arranged to pay higher subsidies for certain kinds of milk for use in the winter months as against the summer. We did not pay higher subsidies on milk going into cheese in winter as compared with the summer.

Mr. TUSTIN: But you increased condensery milk fifteen cents a hundred.

Mr. GARDINER: I am coming to that. That indicated our policy. We want all the milk put into cheese we can possibly get into it in the summer months, and we are paying as high a subsidy on milk going into cheese in the summer as in the winter. On the milk that goes into canning we are paying just double as much, thirty cents in the winter as against fifteen cents in the summer, which would indicate that if we are to have canned milk we want it in the winter as much as possible, and we want milk to go into cheese as much as possible in the summer. If the cheese factories close in the winter time we shall probably not urge them very much to keep open, and milk that was previously going to cheese factories will go to canning factories.

Mr. TUSTIN: It will make it that much worse this winter if the cheese factories decide to keep open, for the simple reason that the bonus being paid to the condensery plant will be fifteen cents a hundred more than that paid to the cheese factory, and there will be all the more reason for the farmer to want to send milk to the condensery in the winter months. The question I asked was this. After the summer season of cheese production is over, if the factory decides to remain open in the winter will the producer still have to ship his milk to the cheese factory; will he still be frozen there in the winter as he was last winter, or will he have the privilege of shipping to some other point?

Mr. GARDINER: I would not like to say in advance what will happen in connection with any particular cheese factory. It will depend on the demand for cheese at that time both in Britain and here, but generally the policy which was indicated when the subsidies were set was this. We have thirty cents a hundred on milk going into cheese, and this winter it is only twenty cents, which indicates that we are not so anxious to have milk go into cheese this winter as last winter. On the other hand we have paid twenty cents on milk going into cheese this summer as against nothing a year ago. We are more anxious to have milk go into cheese in the summer months this year than did go into cheese a year ago, but we are less anxious to have milk go into cheese in the winter months this year than last year.

Mr. TUSTIN: I do not know whether I am making myself quite clear—

Mr. GARDINER: You are making yourself clear, but I will not say anything as to whether in any particular plant we shall not ask them to make cheese next winter if they stay open.

Mr. TUSTIN: But the point is this. The spread will be fifteen cents a hundred greater in the winter months going into the condensery than into the cheese factories—fifteen cents more than it is at the present time. The point I want the minister to answer is this. With the spread increased fifteen cents a hundred, is the farmer who is unfortunate enough to be shipping to a cheese factory and who is frozen there, being unable to ship anywhere else, to be compelled in the face of the greater spread in price to send his milk to the cheese factory in the winter while his neighbour is able to get fifty or sixty cents more for his milk by sending it to the condensery plant? The spread will be increased instead of being reduced during the winter months.

Mr. GARDINER: I am suggesting that we are not very likely to be compelling people to put milk into cheese factories in the winter, but I will not say that in no case will that be done.

Mr. TUSTIN: That is what happened last winter.

Mr. GARDINER: It depends on the circumstances.

Mr. TUSTIN: You did it last winter.

Mr. GARDINER: We were short of cheese last winter. We hope to get it in the summer time this year.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister propose increasing the bonus to milk producers in Saskatchewan which was taken off last May? It was reduced fifteen cents a hundred or so. Will it be increased, and will that apply again?

Mr. GARDINER: The bonus on milk was announced last spring for the whole year. On fluid milk it was twenty-five cents a hundred from May 1 to September 30, and fifty-five cents a hundred except in certain districts where it has been previously established at twenty-five cents. That was the position a year ago—cheese nothing and thirty cents; butter, eight and ten cents; for the coming year it is thirty-five cents a hundred for fluid milk in the summer months and fifty-five cents in the winter except in certain districts where it was continued at twenty-five cents, and those are set right across the country. Cheese milk is twenty cents a hundred throughout the year. The subsidy on butter fat is ten cents in the summer and ten cents in the winter. On concentrated milk the subsidy is fifteen cents a hundred in the summer and thirty cents in the winter. That is the same right across the country; it does not matter whether it is in the east or the west.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has the minister a tabulation for fluid milk production for the last couple of years?

Mr. GARDINER: Does the hon. member want fluid milk as distinct from milk that goes into cheese and butter?

Mr. LOCKHART: If the minister has it segregated.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid I have not it here.

Mr. LOCKHART: You would not have it separate from cheese, butter production and condensed milk?

Mr. GARDINER: I have seen the figures indicating the amount of milk that would be required to cover all production of cheese plus butter, plus fluid milk, plus canned milk, and then the fluid milk by itself, but I am afraid I have not it here and I could not make a guess on it; it is very difficult.

Mr. LOCKHART: Could we not have it without too much trouble?

Mr. GARDINER: If you put a question on the order paper I shall get it made up and put on Hansard.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

25. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $97,142.

Mr. BRYCE: How does this subsidy work? Is it available to cooperatives or only to the big cold storage warehouses?

Mr. GARDINER: The subsidies are made available to any kind of organization that applies for it and meets the conditions of the law. The subsidies have been available for many years. I have forgotten the year when they were put on, but I think it was in 1922 or 1923. The act provides that anyone who wishes to build a cold storage plant, provided that it is going to make a reasonable percentage of the plant available to the general public, may apply for assistance and the government will undertake to pay thirty per cent of the cost, half of the thirty per cent the first year and the other half spread over four years. Cash payments are made to cover thirty per cent of the cost of putting up the cold storage, and the money is available to any kind of organization that desires to build cold storages, including cooperatives.

Mr. BRYCE: What are the interest charges?

Mr. GARDINER: The act was passed in 1907, much earlier than I thought.

Mr. BRYCE: What interest is charged on the money lent by the government?

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. GARDINER: It is actual cash payments.

Mr. BRYCE: What percentage must be made available to the public?

Mr. GARDINER: It is different in different places. It must be a public cold storage, a cold storage in which the public can place products. It may be apple growers in some places; it may be people who want to put in meat or eggs or anything they desire to place in a cold storage. The organization have to make reports to the government and satisfy the government that they are allowing the public reasonable space.

Mr. HATFIELD: Has the government any control over the rates?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there is control over the rates.

Mr. HATFIELD: Are there two cold storages in Winnipeg?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; two large ones, I think.

Mr. HATFIELD: Owned by the same company?

Mr. GARDINER: There are three cold storages in Winnipeg. There is the Winnipeg cold storage, the Manitoba cold storage and the North Star.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What was the total amount paid to the Trenton cold storage? There is nothing for this year, but they were paid a certain amount last year and then paid supplementary amounts.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount voted for the Trenton cold storage in 1943-44 was $23,123.40.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the total that has been paid to the Trenton cold storage since the beginning?

Mr. GARDINER: Is not that the one that did not start to take advantage of the subsidy until last year?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; they had it before that.

Mr. GARDINER: The act was passed much earlier than that but I am not sure that they took advantage of it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They had it in 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and perhaps before that.

Mr. GARDINER: There have been two of these cold storages. There was the original one to which I think the hon. member is referring. Recently they asked for an increase in the capacity and for grants on the increased capacity. I think that started just this year; the $23,000 I have just read is, I think, a payment in the second.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): For 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the amount paid to the Moncton cold storage up to date?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a new one, the Moncton Cold and General Storage Limited, of Moncton, New Brunswick, $18,837.75.

Mr. WRIGHT: Must a percentage of the storage be made available in the form of individual lockers where individuals can store their products, or must it be bulk storage?

Mr. GARDINER: It is both ways, as a matter of fact. By far the greater part of it is in the form of bulk storage. I do not think all the storages have the locker system, but with regard to those that have the locker system fifteen per cent is the amount that must be supplied.

Mr. STOKES: Are all the cheese factories in Ontario and Quebec now equipped with cold storage facilities?

Mr. GARDINER: I wish the hon. member would leave that until we get to the cheese and cheese factories in item 32. I shall have the information here then. I have not it at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

26. Fruit, vegetable, and maple products and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian horticultural council, $540,700.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have the information I was asking for?

Mr. GARDINER: There are thirteen dehydration plants across Canada for vegetables, and then we have some dehydration being carried on in apples in Nova Scotia, the maritime provinces, and in British Columbia; but the thirteen plants are dehydrating in vegetables some 6·7 thousand dried tons of dehydrated products which are going to Britain. I do not think anyone can estimate the amount that will be going after the war is over. There are differences of opinion with regard to that. Some claim that dehydration of certain products will take the place of shipments in the fresh form; others claim that we shall go back to the shipment in the fresh form. I do not think anyone can finally determine what will take place when the war is over.

Mr. LOCKHART: What has been the minister's experience in connection with what has been sent to Britain already? Does it appear that there will be a large demand?

Mr. GARDINER: Up to date it has all gone to the armed forces, and of course from that we cannot judge what the British may think of it when the war is over. Vegetables can be produced quite easily in Britain and elsewhere, and we may find some difficulty in marketing the dehydrated product.

Mr. LOCKHART: What we have sent over may have gone to the armed forces, but I know that at least a few sample tins have gone to civilians, with very happy results. I am just wondering whether any such reaction has come to the attention of the minister. I know the people over there are extremely interested in the possibility of getting these things. This affects our apple crop, for instance. A number of these small tins of dehydrated apples which sell at nineteen or twenty-one cents have reached civilians in Britain, and I have had practically love letters from them asking if there was any hope of getting more. They were enthusiastic about this product.

Mr. GARDINER: I was referring to dehydrated vegetables. There is no doubt that dehydrated apples have met with considerable success in the markets they have reached. We have sent over a very considerable quantity for civilian use.

Mr. LOCKHART: Any other fruits?

Mr. GARDINER: No other fruits are going over in any quantity. Vegetables and apples are the only two products being dehydrated.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to point out to the minister that the price of new domestic potatoes on the Montreal market this morning was $1 per seventy-five pound bag, which is well below the cost of production, and I am told that the price will go to eighty cents tomorrow. New potatoes are selling on the Toronto market at $1.25 a bag, which is also below the cost of production. Market conditions are just the opposite to those which prevailed at this time last year, and I was wondering if any assistance could be given to producers of new potatoes. We all know that the yield of new potatoes is only about half that of mature potatoes, and the cost of production is very much higher.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—
27. Live stock and live stock products, $572,007.

Mr. REID: Is this the item under which the minister wanted me to discuss the matter of poultry and eggs?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. REID: We have increased our flocks of poultry in British Columbia very considerably, and the latest information I have is that the eggs are beginning to accumulate so that last week, in any event, storage space was at a premium. The producers are perturbed. Those who specialize in poultry—and British Columbia is a province which does specialize in poultry—are wondering if steps are being taken looking to the continuation of the market for poultry products, particularly eggs, following the cessation of hostilities. Great quantities of eggs in dried form have gone from Canada to Great Britain, which has provided a good market for our poultry producers. However, it has also brought many new men into the poultry industry, as well as encouraged those already in it to increase their flocks. You can talk all you like about a new era, a new philosophy or a new government, but I believe the Canadian people have about reached the limit in their consumption of eggs. We are the greatest egg eaters in the world, per capita, and if we are looking for markets in order that our poultry industry may continue there is no use in talking about what may be done here by some new government in some new era. Markets will have to be found for the surplus. We in British Columbia want to know whether steps are being taken looking to a continuation of the present market, because it is my belief and the belief of the poultrymen of my province that following the cessation of hostilities eggs will no longer go forward in powdered form. Anyone who has ever tasted a powdered egg will never eat another one if he can get a fresh egg. Has any thought or study been given to the matter by the minister or the departmental officials, and is the minister in a position to make any statement which would encourage the poultry producers to look for a continuance of the present market for at least another year or two?

Mr. GARDINER: For the last few years our egg exports have been as follows:

	Dozen
1939	1,274,000
1940	10,979,000
1941	16,276,000
1942	29,289,000

The contract for 1943 was for 36,000,000 dozen, and the new contract for 1944 is for 75,000,000 dozen. These figures indicate the truth of the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster that there has been a marked increase in the production of eggs and their export to Great Britain. It is true that in the early part of the war we exported these eggs in the shell, but now they are being exported as dehydrated eggs, or egg powder.

Mr. SENN: Are they for the army or for civilians?

Mr. GARDINER: They are being marketed both to civilians and to the army. They are put up in cases for distribution over there. As far as the future is concerned, of course we are trying in every possible way to assure the British market for our products. If dehydrated eggs are to go to Britain after the war, then I understand that our product holds a very high place on that market. It is accepted by the British people as a good product. If fresh eggs are to go, then of course by properly grading our eggs we can put them on that market in as good condition as any other eggs sent there. The question of whether or not we are to be able to supply the market will depend upon the supplies that can be obtained elsewhere and the cost. We hope to be able to supply that market, and are doing everything possible to satisfy the British that we can supply it with a good product.

Mr. REID: Have discussions been carried on with the British authorities?

Mr. GARDINER: Discussions are going forward all the time in connection with all these products, and we are attempting to make contracts that will carry us as far forward as possible. At present the contract is for two years, which may or may not take us beyond the war. We hope to be able to keep these contracts negotiated for at least a year in advance of the current year. I do not think there will be much difficulty in doing that but there may be difficulty in getting contracts for longer than two years.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister say whether the price realized for powdered eggs in Britain to-day is on a level with the price of fresh eggs in Canada? Can you buy fresh eggs here, powder them, send them over there and realize your cost, or is the government losing money under present circumstances?

Mr. GARDINER: The board price is 35½ cents a dozen at Montreal. We buy eggs for that market at that price. They may go higher on this market.

Mr. SENN: Does the price you realize for powdered eggs in Great Britain justify your paying that price here?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it is based upon that particular price. That price is based upon what we get in Great Britain.

Mr. REID: Is the price the same throughout the twelve months of the year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, throughout the year. There is no subsidy paid with regard to eggs.

Mr. TUSTIN: How many eggs have we been able to furnish Great Britain so far this year?

Mr. GARDINER: For the last year it was 36,000,000 dozen, and in the present year we are contracting for 75,000,000 dozen.

Mr. TUSTIN: How far have we progressed in connection with furnishing the 75,000,000 dozen?

Mr. GARDINER: We believe we shall be able to fill the contract this year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Last week the minister tabled a new agreement with Great Britain with respect to beef for 1944 and 1945. If I remember correctly, he said that under that agreement the floor price for red and blue label beef would be twenty-five cents under the present ceiling price. Is this price a guaranteed price to the packers, or is it a guaranteed price to the producers? What I mean is this: Will the producer be able to ship beef to the board, and the board take it over at the packing plant, kill that beef and have it credited, and the producer be paid on the basis of the grade, or is it just a guarantee to the packer that for any beef which he has within those grades he will receive twenty-five cents under the present ceiling price? I want to know how the government proposes to see that a fair price is carried back to the farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: It is exactly the same kind of agreement as we have with regard to hogs. We have not gone into the slaughtering business, and I do not think we intend to do so. We are buying the beef at any plant that can freeze it. It is not only a case of slaughtering it, the beef has to be frozen, and we buy the beef at the plant where it can be frozen, and have it shipped to Great Britain. The price we pay for that beef is twenty-five cents below the ceiling at the present time, and continues there until we have purchased the very considerable amounts mentioned.

The result of that is that a floor can be figured on what cattle would sell at, at different points across Canada. In relation to that the department will do just what we have done in connection with hogs. We will keep a check at all times on what is being paid on those markets. So far as hogs are concerned, we have had no reason to complain up to date, although we have been carrying on now for four or five years in connection with these contracts.

We think we shall have the same experience in connection with beef. As a matter of fact, cattle have been selling recently at above what would be called the price when beef is related to twenty-five cents below ceiling.

Mr. BRYCE: Is that the thin end of the wedge for the rail grading of beef?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not the thin end of the wedge for the rail grading of beef. That is not the intention of it at all, and probably it may not result in that. But I would say this, that in connection with the rail grading of beef, I doubt very much if anyone would undertake it until such time as the farmers are pretty well satisfied that they should have it. That has been the practice.

Mr. BRYCE: That is what you said about hogs.

Mr. GARDINER: A large percentage were asking for it, before they got it in connection with hogs. Probably that is not true around Winnipeg, but in most other places it was.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will there be a board set up this session to supervise the floor prices of agricultural products?

Mr. GARDINER: I have a bill which has passed the department, and which is now before some others who have to look into these matters. I expect it to be completed in a day or two.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will potatoes be included in that bill?

Mr. GARDINER: There will be the possibility of any farm product being included in it, as it is now drafted.

Mr. HATFIELD: I hope so.

Mr. REID: The minister said that the meat board had found that so far as pork was concerned this ceiling price had worked out satisfactorily. I can agree with him on that. However, in connection with beef it has not worked out so satisfactorily. There has been greater variation in the price of beef to the consumer than there has been in the price of pork.

The minister said that his department was prepared to keep an eye on prices, and to see that prices of beef do not vary too widely, in accordance with floor prices. What action does the minister propose to take if the price should drop below the floor, as it has on several occasions in the past two years? At those times the government have not taken any action; they have simply let the thing drag until it righted itself. The beef producers have at times accepted prices which were considerably below the floor.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact we discussed this whole question when the war estimates were before the committee. On that occasion, after some considerable discussion with the hon. member for Lethbridge, who is not in his seat to-night, I stated to him that I did not think conditions existing in the last two years could be righted until such time as we had an agreement similar to the one I announced the other day.

The reason why there was more variation in prices was that we did not have an agreement of this kind, and we did not have a floor of the kind this agreement provides. The floor last year was a varying floor, and anticipated or made necessary varying prices. It started out at a quarter of a cent below the ceiling, and on August 20 or 27, I believe it was, dropped half a cent. Then it ran along for another month or so at that level, and dropped again. Finally, after three drops it went down to two and a quarter cents below the ceiling. Then, in the middle of December it started to rise again, and came up three-quarters of a cent. It then ran along until February, I believe it was, and came up another three-quarters of a cent. Then, finally, on May 27 it came up to the quarter of a cent below the ceiling again.

In other words, it was argued by people interested in the feeder lot handling of cattle that we should have a lower price in the fall, so that they could buy their cattle low, put them in feeder lots and sell them higher in the spring. We argued that that was not the proper way to handle cattle in war time, and that we should have a flat floor throughout the season. We said that we should have a floor on blue and red which would be fairly close to the ceiling, a floor on cows which would be a little farther away from the ceiling, and a floor on unfinished cattle which could be taken in and fed. Those would be plain cattle and other cattle which were not really fit for market, which could be taken in and fed up to the other grades, and sold when they were properly prepared for market.

That is provided for in this agreement. There is a flat floor on red and blue brand beef. There is a flat floor on cow beef, and a flat floor on plain and commercial grades below the cow beef standard. The result is that we think there will not be variation, just as there is not variation in hogs under this contract.

Mr. BRYCE: What will you do when the heavy run comes along in the fall, when there are all kinds of cattle from which to pick and choose? When you have a heavy run on the market you can pick out the good steers, and put them into blue and red beef. But if you take over a half-finished animal, where can you put him?

Mr. GARDINER: If you have a half-finished animal you can sell it as a feeder.

Mr. BRYCE: The packers will outbid you on that animal, and will take it and bone it. The man who is going to feed the steer will need that spread.

Mr. GARDINER: We have sufficient spread, if it is the kind of animal my hon. friend is talking about. If it is an animal which is not properly fed or is not finished for the market, then of course both the packers and other people can buy it at wider spread than they can buy finished beef. We shall be in the market all the time for finished beef. We shall take all the finished beef that can be frozen and sent to Britain at any season of the year. That is the difference between conditions now and in peace time. In peace time when a rush of cattle came on the market in the fall there was no market for a certain percentage of them. As a result, feeders came and bought the cattle at one cent below the actual cattle price, based on beef, and they fed these cattle until they reached the red and blue class and then sold them at the beginning of the year as red and blue label beef. At the present time we can guarantee a market for all the finished beef, and there is only one difficulty in the way, but I must admit that it is a real difficulty. We must be able to get it through the plants that can freeze it. We have huge deliveries of hogs just as we have huge deliveries of cattle in the fall of the year, and there may be some difficulties unless the farmers will assist us by distributing their marketings over as long a period as possible rather than rushing them on to the market all at one time. We are hopeful that we shall be able to persuade them to assist us in the way I have suggested.

Mr. BRYCE: Are you going to have somebody on the market to buy these cattle in competition with the packers?

Mr. GARDINER: No; we are not buying cattle but beef, just as we are not buying hogs but bacon and ham.

Mr. SENN: You are buying only the two grades of beef?

Mr. GARDINER: No; we will buy cow beef as well.

Mr. BRYCE: I thought the minister said he was going to protect the market.

Mr. GARDINER: Certainly.

Mr. BRYCE: If the farmer does not get the price he wants he turns his cattle over to the abattoir where they are dressed on a rail-grade basis and then the government buys them. That is the way you protect the farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not any brief for the packing plants, but I have not found them as crooked as some people think they are in our dealings with them. I quite agree that the packing plants want to make some money. Most people do. I find that even the C.C.F. when they are talking, usually talk about money, whether they can make enough to get by on. I have no doubt that the packing plants desire to make some money. On the other hand, we have found in our dealings with them during the war period that we have been able to maintain a flat price, or as near to a flat price as one can obtain under any system, from one end of the year to the other for hogs through the fact that we have made a deal with Britain under which we sell the surplus product to them and get delivery from the packing plants of the bacon. We have figured out the relationship between the price at which we sell to Britain and the price which the packing plants pay for the hogs; and we have been satisfied, as I believe the farmers themselves doing the marketing have been satisfied, that they are getting the best returns possible from their hogs in relation to the price at which the bacon and ham are sold.

We are satisfied that the same thing will happen in connection with beef. We are offering to buy not only the red and blue beef but cow beef at all times at a price which is three-quarters of a cent below the ceiling. We are also offering to buy the beef from the canners and the cutters and that which is put into boneless beef at one cent and a quarter under the ceiling. We will buy that at all times unless somebody else is prepared to pay more for it. The only way in which the trade will get that beef is to pay more than we are prepared to pay for it. If any packer does not pay enough for the cattle, some other packer will compete with him and the competition will go on between them. They can establish a proper price level for all the cattle that the farmers deliver on that market.

We are hopeful that the farmers will cooperate in this. It is much better for the farmers to keep cattle that are not properly fed back in the farming districts rather than send them into Winnipeg, where feeders near Winnipeg will take them out, feed them up and then put them back on the market. We think it is better for the farmers to keep their cattle back in the farming districts until they are finished. That will help in handling the cattle both in the stockyards and through the plants in the rush seasons of the year.

Mr. FAIR: I was very glad to hear the minister make the announcement that he did on Friday last, but I am sorry that the farmer or producer is not protected. As I have said before, a year ago, before the agriculture committee we were given to understand that protection would be given to the farmer, but so far I do not see anything of that kind being done because prices paid by the packers are not always what they should be. Under this programme the packer is guaranteed his price and his profits; but the farmer, when he brings his cattle on the market, is still at the mercy of the packer. The farmers are not organized as the packers are. I realize that that is the fault of the farmers themselves. For that reason the announcement of the minister is very much in favour of the packers. I should be very glad to see the government go on the market and buy live cattle rather than allow prices to go down to where they have gone on several occasions in past years. If what I suggest were done, instead of it being left to the packers to set the prices, the farmers would be guaranteed something worth while under the announcement made by the minister.

Mr. SENN: I have just one comment to make. I was surprised to hear the minister state that the government was prepared to buy not only red and blue label beef but also cows and other unfinished cattle which were perhaps not of good conformation. We have been trying our best to provide the best bacon possible for the British market because we want to keep up the reputation of our bacon in England. I am afraid that if we start shipping inferior quality of beef to that market we are going to lose the market which we might otherwise gain and keep. I was sorry to hear the minister state that he is prepared to buy poor quality beef and even boneless and send it to Britain, because everyone knows that the poorer qualities of cattle will not produce the first-rate beef which the Britisher enjoys. A beef type of animal of good conformation puts his flesh on the parts where the high price cuts come from; but the poorer qualities, some of our dairy cattle, do not do that, and the beef is naturally not as good. I hope that the minister will reconsider and not send too much poor quality beef into the British market.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister made a statement in answering the hon. member for Selkirk on which I wish he would elaborate. He said, "I have not found packing plants quite as crooked as some people think they are." What did he mean by "quite as crooked"?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say quite as crooked. I said that I did not find them crooked as some people think they are.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the minister qualify his statement.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

28. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $15,000, $25,000.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is wheat starch being manufactured in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think so except perhaps in very small quantities.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understood that some milling company at Fort William had turned one of its flour mills into a wheat starch factory.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not heard of it, but it may be so.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is anything being done to help the man or boy who wishes to learn the cheese business? Does the government help them at all? I know that at the present time Ontario is very short of cheese-makers. Just to-day I had a letter from a cheese-maker saying that he was very short of help and unable even to get tires for his car to take down and have fixed the milk cans which came in. I took the matter up with the controller and perhaps something will be done. I know these people are short of help. Is anything being done?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that anything is being done other than what is done under regulations in connection with selective service, which gives some of them an opportunity of having postponements.

Item agreed to.

Special—

29. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $2,000,000.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. MacNICOL: On one or two former occasions I intimated that I should like to say a word or two in reference to this vote when it came before the committee, because in the last couple of years I have had the pleasure and profit of examining a goodly portion of the work which has been done by the prairie farm rehabilitation board. I am glad to say that to my mind one of the best pieces of legislation passed through this house at any time—I have no notion at the moment, by which government—was the legislation which pertains to the prairie farm rehabilitation board. Last summer I looked over quite a number of the dugouts which have been made by the board, one or two of the very small irrigation projects, and a number of stock-watering dams. The board deserves unstinted praise for the work it has achieved. I am not passing any comment upon the cost; I am speaking only about the work which has been done, to which I just referred. The last figures I could obtain are as of 1943, and show that altogether in 1943 alone there have been completed over a thousand projects, divided into three divisions, dugouts, stock-watering dams and small irrigation projects. When the minister replies to what I have to say I should like him to tell us whether the department plans to quadruple or increase by five, six, eight or ten times the amount of this vote as soon as it can possibly do so. As a business man I cannot figure why the vote has not been larger and larger every year; the results obtained from what has been done have been so splendid. They are self-liquidating projects, and since they have achieved a great deal, why not greatly multiply the vote?

I found the board's work in two of the provinces. I did not see any of it in Manitoba, because I was not in the southwest part of the province, where I believe they have control. In Saskatchewan they have done good work and have planned more good work, but I should like to know from the minister why any delay has occurred in carrying out the plans which the prairie farm rehabilitation board have made for southern Alberta. Every dollar spent in carrying out the projects planned for southern Alberta would be self-liquidating and give ample returns. I believe the board have prepared plans for building a dam on the St. Mary river at Spring Coulee. Why not bring in a vote and proceed with it? The minister knows better than any other hon. member that unless the dam at Spring Coulee is proceeded with we stand in jeopardy of losing our allotted flow from the St. Mary river. We cannot forever let it run to waste when our cousins to the south can use it. Therefore I should like the minister, at some time, not now but at some later session if he is then in control of the department, to bring in a vote to provide for the building of a dam at Spring Coulee on the St. Mary river, so that southern Alberta can obtain the water for much needed irrigation works.

I cannot understand why the vote now being asked for is so small. Two million dollars will not go very far, and if you examine the table on page 69 of the estimates you will observe that the money is distributed under quite a number of headings, such as salaries and wages, cost of living bonus, equipment—I assume that "equipment" refers to machinery and so forth to be used by men working under the prairie farm administration board—freight, express and cartage, miscellaneous, printing and stationery, rents, telephones, telegrams and postage, travelling expenses. The only money I see which is directly allocated to building works is $621,000 under the heading "buildings and lands"; perhaps also $113,000 under "supplies and materials." Together they amount to only $734,000. I should like the minister to tell the committee why, when the results have been so splendid, a much larger amount is not asked for.

Is any of this vote to be used in connection with the water requirements of Regina? I noticed in the paper a few days ago, as probably the minister also did, a statement by the city superintendent of waterworks, Mr. J. W. D. Farrell, in which he tells in a few words the situation. He pointed out that they obtained their water from three sources—Mound springs, Mallory springs, and Boggy creek—and stated that the capacity of those three sources of supply amount to five and one-half million gallons a day. The population of Regina at present is around sixty thousand. Including the immediate suburbs, part of which are comprised, I believe, in the constituency of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I do not think I shall be far out in surmising that Regina has to supply approximately sixty-five thousand people with water. That provides for a comparatively small gallonage per capita for a city of that size. Perhaps a year or more ago we had a fire in Toronto, not a fire of any particular size, at Lyons' Furniture company's store on Yonge street.

It took 750,000 gallons of water to subdue that fire, and it was only a medium one. What would Regina do if it required 750,000 gallons to put out a fire? And it might have three or four fires of that extent. I appeal to the minister not to be afraid to give that city and the adjacent city of Moose Jaw fair play. I am afraid he is too timid, too humble in asking for fair play for his province, asking for that to which it is entitled. It would be a disaster if the waterworks of Regina were called upon to put up a million and a half or two million gallons in one day to subdue a fire, and that would not be a particularly large fire. Are we fair in placing that city in jeopardy like that, particularly when we have the engineers under the prairie farm rehabilitation board to assist. I will not cover what I said before, but knowing from investigation the position in those cities from the point of view of water supply I once again ask the minister to press for whatever sized vote is necessary to provide adequate protection for those two cities.

In Toronto I have seen water mains burst, and I have no doubt other hon. members here have been in that city when some water mains have given way. The hon. member for York South is likely familiar with the bursting of a large water main that goes up Bathurst street. What causes such things is a weakness in the water main. Well, what would happen in Regina if during a fire of any magnitude, a twelve, or fifteen or twenty-inch water main burst? The amount of water that would be lost from that main before the situation could be got under control might mean disaster. A few days ago the minister read the statement of the superintendent of the Regina water department in which it is pointed out that their maximum apparently is 5,500,000 gallons a day, when a city of that size, using the same amount of water per person as is used in Ottawa, would require over 7,000,000 gallons a day without any allowance for extra demand for great fires. I am sure the minister would have the support of the house as well as the country if he asked for whatever amount might be required to ensure that the capital of his own province as well as the adjacent city of Moose Jaw be given that protection which is their right. The people of the country placed that capital where it is and they started its growth and the growth of the other city, but neither of those centres can properly develop under these circumstances. Regina has a population of 60,000 whereas it should have from 80,000 to 100,000. If it were guaranteed a water supply I am sure its industry would expand. The industry that I was in for many years, the radiator and boiler industry, requires a great deal of water. Could anyone start such an industry in Regina or Moose Jaw? It is an industry that consumes a large volume of water. If I wanted to start such a plant in Regina one of my first acts would be to visit the city hall to ascertain how much water I could have, how many thousand gallons per day; but what would they tell me, when they are now delivering per capita so much less than eastern cities?

I do not wish to labour the subject, but I suggest that the minister is not putting enough emphasis on the water situation in those two cities. Again I say he is too humble, not vigorous enough in this matter, although he has plenty of vigour when he gets his dander up. I want to see him get his dander up. I want him to get his back up and ask for whatever is fair in order to place those two cities in a satisfactory position of defence against what I hope will never happen but what might happen. The matter comes under this vote, and if it does, then $2,000,000 is a mere bagatelle. The minister should ask for $20,000,000. It would create business. He need not ask for it all in one year, but he should ask for sufficient to make an adequate start in order to give those western cities and the adjacent municipalities a chance to go forward and provide a defence against any possible contingency.

Mr. PERLEY: This is an important item, and I notice there is no increase this year. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has pleaded with the minister to consider assistance for the city of Regina, and I presume he includes Moose Jaw. Recently the hon. member has received a telegram from the mayors of those cities asking him to bring the matter to the attention, I presume, of the Minister of Agriculture or some other member of the government, and asking also that he solicit the support of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross).

Mr. MacNICOL: I would rather have the minister's support.

Mr. PERLEY: I happened to see a copy of the telegram askng him to try to get their support for a project of this kind, and he has brought it to-night forcibly to the attention of the minister. The hon. gentleman has spoken many times in this house on matters pertaining to water power and development, water supply and other projects in Saskatchewan, and he has made a point of touring the district in the last two or three years, so that he knows the situation as well as any hon. member coming from that province does. We all appreciate his efforts, and there is no doubt about it that, from reading the press, the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta appreciate the interest the hon. member has taken in these matters. The bill setting up this branch of the department was passed in 1934.

Mr. GARDINER: It was 1935.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. PERLEY: This is the eighth year of the operation of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: The date is April 17, 1935.

Mr. PERLEY: At any rate, the idea was to provide a water supply to certain parts of Saskatchewan and the west. Since that time and under the direction of the present minister this department has developed and taken on many other projects of one kind and another. I notice from the report that there are four or five cultural activities, water developments, small individual projects, community projects and larger projects. Then there is land utilization and land settlement. The hon. member who has just spoken referred to some of them. I notice that large water projects to the number of fifty-eight were provided for in the irrigation scheme. The minister should explain the different branches of this work of water development. For instance, he should deal with community pastures and give us a detailed statement with respect to each one, what they did last year and what they proposed to do this year.

I notice that on page 69 of the estimates there is a column on the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, but there is no list of the employees such as there is in the other branches of the department. You can get a detailed statement of the employees this year and last year for the other branches of the department, but there is no list of the employees of these projects. Reviewing the details of the item we find that three items alone, salaries, wages, cost of living bonus and other payments including travelling expenses amount to $1,012,000. These three items alone amount to more than half of the total vote. I think the minister should give us a list of the employees and inspectors in each one of those branches or projects that I have mentioned. He should tell us whether the employees have increased in numbers this year. He should give us the total number of employees and whether there has been an increase in the last six months, and, if so, in what way. I have covered four or five of the different projects undertaken at one time instead of taking each one individually. I think the minister should give us a more detailed statement than we have in the estimate or in the report on last year's work.

Mr. EDWARDS: While the minister is looking up the information for the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, may I say that I for one have listened with the greatest interest to what the hon. member for Davenport had to say with regard to water in the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina. I should like to remind the hon. member that we have an abundant supply of most excellent water in my home city.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know that.

Mr. EDWARDS: In addition to that we have so far an unlimited supply of natural gas and coal. All this goes to show our most advantageous position for the manufacture of radiators. I should like here and now to extend the most cordial invitation to my hon. friend and to his associates to come to my home city of Calgary and establish a radiator plant there.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a fine city, none better anywhere.

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to the latter part of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle I would call his attention to the fact that on or about February 28, 1944, I answered a question asked by Mr. Douglas of Weyburn, giving the names and addresses of the fieldmen in Saskatchewan. The question was made an order for return, and I do not think he would expect me to go over it again. It can be looked up under that date. I have them here in my hand. There is a long list of them.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there any increase in the last two months?

Mr. GARDINER: Just the engineers that are taken on for the season. We make up our engineering staffs that go out with some rod men and others who are necessary to the making up of those engineering staffs to do the inspection work.

On the question of the vote, the vote is $2,000,000. I would, of course, call the attention of the hon. member for Davenport to the fact that when I came to Ottawa the limitation on that vote was $1,000,000 a year. It was a vote of $4,750,000 which was to be expended as follows: not more than $750,000 the first year and not more than $1,000,000 a year in the succeeding years. As the act then stood it came to an end at the end of five years. It was an act for the purpose of taking care of what was looked upon as a temporary condition brought about by drought, and was to be utilized for that purpose. When I came to Ottawa I insisted that this was a job which would take at least twenty years and could not be done in less time than that no matter how much money was provided, and that no system under which you provided only $1,000,000 a year could possibly take care of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could you not ask for more?

Mr. GARDINER: I did ask for more. As a matter of fact, the first year I had quite a time in getting the bill through this house, largely because of opposition coming from directly opposite; but I asked to have the vote under the bill enlarged and made so that I could spend any amount of money that I could persuade the house to vote for me in any session. I finally got it through. As a matter of fact I had to bring it back the second time before I could get it through the house in the form desired. I did not get it entirely changed the first year. I managed to get the amount out the first year, I think, or the dates out, or vice versa. But I had to come back the second time in order to get it enlarged to the extent it is now. As a result of those activities we got the amount increased year by year, until finally in 1938-39 it was up to $3,500,000, but the second $500,000 was voted only on condition that it was expended on some particular project, one of them being the project that had to do with supplying water to Moose Jaw and another in the form of supplying stationary water at Saskatoon. But it took considerable discussion in the house to get those votes agreed to. In two years before the war we got up to $3,500,000. It was cut by a quarter of a million in the year before the war, that is 1939-40, the reason being that about half of the amount of money that was set up for conservation of water supply in those larger projects was not voted in the second year; only the amount that had not been expended in the preceding year was allowed in the second year. When the war started that vote was cut. In 1939-40 it was cut to $3,250,000; in 1940-41 it was cut to $2,500,000; in 1941-42, we retained the same amount. In 1942-43 it was cut to $2,000,000, and in 1943-44, it was $2,000,000, making a total of $19,684,-420.69. But I repeat that even now it is twice as large as could possibly be spent under the act as it stood when I came to Ottawa in 1935. I say that in order to impress upon the committee that this act was set up for the purpose of doing a particular job. When it was set up by the previous government in 1935 it had no relationship whatsoever to problems such as that which confronts the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw.

It was only after getting a special vote of something like $500,000 in the first instance and another $100,000 later on, that we were able to do anything in connection with the Moose Jaw situation; and it will be noted that this was taken care of by the special phraseology of the item put in the year in which the extra $500,000 was included. That is, the only authority we have for spending that money is contained in the wording of the vote itself. It is not in the act, and never was in it. So that there is no provision under this act for doing the sort of thing that has been suggested. That does not mean that kind of thing should not be done, but some change would have to be made in the legislation as it was then drafted and as it remains to-day in order to take care of the cost of the project suggested. In addition, in regard to matters like the Milk river project and another project which has been discussed by the hon. member for Davenport on previous occasions, namely the irrigation project up in the neighbourhood of Hanna and extending down from lake Sullivan—

Mr. MacNICOL: Out from Taber toward Medicine Hat.

Mr. GARDINER: The project proposed up near Hanna involves taking water out of one river, siphoning it under another and filling up Sullivan lake, which is not really a lake at all as a rule but just a great flat which is dry most of the time, having water in it only occasionally. That was known originally as the Pearce project, but since then it has been looked into on a much smaller scale than the original Pearce project. We have done engineering work in connection with both those projects and have reports on our files relating to them. Then we have done further investigational work in connection with the project near Medicine Hat, upon which we have very full reports. It is the declared intention of the reports that have been made, and of any comments that have been issued in regard to those reports during the last two sessions, that they are projects which should be given consideration following the war, as rehabilitation measures and projects in which manpower may be employed for a very considerable period of time.

Of course those projects will involve very considerable expenditures of money. This $20,000,000 proposed by the hon. member for Davenport would not touch them. Those projects would involve the expenditure of at least $111,000,000, taking them all into consideration. Such projects as that at Milk river, which may cost from $12,000,000 to $20,000,000, depending upon what you do, and the Regina-Moose Jaw project, which may cost another $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, I believe are in addition to the $111,000,000 I mentioned a moment ago. As I recall it, they would not be included in that figure. This will give some idea of the amount of money involved in all these matters, and what will be required to bring them to completion. I think it is quite proper that hon. members as well as ministers of the government and others should be considering the possibility of developing some of those projects at the end of the war. I think it is a good thing to discuss them in this house from time to time, because they have great possibilities, not only in connection with the employment they will afford in their construction, which after all is not the most important thing, but in connection with the number of people who will be able to maintain themselves in that area for all time to come; in other words, the people who will give themselves employment by taking up land which to-day cannot be occupied, building homes and making their living.

All these matters have been under consideration, and we have spent some of this money in order to put engineers at work on them to develop information that will be available to anyone who at some future time may desire to enter upon the construction of any of those works. In connection with some of them we have fairly complete information which certainly would make it possible for any minister in any government, provincial or federal, to sit down and consider what might be done toward developing a particular work. It is true that there are certain administration costs under this item, which amount to $105,000. The amount allotted for cultural experiments and research is $375,000; for land utilization, $525,000, and for water development and storage, $995,000, making a total of $2,000,000.

The suggestion was made that the $621,000 shown for buildings and lands, on page 69 of the estimates, would be practically all that would be involved in these works; but the greater part of the money covered by the first two items under this vote, $391,745 and $326,041, making a total of approximately $717,000, is accounted for by work carried on by engineers and employees of the department. That is, we put up the fences around the pastures. We employ foremen to do the work, and they employ men in the neighbourhood to build the fences and do the cultural work in relation to the pastures, place water upon them and so on. Many other things are done, such as re-grassing lands in order to stop blowing. That work is done by local men under the instruction of experts from the experimental farms. Work of that kind comes under the $717,000 shown in those two items to which I referred a moment ago. Headquarters administration amounts to $105,000 out of a total of $2,000,000. The remainder of the money is used to send out engineering parties that do the actual work of surveying on the ground, laying out projects, or in the employment of people to carry on the actual work in that connection, or in paying contractors who do work in connection with the building of dams, the digging of ditches for irrigation and other associated work.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has suggested that I might indicate what use is made of this money and how it is divided up. I think that may be done best by saying that the first item is $105,000 for headquarters administration. This covers salaries and expenses of administrative staffs at Ottawa and Regina; the expenses of advisory committee meetings, and economic and entomological surveys. The next item, $375,000, covers cultural experiments in research, including cooperative assistance to the prairie provinces in soil survey research, assistance to agricultural improvement associations, soil moisture and soil drifting conservation projects, grazing surveys and publication of experimental data. The next item is for $525,000—

Mr. PERLEY: What page is the minister quoting from?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not quoting from any page of the estimates; I am taking this information out of a book I have here.

