House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, June 28, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

REPLY OF HIS MAJESTY TO RESOLUTION EXTENDING GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES

Mr. SPEAKER: If the house will please rise, I have a communication from His Majesty the King:

Buckingham Palace
21st June, 1944.

Dear Mr. Speaker,

The King has received from the Governor General the address adopted by the House of Commons of Canada on June 8.

His Majesty greatly appreciates this expression of the loyal good wishes of the members of the house on the occasion of the official celebration of his birthday in Canada and commands me to ask you to convey to them his sincere thanks for their kindly sentiments towards himself.

Yours sincerely,
A. Lascelles.

The Speaker,
House of Commons of Canada.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS—THEFT FROM POST OFFICE—FRAUD IN SALES OF MILITARY STORES—APPEALS FROM SUMMARY CONVICTIONS IN QUEBEC

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 139, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill, which has to do with a number of amendments to the criminal code, an opportunity is given to make some reference to amendments to the criminal code and the necessity for such amendments being made at this time. Each session there is an annual piecemeal introduction of amendments to the criminal code, and the accumulation of these suggestions for amendments show the necessity for a complete revision of the Criminal Code of Canada at the earliest possible time, such revision to be based on the changing and changed conditions through which we have passed and on the changes which have taken place in public opinion since the last revision of the code, also by reason of the scientific advancements that have taken place since the time of Sir John Thompson, who in a revision some fifty years ago codified our criminal law.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for consideration by this house and by the Minister of Justice in particular of a revision of the criminal code in its entirety in order to bring it up to date and in order to remove the results of conflicting judicial interpretations which have been given on the various sections as well as anomalies that appear in many sections of the code.

All admit that the criminal code should be revised, and I rise for the purpose among other things of placing before the Minister of Justice the suggestion that there should be set up by parliament a committee composed of outstanding representatives of the law, and others, particularly of members of the bar, so that they may hear evidence from jurists, scientists, penal workers and psychiatrists to the end that there shall be a body of evidence available to enable the criminal code to be brought up to date.

Having regard to the fact that these amendments before us have to do with the revision of penalties I should like to suggest that something be done with regard to amending the criminal code in order to remove the situation that prevails to-day in that there is a mandatory penalty of death for all convicted of murder. That penalty has been changed in other parts of the empire. As a matter of fact —I am not at the moment entering into any discussion of the merits or demerits of capital punishment—in 1941 capital punishment was done away with in New Zealand, as was flogging and whipping as punishments for certain crimes. The trend recently has been to ameliorate the harshness of the criminal code, and I believe that provision should be made for the removal of the penalty of death so far as youths of eighteen years of age are concerned. In Great Britain that has been the law since the Children and Young Persons Act was amended in 1932 providing that the sentence of death shall not be pronounced or recorded against any person under the age of eighteen years. Only recently there was an example of the horror felt by the people as a whole when in the city of Montreal an outstanding jurist, following conviction by a jury, had to impose mandatory sentence of death upon a fifteen-year old boy. True enough, everybody realized that the sentence would not be carried out, and as a matter of fact, shortly after the trial of a confederate, the sentence was commuted, as has been the case for many years, because no person under the age of eighteen has been executed for murder, the sentence in every case having been commuted.

There is reason why these severe sentences should be removed from the code. As the Minister of Justice has stated, experience has shown that when mandatory sentences are out of line with what public opinion regards as proper in the particular case, justice is defeated; for juries, realizing that there is no other way, in many cases, to avoid the rigours of the law, bring in a verdict of "not guilty" or a verdict for a lesser offence. No matter what may be said in regard to the jury system, one salient fact stands out, namely, that throughout the years juries have been the protectors of the people against unfairness, harshness and the rigidity against change which have too often characterized law makers who are behind advancing public opinion.

I suggest too that provision should be made whereby the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada should be made available in criminal cases from the appeal court in the various provinces. One of these sections has to do with the matter of appeal, but it does not face the problem of the right of appeal on the part of the individual. Too often, as the law stands to-day, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, by a person in search of justice, is circumscribed within such narrow limits that many who would otherwise appeal are denied the opportunity to do so.

One of the important things in connection with the administration of the criminal law is that not only should a man receive justice but that he should believe that in fact he is receiving justice, and I believe that in that regard all possible injustice would be removed if the minister would consider the enlargement of these provisions.

I believe that in the administration of the criminal law we should seek not only to punish but to reform. As the law is to-day, any youth of sixteen or over who commits a serious offence is sentenced to a penal institution. We have no institutions similar to those in the United Kingdom. In that regard we are far behind in the administration of our penal system. Many of the outstanding recommendations, most, if not all of what the royal commission on penitentiaries recommended in 1937, remain recommendations that have not been carried into effect.

Mr. POULIOT: And rightly so. They have not been carried into effect and it was right not to carry them out.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a matter of opinion. I believe that the recommendations that had to do with the improvement of the administration of justice ought to have been carried into effect, and so far as youth is concerned, so far as first offenders are concerned, provision should be made whereby it would not be obligatory as it is to-day to put them among old offenders. A system similar to that in the United Kingdom under the Borstal method should be brought into being in this country.

There is one other suggestion I would bring to the attention of the minister. Only recently in Toronto a prisoner sentenced to the penitentiary was taken to the common gaol, and while there a homicide was committed, allegedly by him. I feel a change should be made in the law whereby, when a man is sentenced to penitentiary, he should be forthwith taken there, where measures of security are much greater than in many gaols. As the law is to-day, unless a prisoner signs a waiver of his right of appeal, he remains in the common gaol for a period of thirty days. That, I submit, should be done away with, and provision should be made whereby those in authority may send prisoners sentenced to penal institutions to the penitentiary pending the period during which the appeal should take place.

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the hon. member permit a question? That which is being suggested to the house would make it somewhat more difficult for the prisoner in case he desired to prosecute an appeal, would it not? I take it it is not the hon. member's intention to make appeals more difficult, but is it not a fact that sending the man to penitentiary would make the institution of appeal more difficult for him? How would the hon. member get around that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question is a perfectly proper one. I realize the difficulties of counsel communicating with his client in the penitentiary. One has to communicate with the Department of Justice in order to secure permission to do so. Apart from that, however, I see no difficulty in the way.

Mr. MAYBANK: Distance, as a rule.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. But arrangements could be made for appeal directly after the sentence, and in any event, so far as the matter of appeal is concerned, it could all be done through the medium of correspondence as grounds of appeal have to do with legal arguments respecting the charge in general and very seldom with regard to the quantum of evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot see the relevancy of the hon. member's remarks with regard to the question of appeal. His remarks are general with reference to the provisions of the criminal code and amendments that may be made thereto, but the house is considering specific amendments, and so far as I have followed the hon. gentleman to the present moment, he has not specifically referred to the matter before the house. Rather, he has suggested that there should be a general revision of the code. That may be in order somewhere else, but not at this moment. If the hon. member wishes to discuss the question of the relevancy of his remarks at this time I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I had in mind was this. This bill amends the criminal code. Sections 364 and 365 mean that there is going to be an amelioration in the rigour of mandatory sentences. I bring to the attention of the house other sections that should be dealt with with regard to amelioration of sentence to the end that the administration of justice may be as perfect as possible.

The question of an appeal is dealt with by an amendment to paragraph (b) of section 749. This paragraph provides that in the case of summary convictions in Quebec, appeals shall be made to the superior court. The principles laid down with regard to amelioration of the mandatory sentence and the matter of appeals should be applied to the general administration of justice, and provision should be made that in respect of youths under eighteen years of age the death sentence shall not be mandatory. I contend that the amendments contained in the bill cover only a small segment of the problem, and that appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is necessary in criminal cases to assure of a proper administration of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's argument is that the bill before the house deals with matters that are the subject of comment to the Minister of Justice, and that further reference should be made to them because they are now raised by this amendment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was dealing with the matter of appeals, and the question whether provision should be made to give the right of appeal even while a prisoner is in the penitentiary, and that he should not be kept in the common gaol pending the exercise of his right to appeal. In general these are the submissions I wish to place before the house. One of the amendments contained in this bill is designed to increase the penalty and another to reduce the penalty. Then a further amendment makes provision for the right of appeal in one province. The suggested amendments merely touch the fringe of the subject. Those amendments do not meet the great body of opinion all over this country that is to-day asking for amendments to the criminal code to the end that the attainment of justice will be made easier. Those expressions of opinion come from within the legal profession and outside of it.

In recent years we have gone a long way towards the denial of the elementary principles of the administration of criminal law in a large portion of the legislation that has become law since the beginning of the war. The accused is denied the benefit of reasonable doubt. Presumptions of guilt take its place when a person is charged under various war regulations. The accused is deemed to be guilty unless he proves to the contrary. These things are contrary to the direction which we have a right to ask for in the administration of the criminal law of the country.

In speaking to these suggested amendments I have referred to certain other matters which are much more important, as I see them, than those dealt with. Many others will occur to other hon. members on all sides of the house. If a committee of this parliament were set up to study this matter, in my opinion, it would go a long way towards the advancement of justice in this country and the improvement of our penal law.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this is the eighty-seventh day of the session. I contend that these amendments to the criminal code should have been brought down earlier in the session. As I said when this bill was being read the first time, and asked the minister a couple of questions which he did not answer, sections 1 and 2 of this bill affect the subject matter of what on the postmaster general's estimates I have had before this house for the last twenty years, namely, what shall be done with regard to the word "theft" in the criminal code and those employed by the Post Office—that great public utility that is operating in a most splendid manner for the people of Canada—and are charged with theft of letters. During the debate on the postmaster general's estimates last year I raised the same question, and he was kind enough to say he would deal with this question, when I raised it for the twentieth time. After conferring with the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) he brought in an amendment which I think will commend itself to all fair-minded people in this country. I appreciate what these great workers of all classes in the Post Office have been doing under an intolerable condition in winter and summer at low wages. Less than one-eighth of one per cent have failed thus in their duty, and juries failed often to convict when they knew the minimum penalty was three years. That minimum of three years is now eliminated.

When I was chairman of the board of police commissioners of Toronto I had complaints from magistrates, county court judges, high court judges and others regarding appeals in connection with those two sections. I believe in giving a magistrate, a judicial officer, the power to deal with them each as a special case, and allowing a minimum. It is a great improvement to do away altogether with the minimum three years.

Section 3 of this bill amends section 365 and increases the penalty from two to seven years. No doubt that is a wise proviso, but I think there should be some further investigation with regard to section 4 of the bill. This section deals with appeals from summary convictions in Quebec. A question arises as to whether or not there are too many judges in the province of Quebec and whether there are judges styled high court judges who are doing county court judges' work and getting the larger salaries and disbursements, and differently styled from judges in other provinces.

I have brought this matter up before. The organization of our courts is provincial. I contend that the amendment contained in section 4 of the bill may conflict with sections of the Judges Act. In amending the criminal code thus the house must read with it the Judges Act. The contention has been raised that there are certain judges in the two courts mentioned here, the Court of King's Bench crown side, and the superior court, who are doing work that in the other provinces is done by the county court judge.

My last objection to the bill is based on the fact that the principle of criminal code general amendments is also involved. It is bound up with the whole criminal code. It is very difficult to raise these matters in the house. You cannot deal with it when the minister's estimates are up. For many years I have had a bill on the order paper to amend the Judges Act. It deals with judges serving on commissions, and following privy council decisions. It should be considered in the proposed code amendments. I have had this bill up for some years but have not been able to get any consideration in war time. I point out that the various bar associations have also been making a number of recommendations to the present minister. I understand that this is his third year in office. He is a man who has a great reputation at the bar and is very much respected by the bar association of the country. I hope he will take up those other recommendations of the bar and include them in this measure. There are also many recommendations from the chief constables' association of Canada. That is a very important body. In war time every department of this government has increased its police duties, and they get nothing for it. This work has been forced on the municipalities and on the police systems of the country. For a number of years the chief constables' association has been making recommendations in connection with the administration of federal laws and the criminal code.

For some time I have been asking when an opportunity will be afforded to discuss the great number of people who are killed by motor cars. The sections of the code dealing with these matters should be brought up to date and a check made of this road slaughter. More lives are being lost and injuries caused through motor cars than the casualties in the last great war. The minister wrote me a letter saying the matter could be discussed on item No. 88 in his estimates, and that is what I propose to do, but little chance is afforded. As I said yesterday in connection with another bill, the minister should have added another section to the bill now under discussion which would permit charges of criminal negligence to be brought in such cases as the motor boat fatality at Port Stanley, in which seventeen people were drowned, and the recent fire in a Hamilton theatre, in which several lives were lost. I do hope the attorney general will consider that those guilty of offences in this regard be charged with criminal negligence by new clauses in the act. Further, I believe he should appoint a committee to bring the code up to date; a consolidation has long been overdue. As I have been saying for many years, the criminal code should be consolidated and revised. Many sections are obsolete and not now applicable. It cannot be done too soon, for if we wait until the war is over it will be too late.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I really should rise to a point of order. I want to suggest that the doubt which Your Honour expressed a few moments ago was fully justified. The discussion which may take place on the second reading of a bill is clearly defined by our rules, which say that on second reading only the general principle of the bill shall be discussed. If I remember aright, there are more than eleven hundred sections in the criminal code. The rules do not say that on a bill like this we can discuss the general principle of the criminal code; we can discuss only the principle of the bill itself, which contains only four sections. It says nothing whatever about the other matters that have been alluded to this afternoon. If we are to be at liberty, on a trivial bill of this nature, to discuss at any length any or all of the eleven hundred sections of the criminal code, it is no wonder the Prime Minister spoke of the possibility of our being here until Christmas. It has been the custom since I have been in this house to discuss nothing but the general principle of the bill before the house on the motion for second reading, not the general principle of some other bill. I have known of a man who wanted to introduce an amendment to an act which had been thrown open, as they say; so he stuck around until they came to section 600, let us say, in order to move his amendment to that section. I have never heard, however, that it would be in order to have an open debate upon every section of the bill. We could not have a better illustration than the bill now before us; the act being amended contains so many sections, with very great implications. We shall be here for much more than a week or two if each of us airs his views and perhaps justifiable grievances in regard to every remote section of the code. I suggest that we adhere to the rules and discuss only the general principle of the bill under consideration.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to make a few brief observations in respect of this bill, and I hope I will not displease the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) if I discuss the principles of the criminal code incidentally, in a most general way, while generally speaking confining myself to the principles of the bill.

There is a great deal in what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said with respect to the criminal code and its administration generally. I am not going into any of the particular topics to which he adverted, except to say that I support his contentions in every regard, with one exception. I think the criminal code should be overhauled. If my memory serves me aright it was in 1892 that the criminal law of Canada was codified. I had the honour to sit as a student under a very able man who did a great deal of work on the codification of the criminal law of Canada, the late Doctor Weldon, who lectured to us on crimes in the law school. His experience was of great benefit to us as students at law. The only point upon which I differ with the hon. member for Lake Centre is with respect to his suggestion that these unfortunate convicted men or women should be transferred immediately to the penitentiary.

Mr. NEILL: I repeat my point of order, which has not yet been decided. If it is to be generally understood that we can discuss every section of the criminal code under this bill, let us go to it. It will take a long time, and will be a precedent in the discussion of other bills. I just want the matter cleared up. If that is the ruling of the Chair and the judgment of this house, go to it; but don't kick later on when we come within sight of Christmas.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the hon. gentleman was raising a point of order. When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking I asked him to state in what way his remarks were relevant to this bill, and the hon. member said he was dealing with the sections of the bill and giving some instances in support of his argument. It may be that in giving those illustrations he was somewhat irrelevant as far as this bill is concerned, yet generally speaking he was confining himself to the sections of the code now being amended. I would ask all other hon. members to confine themselves to these amendments and their implications, supporting their remarks by whatever arguments they consider proper but keeping always within the amendments themselves. I rather think the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was proposing to deal with the matter in the same manner; at least I hope that was so, and that I will not have to call him to order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope there will be no occasion for Your Honour to call me to order. The weather to-day is too hot for me at least to engage in any great controversy. I just want to finish the statement I was making, and then I shall deal entirely with the principle of this bill. That is to say, I do not find myself in accord with the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake

Centre in respect to the thirty day interim period now provided by law. I imagine his suggestion was prompted by the fact that in some of the county gaols there has not been proper custody of these men, and an agitation has grown up to have them shipped off to the penitentiary at once. That argument, I think, does not carry very much weight, because I believe it would be a great inconvenience for counsel pending appeal if they did not have the opportunity of frequent consultation with their clients. Having said that, I am content.

I am interested in the proposal to amend sections 364 and 365 of the code, and I will tell the house why. It is a long time since I have had anything to do with the administration of criminal law, but twenty years ago I defended a young man who was charged with the theft of money from a post office. I found myself confronted with a problem, as to whether I should advise him to plead guilty or fight the case out. If I fought it out and he was found not guilty, of course he would be cleared; if he was proved guilty, however, he had to go to the penitentiary for three years, willy-nilly; nothing less, because there was no discretion.

Mr. MARTIN: Or a suspended sentence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so.

Mr. MARTIN: There is a judgment to that effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not believe there is the right to suspend sentence; the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will correct me if I am wrong. I remember discussing that case with the Postmaster General of the day, the late Hon. Charles Murphy, who was a good postmaster general, I should like to say in passing; who was himself an eminent lawyer, and who had a large experience in the practice of the criminal law of this country. I was unsuccessful in my defence of the case, with the result that the young lad, who had come from a good family, was sent to the penitentiary. Nothing could save him. After a time a remission was granted. I had something to do with getting the consent of the postmaster general of that day, as well as that of the then minister of justice, for the leniency shown by the crown in that connection.

At that time I discussed with Mr. Murphy the reasons for the apparent severity of the provisions of the criminal code against employees of the Post Office Department for stealing. In that instance it was a case of stealing money from a non-registered letter, then in the custody of the Post Office Department. While he paid great tribute to the honour and integrity of the postal service—and I join in paying the same tribute to that service, which handles millions of letters every year containing money, valuable securities, cash and specie—he pointed out that if there was the millionth case in which theft had been committed the penalty would be justified. He told me at that time that an expert sorting clerk could tell in a minute, simply from the feel of an envelope, whether it contained bank notes, and pointed out that the experience of the department had shown that opportunities for theft there presented themselves, as they did not present themselves to most people. Those clerks operate in a fiduciary capacity, and their records and conduct must be above suspicion. If undue leniency were shown, or if suspended sentences were permitted, they might place a premium on delinquency. I had to be content with that, although the minister at that time was very helpful in dealing with this first offender. I am glad to say that he was released from custody, and is now an honoured minister of the gospel in the United States. He did not become a confirmed criminal.

Mr. GRAYDON: He had a good lawyer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid I did not teach him that. So that the question I put to the Minister of Justice to-day is this. Having regard to what I learned first-hand from a postmaster general of twenty years ago, what change of policy has come over that department—because I assume this amendment emanates from the Post Office Department, and not from the Department of Justice—whereby they are recommending this leniency?

May I say in passing that the operation of this amendment will depend entirely upon the judicial officers who are administering the law. It will depend, for instance, on the type of police magistrate before whom many of these offenders will come. Or if the offence is under indictment, it will depend upon the type of judge who will have charge of the case.

In his introductory remarks the Minister of Justice confined himself entirely to the subject matter of the amendments, without giving us the reasons therefor. I should like to learn from him if there has been any change in the policy of the Post Office Department, and if it is now considered that the minimum sentence which must be exacted under the provisions of the statute as they now exist is too harsh. Generally speaking, would he tell the house what has occurred in the last twenty years which would direct the attitude of the Post Office Department toward the degree of leniency indicated in this bill? I am bound to say that the postmaster general of that day convinced me that postal employees were the guardians of public moneys passing through the mails, and that there must not be any easy way of escape from the consequences of violation of the statute. He pointed out, further, that the penalty given must be sufficient to act as a deterrent. I believe that was the principle underlying his philosophy. It was a deterrent to everybody else, showing that they could not do this sort of thing and escape with only a suspended sentence, or a light term of imprisonment. I did not, of course, agree with him entirely at that time, because I had in my mind an offender who, I thought, had been dealt with harshly under the provisions of the statute. I therefore invite the Minister of Justice, when he closes the debate, to give us the underlying reasons which have caused the Post Office Department to change their views in connection with this important matter.

I have nothing of importance to say respecting section 4 of the bill. I think the minister pointed out a cogent reason why there should be a change, and certainly he is much more familiar with the administration of justice in his own province than any of us who are not from that province could possibly be. Sometimes I think there are too many judges in this country, especially since in this time of war they do not seem to have much to do. In my province, at all events, we could get along with a lot less. However that is a matter of—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Within a matter of hours I have had representations to the contrary from the law society of the hon. member's province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did not ask my advice, that is all I can say; they lost a good opinion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be glad to have the hon. member's opinion to use in my reply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I think they have in mind down there is that the government of to-day should fill vacancies when they arise, and not hold them back in the hope of holding them over for perhaps some incompetents to fill before or after an election. That is what they are objecting to in New Brunswick. If we are going to have a panel of three appeal court judges in New Brunswick, then let us have them. If we are going to have four King's bench judges in New Brunswick, then let us not get along with only two, and one ill, and one vacancy. That is what we object to in New Brunswick—the holding of vacancies. If they tell the Minister of Justice the whole truth and nothing but the truth, he will find out that that is the reason. I happen to be just about as close to the active practising barristers down there as anyone could be, and I believe that is the view. However, I apologize for interjecting those remarks.

Then there is another thing. We are going to have an election down there pretty soon, and there are two or three would-be applicants who are being forced to run over the course before they get their reward. I know it is very difficult—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course I know it is difficult to satisfy five applicants with just one plum.

Mr. SLAGHT: How does the hon. member know that? Is it through his own experience with a former government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would say I would take a good deal of pride in the judicial appointments and recommendations I made in 1935.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member is reflecting on the whole bench.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I respectfully dissent from that. I have a very high regard for the bench as a whole.

Mr. SLAGHT: One would not think so, after the hon. member's last remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to address the Chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not have said what I did if the hon. member for Parry Sound had not interjected; and I am not going to say any more on the subject. I am inviting the Minister of Justice to illuminate this discussion by telling us just what has changed the policy of the Post Office Department.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think these amendments are certainly long overdue, particularly that one having to do with the inclusion of the words in the present section which provide that it is mandatory for a judge or magistrate to impose a sentence within the ambit of the phrase "or for any term not less than three years." This provision has called for amendment long before this. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken mentioned a case in the province of Ontario. Chief Justice Rose has given an obiter dictum to the effect that the magistrate has power to impose a suspended sentence, and in one case in which I appeared two years ago a suspended sentence was granted in spite of the mandatory direction of the present section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the nature of the offence?

Mr. MARTIN: The same kind of case. It was Rex v. Mallott. It is reported I think in the Ontario Weekly Notes, but I have not at hand the citation. The point I had particularly in mind was in reference to that part of section 364 to which no amendment is suggested. This reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who steals,
> (a) a post letter bag, etc.

As one who has had some experience at the bar I feel it my duty to register strong objection to this kind of provision, even though it may be an omnibus provision. I find it difficult to conceive of any kind of crime under paragraphs (a), (b), (c), or (d) which would justify a life sentence. It might be impossible to find a magistrate who would impose such a sentence, but any one who has practised at the bar knows that there are magistrates and magistrates. One does not know what might happen. There might be the restraining influence of the court of appeal, but I suggest that we should not permit the inclusion in any of these sections of a punishment which is out of keeping with the tempo of modern criminal jurisprudence. There was a time in the history of our law when we punished an individual with death for theft, but in this day and age I do not think we are going to correct crimes of this sort by leaving in the hands of an irresponsible magistrate the power to impose, if not a life sentence, anything like it for such offences. I think we should unhesitatingly remove the discretionary power which this present section provides so far as the maximum sentence is concerned.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin), who has just spoken, has brought to the attention of the house a matter which deserves consideration and, if I may say so, the unanimous support of the house. I am not always able to support him as strongly as I can on this occasion, but I do not think we should pass this statute in the manner in which it now is and let an accused person who is convicted be liable for imprisonment for committing these crimes. Perhaps I had better read one of them to the house in order to impress upon hon. members the seriousness of the term which is imposed. The first crime is the theft of a post letter bag.

A post letter bag may not contain anything; it might be only an empty bag, because it does not state that it must contain something. If an employee of the Post Office Department were to pick up a bag and take it home, surely a magistrate should not have such extended jurisdiction as to permit him to impose life imprisonment. It might of course be properly said that a magistrate would not do that, but we have no right to grant that discretion.

This section indicates clearly the ridiculousness of some of these sections in this enlightened period of our national existence, and I support the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour in his plea. It looks to me as though we are back in the old days when they used to hang men for putting their initials on London bridge. Those were supposed to be much darker days than what we are living in right now.

The postal employees generally are not an overpaid group of people, and I think it is bad to impose such a heavy penalty and make them liable to life imprisonment for what at best could be only a relatively small misdemeanour.