Mr. PERLEY: It is rather hard to follow when we do not have it before us.

Mr. GARDINER: I am putting on Hansard this explanation of the expenditures.

Mr. PERLEY: These are the expenditures making up the $2,000,000?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The next item is $525,000 for land utilization, including the acquisition of land for all projects, what might be called purchases, whether for pastures, for irrigation projects or for land that will be flooded after dams are built; construction, management and operation of community pastures, and reserve grazing areas; management and operation of irrigation projects, and re-establishment of farmers. That is, we encourage farmers to leave submarginal lands, and to go on better lands. That is what is known as a resettlement plan. Under this item we assist farmers in moving from submarginal to other lands. The final item is $995,000 for water development. That includes the construction of many projects such as dugouts, stock watering dams and flood irrigation schemes on both farming and range lands. It includes the construction of large storage and irrigation projects, and water development surveys.

As I said a moment ago, these are surveys we are making in connection with the Milk river, and in connection with the project at Medicine Hat, and other projects in the vicinity of Hanna. Those come under this item having to do with water development and survey. Those are the items on which the money is expended.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has now given a break-down of the $2,000,000, showing the cost in connection with community pastures, land settlement and so on. When he takes the four items of salaries, wages, travelling expenses and supplies and materials, totalling $1,120,000, does he think that is a fair proportion of the total amount spent on the project? Salaries, wages and travelling expenses total a huge amount.

Mr. GARDINER: Wages are paid on the actual work. For example, this item of $621,000 covers very much the same thing as the $717,000 farther up on the list, with the exception that some salaries are included in the upper item. But those salaries would be a very small proportion of the total $717,000. The hon. member will notice that there is an item there of $326,000 for wages. That is taken up in the construction of such works as pastures, for example. A foreman goes out and hires farmers living in a community to go on the job and build a fence around, for instance, 50,000 acres of land. In some cases it would be 100,000 acres of land. Those fences are constructed and then, in addition to that, they provide water supplies. It may be a matter of putting up a windmill, or it may be a matter of digging dugouts, or it may be a matter of putting in dams. However, it would be something necessary to the conservation of a water supply for the watering of stock on the pastures.

That is all included in wages, but it is all actual work being done for the purpose of carrying out the intentions of the act. One could go through the different items, and say that is what happens in connection with them. Expenditures are not made only on the hiring of people to go round the country to run up expense accounts. There are a certain number who have to have expense accounts, but they are not the big items.

Mr. PERLEY: What number of dugouts have been supplied this year since April 1? Also, what number of survey parties have been working during the summer?

Mr. GARDINER: There were 1,307 built last year, with the same vote we have this year, and over 1,400 the year before. I am informed that the vote was practically exhausted by the middle of July, and that means there would be a similar number constructed this year. The same was adopted last year as was adopted this year, and my information is that they would be out of money by the middle of the month. We were asked to supply them with another $30,000, which we obtained by taking it out of some other item in the vote, and transferring it to that item.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say there were 1,400 last year?

Mr. GARDINER: 1,307 last year and over 1,400 the year before.

Mr. MacNICOL: The figures sent me showed 1,004.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was surprised to hear the minister say that he had difficulty in getting some of his estimates for prairie farm rehabilitation through, because of opposition from this part of the house.

Mr. GARDINER: That was some years ago, before you came.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Since I have been here I have commended the work being done under this vote. That also applies to the hearings before the committee on rehabilitation and reconstruction. I heard only two criticisms with respect to the matter, and one of them was that the amount of overhead was unduly high. The minister has explained that it is not fifty per cent. The fact is, however, that the details show some very large overhead expenditures. For instance, there are travelling expenses amounting to $185,260 and another item of $22,000 for printing and stationery. Those appear fairly high. That is one criticism which has been made.

The other criticism is that a similar vote has not been made applicable to eastern Canada. This act was first passed in 1935. Grants were made, and have been made every year since then. This year we now have another vote of $2,000,000 before the committee. I understand the total appropriations have amounted to about $20,000,000. Perhaps the minister would give us the exact figure.

My complaint is that we have not had like expenditures in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the head of the bay of Fundy, as I have pointed out repeatedly since 1940. We have greater need for expenditures of this kind, namely expenditures for reclaiming, restoring and draining marsh lands, than have the people in the west. In the east we would be protecting and draining lands which had previously been in a good state of cultivation, while in the west the expenditures, which I approve, are being made for improvements which were never before enjoyed.

The minister told us this morning, when we were dealing with beef cattle herds and experimental farms, that he expected to have a supplementary estimate in order that work on the marsh lands might be carried on. I am sorry we have not had a statement from the minister informing us just what that appropriation will be to improve the marsh lands in the east.

I do not wish to delay the committee by going into this matter again, but it appears to me remarkable that large expenditures should be made for the west, year after year, with the general approval of the committee; yet despite the greater need in the east there have been no appropriations for our marshlands in the east.

Again I express my appreciation to the minister and his officials for the recommendation they have made. I understand that recommendations have been made in the last two years to the treasury board for an estimate of $250,000 or $300,000, and that those estimates were not approved. I hope that the minister will have greater success this year, and that this or a larger amount will be approved.

The minister has pointed out that prairie farm rehabilitation in the west is a long-term project. I believe he said it would take a twenty year programme. That length of time should not be required to reclaim these marsh lands in the east; but at least five years will be required, perhaps longer. That shows how necessary it is that the appropriation be made now, and some of the work started at once.

The minister pointed out earlier to-day that it was the purpose of the department to make experiments with special machinery adapted to the handling of marsh mud. That is very necessary. To-day that work cannot be done except by machinery, and it is essential that special machinery be devised for the handling of marsh mud. I look forward with much interest to the appropriation that will be made when the supplementary estimates come down, to deal with the needs of the marsh lands.

Mr. QUELCH: Last year a report was tabled in the house dealing with a number of recent surveys made in connection with the William Pearce project. This report referred to a number of schemes under the heading of 1 and 2, A and B power development schemes. The report also dealt with an old survey that was made back in 1922. I understand that a number of engineers are working around Buffalo lake to-day. Can the minister say in connection with what scheme these engineers are working? Are they completing an existing survey or surveying for a new scheme?

Mr. GARDINER: It is part of the old scheme. We are trying to bring the information up to date as near as we can covering a large part of the project.

Mr. QUELCH: Are they making a detailed survey to complete the old scheme?

Mr. GARDINER: They are going into detail so far as the construction part is concerned, but they are not covering large areas of land for ditching and so forth. But for the main projects they are going right into detail.

Mr. QUELCH: There has been a certain amount of controversy regarding the diversion of water from the North Saskatchewan river. This spring I received a letter from Mr. E. K. Phillips, dealing in part with this question, and making certain recommendations. I quote from his letter:

> Whether the potential irrigable lands in Saskatchewan are irrigated from an extension of canals taking water from the streams in Alberta or whether they are irrigated by means of diversions in Saskatchewan, some 2,000,000 acre feet of water is required from the North Saskatchewan and Clearwater rivers and since such a diversion does not adversely affect conditions on the North Saskatchewan river, there should be no opposition to the proposed diversion.
>
> The fact that opposition has developed would indicate that the proposed development of the Saskatchewan drainage basin is not properly understood and would show the necessity of a board of engineers to properly advise the governments as to the most economical use of the streams.

Is anything being done in regard to the appointment of a board of engineers in order that this kind of friction will not develop in the future? I have received several resolutions from boards of trade urging that a board of engineers representing the three prairie provinces be appointed for the purpose of advising on the best possible use of these waters.

Mr. GARDINER: We have authority under the act to make surveys of that kind, and we have the best engineers we can find. As a matter of fact, very recently the Alberta government offered our chief engineer enough to take him away from us. I imagine that they are going to use his services on similar work in Alberta. I think the engineers we have on the work are doing just as good a job as any board of engineers could do.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not think that is the point. What is wanted is a board of engineers representing the three provinces to decide on the allocation of the waters as between the provinces so as to avoid any charges on the part of Saskatchewan, let us say, that Alberta is getting more than its share of the water, and similarly with the other provinces. Perhaps I had better read a resolution I have received which was adopted by the Craigmyle board of trade:

> Whereas it is desirable that the federal government should continue and intensify the survey being made under the direction of P.F.R.A. officials to determine western Canada's irrigation and power development possibilities;
>
> And whereas it is necessary that there should be some organization charged with the duty of assembling such data as may be necessary to determine the feasibility of the projects and their economic practicability;
>
> Therefore be it resolved that the Craigmyle and district board of trade request the federal Department of Mines and Natural Resources to set up an interprovincial water board or commission for the prairie provinces, whose duty it would be, among others, to assemble all the available stream flow data of western rivers and establish such new stations as may be required to get a complete record of the river discharge throughout the whole western drainage area, and to determine the most feasible and economical water power and irrigation projects that would make the best use of all the available drainage water, with the object of advising the various governments concerned of the possibilities of the area;
>
> Be it further resolved that the personnel of such board include a representative from each of the three prairie provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The idea is to avoid friction that might otherwise develop between the provinces over one province getting more than its share of the water.

Mr. GARDINER: There would have to be a board of that kind. The information we are gathering will be available to such a board if construction were to start.

Mr. QUELCH: The sooner the board is established, the better because otherwise the hopes of one province might be unduly raised as to the amount of water it might get, and then the board might say later that it was not entitled to that much water. That would lead to an unpleasant situation.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What have been the total expenditures under the P.F.R.A. from 1935 down to the present, plus the $2,000,000 in this vote?

Mr. GARDINER: The total expenditure so far has been $18,088,525.84.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): And this vote of $2,000,000 is to be added to that?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): When the war estimates were up I asked the minister what research was being done in connection with chemurgy. We in the cities are very much interested. There are other uses for farm crops besides eating them. First, I should like to say that this $2,000,000 is a very small amount of money for the purpose of this vote, farm rehabilitation. It looks to me as if the thing is being done by pieces and that a great deal of money is being wasted. I think we can accomplish a great deal more by undertaking a real big project, as was suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Davenport. I notice that in the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce there is an item of $325,000 for research in connection with the utilization of farm crops. It is most important that the national research council and the Department of Agriculture should work together in close harmony, because most of the work that is proposed to be done is being done for one purpose, namely, the growing of wheat, barley, oats and other crops. But for what other purposes can the crops on these lands be utilized besides eating them?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member is discussing the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There is no item of that kind in my estimates.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 19, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JAQUES

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. COLDWELL IN ALBERTA ON JULY 18

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): My attention has been called to an item in to-day's paper as follows:

> The incident occurred when Mr. Coldwell, main speaker of the meeting, said that Norman Jaques, Social Credit member for Wetaskiwin in the House of Commons, declared in the house recently that the finance of Canada was controlled by Jews.

I am not apologizing for or retracting anything that I have said in this house or on the public platform outside this house, but I will challenge the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to show where I have ever made such a statement. What I have said is that international finance is under Jewish control. Now I will go further and say it is evident that the C.C.F. intend to make that control national and are using the strong arm of their gestapo to enforce their control.

Mr. CASSELMAN: C.C.F. storm troopers called in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is on resolution 27.

> 27. That dividends paid by a wholly-owned subsidiary non-resident company to a Canadian parent company be exempt from tax when received by such parent company.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the parliamentary assistant indicate what amount of taxes will be forgone by the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): We have no information which would show the amount of taxes forgone, as the hon. gentleman puts it. As the committee will appreciate, the purpose of the proposed amendment is to avoid triple taxation. The situation now with respect to a wholly-owned subsidiary in Canada is that the dividends to the parent company are exempt because they have already been taxed in the hands of the subsidiary. In other words, company to company dividends are exempt from tax to avoid double taxation. As the law stands at present, if a foreign subsidiary is taxed in the foreign country, say the United States or some other, at rates comparable to those in force in Canada, those profits in effect will be subject to triple taxation because they will be taxed in the foreign country, they will be taxed again in the hands of the parent company in Canada, and they will be taxed once more and distributed to the shareholders. If the tax rates in the foreign country are lower than the Canadian tax rates then there would be some benefit in a complete tax exemption on dividends received from a foreign subsidiary company, and that of course is not the intention of this resolution. In order to guard against the possibility of that situation I am going to ask one of the ministers to move an amended resolution which will in effect provide for a tax credit covering the amount of tax paid in the foreign country by such wholly-owned subsidiary of a Canadian corporation. On that basis there will be no tax advantage to the parent. The Canadian parent company would be in the same tax situation as though it were an individual carrying on business in the two countries and subject to tax in the foreign country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the case of a wholly-owned subsidiary of a Canadian company operating under a Canadian charter in a foreign country, what would be the position (a) under the law as it stands at present and (b) under the proposed change? What is meant by "non-resident"? Would that be a non-resident company?

Mr. ABBOTT: I must apologize; there was so much noise I could not get my hon. friend's point clearly. A wholly owned subsidiary resident abroad is not now subject to payment of Canadian income tax at all; but if it brings the dividends into Canada they are taxable income in the hands of the parent company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that, but what is meant by "resident abroad"? The case I gave is that of a company which is a subsidiary company but is operating under a Canadian charter; that is to say the capital structure is set up under the Canadian Companies Act, but it operates in the United States. Is that a non-resident company within the meaning of this resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: The question of residence is a question of fact. The case my hon. friend cited may be a company which comes under section 4(k) of the Income War Tax Act. Brazilian Traction is an example of that kind of company. It is incorporated in Canada but its business and assets are situated entirely outside Canada, and it operates outside of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Exactly, but that is not a subsidiary.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not a subsidiary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not mind giving the name of the company. Fraser Companies Limited is a Canadian corporation with subsidiaries. A wholly owned subsidiary, Fraser Paper Limited, is incorporated under a New Brunswick charter, but all of its assets are situated across the Saint John river in the state of Maine, where its whole undertaking is carried on. What will be the position of that company with respect to the provisions of resolution 27? It depends on the meaning you give to the words "resident" or "non-resident." Is it a non-resident company?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the position of that company would be this. It is a Canadian company carrying on business abroad. As such it is entitled to take credit for any taxes which it is obliged to pay to the foreign jurisdiction, and therefore it is not a company which needs the protection of this proposed resolution because it will have already received credit for the foreign taxes in its own Canadian tax returns. This resolution contemplates a wholly owned subsidiary of a Canadian company which is incorporated and operates abroad and is therefore not a Canadian taxpayer and is not in a position to take credit as a Canadian taxpayer is for taxes which have been paid in a foreign jurisdiction, although in fact all the equity of the company is owned by a Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that explains the situation, but I want clarification of what is meant by "non-resident company." A company has not a residence but it has a legal domicile. The legal domicile of the example I gave is in Canada, but the operations are in the United States. Perhaps it would be better if it were made clear in the legislation what a resident company means and what a non-resident company means.

Mr. ABBOTT: Consideration can be given to that in drafting the legislation. As my hon. friend knows, there is a long line of cases which lay down what the residence of a company is for taxation purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are not the words "legal domicile" used?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, a company has residence for taxation purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the statute?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Moved by Mr. Gibson that resolution 27 of the resolutions to amend the Income War Tax Act be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

27. That the provision permitting a taxpayer to deduct from tax the amount paid to any foreign country for income tax in respect of income of the taxpayer from sources therein be amended to permit a Canadian parent company to deduct from tax the amount paid to a foreign country by a wholly-owned subsidiary company with respect to that portion of the profits of the subsidiary company which are deemed to be paid by way of dividends to the Canadian parent company in any taxation year, dividends being presumed to be paid by the subsidiary company from profits most recently earned.

Mr. ADAMSON: We ought to understand this resolution before it carries. The Brazilian Traction company has been specifically referred to. It is composed of a number of subsidiary companies. There is the São Paulo Tramway, Light and Power Company, the Rio de Janeiro Tramways Company, the Brazilian Telephone Company, the Brazilian Hydro-

Electric Company, and others. All these are subsidiary companies incorporated in Brazil and form the Brazilian Traction Company which is the holding company. The Brazilian Traction Company derives its whole revenue from these other subsidiary companies. Their dividends are the sole source of revenue of the Brazilian Traction Company and their taxes are at the rate of forty per cent, or whatever the corporation rate is. As the Brazilian Traction Company pays that money out to its individual shareholders it is again taxed. Is this resolution intended to overcome the double rate of income tax on subsidiary companies?

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution has nothing to do with a situation such as that of the Brazilian Traction Company. I do not wish to go into a long dissertation on income tax, but it happens that Brazilian Traction is a company which is exempt from the payment of Canadian income tax under section 4(k) of the Income War Tax Act, which is a section entirely different from the one we are considering; therefore this provision does not affect the situation of the Brazilian Traction Company. I underestand that the Brazilian Traction Company as a company is not a Canadian income tax payer because it is exempt under section 4(k) of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because its returns are all from foreign companies?

Mr. ABBOTT: Its business and assets are outside Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to hold up this resolution because the preliminary statement of the parliamentary assistant indicates that it is intended to correct what I consider to be a wrong, namely, the possibility of triple taxation. I confess that on reading the original resolution and comparing it with the redrafted resolution I am not able to grasp immediately the significance of the section. I should like a little time to study it. However, if that should not be permitted will the parliamentary assistant tell us the effect again because I could not follow him when he gave it the first time. He will observe that this is a completely new resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is new in form only. The original resolution provided that all income received from a wholly-owned non-resident subsidiary by a Canadian taxpaying company would be exempt from income tax in the hands of the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. ABBOTT: That is sound, provided that the taxes imposed on the foreign subsidiary in the foreign country are as high as or higher than the Canadian rates of tax; but if the subsidiary happened to operate in a country where there were no income or excess profits tax, or if the tax rates were substantially lower than the Canadian rates, then there would be an advantage over the Canadian subsidiary company. Therefore it is felt that this section should give the same protection that is given to an individual who earns income abroad and is subject to tax there; namely, that he may deduct from his Canadian tax liability the amount of tax he has had to pay abroad, provided that tax is not at a higher rate than the Canadian tax. That is what the amended resolution will now provide. When the bill is before the house hon. members will have an opportunity to see whether it is clear on that point, but I hope I have indicated the purpose of the amendment. I think it is fair, and fully protects the position of the Canadian tax structure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, they are to be treated on a basis of equality. What is the reason for the addition of the last clause, "dividends being presumed to be paid by the subsidiary company from profits most recently earned"? That was not covered in the hon. gentleman's explanation. Dividends may be paid out of the most recently earned profits, or they may be paid out of surplus or in any other legal way.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is in order to determine what effective rate of tax those dividends actually paid in the foreign country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the United States.

Mr. ABBOTT: Or any other country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be made clear in the bill, I presume?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it will.

Mr. KNOWLES: I feel that the amendment which has been proposed in an improvement on the original resolution, so it may be that my protest the other evening was not in vain. However, it does strike me that further thought might be given to the matter, and I still feel that it would be of value to us to have figures such as I suggested earlier. The question that arises in my mind as I look over the amended resolution is this. Are these deductions, since they are in lump sum amounts, going to achieve the purpose when the parliamentary assistant tries to make a comparison between income tax rates in Canada and income tax rates in another country? It seems to me it might be possible for this lump sum deduction in lieu of taxes paid in another country to put a company out of line as far as the actual rates are concerned. The minister said the intention of this amendment was to make sure that no company would obtain any undue advantage through a lesser tax rate in another country. It strikes me that this phase of the matter might be looked into more thoroughly. Another point I would like to suggest is this. The parliamentary assistant defends this proposal to provide some relief in taxation to companies of this class on the ground that they are now subject to triple taxation and therefore deserve some relief. Just to call it triple taxation does not settle the case; I still feel we should have the figures. As a matter of fact earlier in the budget debate, when the Minister of Finance felt that he had caught the critic of the official opposition proposing the elimination of double taxation, he launched into quite an attack upon that position, and rightly so, saying that now, in time of war, was not the time to make any such change.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is another principle, of course.

Mr. KNOWLES: The principle the minister was proposing was that in time of war unnecessary relief of that kind should not be provided. These companies have been getting along all right. I quoted a particular example the other night, namely the aluminum interests. They are getting along quite well, piling up profits in their Canadian balance sheet despite existing taxation, so that I do not feel that the parliamentary assistant has a case here, unless he will give us the figures to show what it amounts to.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that the first point he raised is a technical matter which should and will be considered when the bill is drafted. Personally I am satisfied that the language of this resolution is adequate to protect the Canadian tax position, and that the only deduction which a Canadian parent company can make from its own tax liability will be a proportionate amount of the tax paid to the foreign jurisdiction with respect to dividends brought into Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just direct attention to the fact that the word "proportionate" does not appear in the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know; but my hon. friend appreciates that this is really in the nature of a notice, and is drafted in general terms. The legislation will spell out, in perhaps more precise legal language, what is intended. My hon. friend may examine the legislation closely and see if it meets his point. As to the matter of triple taxation, there is no doubt that is what it is; and while of course there is the argument that our existing tax structure under which corporate profits are taxed once in the hands of the company and again in the hands of the shareholders is justifiable and certainly cannot be disturbed in war time, personally I do not believe that argument can be extended to triple taxation, that is that the same profits should be taxed three times, once by a foreign jurisdiction, again under the Canadian corporation income tax and again in the hands of the shareholders. That position is recognized with respect to individuals. If an individual or a partnership carries on business in Canada and in the United States, and is taxed in that country on his operations there, he is entitled to deduct from his Canadian tax liability the amount of tax he has had to pay in the United States, provided the rates are not higher than those in effect here. That principle will be extended by this proposed legislation to the wholly owned subsidiary company, but to that company only, and I suggest to the committee that it is an entirely equitable and justifiable proposal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the hon. member has stated the position very clearly, that it is now the intention to treat wholly owned subsidiaries as individuals are treated.

Mr. ABBOTT: With respect to foreign taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to foreign taxation. It is also abundantly clear from this discussion that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre not only approves of triple taxation but would like to see it extended. He approves of triple taxation. I wonder how we are going to provide that employment in the post-war period about which these gentlemen are talking with such loud mouths if we are to have triple taxation of industry in this country. Let us expose this hollow sham once and for all. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. You cannot have the state take one, two, three or perhaps more levies from industry and expect that there will be private employment and private enterprise in this country. That is the sort of thing which is driving this nation and other nations into the operation of industry by the state. If we want a corporate state in Canada operating industry, just follow the line of reasoning of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleagues. That is where we will arrive, and that is what I want the people of this country to understand as fully and as quickly as possible. If unfortunately the socialists in this country should dominate the political situation there will not be any private industry left in Canada; and what applies to private industry applies to the nationalization of the chief resource of the country, that is, the farms. If it is good for industry it is good for the farmer, for the small storekeeper and every other class, and we will be regimented by gentlemen like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Not for me—

An hon. MEMBER: For democracy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And not for democracy, if it is to function properly in Canada. I would like hon. members to realize just what these gentlemen actually mean when they apply it to a concrete case like this. Here is a position where one can understand right down to the ground what they mean.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just a word on this point, although I think it is hardly necessary, because the hon. member for York-Sunbury really knows our position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it shifts every day, according to what electoral district you are in.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. KNOWLES: Our position has been the same as long as our party has been in existence, and we stand by it. Our position is that so long as you have a capitalist order of society it is necessary for the state to take from industry the wealth that the people create, but which gets into industry's hands in the first instance. It should be taken in the form of taxes, so that it can get to the people. But under a cooperative socialist form of society we believe in the people themselves, through their government, taking the initiative and setting up industry and business in such a way as to produce sufficient wealth for the well-being of the people.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I have one question to ask the parliamentary assistant. I think probably this question of triple taxation is getting out of proportion. So far as I know, each of those subsidiaries is a subsidiary of a large company which has control in its field. It does not matter whether they are taxed once, twice or three times. They are in a position to fix the prices of their own products, and in the final analysis it is the consuming public that pays, whether it pays in the form of higher prices or higher taxes.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

So far as that goes I think it is just a question of how they get the profits.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is just my hon. friend's view; but it is hardly a basis upon which a logical tax structure could be arranged.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: My point is that we are quibbling over something that does not make any radical difference. Is there any reciprocal arrangement or agreement with the United States whereby the subsidiaries of the United States companies operating in Canada pay taxes to the Canadian government first and the residue to the government of the United States?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there is. I believe there is a reciprocal agreement.

Mr. KNOWLES: This resolution does not restrict it to the United States.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right; this does not restrict it to the United States.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

28. That persons authorized by law to accept deposits be required to file information returns showing interest credited to depositors in 1944 and subsequent years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the intention behind this resolution?

Mr. BURTON: Does this include credit unions required to file a return, and information showing interest credited to depositors?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not seen the legislation yet, of course. It will be noted that the resolution refers to "persons authorized by law to accept deposits," and that they shall be required to file information returns showing interest credited to depositors. Obviously that covers banks; and if credit unions are persons authorized to receive deposits and pay interest on deposits, I suppose that would be taxable income—or I assume it would be. I do not know for sure whether it would be or not. In any case I understand this is to be an enabling provision, so that the minister may require institutions to do what is suggested.

Mr. BURTON: As the resolution now reads, the minister is requiring everybody who is authorized by law to accept deposits to file these returns. I suggest that it be made much more to the point, so that persons accepting deposits will be required by law, when asked by the department, to file their returns. With all the banking institutions in the country, and the credit unions, there is an enormous number of accounts. Many of these would be small and would have the effect of cluttering up the department with returns. While I can see that the department would need to have a check, what I am trying to guard against is the filing of returns with respect to all these little savings accounts which would have no bearing at all on what the department has in mind.

Mr. GIBSON: That would be covered by the regulations in the income tax branch so that the records would not be cluttered up with small accounts. A limit would be placed upon what returns would be made.

Mr. BURTON: There are many people who have accounts consisting of several hundred dollars. They would not come within the income tax bracket. We have here the possibility of an enormous number of returns being filed every year by institutions and persons authorized to accept deposits. If the department asked that returns be filed in certain cases where required, the rest of the people would govern themselves accordingly and probably account for the interest they receive.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I said a moment ago to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, this is a resolution; it is not final legislation. It is intended to authorize enabling legislation giving the minister power to require the filing of returns. Regulations will be required, as the Minister of National Revenue has indicated, setting out what the returns will be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member's remark would seem to indicate that the department has not now the authority to require banks to make returns of deposits, and the amount of interest paid on deposits. Is that correct? I would be surprised to hear that.

Mr. ABBOTT: The department, of course, contends that it has the power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under what authority?

Mr. ABBOTT: In virtue of the act. The law as it stands at present gives the Minister of National Revenue power to require information from anybody. Although I have not the section before me, I believe I have paraphrased it correctly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a general power.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The department have taken the stand that they can exercise that with respect to banks, in the case of individuals. But they have never exercised the power to require a general return of all of a class of depositors. It was felt it was desirable to have a special provision in the law which would enable the filing of those returns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, you are going to put on the banks the burden of making a general return, rather than on certain individuals.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, if necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would save the department some labour by putting this responsibility on the banks.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it would not save the department labour. But the department would have no means of knowing whether a given individual might have a savings account on which he was getting one and a half per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In his income tax return the individual has to show what, if anything, he receives by way of interest on deposits.

Mr. ABBOTT: And those returns have to be checked. The same applies to dividends. We have an information return with respect to dividends.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not corporations have to file with the department details of dividend payments?

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you check one against the other and, if you feel there is anything wrong, go right into the books of the corporation? I suppose that that never occurs because every reputable corporation would make the correct returns. I am surprised to find that it is necessary to pass a law to grant this power, because I would have thought that the powers of inquisition—I do not use that word in any improper sense—already possessed by the department would be sufficiently wide. But if it is said they are not, then I have no objection to this. I merely rose to ask for information.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand there was some question of doubt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have the banks objected to giving this information?

Mr. ABBOTT: They have not objected, and I think they would prefer to have legislation of this kind. As my hon. friend knows, the relations between banker and customer have always been considered confidential. They never give information except on a court order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They want protection.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think they would want to have the protection of a section of this kind.

Resolution agreed to.

29. That with the approval of the governor in council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources there be allowed a tax credit of fifty per centum of expenditures incurred by a corporation, asociation or syndicate or exploration partnership whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or the exploration or drilling for oil, on a well spudded in between June 26, 1944, and March 31, 1945, which proves to be unproductive, provided that such well is a deep-test well the drilling of which is deemed desirable in the interest of extending the petroleum resources of Canada and which could not reasonably have been expected to be undertaken without such tax credit.

Mr. SENN: Under this resolution a tax credit of fifty per cent is to be allowed on exploration work and drilling for oil. The section of the country from which I come contains a considerable natural gas industry. The Minister of National Revenue will know something about this because many homes in Hamilton are heated with gas. A good deal of exploration work is being done by this industry. Has consideration been given to extending this privilege to exploration work for natural gas as well as for oil?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I can give a word of explanation as to the purpose of this section. As the minister said in his budget speech, the purpose of the resolution is as follows:

It is, I think, in the national interest that some additional encouragement be offered to the Canadian oil industry to undertake the drilling of several deep-test wells in certain areas with a view to proving up significant, geological structures.

At present, as the committee is aware, tax credits are allowed in respect of unproductive wildcat wells. These tax credits are equivalent to the writing off of this expenditure as an expense in profit and loss account. The present provision is somewhat more generous in the benefits to be allowed. It should be emphasized that this special tax credit is allowed only in respect of projects approved by the governor in council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and will apply only in cases where it could not reasonably have been expected that the project would be undertaken without special assistance. In other words it is to encourage operators to drill in non-proven areas where our government geologists would like to see deep-test wells drilled in order to determine whether or not the area is oil bearing. For that reason, on projects approved by the Minister of Mines and Resources and authorized by order in council the special tax credit will be given. As the committee will appreciate, the effect of this will be that the oil explorer gambles fifty cents of his own money and the government says, "If you will do that, we will give you a tax credit of fifty cents on the dollar."

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to know why you do not give one hundred per cent on the cost of drilling oil wells that do not materialize. In the Dawson Creek area, in the Pouce Coupe area, in British Columbia, in the Peace River area in Alberta, in southwestern Saskatchewan, in northeastern Alberta south of the Saskatchewan river, legitimate oil people have been drilling for oil. These wells cost up to $150,000 and more. I observed these men working and I know the difficulties under which they labour. If oil were found it would be a wonderful thing for the country; why should we not allow all the cost of a well that does not produce anything?

The people I have in mind are not wildcatters; they are legitimate oil producers. For instance, Imperial Oil of Turner Valley are operating. I do not know whether they would be entitled to consideration, but I did see a number of wells that had been drilled in the Turner valley and which have not produced anything. Why should not the producers of such wells be given some consideration in the way of taxation?

No country needs oil production more than Canada. We are producing now about 12,000,000 barrels a year and are using from 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 barrels a year, speaking from memory. Canada would be in jeopardy if her oil supplies from outside were cut off. While no doubt this fifty per cent allowance will be acceptable to the legitimate oil companies, I do not see why they should not be allowed one hundred per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend is no doubt aware, the tax structure does allow substantial tax credits to companies drilling wildcat wells or for off-property drilling. Section 8, subsection 6, reads as follows:

A corporation whose principal business is the production and/or refining and/or marketing of petroleum and/or petroleum products shall be entitled in respect of the year of expenditure to deduct from the sum total of the income tax payable by it under this act and the tax payable under the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, (and if such sum total of tax is not sufficient to provide therefor, to deduct any balance from the tax of subsequent years) forty per centum of

(a) all drilling costs incurred by it directly or indirectly on oil wells spudded in during the period from the first day of January, 1943, to the thirty-first day of March, 1945, and abandoned within six months after completion of such drilling; and

(b) all exploration costs, including all general geological and geophysical expenses incurred by it:

provided, however, that in the case of a corporation substantially all of whose income is subject to depletion under the provisions of this act, the deduction to be allowed hereunder shall be twenty-six and two-thirds per centum of such costs instead of forty per centum.

As I indicated a moment ago, this is a special type of drilling, and the tax credit is granted because it is believed that these people would not engage in this type of drilling if they were not given special encouragement. But if we were to give them their entire costs it seems to me it would be pretty much a case of heads I win and tails you lose as far as the oil company was concerned. They would get a tax credit for the entire cost of drilling the well, and if anything should develop they would get the benefit. It is felt that while this is not excessive, it is a reasonable inducement to offer for a special type of drilling on projects which are approved by the Minister of Mines and Resources and authorized by order in council.

Mr. MacNICOL: During my last visit to Turner valley I spent some time watching the drilling of a deep well. I have forgotten just how deep it was, but I know they were using a large-sized pipe, and it runs through my head that the operator told me the well would cost perhaps half a million dollars. Right there the question of tax allowance came up.

The Imperial Oil is a reputable company; there are other companies in Canada just as good, but none better. The parliamentary assistant spoke a moment ago about an allowance of fifty per cent being made, which would be sufficient perhaps to prevent unnecessary drilling. The Imperial Oil company, a corporation of that magnitude, with their experience, with the geologists and the equipment they have to enable them to ascertain whether oil is below, would not likely drill anywhere unless all the indications pointed to the presence of oil. They have put, I suppose, half a million dollars in the well which I saw—my recollection is that the well would cost about that—and if nothing comes out of it the Imperial Oil cannot make anything out of it, yet if the well should produce oil the whole of Canada would profit from it. I suggest the utmost consideration as far as taxation is concerned should be extended in a case of that kind.

I called to see another area out west of Nordegg, in northern Alberta, away west of Rocky Mountain House, on the north Saskatchewan river. There were a number of men with equipment drilling for oil. If they do not find oil there, of course the cost will be an investment cost to the Imperial Oil. But there again it seems to me that in any honest-to-goodness effort to discover oil, consideration by way of tax relief should be given to any reputable company which makes a real effort in this direction. The Imperial Oil is a well-known company which has done a very great deal for this country.

Mr. GERSHAW: This resolution proposes to give a tax credit to corporations, and I notice that the next one proposes that it shall be given in respect of strategic minerals. I wonder whether the minister has considered the possibility of regarding oil as a strategic mineral, in view of the great need for it which exists at the present time, and thus making it possible for the individual investor under certain conditions to get a tax credit for the amount he contributes towards the drilling of an oil well.

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution, as my hon. friend will have seen, applies not only to corporations but to associations, syndicates or exploration partnerships.

Mr. GERSHAW: But not to individuals?

Mr. ABBOTT: But not to individuals. I do not know whether there are individuals engaging in these deep test wells, but the expenditure would be so considerable that it is unlikely, I should think, that any one man would do that. This benefit is available to partnerships for instance.

Mr. GERSHAW: That is the money which is made by the partnership? Suppose a number of men group together and each contributes so many thousands of dollars to the drilling of a well, can each individual taxpayer get a tax credit in that case?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, under our taxation system, as the hon. member knows, we do not tax the syndicate or partnership as such. We tax the individual partners. So that the tax credit would be applied, I take it, by the individual partners in proportion to their interests in the syndicate or partnership.

Resolution agreed to.

30. That the tax credit allowed to a taxpayer of forty per centum of contributions made by him in the year 1943 to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals be extended to include a tax credit in respect of contributions in the year 1944.

Mr. STIRLING: I think that the purpose of this clause is to extend to 1944 the assistance which was given in 1943; is not that so?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: But I do not think that that assistance was open to the prospector or to the individual who so frequently uses his money to grubstake a prospector. In the southern part of British Columbia those great rugged mountain areas have been worked over in the past by, shall I term him, the old-fashioned prospector. But now, what with tuition by mining classes given by the provinces, another class of prospector has arisen who is capable of making use of modern experience and modern instruments, and there is a very great need for the whole of that area to be explored again by geological exploration. It is quite true that at the present time labour is scarce and that individuals are not so able to use their money for the purpose of grubstaking as they were; but the time will shortly arrive when there will be great opportunities of going back to the old method, so common in British Columbia, of individuals putting their money up to back a prospector.

Reference has already been made in this house to the words of advice given us by a member of the geological survey of Canada, drawing attention to the fact that not more than five per cent of the great north country is now properly geologically explored; drawing attention also to the fact that, of the great producing mines of to-day, hardly more than one of them have been discovered in this generation. So that our object should be to do everything we possibly can to further exploration, and for that purpose we need the prospector.

In the working over of the mountains in the southern part of my constituency mines have been discovered, most interesting prospects have been discovered. Copper is mined, platinum has been taken from the creeks, gold and silver are mined, and over a huge area there are valuable showings of lead and zinc. I want to keep going the old method, the old habit, of having the money of individuals used to back the prospector to work over that whole area again, in the hope that mines so far not discovered may yet be discovered. Will the parliamentary assistant tell us whether there is any possibility of extending this facility to the individual who risks his money in that way, not by investing it in a company whose business is prospecting, but investing it in a way which will enable the individual prospector to go out and do the work?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid there is very little prospect of this being extended to the individual prospector. As my hon. friend will realize, in a sense this is a rather loose section; it is a straight tax credit to a contribution or an investment which is made to a prospecting syndicate, association or partnership. That was pretty carefully considered last year when the section was originally brought in, and after consideration it was felt that, in view of the very loose nature of the section, of necessity it should not be extended to cover payments made the individual prospector. This resolution merely extends for another year the incentive legislation put in last year. I can bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the minister, but frankly I feel there is little or no possibility of his being prepared to extend that concession.

Mr STIRLING: But why was the section made so loose?

Mr. ABBOTT: The looseness is not so much in the section as it is in the description of the groups to which a contribution may be made. My own view on this matter is this. I have always had rather serious doubts of the desirability of this legislation—as I say, this is only my personal view—because it gave a very great incentive to stock promoters to organize these prospecting syndicates and sell shares on the basis of getting the tax deduction. But weighing one thing against another, the desirability of encouraging prospecting and so on, it was felt that this concession should be made. To extend it beyond registered or incorporated prospecting companies or syndicates to individuals was going further than the government felt it should. Perhaps that decision was wrong, but I do not think it is likely to be changed.

Mr. BRADETTE: I crave the indulgence of the committee for a few moments while I discuss the subject before the chair in my capacity as an ordinary member. I have been greatly honoured by my appointment to the chair, and have fully enjoyed the cooperation that I have received from everyone. But as I represent a very populous and widespread constituency with diversified interests, and more particularly with gold mining as one of the predominant industries, I should like to say a few words on the item under discussion. I am entirely in agreement with the present resolution the purpose of which is to help base and other metals, but I am at a loss to understand why gold is not included.

I do not wish to precipitate a controversy over this subject, because my position rather precludes anything of the sort; but at times gold mining has been maligned, notwithstanding the fact that it has played a very important part in the economic life of the nation for at least the last thirty years. I am in a position to know what I am speaking about in this regard because I represent great producers in the Porcupine section and I am a neighbour to the Kirkland Lake section in Ontario on the one hand and the Noranda-Rouyn-Val d'Or district on the Quebec side, on the other. I have first-hand knowledge and personal experience of what has been accomplished by the gold mining industry throughout that district and of the contribution it has made to the national and particularly the economic life of the country.

It was certainly marvellous, during the depression, to see what was being done by those sections of the country to give full employment to Canadians. Not only did the miners themselves enjoy the benefit of the employment provided, but agriculture also benefited and the forest activities consequent upon gold mining were promoted.

We knew from the experience of 1914-1918 that gold mining would be a war victim, so that in the fall of 1939 and early in 1940 we anticipated what would follow. But when the government made an appeal to the industry for increased production in order to maintain the Canadian dollar and our balance of export trade with the United States, both the management and the miners themselves responded magnificently. Since those days, however, very grave things have happened and both the management and the men have been willing to cooperate with the government to the fullest possible extent. They do not want hand-outs. They are anxious to play fair with the people and to pay their full share of taxation. They are not going to ask for favours from this government or from any provincial administration. All they want is fair consideration of their problems. Two years ago the town of Timmins, the whole of the Porcupine district including Schumacher, South Porcupine, the Kirkland Lake section and the Noranda district, sent a delegation here who presented a very able brief to the government, eloquently delivered by Mr. T. R. Langdon, urging the importance of maintaining at least a skeleton force to exploit the gold mining industry. They pointed out that if this were not done a great many people would suffer from the resulting lack of development, more particularly the municipal bodies. They pointed out further the excellent work carried on through the agency of these gold mining operations. They received a fine response from the Minister of Finance who was much impressed by the representations made, and many of the grievances complained of were remedied.