Mr. MARTIN: This is the section as it has stood for some time.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that this discussion really belongs to the committee stage of the bill. We are now dealing with the principle of the bill. If you accept the principle, that does not mean that the bill cannot be altered by amendment in committee. If the principle is adopted, then the discussion now taking place could continue in committee.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is not by extending the term of imprisonment to which delinquents are sentenced that we shall necessarily prevent crime. I have more faith in preventive than in punitive justice. Of what avail is it to the authorities to imprison for life an individual who is guilty of an offence if no appropriate action is taken in penitentiary institutions for the rehabilitation of prisoners? The latter are not always hardened criminals, far from it. If a post office employee steals a letter, a parcel or even a post letter bag, why should he, except in the case of a confirmed criminal, be liable to life imprisonment? I consider the amendments to the criminal code which are proposed in this bill as extremely severe; that is not preventive but punitive justice. The purpose of every piece of legislation, even in criminal matters, is both to improve the condition of individuals and to protect society. I believe that the proposed amendments go too far, at least as regards sections 1 and 2 of the bill, and I would rather see the criminal code remain as it is now.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with passing the principle of this bill as it stands is that by implication we are approving the sections as they stand as amended. It is true that formally all we are doing is to approve the amendment, but when we approve the amendment we are approving by implication the code as it stands as amended. We should not pass this bill without some indication from the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) that when it arrives in committee it will be amended to common sense. I have defended in court where there was a life sentence in prospect, and I wanted to tell the jury of that fact. There was a time in the courts of Ontario when judges ruled that you could not tell the jury what the limit of the penalty might be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can you now?

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, you can. A number of us brought that about because we refused to submit to an arbitrary ruling of that kind. We held that the jury had a right to know the limit of the penalty that might be imposed by his lordship. We achieved that right in the courts of Ontario, the right to tell the jury that if you convict the accused of this offence the criminal code allows the imposition of a life sentence. Can you imagine twelve good, decent and humane men listening to a charge under one or another of these clauses against some poor individual who may have stolen some inconsequential amount, a man with a wife and family and so on, and facing the possibility of putting the man in gaol for life? The thing is ridiculous. It is so extreme, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has pointed out, as to be pernicious, and it should be changed. I congratulate the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) upon having brought this matter to our attention.

The penalties provided in the code should be reasonable, penalties suitable to the offence in the circumstances. I practised in the courts of Toronto many years ago and I actually saw the criminal law reformed by the juries of the county of York. We had a judge who was unduly severe, who handed out five and seven year sentences with a generosity that was appalling. In due season the juries refused to risk what he might do to the poor fellow in the dock. I saw juries bring in verdicts of not guilty when the prisoner was obviously guilty. Extenuating circumstances made incongruous the abuse which the judge was likely to inflict on him.

And so, too, with the code. You are going to have guilty men let off because of fear by juries of extreme, ridiculous and inhuman sentences. I commend the Minister of Justice for this amendment. I have had the experience of having some offender sent to prison for three years for an offence for which he should have been given three months, much to the regret of the magistrate, without the concurrence of the crown official, and certainly to the consternation of the man's friends and relatives and perhaps his wife and children. It is time that we gave magistrates the right to be reasonable. This we have denied them under the code as it now stands. Let us give them the right to be reasonable. Sometimes they may fail because of human limitations, but at least they should have the opportunity. This is good legislation.

I think some good purpose would be served by carrying out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in having a more general review of the code, particularly of the sentences. The code sentences were adopted many, many years ago, long before we had reached the small degree of enlightenment which we now possess. What enlightenment we now have should be reflected in the criminal code. The Minister of Justice would be doing a public service if he could get a committee of many minds working on this subject in order that he might bring in at the next session a very much more extended series of amendments.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, if a layman may be permitted to be so audacious as to take part in this debate between lawyers in a field where I think angels would naturally fear to tread, I should like to support the suggestions made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Roebuck), and also the suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I approve the withdrawal from the code of the minimum sentence formerly imposed. I agree with those who have spoken, that the amendment is in line with modern thought and practice.

I wish to register my opposition to the continued inclusion in the bill of the words "liable to imprisonment for life," which still gives the court the privilege of imposing a life sentence as a possible sentence for the offences set out in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) of section 364 of the code.

While I am on my feet may I say that the whole nature of this bill serves to emphasize the responsibility which society places upon the employees of the Post Office Department, and the necessity that these employees should be people of character and integrity. I want to compliment the Post Office Department and its employees upon the degree of responsibility and integrity which has been manifested in that department in the past. I just wish to say that that degree of character and integrity required of the employees of the Post Office Department is in strong contrast with the reward which society, through that department and the government, has been willing to pay to these employees; and I would suggest that this bill, which in one instance at least imposes a severer penalty than the former one upon the employees for a certain type of offence be accompanied later, when the minister's estimates come up for consideration, with the announcement that these employees are to be duly rewarded in keeping with the responsibility which we place upon them.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I agree with the last speaker (Mr. Noseworthy) it is important that we should maintain in the public mind the necessity for the strictest probity in those who serve us in dealing with His Majesty's mail. There is an old tradition that His Majesty's mail must go through, and accompanying that is the tradition that that great arm of the public service, both the officers and the mail carriers, must comprise men of high integrity. In my view, in Canada these men are men of integrity. In my view, in the main, particularly as regards the carriers, they are underpaid. That is one of the problems not for to-day but for the future. If that be so, the frailty of human nature inclines men to err when tempted possibly in the matter of $2 or $5 which might be needed and which might cause them to break the country's laws.

Having said that, I desire to concur in the observations so well put by my hon. friend the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and I think the minister will find that they meet with the general approval of the house. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to adhere to your ruling to discuss the principle of the bill and not to speak as though we were in committee.

The principle of the bill is not such as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) suggested in error. He suggests that we are making a new start. We are not making a new start, because the section we are amending provides for imprisonment for life, but places a minimum of three years. So far as the principle of the bill removes that minimum of three years I think it is sound. In so far as it seeks to perpetuate the right to punish with life imprisonment, I do not think the principle is sound.

The administration of our criminal law is the very foundation of our national existence, without which we cannot hope to succeed, and that administration depends upon the observance of a principle which a great English judge once enunciated: Not only shall justice be done, but the people shall feel that justice is being done. Having regard to that principle, I am bold enough to make a suggestion to the minister who takes the keenest interest in these matters. By his equipment before accepting this responsible post, as well as by reason of his record, he is well fitted to stand in this great and responsible position as Minister of Justice, and I wish to pay tribute to his record in that regard, as well as to his record since he has occupied the position. I venture, however, to suggest to him that when he comes to the committee he might feel inclined to suggest an amendment to the section which deals with section 364 and to reduce the term of imprisonment there by striking out the words "for life" and substituting words such as "for not more than", let us say, "eight years", or "seven years" or "five years"—some punishment that fits the crime. I suggest that he amend section 2, which deals with section 365, by reducing the term from seven to perhaps five years. My suggestion would be—and I offer it with diffidence, because this is a very open matter—that he amend section 364 by reducing the penalty to not more than seven years, and that he reduce the penalty under section 365, which defines lesser offences, to one of imprisonment for not more than five years.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): As the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) has suggested, it is difficult to identify in brief form the principle of this bill. Many hon. members who have spoken seem to have regarded the principle as relating only to changes in the penalties to be provided for offences on the part of postal employees. I would point out that there is also section 3, which would change the penalties provided in section 436 of the criminal code, which section has to do with defrauding the government by delivering to the armed services goods which do not measure up to the specifications laid down. In other words, the broad principle of the bill is that certain changes be made with reference to the severity of sentences to be imposed, specifically in sections 364, 365 and 436 of the code.

The reason why I rise to say a few words is that, in my opinion, there is an inconsistency between the severity of the penalties allowable under sections 1 and 2 of the bill and the severity of the penalties allowable under section 3. A number of hon. members have pointed out that it would be possible, if this bill were passed in its present form, for a postal employee to be given a life sentence for the stealing of an empty postal bag. On the other hand, if a firm deliberately defrauds the government and the people of Canada, in the terms set out in section 3 of the bill, section 436 of the criminal code as amended would provide a maximum sentence of only seven years or a fine of $50,000 or both.

My interest in section 3 is related to certain remarks I have had occasion to make previously during this session with regard to the alleged defrauding of the government by certain bedding manufacturers. I have asked questions of ministers of certain departments and their parliamentary assistants, and there has been placed on Hansard information which would seem to indicate that such practices are in some cases being carried out. I refer to the failure of certain bedding companies, who are providing mattresses and other bedding products for the armed forces, to make those products in accordance with the specifications laid down by the government. Offences of that kind are covered by section 436, and the answer given me in one instance by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply made it quite clear that at least one case is being proceeded with against a firm under this section. I have had strong representations made to me by parents and other relatives of members of the armed forces who learned that this kind of thing was being done. Not only is the government being defrauded but the health of persons in the services is being endangered in this way. I have taken this moment or two to refer in detail to this matter as one example of cases that come under section 436 of the criminal code. To my mind the offence I have mentioned is far more serious than the offences possible under paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) of section 1 of this bill. Like some of the hon. members who have preceded me I feel that we have no option but to raise these questions on second reading because the principle that we are being asked to approve is the amending of the criminal code along the lines set out in the various sections. I wholly support the contention already made to the effect that a possible life sentence for the theft of an empty post letter bag should be reduced. I couple with that the suggestion—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But if the bag had a $100,000 in it, what then?

Mr. KNOWLES: In that case the judge would have the discretionary power to pass the appropriate sentence. The bill before us gives the judge the right to impose that very severe sentence even for a very light offence, and yet on the other hand, no matter how deliberate the action of a company in defrauding the government under section 436 of the criminal code may be, no matter how injurious it may be to the health of the people in the armed forces or to the health of our civilian population, the offence under the section even as amended by this bill cannot receive a greater punishment than imprisonment for seven years and a $50,000 fine. My contention is that the element of fraud in section 436 and the injurious effects upon health are so much worse than some of the offences under section 364 of the criminal code that there should be an alteration in the provisions of this bill. Like others who have spoken, I feel that there should be a lessening of the severity so far as sections 1 and 2 are concerned, but I contend also that there should be an increase in the severity so far as section 3 is concerned.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I think I should deal very briefly with some of the general observations that have been made with respect to this bill to amend the criminal code to provide for better administration of criminal justice.

The suggestion is made that there should be a provision dealing with mandatory sentences, removing the obligation to impose capital punishment in all cases of verdicts of murder. There may be very good reasons to urge for the limited extent of the removal which has been enacted in the parliament of the United Kingdom for that kingdom.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is as far as I went.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I gathered that that was as far as the hon. member for Lake Centre was recommending that we should go. Beyond that I think it is preferable, so long as capital punishment is to remain one of the punishments provided by our law, to have it mandatory, and not leave it the responsibility of the presiding justice in certain cases to feel bound to impose capital punishment and in other cases to have the privilege of not doing so. I think that for the cases in which parliament decides that capital punishment is the right penalty the provision of the code should be mandatory as it is at the present time. With respect to the limited removal recommended by the hon. member for Lake Centre I think that is a matter which would receive serious consideration from the kind of committee that the hon. member recommended be set up to consider the whole matter of the criminal code and to take the evidence of jurists, scientists and penologists on such improvements as it may be proper to bring about. Were the times not such as they are—I am not at all sure that I would be here then, but if I were I would be very much inclined to recommend, as the hon. member has done, the setting up of a committee and its operation in an active way. On the whole I think it is preferable to leave that over until the times are more propitious than they are just now, and in view of the news we have been receiving from the theatres of war let us hope that such times will not be too far distant.

The second recommendation of the hon. member would have to do with the enlarging of the possibilities of appeal in criminal cases to the Supreme Court of Canada. I think that would also be a matter upon which it would be of value to parliament to have the recommendations of the kind of committee suggested by the hon. member. As hon. members know, there is now the possibility of appealing to the supreme court whenever there is a conflict of decisions between the appeal courts of two or more of the Canadian provinces. That has served a very useful purpose in bringing into harmony the application of the code throughout the whole of Canada. It is possible that in perhaps not all criminal cases, but in a certain range there should be, without the necessity of obtaining leave and showing special circumstances, the right to take the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada. Where the line would properly be drawn is a matter that has to be carefully considered. At the present time the line is drawn between decisions which conflict with those of the appeal court of another province and those that do not. If the line is to be moved I think it should be carefully considered as to where it would be set up again. It would be useful for parliament to have report of a committee that would have taken the evidence of jurists and others qualified to offer opinions of value upon such matters.

The next suggestion has to do with something about which I am sure every hon. member of this house and most of the Canadian people, though they are not in this house, are in agreement; that is, the desire to see our penal system developed in such a way as will make not merely for punishment but for reform. It has been stated on more than one occasion since the beginning of the war that the recommendations of the Archambault commission could not be fully implemented without the provision of large capital expenditures for the establishment of new institutions. However, I believe we can join the hon. member in saying that in the recommendations of that commission there is much, even though it requires considerable capital expenditure, which should be undertaken as soon as circumstances permit.

Another suggestion had to do with the controversial question of whether or not a man convicted and sentenced to a term which would have to be served in a penitentiary should be removed to that institution before the expiration of the time during which an appeal could be entered. The matter was brought to a head by incidents which occurred in the Toronto gaol within recent weeks. Only this week the officers of the Department of Justice had conferences with the mayor of Toronto in reference to the situation which exists in that city. That suggestion would entail serious inconveniences. Just as an indication of these, supposing a man convicted in Kenora and brought to Kingston desired to appeal. His counsel in Kenora would find himself seriously handicapped by the fact that his client had been moved to Kingston.

There is also this further point. Up to the present time the penitentiaries have been organized for the purpose of carrying out sentences which involve hard labour. I submit with respect, Mr. Speaker, that it is not proper to impose any punishment upon a person until he definitely has been found guilty and subject to such punishment. During the time his case is before the courts for consideration it is proper, for the protection of society, that he be confined; but I think it would be improper to impose any other part of the punishment until the case is finally disposed of. If the suggestion were adopted we would require to have two departments in our penitentiaries, one in which there would be merely confinement, and the other, which exists at the present time, for the serving of time at hard labour. That is an objection which was suggested to the mayor of Toronto. There are other inconvenient features, but the matter is now actively under consideration. In the meantime another suggestion within the powers of other authorities was made for the purpose of remedying the deficiencies which are so apparent in the Don gaol.

On more than one occasion the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has indicated his great concern over the number of serious or fatal highway accidents owing to motor traffic throughout Canada. I have obtained for him some statistical information, but I did not expect to have the matter discussed here to-day, and I note that the hon. member said he would refer to the matter and ask for the information when the estimates of the Department of Justice were being considered. In respect of the appeal to the superior courts of Quebec from summary convictions the hon. member suggested that we may have too many high court judges in Quebec. On that point I shall be able to show the hon. member the per capita cost for the indemnification of judges in each province; and he will find that, since there are no county courts in Quebec to which federal judges are appointed, the per capita cost for the indemnification of judges there is rather lower than elsewhere. I can also assure the hon. gentleman that the recommendations made by the chief constables' association with respect to the administration of the criminal code are always received very gratefully and considered very carefully, because it is realized that they, with the officers of my department, have a common concern in maintaining peace, order and good government in the country.

There remains the question submitted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) as to the reasons for the change in attitude on the part of the Post Office Department with respect to the severity of sentences provided by the criminal code. Of course the hon. member is quite right in thinking that the Department of Justice would not have suggested this change if it had not originated with the Post Office Department or at least been concurred in by the officers of that department. Since the beginning of the war the situation that has arisen in the operation of the post office is rather different from that which existed prior to the war. Before the war the work of the Post Office Department was generally done by permanent employees. Since the war started it has not been possible to select and enrol a sufficient number of permanent employees to do all the work that had to be done, and temporary employees have been taken on; married women, minors and others who did not have the training or experience of the normal permanent staff of the Post Office Department. That created a new situation. You went before the court with some incident attributable to one of these temporary employees and charged that person with an offence which carried a minimum penitentiary sentence of three years and a maximum sentence of life. When you asked the jury to convict, the jury would say, "That person has not done anything deserving of a sentence of three years in the penitentiary as a minimum or life as a maximum. He may have gone through the motions, but parliament did not intend the sort of thing he has done to be the crime for which a minimum of three years or a maximum of life is provided." The result was that it became very difficult to obtain convictions.

The question has arisen as to whether there could be a suspended sentence. I think both the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury are entirely correct. Legally there could be a suspended sentence, as section 1081 provides, if counsel representing the crown consented; but most frequently counsel representing the crown took the attitude that, parliament having provided a minimum of three years, it was not within his right to consent to anything less than three years' imprisonment. In most cases counsel representing the crown would say, "I have no right to give my consent," and without that consent the court could not suspend sentence. It may have happened in certain cases that counsel for the crown took a different view, and would say, "Well, here I have the choice between not getting a conviction and getting a conviction on the understanding that I will agree that this man will not go to a penitentiary for three years."

Mr. MARTIN: That was the occurrence in the case about which I spoke.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That may have happened, in exceptional cases; but the general attitude of crown counsel was that, parliament having said that the minimum punishment would be three years, they had no power to agree to suspended sentence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the magistrate took that view himself, in the case to which I refer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I suppose the magistrate would probably say to counsel, "It does not seem proper that you should give consent, when parliament has stated that the minimum penalty will be three years' imprisonment." But parliament had provided that a magistrate could suspend sentence if counsel for the crown agreed to its being suspended. Those are the terms of section 1081. It is stated that if a maximum punishment is less than two years, the magistrate may suspend sentence without consent. If the offence is one which involves a possible punishment of more than two years' imprisonment, the magistrate could suspend sentence only with the consent of counsel representing the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is correct.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the reasons I have given will probably satisfy the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not controverting it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not a general reversal of the policy that the mails ought to be regarded as sacred.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That still stands.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. That still stands; and we know that great precautions are taken to ensure the delivery of the mails. The necessity of taking on so many temporary employees, frequently minors, and the possibility of their committing small offences in respect of the mails, made it desirable to have machinery whereby some punishment could be imposed. That is so, because in most cases one would not get any punishment at all, with the statute as it stood. A jury would almost invariably say, "This person has not done the thing for which parliament provided a minimum punishment of three years. What he has done is not something of that kind. Therefore we will not find him guilty, when he is being accused of something for which parliament has provided such a severe penalty."

Then, in the administration of the department, there was very great reluctance to institute proceedings when a matter did not appear to be of a degree of importance sufficient to imprison a man for three years in a penitentiary. And, having a class of persons quite different from the class of permanent civil employees who usually handle the mails, it was necessary to have a more flexible type of machinery to deal with this new class.

If the house accepts the amendment, the new procedure will be in operation, and experience will show whether this step has been wise or otherwise. When the service gets back to the place where it will no longer have anything but its regular permanent staff, there may be reason for establishing some rule other than the one now suggested.

As to the details of the bill, and without giving any undertaking to accept amendments, I think it would be preferable if the discussion of such amendments were had in the committee stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is agreeable to us.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Punishment of theft.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to have an explanation of the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East. It was one which I intended to raise, but about which I had forgotten for the moment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would point out that, as has been suggested, this is merely the maximum penalty which can be imposed, and that section 1054 provides:

> Every one who is liable to imprisonment for life or for any term of years, or other term, may be sentenced to imprisonment for any shorter term.

So that even under this, the punishment imposed by a magistrate might be one day or thirty days or thirty years or life. The discretion is entirely in the hands of the magistrate. The suggestion has been made that it is quite improper to have in this kind of section the suggestion that there might be something sufficiently grave falling under the section to warrant life imprisonment. I submit that that is not so, in fact. Those of us in the house who are older than most members will recall the sensations mail robberies used to create. I remember not so many years ago an armed mail robbery of a mail car on the Ocean Limited, perpetrated some miles below Quebec city. That offence resulted in charges of murder, because homicide did occur in carrying out the project of stealing from the mails. I am not suggesting that there could not be framed an indictment under some other section of the code that would apply. But here—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably would apply.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Robbery might be made to apply. But one can conceive of thefts of mail bags and mailed matter under conditions of gravity sufficient to call for the most severe kind of penalty, short of the death sentence. This comes down from the very first drafting of the code, about fifty-odd years ago. At that time mail robberies were grave incidents which were still lingering in the minds of people on the north American continent. The offence of thieving from the mails could be anything from what is done—even done at the present time—by way of abstracting a few stamps, a dollar bill or some other small item from a letter, to the old-time mail robbery. The provision here may appear to be out of line, but as hon. members know, the maximum penalty for robbery is life, and that sentence may be accompanied by lashes. This is only a possible life sentence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think our whole criminal code is a relic of the ten commandments, expanded to different degrees. I think the removal of any minimum will permit satisfactory administration of justice for the time being. There is no doubt that there are sections of the code where there is not a proper balance between the penalties provided. When the parliamentary committee, to which both the hon. member for Lake Centre and myself are looking forward, is established it can go over the whole situation. There is no doubt that a serious effort will be made to have a more uniform scale of penalties throughout the code, but it was felt in the department that for the time being we should merely suggest such amendments as are required for immediate application.

The removal of this minimum is something required for immediate application and the increasing of the severity of the penalty in the other section is of immediate application. We were dealing with things which it was felt in the department should go into force at once. We were not looking forward to bringing about piecemeal a more perfect general instrument to deal with those unfortunates who fall by the wayside and stray from the straight and narrow path.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to me that what the minister has just said in his closing sentences is that the Department of Justice is recommending an expedient to parliament to serve a situation which has arisen at the moment and which requires attention. I am not going to quarrel with that, but I do say that the ameliorating of the minimum sentence is entirely out of balance with the retention of the life imprisonment in the early part of section 364 of the criminal code. Having regard to the lack of balance between what he is doing, on the one hand, and what is being suggested by the hon. member for Essex East, on the other, the minister ought to give consideration to this matter. It seems to me that the two things are incompatible; they are out of balance.

Mr. KINLEY: You are taking away from the one side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg says, you are taking away on the one side and you are retaining an inflexible provision or scale of punishment on the other.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not inflexible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not exactly inflexible, but the minister is maintaining a tremendously high penalty for what after all, as he himself suggests, may be a minor offence. I am not going to labour the point. This has been recommended by other hon. members and I do think the minister might well withdraw the bill and give the matter some consideration for another day. I do not want to hold up the bill. The minister should give us some explanation as to why the penalty is being raised in the next section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will do that when we reach the section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I make that suggestion in the utmost good faith. I have been impressed by the argument made by the hon. member for Essex East. I should have made it myself, and I really had it marked down. The two things seem to be out of line. We are relieving on the one hand, but we are not relieving the maximum on the other.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The unbalanced position might be looked upon as important in this section, but if the hon. member will turn to section 358 he will find provision for a penalty of fourteen years for simple theft. If we are to have a balanced scale we shall have to go through the whole code. That is something that should be done at a relatively early day, and I am hopeful that whoever sits in this seat when the war is over will consider the suggestion which has been advanced this afternoon as to the manner of doing it as the right way to go about it. I I hope that both my hon. friend and myself will have occasion to practise before the courts when a code so improved is being applied. The fact that the maximum remains will not create any immediate difficulty in the administration of justice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is theoretical.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What effect would the omission of the words "for life" have upon administration?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If a maximum is not provided, the magistrate could not impose any imprisonment. If we eliminated the words "for life" the imprisonment that could be imposed could not go beyond one second. It would just be a technical imprisonment and the sentence would be served just as soon as it had begun.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be void for uncertainty.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member for York-Sunbury referred to me. As a lay member of the house I have been listening to the interesting discussion and it occurs to me that by the removal of the minimum penalty you are making the statute more drastic in effect. You have within the bracket a high penalty and a low penalty. In this case the supreme penalty is life and the minimum penalty is three years. If you take away the minimum penalty of three years, what will the impression be upon the courts when they see the new statute which contains no reference to a minimum penalty? If a sentence of only two years or one year is imposed, the public may say, "What kind of judge is that? He gives only one or two years when the statute says that a life penalty may be imposed."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not correct. The statute does not say what penalty the judge shall give; it simply states that the maximum penalty is life.

Mr. KINLEY: The statute says that it may be life. That indicates what this parliament thinks of the offence, and it would appear in the statute without any qualification. At the present time there is a qualification, and it seems to me that when you leave only the high bracket you create a condition which makes the law more drastic.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Penalty.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I promised the hon. member that I would give the reason for increasing the penalty in this section. This is done because it has been found that the importance of contracts is frequently such that the former penalty was entirely out of proportion with the amount involved in the transaction. Some of these transactions run into large sums of money and it was felt that the penalty was not in proportion with what might be involved in cases such as the one mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That case is before the courts and the contract involved there is for amounts for which the former penalties were entirely out of proportion. The situation with respect to such frauds is not that the penalty provided by the criminal code is the only redress because there is redress in collecting from the accused person or firm moneys improperly received.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Restitution.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. This is in addition to whatever civil debt may arise out of the fraud that has been perpetrated. The amount was suggested and it impresses me as being quite substantial as a penalty. The penalty is seven years in the penitentiary or a $50,000 fine or both. That gives the court some latitude to show its appreciation of the gravity of the offence. We have had cases under the wartime prices and trade board regulations where fines of $25 and fines of $25,000 have been imposed by courts of the same jurisdiction, thereby indicating their appreciation of the scale of gravity of the offence committed. In these matters which involve financial gains the monetary penalties sometimes have to be considerable to have any deterrent effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That I think is true with respect to criminal acts. May I point out that offences under the wartime prices and trade board are mala prohibita and are not in the same category as mala in se. There is a great difference between the two kinds of acts. But we are here dealing with an offence in itself. The other is merely an offence against what is an arbitrary restriction on the rights of citizens. You cannot make a comparison between the two.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are cases which can be compared, as I think the hon. member will recognize; for instance, the dodges that are resorted to in black marketing gasoline; the printing of false ration coupons, and other rackets that are resorted to for obtaining sugar, for instance, or some other commodity in excess of the quota to which one is entitled; getting out of a coupon bank coupons which have been used but not destroyed, and selling them. There are things of that kind which impress the courts before which the facts are proved as being rackets that have to be severely stamped upon.

Mr. KNOWLES: The case to which I was referring and to which the minister has alluded may turn out to have some connection with the wartime prices and trade board or the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, but I would point out that it is the Department of Munitions and Supply which has laid the charge. The charge is that this firm knowingly sold to the government material which did not measure up to the specifications laid down. I would emphasize the gravity of that kind of offence. I pointed out previously that charges have been laid in connection with the manufacture of bedding which was supposed to have been made from new material or material guaranteed to be safe so far as health is concerned, but the charge is that the material was second-hand and not clean. This is an offence endangering the health of the members of the armed forces as well as defrauding the government and endeavouring to make unusual profits, if the charges are substantiated, out of the war situation. I agree wholly with the Minister of Justice that the penalty in such a case should be severe.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that case before the courts?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, it is; at least that is the information we have been given in the house. I agree with the minister that the penalties provided by way of the amendment are substantial as compared with the former penalties. But the contention that I was making on second reading was that even the new penalties are not substantial as compared with a possible life sentence for certain postal offences. I accept the explanation, in part at least, which the minister has given in connection with section 1, but it seems to me that he still has to explain why there cannot be at least an equally severe penalty under section 3. My contention is—following the minister's argument in connection with section 1—that there may be cases of defrauding the government, such as the one to which I have referred, which are flagrant enough to call for a life sentence, but under the amendment a sentence greater than seven years and a fine of $50,000 would not be permitted. The point I am trying to make is that the penalty under section 3 is light in comparison with the penalty under section 1.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will agree that if he and I were redrafting the provisions that apply to simple theft, or to theft with various aggravating circumstances, we should find that the penalties which the code provides rather severe and we would probably be recommending a scale quite different from the one that is at present in effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: Certainly, and a better balanced scale.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Fraud, etc., in connection with sale, etc., of military stores.

Mr. KNOWLES: This clause relates to section 436 of the criminal code. Suppose it be found that a firm has applied for and received subsidies from the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and that the application for these subsidies was of a fraudulent nature, could a charge be laid against that firm under this section, or would that come somewhere else?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would imagine, on the hypothesis stated by the hon. gentleman, that a crown prosecutor would be apt to bring an indictment for obtaining under false pretences.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have there been any such cases?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know of any case of subsidies having been obtained under false representation. There has been no request to the Department of Justice to select agents to prosecute any such claim.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just to have the record clear, and in reply to the leader of the opposition, may I say that I have been asking questions both on the war appropriation resolution and on the order paper relating to matters of this kind. The final answers have not been given, but it appears that the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is having some difficulty with some firms over this very kind of thing. I have stated before that I feel it is the kind of thing which should be run down, despite the dislike of my hon. friend for its set-up, by the war expenditures committee—

Mr. GRAYDON: What good would it do to bring the case before the war expenditures committee?

Mr. KNOWLES: Some good could be done if members of the official opposition would join in the work of the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There may very well have been cases instituted that would not be brought directly to our attention, because there are instances in which these boards have obtained the appointment of counsel to handle all their cases, and they do not have to come to us for special counsel. We would not be advised of the individual cases where they had their own counsel appointed. But there has been no application for the appointment of an agent to prosecute for the return of subsidies improperly paid out.

Mr. REID: Following the conclusion of the war, what will be the effect of this clause on the War Assets Corporation? There will be machinery and equipment which may be known to be defective and which will be sold both perhaps to servants of the crown and, following that, to the public. It occurs to me that there will be a good deal of machinery that may be perfect and a good deal that will be imperfect, and there will be many transactions on the part of firms, the crown and the public. It may be known by both parties to a transaction that the machinery is defective. Has that been considered, or will this clause have any effect in that regard?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This clause relates merely to the delivery of stores to the crown and would not have any application at all to the delivery of stores by the crown to purchasers in the provinces.

Mr. HAZEN: My criticism of this section is that the penalty provided is not nearly severe enough. I can readily conceive of a case where a contractor would supply to the navy or the army stores, munitions and so on which were most defective, resulting in the loss of life of members of the armed forces. In such a case, to provide a penalty of seven years for such a defect is to impose a penalty that in my opinion is not adequate. If I were redrafting the section I would make the penalty much severer.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is certainly a considerable difference between certain cases that have been mentioned and delivering and disposing of defective goods to His Majesty whether in the right of one department to another, where perhaps the life of members of the forces might be lost by reason of defect. The sentence of seven years which is mentioned in this particular section is considerably out of line with life imprisonment for stealing an empty mail bag.

Section agreed to.

On section 4.

Mr. DORION: I would point out that in amending this section we should also amend two other sections. If they are left as they are they will create confusion. The first is 580, subsection 2 of which deals with appeals and the adjournment of appeals when there is no sitting of the court; and the second is section 750, which deals with sittings of the court. In Quebec and Montreal, I understand that the superior court sits every day. I should like to know how this will work with the new amendments to section 749. I believe that in Quebec and Montreal there are no proper sittings of the court because the court sits every day. How will this work with the new amendment?

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Which is the last section referred to?

Mr. DORION: It is section 750.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think there should be any difficulty under our section 750. The court sits every day from September 10 or 12 until December 20, and again from January 7 or 8 until June 20, and these appeals could be set down for hearing on any of the days upon which the court sits. If there is any concordant amendment required to correct the anomaly of leaving the words "court of king's bench" in section 540, that will be looked into. I thank the hon. member for bringing the point to my attention.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

FISHERIES

69. Departmental administration, $151,660.

Item agreed to.

70. Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and protection services, $908,700.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the reason for the increase of $63,300?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): The increase is due for the most part to a larger number of employees. We are establishing inspection laboratories in the maritime provinces; and that is the main reason why there is an increase of $63,000, and we have employed a few more men this year.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How far does the jurisdiction of the federal fisheries department extend? Does it take in the great lakes as well as the oceans?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This question has been discussed before the privy council at least three times. The final decision placed fisheries under the jurisdiction of the federal government. The federal government has arrived at a decision with Ontario and Quebec to administer the regulations and laws passed by the government at Ottawa. So far as the other provinces are concerned the federal government administers all fisheries except sport fishing, but the regulations are still passed by the federal government.

Mr. HAZEN: There are two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The first is, by bill No. 91 we are amending the Bank Act. Section 88 as amended contains a provision in paragraph (i) of subsection 1 to provide for loans to fishermen. This subsection is for the purpose of making credit more available to fishermen by empowering the banks to take security on fish, fishing equipment and supplies, and fishing vessels. The proposed new paragraph is necessary to enable the banks to assist in a general programme for the development of the fishing industry. There is a similar provision to this to assist the farmers; but in order to assist the farmers and as a supplement a bill called the Farm Improvement Loan Act has been introduced in this house. No similar bill has been introduced in this house to assist the fishermen, and to supplement the amendment to the Bank Act in order that the fishermen may be enabled to get loans at a much lower rate of interest than they formerly had to pay. I know the minister is interested in the welfare of the fishermen. We have about thirty thousand men engaged in the fishing industry in the maritime provinces. They with their families make up about one-sixth of the population of those provinces. Would the minister keep that matter in mind and use his influence to have a bill similar to the Farm Improvement Loan Act introduced by the government to assist the fishermen of not only the maritime provinces but all other parts of Canada?

I also call his attention to the fact that we have been informed that legislation is to be introduced to put a floor under prices of staple farm products. If the government is to introduce legislation of that kind it seems to me that it will only be right and proper for the fishermen throughout Canada to have similar legislation passed to enable them to have a floor under their products. I call that to the minister's attention and ask him if he will be so kind as to keep it in mind and endeavour to have legislation of that kind passed to assist the fishermen of Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Both of these problems are being studied very carefully in the department at the present time. With regard to the loan act, we have an economist in the field who is studying the situation and conditions, and we may arrive at the conclusion that we should have a similar measure for the fishermen. As the hon. member knows we have been asked to act in conjunction with the government of Nova Scotia. We have passed an order in council providing for a subsidy for dragger boats and long-liner boats. I cannot give all the particulars of the correspondence at the moment since we are not through yet. We have not arrived at a final decision, but we are studying the problem.

As to the stable price it might be a more difficult question than that with regard to agricultural products, because quality counts much more in fish products than it does in agricultural products. The price of good fresh fish which is landed and brought on the market fresh is not such a problem, because the fish sells very easily. One of the great difficulties in the industry is to bring the product on the market in the best possible condition. This market may be in Montreal or at some other place. Then we export a great deal of our product and we have to be very careful in setting a stable price. But we are studying the question to-day and giving a great deal of attention to it.

Mr. HAZEN: It may be very difficult to arrive at the proper form of legislation, but it is of much importance, perhaps of greater importance to the fishermen to have a floor price set on their products than it is to the farmers to have one set on theirs. I know that in New Brunswick the fishermen had a difficult time prior to the war. They found it very hard to make a living, and so far as they are concerned it is much more important that there be legislation of this kind enacted for their benefit than for the farmers. That is only natural.

Item agreed to.

71. Building fishways and clearing rivers, $7,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have a matter I should like to bring up, but I do not know whether or not this is the proper item. I am afraid this is not the item. I wish to ask a question about the position and development and relationship between the provincial government and the dominion government with respect to the Gorton Pew processing plant at Caraquet, New Brunswick. Perhaps I should bring it up under another item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What fishways are being constructed at the present time? On what fishways will this money be spent in 1944?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are not building any fishways at the present time. This amount of $7,000 is only to keep in good condition the fishways we have, and to pay the employees we have there. We are preparing a programme for the post-war period; as a matter of fact an order in council has been passed under which we are asking for

$1,000,000 for just one fishway at Hell's Gate on the Fraser river, and I intend to give a detailed explanation later on, when we come to that item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What rivers are being cleared, or on what rivers is this money to be spent in maintaining the personnel for clearing?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This amount of $7,000 is only for maintenance. If a freshet occurs and logs come down and block a river, we must spend a certain amount of money in order to clear the river immediately so that the fish may go up and spawn. This is the amount required for that work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am interested in learning just what fishways are involved here, and what rivers; there must be two or three or four. What are they, and where?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This money is spent mainly in British Columbia; on the tributaries to the Skeena river, for example, wherever the current is very strong and there is danger of logs accumulating at certain places. The tributaries of the Skeena and some of the tributaries of the Fraser are the rivers where we spend this money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It strikes me that the sum of money is inadequate to maintain anything like an effective force operating over any considerable area. I should think more than $7,000 would be required for the whole dominion.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This amount is not for the building of fishways or anything like that; it is just for the maintenance of rivers where accumulations of logs may block the run of fish.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My point is that $7,000 is hardly sufficient to maintain more than four or five men.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They do not work all the time. We pay them what we should, but we do not pay more than we should, and it comes to about that amount.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What official of the department is in charge of this work? Who determines when to hire men, and whom does he hire? Where does he get them, and how much does he have to pay them?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This work is done under the departmental engineer here in Ottawa. If the hon. member wants the details in connection with this amount I can get them for him to-morrow, but at the moment I cannot remember all these small amounts.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wish to delay the item, but it strikes me that $7,000 is a very small sum if any considerable number of fishways are involved.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is a small sum, I admit, but at present we do not need any more than that for this purpose.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I should like the details, in order to satisfy my mind on this matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: A moment ago the minister indicated that there was another item somewhere. Would he indicate where it is? As a matter of fact this amount of $7,000 is broken down on page 82 of the estimates, and it would appear to cover only wages, cost of living bonuses, travelling expenses and sundries.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The other item is 83, on the next page.

Mr. NEILL: I was glad to hear the minister say that this item was not bigger, because this gives him all the money needed for this purpose. I shall recall those words to the minister perhaps later on, after the house adjourns and the department gets down to doing some of this work.

This is a rather complicated matter. One hon. member spoke about another item, and there are other items. There is one dealing with the Fraser river on a big scale. The matters dealt with under this item are not very large in themselves; they consist merely of taking out a log jam which has prevented the salmon from getting up a creek. However, there is a sort of by-product of this sort of work which causes a great deal of trouble. The primary purpose of the work, of course, is to enable the fish to get up the river, but I think the officials of the fisheries department in British Columbia are a little too prone to stick to the strict letter of the law and say that as long as they let the fish go up they do do not care at all what occurs in consequence of their actions. That is not the view taken by the people who suffer. I can think of several instances where, in all good faith, the fisheries department has spent a sum of money in clearing out a river or in taking out a log jam. The fish got up; there is no question about that, and then the department just washed their hands of it. The result was not so good for the people whose land adjoined the stream, for the removal of a log jam might set the current in a different direction, which might cause erosion and take away part of a man's farm. The fisheries department would say, "Our sole responsibility is in letting the fish get up. If the fish get up we do not care what happens to you or what hardship you must suffer." The more equitable-minded members of the department sometimes do admit that they have at least a moral obligation; that if in their endeavour to make a runway for the fish they do some harm, they also have some responsibility. The minister's deputy will recall that some years ago there was an awful fuss up on the Salmon river arising from something like that. The department stuck by the letter of the law and said that they did not care what damage they occasioned, that the people concerned could go to the province for redress. I do not think that was fair.

I have in mind a matter that I should like the minister to say he will look after under this item of $7,000. It is in connection with Rosewell creek. As far back as I can remember being in politics there has been a fuss about that. The fisheries department did some work; they cleaned out a log jam. That set the current in a different direction and ruined a man's farm; at least it is rapidly going down the river. Naturally he objects, and I think there is at least a moral obligation upon the department to do something in that case. Attempts were made in a rather petty way to repair the damage, but no genuine effort was made to deal with the situation, which will have to be faced sooner or later if we are to be fair to those people. It is of no use going to the province; they simply say, "We did not do the work and we do not care what happens, as long as a bridge or a public highway is not interfered with." This Rosewell creek matter has been dragging on for years. On one occasion the operation resulted in the formation of a large gravel bar. The water, ashamed of itself, went underground for a quarter of a mile or something like that. That did not make it very comfortable for the fish or very good for the farmer whose land helped make up the gravel bar. Now the minister says that he has plenty of money under this item and does not need any more, so that I should like an assurance from him that the situation at Rosewell creek will be dealt with adequately out of this vote. I can assure the minister that there is only one way to do it—and it is a simple way—and that is to straighten things up. Until this is done he and his successors will be beset with this thing. It has really been a very bad deal for the man who bought land in good faith, and encouraged the developing of his country. Now he finds that the best of his land—delta land—because it is always the best of it—goes down the river.

I hope the minister will be good enough to give some assurance that he will do something more than theorize in respect of this situation. This is really a sore point, and I should like to hear from him in that regard.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There are two ways of looking at these things. As Minister of Fisheries, and as a man who has followed the legal profession, if there is a jam on a river caused by logs brought down by a freshet, then we might be responsible if, in removing this jam, we caused damage. If damage is caused by the flow of water, or even by a jam that we are trying to destroy, we cannot be held responsible. That is a question of common law.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister allow me to make an observation? He says he is not responsible. If his officials had left the jam there, there would not be any harm.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is what I say. I am not speaking of Rosewell creek in particular; rather I am speaking generally. Damage might be caused by the flow of water. Erosion might be caused by the natural flow of water, or by logs coming down from the mountains. Or damage might be caused by depositing gravel on a good agricultural piece of land.

If we were undertaking to pay damages in all these cases we would be going very far. If that were so, any farmers around the St. Lawrence river could come each spring and ask us to pay damages because the water had gone too high, and had caused erosion here and there.

However, I may assure my hon. friend that if any damage is caused by our work we will look for the cause, and recommend that proper damages be paid. But I do not think it will be paid through my department. It will have, first of all, to pass the Minister of Justice. My officials cannot decide whether or not the government is responsible. I can make recommendations according to what my officials say.

So far as Rosewell creek is concerned, I would ask my officials to make another inquiry—although I understand inquiries were made previously before I came to the department.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the minister for his viewpoint. But he is entirely mistaken if he thinks that I, or anyone else, would be so foolish as to ask his department to pay out something, or to pay damages, unless his department were responsible. We all know what the law is in regard to these matters. We would not present our cases, if we did not know where the responsibility was. But this is a case—and there are others—where damage was clearly done because of the action of the Department of Fisheries. Had the department left things alone, no harm would have been done. But they went in, in order to make a way for the salmon, and caused certain changes, which resulted in letting the salmon get by. It does not matter what those changes were. It was in consequence of the work that these men are suffering.

The minister says that he will have to consult the Department of Justice. I accept that statement, with regret, because there is such a thing as legal justice. and there is such a thing as model or fair justice. Anyone knows that the legal department—and I am sorry the minister is not here, because he would support me in what I say—is too often concerned with the strict law in a matter. If the law says so-and-so, then it is just too bad for some poor fellow who is seeking relief. But there is such a thing as fair law—I forget the Latin expression—but a law which means fairness between man and man. It is that kind of justice I should like to invoke.

I would hope that the minister, with that fairness he has exhibited in other matters, would give full consideration to this one. I would also ask him to remember this, that there is such a thing as human nature, and also such a thing as an official out in British Columbia having made a mistake, and being unwilling to admit it. Rather than admit it he will try to jam it through, and say that no damage was done—first of all, that there was nothing done, and, second, that there was no damage.

The facts are, however, that the work was done, and damage resulted. If the minister says that he has an engineer out there, sent from Ottawa, I shall be hopeful. I can understand that he would take a practical view of the matter.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would be sorry if my hon. friend would suggest that I am reflecting on his knowledge of the law. Although I understand he is not a lawyer, he has shown in many instances that he has great knowledge of the law.

With regard to the question of justice between man and man, and legal justice, I believe there are quite a number of authors who have defined justice between man and man. One has said that, after all, it is a matter of following the law of the country.

However, with respect to Rosewell creek, the hon. member will understand that an engineer from this department is looking into the matter. I want to give satisfaction—not against, but with the law, if it is possible.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. HAZEN: A few years ago a fishway was erected at St. George, New Brunswick, to enable salmon to enter the Magaguadavic river. Have satisfactory results been obtained from that fishway?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): My officials instruct me that we have had good results from the fishway, and that it is working properly.

Item agreed to.

72. Development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $30,000.

Mr. POTTIER: I notice there is a decrease of $10,000 in this item, and I should like to know the reason for this decrease. I wish to know if sufficient inspectors are being appointed to take care of a serious situation in western Nova Scotia. After all, this is an item which affects sea fisheries, and it affects a situation which is developing there. In the past we have produced what is known as boneless fish, and that has gone to the United States—at least by far the largest portion of it. At the present time the quota law provides that sixty-five per cent of 1941-42 production will be permitted to go to the United States. This means that the fish which used to be made into boneless will have to be diverted, and go to one of the following markets: Canadian consumption, probably dried fish to the West Indies, and elsewhere, and then to the United Kingdom.

That means of exit to the United Kingdom is looked upon at present as the way out. I urge that every assistance and cooperation be given to the fishing industry to bring that about, particularly in areas in Nova Scotia. Certificates of quality must be provided. I am afraid there is a tendency to have a scarcity of inspectors. I urge upon the Department that that danger be avoided, and that there be no hesitancy about providing inspectors, wherever they are in centres where fishing is conducted, so that the quality will be such as is required for shipment to the United Kingdom.

There were just those two things I wished to comment on. I wanted to know, first, why there is a decrease and, second, if sufficient inspectors will be provided to ensure the quality of our fish, so that there will be no delays in shipments to the United Kingdom.

There were just those two things I wished to comment on. I wanted to know, first, why there is a decrease and, second, if sufficient inspectors will be provided to ensure the quality of our fish, so that there will be no delays in shipments to the United Kingdom.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This vote is decreased by $10,000 because the activities of certain officers have been transferred to vote 70, which is increased by $63,300. The chief supervisor is in the district at the present time looking over the situation. He will make a report and I imagine that more inspectors will be appointed.

Mr. POTTIER: An emergency exists.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The supervisor is there looking over the situation.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What is being done to develop deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish? The hon. member for St. John-Albert raised the broader question of what the department was doing; what measures were being introduced to see that fishermen in the years immediately ahead will not be faced with the conditions they suffered in the year immediately before the war. I think the minister knows that there was not a single class of citizen in this country exploited to the same extent as the fishermen, and certainly there is not a class of citizen which has been forced to live under such deplorable living conditions. Go along the coast of Prince Edward Island, of New Brunswick, of Nova Scotia; go into the fishing villages of Quebec and Ontario—I am not familiar with the western provinces—and you will see fishermen living in hovels no human being should be required to live in. It seems to me that something should be done to improve the future lot of these fishermen. All I can see in the item is provision for two lecturers, a little printing and some travelling expenses. Is there some other vote under which the minister can make some plans for the future?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In order to answer my hon. friend I would have to discuss some other items. The situation is much better to-day than it was. and I have never known it to be as described by the hon. member. However, I was not Minister of Fisheries at that time. Our main purpose is to try to keep the level of income of the fisherman as it is to-day. I should not like to go into the details of our programme at this time, because I would have to repeat myself later on. We are helping the fisherman to get better boats which will permit him to land more fish in better condition. We are helping him to bring his fish to the consumer in the best possible form.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is the department considering the use of aeroplanes to bring fish from the fishing grounds direct to the markets?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Aviation has not advanced sufficiently to make it commercially possible to bring fish to market by aeroplane. They would have to go by air express and the rates are too high. I do not think we need that. If the fisherman takes good care of his fish; if he does not stay too long at sea; if he has enough ice for the time he is at sea and brings his fish in in good condition, then we intend to help him. I think with the ordinary facilities we have for bringing fish to the consumers' market we can deliver the fish in good condition. The problem is to help the fishermen catch more fish.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: How are you doing that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We want to process the fish immediately it is landed on the wharf and to have a continuity of supply. One of the greatest handicaps facing the fisherman is the fact that fish are plentiful at certain times and scarce at others. At times we have too much fish and then, when the consumers want fish, we sometimes find we have none. We are trying to develop better fishing methods by means of the use of draggers and long liners and so on.

Mr. POTTIER: I understand that at a later stage the minister is going to give a general statement on the development of the fisheries. I had intended to make reference to a minimum price on fish, but time does not permit. I intend to bring that point up later.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One thing we never could understand in Toronto was the tremendous spread between what the fisherman got and what the people had to pay for his fish in the stores. Before the war the fishermen used to get about half a cent a pound for haddock which would sell in the stores in Toronto for from twenty to twenty-five cents a pound. That does not seem to make sense. If the minister wants to get at the bottom of this problem and increase the demand for fish he must see that the fish is offered for sale at a reasonable price.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The merchants might be responsible.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The merchants are not responsible because I have taken that matter up with them.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 29, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, 28th June, 1944.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Friday, the 30th June, at 5.50 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

STANDING ORDERS

Second and third reports of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Golding.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

BEER BOTTLES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many, (a) carloads; (b) dozens of empty beer bottles have been shipped out of Nova Scotia under administrator's order No. A-505 of the wartime prices and trade board since it became effective December 11, 1942, stating the places from which such shipments were made?

2. By whom were such shipments made?

3. Has the government or the wartime prices and trade board given consideration to the cancellation of order No. A-505, and if so, what decision has been arrived at?

4. What is the present necessity for continuance in effect of such order?

Mr. ABBOTT:

Shipped by	(a) Carloads	(b) Dozens of empty beer bottles
Consumer Bottle Company..	161	40,250
Provincial Bottle Exchange..	272	108,250

3. Since there has been no improvement in the glass situation, the cancellation of order No. A-505 is not under consideration at the present time.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

4. There are no beer bottles manufactured in the maritime provinces. Under the provisions of order No. A-505, the local brewers are assured of their requirements of used beer bottles as they become available within the province, and the balance of bottles remaining after the local requirements have been met, are shipped under permit as nearly as possible on an equitable distribution basis to those breweries in Ontario and Quebec who deliver beer to the maritimes, so that they may be provided with empty bottles with which to fill the quotas of beer set for them by the liquor commissioners of the maritimes.

MOBILIZATION ACT—ENLISTMENTS, DISCHARGES, ETC.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men during each of the months of March, April and May of 1944 have, (a) enlisted for active service in the army; (b) been enrolled under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

2. During each of the said months, how many men have been discharged from the army?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. (a) March—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 3,397 including 389 men previously enrolled as N.R.M.A. soldiers.

April—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 4,302 including 1,429 men previously enrolled as N.R.M.A. soldiers.

May—Estimated: 3,800 including 700 men previously enrolled as N.R.M.A. soldiers.

(b) March—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 1,838.

April—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 1,552.

May—Estimated: 2,000.

2. March—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 5,634.

April—According to documents received at the records office up to 22 June, 1944: 5,111.

May—Estimated: 5,000.

NOTE.—Figures for the month of May have been estimated to allow for the proportion of documents pertaining to that month still outstanding at the 22 June, 1944.

MOBILIZATION ACT—ABSENTEES AND DESERTERS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many absentees and deserters, by provinces or military districts, have been located since the 1st of May, 1944, as a result of the sending out of letters to the next of kin seeking information regarding the men involved?