The mineral resources of Canada, generally speaking, belong to the provinces. It is true that outside the northwestern terirtory the mines in this country belong to the various provinces, but it must be remembered that ninety-one per cent of the taxation which they pay goes to the federal treasury, and that fact alone must make the federal treasury realize that under such conditions certain anomalies—I will not call them injustices—exist in connection with gold mining in some of the provinces. We must keep the record straight. The central government has responsibilities in this matter. If we plot the gross value of Canada's mineral production for, let us say, ten years back, and then project the curve let us say five years into the future, the trend will startle us, and I think it will be readily admitted that a drastic or radical change could not be regarded as premature, as has been stated in the House of Commons. I am not discussing the question of the gold standard or of monetary systems, but I suggest that if we try to visualize the conditions that are to prevail in the future, we shall see that the gold standard will have to be maintained after the war, and for this reason Canada is in a fortunate position in that it is one of the large gold producing countries in the world. If gold mining has meant a great deal to Canada in the past, it will mean a great deal to the future of this dominion, and I am sure it will play an important part in the post-war period.

I have no quarrel with anything that is done to promote the development of base metals, but surely it should be found possible to include gold mining in any programme that is implemented by the federal government. New oil and gold mining companies were given a three-year tax exemption. On the surface this is a real concession, but when in practice it is discovered that during that three-year period it is necessary to write off depreciation and pre-development costs at a fixed rate per annum, the picture changes. In practice, experience has taught that the concession has no real or worth-while value. I leave that thought with hon. members to think over. I do not expect that drastic changes will be made at once, but I hope that these representations which I am now making will be taken into consideration.

It is true that last year the cost of outside exploration for base or strategic minerals was allowed as a deductible item, but such expenditures were limited to something like $5,000. This is a feeble and hesitating step in the right direction, but why limit it to base and strategic metals? Why not include gold? I am not theorizing on that score, because I have first-hand knowledge of the situation, and I have seen what it has meant to this country to have had gold mining operations in Canada. I know what it has meant to my own section of the country and to the rest of Canada. Those engaged in gold mining are willing now, as they have been in the past, to make a one hundred per cent contribution to the development of Canada and to its war effort, provincially and federally. But some people seem to think that mining operations can be enlarged or curtailed at will on short notice. There seems to be no understanding of the fact that it takes four or five years, frequently longer, to bring a gold prospect into profitable production, and that in order to obtain that one profitable development it is necessary to weed out a large number of losing ventures for which no provision is made in the mine tax structure. If we are to play any real part in providing post war employment, we may be somewhat late now in anything we do in connection with gold mining.

Many people regard gold mining as a sort of luscious bonanza. Some people seem to think it is like some fruit that grows in abundance and has only to be picked. Well, it may surprise the committee to learn that out of 4,500 ventures, only two per cent come to full development and that only one per cent of gold mining ventures have been paying dividends. It can readily be seen, when you take these facts into consideration, that gold mining presents us with a serious problem. It would be easy to single out one or two or three mines in my own constituency which are paying dividends, but I know of hundreds of mortalities among the new projects—ventures which never come to fruition at all. It is interesting to note the concern that is felt for the oil industry as well as for the base metals, which have their raison d'être.

We must also realize that it is almost impossible to differentiate between gold mining and the mining industry generally under present conditions. Let us for one brief moment look at the mining industry generally, not gold mining only, which means so much to our national economy. We will take as an example the boot and shoe industry. No doubt there are different factors connected with that industry compared with mining generally, but the raw material is always easy to obtain in Canada, United States or Great Britain. We may send government agencies outside of Canada to sell the products of the boot and shoe industry. This industry has a large national market. You cannot apply the same principles to gold mining or mining generally, because it employs practically only two factors. The first is the size and grade of the ore deposits, and the other the cost of production. That applies more forcibly to gold mining than to any other mining in Canada, because in most cases they are mining a very low grade of ore indeed. This applies particularly to the old mines. No doubt a lot of new mines will come into operation after the war as they did when the United States increased the price of gold to $35 an ounce, if proper attention to its problems are given. The new price did much more than that; it gave a much longer life to some of the old producers that had been producing for a number of years.

As I say, the second factor is the cost of production. That must necessarily enter into gold mining as it does in any other kind of mining industry in this country. For industry generally there has been set up a standard profit based upon a fixed standard period. Anything over that standard profit is subject to a so-called hundred per cent excess profits tax, but for industry other than gold mining any profits equal to—and I wish the committee to pay particular attention to this—or less than the computed standard profits are not subject to the hundred per cent excess profits tax.

To encourage gold production in the early stages of the war, the gold mines, you will remember, were urged to increase gold production by every possible means. Hon. members will be familiar with that situation. To encourage the increased production of gold it was arranged that the standard profit base should move up with the increase in production measured in ounces of gold. In other words, if a mining company doubled its ounces produced, its standard profit base would be doubled. Then, to punish those who might remain indifferent to the government's appeal, it was further arranged that where the ounces produced fell below the output during the standard period, the standard profit base would diminish in the same ratio. At the time the industry raised no objection to this arrangement; but conditions changed. The government declared gold mining non-essential and placed it in the lowest category. I know the government will realize there was no protest from any of the gold mines or from any of the workers in this section either because we knew there was a war on and we were absolutely in favour of a total war effort. However, increased production was not allowed to continue, and decreased production could not be avoided. As a result, gold mines are now discriminated against. The boot and shoe company, as an example, can make up to the standard base before the hundred per cent excess profits tax is applicable, but not so the gold mines. To show the unfairness of this situation, let us assume that a producer in my section ceases all mining operations and that after paying the cost of maintenance they have out of their return from their investments sufficient income to cover costs and retain a small margin. No matter how small that margin is, it is excess profits subject to a hundred per cent levy, because no gold is being produced. There can be no difference of opinion as to whether or not such an arrangement is equitable and just.

I wish to mention one other matter which is very important. Proven and potential ore reserves constitute the mine's real assets, and from the moment abstraction begins, the sum total of these assets is being diminished. It is a wasting asset, different from agriculture or some other industry. That applies to gold mining in every section of the world. In a comparatively short time these assets are completely liquidated. It follows then that the earning power of a gold mine is comparatively brief and very largely unpredictable, and cannot be treated by the intelligent investor as a self-perpetuating industry such as an ordinary commercial or industrial enterprise.

The committee no doubt will be surprised to learn that if to-morrow I were to invest in some of the old producers in my section like Hollinger, MacIntyre and Dome at the present day prices and the company never reduced or missed the dividend paid at the present time, it would take over eighty-three years to get my capital back without interest.

I thank the committee for its kind indulgence in allowing me to bring to its attention some of the difficulties of gold mining. In making this appeal I make it in an open-minded way, realizing that the industry has done much for our national economy in the past as it is bound to be called upon to do in the future. I also make it on behalf of the miners themselves, who have been fruitfully employed for the last thirty years in my own section of the county. They have meant a lot to the economy of Canada. The man-power situation in that section is now tight, because nobody backslided so far as voluntary enlistments were concerned. I am making the appeal in behalf of the farmers in my section of the country. The new clay belt was opened up over thirty years ago. The success of the farmers in that section largely depended on the success of the mining centres. I am making my appeal sincerely, not only in the name of my own constituency but in behalf of the people of the whole of Canada, and more particularly from the point of view of the great help that the gold mining industry is bound to be called upon to give in the post-war period.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Under the resolution as it stands a tax credit is allowed to a taxpayer up to forty per cent of contributions made by him to associations, syndicates, mining partnerships organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals, and so on. I think the provsion is too narrow. Contributions made by a taxpayer to individual prospectors should receive the same proportion of tax credit. On June 7 I wrote the Minister of Finance suggesting to him that a taxpayer in Canada contributing to prospectors for base or strategic metals should be entitled to deduct from the income tax payable by him under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1940 an amount equal to forty per cent of the contribution so made by him, as is allowed to taxpayers who contribute to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships registered or otherwise recognized by the laws of any province of Canada, and as provided and regulated by section 8, subsections 4 and 5, of the Income War Tax Act. I suggested to him that any prospector or prospecting partnership in Canada should register their activities with the mining recorder on payment of a fee and file with the mining recorder a sworn statement of work done and amounts so expended, such statement to be filed by the mining recorder with the inspector of income tax, and upon making return for income tax such taxpayer should file a similar sworn statement with corroborating evidence, with the inspector of income tax. I said further to the minister:

> I know that it is common practice for people living in Yukon and British Columbia and I dare say in other provinces to advance money to prospectors, so making it possible for them to remain in the field and to carry on prospecting. I have frequently done so myself but not since such contributions have been dealt with in tax legislation.
>
> It would seem only just that bona fide contributions so made and proved by individuals should be similarly exempt as contributions made to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships and I respectfully request that the proposal be given your favourable consideration and be appropriately dealt with in the coming budget and attendant legislation.

To that letter the minister replied on June 28 as follows:

> As you know, my colleague the Minister of National Revenue is charged with the administration and interpretation of tax legislation. Whether, from his point of view, your suggestion would be practicable I cannot say. However, I am forwarding a copy of your letter to him for consideration, and I shall be pleased to discuss the point with him when this item is being considered in connection with the new income tax amendments which will shortly be before the house.

I hope the minister has been as good as his word and has discussed the matter with the Minister of National Revenue, and that between them they will agree to a broadening of this provision to allow the same credit to a taxpayer for contributions made by him to an individual prospector, registered and properly approved, as is now allowed for contributions to associations, syndicates and mining partnerships. It is only fair to do this.

Mr. GREEN: The key word of this resolution, it seems to me, as with the resolution of last year, is "prospecting". The government decided that it was wise to encourage prospecting in Canada, and there can be no doubt whatever as to the soundness of that decision. The whole mining industry depends upon new mines being found. For some few years now comparatively few have been discovered in Canada. I think the government was quite right in taking the step that was taken last year, in providing for this tax credit. At that time some of us suggested that it should be extended to include the individual prospector, and certainly the time has now come when that should be done. From my own knowledge of the situation in British Columbia I can say that the great majority of the mines there were discovered by individual prospectors who went out in the hope of striking something worth while. They were found as the result of individual initiative. That is quite a different matter from having men sent out by big companies, but under the present arrangement the companies are the ones who are helped. Most of the mines in British Columbia were found by men who went out on their own, in many cases backed by the local merchant or someone else in the town in which they lived. We feel very deeply about this matter in British Columbia, because we are convinced that the only way we will find new mines is by having individual prospectors go out once more, just as they went out at the turn of the century. The British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines have made representations along this line. I have here a wire in which they say:

> We also urge that tax deductions of contributions for prospecting at present granted persons financing associations, syndicates or mining partnerships be extended to include individual prospectors financing themselves.

The position is that the government is helping the big fellow but is not helping the little fellow. That is exactly what it amounts to. I do not object to the help being given the mining companies or syndicates, but I say it is far more important to help the prospector and his friend in the town who is willing to put up money so that the prospector may carry on his work. We are going to have several hundred thousand young men coming back from the armed forces one of these days, perhaps before the next budget is considered, and I am convinced that many of them would take up mining and go out prospecting if they were given reasonable encouragement. A measure such as we are suggesting, that is the extension of this tax credit to cover individual cases, would be one way to help those young returned men get into the hills and take up prospecting. They are just the right age, just the right type. They are the finest young men in Canada, young men of great initiative, and I am convinced that they could do something really worth while for the mining industry if the governments of this country, not only the federal government but also the provincial governments, gave them reasonable encouragement. We realize that there would be difficulties in working out these tax credits in connection with individuals; perhaps that is why it has not been done so far. The government cannot work out a method of doing it; it is just too much trouble to try. It is a comparatively easy matter in connection with the big companies, but when it comes to helping the little fellow they just do not know how to go about it and therefore they say he cannot be helped. This matter should not be simply pushed aside. The government should take some steps to give this assistance, under this budget, to the individual prospector.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to say a few words on this item, and first I would state that I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think he made a very important point. To follow that through, however, after the individual prospector or whoever may grubstake him is given a tax credit, under present arrangements any discovery he may make is handed over to some private company to exploit. In this field, particularly in the post-war period, if the government is going to invest money in the discovery and development of new mineral resources; if the taxpayers of Canada are to foot the bill through tax credits and so on, at least they should get something in return by way of social services. I am a little doubtful as to whether that is practical on this item. Up to the present I think this was a practical arrangement made necessary because of the urgency of the war situation. I believe the government had to take the position of helping everyone who might find and develop base metal mines; the urgency of the war made that necessary. At the present time, however, I think our war requirements are being fairly well met, so I think now we should carefully examine the situation and lay down certain regulations to cover future developments in connection with any operation in base metals. We should take great care to see that they are so located as to fit into the economy of this country, and have some peace-time usefulness when the war is over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How can you affect their location? They are where nature left them.

Mr. GILLIS: I will give an example of what is happening now, and will leave it to hon. members to decide whether this is a profitable investment for the people of Canada to make. I had a visit from some of the employees of the Quyon Molybdenite company, located not far from here. This company began operations in 1940; it was a war-time set-up. In addition to other assistance they were given a subsidy of 75 cents a pound on the metal they produced. Later that subsidy was discontinued, and the company immediately ceased operations. The plant was taken over by another company, headed by Mr. J. E. Gray of Toronto, who operated it until a week or so ago. The employees of that company have not been paid since June 15. That company was largely the creation of the federal government, and continued in operation only as long as that operation was profitable. You see, the war does not enter into the picture as far as these people are conconcerned. As long as it was profitable, as long as they were subsidized, as long as they were making money out of it, it was fine and they were prepared to stay. That is the sort of private enterprise about which the hon. member for York-Sunbury talks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, you are just talking sheer nonsense.

Mr. GILLIS: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. All morning I listened to my hon. friends to my right talking about private enterprise—private enterprise with both arms round the neck of the government. They say, "We will go as far as the government is prepared to finance us, but when that financing is not forthcoming we will walk out." The point I am making is this. While you are protecting the fellow who wishes to make money, at the same time you are building up a community on that basis, as happened in this instance. Employees were working for this company. It was a new set-up, and they moved in, taking their families with them. Some established homes. They have an investment and an equity in that community which was not government subsidized. If the regulations are such that just as soon as a fellow cannot make money he can pull up, walk out and leave the property completely valueless, then I say the employees or the people in the community are entitled to some protection. There should be some understanding that organizations subsidized by the government into new industry owe some responsibility to the community. It should be pointed out to them that they cannot just walk out without even paying wages. Let us remember that the average worker depends from week to week on his daily wage. They have received no wages since June 15, and they are frozen to their jobs because they are in a high priority industry. Selective service has not allowed them to move out to other employment.

Mr. JACKMAN: I thought it was closed down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it was closed they could move out.

Mr. GILLIS: They have not, so far. I am not arguing about selective service, because I think that end of the matter will be taken care of, once it is understood. The point I am making is that this has been an attempt to establish a new industry to produce base metals for war purposes. We must now concern ourselves with this situation: If the government is going to give tax concessions to those who want to establish industry, then it is the responsibility of the government to see to it that regardless of where mineral deposits are found, if we are going to spend money we should have a permanent industry, and one which can be routed into our peace-time economy. Let us assure ourselves that it will not be just a mushroom growth for the purpose of making money during the war, and that those in charge will not be able to walk out and leave it.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member said it was still working.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it is not still working. The workers are trying to put a lien against the property for their wages.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member said that selective service would not let them get jobs elsewhere.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have been listening to what the hon. member has been saying, and while I do not like to rise to a point of order, still I must point out that the subject he is discussing is a long way from that of concessions to prospectors. I wish my hon. friend would try to bring his remarks within the resolution.

Mr. GILLIS: I think I am absolutely within it; I am on the point. I have shown what has happened, something that the government is apparently going to continue. I am urging that some regard should be had by the government to the establishment of base metal industries, so that it may preclude what is taking place now, namely exploitation for war purposes. This is a use of the taxpayers' money, and when it is no longer profitable, or when the government is not prepared to continue to make it a paying proposition, out of the public treasury, private enterprise picks up and walks out.

Mr. ABBOTT: The question whether or not the government should subsidize an unprofitable industry is away outside the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word, although I am not going into the ramifications of the position outlined by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I do not know much about molybdenite, but I understand the great production is in the United States. Someone discovered some of it in Canada and thought it would help the war effort. The government gave a subsidy. I suppose it was found unprofitable, and the subsidy was withdrawn. Someone with private initiative thought he would stake something or risk something, and he failed and folded up. I suggest the plight of the men is bad, but they have their remedy against the directors of the company. I am sorry for them, and I would do anything I could to help them; but it is not at all germane to the subject matter we are now discussing.

I should like to add a word in support of the plea made by my three colleagues from the west coast—the hon. member for Yale, the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Vancouver South. On principle, if it is right to give a tax concession to a company or to a syndicate which sends out its employees, finances them and reaps the profit of their knowledge and industry—probably out of all proportion to what a private individual would do for and reap from prospectors—then on principle it is right that this same assistance should be extended to two private individuals, one the prospector and the other the man who grubstakes him.

The hon. member for Vancouver South has pointed out that it is the history of the industry that individual prospectors have discovered the most and the best mines. That ought to be encouraged. What have we here? We have here discrimination between two positions, and the reason is quite clear. In my view the reason is that in the case of a corporation or a syndicate, supervision or checking can easily be carried out and the quantum of allowance determined with mathematical accuracy, while in the case of the individual it may be difficult. Obviously that is why there is a distinction and discrimination, because in my opinion the principle is absolutely the same. In fact if there is a weight, on balance, it is in favour of the individual prospector. I suggest that in respect of the Yukon, the hon. member for Yukon has given with great particularity the modus operandi which would protect the public treasury against fraud. It can be done in any individual case by the exercise of diligence and labour on the part of the taxing authorities. The difficulty is in administration, and I think the minister will tell us that when he comes to reply. I do suggest that in setting up the income tax too much regard is given to the convenience of administration, the centralization of administration, and not enough is given to business and employees of business. The whole thing is based upon this principle: how can we get the most dollars in the easiest possible way and with the least administrative difficulty? That is an indictment against the administrative policy of the department.

It is of course only natural that a departmental head would say, "Well, this is the easiest way; we can get the same results along an easier path." But they do not think the thing through clearly. They do not ask themselves: which is the better way, having regard to the whole national economy, and the public interest? I suggest the whole position ought to be reviewed. I am wondering if we have not put our finger right on the weakness of the administrative position, namely that this is an administrative problem they have not tackled and do not wish to tackle. It stands to reason that if it is a good principle to give a tax concession to a company or a syndicate or a group, then certainly that principle is sound as it applies to an individual. You cannot get away from it; you cannot deny it. In this instance if there is to be discrimination it would be to the greater advantage of the national economy and would bring about a greater national productivity if such discrimination were in favour of the individual rather than the company.

My reading of history is that individuals with inventive minds or a flair for prospecting who are employed or sent out by companies never have reaped the part of the reward that was due to their industry; it is taken up by the company concerned. I know that is true of individual inventions which have been financed by companies. I know it is true in connection with chemical research.

I have a clear recollection of a chemical engineer of a very high type who delighted doing work of this kind. He was in the employ of a company and of course in receipt of a good salary. He would not have been there if he had not been getting that salary. But he had capabilities, and he discovered something, and I regret to have to say that he did not reap where he had sown to the extent that he ought to. This type of tax legislation just puts a premium on what I have been talking about.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that there is much I can add to what I said in reply to the hon. member for Yale. It does not seem entirely clear from the remarks of some hon. members that individual prospectors do not get any benefit. Apparently they would not get any benefit even if the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South were adopted.

Mr. GREEN: The minister's assistant is not right. The man who grubstaked the prospector would get a credit, but the prospector would also get a tax credit for his expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: That has never been suggested before to my knowledge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose he would get it automatically.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suppose he would get it as expenses. This resolution is intended to benefit the man who puts in an amount not exceeding $500 in the case of one association or syndicate, and not exceeding $5,000 in the case of contributions made to all such associations or syndicates. The man who is in the $100,000 income bracket may grubstake prospectors up to $5,000 provided that they are properly registered and are recognized as a prospecting syndicate. In the case of individual prospectors I could get one to go into the field—I am told there are none out of work at the moment. It is not simply a question of administrative difficulty, it is a matter of knowing whether or not a man is a prospector.

If I wanted to give a fellow a nice holiday I could give him $500 to go up and look around northern Quebec. He could spend his time on the delightful lakes up there. Perhaps he could take a pick along or he might even register as a prospector, but the result is that I would get an income tax credit. That would be extremely difficult to check.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is an administrative difficulty.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is more than an administrative difficulty. I think the view was that the government would not be justified in extending it to the individual. That was the position taken last year, and so far as I know there has not been any change.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not an answer.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The parliamentary assistant has referred to the individual prospector who might go up into northern Quebec or some other mining section and have a holiday. The taxpayer who contributes and gets a tax credit does not go out himself. The syndicate does not go out, nor does the mining partnership. It is the prospectors who go out, and they are just as apt to go on a holiday as the man referred to by the parliamentary assistant. You cannot keep track of the individual prospector any easier when he is working for an individual than you can when he is working for an association or syndicate. What has the Minister of National Revenue to say? The Minister of Finance said that he would discuss it with him.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member for Yukon has referred to the Minister of Finance passing to me a letter that had been sent to him concerning this matter. What the Minister of Finance was referring to me was the question under section 8, subsection 5, whereby an allowance is made for an association, syndicate or mining partnership registered or otherwise recognized under the laws of any province of Canada. The hon. member for Yukon brought up the fact that this does not extend to the territories, and he contended that they were just as much entitled to it as the provinces. That matter is being taken care of in the legislation this year, and this allowance will be extended to residents of the Yukon and other territories.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Do I understand that contributions made by taxpayers to individual prospectors will be taken as a credit?

Mr. GIBSON: That is a matter of finance, not for national revenue.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It could be easily accomplished by amending the resolution by adding the words "to individual prospectors" after the figure "1943" in the second line. The resolution would then read:

> That the tax credit allowed to a taxpayer of forty per centum of contributions made by him in the year 1943 to individual prospectors, to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals be extended to include a tax credit in respect of contributions in the year 1944.

You could do it by the addition of three words to the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no trouble about doing it if the government felt it was proper to do it as a matter of policy. I have been endeavouring to explain for some time, no doubt inadequately, that after considering the matter fully last year and again this year the government felt that it could not go that far.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For administrative reasons?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not say for administrative reasons only.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The objection is for administrative reasons, but the amendment I have suggested would obviate those administrative difficulties. Now the tax allowance is made only in the case of contributions to prospectors who organize and incorporate a company.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, the observations of the previous speakers should bring forcibly to the attention of the government the importance of the prospector. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have taken part in a discussion of this matter, but where is the Minister of Mines and Resources? He is the man who should be evolving a broad and comprehensive programme of mining development in this country. He knows the provinces in which mining is most active.

I cannot recall a single mining property in British Columbia which is not the result of the efforts of an individual prospector. The great Sullivan mine, which gives employment directly or indirectly to 100,000 people, such as railway men, machinery men, and other employees, was discovered by a prospector many years ago. The individual prospector was the basis of all mining organizations. The different companies raised the money; the government did not raise it. Individuals subscribed for shares in these companies and smelters were built; machinery was bought. All of this contributed to the development of mines, which in British Columbia at least have created the greatest prosperity that that province has known.

The average life of a mine is twenty years, and then comes the depletion period for which the mining industry is asking a fifty per cent depletion. After twenty years most mines have to close and unemployment is created. As one of the members noted, in the post-war period it is the mining industry that will create the most employment and the most prosperity. I do not know of any better argument I can present that the prospector is the basis of it all than to state the fact that in British Columbia, you can count seven smelters which have gone out of business, or rather, seven smelters which have been treating British Columbia ores; one of them is on the international boundary. These smelters created an immense amount of business and a great volume of employment. Then we come to the gold mining industry. In 1938 there were thirty-nine plants in British Columbia for the treatment of gold ores. To-day there are just seven. There is no encouragement from the government. The department of mines should cooperate with the various provinces in a broad and comprehensive programme for the recreation of the mining interests and the mining activity and the mining development in every province which appeals to the prospector.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to go on record as supporting the contention of the hon. member for Kootenay West. The minister has a peculiar idea, and the Department of Finance has an even more peculiar idea, that this is a generous thing which they are doing. Let me say this: you limit it to base metals or strategic minerals. In the view of the treasury officials that is what they want. Now, base metals and strategic metals are frequently found in connection with mining gold. I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister that they reword this clause and omit the words "for base metals or strategic minerals.", and so have the section in this form:

That the tax credit allowed to a taxpayer of forty per centum of contributions made by him in the year 1943 to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada shall be extended to include a tax credit in respect of contributions in the year 1944.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To apply to all metals.

Mr. ADAMSON: To apply to all metals, to apply to all prospectors, because in our peculiar and very intricate geological structure, if you limit the prospector to going out looking for strategic or base metals you will find that the clause will have very little effect at the present time. It is of very little use to the prospector, because it is an extremely limiting clause. I believe we could well follow the Australian practice, by which they allow one hundred per cent as a deduction for prospecting, up to a certain percentage of the total income. I am going to read the specific clause, because I think it is important, particularly at this time in the war. Clause 23 provides:

The following income shall be exempt from income tax:

That is, it is unequivocally exempt from income tax. Here is the clause concerning the prospector:

(p) Income derived by a bona fide prospector from the sale, transfer or assignment by him of his rights to mine for gold in a particular area in Australia or in the territory of New Guinea. For the purpose of this paragraph "bona fide prospector" means a person, other than a company, who has personally carried out the whole or major part of the field work of prospecting for gold in the particular area, or who has contributed to the expenditure incurred in the work of prospecting and development in that area, and includes a company which has itself carried out the whole or major part of such work.

That is a broad provision, and I think it is a sound and reasonable clause to insert at this time in our act. We are going into the post-war period very shortly, possibly within the next year, and we are going to find our mining industry on a salvage basis. Remember this, that while during the war we have had great metal production in base metals, in such strategic metals as tungsten we shall be unable after the war to compete with the rest of the world, because we have only produced them under the stress of war, because a bigger supply was not available; it was cut off by war. We needed the metals and we needed them at any price; we had to have them. But when the war is over, world sources of these strategic metals will be opened up; it will be found that it will be uneconomic to continue producing a number of them, and in all probability the operations will close down. Some of them have already closed down. The mercury situation is a peculiarly dangerous one; if I may use the word about mercury, it is a peculiarly volatile one, because it fluctuates tremendously, depending upon the outlook and upon certain peculiarities of the industry. Tungsten is another such instance. We have the Emerald mine: having opened up that mine we find that there is no market for its products. There was a market: we had to have the tungsten at that particular time: but at the present time the mine, I believe—the hon. member for Kootenay West will correct me if I am wrong—is closed. That is the sort of thing we are going to find.

The limitation of the credit to base and strategic metals is defeating the very end for which this resolution is required. In the future we shall be worried not so much about getting production of strategic metals as about putting the mining industry back in a sound and a replenishing condition. At the present time, as I have said, the mining industry in many instances is on a salvage basis.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON: When the committee rose I had not quite finished what I had to say with regard to this item. One of our most immediate problems, as I have tried to point out to the parliamentary assistant this morning, is not the finding of strategic metals. The operations specially undertaken for war purposes have to a very great degree been closed down because they cannot now compete with the natural source of supply. I mentioned tungsten, molybdenum, mecury, mica and others. These operations are not going to be of much use to us because even now, while the war is on, they cannot continue; so that with the resolution as it now stands the minister is flogging a dead horse. To make the resolution really mean something I would suggest bringing it into line with legislation elsewhere, that expenditures on prospecting be allowed at the rate of 100 per cent. By this I mean that if an individual or a company grubstaked the prospector the whole amount so expended in grubstaking would be allowed as a deduction. There would have to be some safeguard with regard to the way in which that money was expended. That I see. But in Canada to-day we have active and extremely capable prospectors associations who are jealous of their good name. Not only that, but we have an equally active Canadian institute of mining and metallurgy, and there are the various provincial mining associations. They are all responsible bodies of men and they have a great responsibility to the state. They would join with the government in judging of the bona fides of the prospector. That is the way it has been done elsewhere. I believe that the private association is the one that is recognized in England where legislation similar to that which I have suggested is in force.

Let us see what this means. Mining is a game that is completely unlike any other operation. Mining is one of the few operations, in fact it is the only one I know of, where the small man, the individual who has as little as $50, has an opportunity to enter into the development of Canada. May I give the minister some figures on the national character of this industry, and I do so to prove the point I wish to make. To-day there are in mining companies 136,801,310 shares. Of that number there are owned in Canada 99,579,476, or 73 per cent; in the United States, 28 million, or 20·5 per cent; elsewhere, 9 million, or 6·5 per cent. This shows that the shares are very largely held in Canada. But it has escaped so many people that there are 274,192 individual shareholders in Canadian mines, of which number 168,404 are resident in Canada, while 81,869 are in the United States and about 24,000 elsewhere. In other words, 61·4 per cent of the total number of shareholders reside in Canada. This means that 168,404 individuals are dependent on or have a stake in the mining industry.

There is no other industry anywhere in the world that can show a comparable general and widespread public interest as the mining industry in Canada. It is truly a national industry. The average shareholding of all these people is around 500 shares. These are the facts. It is nationally owned; it is owned by the small man; and it is the one industry that can serve us immediately at the end of the war. Under this clause, however, no encouragement whatsoever is given to the general prospector. You are told you can go and look for molybdenum or tungsten or other strategic minerals knowing that mine after mine is being closed down because they are not economic. Nobody would go into a tungsten mine to-day or into a molybdenum mine. Properties are being closed because the other natural and great source of these metals is being opened up.

If the minister would accept my suggestion and remove the qualifying conditions in this section and allow prospecting for all metals, not merely restricting it to base and strategic metals, it would mean that the prospector could go and benefit by whatever he might find. I wish to urge that very strongly upon the minister. I believe the Minister of Mines and Resources should have been here and should have stressed it as hard as I am, in fact harder, because he can say to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue things which it would be perhaps unparliamentary for me to say. However, I say to the assistant that there is no outlet, there is no field of endeavour that offers the possibility of the mining industry, and it offers it right away.

You will say that there has been a great boom in the Yellowknife and elsewhere. True, there has been a speculative boom, but the Yellowknife has been known for a number of years. The market has certainly reflected a speculative interest in a number of drill holes, but remember, a drill hole is not a mine. Because we are led away by looking at the mining market that is not a sound basis on which to regard the future of this industry. We have to see to it that the mines are developed. Mere speculation as the result of a drill hole is not development. I leave that with the minister, with the most earnest request that he give it serious consideration before these resolutions are finally passed.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the few remarks which the Minister of National Revenue made on these resolutions he made it quite clear that he did not make the balls of taxation; he only rolled them. I think in that terse statement I represent clearly the gist of his remarks before the committee. I and others have suggested here to-day that the reason why the line of demarcation, or shall I say discrimination, has been drawn so closely is that it is an administrative one and an administrative one only. It lies within the minister's power to indicate whether that is the real reason why the resolution does not go as far as hon. members have urged. I ask the minister to lay the cards on the table and to say that this is the real reason. Then I suggest to him that a complete answer has not been given to the hon. member for Yukon and others who have indicated a way, in their localities at least, whereby this discrimination may be overcome. A case has been made out for the prospector and his individual backer that is unanswerable. There should be encouragement given to them, because, as the hon. member for York West has just indicated, there is no occupation in the country that can be put into action so quickly and easily immediately after the war as the mining business. Surely we ought to try to encourage that. I request the Minister of National Revenue to state the positon frankly. Is not this an administrative difficulty?

Mr. GIBSON: No; I would not say that at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what is the real difficulty?

Mr. GIBSON: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has answered that question on two occasions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With due respect to the minister, I do not think he answered it at all. He just said it was a matter of policy on the part of the government, without giving any of the reasons lying behind that policy.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have tried to do it several times. I do not think there is any purpose in repeating what I said this morning. Would my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Does he think there are not sufficient funds coming forward now for prospecting purposes?—because that of course is all this section covers. It does not affect the individual prospector, as I tried to make clear this morning. It does, I presume, encourage some people to put money into prospecting. Does he from his own experience feel that there is not enough money being put up for prospecting purposes? My own opinion is that there is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My experience would not be worth anything, because I do not come from a mining country and am not interested in mining stock. But those who ought to know and do know say that prospecting is dead. I think it was the parliamentary assistant who said that there were no men available for prospecting.

Mr. ABBOTT: My information is just the contrary. Every prospector in the country is working his head off.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Somebody said there were no prospectors available. I do not believe that for a moment. I believe there will always be an opportunity for prospectors, and as the hon. member for Vancouver South said, after the war there will be many, within a year perhaps, who will want to engage in prospecting.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the time to give the incentive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; now is the time to give the incentive so that they will know what the position is.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend realizes that originally this was for one year only, for the 1943 period. This resolution proposes that it be extended for one more year. It is not a permanent part of our taxation legislation and the taxation that has arisen in this war. I should like to quote what the minister said with regard to mining company taxation in his budget speech. I think it is well worth repeating. At page 4182 of Hanard the minister said:

During recent months we have been urged to introduce a number of drastic changes in the tax structure as it affects the mining and oil producing industries. These industries are very properly considering their post-war position and the contribution which they can make to the solution of post-war problems. Needless to say, the government has very much in mind the need of a comprehensive and many-sided programme to encourage the efficient development of our natural resources and to assure that these industries will make the maximum contribution to the expansion of employment, national income and national wealth after the war. Natural resources, of course, are for the most part in the hands of the provinces, but the dominion, it is believed, can do much to promote full development and wise conservation. Tax policy may be one of the devices which it may appropriately use to these ends but it will be by no means the only one. The dominion's programme should be part of an integrated programme worked out in cooperation with the provinces. At the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference, this programme, it is proposed, should be discussed with provincial governments and agreement reached as to the contribution to be made by the respective levels of government.

For these reasons I believe that any radical changes in tax policy of special application only to the mining and oil companies would be premature at this time. The Excess Profits Tax Act already includes a special formula for the taxation of oil wells and gold mines. New companies in the metalliferous mining field enjoy a three-year exemption from excess profits tax. In last year's budget we made a number of important concessions to encourage exploration and drilling for oil and also made it possible for mining companies to write off exploration and prospecting expenses incurred in prospecting anywhere in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals.

That is the provision we are referring to now. I continue:

With this measure of encouragement the oil and mineral industries have been able to make a very important contribution to the country's war effort. They have also been willing to bear their full share of the burden of financing the war and they well recognize, I believe, that the need for war revenue continues at least as great and as urgent as ever. The changes I have announced in respect of income and excess profits taxation and the indications I have given in regard to future tax policy will apply to these industries as well as to other industrial enterprises and I hope that it may be possible to announce at the next session of parliament the comprehensive and integrated programme for the development and conservation of natural resources to which I have already referred.

This statement relates to the broad picture of taxation with respect to mining and other companies engaged in developing the natural resources. This particular provision is a limited incentive provision which was inserted in last year's budget provisions for one year only and which rightly or wrongly was felt should be extended for another year. I think my hon. friend from York West will agree—in fact he has already indicated—that this cannot be taken as a broad measure to cover encouragement in general to the mining industry. It was put in because last year it was desired particularly to encourage the prospecting for base metals and so-called strategic metals. That is all the section is. It is not a broad measure to cover the mining industry as a whole. I think it is desirable to renew it for another year. I think it should be considered along with other provisions when there is a discussion with the provinces as to the proper basis for mining companies as a whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means just stalling on the whole proposition. All that has been asked for here to-day is that the discrimination against the private prospector and his backer be removed.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no discrimination against the private prospector. There may be—I am not prepared to admit there is—some discrimination against the backer of the private prospector.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said "and his backer".

Mr. ABBOTT: My answer to that is, whether my hon. friend agrees with it or not, I think in such circumstances the incentive to abuse would be so great I do not believe it should be introduced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means administration.

Mr. ABBOTT: Administration is a necessary part of any tax law, and if a law cannot—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it is not a fundamental part.

Mr. ABBOTT: If a tax law cannot be administered efficiently and fairly, so that the people will believe in it, in my opinion it is a bad tax law.

Mr. ADAMSON: I just want to refer to one point. The statement was made that there were enough prospectors. Referring to the official blue book containing the report on reconstruction, I find the significant statement that successful prospecting had almost come to an end after 1940. That is what has happened; successful prospecting has come to an end. I have tried to point out that the great boom in the Yellowknife was the result of a series of diamond drill holes, which may or may not mean a mine there. Until we have the definite development we cannot tell. I repeat that prospecting has virtually ceased in a great part of Canada, other than some special sections where I admit there is a good deal of activity at the present time.

Mr. ABBOTT: Certainly I cannot say with any personal knowledge whether or not prospecting has ceased. My officials tell me that according to their information that is not the case. Of course it may have been curtailed because of the man-power shortage, but I cannot say as to that.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the assistant to the minister inform me whether I am correct in assuming that the write-off is designed to encourage prospecting in regard to base metals, and not in regard to gold?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then I should like to make this contribution, if it be one, to the discussion. My experience is that prospecting has practically dried up. It is my view that prospecting for gold mines should be encouraged now, instead of waiting until the war is over. It has been said previously, and I do not want to go all over it again, that from the time the prospector is lucky enough or scientific enough to stake out a claim, at least four years must elapse before the mine can be brought into production. I took the trouble to elaborate on this point on another occasion; I am not going over it again, but I do not think anyone who understands mining will dispute that statement.

Mr. ADAMSON: Four years is a very short time.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is probably the minimum length of time, according to all our experience with silver in the old Cobalt days, with gold in the various gold camps, and with base metals. If it be right to encourage prospecting for gold, why should we wait until the war is over, and then have a further hiatus of four years before any more gold properties can be brought into production? After the war our friends to the south may not be as liberal with us as they have been up to the present in the matter of credit. They have given us splendid cooperation so far; we have been enabled to make goods for the mother country because the United States have given us credit for the raw materials we required. However, notwithstanding what may happen at Bretton Woods, in the natural course of events that cooperation will begin to taper off to some extent. Then we may be told again by the Minister of Finance, as the predecessor of the present minister, who is now Minister of National Defence, told the gold mining industry two or three years ago, "Spend your money. Increase your plants. Take on all the men you can. Produce every ounce of gold you can possibly produce to enable us to maintain our exchange with the United States at something like a reasonable level, because we have to do it." What is going to be the use of that if we are to be blacked out for a four year interval after the war? I do suggest to the Minister of Finance and his associates that this matter should be given some further consideration.

Now I should like to say a word about the suggestion that there are no prospectors available to go into the field, if they could do so under attractive conditions. It is true that there is a sprinkling of prospectors in the armed forces. Those in the north country who were of army age flocked to the colours; there was no more loyal body of men in the country. But there is a vast army of prospectors who are over military age, but who, because of their experience, are still extremely useful. Indeed, without throwing any stones at the younger men, I might say the older ones are perhaps even more useful. If you take the trouble to go back through the statistics and look up the prospectors who have been most prominent in discovering valuable mineral properties of all types throughout Canada for the last thirty years, you will find that in the main the original discoveries were made by men of fifty years of age and over. In other words the old timer, of whom we speak in the mining camps, is still with us. If you would give him proper encouragement he would go all over the country carrying on his work. I want to join with those who have said that we have not understood the encouragement we ought to give those prospectors. I fail to appreciate why we should continue to encourage men to look for base metals, which we will require to a much smaller extent after the war, and at the same time refuse to encourage men to prospect for gold, which we will require to a far greater extent after the war.

Mr. JACKMAN: In rising to support the suggestions that have been made by various hon. members I should like to say that I hope the spirit behind this section will be embodied in our post-war taxation legislation. This house has been reminded already, but I will take time to repeat it, that eighty-four per cent of our mineral production is coming from mines discovered before 1920. As the hon. member for Parry Sound just said, prospecting is at a standstill, and nothing we could do would be better calculated to open up our great north country than to have more prospectors. However, I should like to direct my remarks to the suggestion that there should not be any substantial administrative difficulty in extending the benefits of this provision to the individual prospector who is backed by another individual or a small group of people. The parliamentary assistant has suggested that such a provision would be full of loopholes, that a father might send his son into the woods on a vacation, to fish, and he would be able to get an allowance in his taxation bracket under the pretext of having sent his boy out on a prospecting expedition. I do not believe such things are likely to occur. Of course there may be a few cases of that kind, but I do not believe their number would be at all substantial. I think the parliamentary assistant or the Minister of National Revenue, who is in charge of the enforcement of this provision, should outline some of the cases which they fear will deprive the treasury of a substantial amount of revenue.

Let us analyse the case of the father and son. Is a father going to give his boy $500, or some such amount, to go into the north country and spend his summer fishing, and then claim this $500 as a deduction from his income tax? In the first place that would mean that a father would have to be in collusion with his son in an effort to cheat the government out of a certain amount of money. I doubt very much if there are many fathers in this country who would be willing to conspire with their sons for such a purpose. I think the fears of the Department of Revenue are ill-founded. I heard just the other day of an interesting story about a saw mill owner who was said to have forty bosses and who operated at a loss. I could not understand how that could be, but it was explained to me that he was in the habit of taking logs out of the river which did not belong to him. His employees knew about that, and they proceeded according to their own ideas as to how long or how hard they should work. The result was that he was certainly worse off than if he had operated as an honest man.

I doubt very much if dishonesty would further any person in this game of sending a man into the north country, any more than it would in any other field. In my view the fears of the department are entirely without foundation, and I would ask for information as to other cases than that of the father and son, which has been mentioned. What man is going to give some other person $400 or $500 to go up to the north country to waste? People are not disposed that way. I should think any attempt at collusion would be pretty well confined to a family, and I have endeavoured to explain that the honour existing between father and son would be such as to prevent any great number of these cases at any rate. Furthermore, if the Department of National Revenue would undertake a few prosecutions, where there may be loopholes, they would soon find that there would be no more advantage taken of those so-called loopholes, and the result would be a stimulus to exploration and prospecting activity in this country, something which is so badly needed for the post-war period.

The department has admitted the principle that we need more prospecting in the north country. An extension is granted to companies and syndicates which are registered, but refused to individuals. I call upon the department to review its decision to exclude advances to individuals to encourage prospecting, as having been based upon ill-founded fears. The administration must not consider itself first, even if there are some who do slip through their meshes. The important thing is the matter of job creation, and the bringing of more production to the market, whether it be of minerals or any other commodity, which will help the standard of living of the people.

That is the important thing. We must recognize that man is not made for the budget, but rather the budget is made for man. And where there may be more production, it must not be restricted by considerations based upon ill-founded fears in the minds of officers in the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has made it quite clear that the government will continue its policy of discriminating against contributions by taxpayers to individual prospectors. I do not think there is any mistake about that. To my mind that is a poor policy, and one which will not tend to increase mineral production in this country. I said in the first place that it was unfair, and I say it should not be continued. This morning I suggested to the government a very simple way in which they can remove the difficulty so far as the administration is concerned. It was my understanding that the Minister of National Revenue said that this provision of the Income War Tax Act, subsection 5 of section 8, will be extended to apply to the Yukon territory and the Northwest territories, as it does now to the provinces.

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct, yes.

Mr. GREEN: I can see the difficulty in the minds of the Minister of National Revenue and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance in understanding the pleas which have been placed before them to-day. From what they have said, they envisage the big man in Montreal or Toronto or Hamilton who puts up $100,000 or $50,000, or some other large sum of money—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is limited to $5,000.

Mr. GREEN: —to help out a prospector. But the situation we are asking the government to meet is entirely different. We are thinking of the small town of perhaps 500 or 1,000 people, where there are young men, or perhaps older men, who know the country, understand prospecting and are willing to go out and take a chance in the hope of finding a bonanza. That is the way the mines in British Columbia were found. As a matter of fact, in many instances these individual prospectors are in direct competition with the prospectors sent out by the big companies. Mind you, that is heavy competition, because the big companies in the event of a strike in a district may send out twenty-five or fifty employees to stake everything in sight. In some cases they keep the little fellow right out of the field.

[Mr. Jackman.]

We are asking for help for the individual prospector who will go out from the small towns. In the first place, we think his backer, the local merchant who puts up the food or an amount of cash, should be entitled to this tax credit. I go further and say that the man himself who goes out should be entitled to his expenses as a credit. This morning the parliamentary assistant said that he thought that was already done. I am informed that it is not. The prospector spends his money in the purchase of food and mining equipment, but does not get any credit.

Mr. ABBOTT: The deputy minister tells me that under those circumstances a man is entitled to the expenses entailed in earning his income.

Mr. GREEN: But is he entitled to his food? Is he entitled to the amount he pays for food?

Mr. ABBOTT: He is entitled to ordinary equipment, whatever expense he incurs, just the same as you and I as lawyers are entitled to our expenses in earning legal fees.

Mr. GREEN: But we are not entitled to the cost of our food. This man would be going out and taking a chance. For instance, let us consider the man returning from the war who has a small amount of money coming in from other sources, which will be taxed very heavily. There is no chance that he will use that money to go out and risk it in the hills. I suggest he should be given a tax credit just to aid him in prospecting. Those are the cases we are worried about.

Mr. ABBOTT: Upon what does the hon. member say he should get a tax credit?

Mr. GREEN: For his expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: He gets that now. From what would it come?

Mr. GREEN: Well, if we can be sure he gets it, that helps.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does get it.

Mr. GREEN: But I do not think he does.

Mr. ABBOTT: This section gives tax assistance to the man who puts up the money to help some person to do the prospecting.

Mr. GREEN: I am referring to the prospector himself; does he get an allowance?

Mr. GIBSON: Does the hon. member mean a credit from the income he earns from his prospecting?

Mr. GREEN: In making out his income tax return each year, does he get credit for what he had to spend in order to equip himself to go out prospecting?

Mr. GIBSON: If he has earned income from his going out and prospecting, he does. That is what he can deduct expenses from, namely, the expense incurred in earning that income.

Mr. GREEN: In many cases the prospector goes out but does not earn an income.

Mr. GIBSON: Then he is not taxable. What could he put the tax credit against then?

Mr. GREEN: Any other income he has.

Mr. GIBSON: No; he cannot do that.

Mr. GREEN: Then he is not getting any help at all under the present law. That is the picture. I cannot understand why you help the big companies but will not help the little fellow. So far as we are concerned that is all wrong and certainly should be remedied.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I just make one point clear? My hon. friend has referred to the big companies, but if he will look at the resolution he will see that they are not necessarily big companies. A big company may get the benefit of it, but it says:

That the tax credit allowed to a taxpayer of forty per centum of contributions made by him in the year 1943 to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships registered or otherwise recognized under the law of any province in Canada.

That is pretty broad. Take the case of a small town, such as my hon. friend mentioned, and of a group who want to grubstake a prospector. It is perfectly open to them to register as a mining partnership in accordance with the law of the province. They can put their capital into this partnership, and the partnership may engage a prospector and grubstake him to go out. Contributions or payments to a mining partnership, a prospecting syndicate or whatever you want to call it, would qualify under this section. The limitations under the section are twofold. First, there is a restriction as to base or strategic metals, and we had some discussion on that point. Second, the credit is not allowed in the case of contributions made to individuals. It has been urged strongly by the hon. member for Yukon and others that this credit should be extended to contributions or subscriptions to individuals. I have endeavoured to put forward, perhaps unsatisfactorily, the reason why it was decided last year after consideration that that should not be done, and that the same considerations ruled this year. But that is the only limitation. As I have pointed out, it covers associations, syndicates or mining partnerships registered or otherwise recognized under the laws of any province of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant stated this morning that he is opposed to this tax credit because in the large cities promoters are using it for their own purposes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Please do not misquote me. I did not say they were using it. I expressed my personal opinion, which I have always had, that it gave a certain amount of incentive to stock promoters to form these syndicates or associations for the purpose of getting subscriptions from the public on the ground that they would be partly exempt from taxation. That is only my own personal opinion. I think that objection is more than overcome by the desirability of encouraging this work.

Mr. GREEN: That objection would not be applicable in the case of a merchant in a town who advanced money to a prospector.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are other objections that are equally strong.

Mr. GREEN: In that case it is not a question of financing or floating a company.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am going to move an amendment to this resolution which I think will resolve some of the difficulties we are up against. I move:

That the word "base" be struck out of clause 30.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not an expert on parliamentary procedure, but I think this is a money resolution, and if it is—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a tax resolution; it is not expending money.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new doctrine, that a private member cannot amend a tax resolution. I have seen it done fifty times.

Mr. GOLDING: Not if it increases—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is no authority on anything as far as I am concerned. If he will just keep quiet I will explain my position. If this resolution provided for the expenditure of public money, then the parliamentary assistant's point might be well taken.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member is attempting to amend a tax exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A resolution providing ways and means of raising money is in an entirely different category.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a resolution which provides a tax credit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This resolution is the reverse of one to raise money; this resolution gives some relief.

Mr. ABBOTT: It affects the revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not agree with that. If that is to be the case we might just as well fold up and go home as far as these tax resolutions are concerned. It will be ridiculous if parliament is to be hamstrung in that respect. The rule is that no one but a member of the government can introduce such a resolution, but that does not say that we cannot amend it. I have seen time after time motions put in committee of the whole to reduce an item in the estimates to one dollar.

Mr. GOLDING: That is in order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you for the commendation; I am glad to hear that you agree with me. This amendment is of the same nature.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I rise to a point of order?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not through yet.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was going to help you.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope you are, but wait until I am through. I am a little fearful of help from that quarter, but I will welcome it if it is genuine. The illustration I gave about reducing the estimate is I submit on a parallel with this amendment. I hope the parliamentary assistant will not be serious in pressing his point of order.

Mr. ABBOTT: An amendment to reduce an estimate simply provides that we spend less money, and it is open to any hon. member to move such an amendment. But this resolution affects the revenue. If the exemption is extended to other classes than have been provided, then the revenue will be affected. I prefaced what I said with the remark that I am no expert on parliamentary procedure but I have always understood that a money resolution or a resolution affecting the revenue had to be introduced by a member of the government and had to be preceded by the formula we have listened to on many occasions, that it has been communicated to His Excellency the Governor General, and so on. This is a resolution which affects the revenue. The suggestion made by the hon. member for York West would have the effect of diminishing the revenue which would be received under the Income War Tax Act. If that is so, then I think it would be out of order.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I suggest that we should know just what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the hon. member for York West that the word "base" be struck out of clause 30.

Mr. KNOWLES: Whether or not a point of order has been raised, I should like to refer to citation 502 in the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. I am not discussing the merits of the amendment moved by the hon. member for York West, but I should like to read this citation:

> A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order again, the parliamentary assistant has correctly stated the position that no one but a member of the government can move a money resolution, but I have never heard it advanced that a private member could not move an amendment to that resolution.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps they will be less stubborn about making changes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether the hon. member for York West had concluded what he had to say, and perhaps I should not have interrupted him. After he has completed his remarks I would prefer that the committee allow the resolution to stand until the minister is able to be here.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to make two short statements. The Australia act describes exactly what a prospector is. It is not easy to be a prospector. There are prospectors' associations in the various provinces which are very jealous of their good name. If the government are going to cooperate and allow a credit for money spent in prospecting, then I think they will find the prospectors' associations and the mining associations extremely jealous. They will be careful to see that their good names are maintained and that no money earmarked for prospecting is spent in any other way. To that extent I am certain of the genuineness of the prospectors' associations.

Now I come to the amendment. A prospector goes out into the field. In our complex geological structure he may be looking for anything—copper, zinc, molybdenum, tungsten or half a dozen other base metals, and he may find a showing of precious metals mixed with base metals. Nickel is a case in point, also Noranda and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting. All have a definite precious metal content in their ores. Frequently base metal mines have started out because it was thought they were precious metal mines. If you continue to have this limiting clause, when a prospector finds a showing of precious metals when he is out looking for base metals, he will turn it down because he can get no allowance.

Mr. ABBOTT: The individual prospector gets no concession under this. It is his backer that gets it.

Mr. ADAMSON: In nearly every case you will find that the prospector is in part his own backer.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he found a showing of precious metals I doubt that he would quit simply because he could not get the benefit of this exemption.

Mr. ADAMSON: It depends on the showing. You can never tell what you are going to find. In some gold areas some of our biggest base metal mines have been discovered, and vice versa. That is why I say that this amendment should be given very serious consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: The section might stand until the minister can be here. But I just want to say one word about the individual prospector. I am advised that no prospectors' association has requested that this concession be given to the individual prospector—not one. Mrs. MacMillan is the president of the Dominion Prospectors' Association, and her association has never requested that this be extended to the individual prospector. I am advised that one reason why they have not done so is that they feel it might bring the section into disrepute and result in the concession being withdrawn entirely. I just wanted to get that on the record.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are fearful of abuse.

Mr. ABBOTT: These prospectors' associations, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury knows, are extremely well organized in each province, and we have had no request from a single prospectors' association that this concession should be extended to the individual prospector.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): You have this request from the members of this house.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but we have had no request from any of the associations referred to.

Mr. STIRLING: These associations might not be interested in private individuals, merchants and others, who desire to grubstake the prospectors.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think that most of the prospectors would be members of the associations and therefore that the associations of prospectors would be interested in the backers of individual prospectors to have this concession extended which is given to syndicates and partnerships. I just wanted to point out that we have had no such representations from any of these associations.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am surprised, because that certainly is not the story that was intimated to me.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the information given to me by my officials.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is in order for us to discuss the amendment until you have declared whether or not it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I have not yet given my decision, but it would be in order for the hon. member to speak to the amendment in the meantime.

Mr. ABBOTT: In any case I have asked that the resolution stand, so that the minister himself might consider the amendment.

Resolution stands.

31. That one-half of expenditures on maintenance and repairs incurred by any taxpayer carrying on a business (or an underground development, in the case of a taxpayer operating a mine) in a period to be fixed by order in council be regarded as deferred maintenance and repairs and be deductible as an expense, at the option of the taxpayer, either in the year or fiscal periods when incurred or in years or fiscal periods ending subsequent to December 31, 1942.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very important matter which was referred to by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. His remarks will be found at the beginning of the last paragraph on page 4181 of Hansard. Just to refresh the minds of hon. gentlemen I am going to read what the minister said, and make, I hope, a few appropriate comments. He said:

> Another point at which our taxes on business income have gone beyond the taxation of true income, is in the matter of expense for maintenance and repairs.

That is a sad admission, that the taxation policy of the country has in that regard gone beyond the taxation of true income; that is, it is violating the real principles of taxation. The minister went on:

For the past two years, in certain industries at least, it has been impossible, by reason of shortages of material and labour and the necessity of continuous operations—

That is in industry itself.

—to carry out the maintenance and repair work that would be normal and necessary to prevent the deterioration of plant and equipment.

That is quite true; there is no doubt about it, and I would say that it goes beyond the past two years. The minister went on:

As a result, deferred maintenance expense is accumulating, and, in the meantime, profits are inflated because full maintenance is not charged.

That I think is a true statement of the position. Apparently the minister's advisers are properly informed of what the position is. The only remark I would make about that is that it is an understatement of the position. Full maintenance is not charged, deferred maintenance expense is very rapidly accumulating, and profits are thereby tremendously inflated and are taxed improperly, taxed in some cases 100 per cent less the 20 per cent refundable. That is a serious indictment against the present taxation structure. The minister goes on to say:

We have tried in the past to find some equitable formula for permitting the setting up of a maintenance reserve, but it is extremely difficult to devise one which will fit the varying circumstances of all industry.

I suppose that is an administrative difficulty, but I see no difficulty in devising a formula that would operate for a particular industry, and I do not understand why it has not been permitted before. The minister goes on:

We are now recommending a provision for the future which I hope will meet the problem in at least a partial way—

I suggest that that is not good enough. I characterized it in my address on the budget as a pseudo remedy, and I adhere to that term for lack of a better one. Here you have an admission by the minister of a weakness in the tax structure and that he is attempting to meet the problem merely in a partial way which will speed up the work of plant repair in a period when additional employment may be needed. What is the proposal?

The proposal is that one-half the expenditure on maintenance and repairs, incurred in a period to be fixed by the governor in council—

I pause here to criticize the giving of authority to have the period fixed by the governor in council. How can the governor in council—which means the Department of National Revenue, which means the commissioner and his staff—know what is to be the appropriate period? Yet they make the final and only decision. The man who should be able to fix it definitely in his own particular case is the man who wants to catch up on the deferred maintenance, not a government bureau. What is the parliamentary assistant's answer to that indictment of bureaucratic power, a power which is reserved in this resolution, purposely and with intent aforethought, according to the minister's statement as it appears at page 4181. They are to hold the strings in their hands, and if their opinion differs from that of the proprietors of the business, then the latter are overruled and the department is the sole judge. I continue the quotation:

—may be charged against the income of a previous fiscal period but not farther back than the fiscal periods ending in 1943. In the case of the mining industry, maintenance and repairs will be held to include also underground development work.

I am not concerned about that at the moment. Now I submit that we are entitled to a much fuller explanation than is contained either in the minister's statement or in the resolution before us. The resolution before us takes an arbitrary half of the expenditures on deferred maintenance and repairs and carries into effect this period to be fixed by order in council and to be deductible as expense at the taxpayer's option in any fiscal year within the limitations mentioned. We should have a thorough explanation of this half remedy, according to the minister's own admission. I call it a pseudo remedy, because it is not a real remedy at all but a partial remedy. Perhaps his language is better than mine. It is a partial remedy for what he admits, in his statement at page 4181, to be an evil in the tax structure. He admits that the tax structure on business income has gone beyond the true measure of taxation on true income. That is a damning admission, in the minister's own words, that they have overtaxed companies in previous years. They have not allowed sufficient sums to take care of what is a necessary provision for maintenance and repairs, which must be deferred because of the lack of labour or perhaps equipment.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is why it is being corrected now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but it is only to the extent of one half of what it ought to be.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. The parliamentary assistant can explain it if he likes.

Mr. ABBOTT: You can have it one half in one year and one half in another.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would like to have that explanation, because I am trying to understand this as well as to indict it.

Mr. ABBOTT: You had better do the former first.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am strong on denunciation, because it is the only way to get at the truth—that and cross-examination. You cannot get it by mealy-mouthed phrases or polite invitations. You never get anywhere. We have not got anywhere to-day on resolution 30, which was allowed to stand. Indeed, that was the very reason why 30 was allowed to stand—that it is discriminating against one class and in favour of another. My view is that we are never given the actual facts and the underlying reasons for any move on the part of the administration. They are afraid to reveal their hand. I will illustrate that. A supporter of this government this morning, when we were discussing that provision—this is by way of a digression and I hope the chairman will not stop me—when we were considering section 28 dealing with the requirement to file returns showing interest credited to depositors in 1944 and subsequent years, revealed to me the real reason. The real reason is that the government wants to know who has money in the bank so that it can send the national victory loan people and make these people buy victory loans. That is the real underlying reason. They will deny it, but there is a lot of truth in that.

Mr. GIBSON: That is entirely wrong, because the income tax division does not tell other departments of government what information it receives from the banks or anyone else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose I have to accept the minister's statement, but that was the opinion of one of his supporters.

Mr. GIBSON: It is quite incorrect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it may be incorrect, and perhaps I am unduly suspicious, but I would not be doing my duty as an opposition critic if I did not have some suspicion of this administration, or any other.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is justifiable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In many cases it is justifiable. I will not waste more time on that because I think I have made my point.

To come to section 31 of the resolution, I do not wish to go over the whole ground again, but we have first of all a frank admission on the part of the Minister of Finance that they have been doing an injustice through the tax structure to corporations and companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only if perpetuated. Be fair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I beg your pardon?

Mr. ABBOTT: Only if it is not corrected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not see the applicability of that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have a word to say on that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I read the English language and I try to understand it and I think I have some realization of the value of words. He says:

> Our taxes on business income have gone beyond the taxation of true income.

Mr. ABBOTT: But that is because they have not been able to get materials to do repairs, and we are recognizing that fact.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not have to lecture me on that. I know the reason why. The parliamentary assistant objects to my stopping at that point; I see that. They have not allowed proper reserves to be set up in days gone by as operating charges to come off operating income and as a result they have taxed beyond what is true income. That is my indictment against this administration, and that is true all along the line. I have a whole sheaf of comments here against the entire tax structure, and the best indictment I have against it comes from the greatest defender of the administration, the Winnipeg Free Press. I may take occasion to put that indictment on the record before I am through. The Free Press, in a series of articles, indicts the whole tax structure of this government, so far as income tax is concerned, in language that is stronger than any I would use, and it added counts in the indictment that I would not. In the course of their indictment of the government's tax policy they have charged, under the fourth weakness of the system, the method of collection. "The fourth weakness in our system is in its method of collection." I am not indicting the government for that, because I made a number of investigations of it and I had some reassurances. This indictment in the Winnipeg Free Press was published in March of this year. It contains at least three of the most damning indictments that I have ever heard put forward to the public of this country, and it is published by one of the strongest supporters of this government. They may have some underlying reason for this indictment; I do not know. I am not in the confidence of the Siftons, but on the surface it speaks for itself.

Let me call this to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. The first count in the indictment is that our tax laws are undemocratic. That is a very general statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is that on this resolution?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I can talk about taxation on this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: We must have reached the stage now after so many months of the session where we should keep within the ambit of the resolution that is before the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to conform to the rules of the house. Will the hon. member across the way stop muttering? I have the floor. If he wants to say anything let him rise. He is only the temporary chairman of the committee of ways and means; he is not the permanent chairman.

Mr. GOLDING: You are doing yourself credit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope so; I never talk foolishly in this committee.

Mr. GOLDING: You sit there and interrupt all the time, and if anybody else says anything you crack down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you have anything to say about me, get up in your place and say it and I will answer it.

Mr. GOLDING: I am saying it sitting down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order that has been raised—will you be good enough, Mr. Chairman, to ask the hon. member to stop muttering and interrupting me. He has nothing to say that is worth listening to. I am making a reasoned argument. If I am in order I propose to go on; if I am not I shall confine myself to the section. But I do submit in all fairness that we are dealing with a question of taxation and administration of taxation, and under that heading I am entitled to give my views and the views of others that have been communicated to me as to the injustice of our taxation system.

Mr. ABBOTT: That could be done under any section of the resolution?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it could. I think you can attack the system of taxation under any section.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ABBOTT: Again with deference I would differ, but perhaps I am wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to conform to the Chairman's ruling. If he says I am wrong I will not pursue the point any farther, but I shall have something to say on it later.

Mr. ABBOTT: It can be said on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The parliamentary assistant is quite right about that. If I am not permitted to say it now I shall say it then.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but if we can have the general criticism on the second reading of the bill perhaps it would facilitate the resolutions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the Chairman rules I shall answer that by referring my hon. friend to what the Minister of Finance said about this very proposal at page 4181 of Hansard when he delivered his budget speech. He was referring to the point I have raised. This is what he said:

> . . . our taxes on business income have gone beyond the taxation of true income. . . .

Using that basis laid down by the Minister of Finance, under which this resolution is brought in, I propose to indict the taxation system, if I am permitted.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, in the committee of ways and means it is easy for hon. members to have a general discussion on almost any resolution but it is not conducive to celerity. The hon. member for York-Sunbury knows the rules better than I do myself—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not say that.

The CHAIRMAN: He realizes that I am the last man who would try to curtail discussion. I am in the hands of the committee. I know they want to play fair in their deliberations. It is absolutely impossible to have ironbound rules. However, I believe at this stage of the deliberations it should be possible to keep within the ambit of the resolution before the committee and avoid general discussion not germane to the clause.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I take it if I keep within the ambit of the subject matter of the resolution I am in order in proceeding, and I shall be glad to do so.

I lay down the first indictment against the proposal as outlined by the government's friend, the Winnipeg Free Press, that our tax laws are undemocratic. This is what the Free Press says:

In the Minister of National Revenue—which actually means in his deputy and other officials—

I hope the minister is not just a figurehead, but that is the implication here.

—the law vests almost dictatorial powers.

That, of course, is the gravamen of the charge, and I think there is a large measure of truth in it.

—almost dictatorial powers; and not only dictatorial powers but sweeping powers of discretion.

I say it is an axiom of any taxation statute that the right to tax must be clear and explicit as against the subject; unless it is, the courts of this country will not give effect to the power to tax. That is one of the fundamental principles of the right of the crown to tax the subject. That has been departed from so frequently and to such a degree in the growing powers of income taxation that we have in this country that it calls not only for an immediate halt but for reform, which is long overdue. I have not the section of the act before me, but in a given case certain government bureaux of this country are entitled to impose taxation that is not imposed by the statute itself; not only that, but to fix the rate and the incidence of taxation. That is taxation outside of the borders of the statute itself. That was done, it was said, to meet a special case of tax evasion. I think that was the reason for it, and there is some basis for that reason, but why give it to a group of men, no matter how much confidence we may have in their personal character? It is wrong in principle to give power such as that to a group of men when parliament has not even been consulted about it. This article goes on to say:

In a democratic country the citizen should never be subjected, if law can prevent it, to the varying opinions of officials, however sincere—

That is exactly what I have been saying in other language. That is the position to-day. In this country citizens are subjected to the varying opinions of officials and perhaps to the varying opinions of the same officials; although I am bound to say I have not before me an instance that would justify me in being dogmatic about that statement, because I have found that once a decision is given it is like the law of the Medes and Persians; they very rarely reverse themselves. They think it is not proper to do so. Well, let me say to the minister that in one of the greatest courts the world has ever seen, the Supreme Court of the United States, they do reverse themselves. We are not so good at that sort of thing in Canada, we are so bound by precedent; but in reading the history of the Supreme Court of the United States and its place in the history of that country I have been struck by the number of times that that court has reversed itself. I do not think that ever happens in the income tax department of this country.

Then the article refers to the matter which I brought up in this house last week, namely, the inadequate system of appeals against the arbitrary decisions of tax officials. That is the language of the Free Press, not mine. I did not go as far as that, nor am I going as far as that now. It was the system of appeals that I was objecting to, which the parliamentary assistant characterized, I think, as an empty gesture, or something to that effect; at least, that it was not worth while.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said the worst that could be said about it was that it was a bit of waste motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot remember the words my hon. friend used, but I know he gave half-hearted assent to my proposal. The Minister of National Revenue proposed to perpetuate that system making him the sole court of appeal, if I understood him correctly last week, but having a group of technical advisers around him, which of course does not meet the point at all. The next point made by the Free Press is:

Again, twenty-six years after assessing a citizen for taxes, the government can reopen the account and, saying it was mistaken in the first place, force him to pay more taxes for years long past.

That has not been amended, except with respect to men overseas, and for that much consideration we give thanks.

Mr. GIBSON: That has been amended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There should be some limitation. I point out that this is not permitted in Great Britain or the United States. I think that is based on the theory that the principle of estoppal does not operate against the crown. I never could understand why that should be so, why the principle of estoppal should not operate against the crown as it does against me as a subject. It is a survival of the old days when the crown was supreme, when it could do anything it liked and was not amenable to the ordinary laws of the country. The doctrine that the principle of estoppal should not apply against the crown should be thrown into the discard immediately, for it is a denial of justice.

Mr. GIBSON: Perhaps the hon. member has not read resolution No. 20.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have read it but perhaps I have not comprehended it fully. You know, they were passed through within three minutes after the house met the other evening, before many hon. members got to the chamber.

Mr. ABBOTT: But we went back to a number of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To No. 15.

Mr. ABBOTT: And two or three others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have looked at resolution 20, and I am corrected to a degree; but if I am permitted to say what I would have said if I had been here when that resolution was called, I suggest that the six year limitation should date from the filing of the assessment, and not from the assessment itself.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Rosedale put forward that argument the other night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is putting it forward again through me now, and that is the criticism I am going to make. This change has partly taken care of the objections of the Free Press, and I am not going to labour the point further. On the other hand, supposing after I pay my tax I find that I have overpaid; what right have I to ask the government to reopen my assessment? I think they would do it; I have enough faith in the fairness of the administrative officers of the department to believe that if I could show that I had made an overpayment they would reopen the case and give me a refund, but there is no right on the part of the subject. I think that is a correct statement; and as a corollary to the crown's right to reopen, provision should be made for the subject's right to reopen. That would seem to me to be a balanced position.

Then the provision for refunds is discretionary. Well, I think the Free Press is wrong when it says the government "may" make the refund; I would believe the word "may" as it applies to the crown in effect would be mandatory, and that they must make the refund, so that I am not going to add that count to the indictment against the government.

There is this matter of the charging of interest on deficiency payments. I could tell a long story in that connection, but I hope the matter is going before the courts, so that I am not going to deal with it here. But if the government charges interest on deficiency payments why should it not allow interest on overpayments? That is a point which I think cries for reform, and I do hope the officials will give effect to that change. It seems to me that is only fair and just. It used to be that if you made an overpayment you got a refund, if the assessment was made within a reasonable time. To-day they put the overpayment to your credit for the next taxing year, long before it is due. That reminds me of the story told me by an old Irish woman who was employed to do the washing in my mother's home; she was paid so much per diem—not so much either, in the light of what is paid to-day. She had to use a certain portion of that money for the final repose of her husband's soul, a most exemplary thing for her to do. I was just a lad, and I asked how she knew when the payments were completed. She replied that she never knew, but that if she overpaid it went to the credit of her next friend. That was her opinion; it may be wrong, but that is the story of which I am reminded. In this case the government exercises some option the authority for which I cannot find in any statute, and instead of making a refund of the overpayment it is credited to the tax for the next year, on the theory that during the time that has elapsed you have again become indebted to the crown, although the amount is ascertained.

Mr. GIBSON: They are entitled to their money at once if they want it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why, without asking, do they put it through as a credit for the following year?

Mr. GIBSON: They get their assessment; they are shown that it is to their credit, and if they want it back immediately they can have it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can show the minister an assessment on which it is indicated that there has been an overpayment, with the statement that it is carried forward to the next taxing year.

Mr. GIBSON: That is quite all right; it is just a matter of convenience. If the taxpayer wants it back he is entitled to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say it is not quite all right at all; the money should come back with the assessment. That is what a business firm would do. If I sent a cheque in payment of an account and overpaid it, my creditor on discovering the error would receipt the bill and return the excess payment. If he did not I would think he was a pretty poor citizen. That is all I am going to say on that point.

Then, of course, there is the second indictment, which is the strongest of all; that is, the injustice of a system which taxes the same income twice. I suppose it is perfectly useless to argue this point here, but I know it is a great injustice. We passed a convention the other day one of the objects of which was to prevent triple taxation, but as far as I can see no one has raised his voice against the injustice of double taxation. I well remember when that system of double taxation was introduced in this house. I should like to commend to the taxing authorities of this country a review of the position in Great Britain and of the effect of the system here. I have in my hand a little pamphlet which has been compiled just recently. I am not going to read any part of it; I have not time to do so, but I commend it to the taxation authorities. It is a memorandum on the relationship between an incorporated company and its shareholders, and in regard to the incidence of the United Kingdom income tax and surtax. It is prepared by Mr. Raymond W. Needham, one of His Majesty's counsel, and a bencher of the Middle Temple. It has to do with this matter and kindred subjects.

It would be perfectly useless for me to argue the point of double taxation now. But until there is a review of the tax structure in this country, and until some indication is given to the business world as to what the taxation system is to be in the immediate post-war period, nobody can plan for the post-war world so far as industry is concerned. They cannot plan as to what they shall do. I know companies that are just waiting to know what the post-war policy of taxation will be. I made a speech in the house on the budget debate and touched upon that point. I have recalled that the Minister of Finance made the statement that no government could bind its successors. In a general way that is true. But any government, visualizing the post-war period in this country, should indicate at least what its views may be in the post-war period in respect of taxation. I talked that matter over with one of the biggest executives in Canada. If I were to mention his name he would be recognized at once as one of the soundest business men in Canada. I gave him my speech to read, and when he had finished he said, "You are absolutely right. In the businesses of which I am chairman"—and he named three big companies—"we do not know what to do with regard to the post-war period, until there is some announcement as to what post-war taxation is to be, and with regard to improving conditions to make employment for people who are coming back to industry." This is a matter of vital importance to Canada, but nobody is giving any consideration to it, and least of all the government of the day.

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been given constant consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, then, they are hiding their light under a bushel. They may be giving theoretical consideration to it. The only thing we are getting is a saturation of taxation—and we certainly have got that. I am going to tell the parliamentary assistant and his colleagues on the treasury benches and members of this government who are now in the chamber that they will know what the public think about it at the next election—make no mistake about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Don't commence to boast.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not commencing to boast or to threaten. I am just stating the facts as I hear them from every point, and as I will hear them right in Vancouver Centre.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will take my chances with you any day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Come on down and we will fight it out. I will take one side of the ring and you can have the other.

Mr. JACKMAN: And with one hand tied behind your back.

Mr. ABBOTT: You do not want to pay until it hurts any more.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As far as I am concerned I am paying.

Mr. ABBOTT: And so am I.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am paying because I want to help. But I am afraid there are a lot of people in this country to-day who do not want to pay. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres in this house either last session or the session before; I have listened to speeches from other parts of the house, and I have come to the conclusion that there is a certain amount of public opinion in this country that neither wants to pay nor wants to fight to win this war. And that is a pretty sad thing to contemplate.

Mr. GIBSON: Are you arguing that now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am condemning it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: Taxes are too high, are they?

The CHAIRMAN: I have given a lot of latitude to this discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you; I realize that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is taking it.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in duty bound, however, to consider the rules, and to have hon. members in the committee observe them as closely as possible. Surely the hon. member for York-Sunbury will realize that most of the discussion—although he has made a fine speech, and all that—was not relevant to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It will be understood that the last five or ten minutes has been the result of interjections by the Minister of National Revenue. However, I am going to take the chairman's hint, and not wear out my welcome—or perhaps it is not a welcome.

The third point is an indictment against the question of annuities. We shall have something to say about that when the section is under consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is no section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we shall have something to say about it at some appropriate time, because I understand the government is setting up a commission to investigate the whole matter. On that point I should like to know just when that is going to happen. Why is the commission to be set up? I should have thought the department would have had all the facts and could have evolved a formula to submit to parliament. Apparently there is some disagreement. However I am not going on with that.

I am leaving out the fourth point in the indictment in connection with the intolerance and injustice of our tax system as portrayed by the Winnipeg Free Press, a friend of this government. I hope the government will listen to it, and I hope each member of the government has read it.

I shall now return to a brief discussion of the resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I hope I have not been foolish in what I have said to-day. I hope it has been informative. It is something I have thought about for a long time, and something I have thought should be said in the house. I did not hear anyone saying it. It was in the same position as the indemnities question. I pointed out last week that what I had said about indemnities was what we were all thinking.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. McLEAN: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, most of us. I know the hon. member for Simcoe East does not agree with me. But ninety per cent of the members agreed with what I said about indemnities.

Mr. McLEAN: What is the hon. member's authority for the figure of ninety per cent?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I gathered that in a general way, because of the support I got in the house. All parties spoke for it. There was support from all shades of political opinion.

Mr. McLEAN: But only about ten spoke.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The others did not have a chance. Some members never speak in the house, but that does not prevent their revealing what is in their minds.

To get down to resolution 31, I should like to have an explanation from the government as to why they limit this to one-half, and why in particular they keep to themselves the power of fixing the period of years. I may have something to say after the reply has been given.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the first place, as the minister indicated in his speech, many suggestions have been received from industries which want to be allowed to set up a tax-free reserve to take care of maintenance and repairs they are unable to carry out now because of a shortage of materials and man-power. This matter was carefully considered. The feasibility of being able to allow such a tax-free reserve was considered, and it was felt that the difficulties in the way of allowing it were almost insuperable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What were they?

Mr. ABBOTT: One was that if you allow a reserve you are permitting the judgment of managements to determine what is adequate provision for repairs and maintenance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who would know better?

Mr. ABBOTT: Whereas under ordinary circumstances you have the facts as to what money was actually spent on those repairs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In a given year.

Mr. ABBOTT: The proposal here is that after a period determined by the governor in council repairs and maintenance may be charged, half back to a previous year. In other words the income tax return for that year may be reopened. One-half of the repairs in a given period may be charged back to that year and, in effect, the taxpayer would be receiving a refund on taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even though the money is not actually spent?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, the money must all be spent, and the taxpayer may then charge half of it as current and take half of it and put it back in a previous period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When can he do that, in view of the fact that he cannot get either labour or material?

Mr. ABBOTT: Now I shall meet my hon. friend's second point, the reason for putting in a provision that this will apply during a period to be determined by the governor in council. That period will be fixed when materials and labour are available and when it is desired to encourage employment. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the war should end some time next year. Materials and labour would then become available for deferred maintenance. The government would say, "You knew what the provisions were; as and from July 1, 1945, expenditures for deferred maintenance and repairs may be charged in accordance with the provisions of this section; one-half of the expenditure from that date on may at the option of the taxpayer be charged as an expense for any year subsequent to December 31, 1942." The taxpayer is given the option to charge to any year where he had war-time profits but where he was not able to make repairs and do the maintenance which he would ordinarily have been able to do. In other words they are allowing him to put it back into that year, but he has actually to make the repairs or do the maintenance. Then he takes the other half and puts it in the year in which he expends the money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is allowed the full portion of the cost of all maintenance and repairs that he makes?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no limitation on that?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. He can take half of it and put it back into a previous period. I have discussed this with a number of concerns that have been unable to make these expenditures for deferred maintenance, and they feel that this will be a real help.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not minimize it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether they would have preferred a reserve, but they seemed to indicate that this will largely meet their problem. I just wanted to clear up my hon. friend's point. The legislation does not contemplate that it shall be chargeable only to the year in which the repairs and maintenance are made; half the expenditure may be taken back into a previous period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot read into the resolution all that the parliamentary assistant has said but at least his explanation makes it more understandable. I have discussed this matter with three different lines of industry, and I was told that they would prefer to be allowed to set up reserves. I think that would be the usual method of accounting, would it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: The Income War Tax Act has never allowed contingent reserves as a deduction from income. The only reserves that are allowed are those for bad debts and depreciation. The English act is the same.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that is quite correct in practice. There is the question of inventory reserves.

Mr. ABBOTT: That has been under the Excess Profits Tax Act since the war began.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are allowed to set up a reserve for inventories which have become depleted and the replacement of which is very uncertain.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is only for excess profits tax purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a half-way measure, but I am thankful for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is more than half way.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does resolution 31 cover more than one taxation period? Does it cover, perhaps or possibly, three taxation periods?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not stated, and frankly I am not sure about it. That will be indicated in the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is nothing to equate the amount of expenditure which may be made in the future with the actual amount of deferred maintenance and repairs. Take the railways, for instance. It was stated by the Canadian National in the railway committee—of course this company is not subject to taxation and does not come under the Minister of National Revenue—that they have set aside a large amount of money for deferred maintenance. I questioned them as to how they arrived at the amount and I was informed that they had made an actual physical survey of how many stations would have been painted had the paint and labour been available, and how much work on the various sections of the line would have been done. They had made an accurate accounting computation of deferred maintenance, and I believe last year they set aside $13,000,000 for that particular purpose. How will the department know that under this provision full compensation will be made the deferred maintenance? With some concerns it might work out satisfactorily, while with others it might not. I can see where it might be necessary to carry forward these provisions for two or three years in order that a plant might be able to make adequate maintenance.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be impossible for the department to say that an actual expenditure made by a company, let us say in 1945, represented ten per cent deferred maintenance and ninety per cent maintenance for that year. We assume that some repairs are being made all the time, and it is recognized that the average concern cannot do full repairs or make full maintenance. They will catch up on these, presumably, as soon as men and materials are available. This resolution provides that the actual expenditure incurred after a date to be fixed may be charged, one-half to a back period and be considered, arbitrarily, if you will, as the cost of deferred maintenance, and the remaining half to be charged as current expense. I am afraid I cannot give any other explanation than that.

Mr. JACKMAN: While this resolution does give some relief where there has been over-taxation on income which was not true income, it leaves out entirely the cost of reconversion. Because of the war and to some extent because of the length of it, I suppose well over fifty per cent of the industries of this country are being used to a greater or less degree on war production. In some cases their whole layout has been changed completely to produce munitions of war, and their peacetime production has fallen by the wayside. There is no provision here to cover the cost of reconversion, nor do I see any in any other resolution. I believe that the cost of reconverting a plant which has been on war production should be properly chargeable to war profits, just as we are doing in the case of deferred maintenance, which is chargeable to years in which the money was not spent and in which the over-taxation has taken place. One of the most important questions in connection with post-war matters is the cost of reconversion, which leaves a man's plant in no better condition than it was in 1939 or when he first turned his energies to war production. With the termination of the war his contracts end and he is faced with the problem of reconverting in order that he may once more turn out goods for civilian consumption. In some plants this cost will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. In many small plants it will be $10,000 or $20,000, which is a considerable item. I believe the revenue department should give the same consideration to this problem as they have given to the question of deferred maintenance and repairs.

I should like to hear from the parliamentary assistant if there are any good reasons to the contrary. I have talked over this matter with some industrialists who are going to be faced with this problem, and they find themselves short of working capital because they have paid out so much in taxes to the government and have not been allowed to accumulate any reserves for this purpose. I think one could say that they are at their wits' end to know how they are going to finance the cost of reconversion. If there could be some tax relief it would help in a small measure to solve the problem with which they are going to be faced, namely, the providing of employment through civilian production.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with my hon. friend that this problem of reconversion is one to which the government will have to give, and is giving now to some extent, the most careful consideration. However, reconversion costs are primarily capital costs. Repairs and maintenance have always been recognized in income tax law as current operating expenses. The cost of reconverting a plant has always been recognized as a capital expense and would be charged as such on the books of the company, would be set up as a capital charge and be subject to depreciation. In a great many war plants a substantial amount of capital cost will have been written off during the war by virtue of accelerated depreciation or by a combination of accelerated depreciation and ordinary depreciation. I do not want to minimize the importance of this reconversion problem or to be understood as saying that it is not one to which the government should give consideration, perhaps consideration in framing a budget, although I feel, or rather I hope, that it is a matter which could be more appropriately dealt with in the next budget rather than this one. It is primarily a capital matter and involves questions of high government policy as to how these plants are to be reconverted.