2. How many letters were sent out, and in how many cases were replies received?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

Note

(a) The details respecting each absentee or deserter in M.D. 1 are being checked. Pending such check no letters have been dispatched from that district.

(b) A small part of northwestern Quebec is in M.D. 3.

(c) A small part of northwestern Ontario is in M.D. 10.

(d) Not included in this number are a number of men who have surrendered since the sending out of these letters. It is not know whether they did so as a result of the letters.

* DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—R. M. CHARPENTIER

Mr. DORION:

1. Since January 1, 1940, has R. M. Charpentier been in the employ of the Department of Labour, or rendered any services to the said department, or received any money from the said department for any reason?

2. If so, (a) when; (b) under what conditions; (c) what was his remuneration?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

VETERANS GUARD—RESERVE UNITS

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Are reserve units of the veterans guard being disbanded?

2. If so, as at what date, and for what reasons?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes. Fifteen reserve companies of the veterans guard have been disbanded.

2. They were disbanded effective 15 May, 1944. The reason for the disbandment of these units was that they were either dormant or operating at low strength.

EDDY MATCH COMPANY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government granted priorities to the Eddy Match Company for the construction and/or provisions of plant, and/or repairs at Pembroke, Ontario?

2. If so, was any material for which priorities were granted subsequently diverted by the company for actual use at Haileybury, Ontario?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No application has been received from the Eddy Match company for priority assistance involving alteration or construction of premises at any of their plants. An application was received covering the importation from the United States of one angledozer which was required for the building of new roads through pulp wood areas which this company was opening. The application was applied for on March 13, 1944, and a preference rating of AA-3 was assigned by the department on March 29, 1944.

2. No information. Please see answer to question 1.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. DORION:

What is the set-up of the national film board?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Major General the Honourable L. R. LaFleche, chairman, and the following members: the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Dr. Georges Bouchard, J. F. MacNeill, M. M. Maclean, C. G. Cowan, Edmond Turcotte, Donald Cameron.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD—J. D. KETCHUM

Mr. DORION:

1. Is Mr. J. D. Ketchum working for the wartime information board?

2. If so, (a) in what capacity; (b) what is his occupation; (c) since when; (d) what is his racial origin; (e) is he a British subject by birth or by naturalization; (f) what were his former occupations?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. Yes.

2. (a) In charge of reports branch; (b) editing publications and dealing with inquiries; (c) September, 1943; (d) Canadian; (e) by birth; (f) associate professor of psychology, university of Toronto.

CANADIAN ARMY—CENTRAL MECHANIZATION DEPOT, LONDON, ONT.

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Will the Minister of National Defence inform the house whether an investigation has been instituted into alleged irregularities at the central mechanization depot in London, Ontario?

2. If such an investigation is taking place, what irregularities, if any, have been discovered?

3. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the possibility of irregularities in other divisions of military district No. 1, and will the minister consider instituting an investigation into the administration of the entire district?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes.

2. Court of inquiry is now sitting, but has not yet reported. It is not known what irregularities if any have been discovered.

3. No. Nothing has been brought to the minister's attention to indicate the necessity for an investigation into the administration of M.D. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

R.C.A.F.—EQUIPMENT DEPOTS—STATIONERY AND PRINTING PURCHASES

Mr. BENCE:

1. What is the total value of stationery and printing ordered for delivery to R.C.A.F. equipment depots in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, in the twelve-month period extending from May 1, 1943, to May 1, 1944?

2. To what firms were such orders given and what was the total value of orders to each of such firms during the said period?

INDIAN AFFAIRS—P.E.I. AGENT

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. Were the services of Neil A. McDougall, Indian agent, on Prince Edward Island satisfactory during his term of service?

2. Was Neil A. McDougall employed as migratory bird officer in the maritime division? If so, were his services satisfactory?

3. What were the terms of his employment as Indian agent, and what salary did he receive?

4. Was his position as Indian agent in Prince Edward Island abolished? If so, what was the reason?

5. Is the position of Indian agent in Prince Edward Island now a full time job?

6. Who is the present incumbent of the position of Indian agent in Prince Edward Island, and what is his salary?

7. Was the appointment of Indian agent of Prince Edward Island made under the Civil Service Act; was an examination of applicants for the position held, and if so, where?

8. Was the examination written or oral; how many applicants were there, and what were the names of the applicants?

9. Was Neil A. McDougall an applicant for the position of full time Indian agent for Prince Edward Island? If so, did he receive the appointment?

10. Was his rating, experience, knowledge of Indian affairs and general character inferior to the successful applicant?

11. Was Neil A. McDougall a veteran of world war number one?

12. If so, was he wounded overseas?

13. Does he receive a disability pension? If so, what is his disability?

14. When applicants were being examined for the position of full-time Indian agent for Prince Edward Island, were the provisions of subsection 4 of section 29 of the Civil Service Act observed and respected?

15. What reason has been advanced for the abolition of the position of part-time Indian agent for Prince Edward Island and the creation of a full-time position as Indian agent?

PRIME MINISTER FRASER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ARRIVAL IN CANADA—PROPOSED ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I came in to the house this afternoon I was informed that the plane which was bringing the Right Hon. Peter Fraser to Canada had arrived at Boucherville a few minutes before three. As I told hon. members on a previous occasion I had invited Mr. Fraser to visit Ottawa on his way back to New Zealand. On behalf of both houses I also extended to him an invitation to address members of both houses of parliament when he was here. Mr. Fraser has kindly consented to do that, and will address the members of both houses of parliament to-morrow afternoon.

I have been speaking with His Honour the Speaker about the arrangements, and I believe it will suit the convenience of all if we follow the same procedure as when the Right Hon. Mr. Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia, was here, that is to say, have hon. members assemble at three o'clock to hear the address by Mr. Fraser and after the address is concluded then have the house begin its regular proceedings. When Mr. Curtin was here, on behalf of both houses and of all political parties in the house I extended a welcome to him and asked my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) to join with me in making it apparent that the welcome was unanimous. Since that time I believe a question was raised as to why an invitation had not been extended to the leader, or at that time the acting leader, of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party also to join in extending a welcome; and that would, I assume, apply also to the leader of the Social Credit group, though no question was raised at that time by any member—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the other parties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is speaking of other parties and putting in a word for them. I do not know whether he intended it as such or not. However, with regard to the welcome to Mr. Fraser, may I say I think it would be advisable to follow the same procedure as was followed in the case of the welcome to Mr. Curtin. May I say that in extending a welcome I am not doing so as the leader of a political party. Nor is Mr. Fraser being welcomed as the leader of a political party. The welcome that will be extended to Mr. Fraser by myself will be from me speaking as the Prime Minister of Canada to the Prime Minister of New Zealand as representing the government and the people of New Zealand. Our constitution does not take account of political parties as such, but it does take account of governments and oppositions. The leader of the opposition is a salaried officer of this house, and I have felt that to make it quite obvious that both the government and the opposition are agreed on the welcome extended I should ask my hon. friend to join with me in that welcome, but that does not mean that I am excluding any other parties. As I have said, we are not speaking as leaders of political parties, we are speaking in our representative capacities. The government is speaking as the government in office, and the opposition is being asked to join so as to make it perfectly clear that this is a matter above party in every particular. His Honour the Speaker of the House and His Honour the Speaker of the Senate will extend a word of thanks because of their official positions in their respective houses. I hope that will be satisfactory to all concerned. I just want to make quite clear to my hon. friends who are leading other parties or groups that it is not in any way the intention to pass them over. Five speeches will be delivered as it is and to add to that number would perhaps be going farther than we should.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say a word? I think the house will agree with me that we have never endeavoured to usurp any place in this house. On previous occasions when distinguished visitors have been welcomed we have not intruded upon the time of the house to any extent. The remarks made by the leader of the Social Credit group and myself have always been brief. I think the Prime Minister is quite right in saying that he speaks for the entire parliament, but I take a different view with regard to the opposition. I do not think the leader of the opposition can speak for my own party in this house.

Mr. HOMUTH: He never tried to.

Mr. COLDWELL: The supposition is that he does. I am stating my position very clearly. I think the precedents which have been established in this house over the past number of years ought to be followed in this particular, and I may say that we have a peculiar interest in the welcome extended to Mr. Fraser.

Some hon. MEMBERS: So have we.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not any more than anyone else.

Mr. COLDWELL: I entirely disagree with the procedure that is to be followed. I do not propose to create—I have never done so—any scene in the house on that occasion, but the policy which is now being laid down, if it is to be followed, will have to be followed closely in the future, both in this and in subsequent parliaments.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps this group pretty well agrees with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that on the occasion of the visit of any distinguished visitor the Prime Minister, who is the leader of the house, and the leader of the official opposition, together with your honour, might very well welcome that person on behalf of the entire house. However, the circumstances surrounding the visit of any prominent person to Canada are usually about the same. It is a matter of welcoming him; what one person can say can be said by anyone else, and in these matters there is a great deal of repetition. We do join with the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in saying that the leader of the official opposition does not speak for the entire opposition, for the reason that there are various schools of thought in Canada for whom I am afraid he cannot speak. I do not believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) can say that the visit of Mr. Fraser is of any more particular interest to his party than to anyone else. We are quite willing to abide by whatever decision may be arrived at, but we do ask that the ruling made be followed in future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) may I suggest that what he has just said illustrates the wisdom of not departing in the first instance from rules of procedure, but adhering strictly to them. I have tried, where it has been possible and convenient, to extend courtesies that did not strictly follow the rule; I have asked leaders of different groups to join in extending welcomes on such occasions, but my hon. friend will remember that when Mr. Eden addressed the house, while cordial welcomes were extended, they were overwhelming in number and in balance. By that I mean there was more in the way of welcome than there was in the way of reply from Mr. Eden. I was taken to task by the press, and there was a good deal of comment around the house as to why so many should be requested to extend a welcome, and for that reason I thought it would be wiser thereafter to limit the number. Perhaps my hon. friend has heard of the young man who was about to be married, and someone asked him why he had not asked his father to the wedding, and he replied that he had to draw the line somewhere.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): There is one happy aspect to all this, Mr. Speaker; the competition to welcome the Prime Minister of New Zealand seems to be very keen. I hope this word will be conveyed to him, because I think it is very much better that way than in the reverse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have sent it to him already by telegraph.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am going to deal with my right hon. friend in a moment in connection with another matter. When the Prime Minister speaks of drawing the line, perhaps he has drawn one already a little too fine, though of course it would be just like a bachelor Prime Minister to do this. I understand that Mrs. Fraser is to accompany her husband, but the Prime Minister has not said anything about her; neither have those interested gentlemen to my left. I think some expression of welcome should be extended to her also. Perhaps on this occasion the Prime Minister will want to make up for some of the things that have escaped him in the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can trust me to see that every courtesy is extended to Mrs. Fraser.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to say that I am very well satisfied to forgo my right as a leader of a group to participate in the welcome to our guest in favour of either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition; but if this principle of pandering to the vanity of individual groups is to be continued to its grotesque end, then I also want to be one of the speakers, seeing that the years of service of the party I represent far outdates those of the groups to my left.

INTERNMENTS

CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains): I gave notice to the Minister of Justice that I was going to ask him this question: Est-il vrai, tel qu'annoncé à la radio et publié dans les journaux, que le ministre a ordonné la libération de M. Camillien Houde?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman is inquiring whether a report, said to have been published in the newspaper and over the radio, that an order has been made for the release of Mr. Camillien Houde from internment, is correct. I do not know what may have been published in the newspapers or over the radio, but if that was said, certainly it is not true.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance, covering the annual expenditures of the government, has long since become a traditional custom in our form of parliamentary government. The people of Canada view with keen concern the heavy expenditures proposed in the budget now before the house. It is indeed a shocking reminder of the grim national purpose for which these expenditures are chiefly required. After almost five years of participation in civilization's most titanic conflict, our gallant forces are now engaged in a clash of arms more crucial than history has ever recorded. On many seas, in far-flung lands and in distant skies, they grapple with unprecedented forces to save our way of life. To those who have already laid their lives upon the altar of this nation's freedom we offer our deepest respect. To those who yet march in this great crusade we owe the full support of every fibre of our national being. Let us not boast, but humbly recollect that great expenditures of capital, great production of war materials or great debts for posterity are not the real sacrifices of war. The sacrifice of life and limb with the disillusioned hopes and aspirations of their family associates, is the greatest cost.

Since the outbreak of this war our people have stood ready to cooperate under courageous leadership which would fearlessly and swiftly marshal our great forces of men and resources. While our numbers are small, Mr. Speaker, no country engaged in this war has had a people more willing and capable, with resources more plentiful or better adapted for the great task of an allout war effort.

May I pay tribute to the valour and gallantry of our fighting forces in the tragic tests of land, sea and air battles. No finer generations of manhood and womanhood ever complemented this young nation than those young men and women who are to-day in His Majesty's forces. Secondly, may I pay tribute to those men and women who are not privileged to serve in physical conflict, but who have given their best skill and energy in toil and direction of factory and field production.

Our magnificent volume of production during these war years is indeed a great compliment to the genius of our people and the efficiency of our industrial organizations. No people were more fitted to meet this test than those whose lives have been free, whose experience has been in matching the forces of nature in a new country, where individual freedom in every creative sphere has developed independence, self-support and confidence in their own initiative.

The phenomenal production of war machines and munitions has been made possible, chiefly by the adaptability of our splendid workmen and the ingenuity of our technical and scientific men under the guidance and enterprise of well-trained industrial executives —some of the best-trained industrial executives of the world. These elements, supplemented by the thousands of agricultural workers and other primary producers unfolding the rich natural resources of this great country, have maintained Canada as a potent force in these tragic world affairs of to-day. Our progress in such production has been an important part of our war effort. While our numbers in the fighting forces are few, yet, associated with powerful and great fighting allies, we shall win this war.

We behind the lines are challenged so to direct our nation's affairs that it shall not be merely "victory at any cost" but "victory at a minimum cost"—that it shall not end as a "war won and a peace lost," that it shall not result in foreign slavery avoided and home freedom surrendered. We are challenged to provide a full all-out war effort by the maximum utilization of our man-power and resources. This is what we are asked to do to-day against terrific odds. Greater equality of service during this conflict—yes, and equality of opportunity in peace, are our people's right and our government's responsibility.

The budget that has been presented to this house covering the estimated expenditure of six billion dollars is the highest in the history of this dominion. In short, it is now proposed that this colossal undertaking shall be achieved by a policy of increased expenditures on the one hand, with decreased revenues and higher borrowing on the other. The old policies of pay as you go, and those safeguards from inflation we have heard so much about, and the control of ordinary expenditures, which were adopted for war, are now disbanded for election.

The most significant feature of this budget is this abrupt reversal of government policy, in this most critical period of the war. This dying government now lifts the lid from the inflation they have long since fought, in a last desperate bid for election at any cost.

The Minister of Finance in his speech on Monday night said:

> National income in 1943-44 was something like 12 per cent higher than in the preceding fiscal year.

That is for last year. And it enables him to follow more easily than ever before the policy which he has enunciated so vigorously in this house. Speaking directly on the question of the control of inflation the minister stated:

> The need for it is evident on every side. It is not without its irritations and disadvantages—

And those are nasty things in election years; he did not say that, but I say it. And may I add, he has had some experience, too, in elections.

> —but its beneficial results are beyond dispute. It is only necessary to remind the house that the government reaffirmed its policy in November last and again in March, and that the successful maintenance of that policy, through the period of active military operations in Europe and in the readjustment which will follow, will be even more important to this country than it has been in the past, and that it will be at least as difficult.

These are the minister's own words. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that after announcing a policy that repudiates control of inflation we find the minister stating, and I quote:

> I must repeat and emphasize that this proposal does not imply that the need for saving is less.

Still he takes the savings of the people back, and undoes the purpose for which those savings were taken away from the people in the first place. The child was born on this side of the house, reluctantly accepted on the other side, and forsaken before it was two years old. Why, Mr. Speaker? He states further:

> On the contrary, from every point of view, the need is greater than ever before. Civilian goods continue to be in relatively short supply, the demands from the war fronts are more imperative; and over-all cash requirements are mounting to new high levels.

I can well recall when the compulsory savings plan was adopted. Some may not have understood me when I said it was on this side of the house it was proposed, and it was on that side of the house compulsory savings were adopted. To-day they are disbanded when they are needed more. Why the inconsistencies of this budget are apparent even to a child, and the preelection bids can be seen by a blind man.

[Mr. Rowe.]

The proposal of the Prime Minister, which was referred to by the Minister of Finance the other day in his budget speech, regarding family allowances, to come into effect in July of 1945, is a strange advance notice for another parliament to carry into effect an election bid for power by a government that knows this parliament expires before that date. It uniquely disregards provincial rights, which are so often used as an excuse for the lack of policy regarding our natural resources. If this preelection paternalism is sound to propose this year, why wait to practise it next year? Is it because the dominion government know that this issue belongs to provincial jurisdiction? Do they expect this election bonus to be discussed by the dominion-provincial conference, and do they intend to leave it to that conference to share responsibility for its rejection? Every year since this war began, the Minister of Finance has been preaching about the dangers of inflation. Toward meeting such dangers the government inaugurated price control with speed and dispatch, and confiscated workmen's wages before they were received. These were imposed upon our people as war-time necessities to keep purchasing power down to a reasonable ratio to the rigidly rationed consumer goods. That principle, Mr. Speaker, was heralded as the bulwark against ruinous inflation. It was imposed upon the farmer, even though he well knew it was a frozen basis of unfair prices. It was imposed upon the workmen to the point where more work meant less pay. Indeed, it was given to every class within this nation as their war-time duty. Never during this war has inflation so dangerously threatened our economic stability as at the present. This is obvious to everyone. This we were told last Monday night by the Minister of Finance. Yet we now witness the spectacle of this floundering government, in a hopeless effort to buy its way back into power, reducing old taxes with one hand and giving out new hand-outs with the other, thinking not of the next generation but planning for the next election. If there ever was a time in our national life when we should not adopt a defeatist attitude by accepting a policy of paternalism that will establish in perpetuity a billion dollar annual budget for ordinary expenditures in Canada, it is now.

Has this government some secret assurance that the war will be over before the end of this fiscal year, or before the new responsibilities created by this preelection gesture will arise? Will any minister now rise in his place in this house to indicate that Germany will be subdued and Japan beaten before this fiscal year is out? No, but rather:

No one speaks because he does not know;
No one rises because he dare not rise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends may laugh, but they cannot tell us. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will not rise. No one sits closer to a job unfinished than he. I take second place to no man in my desire to give security to the people of Canada. I have suffered as much as any hon. member of this house in my regard for the problems of the labouring men and the poor people of this country, but I view the payment of cash bonuses to large families with well-founded doubt. When I think of the potential fathers of this nation battling far from home and dying to save our freedom, I can only see the acceptance of this reckless political bid for power at this time by any party as a piece of callous cynicism.

Great over-all schemes have been heralded by this government for many years. I have sat here and listened to them being announced periodically for periodic purposes. We have listened to the glittering generalities of security in the speech from the throne, and we recently heard about this preelection bid of cash hand-outs to families. These are not plans for health and welfare; these are government cheques for favour and popularity. This is cash which may not be spent for health or welfare. It can be spent according to the dictates of the father of the family who receives the cheque. Is there any assurance that these cheques will be used to pay dental bills or in connection with the health and welfare of the children? No. We believe that Canadians want most of all reasonable assurance of gainful employment and the dignity of self-support. We on this side of the house believe that under a sound social economy, dependency and poverty, with its sickness and suffering must be dealt with as a national problem. The party to which I belong does not take second place to any party in this house in its desire and determination to assure the provisions for a sound social security programme for this young dominion.

An hon. MEMBER: You are taking in a lot of territory.

Mr. ROWE: It does not take much territory to take you in. In order to establish a workable scheme by which a sound health and welfare programme may be made effective, I urge upon the government that they set up at once a dominion-provincial welfare and assistance fund. Why fool with this issue As a first payment the dominion should contribute to that fund a sum at least equal to our present contribution to the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. We are not afraid to be specific as to where we stand on the question of social protection for our people. I hear my hon. friends on the other side laughing, but they have followed their same policy since 1919; they have not changed it in twenty-five years, except to bring it out and dust it off for election purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You have changed leaders five times.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are going to change to another one now.

Mr. ROWE: Your leader may still be your head, but he will change places after the next election. The immediate steps by which we would expect to get our programme into motion are as follows:

1. The establishment of a dominion-provincial welfare and assistant fund, to which I have referred.

2. Set up a competent body of experts, nominated by all parties in the house, to examine the ill-conceived and half-digested proposals now suggested by the government, and report upon them. This body might be the reorganized social security committee of the house or a specially appointed commission of inquiry. In either case, its task would be to consider the problem of social welfare in its entirety as a national problem, and not as an exigency of party politics.

3. The summoning of qualified persons nominated by the provinces to confer with the commission of inquiry set up by this parliament.

4. To convene the representatives of the provinces for a dominion-provincial conference as each item of an integrated programme reaches the stage of report.

5. To free the financial assistance, in the way of public health grants to provincial governments, from the unworkable insurance sections of the proposed national health and insurance act, and make them immediately available to the provincial governments.

6. To extend grants from the dominion-provincial welfare fund to each province in accordance with its needs so that it may enlarge its hospital facilities, nursing services and clinics in urban, rural and hinterland areas. Under this heading also we suggest that the dominion government share with the provinces the burden of new capital expenditure for hospitals, convalescent homes and homes for the aged. This can be done by the provision of funds, grants of federal land, buildings and equipment.

7. To raise the standard of nutrition by education and by assisting the marketing and distribution of essential foods to Canadian families of small means, especially where there are young children.

8. To utilize the dominion-provincial conferences for the drafting of housing plans for urban and rural communities with a view to reallocating population as economic and hygienic considerations demand. The scope of such plans should include provision for wider electrification of rural homes, and the improvement of homes now occupied by families in the low income group.

9. To see that all residual problems of social assistance, such as provision for the aged, blind, handicapped or dependent persons, can be dealt with swiftly and flexibly. This purpose can best be served by developing provincial agencies, assisted by the dominion welfare fund. Local administration of such agencies is essential if each case is to be treated on its own merits.

10. To develop a system of contributory social insurance against the ordinary hazards of community life on a sound actuarial basis, with the dominion government holding and guaranteeing the reserves, rather than resorting to handouts such as the family allowance proposal.

I believe that during these tragic war years we surely must have learned a lot. I believe we have learned more than we ever learned before. The importance of health and fitness of our men and women has been brought home to us more forcibly than we thought possible. The health of a citizen in British Columbia or in Prince Edward Island is just as important to the sound stability of this nation as the health of a citizen in Ontario or any other province. We can maintain our social services in sound unison with that forward-marching enterprise and development awaiting this young country, if we but use our common sense. The policy I have proposed decentralizes control instead of ignoring the right and function of other legislative bodies.

Health and welfare will then cease to be an election football. The hon. members who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, have kicked it around the political field ever since their convention of 1919, twenty-five years ago.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And there has not been a touchdown yet.

Mr. ROWE: When this sounder programme is put into effect, it should be to the mutual interest of all legislative bodies, independent of politics, to carry it out in the common and broad interests of our national health and welfare, about which there cannot be much issue. Why should the matter of health be kept in the federal field when originally under the British North America Act it was not so intended? We realize that we are entering a new age and that after the war we shall need more health and welfare services. Let us meet the issue now, instead of talking about it every four years and then dropping it. Let us meet it now, once for all, so that it will be dealt with consistently in the future.

It is not my purpose to criticize in detail the budget or the many errors in the administration of last year's budget, nor yet the personnel of the government that sits to your right, Mr. Speaker. However, I deem it my duty, representing truly Progressive Conservative principles, to offer a constructive warning against the tendency of the present administration. May I therefore confine my observations chiefly to the trend towards bureaucratic control, the failure to marshal our forces, the unsoundness of our excessive taxation, unbridled expenditures, and the disparity of farm prices.

The trend of government policy in regard to these matters is to-day halting individual enterprise and beckoning state control. In patriotic submission our people have yielded to controls, regulations, restraints and restrictions to assist the government in its gigantic task. However, our people expect the minimum of these bureaucratic controls, even in war time, and most certainly they expect their elimination after the war if peace time freedom is to be restored in this dominion. Under the War Measures Act the powers of the executive are almost unlimited. Such authority can become a danger to democratic institutions, even if it can temporarily be reconciled as a war necessity. For many years we have been lectured in this house on the rights of parliament. The present Prime Minister has opposed most vigorously the vicious practice of government by order in council. As I listened to him in my younger days in the house he was an inspiration to me with respect to the rights of parliament, but not so much to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: He has lost his glamour.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says that he has lost his glamour. I think of all the inconsistencies between his preaching and his practice. Long ago he stated in this house that government by order in council should end. He will remember well that statement. He said that it was opposed to representative government. True, we are in war and we must have some regimentation, but it is alarming to see so many of the functions of this house relegated to the secret chambers of the east block, where the tired and weary executive give new powers of executive control to boards which are not responsible to the people or to this parliament. Government by order in council is now common practice, and it is frequently abused by amending purely civil statutes, as well as meeting war emergencies with departmental administration rapidly surrendering its functions to complete bureaucratic control.