Mr. JACKMAN: We have the government already giving consideration to the Industrial Development bank, which might very well be left to a subsequent session if brought up at all. I admit the distinction between capital assets and what can properly be charged to maintenance and repairs, but the parliamentary assistant said that most of these war plants had allowances through which they could write off their capital assets which were devoted to war purposes. That is a rightful provision, for the owners of these plants have created certain assets for the production of war materials which will be of little or no use after the war, and the writing off of that capital expenditure should take place during the war. But the parliamentary assistant has endeavoured to hang the principle of exclusion of reconversion costs from this section on to the idea that reconversion has to do with capital assets and that the company can spend its money on rebuilding its plant and getting it ready for civilian production and charge the cost off to depreciation.

But in the great majority of cases a company which has been in war production and has written off its war production facilities, which are now in many cases completely useless, has to use the same physical space to recreate capacity for producing civilian goods, and therefore the company is not better off now than it was in 1939. The company finds that it has to spend a great deal of money in the way of capital, if you want to call it capital, to put itself in the position in which it was before the war. Some allowance should be made for this expenditure, which will amount to a great deal in the case of many companies, many of them without working capital. Relief, or the promise of relief, should be given to them in the present budget and not in some future one. If the parliamentary assistant's reasoning about postponing the matter to a future budget carries any weight at all, the Industrial Development bank should also be postponed until then.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all. That is setting up a piece of machinery.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is for the very purpose of reconverting war assets into civilian assets.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only in part. That is one of the reasons but by no means the only one.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is the chief reason that gives the thing any commendation whatsoever. There is no use in having committees and commissions to investigate post-war possibilities and reconstruction problems, such as the James commission and others which the government has created on the principle that the government believes in private enterprise, when at the same time the government will not restore the motivating force behind private enterprise.

Mr. ABBOTT: Surely the hon. member does not suggest that we should reduce taxation at this stage of the war.

Mr. JACKMAN: The parliamentary assistant is always bringing up the question of reducing taxation. The hon. member for Parry Sound said that it takes at least four years to bring a gold mine into production from the time of the initial strike, and similarly I say that it takes business a considerable time to lay its plans, to reconvert its plant for civilian production and to recreate markets for its civilian goods which will be needed after the war. All this takes a great amount of work and money. The parliamentary assistant says that we can discuss this matter in the next budget a year from now. By that time we shall have many more men discharged from the services who will be looking for employment. Already we have 150,000 discharged, and we hope that within the next six months we shall have more men discharged than there are jobs immediately available. It is high time therefore that the ground work of industry should be laid so that we may have post-war employment for these men who will be returning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one observation I should make arising out of a remark made to my colleague by the parliamentary assistant. He said: "Surely you are not suggesting that we should reduce taxation at the present time." I say, Mr. Chairman, that this budget is reducing taxation. Some of these proposals are reducing taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: Very little.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the principle is there. So that the statement made by the parliamentary assistant is not correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are merely adjusting some inequalities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are wiping out some taxation in this budget as well as making adjustments. We are suggesting reductions in taxation, and the reductions which were suggested in our amendment were evaluated by the minister as representing a large sum of money.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then let me correct my statement. Surely you are not suggesting substantial reductions in taxation at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are suggesting reductions in taxation in order to meet the situation that will arise in the postwar period. I want to say this to the minister and he can tell it to his friends. The reductions in income taxation which the opposition amendment advocated this year will not begin to equal the waste in the army in Canada, will not begin to equal the amount of money which the Department of National Defence is wasting in the army in Canada. That is my answer to the statement of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. CHURCH: I represent an industrial district, Mr. Chairman, and I do not like the wording of resolution 31. I realize that when the tumult and the shouting dies and the captains and the kings depart in two or three weeks and when parliament will have prorogued, the budget resolutions which we are now passing will have a far different meaning in effect from what this high court of parliament now thinks. We shall make a very grave mistake if we pass this resolution as it stands. It says that one-half of the expenditures on maintenance and repairs incurred by any taxpayer carrying on a business in a period fixed by an order in council shall be regarded as deferred maintenance, and so forth. That includes trade and commerce, large and small businesses. But what did the Minister of Munitions and Supply say the other day? He said that you could not get materials and you could not get labour to do this specific repair and maintenance work. The resolution goes on to say that this provision shall apply also in the case of a taxpayer operating a mine. That is all right. I have always been one of those who ever since the war started have supported the development of our mining resources and all natural resources to furnish employment to our soldiers when they come back from the war, and I think public opinion will support that. But I object to the discrimination which this resolution makes against the small industrial business man. Let it be remembered that a very large proportion, forty-two per cent of our income tax revenue, comes from Ontario and the industrial income tax districts of Toronto.

I object to the language of this resolution. If we pass it as it is, we shall go home and then within two or three weeks the government can fix maintenance and repairs, deductions for expenses, the period and time and place, all by order in council. Already since the war started we have passed nearly 50,000 orders in council. We are fast approaching the stage where the word "liberty" will be meaningless in this country, because we are being governed right and left by rules and regulations, forms and restrictions, passed under order in council. If you take resolutions 31 and section 33 together—because they are kindred resolutions—and all the resolutions from 20 to 29, you will find that everything that is an enactment is to be done over our heads by means of rules and regulations and instructions and other enactments issued through the department.

Ever since the start of this war I have been objecting to the work of this red-tape factory that has been set up in the east block, where orders in council are passed and the government of the country has been handed over to various control boards No wonder the people are turning against the old parties. They are turning against those parties because parliament has divested itself of practically all its rights and privileges and has delegated all its functions to one control board after another. But that is the very thing that we are fighting against in this war.

The other day I had a letter from a small business man in my constituency, and he referred to what I said in 1942 in connection with this very same question. He wrote telling me that he would lose his small industrial business, the little store he had, and his home, as a result of income tax and the various restrictions by which business is being hampered. Not only that, but his boy, he said, would be deprived of that schooling to which he was entitled. This man fails to see the necessity for all these regulations.

This whole red-tape factory, in my opinion, should be abolished. We are simply handing over executive power to a bureaucracy, and we are doing it under resolutions 31 and 33. We are well on the road sooner or later to the totalitarian state. In England, in the late Sir Kingsley Wood's budget about two or three years ago there was a discussion similar to that which has been taking place here to-day, in connection with this income tax question, and several members made an argument very much along the lines of the argument advanced to-day by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and others. They referred at that time over there to the various abuses that have crept in as a result of the passing of all these orders in council, rules and regulations. In a remarkable pamphlet written two years ago, "Possible Recovery?" Dean Inge put the matter in a more definite way:

> Our upper and middle classes in supporting this war committed suicide with their eyes open. They knew that at the end of it they would find themselves deprived of nearly the whole of their incomes, forced to surrender all the comforts and luxuries which their families had enjoyed, and many of them driven from the homes which they had come to love. So great a sacrifice has never before been voluntarily made. I know of no other instance in which a whole class has deliberately signed its own death warrant. No doubt they had not much choice in the matter, since there is a constituency in which the taxpayers are more numerous than the tax-eaters.

He is referring in England to the pacifists' policy.

No doubt they had no suspicion that the stupidest government of modern times had committed them to a single-handed struggle against the greatest military power in the world. No doubt many of them believed that war was forced upon us. But their chivalry in laying down all that they had on the altar of patriotism has not been sufficiently recognized.

I would not go as far as the Gloomy Dean, but it is obvious by now that a whole class, perhaps a predominating section of society, whether it has voluntarily committed suicide, or not, has been for practical purposes exterminated in the last four years by budgets. People cannot get labour or materials for any maintenance or repairs. On Yonge street the other day I saw small businessmen putting out their goods on the public street on a side lot. What is the reason for all this? Since the war started we have been virtually abolishing private ownership. In the days of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier everyone owned a little property of some sort, a small store or mill, a cow, a team, a small truck, a grocery concern or something of that sort. But since the war started all this has been swept away by the action of parliament in placing artificial barriers and burdens on industry and in handing over power to boards of control. Three years ago in the British House of Commons, as result of pressure brought to bear upon the administration, they were forced to embody in the budget statute many of the rules and regulations that previously had been promulgated by order in council.

There are many inequalities, inconsistencies and injustices to the small businessman and the small manufacturer who pay income tax, and when we go home we shall be faced with a great deal of criticism. The taxpayers are up in arms as a result of what is now taking place. We have the highest income tax in the world, although it may be argued that it is not the highest exactly in that form. But in the United States and in England they have no sales tax as we have it here. Here, when you add the sales tax, corporation tax, excess profits tax, surtaxes and all other taxes the people have to pay, you find that we have the highest taxation in the world. No doubt the government needed the money for war purposes, and no one objects to that. The ministry must have money, but there is a right way and there is a wrong way of getting that money. I know there is a great chorus of approval, in the press and over the radio, of the victory loan, and a great hip, hip, hurrah over this budget. But when hon. members go home let them talk to men and women in industry and they will find that there is not the same enthusiasm for all this as we find on the part of this large regiment of paid officials, radio and press boosters, information bureau and all the others on whom we are spending something like a million dollars.

I should like to see this session conclude as quickly as possible, and the opposition has given a great deal of help to the government; but you will find that the people back home have more knowledge than we have of what is going to happen to them and the real meaning of it all as a result of all these orders in council and these rules and regulations.

We also need a vast housing and reconstruction policy. With regard to reconstruction the minister forgot many things in the budget—materials, house building allowances, maintenance and repairs and a national housing plan. If there were allowances for housing and many other things like that in industry, construction and reconstruction, the people would not object to it. What were the industries engaged in this industry called housing told? They were told the other day by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that they could not get any materials or labour for that particular work, let alone any allowance along the lines indicated. When I was speaking on this matter two years ago I was told by the minister that I was shooting holes through the budget. I was not trying to shoot any holes through the budget. But the orders in council, the control boards, the rules and regulations and orders in council shoot holes through the budget, and they will do it to such an extent that we shall not know resolutions 31 and 33 when they are passed, and neither will the taxpayers. Instead of getting allowance for maintenance and all that kind of thing you will find that the applicant will be ruled out by a bureaucracy.

I have admiration and respect for the present minister's head of departments and the chief commissioner, but he has an intolerable task. I think it is the unanimous opinion of the committee and of the public generally that he is a most excellent officer. I think it would be far better for him in the administration of his work if he did not have to allow political machinery and orders in council to get beyond control, and if we did not allow this government to come along and pass orders in council or some rules and regulations which will entirely change these resolutions we pass, and make them mean something entirely different from what resolution 31 means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On this subject of reconversion I think the hon. member for Rosedale has done a real service in bringing up this topic. I for one regret that there is no intimation in the budget speech, and therefore none in the resolutions, dealing with the subject matter. I wonder if in certain industries which are no longer engaged in war work this problem has not already been facing the department. I would think that there must have been a number of cases where the position has been met and is now being dealt with in the tax situation. As I listened to the discussion between the parliamentary assistant and the hon. member for Rosedale, my mind led me to believe that theoretically and technically this would be a capital expenditure. I think scientifically that would be the correct category, and yet the suggestions that have been made to give some measure of relief apply with equal cogency for the allowance as it did for the capital expenditure in these plants for war purposes. I hope that consideration is being given to that position by the department, although I see nothing in the law as I understand it to-day which would allow it to be dealt with as a special problem. It strikes me that it is a special problem. I can only express the hope, without any thorough knowledge of the situation or the scientific principles upon which legislation should be based, that within a year, if not now—and I would hope now—consideration will be given to this problem and that equity and justice will be done.

Mr. GREEN: This resolution includes underground development in the case of mines, I believe?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Some of us have received representations from people interested in mining. They put forward special recommendations for the taxing of the mining industry. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant has had some.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had quite a lot, yes.

Mr. GREEN: The officers of the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue are really in this position. They have in part the future of the whole mining industry of Canada in their hands. That is a condition which has arisen by reason of the heavy taxation. I freely admit it is wrong that they should have that responsibility, but that actually is the position at the present time. I ask the parliamentary assistant to make some comments on these recommendations.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I may interrupt, I do not know whether my hon. friend was in his place when the question came up a little earlier and I quoted the minister's reference to it in his budget speech at page 4183 of Hansard:

Mr. GREEN: I have the minister's reference here. In effect the minister said that he hoped there would be a dominion-provincial conference and that everything would be lovely after that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think that is a fair paraphrase of what he said; it was a little more complete than that.

Mr. GREEN: He did not go much farther than that.

Mr. ABBOTT: He pointed out concessions that have already been made to the mining industry and that it was premature until the dominion-provincial conference had been held to make any radical changes in tax policy applicable only to the mining and oil companies. I put the statement on Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: I have it here. But I think the situation is sufficiently serious and the recommendations are sufficiently clear to justify some comment from the parliamentary assistant. The recommendations are as follows:

> That depletion allowance of fifty per cent of the net earnings of metal and industrial mineral mines be allowed, and extended to dividends paid by such mines.
>
> That taxes paid annually to provincial governments and to municipalities be allowed as a deduction from earnings of all mining companies before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax purposes.
>
> That all annual expenditures made by mining companies on outside exploration in any part of Canada, excepting cost of options or purchase of property, be allowed as a deduction from earnings before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax.

The statement goes on to point out:

> The above recommendations represent unanimous views of all investigating bodies appointed by government and industry alike as to the proper method of providing an overall equitable plan of mining taxation and to place the industry on a footing where it will best be able to perpetuate itself to the lasting benefit of Canada.

Some point is also made of the fact that even though those changes are not made now it will be very helpful if the government will announce their policy of mining taxation for the post-war years. That would enable men interested in mining to make the necessary preparations now so that they could go ahead and develop their mines after the war. I think the parliamentary assistant will agree that it would be beneficial if the mining industry could have some such blueprint as that. Would he make some comment on these recommendations?

Mr. ABBOTT: Along with other hon. members I received a great many of these recommendations. The minister also received them prior to the preparation of the budget and prior to the delivery of his budget speech. There is really nothing that I can add to what he said at page 4182 of Hansard with respect to the consideration given to the taxing of the mining industry. He refrained from dealing with these specific recommendations. It is true that he dealt with the subject in a rather general fashion, but he did deal in some particular fashion with the special provisions already made for the mining industry from the tax point of view. I cannot speak for him, but my feeling is that it is premature at this stage of the war to attempt to revise the taxation structure for the mining industry alone. I think it has to be dealt with in a larger picture by revising our tax structure when the war is over or so nearly over that we know what our commitments are going to be. I personally do not believe that we can now single out the mining industry as a special industry for special concessions other than the ones which are already contained in the act. I think it should be dealt with as the minister said—and I am only paraphrasing it—as a part of an integrated plan for the taxing of all industry and business. I would not be prepared to comment on these specific suggestions; and, speaking generally, that is the reply which I have given to a number of people who have written me personal letters putting forward these suggestions.

Mr. GREEN: Then in effect the government will make no announcement regarding these recommendations?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think the government can make any announcement now. My hon. friend suggested that no matter if we could not carry it out now, we should announce what our policy is going to be six or nine months from now.

Mr. GREEN: No, I did not say six or nine months; I said for the post-war period.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I should say that would be at least six or nine months from now. It is pretty difficult to announce what your fiscal policy is going to be post-war until you know what your commitments are going to be post-war. From a budgetary point of view I think it would be dangerous, to say the least, to attempt to put forward any specific proposals now, until you know how long the war is going to last and what further effort will have to be put forth purely from a war point of view. I think it is too soon.

Mr. GREEN: Sooner or later the dominion government will have to decide on a plan, and I do not think it will get much help through holding a dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. ABBOTT: This mining question is certainly a matter on which it is essential that a dominion-provincial conference should be held, because the provinces are vitally interested in these mines. They come under the head of property and civil rights.

Mr. GREEN: But the dominion is doing the taxing.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a joint matter; the provinces get substantial revenues from the mines, too.

Mr. GREEN: Then what is the present position with regard to each of these three suggestions? For example, what is the position with regard to the depletion allowance and also with regard to the dividends paid by mines?

Mr. ABBOTT: You are asking now for information?

Mr. GREEN: They are asking for a fifty per cent depletion allowance.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are asking with respect to mines? A depletion of 33⅓ per cent is allowed now; and with respect to dividends paid by the mining companies, the recipients may deduct 20 per cent as not being taxable.

Mr. GREEN: The second recommendation is that the taxes paid annually to provincial governments and municipalities be allowed as a deduction from earnings of all mining companies before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax purposes.

Mr. ABBOTT: All taxes paid to provincial and municipal governments are now allowed as a deduction, with exception of income taxes, and since income taxes are collected only by the federal government—

Mr. GREEN: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong there.

Mr. ABBOTT: Taxes paid to provincial governments, other than income or profits taxes, are allowed as a deduction from gross mining revenues, as an expense. I am advised, and as a matter of fact I know from my own experience, that this is an absolutely accurate statement of the law.

Mr. GREEN: What about municipal taxes?

Mr. ABBOTT: They are allowed on the same basis.

Mr. GREEN: The next recommendation is that all annual expenditures made by mining companies on outside exploration in any part of Canada, except the cost of options or purchase of property, be allowed as a deduction from earnings before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is covered by section 8(9) of the Income War Tax Act, which reads:

A corporation whose chief business is that of mining or exploring for metalliferous and strategic minerals shall be entitled to deduct from the sum total of the income tax payable by it under this act and the tax payable under the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, twenty-six and two-thirds per centum of all prospecting, exploration and development expenses incurred by it in searching for base metals and strategic metals during the period from the first day of January, 1943, to the thirty-first day of March, 1945: Provided, however, that such deduction must be taken against the said taxes payable in respect of the year or fiscal period in which the said expenses were actually incurred.

There is also a further proviso.

Mr. GREEN: Does that apply to all mining companies?

Mr. ABBOTT: It applies to all mining companies, but only with respect to expenses incurred in the search for metalliferous and strategic minerals. Therefore it would not include expenses incurred in the search for gold.

Resolution agreed to.

32. That the provision allowing deductions by a corporation from income of amounts paid by way of donations to charitable organizations in Canada be amended to provide that the amount of the donations made in excess of the average of the taxpayer's donations in the last two fiscal periods ending before July 1, 1942, shall be allowed as a deduction for purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, only to the extent that the total taxes payable by the taxpayer under the said acts are thereby diminished by forty per centum of the said excess, unless made before February 1, 1944, and paid or evidenced in writing before the said date or evidenced by a payment before the said date which is one of a series of payments to be made thereafter and accompanied by proper evidence of the undertaking.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will ask that this resolution be allowed to stand until eight o'clock, when the minister will be here. I believe he has some comments he wants to make in regard to it.

Resolution stands.

33. (a) That any enactment founded on resolutions 20 and 29 be brought into force on enactment; and

(b) That any enactments founded on resollutions 1 to 19 inclusive, resolutions 21 to 28 inclusive and resolutions 30 to 32 inclusive be applicable, unless otherwise stated, to the income of the 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think this resolution had better stand also, until all the others are passed.

Resolution stands.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

1. That expenditures in respect of scientific research directly or indirectly related to the taxpayer's business, whether of a current or capital nature, be allowed as a deductible expense, in the case of expenditures of a current nature, in the year when the expenditures are made and, in the case of expenditures of a capital nature, over a three-year period commencing with the year of expenditure.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is in substantially the same terms as the corresponding resolution under the Income War Tax Act. The committee will recall that resolution 23 under the Income War Tax Act provides that expenditures for scientific research and the like are treated as an expense, and a similar provision is to be inserted in the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is there any definition of what constitutes scientific research, or is it left to the discretion of the minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is being worked out and will appear in the bill when it is brought down. I do not know that the drafting is quite complete yet.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That in the computation of capital employed for the taxation year and subsequent periods the requirement to reduce capital by one-half of the dividends paid in cash during any taxation year be altered to provide that such reduction shall be made only to the extent that earned surplus at the end of the taxation year is less than earned surplus at the beginning of the year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman might give us an explanation of this.

Mr. ABBOTT: In effect this resolution proposes a technical amendment to the definition of "capital employed". Hon. members will recall that under the law as it now stands "capital employed" is defined to include paid-up capital and surplus as it stood at the end of the base period, which I think is December 31, 1939, or the last fiscal period in 1939. The law now provides that this figure of capital employed should be reduced by one-half the dividends paid in cash during the taxation period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are to be deducted?

Mr. ABBOTT: One-half of the dividends paid during the taxation period are to be deducted from the total capital employed, or from the figure as defined under the act as being the capital employed. The proposed amendment provides that if the earned surplus at the end of a fiscal period subsequent to the standard period is not less than at the beginning of the period, notwithstanding the payment of dividends, the capital will remain at the same figure. In other words, if a company pays its dividends entirely out of current earnings, its capital employed, for the purpose of determining standard profits, will not be reduced by one-half of the dividends paid during the year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very fair. If they are paid out of surplus the capital will be reduced?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Which section of the act does that amend?

Mr. ABBOTT: Section 4 of the first schedule of the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Was that schedule passed by this house, or is it in the regulations?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is part of the statute. I have the section before me, and perhaps it would help the committee if I read it:

> Capital as hereinbefore defined shall be increased or decreased by a portion of any bona fide additions to or reductions of the assets of the business made during the taxation period other than additions or reductions resulting from profits or losses of the said period, such increase or decrease to be made pro rata for the time such additions were employed in or decreases withdrawn from the business, provided however, that dividends paid in cash during such period shall constitute a deduction from the capital employed at the commencement at the said period to the extent of one-half the total amount of dividends paid during the same period.

The effect of this proposed amendment will be that if payment of those dividends does not result in reducing the earned surplus as it stood at the beginning of the period, there will be no reduction in the amount of capital employed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair.

Resolution agreed to.

> 3. That the refundable portion in respect of which a taxpayer is entitled to repayment may in case of bankruptcy, liquidation, winding-up or dissolution, be repaid in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This resolution deals with payments made in certain cases of bankruptcy, liquidation, winding-up or dissolution. It states that the refundable portion to which a taxpayer is entitled shall be repaid in accordance with the regulations made by the governor in council. The money is taxpayers' money. If it is a corporation which goes into bankruptcy, liquidation, winding-up or dissolution it is proposed to return it to the taxpayer or to the trustee in bankruptcy, or the liquidator, or as we call it in my part of the country, the curator. On dissolution it would be returned to the shareholders. There would be a distribution of the assets of the corporation.

What has the administration in mind with respect to limitation on this? In the case of bankruptcy this money belongs to the creditors, we will say. I think that is correct, although I am afraid a substantial amount of it would go to the costs of liquidation. In liquidation it may or may not go to the creditors, depending on the kind of liquidation, and the reasons therefor.

I think the resolution is too scanty. The question I would put to the parliamentary assistant would be this: What has the government in mind with respect to regulations to be made in each or all of these circumstances?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer it in this way. My hon. friend will appreciate the difficulty which has arisen in respect of a few companies which have either been liquidated, or their charters surrendered. Some of those companies had on their books a refundable portion of the tax, which was an asset. But of course that is not payable, as the law now stands, until after the cessation of hostilities.

The question arose as to who should hold it, to whom it should be paid, and who is entitled to receive it. The liquidator might wish to get his discharge. I think it was ruled, rightly or wrongly, that if a company wound up and the liquidator was discharged, the right to receive the refundable portion was gone. That did not seem equitable. On the other hand it was felt it should not be left to a departmental ruling as to what should be done with this money when it eventually became payable. I would welcome any suggestions any hon. members may have. However, it was suggested, after consideration, that power be vested in the governor in council to approve regulations. In other words, it is put on a little more formal basis than a mere departmental ruling. A formal order in council would have to be passed setting up rules providing for the retaining of this money in the meantime or, perhaps, paying it over under certain safeguards, placing it in escrow or something like that. The situation which it is intended to correct is that the right to receive this deferred amount should not be lost to creditors or shareholders, as the case may be. It is merely a question of setting up the proper machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose situations have arisen which demand the recognition of some action. That must be the cause of its being here.

Mr. ABBOTT: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that in the case of bankruptcy this money should not be kept; it should go to the creditors. Why should it be kept in escrow or kept with the government for a period of time, when the shareholders have not received it? They should get it immediately. I would hope that principle would prevail.

On the other end of the equation is the question of dissolution. The dissolution of a company usually takes place when the shareholders want to go out of business, and surrender their charter. They pay off all their liabilities to the public, and have only liabilities to their own shareholders. They convert their assets into cash, and distribute those assets among the shareholders pro rata. But they cannot distribute this refundable portion. What has the administration in mind with respect to that? Is that going to be held? It is not quite as pressing a problem as that connected with bankruptcy. That would be recognized.

I have an open mind as to what should be done in a case of that kind, although I realize that companies do not dissolve unless their usefulness is pretty well over, or a proprietor wants to get out of business because of age, or for some like reason. It might be a hardship if this were kept from them, although their estates would of course take it, as in the case of deceased persons.

The other two classes are in between the two extremes, as I understand it. The minister has given us the reason why this has been brought down now, but he has not followed the whole picture through. What does he propose to do in the case of a dissolution by a company?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course, I do not know that that is fully settled. My hon. friend will appreciate the difficulties here. His suggestion that in the case of bankruptcy it might be in the public interest to pay money to the creditors at the time the assets are being distributed is perhaps a good one, although we have to remember that these refundable portions do not bear interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Therefore the taxpayer who gets it back now, or at an early date, would have an advantage over the shareholders, let us say, of a company which continues in operation. There must be some safeguard against that. It would not be fair, for instance, to allow a small, privately held company voluntarily to wind up and surrender its charter, all the shareholders then being able to get their pro rata portion of the refundable portion.

The thought was that perhaps it would be desirable to try to work out a set of regulations covering these cases. This presumably will be a temporary condition; it will not last in perpetuity. Those regulations should be approved by order in council, and that should be the code, as it were, to govern the disposition of refundable portions in these cases. None of the creditors is really entitled to demand his money now. It is to make some provision for the holding of the money during the period of transition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not the parliamentary assistant think that the creditors stand in a slightly different position from that of the shareholders?

Mr. ABBOTT: I should think so, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think they ought to be given more consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think so, yes; I should think consideration should be given to that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): However, we will wait and see. This just gives power to make regulations, and it will not be revealed, even when the bill comes down, as to what the regulations are.

Mr. ABBOTT: But if it is done by order in council, the order in council would be tabled. It would be public. I think it is perhaps a little difficult to expect that this should be spelled out in the statute now. It is a matter which it seems to me might safely be left to disposition by regulation, with the added safeguard that it has to be approved by order in council, rather than by just a departmental regulation. However, I have an open mind in the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not in accord with the general principle underlying the statement just made. I think as far as possible regulations dealing with the money of the taxpayers of this country should be brought down and revealed to the world in the enabling legislation that is to be passed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would agree with that as a general principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Once again I wish to voice my protest against government by regulation, against taxation by regulation and now against the distribution of the taxpayers' money by regulation. I am not going to follow the point farther than that, but I think the principle is bad.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that this is being done to give some relief.

Mr. JACKMAN: This is another example of the uncertainty which attaches to refundable taxes. Something the same was found to exist in connection with the refundable taxes of individuals. The government found that to be unworkable because it was not understandable, largely because of the uncertainty. I can understand why it was not possible to make the refundable portion of the individual's tax negotiable, namely his receipt or whatever evidence he might have, but what objection could there be to making the refundable part of the corporation tax negotiable so that it might be transferred from one company to another and thus obviate some of the difficulty which this resolution indicates may exist?

I understand that if a company sells its assets it cannot sell its right to the refundable portion of its taxes because that refundable portion attaches to the charter itself. This creates a certain amount of difficulty for a company endeavouring to dispose of its assets. Would the parliamentary assistant explain why the refundable taxes owing to a corporation cannot be made negotiable? If someone is willing to buy at eighty or eighty-five per cent of the value and a corporation wishes to sell, it is of no concern of any one but the corporation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I must confess that I find it difficult to see any difference between compulsory savings owing to an individual and compulsory savings in the case of a company.

Mr. JACKMAN: The company cannot spend them and force up prices as an individual may do.

Mr. ABBOTT: I still cannot see why we should make a distinction between the two.

Mr. JACKMAN: If an individual has three or four hundred dollars in refundable taxes coming to him and can negotiate these at the bank or with another individual and get the money, he can spend it, but I do not see how the same principle can be applied to a corporation. If a corporation wants more money very likely it can go to the bank and get it and then spend it, if desired. If the refundable taxes owing to corporations were made negotiable this whole difficulty would be got away from.

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I know this is the first time this point has been raised. It was considered desirable that a company should have a reserve available in the form of these refundable portions for the reconversion purposes, let us say, about which my hon. friend was talking a little earlier. These reserves may not be adequate in all cases, but they will certainly be a help to many companies in effecting reconversion. If you make them assignable or transferable a company, in order to realize on its assets, may sell them to some other company. Frankly I am thinking aloud, because this question has not been raised before to my knowledge. I cannot see offhand why there should be any special distinction between the individual and the corporation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The right of assignment is dealt with in what resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the next resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked a banker recently if a bank would lend money on an assignment or hypothecation of a refundable portion, and he said, "Certainly not because the time of payment is too remote and uncertain." But he told me it would be accepted as collateral security on the borrower's own note. I do not think this is of much benefit to business, but at the same time it is some alleviation. Consideration might be given to paying the actual cash in cases where a company finds itself in a difficult position in the reconversion period.

These companies want certainty; they want something they can depend upon. I do not wish to labour the point, but I think this money which does not bear interest, which belongs to the taxpayer, which in effect is a forced loan without interest, should be made available to him according to his requirements at the earliest possible day.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why cannot some consideration be given by the department to putting some maturity on the refundable portions which are paid under the 1944 tax? They could be made to mature three or four years hence in order that business may have some certainty. I am not suggesting doing anything about the refundables which have already been created. But if you made them mature in a reasonable period you would give business some certainty as to what it has. This would create collateral against which business could borrow for reconversion and reconstruction purposes. It would also be good collateral in the hands of the banks. You have gone a long way for the individual, possibly because you could not sell him the idea, and here you have the same situation with regard to industry. If these were made repayable in three or four years, or in whatever time the minister thinks the war will be over, there would be greater certainty and there would be the possibility of greater use for refinancing.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under section 18, subsection 2 of the Excess Profits Tax Act the maturity is fixed with respect to the refundable portions in the different years. In the case of 1942 it will be the second fiscal period commencing after the cessation of hostilities; in the case of 1943, it will be the third fiscal period after the cessation of hostilities, and so on. Then there is the further provision that notwithstanding the provisions of the sections to which I have referred, they may mature at such earlier times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine. The outside limit of the maturity is fixed and the government may anticipate that maturity.

Mr. JACKMAN: It was impossible for the individual to understand the law with regard to the refundable portion of his tax, and it took five or six lines of highly legal language to explain it. It may be you have made things a little clearer here, but if you could state a definite year it would be much better.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the refundable portion in respect of which a taxpayer is entitled to repayment may be assigned by way of security in cases where the governor in council is satisfied that the purpose of the assignment is to enable the taxpayer to make capital expenditures that will contribute to the post-war conversion of the taxpayer's business and will provide substantial employment.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a comment I should like to make in connection with this resolution. There is a principle here which it seems to me is good. In fact, if my memory serves me correctly, it is a principle that was advocated in this corner some time ago when the Excess Profits Tax Act was put upon the statute books. I refer to the responsibility of the government to see to it that the refundable portion of the excess profits taxes is used for post-war reconstruction and the provision of employment in the post-war period. I believe that from this group a few years ago the proposal was made that all of the twenty per cent when refunded should be earmarked for those purposes. Now we have in this resolution the acceptance to a limited extent of that principle. By limited extent I mean that it applies only to those who are able to liquidate their refundable portion in advance by the methods set out in the resolution. In cases where taxpayers, corporations, are able to do that under the terms of this resolution, they are called upon to meet the government's requirements that the money be used for post-war conversion of their business and to provide substantial employment. I repeat that that is good. But it seems to me that if it is good for those taxpayers who will be able to liquidate their refundable portion in advance in this way, it is an equally good principle for all. I know my hon. friends to my right will probably say again, as they have said several times this afternoon, that this is the corporate taxpayer's money, but I would remind them that this is excess profit and that this profit is due to the war, and we feel that the tax on the excess profit should go right up to 100 per cent. Since however, the government has made provision for the return of twenty per cent I think the idea that the government should direct, to some extent at least, the use of that twenty per cent is a good one, but if it is being done under the terms of this resolution I suggest that there ought to be legislation to do likewise with the refundable portion in all cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a very limited right which is given. It is not desired that any one taxpayer should be able to get his refundable portion ahead of another. But in special cases if a taxpayer is able to borrow money which he proposes to use for capital expenditures which will contribute to the post-war conversion of his business, the governor in council may authorize the assignment of his claim to the refundable portion as security for that advance. Three parties are involved—the taxpayer, the lender and the crown. It is a sort of three-cornered arrangement. I do not know how much it will be availed of. Obviously the lender, if he advances money against the claim, can take an out-and-out assignment on a discount basis because it does not bear interest, or he might take it as collateral security. I think the average case might be where a business might want to expend money to reconvert its war plant to a peace plant. It has a reasonable credit standing and also some accumulated refundable portion of the tax. If it were able to assign that as security to a lender, it might be able to get a loan which it might not otherwise be able readily to obtain. But the governor in council would have to be satisfied that the money was to be used for the post-war conversion of the taxpayer's business.

Mr. KNOWLES: I emphasize the last few words that the parliamentary assistant used. Even with the other conditions which have been set out it will be necessary under this resolution, for the corporate taxpayer to satisfy the authorities that its purpose is to do a certain amount of post-war conversion and to provide employment. All I am doing at this point is to emphasize that that is a good principle, and I hope that it will be remembered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask if the procedure that will be adopted has been worked out. A taxpayer wants to make a capital expenditure for reconversion purposes. I would assume that he would have to file some sort of petition or brief with the department asking for permission to assign the refundable portion to a creditor who will presumably advance money against it, whether by way of total assignment or hypothecation or lien. Then I assume that the taxpayer will have to show that he will provide substantial employment. Just what procedure will be adopted? What are all the factors that will enable him to do that?

Mr. ABBOTT: That has not yet all been worked out. This is an enabling measure. but the procedure will, I think, be very much as the hon. gentleman has indicated. An industry that had a project in mind and wanted this assistance would file a brief with the Department of Finance or some other department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I wanted to know. Under whose jurisdiction would it be?

Mr. ABBOTT: It will be the Department of National Revenue, I would think. If the department is satisfied on the facts as presented, the minister would submit a recommendation to council authorizing the assignment, and I take it that an agreement would be entered into. I am only speculating because the procedure has not yet been worked out.

Resolution agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The CHAIRMAN: We are on resolution 32.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the course of the remarks I made on the budget on July 3 I adverted to this proposal which we now have concretely before us. So far as I can see, there is no mention of this proposal in the minister's budget statement. I think that is correct. But the basis of the remarks I made on July 3 was contained in a press release, which unfortunately I have not before me, made by the minister just prior to the opening of parliament.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Just to keep the record straight—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure about my time.

Mr. ILSLEY: —I made the statement in parliament first. In fact, I made two statements, one at the end of January and one about the middle of February, and nothing was given to the press before parliament met. Anything given to the press was given after I made a statement in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems I am entirely wrong, and I am depending only on my memory; but I had the idea that notice had been given to the public that the provisions of the last budget, the laws relating to gifts to charitable and educational institutions, would not be allowed to come into effect. When the statement was made is a matter of minor importance. At any rate, I felt that was doing a grave injustice to a body of institutions in the country which are not simply charitable institutions, but which in this war have proven themselves to be a strong arm of government. I venture to assert that the work of certain of our educational institutions directly relating to the war has been of great and paramount importance for which probably some of them at all events have received wholly inadequate compensation. One of these institutions which I have in mind has given over its whole curriculum to the navy. I refer to King's college, Halifax, which has been taken over by the department of naval services, and is now a naval school of some kind, and for which the department is paying a rental of $30,000 per annum. I was going to say that the entire college population had to be transferred to Dalhousie university, and that added a great weight to that institution. No one is complaining about that. It was evidence of a measure of good will on the part of the authorities of the institution that does them nothing but honour and credit. The same is true of other institutions.

But the minister announced at some stage that the law as passed by parliament, because of developments which came as a result, would not be allowed to become operative, and in that I consider there was a breach of faith not only with the parliament of Canada and with the taxpaying public, but more particularly with the educational institutions of the country. I deplore that attitude on the part of the government because it must have known, when the law was made as it was, that a substantial part of the excess profits tax which is given to charitable and educational institutions would come out of taxation. That was abundantly clear at the very beginning. I assume that when the minister learned that advantage was being taken by these institutions of the position and used the taxing position, the legal position, as an inducement to corporations within the excess profits tax clause to make contributions, he must have known that those in the 100 per cent class would be taking that money out of taxation, except, I suppose, the twenty per cent refundable which ultimately would come out of the taxpayer. I deplored that position in the statement I made in the house on July 3 in discussing the budget.

I am not going to cover the same ground again; I think that would be a work of supererogation. I merely make these introductory remarks to explain that I was greatly perturbed by that position taken by the Minister of Finance as it affected certain educational institutions of the country, one or two of which are very dear to me and in whose prosperity and welfare I am intensely interested. Campaigns had been put on by the educational institutions, notably I believe by McGill, under which large sums of money in cash and in pledges were given to some of these institutions, to be payable in cash or over a period of time, and which would have the taxation effect to which I have referred. The effect of the minister's announcement was absolutely to kill the efforts that were being made on behalf of these institutions whose corporate resources needed replenishing, and I thought and still think that was a reprehensible position for the minister to take, because the policy under which that became operative was the government's considered policy.

There was a time when a taxpayer could give up to ten per cent of his taxable income to education and charity.

Mr. ABBOTT: And still can.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is for individuals; that is quite true. But under the Excess Profits Tax Act, if I apprehend the position of the law correctly, only five per cent could be given in the way I have indicated, and it is out of that that these gifts were made.

Mr. ABBOTT: The five per cent applies to corporations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it was from the corporations principally that these benefactions were expected to come, and it had the effect, at least until the position was fully clarified, of stopping any flow of donations to that class of institutions. I think that was a deplorable situation, and it is up to the minister to support his position.

I do not know that I have made the position absolutely clear, but I know what the effect is. The minister is making in effect what is retroactive legislation. In actual technical expression it may not be retroactive legislation, but it has the effect of being retroactive. It withdraws the provisions of the law as they have existed up to the present time and it substitutes a new formula. If I understand the position correctly—and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong—it now provides that the amount of the donations made in excess of the average of the taxpayers' donations in the last two fiscal periods ending before July 1, 1942, shall be allowed as a deduction for purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act only to the extent that the total taxes payable by the taxpayer under the said acts are thereby diminished by forty per cent of the said excess, unless made before February 1, 1944, and paid or evidenced in writing before that date. That is a rather involved formula unless one studies it; but it is as clear as daylight to me.

I said this once before; it means a definite reduction in the amount that this class of taxpayer may give to charitable institutions under the tax-free clause, if that is the proper designation. I venture to suggest that there will be no further benefactions, no further contributions to education from that source. The average of such donations made by corporations within the excess profits clause in the two fiscal periods before July 1, 1942, was, I am informed, exactly nothing, or in most cases was absolutely nothing. Perhaps it is not wise to be too sweeping in this statement. It was little or nothing. I shall put it in that way. Therefore in most cases the amount that will now be allowed will be little or nothing. I think that is a very bad situation. There is no class of institution in this country which is feeling the pinch of war in its finances more than the smaller educational institutions, especially those that I know something about in the maritime provinces. They find their classes depleted; they find their revenues from tuition and what-not depleted. They have been doing a lot of good war work. They anticipate throwing the whole of their resources behind the government of the country in the post-war period in doing their share. The educational authorities are among the best class of citizens we have in this country. Yet when the opportunity for them to strengthen their position at the expense, we will say, of the treasury presented itself, after the position was fully reviewed by the taxing authorities and the finance department of this country with their eyes wide open, as part of government policy, the government withdrew the privilege which those institutions thought they were going to enjoy, with the result that their hopes have been frustrated. That is putting it pretty mildly.

I suggest to the minister that he might have allowed at least one year's operation of this law. I know that in certain cases he would have lost substantial amounts of revenue. I think that is apparent. In the case of one institution which I mentioned, I believe that the sum of $7,000,000 was either paid in or will be paid in, evidenced by pledges in writing which will no doubt be redeemed, and that there will be substantial loss of revenue. But that is not the case of the smaller institutions which stand to suffer most. When the minister comes to make his statement, as of course he will, I want him to justify fully and on ethical grounds the reason for the change that he has made, because I cannot bring myself to believe that he is on strong and sound ground there. It does look to me—I hesitate to say this again; I said it pretty strongly on July 3—as though there were some breach of faith with the smaller institutions, and they certainly feel as I feel about it. They have not asked me to say this, but I know exactly their feelings. They have a sense of frustration in their endeavours to strengthen their position while they are doing a magnificent piece of war work. Anything and everything that the government has asked them to do they have done, and many of them without compensation. That cannot be said of some of the larger institutions. I know of one institution which has received from the army sums in excess of a million dollars in a single year. I should not say "I know", because I have not a personal knowledge, but I have been told that they have received sums in excess of a million dollars in a year. Some others have been paid and some have not been compensated for the services they have rendered.