The consideration of taxation problems used to be foremost among the functions of this house. Our people knew what was going to happen; they knew the rates that were levied; the rates were common knowledge. But under the present system of government by order in council, hundreds and hundreds of tariff changes are made and thrust upon private enterprise with shocking suddenness. Since the war began over 45,000 orders in council have been passed, and my hon. friend behind me says that another armful came over from the east block to-day. These orders in council have been passed in ever-growing disregard for the rights of parliament itself. Twenty-five orders in council are being passed every day that this parliament sits. Many excellent men are struggling to carry on this bureaucratic muddle which the government has established. On the good personalities of these controllers I shall not hesitate to comment. Under the authority of the War Measures Act the wartime prices and trade board issues a new unprecedented licence to exist to different enterprises almost every morning. This added uncertainty, at a time when the government's tariff policy is known to no one and its taxation laws are understood by so few, shatters the confidence in government that is so essential for the progress of this dominion. How in these circumstances can the executives in industry and commerce, to whom we must look for the planning and utilization of our resources after this war, prepare to give full employment to our returned soldiers and war workers when the war ends?

The vital spirit that lies behind the responsibility of parliament must not continue to be smothered under the War Measures Act. Although parliament freely gave the executive certain rights, unless the abuse of such rights is checked, this house, as the citadel of our freedom, will become the home of a new autocracy.

The normal policies of government have been conspicuously replaced by administrators' orders, commission regulations, and board controls, authorized by order in council instead of by parliament, and applied without notice, as the expediency of each day arises. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this fourth arm of government, established for a just purpose but extended evidently by design, threatens to undermine the bulwarks of our democracy.

With such a lack of policy for war, is it any wonder our people search in so many new fields of thought for a policy for peace? In 1939, when war was declared no fixed policy on its execution was decided. Some believed that we had a limited liability. Some believed our participation should be one of production. It was only after a careful review of every political aspect of our sovereign rights that we, all too late, joined the commonwealth air training plan. For almost a year, the war raged close to the gates of Britain before even an inventory of our human resources was taken. This was to be the basis and beginning of our man-power planning. Slowly and cautiously, a thirty-day compulsory training scheme was born, enlarged into a four-month plan in 1941, later to grow into the now infamous home defence plan. In 1942, the national selective service plan was born after the advent of the now historic plebiscite. The Prime Minister then said: "It is imperative that the services of all should be directed into wartime tasks," and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said: "Even the girls must be taken from the 'golden slipper' trades."

One of the government's famous information bureaus, ponderously toiling on into the night, to save their master's face, told our people that selective service meant just what it said—"placing each where he could serve best." After five years of floundering uncertainty, we now have the glaring spectacle of national humiliation, in a policy that is costing this country between $150 and $200 million per annum. To maintain an army where there is no fighting, men from field, forest, factory and store, has created a vital jam in every production front at home, and has mocked the tragic need on every fighting front abroad.

For the honour of Canada I urge the government now to remove the political halo that surrounds this most ridiculous camouflage, and turn these able-bodied men back to the farms, the factories and the forests where they can produce for victory until they are marshalled for the more vital service for which they were conscripted. To-day there is no government policy to send this home army overseas, and no purpose to keep them here. On every front, at home and abroad, our comrades plead for men.

The government is fearful to move forward and ashamed to turn back. I do not know how my hon. friend can laugh. Canada is not laughing with him; the boys overseas are not laughing with him.

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid they are laughing at the hon. member, though.

Mr. ROWE: To-day, Mr. Speaker, 75,000 of these men stand at ease without a mission, while the government adds another $150 million per year to the taxpayers' burden. Indeed, they are not as useful here in Canada for an all-out war effort as the lost legion which my hon. friends refuse to seek, or the forty-nine thousand and one men whom they admit they cannot find. The folly of building such a defence force at home while our allies fight the enemy three thousand miles away is recognized by all. Indeed, the school children are talking about it. They are not needed here to win over there. Surely when our best men are dying for our freedom we can take our people into our confidence and view the reality of things as they are. Let us tell the people the truth. Let the government say why they are exercising the policy of conscripting men from useful toil and withholding the power to direct them for the purpose for which they are required. That is the question I leave with the government. They have tampered with it for four years and they might have tampered with it until Britain, the citadel of freedom, had fallen—all for what? Well, Canada will answer, and the people in my hon. smiling friend's riding also, will answer.

The magnitude of the present budget proposals indicates the tremendous tax obligations that must be met by the all too few taxpayers of Canada. It anticipates the ability of the people to pay, and it reflects again the fact that no similar number of people in the world have ever enjoyed such abundant resources. I submit that the taxation forms should be simplified and should more clearly indicate what the taxpayer is required to pay. To-day they are subject to various interpretations. The present tendency towards more complicated systems shows us that we shall rapidly become a nation of bookkeepers unless there is a change in this trend. Parliament is, or rather was, the only constitutional taxing authority; yet in many cases to-day, taxes are not only collected according to the discretion of the minister, but they are fixed by the decision of departmental officials far removed from the house. Such bureaucratic taxation must not become a part of our democratic system.

To-day, after five years of war, many companies do not know where they stand. The annual financial returns of shareholders must state, "amount of taxes cannot yet be determined." In view of the government's failure to simplify the taxation forms, I recommend that a thorough investigation be made to devise methods of reducing the national waste of labour and time in the preparation of income tax returns. To-day few people understand them, and they have grown to be a burden to the government as well as to the taxpayers.

Our complicated tax structure is a serious problem, and the unsatisfactory state of affairs that arises in its administration is equally disturbing. The treasury seems to have developed a bureaucratic attitude towards the nation's producers, and an unwarranted lack of confidence in the common taxpayer's integrity. The purpose of our taxes to-day might well be said to be twofold. The first is to raise needed revenue, and the second is to prevent inflation by restricting purchasing power. The spirit of tax collection to-day seems to be the extraction of as much as possible for the immediate requirements of the treasury, with a reckless disregard for the expansion, employment and survival of industry.

In the interests of our longer-term economy, there is a limit to the extent to which taxation can be carried. Canada's debt to-day is about $11 billion. The carrying charges of this, and added war requirements, plus a long list of new social services that are proposed, constitute an unprecedented challenge to our people and our resources which can only be met by the soundest utilization of every potentiality of this nation. However, our task must be to win the war. Before considering a general modification of the tax structure, to preserve our ability to produce, we must meet the war emergencies.

Our first task, I say is, to win the war. We must look to the future. The minister has told us that the present critical man-power shortage is seriously aggravated by absenteeism and refusal to work overtime. I submit that the present budget offers no effective solution to this problem. Now that the war has reached its most critical stage and every ounce of our energy must be mobilized behind our fighting men, the basis of taxation of the industrial worker should be on the standard weekly hours he works, without any tax on overtime for those who are ready to give this much-needed extra service until victory is achieved. If our people are to carry the burden that will remain on their shoulders many years after the war is over, our basic sources of revenue must be preserved and expanded. The present haphazard taxation system must be placed on a more scientific basis or the wellsprings of revenue will dry up.

Taxation of the farmers' income is perhaps the most complicated and in some respects the most unfair. The farmer may invest $5,000 in high-class live stock, and he and his son after fifteen years of diligent care may be able to make a special sale of the best part of the herd for a substantial sum, on which he is now subject to general income tax levies of one year's profit.

Mr. GIBSON: That is not correct—it is averaged back five years.

Mr. ROWE: In fairness to the farmers, and as a means of providing a greatly needed incentive to investment in the improvement of agriculture I urge the immediate revision of income tax levies on farm incomes so that annual sales shall not establish the excess profits of a special sales year but shall be calculated on the average income for a six year period.

Revision of the corporation taxation laws is no less required for industrial concerns. The present system of double taxation, through corporate and personal income tax collections, is not only discouraging industrial enterprise but is penalizing the individual shareholder. Those who have small investments in corporations are often indirectly paying from 50 to 60 per cent income tax on earnings of such money and when such dividends as are left are received, they are taxed again at the rate of the individual's general income. There is a discrimination against the small shareholder whose investment income has been taxed on the high rate, while his personal income may be much lower. The shareholder, on the other hand, who is in the higher income brackets, finds the earning of the capital he invests in industry taxed by a company rate of perhaps sixty per cent, and the balance he receives taxed another sixty per cent as his individual rate. This is a dangerous type of taxation that defeats its own purpose. Money invested in industry to employ labour and produce wealth should yield a better return at least than money loaned in government bonds, where no such risk is involved.

It must never be forgotten that the power to tax is the power to destroy. The first step towards such destruction is the imposition of rates so excessive that the incentive for greater production is gone. While there is a limit to borrowing, there should also be a limit to taxing. Heavy debt is not desirable, but excessive taxation can well become disastrous. If we are to meet the world competition of post-war days in giving employment to our people, taxation must be reduced as soon as possible.

Some of the revisions I believe most vital for the employment of our people through the necessary encouragement to capital investment are: First, the elimination of the double taxation now imposed on company and shareholders. This would give the same encouragement to industry and employment in Canada as is now given in Great Britain. Second, the revision of the present rigid regulations of the income tax rules so that depreciation allowance could be made flexible enough to include obsolescence now so recklessly disregarded. Third, the earliest possible elimination of all sales tax on building constructions that are to be used to give employment to our people.

Taxation, Mr. Speaker, is an important policy as well as a means of compelling the public to furnish the expenses of government. This is a fact too often forgotten by governments which seem to prefer to cloak the levies they make upon the people and disguise them in all sorts of ways. Most taxes are obtained by diverting some part of the stream of commerce into the national treasury. Until the war, the direct taxation of personal income, which is now the most just and straightforward of all forms of taxation, yielded but a small part of our national revenue. Prior to that, the great bulk of revenue came from tolls and penalties on the production and sale, the transport and the import of products and other sources. What the private citizen saved in income tax he paid out in the increased price of all that he purchased. It was a case of painless extraction. To-day these nuisance taxes still persist. Commercial and industrial processes which give employment to thousands must now hurdle all the fences which the government puts in their way as the price of doing business, and the private citizen knows little of what it costs him to maintain the luxury of government. His personal income tax is the one thing which reminds him of his citizenship in this dominion, and this is a burden which the largest part of our people never carried before the war because exemptions were high enough that only a minority paid income tax. To-day they are somewhat bewildered, and in truth I believe that the government is bewildered as well. The income tax branch must be bewildered; for a task has been thrust upon it which is much greater than it was designed or equipped to perform. The result has been that far too much authority has been given to the minister and delegated by him to the heads of his department. The deputy minister, in practice, takes the framework of a tax policy that leaves parliament and fills in the detail at his own discretion. He makes assessments and reassessments; he makes regulations and has recourse to all the machinery for collection of what he considers due him and his department. He is clothed with power, and against his authority the private citizen stands naked and unarmed.

If, in his bewilderment, the taxpayer miscalculates and overpays the government, there is no such ready means of recovery at his command. Section 56 of the Income War Tax Act provides only that the minister may refund an overpayment, provided application in writing is made therefor by the taxpayer. No one says the minister must. There is no equality or justice in the arrangement. The time is long overdue when the administration of income tax should be democratized, the powers of the minister limited and defined, and the machinery for protecting the citizen against arbitrary decisions made readily accessible. In Great Britain and in the United States the private citizen is better protected against both faulty assessment and improper collection. His complaint of overpayment is swiftly dealt with. I regret the tendency which seems to have been fostered by this government during the last decade under which the public business, which is everybody's business, is treated as though it were nobody's business, save only those who are clothed in the mantle of governmental authority. I may say for myself and I believe for my colleagues in this party, that we stand for strict limitation of personal authority in public service, and for ready access to impartial tribunals for those of our citizens who feel that they have been wrongly or harshly treated. We believe, too, that the people, as masters of the state and not its servants, are entitled to a regular and honest accounting.

It was inevitable that the prosecution of war would result in more debt and vastly increased taxation, but it was not inevitable that the principle of accountability should shrink to a corresponding degree, nor was it inevitable that the ordinary expenditures, exclusive of war costs, instead of being curtailed as this government promised when it took office, should have expanded from an actual expenditure of $413,032,000 in the fiscal year 1938-39 to $630,215,000 in the fiscal year 1943-44. What justification can there be for this increase when the population is fully employed and the demand for public services is reduced? If this disregard for prudence is to be observed in routine matters, what conclusions are we to draw concerning the expenditure of the billions of dollars earmarked for war purposes? No one who has any pretensions to patriotism wishes to be niggardly in giving support to our fighting forces. But equally it must be said that no one with any pretension to patriotism would wish to limit the support which can be given to the fighting forces by permitting a riot of wasteful expenditure at home to consume the resources of this nation. What is the situation? The taxpayers do not know. Neither do the members of this house. For a while their apprehensions were allayed by the creation of a war expenditures committee, which was heavily weighted by the followers of the present government, and from the deliberations of which that greatest bulwark of our liberties, the press, was rigidly excluded.

The people of this country are entitled to know whether the most important of their enterprises has been conducted efficiently, honestly and prudently. The war expenditures committee has lost the confidence of the people, and for that reason I think it should be disbanded. Its sittings are a waste of time; its deliberations are a mockery; it is not a satisfactory substitute for the public accounts committee or any other committee which may be named. It is hedged with secrecy; it conceals the truth. It is not a fearless agency for exposing the real facts. Have we reached the stage, Mr. Speaker, where about these great expenditures we have to listen only to the tired voice of this exhausted government?

This country stands at the cross-roads. One road points on toward wider fields of human endeavour and the other toward closer restriction and regimentation by state control. That "he who runs may read" is as true as ever, it goes without saying. It requires $5,000 investment in plant and equipment to employ one family head in industry. We as a parliament should be consistent in aims to encourage post-war prosperity and employment. When such investment in private industry ceases to be an attraction to the individual, the employment of our people becomes the responsibility of the state. Enterprise is then no longer general, and initiative ceases to be personal, while a government monopoly will direct our course and dictate our destiny. So to-day we observe the old reactionaries to your right, Mr. Speaker, taxing out individual enterprise, and the new voices of an older socialism to my left endeavouring to "talk in" state control. The Progressive Conservative party offers progressive and creative alternatives to a people determined to maintain the individual freedom and virility that has built this nation, the same virility and freedom from which must arise the initiative and enterprise if Canada is to reach her deserved destiny as the most progressive and prosperous nation in the post-war era.

We trust the dawn of peace may soon return. Swift changes inevitably must follow. In all conscience our first obligation must be to the dependents of those who have made the supreme sacrifice and those who may be disabled. Second only to the medical care and vocational training of those unfit to assume their intended places comes the provision of general opportunities for all members of His Majesty's forces. No government or enterprise which forgets these men who have a "G.S." on their tunic sleeves will be worthy of a place in our national life. We shall have thousands and thousands more who have learned to work and produce as never before. That productive ability is a new asset. Indeed, Canada's hope for the future is work. The products of the toil of our people must be for the service of each other rather than for the purpose of destruction.

The farm, the forest, the mine and our fisheries must be coordinated in their true greatness with the vast industrial capacity now available. Home and other markets must be established on a larger scale if we are to maintain employment and a reasonable standard of living in post-war years. This objective can be achieved only to the extent that we equalize conditions as between our primary and secondary producers.

In this regard I want to mention the place and importance of agriculture. The farmers of Canada, with their 750,000 families, constitute the greatest potential market for manufactured goods of any class of our people. Despite the all too prevalent disparity of prices which they have endured for many years, prior to the war they purchased about fifty per cent of all the manufactured goods sold in this country; they provided one-quarter of all the railway freight, and nearly all the truck transportation. During several pre-war years about forty per cent of Canada's exports were agricultural products. It is generally conceded that the rural population provides the largest domestic market for the products of Canadian industry. However, it is equally true that the purchasing power of the farmer can be no more than his earnings. The total of wages to be divided among our working men and women is influenced greatly by the amount made available by our basic or primary producers. It has been recognized long since that the degree of unemployment is in ratio to the degree of disparity in earnings as between primary and secondary producers. Our maximum production, employment and consequent prosperity can be maintained only by the equalization of conditions among the various economic groups of our country.

No class of people actually needs more manufactured goods than the farmer. Only a very few of our farm homes are fitted with modern conveniences. At least 700,000 farmers need electrical fixtures, bathrooms and ordinary modern conveniences in their homes. A similar number have farm buildings that need extensive repairs. An equal number need new and more modern implements of production. The extent to which this great potential purchasing power can be brought to the support of industrial employment in post-war years is limited only by the amount our farmers have left to spend after going through the tax mill. For many years prior to the outbreak of the war, while our farmers constituted more than thirty-five per cent of our people, their earnings were only about twelve per cent of our national income. During this life-and-death struggle in which we are engaged our chief occupation must be the production of the necessary weapons to destroy our enemies. The full force of this unbalanced economy, however, will be felt only when our own consumption is again the chief market for our industrial production. A sound post-war Canadian prosperity cannot be achieved by perpetuating agriculture as the loss leader of our economy. For many years the farmer has been the forgotten man. In peace-time depression he was the victim of deflationary tendencies abroad. In war-time prosperity he is the martyr of inflationary fears at home. It is folly to compare the present price of farm products with the price received ten years ago. The degree of error can be calculated only in relation to the prices of other products or the price required to purchase agriculture's true share of the production of a fuller post-war employment.

It is no less alarming to observe the government's failure to appreciate the significance of the other great basic enterprises of mining and forestry. Next to agriculture our forest industry gives the greatest employment and contributes the most to our national prosperity. A wide range of possibilities for expansion has been opened up in this and other countries by recent discoveries and new methods of processing wood products. Yet in research, so badly needed, and all other forestry services the government spends less than is expended on our national parks. No policy has been disclosed that would give encouragement or lend confidence to the expansion of this great industry. The dominion treasury receives about $80,000,000 per annum in taxes from our forest industries, yet less than one-third of a million dollars is spent annually to assist in the sounder development and expansion of this industry. Its progress and possibilities for post-war employment seem to have been disregarded entirely.

During difficult years Canada's great mineral production was vital to our solvency. It is alarming to find that eighty-four per cent of our mineral production in 1942 was from mines discovered prior to 1920, while only five per cent of our production came from mines found since 1930. These are dangerous symptoms in the development of a resource that is yet only in its infancy, an industry that employs over 100,000 people and is a potential market for nearly $400,000,000 per annum of the production of other labour and services.

The great mining industry as a depleting asset can survive and grow only by new discoveries and new capital. A policy with reference to taxation, depletion and depreciation that would restore confidence and inspire individual initiative to venture and risk is the only sound course to follow if we are to develop these vast hidden treasures for the post-war employment of our boys now overseas.

These basic industries are the cornerstone of our economy. From them we must secure our standard of living. Let us not be turned aside by all these promises of "pie in the sky," for we shall have to come to earth sooner or later, and when we do we shall find that we must develop the great basic resources of this dominion. In their sound development our people must find new opportunities. Our people do not want paternal hand-outs from the government; they need only the cooperation of the government in the development of these splendid resources.

While I am on the subject of mining, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one suggestion. Perhaps the minister is not aware that the dominion treasury is losing in excess of a million dollars annually from the operations of highgraders which have not been stopped. By operating across provincial boundaries these highgraders are able to elude the vigilance of our provincial police forces, who have tried diligently to restrain this illegal traffic. I would suggest that at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference an agreement be sought under which the jurisdiction over this nefarious practice may become vested in our splendid Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am sure if this highgrading, which has grown to be big business, were stopped, the minister would find even greater additional revenue flowing into Canada's treasury than I have indicated.

We have many businesses in Canada which are not connected with mining or other enterprises. Businesses employing fifty people or less form the backbone of the Canadian economy and are the basis from which greater enterprises and capable executives spring. They have carried all the burdens imposed by a war economy of heavy taxation and restriction of supply without the compensation of cost-plus contracts—as many of the larger corporations have had. In preparing this budget the minister seems to have overlooked this valuable element of our community.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that this policy of neglecting small business will not be continued. I should like to have the assurance of the minister that when war assets come to be disposed of, no one will be able to corner important surpluses, and that the small businesses will be able to get a fair share on equal terms with the large corporations throughout the dominion.

Following the proposals I have made I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets—

(a) that no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation;

(b) that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum.

(c) that no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting over-time pay from income tax;

(d) that sufficient provision has not been made for the elimination of the inequities presently existing with respect to agricultural taxation;

(e) that no adequate provision has been made to ensure increased post-war employment through the discovery and development of metallic and non-metallic mineral resources;

(f) that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent."

In conclusion may I say that this is truly a country of wonderful possibilities. It might well be described, as was another long ago, as "a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron and out of whose hill thou mayest dig brass." There is a great heritage awaiting all of us who live here; but before we can enter into it we must prove our worth. We must resist the blandishments of the demagogue who bids us betray our fathers and take where we have not given. While developing our individual faculties we must absolve ourselves from the curse of Cain who asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" and recognize that each of us individually is responsible, as are all of us collectively, for the well-being of his brothers. The trouble with many who are lured by the prospects so eloquently described by hon. members to my left is that they hope to be freed of their personal responsibility, and to drift serenely on the current of collective responsibility. As anyone can see, this means the abandonment of all responsibility and the passive acceptance of direction by authority.

The strongest, the fairest and the best among us are being tested by fire, far from the kindly influences of home. If we have faith in our destiny at all, we must believe in their virility. Are we to prepare for them a nursemaid state, in which those who claim rights without responsibilities may be spoon-fed on the enterprise of others? Our sons are not serfs or creatures bereft of hope, creative impulse or discretion.

The ingenuity and creative impulse of the individual, which is saving our freedom against the gangsters and dictators abroad, must continue to fashion the pattern of human society at home. Personal freedom and political freedom must march together. Neither can survive alone. Our future security and the several freedoms we each desire are not to be found along the pathway of patchwork politics, faltering leadership, and reluctant reform, which distinguishes those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, or along the road of reckless revolution as indicated by those to my left, who would allocate to themselves the power of decision over what is good and what is not good for those who breathe the free air of Canada.

The future of our people and their economic well-being depend upon their native enterprise finding new opportunities for creative action under a progressive policy of rational reform as clearly advocated by the party I have the proud honour to serve.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my time, unlike that of the speaker for the official opposition, is not unlimited. Therefore of necessity I must address myself to the problems raised in the budget itself. Health and nutrition, which were discussed by the hon. member representing the official opposition, will be the subject of discussion in the house on another occasion, as will also family allowances and other plans respecting social welfare.

I was interested in what the spokesman for the official opposition had to say, particularly in his remarks about man-power. I thought probably he would endorse the statement made recently by the national chairman of the Progressive-Conservative party, Mr. McTague. I wondered at the time why the statement was made outside the house, and why it was not made by the leader of that movement in Canada, Mr. Bracken, who, I believe, was present on the occasion on which the observation to which I have referred was made.

I noted carefully this afternoon, however, that we were told that the thing to do with men called up under the National Resources Mobilizaton Act was to turn that army back into industry and agriculture, where they could be most usefully used. I believe we should use our material and human resources for the winning of this war in whatever field it may be necessary to use them.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) of course took a cut at this group and called us socialists who were inclined to revolution, and all the rest of it. Let me say that the nearest approach this country ever made to revolution was under the Tory party between 1930 and 1935. They may try to camouflage their party as much as they like, but it is the same old Tory party with its face lifted. That is the only difference. So that this afternoon I propose to address myself to the budget.

This, like other budgets we have had, is a war-time budget. The first concern of this house is that no financial consideration shall be permitted to hinder the flow of munitions of war and supplies to the battle fronts. We must make certain that everything that this nation is able to do physically to back the attack and safeguard the lives of our service men is in fact being done regardless of money cost. This, I am confident, is the settled policy of the government, as it is, I believe, the will of this parliament. Finance must be secondary to other considerations in the winning of the war. I wish I could say the same of the government's settled policy in regard to the after-war years, and that whatever should prove to be physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible. Without such a policy there cannot indeed be jobs for every one and a full utilization of our resources for an improved standard of living. I fear, however, and the present budget increases my fears, that the government is anxious to hurry back to the restrictive practices of orthodox finance and orthodox industry. It seems to me that there is a danger that money is to be put back on its throne as the primary criterion of action, and that human need, which has been our guide during the war, is to be dethroned. If so, our fighting men will have fought for a democratic order in which social and economic justice is still sorely lacking. Let us remember always that policies for war and policies for the reconstruction period after the war are indeed one and indivisible. I shall revert to the question of reconstruction before I close. At the moment I want to examine the equity of the budget in relation to the present fiscal year and its incidence upon our war effort.

The minister has properly directed his attention to the plight of the low income group upon whom, in my opinion, the financial burdens of war have borne and are bearing too heavily. Before I make any proposal I wish to take exception to the reference made by the minister to taxation in other countries. Even supposing his comparisons happened to be fair, would the fact that another country overtaxes its poor justify Canada in following a similar course? The minister stated that the New Zealand rates bear more heavily on the low income brackets than do the rates in force in Canada, but what he did not say is that the New Zealand rates include the five per cent social security levy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I read the speech very carefully, and it must have escaped me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that it included national security and social security taxes.

Mr. COLDWELL: The whole inference, however, is that which I have stated and which has been conveyed many times by hon. members who are associated with the hon. gentleman. To-morrow we are going to welcome the Prime Minister of New Zealand. Let me say that sitting around the Prime Minister are those who last summer, during the Ontario provincial elections, circulated a pamphlet declaring that the New Zealand government's policies were worse than those of nazi Germany. Yet the spokesman for the government, and the official opposition, will welcome the Prime Minister of New Zealand here to-morrow afternoon. I say that the criticism that is often made of other countries does not take everything into account.