I suggest to the minister that at this time an educational institution is one arm of government in Canada. It is not a charitable institution. I am not going to labour the point. I know the minister will put this thing through. He has announced he will put it through. I suppose I am like the famous Bolivar. I am ploughing in the sands when I endeavour to get the minister to change his mind, because I have found he was inflexible in days gone by. But I could hardly let this opportunity go by without entering my protest against this type of legislation and against this change of policy on the part of the administration.

Mr. CHURCH: I had started to speak on resolution 32 this afternoon when it was allowed to stand. I wish to refer to the effect it has had on those who had a little money and had it taken away from them very largely by the burden of war and taxation. In everything that the minister does he has to get the money to run the war and support the war by income tax. About fifty-two per cent of the revenue comes from that source or from capital account. This resolution reads as follows:

> That the provision allowing deductions by a corporation from income of amounts paid by way of donations to charitable organizations in Canada be amended to provide that the amount of the donations made in excess of the average of the taxpayer's donations in the last two fiscal periods ending before July 1, 1942, shall be allowed as a deduction for purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, only to the extent that the total taxes payable by the taxpayer under the said acts are thereby diminished by forty per cent of the said excess, unless made before February 1, 1944, and paid or evidenced in writing before the said date or evidenced by a payment before the said date which is one of a series of payments to be made thereafter and accompanied by proper evidence of the undertaking.

We are near the close of the fifth year of the war and, as hon. members know, our charitable organizations, the churches, the universities and colleges of this country have had a most precarious time of it. The same is true of the hospitals. As a result we were told the other day by the Department of Munitions and Supply that they had no materials, no labour to carry on this extensive building work in war time. The board of education of Toronto is many millions behind in primary and secondary schools. It has the money for it but has been refused materials and labour therefor.

Some constructive suggestions have been offered to the minister, among them a very good one coming from Archbishop Seager of the diocese of Huron, a gifted man, who is the metropolitan of the Church of England in Ontario, representing the house of bishops of the Church of England in Canada, supported by four other Protestant denominations, and also by Roman Catholic bodies and prominent members of their clergy. The bishop has written me several letters in the past nine or ten months. In the last one I received in May last he referred to the city of London, where they have a fine large university, Western, with a very fine medical faculty and some affiliated colleges. That university has done a great deal for western Ontario. Archbishop Seager wishes to offer some constructive suggestions to the minister, who, I believe, has had this memorandum laid before him. In his letter, Archbishop Seager says:

> Locally, here in London, we of our own Huron college, together with the university of Western Ontario and the bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of London have forwarded a proposal to the Minister of Finance in the shape of a memorandum, a copy of which I enclose. The essence of it is that subscriptions may continue to be made for actual building projects after the war, without being subject to any change in the regulations.
>
> In addition, the university of Toronto is making its own representations in the matter . . .

There is a short preamble to the memorandum of this scholar and divine in which reference is made to the difficult time the universities and charitable organizations have had since the war began. As hon. members know, many of their sources of income have dried up on account of taxation and other economic controls, with the result that the universities, colleges and churches have been starved and the charitable organizations have been unable to carry on their work. I do not know what position they will be in after the war. We are a young country, of eleven and a half million people, and these charitable organizations, including the patriotic fund of the last war, the Red Cross, hospitals, churches, universities, and so on, all have to depend very largely upon private enterprise and private subscriptions from those who, before the present heavy taxes were imposed, gave millions of dollars to these wonderful charities and educational institutions of Canada. The preamble goes on to say:

> The recent amendments to the Income Tax Act which narrow the limits of gifts corporations may make to institutions broadly classified as charitable, have so adversely affected the prospects of leading institutions in Canada as to arouse serious fears in the minds of their officers and governing boards. These fears touch at least two aspects of the national effort to draft, before the end of the war, definite and practicable plans of reconstruction (especially those bearing upon employment) for the first part of the post-war period. The administrators concerned are, with reason, genuinely apprehensive that the new restrictions, if left without modification, will entail certain deplorable results.
>
> (1) A large number of institutions which have already instituted specific construction projects and have succeeded in collecting a portion of the amounts needed, find their efforts brought practically to a standstill and their plans for taking their part in the activities of reconstruction defeated.
>
> (2) There is a real danger that the enforced failures to carry out projects as outlined in (1) constitute a great menace to the reconstruction plans of the government in regard both to the problem of unemployment and to the various kinds of social services which the institutions are designed to give.
>
> Because of the government's declared desire to establish a sound and feasible policy of reconstruction in which all classes of citizens can cooperate, the following memorandum has been drawn up by representatives of educational and religious organizations of the dominion, in the hope that the government will give it careful consideration. It is asked that the memorandum be read in the light of the serious situation set forth in the foregoing preamble.

These representatives included four from the Protestant churches as well as some of the fine clergy of the Roman Catholic denomination, all united in the hope that the government will give the matter very careful consideration. The memorandum presented by this body is most constructive and helpful, and contains in the last clause a suggestion which I hope will be adopted. In substance it is as follows:

> (a) That the government, or the government's commission on reconstruction, institute a committee to be designated by some such title as the committee on approved building projects;
>
> (b) That the government request the educational and religious institutions to prepare plans for their respective building projects, and to submit such plans to the proposed committee on approved building projects;
>
> (c) That any such building project approved by the proposed committee be officially called an approved building project.

The proposers of this suggestion believe that once building plans have reached the stage of approval they can most expeditiously and economically be carried out by a responsible local committee of public-spirited, competent citizens.

Under the changes recently projected for the Income and Excess Profits Tax Acts, it seems that any corporation in Canada will not be permitted to charge as an expense operation more than the average of the donations made by that corporation during the two fiscal years ended prior to July 1, 1942, unless the corporation is willing to pay a tax of 60 per cent of the amount of the contribution exceeding the average of the two years above mentioned. Apparently no donations will be allowable which exceed the statutory limitations of the five per cent of the net earnings of the corporation.

It appears to be the expressed policy and intention of the government to carry out numerous construction projects following the war as a method of creating employment. In view of this fact the sponsors of this memorandum venture to suggest that the welfare of the Dominion of Canada and its citizens would be better served through the amendment to the Income War Tax Act, whereby the present stated policy of the government—that the average of the donations during the two fiscal years ended prior to July 1, 1942, shall not be exceeded by corporation donations to operating charitable funds—should be altered to permit a corporation to donate to approved construction projects the difference between the average of the two years above mentioned and five per cent of the net taxable income of the corporation, regardless of the possibility that the corporation might be subject to 100 per cent excess profits tax, and provided that all contributions received by the approved construction project committee must be invested in Dominion of Canada non-interest-bearing securities to be due and payable on a date six months after the cessation of hostilities.

In this connection one must bear this in mind: the costs of construction projects of the above character would be paid for by donations which, even though the corporations making them might be in the 100 per cent excess profits tax class, would represent in each case a contribution of twenty per cent of shareholders funds which are repayable by the government to the corporation under the provision for refundable portion of the excess profits tax as provided in the Excess Profits Tax Act. This proposed policy would remove the objection of the government to the diversion of funds which are very necessary for the prosecution of the war. It would also ensure that such funds would be received by the government in payment for non-interest-bearing securities, as proposed above, and provide that after the war the government refund twenty per cent of the excess profits tax to corporations. By virtue of the suggested amendment the amounts refunded would be devoted to special war reconstruction and thereby create necessary employment.

One must note that under the provisions of this proposed amendment the government's indirect contribution to approved construction projects would fall far short of the eighty per cent of the total contribution to this object, since a great many donations will be made to such projects by individuals whose income tax would not reach an eighty per cent rate.

He concludes by making a suggestion, a most constructive one, in the following paragraph:

The sponsors of this memorandum believe the proposal should be given serious consideration by the government on the grounds that the carrying out of construction projects would involve beneficially every province of the dominion. If the government does not see the necessity to pass the suggested amendment to the income tax enactment, then the government is requested to make provision for authorizing the completion of construction projects which have already been started and for which funds have been solicited and partially collected.

That is a sensible proposal by the archbishop, on behalf of Protestant bodies, and it includes a proposal by the able Roman Catholic Bishop of London. Many other members of the clergy have made the same suggestion to the government.

We must consider what the universities in this country have done. I do not know what the universities are going to do after the war. They are carrying on extensive scientific work, to which the university of Toronto has made a fine contribution, and all universities have in the war given all their buildings for war to the government. Let us look at the work the universities have done in the fields of science and medicine. I referred the other night to the progress science had made, and the glorious contribution made by science in this war and in the past twenty-five years has won the admiration of the whole civilized world. We think at once of the Banting institute, the magnificent Toronto General hospital. We think of the work which the university of Toronto and all the other universities alike are doing in this war, and what science is doing. We think of the material progress being made as a result in trade and commerce, a progress which is most commendable.

In my view it is the duty of the government to come to the help of the universities and charities, at least to the extent suggested by the bishop. This was a most constructive suggestion, and he has performed a great national patriotic duty in making it.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The application of resolution 32, and its effect upon universities, has been discussed in this debate. I would call the attention of the minister to a statement I made in the house on June 22, in which I pointed out the basic needs of education across the country, and the extent to which the federal government should come to the assistance of education I gave some details as to how that assistance should be apportioned. On the subject of university education I said:

The financial condition of our universities has been difficult; during the past years they have found it necessary to increase student fees. The fee required to be paid by a university student to-day is on the average, in all our Canadian universities, eighty per cent higher than it was ten years ago. As a result our universities are rapidly becoming institutions for the privileged class. The test of admission to our universities is rapidly becoming a means test rather than a test of ability. This trend, apart altogether from the inequity to the individual and the loss to society through the failure to train our ablest and brightest young people, can have but one effect on our universities; that is, a general impairment of educational standards. To-day our universities are operating on approximately $20,000,000. It is estimated that a federal grant of $5,000,000 would enable them to put their financial affairs in order and considerably reduce student fees.

As suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I think in the first place the legislation which provided tax exemption to individuals and firms contributing to educational and charitable institutions was basically wrong. I am in agreement with the hon. member to the extent that at the present time some public funds should be made available at least to our universities, and also to other educational institutions.

To my mind the only sound way in which that could be done is by definite government grants for that purpose. I think the principle of permitting universities to go out and canvass corporations, with a view to inducing them to put their money into universities, instead of paying it in taxes, is basically wrong. It is the Canadian public which, in the final analysis, is making that payment; and in my view the payment should go directly to the institutions concerned. There is only one ground upon which I would support that principle, and that is if the government finds it constitutionally impossible to make a direct grant to educational institutions. If that were the case, then we might overcome that constitutional difficulty by the indirect or roundabout method of granting exemptions from taxation, until such time as the government can make direct contributions to such institutions.

Certainly the time has come when the federal government must face up to the educational means of this country. The federal government must come to realize that education can never be adequate in many of our provinces, not only in universities but in the lower schools, until federal support is forthcoming. I sincerely hope that in the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference some discussion will be had on that problem, and some effort made to bring about cooperation between the dominion government and the provincial legislature, without infringing upon their constitutional rights, so as to make it possible for the provinces to place their educational institutions on a better basis. In that way we could have education available to all the youth in this country who have the ability and the desire to attend such institutions.

Mr. ILSLEY: In his speech on the budget the hon. member for York-Sunbury made a vigorous attack on the government's position in regard to charitable contributions. I did not answer it during the debate, because I thought I would leave such discussion until the resolutions were reached. That resolution is now before the committee, and I should like now to give hon. members a brief resume of the steps taken, and the reasons for taking those steps.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Up until the 100 per cent excess profits tax was imposed—and it dated from July 1, 1942—corporations made odd contributions for charitable purposes. Some corporations were fairly consistent givers, but not in very large sums. I suppose they felt they must always be in a position to justify to their shareholders the amounts of their contributions, and they were able to do that if the amounts were not excessive.

Up to a certain stage—I forget the year—corporations were given the same privileges as individuals. That is, they had the privilege of deducting, for taxation purposes, charitable contributions up to ten per cent of the income. But there came a year—either 1941 or 1942—when we thought that should be reduced to five per cent; for, since corporate profits before taxation have increased enormously during the war, after taxation they have increased very little. Five per cent of the total corporate income was a very large sum, in the aggregate. Nevertheless, as the matter appeared to us at the time, we felt that they should be at liberty to contribute for charitable purposes up to five per cent of their income.

I am not altogether sure that the hon. member for York South is wrong in his statement that the whole principle is bad, but I am not sure that he is right. I certainly would not have been worried about the extent of contributions by corporate taxpayers to charities if it had not started to get manifestly excessive and away beyond any legitimate corporate purposes.

When we talk about charitable organizations we must remember that they go far beyond universities. They include a wide range of non-profit enterprises, such as churches and municipal projects of one kind and another. When this fever reached its height about January last I began to hear of municipal projects which were contemplated, some to the extent of $500,000, $1,000,000 or $1,500,000, to be sponsored directly or indirectly by the municipal authorities and to be financed by corporations in the municipalities. These corporations had the privilege of deducting for taxation purposes up to five per cent of their income when donated for charitable purposes. If the company was paying 100 per cent excess profits taxes that meant that for the time being the whole 100 per cent would be diverted from the dominion treasury.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the minister have in mind when he speaks of municipal projects?

Mr. ILSLEY: Auditoriums and skating rinks, which were allowed. These projects are laudable activities for the most part and I do not criticize them, but they covered a wide range and it really meant that Canadian corporations were able to divert funds which otherwise would be public funds. I am not saying that they were public funds, but otherwise they would be public funds. It meant that Canadian corporations were assuming the responsibility of diverting what would otherwise be public funds to charitable purposes of their own choice.

There was no possibility of getting an equitable geographical distribution of these donations; it was a haphazard method of diverting public funds and it was growing with tremendous rapidity. I was much concerned about it, because I knew how unpleasant a step it would be for the government to interfere with them. It is a thankless task to say to any taxpayer that he shall not donate money for charitable purposes. However, as the guardian of the treasury, as the custodian, to a certain extent at least, of public funds, I felt that the situation had reached the point where I should do something to stop it from going on any longer. I heard of campaigns which were planned and which were being planned in various parts of Canada. On one occasion I was consulted about a campaign that was projected.

It became fashionable, shall I say, for canvassers to go to corporate taxpayers and say frankly to them, "The government will get this if you do not let us have it; why not give it to us?" I do not think we could object to that type of canvass, but it always irked me to have canvasses like that made. I do not like it in time of war, no matter how fine the charitable project may be. It was something that went against my grain, but I do not think I could have taken any exception to it so long as our law was what it was. They could very well say, "There is your statute; that is what parliament has done; you cannot blame us for taking advantage of it, and we will pass upon the patriotism and the ethics of our course."

I felt that the only thing to do was to make a statement, which I did on January 31. This statement would have to take effect at once because no advance notice could be given. To have given advance notice would have meant the feverish collection of donations in the next few days, and I felt I had to make a statement, which I did at the end of January, with regard to donations made after January 31, indicating that there would be restrictions. I had no power to do this as Minister of Finance; the government had no power to do it, but I could give notice that when the budget was brought down I would introduce legislation which would be effective as from February 1, and that is what I am doing.

Mr. JACKMAN: You scared them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the announcement had the effect which I desired and which I think was the proper effect for it to have. The criticism of what had been done was quite voluminous, but the commendation, while more private, was also fairly widespread because there were a great many people who did not feel just right about what was going on.

Mr. JACKMAN: Did you get letters of commendation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but they are not producible; they are personal. I said that at the time of the budget I would introduce a provision whereby all companies would be on the same basis as to tax advantage, that there would be a forty per cent advantage. The majority of companies could get a tax advantage of only forty per cent on their donations for charitable purposes, but the minority of companies, including some large ones, could get a 100 per cent advantage. Those were the ones being subjected to this intensive canvass by persons interested in various charitable projects.

I do not intend to go into these projects, nor do I intend to deal with them in a hostile or critical way. The canvassers were well within the law; they were within their rights when they proceeded as they did.

Shortly after January 31 representations were made that there were certain companies which over a course of years had established the practice of making certain charitable donations. While it was understood that what the government desired to do was to prevent excessively and unreasonably high donations, donations out of all proportion to the purposes of a particular corporation, it was contended that we ought to make an exception in the case of a company continuing to give what they had normally given before the 100 per cent excess profits tax was in effect. It was contended that they should not be denied the full tax advantage if they kept within those limits, that they should not be penalized for doing what they had done before the 100 per cent excess profits tax came in.

Therefore on February 18 I modified the announcement by saying that companies might give up to the average of the two years before July 1, 1942. It is only when donations are in excess of that that they are limited to the forty per cent. This gives a great deal of scope for charitable donations, and I think many charitable donations are still made by corporations. Of course, indivividuals have never been touched at all.

Mr. JACKMAN: They were touched last year, drastically.

Mr. ILSLEY: They were touched last year by the high taxes.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is where it hurts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not arguing with my hon. friend. The ten per cent provision was not changed in so far as individual donations are concerned.

I received the memorandum which was read to the house by the hon. member for Broadview, but, having given this matter anxious consideration, first in January and again in February, I felt that I should not suggest to the house any change in the policy as laid down. Several charitable drives have taken place since January 31 and to change the basis now would be unfair to those who have conducted those campaigns. I think the present basis is sufficiently generous, all things considered.

There is one element of inequity in the situation which I cannot eliminate. Certain groups completed their drives before January 31 and raised a lot of money. Others were under way and were hampered to some extent, I suppose, by the announcement. Others were planning to get under way and as the hon. member for York-Sunbury said, are disappointed in their expectations and feel frustrated. But I did not feel that I could just sit still and see millions upon millions of dollars being diverted from what otherwise would have been the public treasury without taking a reasonable step for the protection of the revenues.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we may go back now to resolution 11.

11. That any enactments founded on—
(a) Resolutions 3, 4, 5, 8, 9 and 10 come into force on enactment; and
(b) Resolutions 1, 2, 6 and 7 be applicable to the income of 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand that the minister may have something to say in regard to the proposals which were put forward the other day, namely, that five years was not a very long period in which to have the lump sum payment on retirement extended for taxation purposes, and that it would be better if the lump sum which was given on retirement were extended either on the basis of the length of service of the man or woman to whom it was given, or on the basis of life expectancy. At least the life expectancy should be considered in determining the length of time over which the capital sum should be spread. Perhaps four or five years might be taken off the total life expectancy.

Mr. ILSLEY: If nothing is done the whole amount will be taxable in the year in which it is given.

Mr. JACKMAN: That would be very unfair, as the minister will agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that that would be unfair to the taxpayer, but I think it would be unfair to the crown if it were spread over the expectancy of life, and for this reason: If the taxpayer lives for longer than his expectancy of life the crown would be collecting taxes only for the period of his life expectancy. If the taxpayer lives for a shorter period than his expectancy of life, the crown would be collecting taxes only on part of the years. If we knew exactly how many years each employee would live I do not know that there would be anything unjust about spreading the payment over that number of years, but to take the expectancy of life as a basis would be far more unfavourable to the crown than that would be. Therefore I think it is fair to take a period somewhat shorter than the normal expectancy of life. Five years is shorter than the average expectancy of life at sixty or even at seventy.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of course it would be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nevertheless I do not believe that there is any essential justice in taking the expectancy of life, because in all those cases where a person dies before that period runs out, the crown collects income tax only on part of the amount and, when they live beyond the expectancy of life, the crown is limited to taxes on the exact amount.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a matter of equity; it cannot be exact. But surely in equity the subject has some rights as well as the crown. Supposing a man who has been working for a company which did not have a superannuation plan gets a lump sum gratuity at sixty. It is true that these superannuation plans are becoming more the vogue, as they should be, but a great many of our companies have not had them up to date. Suppose that an employee or executive on retirement at sixty is given a lump sum of $5,000 or $25,000; he will be taxed on one-fifth of that sum in each of the next succeeding five years, which is a very heavy tax, almost an extortionate tax at the present high rates. But suppose his expectancy of life was fifteen years. Why could we not compromise and spread the taxation over ten years? Surely that would be working against the subject and in favour of the crown. But when the minister takes an arbitrary figure of five years he is making the principle work against the subject to a degree which is against all principles of equity.

Some of these large corporations retire all their executives at sixty in order to bring in new blood and give an opportunity to the younger men. We have seen the same principle adopted in the air force. The minister for air has stated in the house that rapid promotion in the air force brings its own penalty, because when men were rapidly promoted they were got rid of at a comparative early age to make room for younger officers who had won their spurs on the field and these younger men were to be promoted to the senior jobs. The same thing applies in business. The Woolworth company retires all its executives at sixty, I believe, to make room for younger men coming in with fresh ideas. Suppose a man is given a substantial sum upon retirement from such a company at sixty, and he has a life expectancy of from fifteen to twenty years. Under this clause he is going to have taxed away the greater part of that capital sum in a five-year period, and it will go to the crown instead of being used for the purpose for which it was given to the employee. I hope that the minister, who surely seeks only fairness in this regard, will see fit to arrive at something that will be in favour of the crown, if you like—I have no objection to that—but that will also be fair to the subject. If we adopted the principle of life expectancy, less a few years, if you will, it would give equity to the subject as well as making sure that the crown gets all the revenue to which it is entitled.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just how far should parliament go in arranging the affairs of taxpayers for them? This is a matter which is entirely in the hands of the employer and the employee. If the employer wishes to pay the employee an annuity or pension, there is nothing to prevent the employee from accepting it, in which event the employee will be taxed each year as long as he lives. If the employer wishes to spread it over ten years, or over seven or eight years all that can be arranged between themselves and the taxation imposed accordingly. If they wish to make another arrangement, to give a lump sum gratuity, there is no presumption that that gratuity is intended to be spread over the remaining years of the employee's life.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is a reasonable presumption.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no more presumption that it is to be spread over the remaining years of his life than over the next five years. So that all we can do is to take an arbitrary figure and just say that if you want to arrange your affairs in that way and take a lump sum we will not tax it all in one year, which is the law at the present time, but will spread it over five years; and if you want it in smaller sums, arrange accordingly to pay it in smaller sums.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of course a corporation could use its head, if you will, and give a life annuity to the employee. There are cases. How they arise or why, I am not in a position to say; but the very fact that the minister brings in this resolution shows that there are cases where men and women, former employees of companies, do get lump sums given them. The minister can say better than I can why they get them, but he has pointed out that if the company would use its head and give the employees an annual income in place of a lump sum the government would get only so much taxation. On the other hand, because they happen to have given a lump sum, for reasons which the minister can explain better than I can, the taxation is not only three or four times but eight or ten times as much as it otherwise would be. The crown wishes to take advantage of the subject's lack of knowledge of the taxation laws of the country. I am only pleading for something approximating the taxation that the crown would get if the company used its head.

Exactly the same question came up last year in connection with annuities. There, if the husband seeking to provide for his widow leaves an annuity, constituted of all the principal he has, we find that the widow pays three or four times as much taxation as if the widow received the capital outright. The hon. member for Vancouver East supported me after he had heard the arguments and changed his mind against the minister. This case is similar to the annuity question. If a man knew exactly how long his widow would live he would say to her, "Here is a capital sum to draw an income from during your normal expectancy of life, of fifteen or twenty years, and you will also take $400 or $500 of capital and you will have enough to get by on." But he does not know how long she will live, and because he does the only sensible thing he can do and buys her an annuity, the government collects four or five times as much as it otherwise would.

This case is similar in principle. I admit that if the companies used their heads the crown would not get this excessive taxation, to which it is not entitled. At any rate, the cases are there, and I only ask that the subject, seeing that he does not know the incidence of the taxation laws of the country, should be fairly dealt with. I submit that some clause should be framed having as its basis the normal expectation of life of the person who receives a lump sum on retirement. Normally I should say, as the minister has admitted, that if a man retires at sixty or seventy his expectancy is ten years. But the crown wishes to have all the money it can get even from poor people who are trying to provide for their old age and it fixes the period at five years. Ten is not too large a figure, and I should be glad to move that the word five be changed to ten in the section. It is only an approximation. It does not go the whole way, but it does come a little nearer to what is fair and it does not rob the treasury of anything to which it is rightfully entitled.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, the spreading of the amount over ten years instead of five years would mean of necessity that the amount of income of the individual each year would be less than it otherwise would be, and my submission would be that it would affect the revenue adversely.

Mr. JACKMAN: We discussed this matter while the minister was in the banking and commerce committee this afternoon.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was held over to be decided to-night.

Mr. JACKMAN: The principle was.

Mr. ABBOTT: I raised the same point of order on the motion of the hon. member for York West. That was to be decided this evening.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not an authority on parliamentary rules, Mr. Chairman, and I shall, of course, have to abide by your decision, but I should like to hear argument from others. It was contended in this house, however, in connection with ways and means, that private members did have the right to suggest alternative means of raising revenue and even of suggesting means which might not necessarily raise as much as the proposals brought down by the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not now expressing my view of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosedale, but speaking to the point of order I would call attention to citation 502, in Beauchesne's third edition, which is the citation I read this afternoon when the hon. member for York West proposed his amendment. It reads:

> A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

I believe that the citation to which the Minister of Finance has reference is 500. It might be argued that this book of rules at times might be used both ways and that this is a case in point. In citation 500 I read:

> Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee—

The reference is to committee of ways and means.

> —but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown.

My point is this. Even though the rules do specify the limitations set out in citation 500 they go on, in citation 502, to specify something that a private member can do in committee of ways and means, namely, to move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

Mr. ABBOTT: But not reduced.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of fact I do not agree with the amendment proposed by the hon. member, but I support his right as a private member to move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) that in line four the word "five" be struck out and the word "ten" be substituted therefor. There is a point of order; does any other hon. member wish to speak to it? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has mentioned citation 502 of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, third edition:

> A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

That principle applies to the committee on the bill only and not to ways and means. That is the meaning of that citation and of citation 500 as quoted by the hon. member. Citation 500 reads:

Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, example of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

I have no doubt that such an amendment will affect the balance of ways and means. Consequently I rule the amendment out of order Shall resolution 11 carry?

Resolution agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Broadview, with the sanction of the committee, wishes to revert to resolution 13 to raise one question. Does the committee consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: A week ago last Monday night at eight o'clock the Chairman very properly called twelve resolutions, and all were carried in five minutes at the time I was in. I wished to ask but missed a question at that time regarding resolution 13. My question had reference to the allowance of $300 to a trade union deduction in connection with a superannuation or pension scheme approved by the minister. Doctors, physicians and lawyers have trade unions. Would resolution 13 apply to the superannuation fund of a clergyman of the United church, the Baptist church or any other church that has superannuation funds—they are all trade unions—if it is approved by the minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the amounts paid into that type of superannuation fund are already covered by the law.

Mr. CHURCH: Does that include fees? Is there a uniform practice for all clergy in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what my hon. friend means by "fees". But contributions by the clergy to recognized superannuation funds are deductible by them from their income for tax purposes.

Mr. CHURCH: Do they all file income tax returns?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I do not know. Those who are taxable do.

30. That the tax credit allowed to a taxpayer of forty per cent of contributions made by him in the year 1943 to associations, syndicates or mining partnerships organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals be extended to include a tax credit in respect of contributions in the year 1944.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is this the resolution as amended?

Mr. ABBOTT: The same point of order was raised on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON: Speaking to the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 30 stood this afternoon.

Mr. ADAMSON: We are now back on it and, since a point of order was raised on my amendment, I have a right to speak on it. This is in a rather different category from the previous amendment, and I again wish to quote citation 502, of Beauchesne's, which is as follows:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

This amendment of mine merely strikes out one word, enlarging the scope of exemption and therefore comes under citation 502. It does not increase or diminish the revenue; it merely increases the scope of tax exemptions because it is a definite case. I have moved that in resolution 30 all prospectors for all metals and all strategic minerals be exempt. It is an enlargement of the resolution and comes under this citation. I feel that citation 500 is not germane to this particular case because it is a definite and specific motion with regard to the enlargement of the tax exemption. It applies to a specific instance of enlarging the exemptions to include all prospectors engaged in the search for all metals. At the present time the resolution is limited to base metals and strategic minerals. We discussed this matter at length this afternoon. I want the resolution to read that it includes all metals and strategic minerals. I therefore suggest, Mr. Chairman, that your ruling is not in conformity with the rules in this case.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if I may speak again on this point of order; in essence it is the same point we had when the last amendment was before us. I am not speaking on the merits of the amendment but only on the point of order. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will permit me to address myself to the point that you made in discussing the point of order the last time when you called my attention to your belief that citation 502 referred to the committee of the whole when dealing with the bill. I would first call your attention to the index to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 883. About half way down the page appears the heading, "committee of ways and means." The eighth entry under that heading is, "'readjustment of tax, 502." I realize that the index is not necessarily the final authority, but we start from there as indicating the fact that citation 502 deals with the committee of ways and means. Then if we turn back to citation 502 itself, although we do not find any reference there to the committee, if we check back to the previous citation which you quoted, Mr. Chairman, citation 500, and also citation 494 as well as some others, we find that the references all along are to the committee of ways and means. I therefore submit with due respect, despite the ruling you gave on the previous occasion, that citation 502 does refer to the committee of ways and means, which is the committee in which we are now sitting. I can see that there might be some difference between the essence of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosedale and the amendment moved by the hon. member for York West; yet it does seem to me that this present amendment, entirely apart from what I may think of its merit, is a motion for readjustment of taxes and an enlarging of tax exemptions. I would therefore respectfully suggest that this amendment should be considered as in order.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, I must refer again to citation 502. Every hon. member fully realizes that we are now dealing with the different paragraphs of the resolutions. Those resolutions will eventually become a bill. When that bill goes into committee of the whole some amendments that are out of order now will be in order on the committee stage of the bill. However, I must give my ruling on citation 500, and I will ask hon. members to listen very attentively to it. It is as follows:

> Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

I shall read the amendment moved by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson):

> That the word "base" be struck out of clause 30.

There is no doubt that the moment you include all precious metals you immediately change the balance of ways and means. There could be no question about that. For these reasons I move the amendment out of order.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask what you mean by "the balance of ways and means"? Do you mean the total amount of revenue the treasury may get? Is that what you mean? I do not know what it means.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sure that every hon. member will be struck by the fact that the moment you include some very large industries which are not included at the present time in the resolution, as is proposed to be done in the amendment, it is bound to affect the revenue, since it enlarges the scope of the resolution. There is no doubt in my mind that it must affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. That is the point on which I base my ruling.

Mr. JACKMAN: I presume by "balance of ways and means" you mean the total revenue the crown might receive. If that is the case, the change I have suggested, from five years to ten years, might work to the benefit of the crown. It might easily be found that many companies would be willing to give their employees a lump sum which could be spread over ten years and on which the government would get its proportion of taxes, instead of giving them life annuities or some other form of payments based on expectancy.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am suggesting that the balance of ways and means, if affected at all by the change I have mentioned, might work to the benefit of the crown rather than to its detriment. I think it is up to the minister or up to you, Mr. Chairman, if you maintain your ruling, to point out that what I suggest would be against the amount of revenue which the crown would receive rather than in its favour.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like an answer to that question.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are questioning the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling and the hon. gentleman must either abide by it or appeal from it. There is no doubt there would be a decrease in revenue if the suggestion of the hon. gentleman were applied to the entire mining industry. Undoubtedly this matter could be better dealt with by the Minister of Finance, but I am not changing my ruling in regard to the amendment.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was not speaking on the amendment; I was merely asking whether you had given consideration to this phrase, "the balance of ways and means," when you ruled against my amendment on the ground that it would decrease the amount coming to the treasury. Of course I accept your ruling, but I suggest that my amendment might easily bring more rather than less revenue to the treasury.

Mr. GREEN: Before this resolution carries, may I point out to the Minister of Finance that earlier in the day several hon. members suggested to his parliamentary assistant and to the Minister of National Revenue that the resolution should be extended to cover a contribution made by one individual to a prospector rather than left to cover, as it does now, merely contributions to an association, syndicate or mining partnership. We had in mind the well known practice of grubstaking an individual prospector. I do not want to repeat the arguments that were advanced this afternoon, but I thought we made out a very good case, and I am convinced that the membership of the house at large would be in favour of extending the provision to cover such contributions. We feel that the only argument put up by the minister's assistant and by the Minister of National Revenue was the difficulty of administering such an extension, and frankly we do not consider that to be good enough. I would ask the minister if he would not give further consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not here this afternoon; however, I understand that there was a long argument on that point, and that reasons were given by my parliamentary assistant and by the Minister of National Revenue as to why contributions to individual prospectors should not be recognized. Those hon. gentlemen are more familiar with those reasons than I am, but it seems to me the reason why it was limited to syndicates and associations is that there is a degree of control over audit and an examination of the affairs of syndicates and associations which are impossible in the case of individuals. The very association of people makes it more certain that the money will be spent for the purposes set out in the act than would be so in the case of individuals. I do not know all the reasons given this afternoon by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, but I believe that is the principal reason why we thought this should be limited to these syndicates. This point has not been raised previously. I remember that we had a long argument over this provision a couple of years ago, during which everything was discussed but this suggestion that donations to individuals should be recognized. That would be a transfer of money from one man to another, provided he would do certain things with it.

Mr. GREEN: That is the way most of our mines in British Columbia were opened up.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know why the point is so late in being brought up. This provision was fully debated in the house two years ago. I do not believe it was debated last year; I think we were on some other phase of the matter then, but now the hon. member for Yukon has brought up the point. I think I have given the main reasons why we consider such donations could not be recognized.

Mr. GREEN: In all mining centres in British Columbia there are gold commissioners or mining recorders, who are officers of the provincial government. They have wide powers of control over all mining and prospecting within their respective districts, and they are responsible officers. I should think a certificate from one of those officials would be quite sufficient. If the government received a certificate from the gold commissioner, they could bank on it as being absolutely correct. I believe the difficulty could be overcome in some such way as that. Actually the fact is that most of the mines in British Columbia have been discovered by individual prospectors, and in many cases that was made possible only because those prospectors were grubstaked by people in the towns.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this worth while doing from a public point of view? This is the 19th day of July. I am informed that all prospectors in Canada are at work now. It may be that a great many individuals and perhaps companies made advances to prospecting syndicates or associations believing that the law for the year 1944 would be extended, and that therefore they might have some moral claim to consideration, such consideration being the privilege of deducting these donations from their income for taxation purposes. Certainly if the prospectors are all out now, no one who contributed out of his own means to an individual prospector has any moral claim or equity at all, because that never was the law; it was not the law the year before last or last year, and he had no reason to think it would be the law this year. To make it the law now will, as far as I can see, not get a single prospector out for the rest of the year. Is that not correct?

Mr. GREEN: No; the minister is wrong there. The year is not over yet; it has only begun. The men could not get out in the mountains of British Columbia until a couple of months ago. There is plenty of time yet, and there will be all next year.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may intervene and say just a word, I suggest that the last part of the minister's argument was not very sound. He based his position on the fact that because it is so late in the year the change suggested would have very little effect upon the prospectors. If we take that attitude each year, how can we make a change at all, for each year the same argument will apply. We must make a start somewhere, and perhaps this is the time to prepare for next year. I only rose to point out what I think are obvious flaws in the argument of the minister, and to suggest that his argument does not do his case justice in this instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think my argument is pretty good. We are legislating for the year 1944 only. It is war-time legislation, to encourage prospecting for base metals and strategic minerals. That is for war purposes, and for this year only. This was enacted two years ago, and again last year and this year. I should hope that this would be the last year it would be necessary to give more encouragement to search for minerals having strategic necessity.

The hon. member has suggested that perhaps we should get started on next year. I do not know whether there will be any such legislation next year. But what I am saying is that if my information is correct—and I may say I do not know much about it, except what I get through the officials, and from people who come to see the officials—prospectors are all busy. Is that not so?

Mr. McCANN: No; ordinarily prospectors do not go out until the fly season is over, that is in July or August.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better not rely on that kind of advice.

Mr. McCANN: They know more about it than you do.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be a very poor standard to set up.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it is a shame to hear the leader of the opposition criticizing the advice, because the advice, unfortunately, corroborates the hon. member himself.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister must remember that when he says prospectors are busy, all able-bodied men are busy at this time. Because prospectors are busy it does not follow that there is a healthy state in prospecting. Because there is a tremendous speculative boom in two particular sections of this country, it does not mean that that reflects a healthy state in prospecting, or that all prospectors are busy and engaged in their professions.

That is why I brought in this question of allowing prospectors to prospect for all metals, using their complete profession, rather than prescribing and limiting the metals they are to look for. I do not intend to argue this matter further, because I argued it this afternoon. It must be remembered, however, that the prospector of to-day is a very different individual from the prospector of a few years ago. To-day the prospector employs a great deal of scientific equipment. He uses a diamond drill, and a process of radio-location known as the doodlebug. He employs a great many scientific instruments, and has to be trained in his work. Not only that, but in the main ore-bearing belts in Ontario and Quebec he has to overcome a great deal of overburden, and has to get down to bed rock.

In other words, he has to do a great deal of work that the old prospector, the man who went out and found the minerals showing, did not have to do. His work to-day is entirely different. To-day it is a science, when compared with the old system. It was said that the old prospector had a nose for ore, but it is very different to-day. I do not think the minister appreciates fully the dependence in the future that we shall have on the prospecting industry. He does not appreciate the fact that from the time a find is made, four or five years must pass until the time of a producing mine, irrespective of how encouraging the find may be, or irrespective of the fact that the mine may be close to an established gold camp or base metals camp.

That is the reason why I moved the amendment this afternoon, and that is the reason why I tried to say, "Let us broaden the picture this year, even though it is a war year, and even though we are still in the greatest depths of strain in the war." Let us enlarge this now, because it will not have immediate effect. These things have delayed action, and we must remember that now is the time to let the action start—because we are not going to use up any more of our man-power. The men are there. Let this delayed action start now, so that when the time comes when our men require work and when, with all due respect to our monetary theory, we are going to need every ounce of gold we can produce, we shall be in a good position. Let us now strive to find that new gold and all those new precious metals we shall need. Now is the time, irrespective of the fact that we are still at war.

I appreciate the minister's argument, and I appreciate his difficulty in changing taxation in the depths of war. But we must prepare at this time for the time which lies ahead.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed further, hon. members will find that standing order 40 refers to repetition. I must say that for two hours this afternoon hon. members, including myself, spoke on this matter. The time has arrived when we ought not to repeat ourselves, when members should speak to the resolution before the committee. I believe that every hon. member will agree to that suggestion.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like to ask three questions. First of all. I understand that the effect of this resolution is to benefit the financial backer of the prospector, not directly the prospector himself. The prospector benefits only to the extent that this makes it easier for him to secure financial backing. Is that not correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: The backer is the only one who gets the tax benefit.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes. So that the only benefit the prospector gets is that this makes it a little easier for him to get money from someone to grubstake him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: My second question is this: What is involved in a partnership? I notice that this exemption may be claimed for anyone financing a partnership. I know a number of prospectors, and so far as I have been able to learn, very few of them go out singly. On most occasions they go out in pairs. What is involved in their getting support under this resolution? What is involved in establishing the fact that they are partners? How difficult is that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I explained that this afternoon, in part. The resolution provides for contributions or payments made to associations, syndicates or ordinary partnerships registered or otherwise recognized under the laws of any province in Canada, and organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals or strategic metals. So that the partnership would be an ordinary partnership constituted in accordance with partnership laws of the particular province in which it was operating and registered or otherwise recognized by the laws of that province.

In other words, it would be a legally organized partnership, organized for the purpose of prospecting for base minerals. The point is that it need not be a corporation. This resolution does not extend the benefits only to incorporated bodies. It extends them to partnerships and syndicates, which are unincorporated bodies. A partnership may consist of two or more individuals.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: My third question is this: Let us suppose that funds are provided for a partnership on the understanding that they are out to prospect for base metals. If in the course of their prospecting they discover precious metals, would they be penalized to any extent, or would they lose the benefits of this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: In order to qualify an association, the syndicate or mining partnership must be organized for the purpose of prospecting in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals. That purpose must be established to the satisfaction of the taxation authorities. If gold is found, that fact of itself would not be sufficient to rebut the allegation that the purpose was to prospect for base metals and strategic minerals, but if it is made clear that the purpose was to look for gold and not for the base metals or strategic minerals, the deduction would not be allowed.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: How do they establish the fact that they are prospecting for base metals? It is not necessary for them to discover base metals in order to get the exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: How do they establish the fact that they are searching for base metals?

Mr. ABBOTT: They just say they are looking for them.

Mr. JACKMAN: They cannot get any manpower for gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: The facts would all have to be looked into. As I say, the fact that they found gold would not of itself be sufficient to rebut their claim that they had been established for the purpose of searching for base metals and strategic minerals, but the places where they had looked and all the circumstances might indicate that they were not looking for strategic minerals and base metals, in which event the deduction would not be allowed.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I had in mind the prospector who went out definitely to prospect for base metals but who happens to find precious metals. He is not penalized because of that accident or good fortune?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is covered by the previous answer.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can the minister tell us what was allowed last year to syndicates, partnerships and associations under the terms of this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: The deputy minister informs me that he thinks it is available but it is not here. We shall try to have it before the bill is brought in.

Mr. JACKMAN: If any of these associations, syndicates or mining partnerships happened to be successful and found a claim which was worth money, would they be taxable as an entity in themselves apart from the individuals who composed them?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is asking if they would be taxed on the profits they make?

Mr. JACKMAN: If an individual prospector went out he would not be taxable if he made a find, as might happen in one out of ten thousand cases. But where you have an association or a syndicate or a mining partnership and in the one case out of ten thousand they are lucky and make some money, would tha profit be taxable, and at what rates? If it is, then obviously it would create a substantial discouragement. As the minister knows, the present tax laws prevent the starting up of any new business because the government take is so large that very little is left to recompense the person for the risk involved, to say nothing of his having a return on the money invested. What rate of taxation is there on the association? What rate is there on the syndicate? What rate is there on the mining partnership? If this resolution is to have any meaning at all we must know that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Could we give the answer later? It is a pretty general question.

Mr. JACKMAN: General, but rather significant.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman perhaps wants to know what would be considered as profits. There cannot be any question about profits being taxed, but the question would be whether it would be capital gain or profit.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suppose there is only one way of getting money. If you grubstake a prospector and he finds a claim which is developed into something and you sell it for a worth-while amount, you may get many times what you put into it by way of grubstaking. I want to know whether that potential profit would be taxable, and at what rate. For instance, what is meant by "association" in the eyes of the taxation law, and what rate applies? It is not a question of whether it is capital gain or operating profit. I presume you look upon these things as capital profits or operating profits or capital gains on the part of the association, syndicate or partnership.

That is the only source of revenue they are likely to have, what is obtained by disposing of claims which have developed into real prospects. I want to know what the rate of taxation is. It may be so high as completely to defeat the purpose the government has in mind in inserting this resolution in our taxation scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how much farther I can go in this. If they make a profit—

Mr. JACKMAN: The association?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the association, mining partnership or syndicate make a profit, it is taxable. If they are incorporated, it would be taxable at the corporation rate.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the association a corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Bring along your association and I will tell you. If it is incorporated, of course it is a corporation. If it is not, it is not.

Mr. JACKMAN: Supposing the minister and I formed an association to grubstake some people to search for essential materials.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be a pretty shaky partnership.

Mr. JACKMAN: It certainly would be. By a stroke of good fortune they come across a likely looking prospect and we sell it for $100,000. Is that $100,000 taxable, and at what rate? I do not know; I am asking the minister. If business does not know where it is at, how is it to go ahead? People do not lay plans unless they know what the chances are. That is what is wrong with so much of this taxation legislation that is brought down before this house. If the minister formed a partnership with me and we make $100,000, is that to be frittered away and shall we get no return even though fortune smiles on us? I am asking what the rate is and nobody seems to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would it be different from any other business we might go into? If the hon. gentleman and I formed a partnership to go into business we would be taxed on the profits of that business.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the individual rates. The principles of taxation of partnerships and individuals constituting partnerships are all set out in the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where an individual grubstakes a prospector he is not taxable. If I go up into the north country, find a mine and sell it for a good price, I am not taxed on that money. That is a capital gain. If I form a partnership you say I shall be taxed, but an individual would not be taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was trying to find out whether the hon. gentleman wanted to know whether something would be regarded as a capital gain or as profit. Is that his question? If he would write me a letter outlining the circumstances and ask for a ruling as to whether it is a capital gain or an operating profit I would try to get a ruling from the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose that an association makes $100,000 by the sale of one of these claims; what rate of taxation applies to that? Suppose it is a syndicate. I do not know what rate of taxation a syndicate pays; I never was in a syndicate. That is a simple question. Suppose that there is a gain of $100,000 and that there are five partners.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion many of the questions asked have not been relevant to the resolution before us.

Mr. JACKMAN: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, my question is extremely relevant because busines men must know whether there is any reward for their effort and for their assumption of risk.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like to ask a question along the same lines as that asked by the hon. member for Rosedale. Let us suppose that six prospectors find a claim and the claim is sold to a syndicate, which in turn sells the stock to the public and realizes, let us say, one million dollars on the transaction. That one million dollars is considered a capital gain and is not taxed. Has not that been happening all the time?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think this is completely outside the resolution, Mr. Chairman. The members of the committee are anxious, I take it, to get a high-class legal opinion as to whether a certain man is taxable or not. This resolution does not affect the taxability of individuals, mining partners, syndicates or anybody else. If they have made a net profit they will be taxed under section 3 of the Income War Tax Act. We do not tax partnerships as such under the Income War Tax Act, but the individual partners are taxed on their proportion of the profits. I do not know whether it is fair to ask the minister or even his parliamentary assistant to give free legal opinions. I make my living outside this house giving legal opinions for an adequate charge.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister, I think, suffers from a fundamental misconception of the mining industry. A prospector goes out and stakes a claim. The minister and I go out in the bush and stake a claim, and we sell it to the minister's rich friend from Montreal sitting beside him. Are the minister and I taxed on what we sell it for to the parliamentary assistant?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would suggest that my hon. friend see his solicitor in Toronto.

Resolution agreed to.

33. (a) That any enactment founded on resolutions 20 and 29 be brought into force on enactment; and

(b) That any enactments founded on resolutions 1 to 19 inclusive, resolutions 21 to 28 inclusive and resolutions 30 to 32 inclusive be applicable, unless otherwise stated, to the income of the 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods.

Mr. JACKMAN: This was held over because it was consequential on some other clause.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is just the coming into force clause.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was merely protesting against the haste. If the clause is all right I am satisfied.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN: Before we go any farther, Mr. Chairman, this might be a convenient time for me to bring up a matter which was discussed the other evening and which the acting chairman ruled was out of order. It had to do with complaints of people who are known as commuters, people who live in the border communities.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to rule again that the hon. member is out of order. We are in committee of ways and means, and there is a rule that there must be a clause before the committee.

Mr. MARTIN: We have just passed resolution 33, and before we go any farther, Mr. Chairman, I thought I would be in order in bringing up a matter which might well have been dealt with specifically by a resolution in ways and means.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no clause among these resolutions dealing with the matter I do not see how the hon. member can be in order in discussing it unless the committee gives its unanimous consent.

Mr. MARTIN: I have great respect for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I did discuss the matter with no less an officer than the author of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and I suggested that this might be the proper place. I do not know whether that can be regarded as a persuasive authority on the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: When this matter was up before, the hon. member for Essex East and I took some part in it, and my understanding was the same as his. I thought that at the conclusion of our consideration of these resolutions an opportunity would be provided to discuss matters which might have formed part of the resolutions themselves but which for various reasons of government policy were omitted. I think the committe ought to give my hon. friend the opportunity to put his case before us. I know something about the commuters' case, and my hon. friend is an authority on it because he lives in a border community. I think he ought to be allowed to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN: I was simply stating the rule. I have certainly no objection if the committee consents, since I am positive that no one would object to the hon. member's speaking.

Mr. KNOWLES: The same latitude must be given to other members.

Mr. MARTIN: Following the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, I think the matter should be aired here. It will not take a great deal of time. It is not a matter that has come to the attention of the Department of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance for the first time. There has been considerable correspondence as well as conferences over it.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend will permit me, if the precedent is established of raising any subject that might have been covered by a resolution, the privilege will have to be extended to other members. The hon. member for Essex East has been making representations to me and to the Minister of National Revenue about this matter, and I know that he wants to discuss it. I am not sure as to the propriety of discussing it now, but I think he could discuss it on the second reading of the bill to amend the Income War Tax Act. That opens up the whole act, and we will bring it on as rapidly as we can. I think under the rules that would be the regular course of procedure. But if my hon. friend were permitted to raise the subject here, any other member could bring up any other subject and say that it should have been dealt with by a resolution.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. MARTIN: If your ruling is, Mr. Chairman, that I am still not in order, although I thought I had prepared my ground sufficiently to be in order, I have no other course than to follow the suggestion made by the minister. I have tried to bring this matter up on two occasions, and I had thought I had convinced the Minister of Finance that the matter is one which deserves careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no doubt that the hon. member would be in order in bringing the matter up on the second reading of the bill to amend the Income War Tax Act, as suggested by the Minister of Finance. I want to say that I have sometimes been criticized myself for not strictly adhering to the rules and forms, and I know the hon. member always adheres to them closely.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can you criticize the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN: Members of parliament have certainly been most kind to me. I would point out that when we are in committee of the whole in ways and means officials of the government are often held up at some length in their functions. I believe the point of order was well taken.

Mr. MARTIN: I hope the Chair did not take anything that I said as a reflection upon it.

The CHAIRMAN: Positively not. I know the hon. member too well even to have such a thought.

Resolution agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

6. That a taxpayer, whose income in the taxation period is, in the opinion of the minister, derived from the carrying on of a business substantially different from the class of business carried on by such taxpayer in the standard period, be required to have its standard profits ascertained by the board of referees as if they had not commenced business before the second of January, 1939.

Mr. COTE: Under this resolution I would call the minister's attention to the remarks I made on Thursday last on behalf of optometry, when I urged that this profession be considered as a profession and their services exempted from the tax. I do not wish to prolong the debate, and for that reason I would ask the permission of the committee to place on Hansard, without the necessity of reading it, a statement showing points of similarity between optometry, on the one hand, and the two professional groups of oculists and dentists, on the other, who are already admitted under the exemption clauses of the Excess Profits Tax Act.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. COTE: This comparative statement is not a very long one:

	Oculist	Optometrist	Dentist
Is a college or university course necessary to qualify?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Must one pass qualifying examinations and be licensed to practise?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Are scientific instruments and equipment necessary to conduct practice?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Does it take years to build up a large practice?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Where does the therapeutic device or appliance come from?	Most have them made in an outside laboratory	Same	Same
	Some have their own laboratory	Same	Same
Who supplies and fits the therapeutic device or appliance?	Some supply and fit	Most supply and fit	Most supply and fit
Is an examination conducted to determine the need of the aid or appliance?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Are the specifications for the aid or appliance prescribed?	Yes	Yes	Yes
What about the fitting?	Many do Most do not	Most do Some do not	Most do Some do not
What about the periodical adjustments?	Same as above	Same as above	Same as above
What about the repair work to the aid or appliance?	Same as above	Same as above	Same as above

To supplement this statement, I would say that these three professional groups, the dentists and oculists on the one hand and optometrists on the other, are consumers of certain materials. One consumes certain dental materials, such as set of teeth made of gold, porcelain, platinum and cement, and the other consumes ophthalmic materials such as lenses and mountings. There is no substantial difference in principle. In both cases, the therapeutic or appliance is useless and worthless if professional services are not rendered with it. It must be remembered that the optometrist's fees to his patients are for professional services rendered in his examination, refraction, prescription, interpretation, fitting, and servicing, and the latter service goes on something for years. The cost of the material consumed by the optometrist is only a small part of the fee charged for professional services. Years of faulty thinking on this subject on the part of a few persons cannot alter the facts or effect the truth of the matter. In the province of Quebec the government has recognized this fact, and neither the dentist nor the optometrist is charged with sales tax in connection with his patients. They are both considered professionally, not as vendors but as consumers of materials. I respectfully submit, therefore, that for most of the reasons I mentioned the other day, when discussing unusual medical expenses, the optometrists should be regarded as a professional group; that the services they render should be considered professional services and that therefore they should be exempted, as regards their fees, from the application of the excess profits tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that the practice, really the law, is that in the case of optometrists that portion of their charge which represents the fee for examining the eyes and giving advice and a prescription as to the type of glasses that should be used is properly chargeable as medical expenses under the section which we discussed the other day, but that if, in addition, they procure glasses, spectacles, and sell them to the client, that is exercising a trade or business, and consequently that part is not subject to deduction in connection with medical expenses and presumably would be subject to excess profits tax if the business were over $5,000. I am advised that is the practice followed under the English act. A separation must be made between the respective functions performed by this class of practitioners as between professional activities and trading activities.

Mr. COTE: My interpretation is that the procurement of eyeglasses by the optometrist to his client should not be regarded as a sale, because it is not a sale. He prescribes eyeglasses and this prescription is entrusted to an ophthalmic laboratory. Then the produce of that prescription, the eyeglass, is returned to the optometrist who fits and delivers it to his client. The transaction is exactly the same as with the dentist who writes his prescription and sends it to the dental mechanic or laboratory who fills the prescription and returns it to the dentist, who supplies his client with the dental plate or whatever it may be. I contend, therefore, that the whole transaction must be regarded as coming within professional services. This has been admitted in several instances and more particularly by the city of Montreal, which has enacted a specific bylaw recognizing that the prefessional services of the optometrist must not be limited to the eye examination but must be extended to include the prescription and supplying of glasses. I would ask the minister to give this matter his most serious consideration in order to render justice to a professional group who have a good standing throughout Canada and who urge that this principle be maintained.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to agree with my hon. friend that there is some analogy between the dentist who makes a plate for his patient and the optometrist who examines his client and decides what type of glasses he needs, and thereupon proceeds to sell him a pair of glasses. There is, however, a definite trading aspect on that side of the optometrist's work which is considered as a trade or business for tax purposes. The dentist, on the other hand, is generally regarded as a professional man. We do not hear of dentists selling plates, but we do recognize that optometrists sell glasses.

Mr. COTE: That is a misconception, because a distinction must be made, for instance, between sun glasses or dark glasses and eyeglasses. Any pair of dark glasses may be equally useful to the parliamentary assistant and to me; it is a public commodity. It is salable as such, and there is no specific or scientific fitting to suit the peculiar requirements of any particular individual, whereas I am sure the eyeglasses which the parliamentary assistant wears would not be of any value to me or to anybody else, because in the latter is an item of professional service which is exclusively necessary to fill the need of each individual case. That makes the eyeglasses a piece of scientific equipment, and for that reason they are entirely different from sun glasses or anything else. That is why I say we may sell sun glasses, but we do not sell optometrist's eyeglasses individually prescribed. These glasses are made for his clients and are of no use to anybody else, to the same extent as is the dental plate.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. JACKMAN: We are on resolution 6. May I just revert to resolution 5 which I hardly had time to read before it was passed? I wish to make a suggestion with regard to the words, "in the opinion of the minister", which ordinarily means in the opinion of the deputy minister. I do not know whether or not it would change the meaning of the section if these words were left out, but they do create in the minds of a great many people who have to pay taxes a feeling of—I shall not say "distress", but it is like waving a red flag. Surely the question of whether or not a business was started on or before June 26, 1944, is a question of fact. If the taxpayer claims that his business was started on a certain day and the department refuses to accept it, I suppose the taxpayer has the right to appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada. What purpose do those words serve? They are most objectionable to some people.

We are now considering resolution 6. Would the minister explain the type of businesses or taxpayers which are sought after by this section? I do not quite understand it.

Mr. ABBOTT: This proposed resolution covers really what is a technical point. At the present time our Excess Profits Tax Act defines standard profits, and I quote:

> The average yearly profits of a taxpayer in the standard period in carrying out what was in the opinion of the minister the same class of business as the business of the taxpayer in the year of taxation.

The proposed amendment provides for the determination of standard profits by the board of referees where the business of the taxpayer is substantially different from the business carried on by the taxpayer in the standard period. In the act there is no definition of standard profits where the business is substantially unlike the business carried on during the standard period, and there is no power to send to the board of referees. In other words, to give an example, the business may have been carried on during the standard period to manufacture stoves, and by reason of shortage of material or something else they switched to the manufacture of a completely different commodity. There is a gap in the act. Under those circumstances it can be argued that they have no standard profits at all because they are not carrying on the same class of business. I would say it is a technical point arising out of the definition contained in the act. It does not enlarge the scope of the act in any way. It just covers one of those drafting oversights, and probably on balance it may be and should be beneficial to the taxpayer.

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose the stove manufacturer had a fairly successful business and had a reasonable return on his capital over and above what the board of referees are allowed to grant. Owing to shortage of materials the stove business is no longer in operation and the owner turns his equipment over to the manufacture of shells. It is clear he cannot use his old manufacturing base. What I want to find out is what authority the board of referees have to grant him a base over and above five to seven per cent, is it, on his assets in connection with the manufacture of shells, which may be very small in relation to his pre-war profits.

Mr. ABBOTT: The section which defines standard profits is paragraph (i) of section 2 of the Excess Profits Tax Act, which reads:

> Standard profits means the average yearly profits of the taxpayer in the standard period in carrying on what was in the opinion of the minister the same class of business as the business of the taxpayer in the year of taxation or the standard profits ascertained in accordance with section 5 of this act.

It could be argued that in the case such as has been cited the taxpayer has no standard profits at all and that, therefore, all his profits are excess profits. Or it might be argued that since he has no standard profits he is not subject to the provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act at all and is only subject to the Income War Tax Act. It is to clarify that position and to provide that in the case of a taxpayer whose business is substantially different from the class of business which he carried on during the base period the question of his standard profits shall be referred to the board of referees for determination. Of course, the board of referees will be governed by the general rules respecting determination of standard profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: It may easily turn out that if the stove manufacturer was making $100,000 taxable profits before the war and has turned his business entirely over to war production, on a strict evaluation of his assets in that class of business the board of referees would only grant him perhaps $10,000 or $15,000. Is that a situation which might arise out of the application of this resolution? It seems rigorous. I cannot see that the direction of the board of referees is such as to allow a fair return commensurate with what he was earning before.

Mr. ABBOTT: He will have the same rights as every other taxpayer appearing before the board of referees. First, as to new business, the standard is determined by the board of referees in accordance with the rules laid down by the act. If he can show that he has a depressed business, then he would get standard profits determined under section 5. If he can show that the business was one in which capital was not a major factor, then the board of referees can take that into account. But, broadly speaking, where the business is substantially different from the business carried on during the standard period, the standard profit is to be determined by the board of referees.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That the provision permitting a taxpayer to deduct from tax the amount paid to any foreign country for income tax in respect of the income of the taxpayer from sources therein, be amended by deleting the requirement that such foreign country in imposing tax allow a similar credit to persons in respect of income thereof from sources within Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the parliamentary assistant explain this resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution corresponds exactly to resolution 25 of the income tax resolutions which were discussed at some length this morning. It is exactly the same provision. If a Canadian income taxpayer is subject to tax abroad he may deduct from his Canadian tax the amount of tax which he is obliged to pay in the foreign jurisdiction. That is the law now. But the requirement that the foreign country should afford a similar privilege to our citizens is now being eliminated, and the Canadian taxpayer can take that credit whether the foreign country grants a reciprocal provision or not. It is exactly the same provision that was set out in resolution 35 with respect to income tax, as distinct from the excess profits tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: Which other countries do not afford us reciprocal provisions? I presume the only two countries in which we are interested are Great Britain and the United States.

Possibly there are some others, but the minister might explain why we cannot get reciprocal provisions with them and what countries they are.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that a great many countries do in their statutes as we do in ours, grant this provision. The deputy minister advises me that in the department they have a list, which may be incomplete, setting out the various statutory provisions, but that is not here. Certainly the United States and Great Britain do have this reciprocal arrangement, and they are the two most important countries from our point of view.

Resolution agreed to.

8. That the standard profits be adjusted upwards to the extent of five per centum of the increase of the capital employed at the commencement of the 1944 taxation period over the capital employed—

(a) at the commencement of the 1939 taxation period; or

(b) at the commencement of the first fiscal period after 1939 in respect of the taxation of the profits of which the board of referees have determined a standard profit:

Provided that such increase in capital employed shall be reduced by the amount of any increase in capital employed accompanied by an equivalent increase in capital stock on which an adjustment of seven and one-half per centum has been made to the standard profits as already provided in the act.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is an amendment to be moved, a further proviso to be added. The amendment is that resolution 8 to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided that, if the capital employed at the beginning of any fiscal period ending in 1945 or a subsequent year is less than the capital employed at the beginning of the 1944 fiscal period, the standard profits may be reduced by an amount equal to five per cent of the reduction in capital employed, but not to an extent greater than the previous upward adjustment made under this provision, dividends being presumed to be paid from profits most recently earned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I listened closely to the minister's arguments in favour of this move, which he gave on June 26, and I have reread them as they appear at page 4182 of Hansard. I grant that the minister has made a case for the step he is taking, but I consider that some of the things that strike me in this connection should be pointed out. I am prepared to have the minister correct me if my understanding is not accurate. It seems to me that once this upward adjustment of standard profits is allowed, it must be admitted that it will have certain effects. It will provide some relief in taxation to certain corporations. It will result in some loss of revenue to the treasury. It will also result in certain increased profits to corporations and, to the extent that there may be greater profits for distribution in the form of dividends, it has a bearing on the fight against inflation. As I have said, I grant that the minister has made a case, but the point I wish to emphasize is that if he finds it necessary to take this step, in spite of the results I have enumerated, he should appreciate the position when some of the rest of us in this house come along and suggest adjustments that we feel need to be made, even though they may have some of these same effects. The parliamentary assistant and I had a little spat the other day over that very attitude.

Mr. ABBOTT: Very friendly, though.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, quite; the hon. gentleman and I get along very well even when we fight. The point I was making then was that the adjustments for which we on this side of the house ask should be considered in the same light as the adjustments proposed by the government. I suggest that resolution 8 is a particular example of an adjustment the minister has found necessary, despite the effects which I have enumerated as likely to result. I have in mind at the moment one group of people in particular who are much concerned at the delay in making an adjustment as far as they are concerned; I refer to the railroad employees throughout the country. For some considerable time their case has been before one of the boards, and they have been anxiously awaiting a decision. The discussion that has gone on in the press in regard to that matter has related to the very things I have mentioned, particularly the fight against inflation. Still these things are allowed to happen in this case, while on the other hand we have the railroad employees who are feeling quite disturbed at the long delay in dealing with their case. I know that does not come directly under the minister, but it is part of the government's wage-freezing and anti-inflation policy. The point I am suggesting here is that there has been some relaxation in resolution 8 as far as the profits of private corporations are concerned. We ask for similar consideration for other groups of people.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is a pretty far-fetched comparison. The idea of the Excess Profits Tax Act is to take away excess profits; but when a company grows into an altogether different sort of thing than it was in the standard period; when it becomes a much larger entity than it was in the standard period, then the provision is no longer fair.

Mr. KNOWLES: I grant that, but the same thing is true in the other case. All we are asking is fairness on both sides.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is saying that he wants fairness, and so do I. He points to certain things and says that this has some inflationary effect. It would be very remote indeed, I should think. We would have to take a particular case and trace it through. It does have this effect, I admit: If you raise the standard profits it makes a little less than you take away in 100 per cent profit, but whether or not that would have any effect upon dividends I should think would be very uncertain. There might be a little more there in the company. However, the hon. member does not oppose this on grounds of unfairness.

Mr. KNOWLES: No, I am just trying to emphasize the fact that if the reason for this is the ground of fairness, that is likewise the ground we use in the cases we bring to the attention of the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that this is not an increase in rates earned. It is simply an application of the same rate to a greater number of employees. There is no increase in the rate. It is simply that more capital has been put into it, and they are getting returns on it for the first time.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a relief in taxation, as compared with what the case would be if the resolution were not passed.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a relief from a hardship. At the same time, the second amendment means that if the amount of capital is less than it was before, he ought not to be allowed to earn so much. The rate remains the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: If you let the situation alone you would be taking more than 100 per cent of the true excess. It is merely applying the 100 per cent rule on a fair basis. That is all it is doing. It is necessary to do certain things in a time of war that are not altogether fair, because of the terrible consequences of not taking that course of action. The economy becomes so complicated that precise equity in every instance is impossible. I presume there is not precise equity here even yet. Certainly there has been inequity through the year.

This is applicable to 1944 for the first time, even though the company had been growing during that period. There were inequalities all during that time, and they were not recognized at all. But there comes a time when it becomes a little too difficult, and an adjustment has to be made.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to draw the minister's attention to some of the remarks I made in my budget speech. I made a plea for a step-up for those in the salaried brackets, above those who received cost of living bonus. As I said at that time, many people accept low salaries in their early years, just as do civil servants, until they reach a maximum. Owing to the effect of the wage-freezing order their wages have been kept at a very low level. I believe it is three or four years—perhaps three years is correct—since the wage-freezing order was made. So that I think consideration should be given to the effect which that order has had on many of the white-collared class who not only have been faced with higher taxes—as we all have—but are not getting the advances which they otherwise would have got, and who as a result are feeling a peculiar hardship.

Wage-earners, particularly those who are unionized, have been able to get increases in wages or, in some cases, have transferred their employment. But many of our finest citizens, receiving small salaries, people in the white-collared class, have had no increases in pay, yet their responsibilities have greatly increased during that time. It seems to me that there must come a time—and I think that time has already come—when consideration should be given to a step-up in their salaries, where justified, and where employers would be willing to make the increase which would ordinarily be made, if the freezing order had not been in force.

Mr. ILSLEY: I listened to the hon. member attentively when he made his budget speech. It is a question whether there should be a gradual retreat.

Mr. JACKMAN: When a man becomes more useful to his employer, it is just like an increase in capital.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say anything in reply to those representations. The trouble is they are there on every side. They are on prices, they are on wages, they are on salaries and on everything else. I do not know what the government should do under those circumstances. You might very easily make a retreat, and then the fight against inflation would become a rout. I might easily do that. But, on the other hand, certain adjustments have to be made from time to time. As the hon. member has said, there have been a great many wage adjustments.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

9. That companies which elect or have elected since January 1, 1940, under the Income War Tax Act to file consolidated returns be not permitted to file such returns under the Excess Profits Tax Act in respect of fiscal periods ending on or after January 1, 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: May we have an explanation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall endeavour to explain it. The law now permits companies which have wholly-owned subsidiaries to file a consolidated tax return, upon paying two per cent additional tax, I believe it is. Up to comparatively recently, in the case of a company and its subsidiaries, the standard profit for excess profits tax was taken as being the standard profit of the parent, together with the standard profit of the subsidiaries.

A ruling was issued some time ago that in the case of companies which had elected to consolidate subsequently to January 1, 1940, the standard profit should be restricted to the largest standard profit of a company in the group, plus $5,000 for each of the other companies.

This measure further restricts that right, and it provides that in the case of companies which elected prior to January 1, 1940, to consolidate, there is no change in their position. That was before the war. In the case of companies which have elected since that time, after January 1, 1944, they will no longer be able to file consolidated returns for purposes of excess profits tax. It is a measure which I think would have the effect of curbing or checking possible abuses. In other words, each company will stand on its own feet so far as excess profits tax and standard profits are concerned.

Resolution agreed to.

10. That the provision allowing deductions by an unincorporated taxpayer from income of amounts paid by way of donations to charitable organizations in Canada be amended to provide that the amount of the donations made after January 31, 1944, by a taxpayer carrying on business, in excess of the average of the taxpayer's donations in the last two fiscal periods ending before July 1, 1942, shall be allowed as a deduction for purposes of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, only to the extent that the tax payable by the taxpayer under the said act is thereby diminished by fifteen per centum of the said excess, unless made before February 1, 1944, and paid or evidenced in writing before the said date or evidenced by a payment before the said date which is one of a series of payments to be made thereafter and accompanied by proper evidence of the undertaking.

Mr. ABBOTT: Exactly the same provisions are included here as were included in the Income War Tax Act with respect to charitable donations.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

11. That any enactments founded on—
(a) Resolutions 3, 4, 5, 8, 9 and 10 come into force on enactment; and
(b) Resolutions 1, 2, 6 and 7 be applicable to the income of 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods.

Mr. JACKMAN: Reverting to resolution 10, may I say that I do not think there is any complaint to be made about the intention of the resolution; it is meant to apply only to the taxpayer whose business comes under the Excess Profits Tax Act, but it says "unincorporated taxpayer," which would mean any one of us.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he is subject to the provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Resolution agreed to.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act, and to provide:—

1. That the definition of "child" be extended to include that child to whom the deceased stands in loco parentis.

Mr. GREEN: Under this act as it stands at the present time an estate is taxed in accordance with the terms of the will, but in some provinces there is what is known as a testator's family maintenance act under which judges of the superior courts have the power to vary the succession. I understand that the Dominion Succession Duty Act pays no attention to an order made under one of these provincial acts, and the result is that succession duty may be levied against a person, say on $10,000, when a judge of the provincial court may order that that person shall receive only $1,000. I understand that some cases have been adjusted by refunds of money or something of that sort, or by the passing of a special order, but I think the act should be amended so that situations of this kind will not arise.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am totally unaware of the situation to which the hon. gentleman refers, and I shall have to give it consideration between now and the time the bill is brought in. I shall have to take it up with the Department of National Revenue to see if consideration has been given to the problem. The deputy minister informs me that he does not know of the situation.

Mr. GREEN: Cases have actually arisen where a person named in a will has paid succession duties, say on $10,000—I am just using that as an arbitrary figure—and then an order has been made subsequently by a provincial court drastically cutting the amount. That obviously is not right, and the act should be changed to meet that situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look into the matter. On the facts stated it would look as though the taxpayer should have a refund, but I do not know.

Mr. BENCE: I understand that this act was passed to raise additional money during war time. It is purely a succession duty proposition, but there is one thing I should like to point out and object strenuously against. The people who administer the Dominion Succession Duty Act are the same officials who look after the collection of the dominion income tax. They use the powers granted to them to prevent the issuance of a certificate in order to force the representative of the estate or the beneficiaries to file income tax returns over a period of years in the event that they have not been filed.

I suggest that the administration is taking an unfair advantage of the Dominion Succession Duty Act to go into another field of taxation in order to hold up a person from getting a little bit of money. I have a recent case where the only asset of the estate was a little bit of insurance. The widow knew nothing about her husband's affairs, but she was obliged to dig around for a lot of information about her husband's business in order to be able to file income tax returns for a number of years before his death. I do not contend that the deceased was justified in not filing income tax returns, but the fact is that this money was held up and the certificate was not issued. The powers granted under this act are being used for an entirely different purpose. I suggest that if the matter is to be dealt with, it should be dealt with under the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. GIBSON: We were not taking unfair advantage at all. After all, the estate was being wound up, and it is the duty of the taxing officials to see that any income tax returns should be filed that have not been filed. It is their duty to do this when the size of the estate indicates that returns should have been filed.

Mr. BENCE: The estate may indicate that a man was fairly well equipped financially, but this case was a small estate of about $5,000 life insurance. It happened to be the only cash asset the widow had, but it was held up until she furnished income tax statements with respect to the last three or four years before her husband's death.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That when a person is given a general power of appointment or disposal over property, such property be subject to duty as if it were given directly to him, and, upon his death, the person then benefiting be regarded as his successor for purposes of taxation.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to mention a specific case which I think will come under this resolution. Since this case is public property I will mention the name. It is the Arthur E. Burgett estate. Mr. Burgett was the former bishop of Edmonton and his estate was left entirely to charity. I should like to show what happened to the estate. The deceased resided at Oak Bay, Victoria, British Columbia, and he died on December 13, 1942. He was formerly Bishop of the Diocese of Edmonton, but resigned his episcopal office in 1940 and removed his place of residence to Victoria. He was unmarried and had no relatives in this country.

His estate had an inventory value of $179,469 and consisted almost entirely of securities which were in his possession in Victoria. By his will be made provision for an old servant by the devise of a cottage and the bequest of an annuity. The total amount expended for the benefit of this servant was between $14,000 and $15,000. The point I wish to bring up is in connection with the residue of his estate. This amounted to $163,914, and apart from a small bequest to the Diocese of Edmonton, it was given for the aid of divinity students at Bishop's college, Lennoxville, Quebec, and Trinity college, Toronto, and for missionary work in the ecclesiastical province of Rupert's Land.

Among the securities which the decedent owned were stocks in companies having head offices in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, and all of these provinces claimed succession duties on assets transferable in their respective jurisdictions. These claims amounted as follows:

British Columbia—
Probate duty	$ 2,190 45
Succession duty	12,828 98
		$15,019 43
Manitoba		37 08
Ontario		11,647 42
Forward		26,703 93
Quebec		12,865 65
The Dominion of Canada also claimed duty on the estate less one-half of the charitable gifts, and this amounted to		9,191 89
Making a grand total of		$48,761 47

The dominion, of course, also claimed the "forgiven" portion of 1942 income tax which, with other income tax assessments, amounted to approximately $2,000 additional, so that out of the estate of $179,469.28, over 90 per cent of which was given for charitable purposes in Quebec, Ontario and western Canada, the several government taxing bodies deducted almost $50,000, or approximately 27 per cent of the estate. None of these taxing bodies made any allowance for duties paid in other jurisdictions in estimating the taxation rate which was fixed on the aggregate value of the estate everywhere.

It seems to me an indefensible policy that there should be so many jurisdictions in this case, and I bring this matter up on this resolution just to show what is happening to-day through our system of dual and triple taxation by succession duties. The whole estate of this bishop with the exception of a small bequest to a faithful servant was left to charity, and yet very nearly fifty thousand dollars in taxation was imposed. I wonder whether the committee is aware that this is the sort of duties that are being imposed to-day by our succession duty acts. Practically the whole estate was given to charity. I hope the minister agrees with me that these rates are quite indefensible in justice and in law. This estate is closed now and has been probated, but I honestly suggest that the minister give serious consideration to an immediate conference with the provinces, so that these double and triple imposts shall not continue to destroy particularly assets of a clergyman of the church who was leaving his entire fortune to charity. I think our whole succession duty system should be given the most careful revision to prevent things like this from happening in the future.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not anything really to say about that. It is not strictly relevant to the resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON: I thought it would be relevant under "power of appointment".

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not think so. That has a technical meaning. We proposed once that all succession duties be handled by the dominion, but we did not get very far. I think there is much to be said for their being handled by one administration only. But I would not agree that charitable donations be entirely exempt from succession duties. I cannot help thinking that one very important purpose for which money should be devoted is the transaction of the important business of government.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to have an explanation of this resolution and to know why it is introduced at this time. Does a person who is given a general power of appointment under this resolution include persons who do not get any benefit out of the estate? In other words, does it include a person who is just a trustee or a type of trustee who is given a general power of appointment for a certain number of years and has to distribute the proceeds of the estate among sons and daughters or other classes at a certain time, and has not the use of the money himself? Does this double taxation exist in a case like that?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is to cover a technical omission from the act. It is to take care of the case where a general power of appointment is given and the man does nothing about it. The resolution says "such property be subject to duty as if it were given directly to him and, upon his death, the person then benefiting be regarded as his successor for purposes of taxation." There would, I take it, be no additional taxation.

Mr. BENCE: I am not clear on that yet.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 20, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF PORTNEUF

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Pierre Gauthier, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Portneuf. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

CANADIAN FIRE FIGHTERS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ORGANIZATION OF DETACHMENT FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, may I inform this hon. house that a detachment made up of volunteers from the corps of Canadian fire fighters now in the British isles has been organized for service on the continent of Europe in support of our invading armies. The Canadian detachment will work with the national fire service of the United Kingdom. The authorities in Great Britain have requested that no information be given out as to the strength of the detachment.

It is with very much regret that I must announce that three members of the corps are recent casualties: one, senior fireman John Stewart Coull of Winnipeg, Manitoba, has been killed, and leading fireman John Robert Cook Leguee, also of Winnipeg, and senior fireman Joseph Antoine Willie Cassidy, of Campbellton, New Brunswick, seriously injured by enemy bombs somewhere in England. The next of kin were informed some few days ago and the names of the injured men have since been taken from the seriously injured list.

CANADIAN FORCES

DISTURBANCES AT PETAWAWA CAMP

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps this is the proper place for me to make a correction in the statement which I made in answer to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon) on July 10 with respect to disturbances at Petawawa. At the time I answered my hon. friend I found his question on my desk when I came into my office, and I went immediately to the telephone and got the information from the officers at headquarters. They gave me the information which I immediately gave the house in answer to the question. I now have the proceedings of the court of inquiry and the report of an investigation conducted by the officers of the department whom I directed to be sent to Petawawa, and I very much regret to find that the information I gave the house was not accurate.

I said that at the training centre commanded by Colonel Johnston the only disturbance in recent days had taken place about three weeks ago. I find, in fact, that there had been two disturbances on successive nights; one on June 25 and the other on June 26. The incident on June 25 took place around nine o'clock that evening. A large group of approximately one hundred and fifty men had gathered close beside the canteen and there was some argument between some unidentified persons. I mention that particularly because I stated to my hon. friend that there were only two men involved in each case. The officer tells me that there were only two men involved in the fight, but at the same time I did not have the information that there was a crowd in addition to that. Hebert, a witness, states that he saw a scuffle and noticed a sergeant and a couple of other ranks lying on the ground. None of these has been identified. Another witness, Peters, a coloured man and a boxer, says he saw a few men "pick on" the sergeant. This latter witness did not know what the argument was about but he decided to participate in the scuffle in order to help the sergeant, and he got into the fight and says that the crowd was arguing whether he was fighting for the general service or the N.R.M.A., and that he said he was not on either side—all he wanted was fair play. Hebert, who had been acting as a regimental policeman, called the provost who intervened. The scuffle stopped almost immediately and the crowd moved off.

About twenty minutes later it appeared that a man named Dussault insulted Hebert, the acting regimental policeman. There had been bad blood between them in the past arising from personal differences. No fight ensued, as friends on both sides stopped them. However, tempers had risen and Dussault incited the soldiers who were still there to get after Hebert; the latter and two of his friends ran for safety in an office nearby. Most of the crowd followed and the office door was forced open and the upper panel broken. Hebert and his friends escaped by the window. At this time the crowd had increased and there were approximately two hundred men milling around. The regimental sergeant major and some senior non-commissioned officers arrived, ordered the men to proceed to their huts, which they did, and when the orderly officer arrived immediately afterward everything was under control. Hebert, one of the escaping men, reported to the medical inspection room with a lacerated nose. Dussault was the only man identified in the group which forced the door, and he was disciplined. I may say as a matter of fact that Dussault was just back from embarkation leave. I think he is now overseas. Both Hebert and Dussault were general service men.

The second incident was about nine-thirty the next night. It is substantially as I stated last week. Two men, both general service soldiers, had been doing some drinking and got into an altercation but did not come to blows. A group of about fifteen soldiers got around them, and when the orderly officer ordered them to break up they did so immediately. A little later a crowd of about fifty had gathered, apparently waiting for something to happen. There was some argument going on but no fight. After the canteen closed there would be probably two hundred men around. The orderly officer was in the vicinity from nine-thirty onwards. He saw the men in their huts and the lights out. He stayed around until about eleven o'clock and when he left everything was quiet.

These are the incidents at training centre A-1 commanded by Colonel Johnston. I had said there was only one disturbance, but as I have just indicated, there were disturbances on two different days. As I mentioned to the house, there had been an incident some time ago at training centre A-2. I said it was about two months ago. As a matter of fact it was on April 9, over three months ago. I said on the tenth that the rumour was that there was a fight between a general service and N.R.M.A. soldier. I find now that what happened was that a general service soldier got into a dispute with another general service soldier as a result of some objection he made to singing in French. He was ejected from the wet canteen by regimental police. It was just closing time, and after the crowd had left the canteen they gathered outside. There was some shouting and noise which attracted men from the neighbouring huts. A crowd gathered, estimated at about a hundred and fifty men. The regimental sergeant major came on the scene and ordered the men to disperse, which they did. No one was injured, there was no fighting and no property damage.

It should be noted by the house that a crowd of two or three hundred men would not be at all unusual at canteen closing time in a large camp like Petawawa, where there are between nine thousand and ten thousand men.

The officer af Camp Petawawa who gave the information which I gave to the house explains the incompleteness of the telephone information on the ground that he had not then seen the proceedings of the inquiry. I would like to repeat that I received the question of the leader of the opposition only a few minutes before the opening of the house, and in my desire to answer promptly I immediately telephoned my officers here who gave me the information which I forthwith gave the house. This information had been forwarded to headquarters by telephone from Petawawa, and contained nothing showing that any crowd had been involved in the incidents referred to.

I should like to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that general service and N.R.M.A. personnel have been training together in probably seventy-five camps and schools all across Canada for over three years. There has been remarkably little in the way of friction. I think both the officers and the men are entitled to great credit for the way they have carried on.

In Petawawa, which is our second largest camp in Canada, there are more differences to be taken account of than in any other camp in the dominion. We can hardly expect that there would not be strained relations at times between N.R.M.A. and general service personnel, but that is not by any means the only possible cause for quarrels, especially in camps of that size and where so many differences of various kinds exist. I am not going to minimize these episodes, but on the other hand I do not think that we should add to the difficulties of loyal and faithful officers and staff who have to deal with men of all sorts and make them soldiers by undue emphasis on incidents like these, which might occur in any camp, especially around canteen closing time. I think the Petawawa camp has made on the whole an excellent reputation for order and for good work, and I am sure that both officers and other ranks want to help to keep it that way. I would ask the house and the country that we try to leave them to do it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the coloured soldier get a medal?