For example, the rates which are in effect in New Zealand relieve the population there of very heavy obligations. They do not require the same life insurance, they do not require the same health insurance, the same medical fees, the same medicine, the same hospitalization, and so on. Those things are met out of what are sometimes referred to as tax levies in this sister nation of the British commonwealth. So I say that when we come to appraise what is happening in another country, let us be fair about it and say what the people of that country are getting for the levies they pay. By comparison, Canada falls well at the foot of the list of nations with social security programmes.

I turn now to the minister's proposal that forced savings be abandoned. Let me say to him at once that I am glad it has been found possible in the light of our financial position to lower the total levies upon these people. That, of course, is the immediate effect of the proposal, and I am glad it has been found practicable to risk this reduction without danger to our war effort. However, what the government proposes is in effect the taking away of the rose and leaving the thorn. If it is necessary to collect money from the low income group, why should it not be taken in the form of refundable savings rather than in the form of pure taxes? What we propose is this: let the full amount to be paid by the low income groups at the new rates be paid in as savings to be returned with interest after the war. Pure taxation could start with the higher incomes, and at such a point the proportion of refundable savings could taper off. The rates on the lower incomes proposed by the government can remain in force; the same total revenue would be made available for the war effort, but the burden on the substandard wage and salary earners would be lightened through the return of their payments after the war.

I believe that when I say this I speak for the vast majority of the Canadian people. Statistics of the 1941 census revealed that sixty-two per cent of all—I would draw attention to the word "all"—wage and salary earners made less than $950 a year. If these people must be taxed, let some or all of their taxes be refundable after the war. If exemptions are not to be raised substantially above the present levels of $660 for single persons and $1,200 for married, surely what we propose is the fairest course of all. I think our proposal will be found both equitable and practical. Refundable savings in the hands of those who will need them most in the post-war years is highly desirable. In the minister's own words, "a reserve of savings will be of great value to the individual and the nation after the war."

Needed purchasing power would thus be put into circulation to assist in maintaining employment. The danger of inflation during the war would be curtailed, but in addition—I regard this as most important—deflation would be forestalled after the war. As for war production, it would be stimulated further under this proposal than under that of the government; for added incentive would be given the low income workers through the knowledge that whatever they paid in now would be refundable to them after the war. As for the administrative machinery with regard to these refundable savings, it has been built up and it ought not to be dismantled.

Let me quote in further support of this proposal the survey of the Canadian publishers' war finance publicity committee. A cross-section of the people were asked, "How long could you get along if you lost your job?" The replies reveal that over fifteen per cent could not get along for as much as one month, and many of those expressing no opinion must be added to this group. Another thirteen per cent could not get along for more than two months. If, therefore, collections must be made from the low income groups, let them be made in the form of savings returnable with interest in the after-the-war years. But alternatively I propose, and this proposal is to my mind the most equitable of all, that the exemption on low incomes be raised. Single incomes of say $1,000 or less and married incomes of say $1,500, or $1,600 a year, as has already been moved to-day, could be exempted altogether from either forced savings or taxation. The necessary revenue can then be found in the retention of refundable savings in the higher income brackets and an upward revision of the high income rates; indeed even, as I have suggested before, putting a ceiling on high incomes.

It is strange that at this time, when Great Britain is continuing refundable savings both as an equitable war measure and as a lever for post-war reconstruction, this government should find that the only way to afford taxation relief is to abandon this feature, this device of compulsory savings refundable after the war. In my opinion, as I have already suggested, there are other fairer ways of affording the needed relief.

The tax proposals that I have just put forward are essentially directed toward a democratic realization of fairer income distribution throughout the entire nation. In that direction, Mr. Speaker, we think lies social justice, individual security, and a conception of national unity as yet undreamt of.

The minister boasted in his speech that our public debt is widely held, and I confess that much has been accomplished during the war along these lines. Much too has been accomplished in relieving the nation of foreign obligations, a fact which convinces me that this country is able to stand on its own feet economically if it but has the will to do so. But much remains to be done in the matter of fairer distribution of income.

During the fiscal year 1943-44 some 58 per cent of the victory loans were subscribed by special names and corporations. Furthermore, the government supplemented its borrowings through victory loans by loans from private banks to the extent, in round figures, of $170,000,000, and by the issue of treasury bills. Thus there is already a substantial portion of the public debt in the hands of a few. But what is worse is that the concentration of wealth may be seriously aggravated after the cessation of hostilities as small holders sell their bonds to the banks and to other financial concerns. May I say just here that that is where the refundable nature of the levy might assist us after the war. At one point in his speech the minister says that substantial numbers of bonds will be cashed in by small holders in the immediate post-war period, and at another point he states that the debt will be widely held. Yet it will be the speculators and the big holders who will be taking up the cashed bonds after the war.

The present concentration of wealth in their hands will in my opinion after the war be intensified because our present taxation methods make that almost certain. With this and other factors in mind the party which I have the honour to represent have proposed that the government guarantee victory bonds to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar for the protection of the small holders against depreciation or speculation. The large holder can indeed hold the victory bonds to the date of maturity, when he will collect one hundred cents on the dollar. Further, we have consistently proposed that the tax structure be adjusted so that the financial burden of the war will fall where it can best be borne, not so much on the little men but more heavily on the war profits and incomes of wealthy individuals and the large corporations.

Further, we propose that the chartered banks be nationalized so that essential war and post-war financing can be accomplished at the smallest cost to the people through the medium of nationally-owned banks controlling currency and credit in terms of the nation's need. Speaking of banks, it is utterly fantastic that the government should pay interest to the banks on money which it has itself created by the issue of government securities. Yet that is what is being done.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not interrupt the minister when he was making his speech, and my time is limited. I say that that is what is being done, and bank profits, and, of course, the notorious inner reserves, largely stem from this financial sleight of hand. This is not a trifling matter at a time when the banks hold, according to the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), and I did not hear his statement contradicted, some $2,500 million in government securities, on which the government must pay annually in interest some $35 million.

I have tried to show that the budget proposals are less than fair to the small man. Now I intend to show that they are more than generous to the entrenched interests of this country. Nevertheless I do not criticize it in its entirety. Many of the provisions proposed merit the approval of this house: recognition of medical expenses incurred outside of Canada removes an anomaly from the previous budget; allowance of tax deductions to the blind is clearly just; widening of the definition of dependents, and particularly, if I may dare to say so, the inclusion in the definition of illegitimate children, a point I have often raised, is a welcome step; relief to the hard-pressed payers of alimony is also justice; provisions liberalizing the status of superannuation funds, particularly of organized labour, are both necessary and wise. Other features, too, deserve to be commended, but I cannot mention them in my limited time.

I congratulate the government upon the removal of tariffs from farm machinery, but I point out that this step, promised by the Liberals since 1919, is a mincing step, not the giant stride which the situation demands. Farm machinery is monopoly-controlled through the method of "price leadership". I do not think anybody who was on the agriculture committee will deny that. We saw that the prices for farm machinery followed the prices of International Harvester company, which dominates the field on both sides of the border. This is the sort of stubborn fact which the government ought to be facing up to at the present time.

In 1937, when the tariff on farm machinery was reduced, not only did prices to the farmer fail to fall but they actually rose. That is why the parliamentary committee was set up, and the recommendations of that committee still remain to be carried out. Therefore I urge upon the government the necessity of converting some government-owned war-time plant to the peace-time production of farm machinery, under, and this is vital, cooperative ownership, or at least some form of government ownership and control. Only then will the farmer receive his just due in the way of fair prices for machinery.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Turning away from the small man to the other side of the picture, what do we find? We find that the budget contains substantial and, I think, undeserved concessions to big business and an enlargement of those concessions from previous years' budgets. These concessions, I believe, flow from a mistaken philosophy, which says in effect that private enterprise must be cajoled and induced to the point of giving employment. The government is asked to make various tax and tariff concessions, to give monopoly a free hand, in effect to bolster business projects by devious means, to assume the risk of unprofitable ventures itself. This is not free enterprise as it was understood by our forefathers. But appeasement on the part of the government here as elsewhere fails, and returns ultimately to plague the very inventor of it; for, apart altogether from the objection that while the people are called upon to pay the shot it is private interests who stand to make great gains, such appeasement will never succeed in promoting full employment. Even with the help of costly concessions exacted from governments, private enterprise cannot carry the load. National planning and public endeavour must be the keynote of post-war expansion. It will be fruitless and, indeed, costly to engage in attempts to prop up the rotting structure of monopoly capitalism.

The minister states that the taxation treatment of business during the war has been severe. On the surface this appears to be true. There is the excess profits tax. But delving below the surface, the opposite appears to be closer to the truth. Average profits for the four years 1936 to 1939 inclusive are assumed by the Excess Profits Tax Act to be "fair" or standard profits; yet the net income of corporations for the year 1942, the latest for which I could find all the figures available, after payment of all taxes, was twenty-nine per cent higher than this average. My figures were taken from the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada. And over and above war profits as such, business interests are securing indirect war concessions. Through special depreciation they are able to obtain plant and facilities paid for by the people. Through capital assistance they are put in the position of being able to acquire war facilities for little or, in some cases, indeed, for nothing. Through ploughed back war-created profits they are able to increase their capitalization without recourse to new investment from the public. In short, business, but more especially big business, has been digging in during these war years. In this perspective, the various indirect concessions to big business contained in the proposed budget ought not to be approved by this house. Considering, too, the prospects for the post-war period, I think we should consider some of the projects that ought to be undertaken in that post-war period, and therefore I will move, seconded by Mr. Gillis:

That the amendment to the motion be further amended by adding thereto the following words:

This house regrets, further, that the government has failed to make provision or plans for the expenditure of, at least, five billion dollars during the first two post-war years for the purpose of establishing a comprehensive national system of social security and of maintaining full employment through public investment in such projects as a low-cost housing programme in town and country, rural electrification, the conversion of government-owned war plants to the production of peace-time goods, the public development of Canada's oil and mineral resources, the promotion of scientific research, and artistic and cultural work throughout Canada.

I move that as an addition to the amendment and therefore as a subamendment to the motion.

In addition to the general appeasement of big business which lies at the heart of the government's policies, what new specific concessions are contained in the budget now proposed? Let us take a look at them. There is, for instance, the proposal that business losses can be chargeable for taxation purposes against profits of the previous year or of the succeeding three years. Perhaps this is desirable in the interests of stability, but we may as well face up to it; it is clearly equivalent in its practical effects to an actual reduction in corporation taxes. That should be understood, and I should like to have the assurance of the government that the farmer will be given at least an equal chance to level out his income for three, four or five years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly. He is included.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to have that assurance from the minister. I took it that it applied to the businessman. The minister's speech was not clear on the point and I am glad to get that assurance, because I believe that is particularly necessary to-day when fluctuations in the farmer's income are often the result of government policy or due to some request made by the government itself.

Looking at some of the other budget concessions, we find that depreciation at double the rates normally allowed is to be permitted in respect of certain investments. Here is another instance of the familiar subsidizing of private enterprises that cannot stand on their own feet. Its plain meaning, as I take it at least, is that the taxpayer is to put up one-half of the new investments but will get nothing in return. The minister will have an opportunity of explaining whether or not my conception of what he proposes is wrong. Let me give another instance, that of deferred maintenance including underground expansion in mines. That is to be deducted from taxes, and that, in my opinion, means that the taxpayer contributes to the cost of operation of private enterprise in that respect. The resolution that dividends of wholly owned subsidiaries of non-resident companies be exempt from taxation is another concession. It seems to me, if I remember the experience of the corporation correctly, that this would, for example enlarge to some extent, if not substantially, the already large profits of Aluminium Limited, which holds a large number of subsidiaries outside Canada.

Again, the resolution allowing the oil industry a tax credit of fifty per cent in respect of new wells is costly and, in my opinion, undeserved. No industry has been more profitable than the oil industry. No industry is entrenched in this country so strongly in its monopolistic position. Imperial Oil, subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey, controls the major portion of the oil industry of this country. A few years ago, according to the price spreads inquiry, it controlled something like ninety per cent of Canada's oil industry. That, however, may have fallen a bit in recent years. Must the public, then, assume the risk of drilling new wells while private shareholders reap all the resulting profits? Is this subsidizing of private interests something that is in the tradition of free enterprise? I say it is not. Can the oil industry, requiring special inducement for the drilling of new wells, be considered as fulfilling its so-called free enterprise function to the community? Research costs may be legitimately deducted from taxable income, and we are doing that for private industry. Will the government give its assurance that public research through some agency such as the national research council will be pushed with all vigour after the war is over? I believe that our national research council and the young scientists associated with it have been virtually starved in recent years. The very best of our young scientists are driven away from our national research organization which ought to be one of the principal means of industrial and economic progress in this country.

I wish to say before I conclude—and my time is now drawing pretty close to its end—something about the prospects of the post-war years. The budget speech recognized how closely interwoven are the war and the after-war years. I think that is clear, though in my opinion the minister's proposals conspicuously fail to offer a lead toward a solution of the dilemma of our time. That dilemma is the dilemma of want amid actual and potential plenty. Our fighting men deserve the best. They must not be allowed to return to Canada as a part of the world of yesterday. Therefore I say, lest this happen as it happened after the last war, let us prepare now for the expenditure of at least $5,000,000,000 in the two years following the war. Why have I made that suggestion so frequently to this house in the last two or three years? Because I believe that in planning our post-war activities we should have a target and the assurance that certain moneys will be available and that this parliament is prepared to appropriate them. If we can appropriate, as we are doing this year, more than $5,000,000,000 in one year for the prosecution of the war, then we ought, as a very minimum, to say that we are going to commit parliament to the expenditure of $5,000,000,000 for the two years following the war. I believe, if we do that, we can get our people to plan comprehensively to meet post-war needs in housing, electrification and all the other things which would improve the standards of life in this country.

I fear the future unless we have comprehensive plans. I believe that some of the countries of the world are going to undergo great economic and social upheavals. In spite of what another hon. member said to-day, they are the party promoting revolution. We want to see orderly democratic progress made in our country. That is the purpose for which we organized and the way in which we desire to lead public opinion in this dominion. This expenditure, set beside our war expenditures, seems paltry, but it is, I insist, the minimum figure. It is at least a target to shoot at, something solid on which to hang our hopes for a better Canada to come.

By pledging this we demonstrate the sincerity of our desire to build a new world. The governor of the Bank of Canada and the report of the James committee on reconstruction agree on this, that capital investments of a billion and a half dollars annually must be made in order to achieve jobs for everyone after the war. These are not my opinions. These are the opinions of the chairman of the James committee and the governor of the Bank of Canada. Therefore you see that the suggestion of $5,000,000,000 in two years, which we made two years ago, is not so far beyond the mark as most of our critics suggested when we made it. Private enterprise, by itself, has not the remotest chance of meeting this total. Even the optimistic forecasts of its propagandists fall far short of it. What is needed is a new freedom to organize production in the public interest. We must bid good-bye to the restrictive practices of orthodox finance and orthodox industry whose only care has been the making of private profit.

Let me quote, Mr. Speaker, from none other than Winston Churchill himself in his book, "The World Crisis—The Aftermath." Speaking of the close of the last great war the present Prime Minister of Great Britain had this to say. While I do not agree with all that Mr. Churchill has said or done, I agree with the statement that he made at the close of the last war, which I am going to quote. He said then:

> The organization and machinery of which we disposed was powerful and flexible in an extraordinary degree. The able businessmen among us, each the head of a large group of departments, had now been working for a year and a half in a kind of industrial cabinet. They were accustomed to unexpected changes enforced by the shifting fortunes of war. There was very little in the productive sphere they could not, at that time, actually do. A requisition, for instance, for half a million houses would not have seemed more difficult to comply with than those we were already in process of executing for a hundred thousand aeroplanes, or twenty thousand guns, or the medium artillery of the American army, or two million tons of projectiles. But a new set of conditions began to rule from eleven o'clock onwards. The money-cost, which had never been considered by us to be a factor capable of limiting the supply of the armies, asserted a claim to priority from the moment the fighting stopped.
> The return of the cabinet to money-cost as the sole governing factor wrecked the dream and the war-time pledge that the British expeditionary force should return in 1918 to "a land fit for heroes." The heroes came back to stagnation and the dole.

In this country we have disregarded the money-costs for the destructive purposes of war. Let us do likewise for the constructive purposes of peace. After all, money is but the medium of exchange. If we fabricate the physical assets, if we can make the commodities, surely we should be able to distribute them among our people and the nations. As has already been said this afternoon, we have to-day one of the most highly trained groups of young men that the world has ever seen. The mechanized army, the men in our air force, have been trained in the operation of machines, in the knowledge of machines, in a manner that no other generation was ever trained. We hope that most of them will come back to us when the war is over. How are they going to live? They are not going back to the bread lines; they are not going back to riding the rods; they are not going back to low wage levels upon which they cannot live. The manner in which we have treated the youth of this country who have entered the armed forces, and quite properly so, has given them a new outlook on standards of living. We who travel across this country by rail see the young men and women who before the war would have travelled in the coach, travelling, and rightly so, where they belong, in the sleepers. We see young men and women who would have snatched a lunch at a counter or who would have brought a sandwich-box, go now, and quite rightly, to the dining-car on the train and get a decent meal. We have given our young people a taste of the better standards of life. You cannot bring them back again to the kind of standard of living most of them had before the war began. I see nothing in this budget, and too little in the proposals of the government now before the house, to give any assurance that our standards will be raised willingly when the war ends.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while one could have advanced other criticism of the budget; while perhaps some of my criticisms will be met in argument from the other side of the house—and I hope they will if in any respect I am wrong—I feel that this is indeed a rich man's budget. It offers a sop to the poor and underprivileged, but on the other hand it contains most valuable concessions to the rich and powerful individuals and corporations who to-day control this land. That, Mr. Speaker, is what I wanted to say.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the two speeches to which we have listened this afternoon have been of a very high order. Generally speaking, I believe we will all agree with the sentiments expressed in them. I am sure each of us was impressed with the closing words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who said that our boys and girls would not come back to riding the rods. I am afraid too many of us are content with making that statement; but I would venture to wager that if the Liberal government is returned to power, right after the war they will come back to riding the rods, and if they try to do anything about it they will be met with aeroplanes and tear bombs. That is a very gloomy thing to say, but all the evidences I can see in this house and in the banking and commerce committee, where I have had the privilege of serving for some weeks, would indicate to me definitely that there is to be no change which would in any way justify one in expecting that conditions after this war would be any different from those which obtained after the last war. If I have overlooked any such changes I should be happy to have any government advocate point them out to me.

These are critical and momentous hours in the most critical and momentous period thus far known in our long and eventful history. Signs would indicate that we are now nearing victory and peace. The peace arrangements will provide us with the answer to a burning and insistent question: Is the second world war to have been fought for freedom or for the enslavement of mankind? The tides and winds are all set for the enslavement of our civilization. Unless the financial and economic thinking of our governments changes radically, the enslavement of mankind will be inevitable. I shall be be asked, "What factors do you observe which seem to indicate the introduction of slavery for mankind?" There are many such factors, but I shall mention only seven this afternoon.

The first factor is debt. It will be noticed that all the democracies are plunging into debt at a rate that is positively appalling. Those who are in high positions, who carry the responsibility of the war, of course are endeavouring to minimize in the minds of the people the seriousness of the situation. But when the president of our Bank of Canada in his annual report to the minister this year sounded a warning to the minister and the country, though in a veiled, guarded and conservative manner, I should think that fact ought to be sufficient to indicate that already we are far beyond the safety point in the accumulation of debt.

The second factor is our taxation structure. It is true that this structure has been modified to some extent by the minister after having mercilessly crushed the people of Canada during the last year or two, but the indications are that a system of taxation is being carefully prepared, which can be fixed upon the Canadian people and which will persist for many years after the war. Debt and taxation produce slavery.

The third factor is bureaucracy. It is true that there are complexities in the environment surrounding us which to the ordinary individual make bureaucracy appear a necessity. Certainly we have established in Canada a bureaucracy which should satisfy even Hitler, and which is functioning with smoothness, precision and an irresistible power which I am sure is quite satisfatory from the point of view of the bureaucrats. The people are becoming accustomed to that sort of government. Bureaucracy may be efficient, but it enslaves.

Another factor which is tending to enslave the world is abundance. One would think that when man invented great machines which would lift from his shoulders the burdens of life and bring into existence an era of abundance such as his ancestors never even dared dream might be possible, the invention and introduction of such machines would be an introduction to a sort of paradise. Yet what has been the result? The more goods we have been able to produce, the more restricted our lives have become; the more it has become necessary, apparently, to control all those who are engaged in both production and consumption, until now we have a substantial party in the Dominion of Canada advocating, and being listened to while they advocate, complete government ownership of industry. That is being listened to by the Canadian people simply because they are being driven to a species of despair. They are being driven by whom?—by the Liberal party and by their counterparts in other nations. They are being driven by the Progressive Conservative party, because they have not sufficient vitality to suggest any substantial change that would impose even upon a schoolboy.

Consequently the people are going to say, "Well, if there is not anything else we can do about it, I guess we shall have to have government ownership, and anything that goes with it." And so we have the votes for socialism—no, not for socialism, exactly, but for something different from the horrible things the people have been enduring for the last fifteen years.

What is the reason? Abundance. Abundance can crush a people, unless those people know how to distribute that abundance. During the war our ability to produce abundance has been enhanced surprisingly. I believe it was Doctor Charles A. A. Stein who, within the last two years, said that, since war broke out, the amount of raw materials available in the United States had increased between ten and one hundred times. That is simply because new processes have been discovered, as a result of which men are able to make almost anything out of almost anything. At the same time increased skill in the management of machines and technological processes has taught men how to use these new continents of matters which have been discovered for the fabrication of abundance. But up to the present time, astonishing as it may seem, no one has been able to get the ear of any substantial number of people with any proposal as to how to distribute that abundance. This strikes me with the deepest apprehension.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Another factor tending toward the enslavement of man is this very inability to distribute. And I think, too, that worse than the inability to distribute is the impatience which I notice when I undertake to discuss with the average group of people anything pertaining to distribution. People seem to think it does not count. Well, it does count. The ability to distribute does count.

Another matter which in my judgment is threatening enslavement is the fact that our people generally throughout the country are so completely unfamiliar with the new and strange conditions confronting them, that they do not know what it is all about. They are unfamiliar with the essential changes which have taken place. How rarely do we hear in the house, for example, any sober exposition of the impact of machines upon our economy? I believe this year the only member who has been sufficiently intrepid to discuss the matter has been the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl); and he has been rewarded for his pains by at least half a dozen offensive remarks.

Why is it that we do not hear government members discussing the seriousness of the impact of machines upon our economy? Sometime between 1913 and 1928 we rounded some mighty corner in this world. We left an age of scarcity and sped into an age of abundance. Nevertheless we hear no serious discussion of the matter among members of the Progressive Conservative party, and there is no reference to it at all by the Liberals. And yet these two groups constitute by far the majority of members in the house.

Why is there so much indifference in respect of these important matters? It must be that there is an indifference among the people in the constituencies represented by those hon. members. The people, generally, are unfamiliar with the adjustments which can and should be made to meet the new situation. They are unfamiliar with the educational equipment necessary to enable a democratic people to judge of the soundness of the various proposals available to them. Hon. members will find something of thought-provoking quality in the Ottawa Citizen of June 28 where, at page 2, appears an article respecting a survey conducted by the Canadian institute of public opinion. It appears under the heading, "What is the meaning of inflation? But few Canadians have the answer." We read that a careful survey was made of the people respecting the matter of inflation. Even among people with complete college educations only thirty-three per cent had good answers; another twenty-eight per cent had only fair answers and the remainder were absolutely wrong as to the meaning of inflation.

Then, coming down through the various groups, including the college group, incomplete; high school, complete and incomplete; public school, complete and incomplete, we find the people displaying an alarming ignorance on the question: What is inflation? Some members will ask: "What bearing has that on the subject you are discussing?" Well, the bearing it has on the subject is simply this, that the very moment anyone suggests a monetary solution as being the way out, he is immediately met with the statement, "This will cause inflation." Then the rank and file of the people, not knowing anything at all about what inflation is, or how it is caused or how it can be controlled, are deluded by clever political advocates—and I shall use that word, to be charitable. The result is that we remain in danger. A very serious element in the threat of enslavement is the lack of information which prevails among the Canadian people, and to an equal degree, probably, among the peoples in other democratic countries.

Another influence working for the enslavement of man is that in all the democracies the political parties, generally speaking, are endeavouring not to give the people the truth, but rather to deceive them. I have commented on this matter in times past. You hear Liberals devoting most of their time to extolling the virtues of trade. Any informed man knows that the possibilities of trade as a means of solving the problems which present themselves to-day are exceedingly limited. Therefore he should inform his constitutents, but he does not. He deceives them. He leads them to believe that the raising or lowering of tariffs is a panacea which will cure the ills confronting them. Any well informed man must know that the effect which tariffs have on the solution of our problem is extremely negligible. So that we have people being deceived.