Mr. RALSTON: He may get the golden gloves.

Mr. GRAYDON: He went to the rescue of the sergeant, did he not?

DISTURBANCES AT CALGARY

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I noticed a report in the press of a disturbance at Calgary R. C. Camp, and I expect to be asked a question by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) with regard to it. A wire has been sent to Calgary with reference to it. Having this lesson about giving information prematurely I am not going to give my hon. friend any answer because I have not any information other than that which is contained in the newspapers. Just a flash came in on this incident and a request was made for a full report. That will be given in due course.

[Later:]

Mr. POULIOT: The Canadian Press carries a dispatch that there was an active army-draftee clash involving a hundred and fifty men in Calgary. I would ask the government if they are willing to have this matter investigated by someone from Ottawa and if they will consider the policy of separating the active service personnel from the draftees in the different camps.

Mr. RALSTON: I have already indicated that I was making inquiries in connection with the matter, and I will make a report as soon as I can.

ACCIDENT AT MOUNT BRUNO RANGES ON JULY 6

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): May I refer to another question which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me on July 10 with regard to the tragic accident at Mount Bruno. Immediately the accident occurred two things were done. The attorney general of the province of Quebec was notified; it was indicated to him that a court of inquiry would be held, and he was given the opportunity to have a representative at the court of inquiry. At the same time the coroner was notified. As a matter of fact the coroner did hold a coroner's inquest in respect of the twelve cases in which, most regrettably, fatalities occurred.

The finding of the coroner's inquest in all twelve cases was as follows:

> Concerning the death of —— age —— years, domiciled at ——; which death happened on the —— day of the month of —— nineteen hundred and forty-four at Montreal, a report having been made to this court, an inquest was held by me on the 8th of July of the said year, and after having heard the relatives of the deceased, the witnesses, and Doctor —— who declared as cause of the death ——

And then comes the actual injury suffered by the deceased whose name is mentioned in the finding—

> I came to the conclusion that the said —— died of a violent death; that this death was not imputable to the crime of whomsoever, neither to the negligence of anybody; that no crime accompanied or preceded this death, and there was no necessity to hold an inquest before a jury. In consequence, a verdict of an accidental death was rendered.
>
> Pierre Hebert,
> Joint Coroner of the District of Montreal.

This is simply the finding of the joint coroner of the district of Montreal.

A full opportunity was given the civil authorities to investigate the matter, and that finding was rendered in all twelve cases. As a matter of fact the findings in four of the cases were forwarded here a few days ago, and I think the remaining eight were received here yesterday.

May I now proceed to the matter of the court of inquiry itself. The attorney general replied on July 7 to the notice we gave him. The reply is as follows:

> Your message received re inquiry on death of soldiers accidentally killed at Mount Bruno. Coroner having made an investigation not felt necessary to send representative to attend military court of inquiry.

This is signed by Mr. Cantin, K.C.

The qualifications of the members of the court were these: Major A. T. Stikeman belongs to A.48 basic training centre, artillery, stationed at St. Johns, Quebec. He has had much experience in courts of inquiry during the past two years, and has been eighteen years in commissioned service. Major J. H. Rankin is a permanent force soldier who enlisted in the R.C.O.C. in 1936 and qualified as an ammunition examiner in 1938. He was recommended by the officer commanding Longue Pointe ordnance depot as being an expert ammunition man, the best available. Captain B. W. A. Allison is attached to A.12 infantry training centre. This officer belongs to the unit concerned. He has had four years' service in the present war and is a graduate in arts of the university of Edinburgh. In civil life he was assistant branch manager of a textile firm. He has had previous experience on courts of inquiry, and is well spoken of.

The court held a number of sittings—I do not know the number of witnesses, but it was a very large number.

I am now in a position to tell the house of the circumstances surrounding this unfortunate accident which took place at Mount Bruno Rifle Ranges, Mount Bruno, Quebec, on July 6, 1944.

The proceedings of the court of inquiry have been received and perused. The information disclosed is substantially as follows:

On July 6, 1944, a detachment of the specialist company, Canadian infantry training centre at Farnham, province of Quebec, went from Farnham to Mount Bruno ranges to give a demonstration of mortar firing to personnel of Farnham at that time at the battle drill camp at Mount Bruno.

The demonstration was supervised by an experienced mortar officer and a staff sergeant who had had long experience in firing 3-inch mortar.

The crew were picked men from a group of twenty-seven who had recently completed a qualifying course.

The 3-inch mortar used for the demonstration had been inspected by technical personnel of the army on the evening of the previous day and found in a clean and serviceable condition. The evidence does not indicate any use of the mortar between the time of the inspection and the demonstration.

The ammunition (mortar bombs) had been drawn that morning from the stores of the training centre at Farnham and had been obtained previously through ordnance at Montreal. This ammunition had been inspected in May, 1944, and found serviceable.

At 11.20 a.m., a couple of hours before the actual demonstration, which took place at 1.45 p.m., a further check was made of the weapon and ammunition by the detachment commander of the gun crew and the members of the crew.

At the time set for the demonstration personnel under training at the battle drill camp, consisting of 105 all ranks, were paraded to the site of the 3-inch mortar and took up positions from twenty-five to thirty feet from the mortar. They were placed as a company, in threes, in a semi-circle to allow every man to see what was going on. Four bombs were fired successfully; No. 2 of the gun crew was then seen placing the fifth bomb in the barrel of the mortar, whereupon a terrific explosion was heard and a large red flash was seen as well as black smoke at the site of the gun position. The gun crew were killed outright and a number of those watching the demonstration were wounded.

Medical assistance, both military and civilian, was immediately requested by telephone, and a Roman Catholic chaplain from the St. Hubert airport was called. There was a qualified medical orderly with a first aid kit on duty with the troops. Unfortunately he was one of those injured.

In the meantime all able personnel of all ranks administered first aid to the injured and field and shell dressings carried by all of the men as a part of their personal equipment were used in addition to medical supplies furnished by the range caretaker. The court in its finding commended all ranks for their coolheadedness and intelligent care of the wounded.

Two civilian doctors were on the scene of the accident within twenty minutes after the explosion but because of the adequate first aid already given found that only the administering of sedatives was required.

I think I saw at one place where they had readjusted some temporary bandages as well. I do not wish to be tied down to that, but I believe I did see that—that they had rearranged the bandages. Ten minutes later the parish priest of Mount Bruno arrived with a Cistercian Father and administered religious rites to the dying. Ambulances and army medical personnel arrived about forty-five minutes after the blast, and the wounded were driven to various hospitals in Montreal immediately thereafter.

I very much regret to report that the casualty list at present is: 7 killed; 5 died of wounds; one critically injured; 16 severely injured, and 16 injured. One civilian, the caretaker, was injured.

The evidence establishes that the explosion took place in the base of the mortar, and the court so found.

It was impossible to establish conclusively from the few fragments of the bomb which were found that the bomb which exploded was defective. However the evidence indicates that the explosion was not due to any defect in the mortar itself or to improper technique on the part of the crew in loading the mortar. The elimination of these two possible causes of the explosion supports the explanation that the cause was a defective bomb and the court so found.

All ammunition of this batch is impounded and will be returned for examination by X-ray.

That is the very terse report on the situation. It is all I am able to report at this time, with this addition, that I do wish to express my most profound regrets for the accident, and my deep sympathy to the bereaved families of the victims of this most unfortunate episode.

I can say to the house that as soon as this ammunition is X-rayed, if we find there is anything wrong with it I shall make a further report. As I understand it, this is ammunition of a certain fuse series, and that is all being taken and being retested.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since the war started have there been any similar incidents or accidents of this kind?

Mr. RALSTON: I can only say to my hon. friend that I cannot remember any—grenades, sometimes, but not bomb mortars.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—INDUSTRIAL CAFETERIAS

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Has the government, through its Department of Munitions and Supply, entered the food and cafeteria business?

2. If so, did the Department of Munitions and Supply set up or cause to be set up through one of its crown companies an organization known as Industrial Cafeterias?

3. When was this organization or company set up?

4. Was it set up under the direction or through the efforts of Wartime Housing Limited, a crown company operating under the Department of Munitions and Supply?

5. What was the name of the general manager in the first instance, and the salary paid him?

6. Did he at the same time receive a salary from the government for any other service?

7. What are the names of the personnel of the executive of this food and cafeteria company, and the salaries paid them?

8. What qualifications are needed to fill such position?

9. Have the cafeterias been set up both in wartime housing hostels and staff houses, and in manufacturing plants and certain wartime industries?

10. What are the names and locations of the various places that they have operated or still may be operating?

11. What is the total cost to the government to date for this organization, and what is the total investment of same?

12. If there has been any change in management, what is the name of present manager and salary paid him?

13. Does he receive a salary for any other government service?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.

2. No. The department did not set up or cause to be set up an organization known as Industrial Cafeterias. Under the authority of M & S C.L. 773 dated December 29, 1942, a cafeteria committee of four members was set up under the chairmanship of Mr. V. T. Goggin, the then general manager of Wartime Housing Limited. The responsibility of this committee was as follows: (a) To review the operating agreements or arrangements and survey the actual operations of all existing cafeterias in crown companies and in plants carrying out contracts for this department on a management-fee, ceiling price or cost plus basis, or on any other basis under which any operating loss which might be incurred in respect of the cafeteria would be for the account of the crown, and to make such recommendations to the minister with respect to the foregoing matters as may seem to them desirable. (b) To receive and consider, and either reject or recommend to the production board of the department any and all applications concerning the setting up of additional cafeterias, or the expansion of existing facilities at the direct expense of the crown via "capital assistance" or indirectly at the crown's expense via the "certificate of necessity" and "special depreciation" route.

3. There was no organization or company set up by the department. See reply to question 2.

4. See reply to question 2. The committee was set up by and is responsible to the minister.

5. There was no general manager of the cafeteria committee. The chairman of the committee when first set up was Mr. Victor T. Goggin, managing director of Wartime Housing Limited, who received no extra salary or remuneration by virtue of such chairmanship.

6. Mr. Goggin was paid a salary as managing director of Wartime Housing Limited. He was paid no salary as chairman of the cafeteria committee.

7. Chairman of the cafeteria committee: Lt.-Col. E. E. Williams, salary $4,200 per annum. Members: Mr. H. R. Hinman, President of Bowles Lunch Ltd. Mr. Hinman serves without salary and has no direct or indirect government contract. Mr. A. E. McMaster, Department of Munitions and Supply liaison officer with the Department of Labour. He receives no salary as a cafeteria committee member. In addition to the above the committee employs a stenographer and two full-time cafeteria advisers who had considerable experience in the food service prior to their employment by the cafeteria committee. Their services are always available to the department's contractors or subcontractors.

8. See answer to question 7.

9. Wartime housing hostels and staff houses do not come under the cafeteria committee's directive. Only prime and/or subcontractors carrying out contracts for the department on a cost plus or ceiling price basis where cafeteria and canteen losses, if any, are chargeable to the crown account come within the purview of the cafeteria committee.

10. The names and locations of the various firms under contract to the government operating cafeteria and canteen service for their employees, coming under the direction of the cafeteria committee, are as follows:

1. Acadia Construction Co. Ltd., Bridgewater, N.S.
2. Accessories Manufacturers Limited, St. James St., Montreal, P.Q.
3. Addison Industries Limited, Toronto, Ont.
4. Aircraft Repair Limited, Edmonton, Alberta.
5. Alberta Nitrogen Products Ltd., Calgary, Alberta.
6. Algoma Steel Corporation, Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.
7. Aircraft Hydraulic Supplies Ltd., Windsor, Ont.
8. Allanson Armature Mfg. Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ont.
9. Amalgamated Electric Corporation Limited, Toronto, Ont.
10. Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Mills Limited, Quebec, P.Q.
11. Armstrong Brothers, Victoria, B.C.
12. Babcock-Wilcox and Goldie-McCulloch, Limited, Galt, Ont.
13. Boeing Aircraft of Canada Limited, Vancouver, B.C.
14. Bata Shoe Co. of Canada Ltd., Batawa, Ont.
15. W. D. Beath and Sons Limited, Toronto, Ont.
16. Beatty Brothers Limited, Fergus, Ont.
17. Belding-Corticelli Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
18. Bendix-Eclipse of Canada Ltd., Windsor, Ont.
19. Bloctube Controls of Canada Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
20. Border Cities Industries Ltd., Walkerville, Ont.

21. Boyles Bros. Drilling Co. Ltd., Vancouver, B.C.
22. Britannia Mining & Smelting Co. Limited, Britannia Beach, B.C.
23. Burlec Ltd., Scarboro Junction, Ont.
24. Burrard (Vancouver) Dry Dock Co. Limited, Vancouver, B.C.
25. Burrard Dry Dock Co. Ltd., North Vancouver, B.C.
26. Canadian Car Munitions Limited, Cherrier, P.Q.
27. Canada Strip Mills, Montreal East, P.Q.
28. The Canadian Bridge Co. Ltd., Walkerville, Ont.
29. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Amherst, N.S.
30. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
31. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Fort William, Ont.
32. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Longue Pointe, Montreal, P.Q.
33. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Propeller Plant, Montreal, P.Q.
34. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Pointe St. Charles, Montreal, P.Q.
35. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Turcot Aircraft, Montreal, P.Q.
36. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Turcot Car, Montreal, P.Q.
37. Canadian General Electric Co. Limited, Toronto, Ont.
38. Canadian General Electric Co. Limited, Carboloy Works, Toronto, Ont.
39. Canadian General Electric Co. Limited, Davenport Works, Toronto, Ont.
40. Canadian General Electric Co. Limited, Wallace Ave., Toronto, Ont.
41. Canadian Kodak Co. Limited, Toronto, Ont.
42. Canadian Marconi Co. Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
43. Canadian Pacific Airlines Limited, New Westminster, B.C.
44. Canadian Propellers Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
45. Canadian Vickers Limited, Aircraft Division, Montreal, P.Q.
46. Canadian Wright Limited (British Aeroplane Engines Ltd.), Vancouver, B.C.
47. Canadian Wright Limited (British Aeroplane Engines Ltd.), Montreal, P.Q.
48. Central Aircraft Limited, London, Ont.
49. Clark-Ruse Aircraft Limited, Dartmouth, N.S.
50. Clark-Ruse Aircraft Limited, Moncton, N.B.
51. Clare Shipbuilding Co. Limited, Meteghan, N.S.
52. Cockshutt Plow Co. Limited, Brantford, Ont.
53. Connaught Laboratories Ltd., University of Toronto, Toronto, Ont.
54. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Co. Limited, Trail, B.C.
55. Crouse-Hinds Co. of Canada Ltd., Toronto, Ont.
56. Defence Industries Ltd., Cherrier, P.Q.
57. Defence Industries Ltd., DeSalaberry, P.Q.
58. Defence Industries Ltd., Pickering, Ont.
59. Defence Industries Ltd., Montreal Works, Montreal, P.Q.
60. Defence Industries Ltd., Verdun Works, Montreal, P.Q.
61. Defence Industries Ltd., Villeray Works, Montreal, P.Q.
62. Defence Industries Ltd., Westmount, P.Q.
63. DeHavilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd., Toronto, Ont.
64. Dominion Bridge Ct. Ltd., Burnaby, B.C.
65. Dominion Bridge Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ont.
66. Dominion Chain Co. Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.
67. Dominion Engineering Works, Longueuil, P.Q.
68. Dominion Magnesium Limited, Haley, Ont.
69. Dominion Oilcloth and Linoleum Co. Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
70. Dominion Rubber Co. Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
71. Dominion Rubber Munitions Ltd., Cap de la Madeleine, P.Q.
72. Engineering Products of Canada Limited, Montreal East, P.Q.
73. Fairchild Aircraft Limited, Longueuil, P.Q.
74. Fairchild Aircraft Limited, St. Hubert, P.Q.
75. Ferranti Electric Co. Limited, Mount Dennis, Toronto, Ont.
76. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. Limited, Hamilton, Ont.
77. Fleet Aircraft Limited, Fort Erie, Ont.
78. Flexible Shaft Co. Limited, Toronto, Ont.
79. General Engineering Co. (Canada) Limited, Toronto, Ont.
80. Genelco Limited, Peterborough, Ont.
81. General Motors Limited, Oshawa, Ont.
82. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of Canada Limited, New Toronto, Ont.
83. Holman Machines Limited, Woodstock, Ont.
84. John Inglis Co. Limited, Toronto, Ont.
85. International Business Machines Co. Limited, Toronto, Ont.

86. Industrial Shipping Co. Limited, Mahone Bay, N.S.
87. International Harvester Co. of Canada Limited, Hamilton, Ont.
88. Kroehler Manufacturing Co. Ltd., Stratford, Ont.
89. Massey-Harris Co. Limited, Weston, Ont.
90. Metal Stampings Limited, Toronto, Ont.
91. Robert Mitchell Co. Limited, Belair Ave. Plant, Montreal, P.Q.
92. Robert Mitchell Co. Limited, Cartridge Plant, Montreal, P.Q.
93. Robert Mitchell Co. Limited, Foundry Plant, Montreal, P.Q.
94. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
95. Moffatts Limited, Weston, Ont.
96. W. H. Meighan Ltd., St. Lambert, P.Q.
97. MacDonald Chemicals Limited, Waterloo, P.Q.
98. National Railways Munitions Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
99. Neon Products of Western Canada Limited, Vancouver, B.C.
100. Northern Electric Co. Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
101. Noorduyn Aviation Limited, Cartierville, P.Q.
102. Noorduyn Aviation Limited, Haig Ave., Montreal, P.Q.
103. Otaco Limited, Orillia, Ont.
104. Outboard Marine and Mfg. Co. of Canada Limited, Peterborough, Ont.
105. Parker Fountain Pen Co., Toronto, Ont.
106. Port Arthur Shipbuilding Co. Ltd., Port Arthur, Ont.
107. Prince Rupert Dry Dock and Shipyard Limited, Prince Rupert, B.C.
108. Reliance Industries Limited, Belleville, Ont.
109. Research Enterprises Limited, Leaside, Ont.
110. Rogers Radio Tubes Limited, Toronto, Ont.
111. Small Electric Motors (Canada) Ltd., Leaside, Ont.
112. Small Arms Limited, Long Branch, Ont.
113. Toronto Shipyards Co. Limited (Redfern Construction Co.) Toronto, Ont.
114. Toronto Shipyards Co. Limited (Canadian Comstock Co. Ltd.) Saint John, N.B.
115. United Shipyards Limited, Montreal, P.Q.
116. Victoria Machinery Depot Co., Victoria, B.C.
117. Victory Aircraft Limited, Toronto, Ont.
118. Vivian Diesels & Munitions Ltd., Vancouver, B.C.
119. Welland Chemical Works Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.
120. West Coast Shipbuilding Ltd., Vancouver, B.C.
121. The Wilson Motor Bodies Limited, Toronto, Ont.

11. $12,624.96. This includes salaries, travelling expenses, office supplies and other expense. There is no other government "investment" in the cafeteria committee.

12. There is no manager of the cafeteria committee. Lt.-Col. E. E. Williams is the chairman of the cafeteria committee and succeeded Mr. Victor T. Goggin, who relinquished the chairmanship of the committee with effect from the 9th of March, 1944.

13. No.

HOME DEFENCE ARMY—TRADE COURSES AND PAY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men in the home defence army are in receipt of trades pay in addition to their ordinary pay?
2. How many have been given trade courses?
3. How many are non-commissioned officers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. Information is not available at National Headquarters as to the number of N.R.M.A. personnel receiving trades pay nor as to the number who have been given trades courses.

As at June 7, 1944, the number of N.R.M.A. qualified tradesmen exclusive of those on long term leave was 9,698.

3. Exclusive of those on long term leave the number of N.R.M.A. personnel who were confirmed or acting N.C.O.'s. of the rank of corporal and above as at June 7, 1944, was 3,353.

PRISONERS OF WAR—MERCHANT SEAMEN—INCOME TAX

Mr. ISNOR:

Are Canadian merchant seamen held as prisoners of war liable to, (a) national defence tax arrears; (b) income tax?

Mr. GIBSON: (a) Yes; (b) yes.

ARMY TECHNICAL DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What is the personnel of the army technical development board?
2. What remuneration is paid to each of the members of this board for their services in connection therewith?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. The members of the board are as follows:—

Major-General J. V. Young (M.G.O.), C.B.E. (Chairman).

Major James E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C. (Director General).

Brigadier G. P. Morrison (D.M.G.O.), C.B.E. (Deputy Chairman).

H. J. Carmichael, Esq., Department of Munitions and Supply. (Coordination of Production).

R. E. Jamieson, Esq., Department of Munitions and Supply. (Director General, Army Engineering and Design Branch).

C. J. MacKenzie, Esq.—Acting President, National Research Council.

2. None of the members of the army technical development board receive any remuneration whatsoever for their services as members of the board.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ASSISTANCE TO COAL COMPANIES

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Has any amount of money been paid by way of subsidy or other assistance, for the period from January, 1943, to June 30, 1944, to (a) Acadia Coal Company, of Nova Scotia; (b) Minto Coal Company, New Brunswick; (c) Welton Coal Company, New Brunswick; (d) Gerald King Coal Company, New Brunswick?

2. If so, how much to each of the above-mentioned companies?

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION OR ANNUITY

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide that a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior court, county court or the circuit court of the district of Montreal, may elect, in lieu of a pension or annuity as presently authorized under the said act, to divide his annuity so that his wife will receive an annuity equal to one-third thereof, and that if he should die in office his widow will receive an annuity equal to two-ninths or one-ninth, in certain cases, of his salary.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FOUR-POWER CONFERENCE

PROPOSED MEETING AT WASHINGTON TO CONSIDER PLAN OF WORLD SECURITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister rising out of a report in the press with respect to a forthcoming united nations meeting scheduled to take place, I presume, some time in August. Will the British commonwealth and empire have representation at this meeting?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is no meeting of united nations scheduled to take place. What the hon. leader of the opposition evidently refers to is a meeting of the four great powers, to take place at Washington, in accordance with what was forecast in the Moscow declaration. The purpose of the meeting is that these four powers may consider the development of a general plan of world security. There will be only the four powers at the meeting.

Mr. GRAYDON: When the Prime Minister refers to the four powers, do I understand that the British commonwealth is included in those powers, or is it just the United Kingdom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The four powers are the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPORTS OF KILLING OF ALLIED PRISONERS IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Sir James Grigg, the war secretary, is reported to have stated in the British House of Commons on Tuesday that German captors had shot thirty-three more allied prisoners of war. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister to inform the house whether or not any Canadians were included in this latest nazi crime, and if so, what steps the government is taking in connection with the matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government has no information at the present time with respect to Canadians. The matter is being inquired into.

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the leader of the opposition asked me a question a moment ago in connection with the statement made by Sir James Grigg in the British house on Tuesday I had in mind some statement that Sir James Grigg may have made in reference to a recent matter. It may be and it probably is the fact that the question my hon. friend asked refers to some matter that has been or is being inquired into very carefully. I am not in position to give information at the moment but I hope to be able to do this a little later on.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that my question was founded upon a press report emanating from London, I think on Tuesday, and which purported to describe a debate which had taken place in the House of Commons or at least some statement that the ministry had given. These thirty-three additional allied prisoners of war which are alleged to have been shot were not included in the forty-seven which were previously the subject of discussion both in this and the British House of Commons. I understand that this is a new incident and perhaps this will indicate to the Prime Minister exactly the situation as I understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have to look carefully into Sir James Grigg's statement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA COAL MINING INDUSTRY—JOINT PRODUCTION COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. Recently two members of the industrial cooperation board, Messrs Carl Goldenberg and M. M. Maclean, visited Nova Scotia to obtain first-hand information of the disabilities affecting the mining industry, and also for the purpose of setting up industrial production committees. Is the parliamentary assistant in position to report to the house as to the success or otherwise of that visit?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice yesterday of his question, and in reply I wish to say that in May and June, 1944, the industrial production cooperation board concluded agreements between the coal operators of Nova Scotia and district number 26 of the united mine workers of America for the formation of joint labour-management production committees in each mine and for the purpose of discussing all possibilities of improving and increasing coal production.

Following these agreements, Mr. H. Carl Goldenberg, chairman of the board, summoned a conference of the coal operators and of the miners to be held in Sydney, Nova Scotia, on July 12 and 13, with a view to inaugurating the joint production committee and to discuss all aspects of the problems responsible for the decline in coal output, as well as possible means of increasing output.

Mr. Goldenberg and Mr. M. M. Maclean, a member of the board, proceeded to Sydney for these conferences. The conferences were attended by a large representation of both operators and miners. The conferences were marked by a full and frank discussion of the problems facing both operators and miners in the Nova Scotia coal mining industry. The discussions led to a clarification of a number of issues, and to a better understanding of mutual grievances.

The principal agreement reached at the conference was that both operators and miners undertook immediately to consider all causes, such as absenteeism, presently interfering with maximum coal production, at meetings of the joint production committees, the first of the series being held on Monday of this week, July 17. It was further agreed that meetings of these committees are to be held twice every month at each mine, and that the operators and the miners would submit for consideration to each meeting problems affecting coal production as each side sees them, together with recommendations for solutions or improvements. Each side also undertook to give immediate consideration to all recommendations, the operators to put such recommendations as are acceptable and feasible into effect as soon as possible, and the union to urge its members to act accordingly. Reports of these meetings and of the progress made are to be submitted regularly to the industrial production cooperation board, which will continue to assist in the operations of the committee in so far as is necessary.

The conference also discussed the recent closing down on Saturday morning of the two mines, number 4 and 11. The company advised that it was considering reopening these mines on Saturdays if the rate of absenteeism was reduced. Before the termination of the meetings the miners were advised by the Dominion Coal company that these two mines would be open on Saturday, July 15, and on that day they were open for work.

It is anticipated as a result of these conferences, and more particularly of the functioning of the joint production committee, that coal production problems will receive more immediate, more careful and more serious consideration. They will be considered both at the level of the mine production committee and of the district production committee, the latter covering a number of mines. If both parties show the good will and cooperation which they showed at the conferences attended by Messrs. Goldenberg and MacLean, there should be an improvement in the coal situation. The industrial production cooperation board now has this matter in hand, and will follow up on the conferences as the situation requires it.

I may say the conferences in Nova Scotia are in accordance with the policy laid down by the government sponsoring the formation of labour-management production committees in industry. A large number of these committees are now functioning across Canada, and the staff of the industrial production cooperation board is constantly engaged in setting up more of these committees. Not only in the coal mines, but in all industry, joint production committees should constitute effective machinery for the discussion and solution of production problems by labour and management on a democratic basis.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to thank the parliamentary assistant for the very comprehensive reply he has given, and I also want to compliment the department for the realistic action they are taking at the present time in connection with this matter.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD—APPLICATION OF STANDARD RAILWAY LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. Will he tell the house when an announcement may be expected from the national war labour board regarding the case of the standard railway labour organizations whose application went to the board in September, 1943, and who were heard by the board in May, 1944?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. gentleman gave me notice of his question. While it is not possible to give the hon. member any specific date on which the decision of the national war labour board on this case will be made known, I can assure the hon. member that the national war labour board has this matter under active consideration. I should like to say further that this is a complex case involving detailed and careful analyses of wage rates and related matters. I should like to point out that the delay which is apparent in the date cited by the hon. member in his question has arisen from two factors. In the first place, a large amount of time was consumed by the applicants and respondents in the preparation of their extensive briefs following their application to the board in September, 1943. In the second place, extensive analyses have been necessary since the board heard the application in May of this year, which hearing followed promptly upon the receipt of all necessary briefs.

The board has the matter in hand and hopes to give its decision as soon as possible.

PACIFIC CONFERENCE

REPORT AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER FRASER RESPECTING MEETING IN NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I regret I have not sent him previous notice of this question, but I believe it is of such a nature that the answer will not require any preparation. It was announced over the radio last night that Prime Minister Fraser had said that a conference would be held in the Pacific between the United States, Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain to consider the best method of prosecuting the war in the Pacific. Will Canada be represented at that conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When the Prime Minister of New Zealand spoke in this chamber he intimated that he hoped that such a meeting would be held in New Zealand, but he was unable to say at that time whether or not it would be held. I have no information beyond what my hon. friend has had over the radio with respect to the possibility of the meeting taking place. I assume that what the Prime Minister of New Zealand said in New Zealand was similar to what he said here. I think I would have heard if there had been any definite decision with respect to the time of a meeting.

QUEBEC ELECTION

REPORTED STATEMENT OF JACQUES SAURIOL IN MONTREAL ON JULY 9

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made by Jacques Sauriol at a public meeting in Montreal on July 9 last that the English soldier is, "the rottenest of the earth and it is necessary for Canadians to fight England's battles and be killed instead of the English in the Caen inferno" and that "we will use every means—and I do not say legitimate—we will use every means necessary to halt this drainage of our young toward the charnel house of Europe," I ask the minister if Jacques Sauriol remains at large, free to campaign against the nation's war effort? If so, will the minister say what steps he has taken or proposes to take in the circumstances? This is a clear violation of the defence of Canada regulations.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I was not aware that the hon. member was present at the meeting and can testify as to the accuracy of the newspaper report of what took place in Montreal. I saw the report when it was published in a newspaper, but feeling that a newspaper report was not evidence upon which any action could be founded I immediately instructed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to make an investigation to ascertain whether or not evidence of the statements attributed to Jacques Sauriol in the report could be adduced. I returned to Ottawa last night from an international conference. Prior to my departure on Saturday I had not had a report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police beyond the preliminary report that the matter was being investigated. Since my return I have not had an opportunity to confer with the deputy commissioner to see if evidence has been found of the accuracy of this report, but I expect as soon as I have a few spare moments to get a further report from the deputy commissioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if it is correct will you lock the man up?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should answer that question here. If the report is correct, the seriousness of the situation will have to be considered and appropriate action will have to be taken.

Mr. BRUCE: May I remind the minister that this statement is very similar to the nazi propaganda broadcast in English from Berlin to Canadian listeners.

Mr. CHURCH: Am I to understand that the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations and of the mobilization act have been suspended during the holding of provincial elections in the various provinces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it is necessary for me to say that they have not been, to my knowledge.

Mr. CHURCH: Then why are they not enforced?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of what my hon. friend has said? On Tuesday I put a question to the minister but I found that he had been away on official business, as he has said today. I do no more than bring to his attention the question I then asked with respect to certain remarks made by a candidate in the Quebec provincial election, and ask for an investigation by the Minister of Justice. At the same time the minister might also look into an incident which occurred in Lethbridge during another provincial election where some people took the law into their own hands. We ought to have fairness in these matters, and perhaps an investigation can be made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into that incident.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that it would not be appropriate to remind hon. members that the administration of justice and peace and order in ordinary circumstances are the responsibility of the provincial authorities. If I were to attempt to have investigated by a dominion agency every brawl which may occur, I would be very soon charged with meddling with affairs that are no concern of mine.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the minister that I suggested the Royal Canadian Mounted Police make the investigation because they would be a neutral body.

Mr. SPEAKER: The questions that are being asked to-day are far beyond what questions should be on the orders of the day. They must be with respect to matters that are urgent.

DIAMONDS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD RULING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I am particularly interested in preventing inflation and in keeping down the cost of living, and I think this matter has a bearing on the cost of living. According to release 0907 of the wartime prices and trade board, under date of July 20, owing to the fact that importers are having a great deal of difficulty in transacting business in diamonds, the board have under this date authorized a mark-up of from fifteen to twenty per cent in the price of the larger diamonds. Is this action of the board to prevent inflation, or to keep the cost of living down?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Is the hon. gentleman referring to strawberries or diamonds?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Diamonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will make inquiry.

FARM MACHINERY

NEW PRICES ON REPAIR PARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, notice of which was sent to his office yesterday. Is the report correct that the wartime prices and trade board has set September 30 as the date when the new prices on repair parts for farm machinery are to go into effect? I wish to draw to the minister's attention the fact that this year more than ever before will the farmers have to buy enormous quantities of repair parts.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question has been asked.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member gave notice of his question which reached my office yesterday but I would ask him to allow me another day in which to get full information in regard to the situation which he has in mind. I will give him an answer to-morrow.

CIVIL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION OF SUPERANNUATION TO PRINTING BUREAU EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State or to the Minister of Finance. I ask it on behalf of a group of employees who play a very important part in the life of this parliament, although behind the scenes. I refer to the employees in the printing and mechanical departments of the government printing bureau. My question is this: In view of the announcement which was confirmed on Tuesday that an amendment will be introduced to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, is consideration being given to including within the act these employees of the printing bureau?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question for the order paper.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is on resolution 2 of the succession duty act.

2. That when a person is given a general power of appointment or disposal over property, such property be subject to duty as if it were given directly to him, and, upon his death, the person then benefiting be regarded as his successor for purposes of taxation.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I desire to go to the banking committee very shortly and I should like to make one or two inquiries now with respect to this resolution.

Last night brief consideration was given to this resolution and a case was cited by the hon. member for York West of what amounted to confiscation by the action of the succession duty acts in the various provinces. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Saskatoon City the parliamentary assistant stated yesterday that the present resolution was to cover a technical omission from the act; that it was to take care of the case where a general power of appointment is given and the man does nothing about it. That of course is not quite apparent from the terms of the resolution itself, and I was fearful that the result of the change would be two taxes on the same set of funds. I think the resolution is open to that interpretation. Those of us who are lawyers and accustomed to draft wills know that it is a common thing for a testator to give to a person a general power of appointment or disposal over property, whether that person takes anything out of the fund or not. Frequently the person to whom the power is given is also the recipient in his lifetime of income under the fund, and in such cases, I assume, his interest in the fund is taxable, having regard to the expectation of his life, and so on. A general power of appointment is given. But I have never seen a case where, in a testamentary disposition, the testator failed to give an alternative if the person in whom the power of appointment is vested fails to act. Usually there is an alternative. In my own practice I have invariably made it a rule to advise my clients that when the power of appointment is given to a particular person to dispose of a fund, on his death or at any intervening period, if he fails to act, the testator himself or herself in the will should proceed to make the disposition.

If I understand correctly the object of this resolution it is that if a person is given a general power of appointment or disposal, such property shall be subject to duty as if given directly to him; then upon his death, "the person then benefiting" will "be regarded as his successor for purposes of taxation." If that means anything it means two taxes on the same fund. There can be no question about it. I think that is wrong and unjust and should not become effective. I see the commissioner shaking his head, but I entirely disagree with that form of denial. That is what this means. It may be that that is not the intention, but it ought to be made absolutely clear either that it is or is not the intention of this resolution, so that the public will know just where it stands. To-day such a fund is in effect liable only to one tax. That tax may be divisible, if I may use that term. If the person to whom a power of appointment is given takes any interest out of the fund, his interest in the fund is taxed, if I apprehend the law correctly, and the balance is taxable in the hands of the party to whom it is disposed. Now, what is the position and what is the intention under this act?—because as it stands to-day this fund is going to be taxed twice. Parliament ought to understand what the intention is, and so far as I am concerned I would oppose it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I speak on this with some diffidence because I do not practise law in a common-law province and I am not so familiar with this general power of appointment, although we have a similar provision in Quebec. I am advised it is not the intention of this section that there should be a double tax imposed. If property is conveyed under a general power of appointment with power to the person to whom it is conveyed to appoint himself, then there is a tax. Of course if he appoints himself and if the property is still in existence at the time of his death it would vest in his heirs and be subject to tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is a very unusual case.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a very unusual case, but this is intended to prevent that. The form of the act, as my hon. friend knows, defines under section 3 what is a succession; and in the dominion act we have rather followed the practice in the various provinces of an elaborate definition, if you will, of what is included in a succession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that you do not want to leave anything out?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite so, and also partly because of certain decisions of the privy council with respect to the constitutional powers of the provinces to tax. Section 3, subsection 1, sets out what a succession shall be deemed to include, and it includes a long list of various things,—property taken as a donatio mortis causa, and so on. Coming to paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 3 there is included in the definition or description of a succession——property of which the person dying was at the time of his death competent to dispose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a common provision.

Mr. ABBOTT: If property is left to one person with power of appointment and if it is not exercised, then on his death, to a designated person: I think that is a common type of power of appointment. But if the power to appoint were general without a designated person to take the property, in the event of failure to exercise such power, and the power was not exercised, I am advised that as the section now stands the property may pass on the death and not be subject to tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on the death of the testator?

Mr. ABBOTT: Correct—on the death of the first testator.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ultimately it must pass to somebody.

Mr. ABBOTT: And the amendment is to make certain that the property passing on death even in the circumstances outlined would be taxable. It is pretty technical to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us understand this, because it is perpetuating what they have in New Brunswick—or so I am informed; I have not the statute before me—and it is something I have never ceased to protest against. There is a double tax down there under these conditions; at least my colleague the hon. member for St. John-Albert tells me that is so and I take his word for it. That just means this, that on the death of the testator the whole fund pays the tax, under the present proposal, irrespective of to whom it may pass. It is a particular kind of fund which is not disposed of by the testator except in certain contingencies. Then, if the person to whom the power of appointment is given—if I understand the position correctly; I am rather feeling my way along—fails to make operative the power which is vested in him by the testamentary instrument, and no alternative has been provided in the testamentary instrument, another tax is imposed. Is that the position?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When it vests in a third person. That is the position.

Mr. ABBOTT: There would really be another transmission under these circumstances which would not have flowed from the direction of the original testator.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, I think, clarifies what is intended, although it is somewhat involved. Now, if the testator has a fund over which he gives a power of appointment to, say, the husband—most frequently I think it happens in the case of a wife or a husband having a fund for the benefit of children, and they do not like to designate the whole of them, or they want to keep them on good behaviour—that has been my experience—it goes to the one most worthy and perhaps cuts out somebody who is unworthy, if the testator makes an alternative disposition; in the event of failure of the appointee then there is not a second tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is not a second tax. I hope I am right about that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am certain about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, of course, what people should do is to look at their wills. Now I understand the proposal. It is based on this theory that there are two successions; is that the idea?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Based on the theory of two successions?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think this discussion has been useful. Perhaps the committee would defer further discussion until we have the bill before us and the exact text of the proposed amendment which will fit in with the section of the act which it is intended to amend. When the bill is in committee the succession duty experts of the committee who are familiar with this branch of the law could carefully scrutinize it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the parliamentary assistant that it would be very much better if we had the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be easier for us to discuss it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I understand the principle.

Mr. HAZEN: If a man by his will leaves his property to his wife for life with the power of appointment, and, failing to exercise that power, then to his children share and share alike, when the testator dies is there a tax imposed on his widow on the full value of his estate?

Mr. ABBOTT: The position there is, of course, on the death of the testator the wife pays tax on her life interest.

Mr. HAZEN: That is what I want to understand clearly. Does she pay on her life interest or does she have to pay on the full value of the estate?

Mr. ABBOTT: She pays on her life interest in the estate, and in Quebec—I do not know about the dominion—it is based on her life expectancy. As to the subsequent transmission to the children, that, of course, was not in virtue of any general power of appointment given to the widow, but was provided for by the testator himself, and on her death this proposed amendment would have no relation to that situation whatsoever.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know; there is a power of appointment there.

Mr. ABBOTT: But not a general power of appointment. The power of appointment, as my hon. friend will see when the legislation is brought down, is power of appointment where an absolute discretion is given to the testator and no provision made as to whom the property should go in the event of his failing to exercise that power.

Mr. HAZEN: The resolution reads:

> When a person is given a general power of appointment or disposal over property, such property be subject to duty as if it were given directly to him. . . .

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution may not be very happily framed. I have tried to make clear that what he appears to fear is not the intention of the resolution. The bill will be drafted—drafting may be almost complete now—along those lines. I suggested a moment ago in the discussion with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that perhaps we could make the criticism a little more effective if we deferred it until we had reached the sections of the bill in committee. I do not want to force that view on the committee, but I should prefer to discuss it with the section before me.

Mr. BENCE: I quite agree with the parliamentary assistant, but I wish to make this point clear. Where the property is given with a general power of appointment, no restrictions—

Mr. ABBOTT: And no alternative in the event of the power not being exercised.

Mr. BENCE: In the power of appointment he may express certain wishes in the will. And as I understand it from the way this is worded the estate is immediately taxed on the whole value.

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. BENCE: If he exercises the general power of appointment then the whole estate is taxed again upon his death?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. BENCE: I want to make that point clear. It would be a very foolish thing for a lawyer ever to draw a will along those lines.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is tantamount to making an open bequest; it is an outright gift to the beneficiary.

Mr. BENCE: I do not understand how the succession duty department loses out on the provisions of the law as they were before. If they fail to make the appointment I presume the estate would fall back into the residue of the original testator.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a very technical amendment. It could be urged that because he failed to exercise this general power of appointment there was no succession or transmission. It is very technical, if you will; I am not sure that I completely understand it myself, but that is the reason I am given for the amendment.

Resolution agreed to.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, and to provide:

1. That sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the said act and schedule one thereto, which prohibit the importation of specified goods from countries outside the sterling area, be repealed.