In addition to that we have world agencies, such as international finance, definitely working for the enslavement of mankind through world organization. Such agencies are advocating economic planning and socialism as a means of obtaining security. They receive support simply because they promise security. They advocate a world police force because people can be deluded into thinking that a police force will mean peace. They advocate monetary stabilization because people can be deluded into thinking that monetary stabilization will greatly facilitate trade. These international organizations are working with an elaborate, highly organized propaganda machine.

I have named the several factors which are threatening to destroy the freedom of man. What is the present government offering as a solution? Nothing. What does the present budget offer by way of a solution? Nothing. All that this government is able to propose is an increase in debt or an increase in taxation. It talks about increasing international trade. I shall have something to say about this later on. The King government can conceive of no method of distribution except that of international trade. That is all we hear spoken of by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his supporters. This means that they advocate a struggle for favourable trade balances, which means that they advocate a resort to a system under which each of fifty odd nations must sell more than it buys.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because without a favourable trade balance it is impossible for them to carry on. Is it not so? As far as I have been able to gather from the remarks I have heard, there has to be a favourable trade balance.

Mr. ILSLEY: To say that there has to be a favourable trade balance is different from advocating international trade.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That needs a great deal of elaboration which has not been given on the floor of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: International trade is a system that has failed to distribute and has involved us in war after war.

Mr. GARDINER: How can you distribute without trade?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just a typical Liberal question. Liberals can see no other way of distributing. The question supports completely what I am saying.

Mr. GARDINER: What do you propose?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall have something to say about that before I have finished; all things in their place. The simple fact of the matter is that the Liberals know of no way of distributing except through international trade. When that breaks down, their whole distributive machinery breaks down.

Mr. DUPUIS: What will you do with your surplus production?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall have something to say about that; all things in their place. I am saying that international trade cannot be relied upon as an adequate means of distributing. This has involved us in war after war.

Mr. GARDINER: Would you distribute where there is no nation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The other day when discussing reconstruction the Prime Minister named several of the committees which had been appointed by his government to study reconstruction. I wonder how many of us have read the recommendations of those various committees. If we have, I think we shall be astounded at the lack of anything constructive in those recommendations. They have simply added to the difficulty which has been created already by insincerity in the house. The obscurity and insincerity of parliamentary debate have served to confuse and confound the people of Canada. It is the solemn duty of parliament to give the people light. Party politicians have in fact left them in all-embracing darkness and fog. In these circumstances, therefore, it is natural that the people should swing from one extreme to the other, from the orthodoxy of capitalism to the orthodoxy of socialism. It is the duty of Canadian leadership to show the people that both of these orthodox ways are false and that the true way must be based on freedom. In either of these false orthodox ways there is no freedom. To have economic security Canadians must reform capitalism. To have freedom, Canadians must retain freedom of enterprise, freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom for the obscure people as well as for the prominent.

In the report of each and every one of the committees on reconstruction appointed by the Mackenzie King government there is a blind adherence to obsolete and bankrupt formulas. There is not a hint of change. The voice of each committee sounds like the voice of big business speaking through its mouthpiece, the Prime Minister of Canada. If individual enterprise is to be bound to function under the restraints and prohibitions imposed upon it by the present government of Canada, then individual enterprise will, indeed, be short lived.

Individual enterprise under a reformed monetary system would have the power to give greater security than has socialism. And such security it can give without impairment of individual freedom. It must be the duty of every lover of democracy to fight to liberate our system of individual enterprise from the prison house of international finance so that it may bring the people the security to which they are entitled.

Wherein lies the key to the solution of our perplexing problems? A minute ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) asked what we would do. I am going to speak in general terms, but I think my words will clearly indicate the solution. It lies in the adequate use of the national credit of each of the various individual nations. What is the essential nature of our problem? It is how to distribute. Mankind has learned how to produce what mankind requires. What men must learn is where and how to obtain purchasing power and how to distribute that purchasing power among the people and among the nations.

Then the consumers will be able to buy their needs; the producers will be able to sell their products. The wholesale textile association of Great Britain, in the second report of the post-war reconstruction committee on international finance, issued in March, 1944, quotes Sumner Welles as saying on March 30, 1942:

> The problem which will confront us when the years of the post-war period are reached is not primarily one of production. For the world can readily produce what mankind requires. The problem is rather one of distribution and purchasing power, of providing the mechanism whereby what the world produces may be fairly distributed among the nations of the world, and of providing the means whereby the people of the world may obtain the world's goods and services.

Where now can money or purchasing power be obtained without additional taxation, without additional debt? Money can be created by the government of any sovereign state as, for example, Canada created $26,000,000 and spent it into circulation in the last war, or as the United States in time of distress created greenbacks. I am not advocating that money be created by printing bills. There are other ways. But the principle of creating national currency debt-free is the principle upon which a new economy and a new order must be based. The amount of such money that can be safely created and used by any state depends upon the goods and services which that state can produce and consume. A number of members have been struggling in the banking and commerce committee to get a little light to shine on the pages of the proceedings of that committee. I believe that we have succeeded in establishing that fact.

Mr. HOWDEN: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Gladly.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is it your suggestion that the government produce currency and distribute that currency to the people of the country?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The suggestion is definitely that the government produce the currency and distribute the currency, and the currency will enable the people to buy the goods produced, thereby providing a market, providing distribution and providing consumption. The first question that will come into the hon. member's mind will be, "Oh, that would be inflation, would it not?"

Mr. HOWDEN: If I may say so, there has been a great deal of ambiguous talk that one finds it hard to understand, and I just wanted to pin the hon. member down on a certain point. Now I am satisfied. Thank you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You have never had any difficulty in "pinning me down" on that point. I have said that thing with clarity at least one hundred times since I have been in the house, so that the poor wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Any state by increasing its production and consumption can increase the amount of money it can have, and the amount of money which it can have depends on the goods and services which it can produce and consume. Thus obviously, the state can increase its revenues by increasing its goods and services.

Mr. GARDINER: It does not produce all the goods and services which the people require—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then its business is to go about doing it.

Mr. GARDINER: —unless it wants to ruin somebody else.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I realize the difficulties which lie in the way. Let me say this to the minister. The moment any person offers a suggestion you look at the difficulties. We grant the difficulties. But how many difficulties are there in the way of your trade proposals or any other proposals? Study the two together and see under which set of proposals you have the better chance of coming through.

Mr. HOWDEN: On what basis would this currency be distributed?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On this basis, that the object of the government would be to enable the people to buy enough of the goods they are able to produce.

Mr. HOWDEN: By what means?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Through modifications of price and modifications of income. Those are two adjustments which I should be glad to elaborate to the satisfaction of the hon. member. But I have not the time now. I have only forty minutes. I am talking against time. But that is the solution and the method. The state increases the income in the hands of the people, income which they will spend to enable them to purchase their needs from what they produce.

Mr. HOWDEN: The question is, how?

Mr. BLACKMORE: You do it through two devices, by modification of price and by modification of income. You had an example of modification of income in the Prime Minister's proposal to give family allowances. There is a modification of income. Anyone with the intelligence of a member of parliament should be able to go further and work the whole thing out.

The debt-free money available to the government of any state can be used, just as I have told the hon. member, to modify the price structure in that state—raise prices that need to be raised and lower prices that need to be lowered—and to increase the income in the hands of its people. The whole thing is done by the use of debt-free money.

Mr. HOWDEN: Debt-free money is the answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Debt-free money is the key to the solution. It is the basis upon which the whole thing can be worked out. My hon. friend is a doctor, is he not?

Mr. HOWDEN: I used to be.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He knows what a tremendous amount depended upon the discovery of anæsthetics.

Mr. HOWDEN: Quite so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the discovery of anæsthetics you had a great principle on which you could work. When you discovered that principle you could build upon it. The principle of debt-free money is a principle upon which you can work. Your money can be used to modify the price structure in the state and to increase the income in the hands of the people. Thus internal distribution can be provided for. That is the answer to the question of the Minister of Agriculture. International distribution can be effected by Mutual Aid arrangements, and Mutual Aid can be financed in considerable measure with debt-free money created by the state and spent into circulation, without any increase in debt and without any increase in taxation. Just as soon as the governments of the world come to understand that, they will not be afraid of increasing and elaborating their Mutual Aid agreements to the extent that the international distribution of goods will be based upon mutually acceptable arrangements rather than upon cut-throat competition, which works to the disadvantage of the weakest nations, the ones most in need of trade. Through cut-throat competition they lose their trade.

Mr. HOWDEN: Finally your solution consists in the distribution of debt-free money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, the distribution of debt-free money up to the limit of the nation's capacities to absorb that debt-free money by reason of the goods and services which the nation produces. That money is used in raising the standard of living in the economy.

Thus Mutual Aid can be extended to the degree necessary to enable all peoples to be free from want and free from fear. Thus trade rivalry can be reduced and eliminated, and thus the main cause of war can be removed.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government call in one of these many committees on reconstruction, perhaps the present reconstruction committee of the House of Commons, and say to the chairman, "Now look here, you are perfectly at liberty to call witnesses and examine papers to discover whether or not there is any validity in this contention of monetary reform. Go into the matter with very great care and call in as witnesses the men who know about it."

Mr. GARDINER: We called Douglas the last time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And he would have done an extremely good job, but for men like Hackett who did everything they could to hurt him and prevent his voice from being heard. If you call men like Douglas and have a committee that is sympathetic and ready to learn, and that is not trying to destroy him politically, not trying to get some little thing which it can magnify out of all proportion as certain Liberal members on the banking and commerce committee are doing to-day, you will learn a great deal of truth. I suggest that the government adopt that policy with at least two or three of these committees on reconstruction, and I guarantee that within a year they will have a great deal more light on this vexatious problem of distribution than they have to-day.

The governor of the Bank of Canada in his annual report has indicated what the possibilities would be if we began to create money to represent the tremendous capacity for production which we shall have immediately at the close of the war. I commend to hon. members the remarks made by the governor of the Bank of Canada on page 11 of his annual report to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). He says:

> By the end of 1943 the gainfully occupied population had risen to approximately 5,100,000 but about 1,900,000 of these were engaged in the armed forces, in supplying the weapons of war, or in producing the food required for special war-time exports. The number available to meet civilian needs had therefore fallen to about 3,200,000, but at the same time the average standard of living had risen materially and was probably higher than it had ever been.

How serious that is, and imagine what will happen when the others return and are producing goods themselves!

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I wish to say, first, that I am sure we all greatly appreciate what has been accomplished by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). His accomplishment has made it possible for Canada to carry on a war effort which has brought praise from outstanding men in all the allied nations. The Minister of Finance has indeed proved himself a great financier. To raise eight billions of dollars loaned from the people of Canada would appear almost an impossibility for a country with the population that we have, and it is indeed a great achievement. Notwithstanding this, the people of Canada are better off financially than they have ever been. I am informed that the savings accounts to-day are two and a half billions as compared with one and a half billions when the war began.

The one dark spot in Canada's war effort has been the lack of cooperation the government has received from some members of the opposition parties. It is indeed a sad thing in time of war that men cannot forget their politics and give the government some co-operation. We have been here now for five months and it looks as though we shall be here two or three months longer, when many of us should be at home doing more useful work. I am sure the people of Canada do not appreciate the actions of some members of the opposition parties.

I wish to speak to-night for a short time on what is, to my mind, a dangerous policy which is being advocated in this country at the present time, and the seriousness of which I feel is not fully realized. I refer to the policy advocated by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party as it affects the country generally and especially as it affects the farmers and organized labour. Some members of the C.C.F. party go so far as to deny that their policy includes the socialization of farms. Whether that is their policy or not, I think we have sufficient evidence to prove that at least a great many workers and organizers of the C.C.F. party are advocating and admitting frankly that the nationalization of farms is C.C.F. policy. A short time ago I met a C.C.F. organizer and he frankly admitted to me that the socialization of farms was their policy. I said to him, "You are not frank enough to admit that when you go into a farming community." He replied, "Well, that is our policy." A short time after that—and this happened recently—I met another C.C.F. organizer and I put the same question to him. He said, "Well, we do believe in collective farming," and he admitted that this eventually would mean the socialization of farms.

Again, a prominent man, Mr. Levans, member of the legislature for Woodbine, Toronto, is reported to have said, at a banquet in Orillia, that the farmers could remain on their farms during their lifetime but could not sell or will their farms to anyone else. And again, we have the leader of the C.C.F. party who, when asked in Maclean's magazine the question, "Do you believe the state should operate everything?" answered, "Practically everything." Well, as farming is Canada's greatest industry, surely "practically everything" includes farming.

Any man to-day who discusses this question with C.C.F. workers will agree with me that they frankly admit that this is C.C.F. policy. Therefore, whether some members of this house agree to that or not, nevertheless the rank and file of the C.C.F. party do believe in it and frankly admit that it is C.C.F. policy. Again, the leader of the C.C.F. party is quoted in Maclean's as saying, when asked the question, "Will the C.C.F. party control labour?"—"Yes." Just how does the C.C.F. party intend to control labour? It will control labour by making labour organizations ineffective.

I am sure we all agree that over the last half century labour has done a great deal in bringing about better working and living conditions. Labour, it is true, has had a hard fight over the last half century to accomplish what it has. We all agree that labour has done a great deal for the labouring man. It is true that labour has not always had good leadership. Labour has often been wrongly advised, but that is no argument against labour policies. That also has been true of organized industry. Industry has also very often had very bad leadership, which has led to a great deal of trouble.

Organized labour and organized industry are learning that if they are to avoid the experiences of the past they must have a better understanding, and that can be brought about only by better cooperation, union recognition and compulsory collective bargaining. If the C.C.F. policies were put into effect, there is not a class in Canada which would be so seriously affected as organized labour. All the hard work they have done over past years, everything they have accomplished, all the sacrifices they have made would be lost effort. It could not be any other way where industries were owned and operated by the government. Is there a man in organized labour who believes that if the government owned all industries in the country the government would allow him to continue to organize and to continue to strike and to defy the government? I wonder if any man who belongs to organized labour believes that. If he does he will learn that he is making a great mistake. When I make that statement I think I hear someone say, "What about industries which are already being operated by the government?" That is easily explained. Take, for instance, the railways. One is owned by the government and another by a private company. The men who are working on these two roads belong to one organization, and just as long as the men who are working on the government-owned road belong to the same organization as the men who are working on the privately-owned road they must receive the same consideration; but if the government took over all the railroads in Canada that would place them in a much different position. If the government took over all the railroads and the men went out on strike what would happen? Well, what would happen would be just what was about to happen recently in another country where there was talk of the government taking over the roads. They would put the officials of the company in uniform and turn the operating of the roads over to the national defence department. No government in power dare allow any organization to defy it. Just as long as any government is operating an industry, labour has not its freedom. I thought I heard someone say that if the C.C.F. were in power they would not treat labour in that way; that they are too much interested in organized labour to treat it in that manner. That may or may not be true. It matters very little whether it is true or not because governments come and governments go. Any government that would take office after the C.C.F. government were in power would have to continue to operate the industries taken over by the C.C.F government. They could not hand them back again to private companies. They would have to continue to operate those industries. The government following the C.C.F. might possibly be a Progressive Conservative government, although that is not likely. It might be a Social Credit government, or it might be a Bloc Populaire, or some other form of government; but, as I say, it matters not what government succeeds a C.C.F. government, it must continue to operate the industries that are taken over by the C.C.F. government. Is organized labour going to hand over its organization to the mercy of any government that might come into power? I wonder. I wonder whether labour has stopped to realize just what might happen to it under any government which might come into power? They would be entirely at the mercy of the government because they would not have their freedom under government ownership. I have spent many years of my life working in the interests of organized labour. I have taken part in long and bitter strikes, one strike lasting nine months, which won for the miners of British Columbia the first eight-hour day that they ever enjoyed. An eight-hour day is a long day for miners to work underground in the conditions under which they have to work. I know something of the long and bitter experience that labour has passed through, and I know something of the sacrifice they have made in order that they might better their working and living conditions.

As one who has the cause of labour at heart I appeal to organized labour to let no government control their organization to the extent it would if it owned and operated the industries in which they are working. I would recommend to labour that they think over very carefully the recommendations for the post-war world issued by the American federation of labour, which reads as follows:

> Free enterprise is an essential part of the democratic way of life. We believe wholeheartedly in free enterprise as an essential in personal freedom. Free enterprise and free labour are interdependent; neither can last without the other.

Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker. This is a recommendation passed by the American federation of labour and sent on to their locals. It is a true statement. Labour can never be free while the government of the country owns and operates the industries in which labour is working. I appeal to labour representatives in this house and in the country to think this over very seriously. Labour cannot retain its freedom if the industries are operated by the government and controlled through state socialism.

Another danger that I see is in the class of men who are getting into the C.C.F. party and who will eventually control it. I have been through the mill and I see clearly what is happening in the ranks of the C.C.F. party to-day. Perhaps some of the older members of the house will remember the days of the O.B.U., the One Big Union. I belonged to the Sandon branch of the western federation of miners in British Columbia. It was a strong branch and had a very large membership. We owned our own block, a large one, containing a large auditorium and fraternity hall. We had stores rented on the ground floor. We owned our own hospital employed our own doctor and nurses. Members of the One Big Union worked into our organization. They became so numerous that they outvoted us and took our property from us. That is exactly what is happening in the C.C.F. today. The class of men who are coming into the C.C.F. party to-day will eventually and before very long control and dictate the policies of that party. It is all very well for the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) to make the statement that he quite often does to the effect that they are not going to take in progressive labour, which is communist. I wish to tell the leader of the C.C.F. that they are taking them in by the hundreds. And they cannot prevent them from coming in. They will do exactly what they did in our organization. Very shortly they will control and dictate the policies of the party. No one realizes that better than the leader of the C.C.F. party. No one sees that danger coming more clearly than he does. If he continues in the moderate way he has spoken from time to time, very soon that class will be asking him to step aside and make way for a more radical type of leadership. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. I am not doubting the sincerity of the leader of the C.C.F. party. Many of the principles they advocate I have supported all my life. What I do oppose is the method by which they are trying to bring those principles into effect. They talk about destroying monopolies. You cannot destroy monopolies by creating greater monopolies, and that is exactly what the C.C.F. would do if they came into power. The nationalization of industry will create the greatest monopoly Canada has ever experienced. We know very well how this has worked out in other countries, and we know it can work out in only one way in any country. I believe in a certain amount of control. I believe that anyone who tries to take advantage of anyone else should be controlled. I trust that this war has brought us to a greater realization of our duty toward our fellow men than we have ever had before. You will remember how men piled up millions during the last war. That has not been done during this war. I hope that the day of the millionaire is gone forever, and that never again will the moneyed interests of this country control its affairs, as they have in the past. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe in control where necessary, but I do not want to lose my freedom through state socialism.

Only one class will benefit under a C.C.F. government. I refer to the class that never did have and never will have any stake in this country unless they get it from someone else. I refer to the class that has fought labour organizations ever since labour began to organize. I refer to the class against whom labour men have had to picket in order to prevent them from taking their jobs when they were on strike. I refer to the class who believe that Canada owes them a living and that it is not necessary to work for it. That class now see an opportunity of getting something for nothing, and they are going to take advantage of that opportunity if they can.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that I stand for a square deal to the labouring classes, whether on the farm or in the factory. Let us beware of any party which advocates government ownership of farms or factories. If that policy should be put into effect it will be the saddest day labour in Canada has ever experienced.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation of the manner in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) presented his budget proposals and the estimates of our cash requirements for the coming year, amounting to some six billion dollars, an all-time high in the history of this country. We realize that the hon. gentleman has a very difficult task, and I should like to express the hope that his health may be spared while he has this task in hand and, of course, for a long time after that.

I disagree in principle with several of the proposals enunciated by the minister. I should like to compliment my colleague the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) who, as official critic of the budget, dealt with it this afternoon in an able manner. I wish especially to endorse his tribute to the gallant men and women of the armed forces who today are doing such a magnificent job for us in attempting to preserve all the worth-while things of our way of life, and also to those people on the home front in this country, engaged in agriculture and industry, who are so ably supporting our fighting forces.

I believe there is a great deal of wasteful extravagance in Canada at the present time under this government. As an example I mention the wartime information board, which I believe spends approximately $1,000,000 annually. A great deal of the information it distributes is political propaganda, some of it false and misleading. Someone may say, "Give us an example of that." I would refer anyone interested to page 26 of the January, 1944, issue of "Canada at War" dealing with the men available in the Quebec military district between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. That information is not correct. I would mention also page 55 of the May, 1944, issue of the same booklet, which contains false information with respect to Japanese nationals in Canada. Both these matters have been dealt with already by other hon. members.

During these years of war huge amounts of money have been spent in the purchase of properties for industrial plants, air training centres and so on. Apparently there has not been a uniform system of valuation in connection with the purchase of these properties. There are other, larger items with which I shall deal at a later stage of my remarks. In the matter of income tax, I am definitely of the opinion that exemptions should be increased to at least $800 for single persons and $1,600 for married men. I believe also that a farmer and his wife, who helps him on the farm, should be granted exemptions on the same basis that they are granted to the man and his wife who work in industry or any other occupation. The present discrimination in this respect is wholly unjustified. In the past the receipts from all live stock sold within the calendar year have been classed as income, which is very unfair. In the case of breeding herds especially I believe a percentage should be allowed as capital. In connection with the power required to operate a farm, the money received from the sale of any horses is classed as income, while a tractor is allowed as capital, along with other equipment. I have never been able to see the justification for that discrimination. Then the income of farmers should be averaged over a period of years. This is something for which I have asked during every budget debate since I came here in 1940. Last year the minister announced that the income of a farmer might be averaged over two years, but I believe the period should be six years so that losses in certain seasons could be offset by profits in others. This is now done over a five-year period in Great Britain, where the hazards of farming are not normally as great as in Canada.

Another point I should like to emphasize is that if a person overpays the amount of tax due, no interest is allowed on this overpayment when the refund is made. On the other hand, if a person inadvertently pays less than he should, the department assesses a rather severe penalty plus interest. Surely, as a matter of justice it should work both ways; if the government have the use of the money they should allow interest on making the rebate.

The present tax return form is too complicated and should be simplified in some manner. It is altogether too difficult for the average taxpayer.

Under the wartime prices and trade board we hear a great deal about agricultural subsidies. I maintain that in reality these are consumer subsidies, and that in many cases the primary producers are carrying much more than their fair share. Especially is that true in respect of beef and grain.

As an example of ceiling prices and controls I would cite that of fuel wood. We had an example shown to us where the ceiling price for poplar wood at the head of the lakes in Ontario was $7.50 a cord. In Manitoba for the same wood the price was $5.50 a cord, including $1 bonus. There are corresponding differences in respect of other types of wood. This wood was shipped from the head of the lakes to Winnipeg with a freight rate of $8 a cord, as paid for through government subsidies. This wood, which cost $15.50 a cord, was shipped through a wooded area in Manitoba and sold in Winnipeg for $5.15.

That is one glaring example of our present controls and inefficiencies. The secretary of agriculture of the United States states that in that country a peace-time farm production of fifty per cent more than pre-war level is possible. Canada's basic industry has often been stated to be and actually is agriculture. Prosperous basic industries are essential for the prosperity of the nation. Agriculture is an industry engaged in the manufacture of foodstuffs. It is an industry which has approximately 735,000 branch factories across Canada, with each factory facing problems similar to those found in all other industrial enterprises. The farmer, like the manufacturer in the operation of his factory, is faced with problems of management, labour, working capital, adequate power supply, overhead costs, finance, factory efficiency, sales promotion and markets.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

It is in an examination of these that we get to the root of our agricultural problem. This industry of agriculture embraces some 3,163,280 people who live on the land. A farm, whether small or large, is an individual capitalistic enterprise. I think it is important that we should appreciate that situation at this time. During the past year agricultural production, with an approximate decrease of twenty-five per cent in man-power, had well over a forty per cent increase in foodstuffs, all of which are required in the prosecution of the war. The war supplies furnished to Great Britain under Mutual Aid have included all types of supplies, procured for Great Britain through Canadian government departments or agencies. They bought huge tonnages of wheat, flour, bacon, beef, cheese, eggs and various other special farm products. Mutual Aid has been extended to cover Canada's contribution to the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, known as UNRRA. This will take us into the post-war period.

Many people ask, then, what about the future of agriculture? Nutritional standards, and the improvement thereof, will create greater demands for agricultural foodstuffs. Nutrition surveys carried out across Canada have shown serious diet deficiencies among more than half the families of Canada. Half a million Canadian children are undernourished. It is now internationally recognized that there must be increased consumption of adequate quantities of nutritional food. Agriculture has suffered more than any other activity in Canada from lop-sided development. The Sirois commission report states definitely that from 1896 to 1913, under a vigorous immigration policy by the governments of the day, assisted by land companies and railway companies, a tremendous expansion took place in territories of Canada. Settlement took place without discrimination. The territories settled grew from about 10,000,000 acres to some 70,000,000 acres in that period. The production of wheat was increased from approximately 20,000,000 bushels to some 210,000,000 bushels during that period. Since that time production has again almost doubled.

During that period of time no encouragement was given to industrialists and tradesmen to come to this country and develop industry. We have greater undeveloped natural resources in Canada than are to be found in any other country of the world. We have great facilities for the development of industry. If in this country there had been a balanced programme of immigration and development we would enjoy a market within Canada for very much of our agricultural production.

For example, statistics prove that for the year 1937 the family of the average industrial employee consumed agricultural products to the extent of $409.35 annually. These figures for to-day would be considerably higher. On this basis, if we had 5,000,000 heads of families employed in industry there would be an immediate home market in Canada for our present agricultural production.

I am one who thinks that in a country such as Canada, with our vast undeveloped natural resources, our very cheap electrical power and the possibility for further development of cheap electrical power, we must have, during the generation following the end of the present war, a much greater development of peace-time industry. This would create employment for all our ex-service men and for every able-bodied Canadian willing to work. It would also necessitate an immigration policy on a selective basis for industrial development—not land settlement, as in the past. This could be had at a greater remuneration for employees than has been customary in the past history of Canada.

In that great and comparatively new and cosmopolitan country to the south of us, the United States of America, we find an example where, prior to this war, many of our young and trained men left Canada and received much greater remuneration in the United States than they could receive in this country, their native land.

In this respect there is a real field of work for the new Department of Reconstruction. I trust it will follow the suggestion through. Many of the new Canadians, or those of foreign ancestry, have splendid war records, when compared with the records of many native-born Canadians. The real native-born Canadians are those of French Canada, or Quebec. French Canada is approximately 300 years old, yet it is still a young and vigorous country. These people are possessed of material, economic and spiritual ideals which are worth fighting for, and which would develop a strong and united Canada. They, and more especially the generation for twenty-five years prior to 1939, have received false or improper leadership with respect to citizenship in this country.

In this connection I should like to quote from a speech by the Prime Minister (Mr Mackenzie King) delivered in this house on March 30, 1939, and reported at page 2419 of Hansard. It states:

> Canada, it is contended, is not a country of unlimited powers; it has not the capacity to stand indefinite strains. We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drouth and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia. The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

Then in the same speech, as reported at page 2426 of Hansard, he said:

> One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.

That was the Prime Minister speaking a few months before the declaration of war. He went on to say:

> One political fact is equally clear: in a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. Planning and coordination would be essential, but the necessary coordination could be made, and if this government were in power it would be made, without sacrificing those vital ends and conditions of our existence. Profits could and would be rigidly controlled, and profiteering suppressed. But men's lives and men's wills cannot be put on the same basis as goods and profits. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

As I pointed out, that was a few months before the declaration of war. In 1939 there was a declaration of the same policy that had been practised by the same leader and some of his cohorts for twenty-five years, while this generation was growing up. Little wonder that when the thirty-day training scheme was introduced during the early stages of this war the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that this was necessary in order to impress Canadian youth with the duty of citizenship. This generation, especially those of the province of Quebec, believe that they have been deceived. There are many splendid fighting troops from Quebec. I prefer to believe that recent events have so challenged the people of this nation that the views expressed by that fighting padre of French Canada, Father Armand Sabourin of Les Fusiliers

Mount-Royal, are more indicative of what all people are thinking across Canada to-day. He said on his return from Dieppe:

> We wanted to prevent Hitler from reaching our shores to-morrow to destroy our faith, our tongue and our institutions. We crossed the channel to fight with England for Canada. If I am a free man to-day in my country I owe it to England. The Anglo-Protestant government recognizes my rights as a French Canadian and gives me complete freedom of religion and of speech and respects my traditions. That is why we went to Dieppe.

I believe that with proper leadership French Canada would do their part in creating and developing a great united Canada. I believe that is yet more than possible.

We have in Canada to-day a serious man-power problem. A few weeks ago the Minister of National Defence assured us that we had adequate reserves for our army to meet battle casualties. Those are his exact words which may be found in Hansard. To-day under his authority the chief recruiting officer of the Department of National Defence says that we are in urgent need of forty-eight thousand reinforcements for overseas. He attempts to shame men from industry and other vocations into enlisting. At the same time the farmer has to do without help. According to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) we are 196,000 men short in industry.

In the face of all this we have an army of approximately 75,000 now in service for the defence of Canada. This home army represents a cost of $150,000,000 a year. Seventy-five thousand men are kept out of agriculture, out of industry, out of the war, out of everything but the public treasury. The farmer and his wife along with other citizens of Canada work many long hours in order to pay for this. The government has access to information as to where these men are required most, and yet they, the responsible ministers, apparently refuse to act. In fairness to some of the men of the home defence army to whom I have talked I think I should say that they make the statement that the responsible ministers of the government have available to them certain information. If they or the government refuse to state and take proper action as to where these men can best serve, that is their problem.

We have the strange anomaly of several ministers on the front benches, family men with good records in the last war, under the cloak of political expediency, as many people claim, submitting to the whims of their leader the present Prime Minister on man-power. We have had set forth by two great world leaders, Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt, the Atlantic charter for the four freedoms. That is what we desire and what we should strive for.

Mr. Speaker, I take second place to no man in my dislike of war. Neither do I take second place to any person with respect to my interest in the welfare of humanity. At the same time I trust I have some realization of my duty as a citizen of Canada. I shall support the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), which reads as follows:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> (a) that no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation;
> (b) that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum;
> (c) that no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting overtime pay from income tax;
> (d) that sufficient provision has not been made for the elimination of the inequities presently existing with respect to agricultural taxation;
> (e) that no adequate provision has been made to ensure increased post-war employment through the discovery and development of metallic and non-metallic mineral resources;
> (f) that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent."

I trust that we shall not forget that at this moment young men are fighting for our way of life and for this parliament. I think that should at all times be our first consideration. As my colleague pointed out this afternoon, many of these gallant young men will not return to us. Many others will return maimed for life. They and their dependents must be our first care at all times.

Just before I close I should like to make some reference to procedure in this house. The statement has often been made that the length of the session depends on the opposition. I have taken some pains to check Hansard on certain points. I remember one to me rather disgraceful day in this house, Tuesday, April 25, when we wasted the entire day on the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders of this house. We made no progress whatever. Some twenty members on the government side spoke in that debate, three Progressive Conservatives, five C.C.F., three Social Credit and two others. Fifty pages of Hansard were filled on that day, or approximately 5,500 lines. Of this amount 4,463 lines, or over eighty per cent, were taken by the government speakers; 449 lines by the Progressive Conservatives and 354 lines by the C.C.F.

Then we had a motion from the Prime Minister to the effect that Wednesday sittings of the house were out from February 22 to June 14, 1944, in spite of most strenuous opposition from all opposition parties in the house.

We have also had the banking and commerce committee sitting for some twenty-seven days, and almost the entire time of that committee has been monopolized by two members of the government party.

There are many other figures I could give of the time that has been taken up this session, but I will content myself with saying that government party members are the ones who are responsible for our not making better headway at this time. In these critical days our first thoughts should be with the gallant young men and young women, and their dependents, who are doing so much for us to-day.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, if I happen to speak at this stage of the debate, it is not, Mr. Speaker, because I want to be labelled as leader of any group, and on this point I should like to tranquillize the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) who, on February 1, in the course of the debate on the speech from the throne, mentioned the fact that he was speaking after many leaders, some of them, he said, leaders of "one man" parties. As I had been speaking before him, there is no doubt that his remarks were directed to me as well as to others who had spoken before him.

I believe the hon. member for Trinity is an able lawyer, and he must be aware of the fact that there can exist some independent members who do not need blindly to follow a leader, being able to think for themselves.

I happen to be here as representative of constituents who sent me to this house to represent their personal views and not the ideas of a party.

Since the beginning of this session we have discussed many projects relating to social security. Every group, and I should say every hon. member of this chamber, has had an opportunity of expressing his personal views on the different post-war projects, many of which have been discussed at great length. This goes to prove that everybody is anxious to look forward, and endeavour to prepare to his utmost capacity the future of our country. There is no doubt that this sentiment is shared by the whole population, and especially by those who, at the present time, are engaged in the gigantic struggle, of which, thank God, we hope to see the end before long.

I should like to draw attention to the fact that, for the last few years, and especially during this session, many declarations made by persons in authority have led us to believe that this country is moving more and more toward greater centralization. All the new projects brought before the house for the purpose of social security bear in themselves this very danger of a greater centralization.

We must not set aside and we must never forget the basic principle which is the foundation of our national life and by which this parliament is bound to give its fullest respect to the constitution under which we live. We must never forget that the provinces constituting the Canadian federation also have their rights under our constitution, and my contention is that none of these new projects can produce good results if the provinces do not share the burden. The provinces should be called upon to collaborate with the dominion government, but should never be called to give up their own rights. If we refer to some declarations, we come to the conclusion that this government wants more than a collaboration on the part of the provinces.

From the discussions that took place on bill No. 82, for the establishment of a new Department of Reconstruction, I should like to quote a few sentences, which will show that I am right in scenting the danger which I have just mentioned. On June 20, in the course of the debate just mentioned, I find at page 4009 of Hansard the following words:

> Mr. Gillis: They are always prepared to do it, but they always throw up a straw man so that we cannot get through it, with the co-operation of the provinces. You hide behind the British North America Act.

The answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was as follows:

> I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has referred to New Zealand. I wonder if he has brought out the point that they have only one government in New Zealand, a unitary government, which is able to do things. If there were only one government in Canada, the lower age of sixty-five would now be in force.

Later on, in the same debate, at page 4013 of Hansard, I quote from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin):

> But this government has not overlooked the desirability of taking unto itself powers that now reside elsewhere. It attempted that in 1941, the first real attempt ever made in this country, by having a conference with the provinces in this very chamber, to try to bring about some of the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report, with the idea of stream-lining, if you like, our legislative machinery, with the idea of rendering our legislative powers more efficient. Then, not having succeeded in that conference, it is now proceeding to another; and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said to-day, steps and preparations are now under way for the holding of another conference between the dominion and the provinces.

I am afraid that such declarations constitute the best encouragement to the very few people who seem sometimes to favour a movement of separatism in our country.

I wish to state, however, that the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister on the same occasion expressed some views which are worthy of mention, and I should like to regard them as the guiding declarations of the next interprovincial conference. I quote from page 4062 of Hansard:

I think it must be evident from the attitude taken so far by the dominion and the members of the government that the conference will not be entered into with any thought of endeavouring merely to secure the transfer of constitutional and financial power by one side or the other. The conference aims to see what is best for the people of Canada, how their needs can be met and who can best meet them; and if, as I expect, the provinces meet the dominion in that spirit, we can look forward to a satisfactory arrangement to deal with all these questions.

These last words are worthy of mention, and they should be inserted in the agenda of the proposed conference.

Mention has been made quite a few times by the Prime Minister and others during this session that this interprovincial conference would be called soon. This conference was announced by the Prime Minister in the very beginning of the session, and a few days ago he repeated his announcement and told the house that this conference would be held in a month or so.

There is no doubt that the people of this country have the right to ask if the purpose of this interprovincial conference will be the adoption of the Rowell-Sirois report which was shelved in 1941, when the premiers of the nine provinces met in Ottawa. If the purpose of the government is such, I contend that it should be well specified, so that the representatives of the provinces will know exactly what they are called for, and beforehand they can secure from their respective constituents their desires and yearnings.

I do not see any need for central government to infringe upon provincial rights to pass legislation even in matters of social security.

We have a very good experience of successful legislation in which the provincial and central governments collaborate; I mean the old age pension and other similar legislation.

The matter of provincial autonomy is very serious and should be dealt with extremely carefully.

Ever since confederation there has been a gradual and continuous movement for centralization of authority in the federal parliament. Many have been the conflicts between the federal and provincial governments in respect of jurisdiction.

We have to admit that the provinces are the real historic units around which centres all the glory of our history, the remembrance of early settlement and adversity, and the affection that clings to the family. The provinces, in the immediate sense, lie nearer to the hearts of most of our people than does the larger but more abstract conception of the dominion. This is all the more true, inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, if we take the prairies as one, represent actual units of history and physical units of geography. Hence the whole setting and background of our Canadian provinces seems to indicate them as the proper form of our natural life, separate groups of people each doing things in their own way and letting the others do the same.

The case for provincial autonomy is made still stronger when we remember that one province, the oldest and the largest, Quebec, is for its French-Canadian people almost everything; and for some of them quite everything. It is almost all that history has left them of a regime that was their own, of the language and religion of their mother country.

In an article published in the Financial Post of January 8, 1944, written by Stephen Leacock, I read this:

The province of Quebec, wrote Andrew Macphail, is the last refuge of common sense in North America. We contrasted, too, the tyranny of the Ontario Sunday, with the wholesome outdoor Sunday of the priests and their seminary scholars playing games together. We admire that quiet contentedness of the French-Canadian habitant and its contrast to the eager haste, the get-rich-quick, the quest-for-money of the restless English. We liked the stories that Doctor Drummond told us of Jean-Baptiste coming home again from the States, of Louis Hemon's far-away and long-ago picture of the world of Marie Chapdelaine. Around French Canada hung all the romance of history, and the respect for a people happy in their own lot. Above this level of the plain life of simple people was the pride felt by the educated and academic classes of society, living in a dual culture, in drawing upon two languages and two great literatures, on the traditions of two great nations.

This picture is true for the whole province of Quebec, and more particularly for the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

In the course of my trips across this vast area of over 300,000 square miles, it has been a great pleasure for me to meet citizens of all groups and all classes, and I must say, without fear of contradiction, that the people living in Charlevoix-Saguenay are most faithful, loyal and honest. They love their country; they love the soil from which they draw their living; they love the small piece of land where they raise their large families, praying the Almighty to be preserved from the evils that are spreading all over the world.

They are glad to collaborate with their fellow-citizens and give their contribution toward making this country as beautiful as possible, and a place where one can live happily; but they, in turn, need the collaboration of the governments, and the greatest of these needs consists in the establishment of better means of communication.

I have already said, and I will repeat it as long as the authorities refuse to hear my appeal, that the only means of developing this vast section of our country would be the construction of a road along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. We have seen in the war appropriations that this government is spending vast sums to build some roads in the western part of the country, and I am eager to see the day when the government will look up to the eastern part as well.

I said that our people live quietly and happily. I stated that they want to collaborate with their fellow-citizens, but they do not want to be replaced by foreigners of all descriptions. That is the reason why they are opposed to opening wide the doors of our country to facilitate immigration. On this question, I already had the opportunity on June 5 to say a few words in this house, and I should like to complete my remarks. Since this question of immigration will, no doubt, be one of the most important in the post-war period, I hope it will be discussed in every quarter with the broadest-minded spirit.

We very often hear some figures mentioned about the possibilities for Canada to absorb many million immigrants after the war. While listening to such declarations, I have always wondered if they were made in good faith, and if those who made them knew exactly what they were speaking about. One of the many reasons advanced for accepting immigrants in Canada is the contention that so many million immigrants will become so many million consumers; but I never heard that such figures were based on serious inquiries, and my first point is that the government, before allowing these immigrants to enter Canada, should make a complete survey throughout the country to ascertain whether there is enough space to absorb such immigrants. I challenge anyone to deny the necessity of such a survey being made with the least possible delay. Doubtless, we cannot compare our density of population in Canada with that of any other country, and I think it is stupid to contend that Canada is able to receive so many million immigrants on account of her vast area. The contentions that are based upon this comparison of areas are not serious ones and are made by those who ignore, as I already said, what they are talking about. In fact, everybody knows that in our country there is only a strip of land habitable, so that we easily come to the conclusion that available space throughout Canada is more limited than it is claimed to be in some quarters. The logical attitude to take would be not to accept immigrants before ascertaining that we need them, and before making a judicious choice of them. I think nearly everybody in this country is willing to have new citizens come from abroad, but they also expect these newcomers to collaborate in building up a greater country, and that they will not be a burden for Canadian citizens.

Since we may not be afforded the time to discuss at full length the problem of immigration when the civil estimates of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) come before the house, I take advantage of this opportunity to express my views on this policy. I wish to state that it would be much better for us to keep Canadian-born citizens in Canada, rather than replacing them with newcomers. I am mentioning this, because if we refer to the "Canada Year Book" of 1942, we see at page 91 a complete summary of the movement of the Canadian population for the last twenty years. It is entitled:

Summary of births, deaths, natural increase and immigration, calendar years, with estimated population as at June 1, 1921-40.

On June, 1, 1921, the population of Canada was 8,788,000. From 1921, to June 1, 1940, 797,036 immigrants came to Canada; in the same period of time, we had 2,432,609 births. Therefore, had we kept our newly-born Canadians together with the immigrants who came to Canada, our population should have increased to 12,017,645. According to the summary just mentioned, we see that on June 1, 1940, our population was 11,422,000; that is to say, about 600,000 less than we should have had. As mentioned, we received 797,000 immigrants and we lost 600,000 Canadian citizens. Have I not the right to ask, where is the benefit in spending such large amounts of money for immigration when we cannot save our own citizens? To explain these figures, I must say that the ones which I have just read about newly-born Canadians are given after having deducted the number of deaths. Is it not right to say that our money would be much better spent for the safe-keeping of our own citizens? I remember that, in previous years, a Canadian citizen from the province of Quebec who went to establish himself out west, had to pay more than immigrants coming from central Europe to the same place.

I said that this question of immigration was a very important one, and I base my contention on the report of the Department of Mines and Resources for the year ending March, 1943. At page 175 of this report, I read the following sentences under the title, "Post-War Immigration". I quote:

Many suggestions are being received as to post-war immigration. These are being carefully examined and filed for future reference. It is everywhere recognized that Canada must, first of all, deal with the reestablishment of her own service personnel and their dependents and during that period turn the Canadian war industry to peace-time pursuits. The magnitude of this task cannot be known until the war is over.

Those best able to form an opinion agree that tens of thousands of the war-oppressed people of Europe will look to the western world for new homes when war has ceased. Few of these are likely to have funds either for transportation or settlement and many may require to be built up physically before being fit for transfer from Europe. How many and what type of settlers, especially those without capital, will Canada be able to absorb with benefit to the newcomers and to the dominion. Will the assistance given by the allies to the suffering millions of Europe after the war include financial assistance for migration and settlement?

We are fighting the most terrible war the world has ever known. We have spent millions and billions of money. Our young men have given their health and even their lives and all these sacrifices to prevent the invasion of our country and to enable our citizens to enjoy an enduring peace. I wonder if these tens of thousands of people of Europe, as mentioned in the quotation I just made, will not constitute what I would call a "pacific invasion" of our country with the possibility of the same result as if the invasion proper had taken place? Are we to allow all kinds of people to enter into Canada and let them spread among our population the ideologies and doctrines that lie at the base of the present war in Europe? I am amazed to see in an official report of this government a statement like the one which is included in the quotation I first read and which is as follows:

How many and what type of settlers, especially those without capital, will Canada be able to absorb with benefit to the newcomers and to the dominion?

Is it not ridiculous to permit the entry into Canada of immigrants who will not even be able to pay their own transportation and who will be nothing but a burden for our people?

Another very important aspect of the same question comes from a declaration made by the Prime Minister, on May 22, after his return from England, and I quote from pages 3099 and 3100 of Hansard:

I should like to add a further word as a result of what I have heard and seen and felt. I do not believe that this war is going to end the conflict between the different classes and races of men. The enemy of to-day must be completely destroyed, but forces of evil have been let loose in this world which it is going to be difficult indeed to bring to bay. These forces of evil are going to continue to destroy all that is best for mankind, I am fraid, for many days, possibly years, after the main struggle is over. In all our deliberations here, as I am sure will be the case in the deliberations of all other assemblies of free nations, we must never lose sight of the fact that our greatest work may still lie ahead in seeking to trample under foot and slay the dragon that to-day is seeking to destroy humanity itself.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has said too much and too little. As far as I am concerned, I should have liked to learn from the Prime Minister what are the forces of evil to which he referred? They must consist of something untold; they must emanate from somewhere other than from our enemy territories, because otherwise they would be destroyed as our enemies will be, and we would not have to fear those evils, once the war is won. These forces of evil must be threatening from outside Canada, since every precaution has been taken to overcome subversive elements in Canada.

Therefore we must believe, first, that those forces of evil actually exist, since the Prime Minister mentioned them.

Second, they must come from outside, because otherwise our government would not be fulfilling its duty by allowing any subversive movement to flourish in our midst.

Third, they cannot be found in enemy territories, since the Prime Minister stated that they will continue to destroy all that is best for mankind even after the defeat of our enemies. Where do they come from? How could they penetrate our country, and what would be the best way to defend ourselves against such forces of evil?

Is it not true that the surest way to spare our country from these forces of evil, since they likely come from outside, would be caution in the selection of immigrants to enter Canada, because this would apparently be the means through which these forces could be brought in. Is it only by a sane immigration policy that Canada could be spared from them? Up to now, I believe that our government has been much too lenient toward the so-called refugee, this problem being so closely connected with immigration.

In the "Canada Year Book" of 1942, under the title, "Immigration and Colonization-Refugee Immigration," we read subsection 8, as follows:

The term "refugee" in recent years, has acquired a much wider application than when it became a familiar word after the first world war. Then it was applied mainly to those who had lost both homes and citizenship; latterly, it has been applied to all who, because of political, religious, racial or economic troubles, actual or threatened, have been forced or induced to move.

And further, at page 166, we read this:

For many years, the exodus of settlers was discouraged by emigration countries, but latterly the emigration of unwanted minorities has been encouraged although an increased effort has been made to retain their capital.

We must conclude that to the problem of immigration has been added the problem of refugees, and I wish to draw the attention of the government to the fact that under the War Measures Act the entry of refugees does not seem to have been dealt with accurately. I am of the opinion that we should have been, and should still be, more cautious with regard to this refugee immigration. It is always commendable to extend a helpful hand to ill-fortuned people who were crushed by dictators of conquered countries; but one must not forget that—Charity begins at home—and I can hardly conceive this virtue of charity practised to the extent of allowing all kinds of people to establish their homes in our midst without, prior to their coming, ascertaining that they are desirable subjects.

One wonders why the government deemed it advisable to cast aside the immigration law, as was the case recently. I wish to state first that in our immigration law, chapter 93 of the revised statutes, we find the necessary protection against the intrusion of undesirable elements. Section 4 provides that the minister may issue a written permit authorizing any person to enter Canada, to remain therein, without being subject to the provisions of this act. In accordance with this provision of the law, at the beginning of the present session the Minister of Mines and Resources tabled sessional paper 46 on Friday, January 28. In this document we see that only two special permits were issued during the calendar year 1943 to the two persons mentioned in the said document. I wonder why all the permits issued by the same department to many hundred refugees have not been issued under the same section. In fact an order in council was passed on the 10th December, 1943. That order, P.C. 9440, in part reads as follows:

Section 1. Notwithstanding any provision of the Immigration Act, chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, or any amendment thereto, or of order in council P.C. 2653 of September 14, 1939, the Minister of Mines and Resources or any person thereunto authorized by him may issue a temporary permit to enter Canada to any refugee transferred to Canada from the United Kingdom whose release in Canada has been approved by the appropriate authorities.

Paragraph (c) of section 2 reads:

(c) be subject to the provisions of the national selective service (civilian) regulations in the same manner and to the same extent as any other person in Canada.

It appears by this last paragraph that these refugees can have the benefit of the national selective service regulations but are not subject to the military call-up. There is another reason why one wonders why we did not apply the immigration law, and this wondering derives from the fact that in the order in council just mentioned it is explicitly stated that chapter 93 of the revised statutes does not apply. If we look at section 3 of chapter 93 we see provisions for the protection of our people, as well as our institutions, which are expressly set aside by the P.C. 9440. In this section appears a list of prohibited classes, and it is worth mentioning some of them. They are as follows:

Idiots and imbeciles	Spies
Deaf and dumb	Criminals
Prostitutes	Alcoholics
Vagrants	Revolutionaries
Invalids	Traitors

And especially those mentioned in paragraph (n) of the said section 3, that is to say:

Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada or of constituted law and authority, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

After having taken cognizance of the abovementioned order in council, I thought it advisable to inquire about the number of refugees who had been admitted to Canada by virtue of this order. On January 26, I asked some questions on the orders of the day, and one of them read as follows:

How many permits have been issued by the Minister of Mines and Resources, or by any person authorized by him, under order in council P.C. 9440, December 10, 1943?

The answer given by the minister was: "932." Wishing to know who these refugees were, I subsequently asked another question to find out the names, previous residence and racial origin of the persons to whom these permits had been issued. In answer to my question, sessional paper 48-A was tabled on April 17. It showed that more than ninety per cent of these permits had been issued to Hebrews.

I wish to state here most emphatically that at all times I am ready to comply with the directions given by the Roman Catholic church, and to consider the Hebrews as any other people. I have nothing against them. During my twenty-three years of law practice in Quebec, I have had occasion to deal with them quite often, and I do not hesitate to say that they must be considered on the same footing as any other people; but my contention is that they must not enjoy any special privileges and I will endeavour to show that, since the beginning of the present war on too many occasions we have seen special privileges extended to them; so much so that, at times, we are wondering whether or not we were engaged in this war for the sole purpose of saving or helping out the Jews all over the world. Here in Canada our attention has been drawn very often, to all kinds of organizations to help the ill-fated Jews. As an example, an association was formed some time ago, under the name of "United Jewish Refugees and War Relief Agencies," with its head office at 1121 St. Catherine street west Montreal. They also have branches in Toronto and Winnipeg, under the chairmanship of Samuel Bronfman.

Under the auspices of this association a campaign was launched throughout Canada, sponsored by Senator Cairine R. Wilson, chairman of the national committee on refugees. The purpose of this campaign was to gather some 500,000 signatures in support of a petition to the Canadian government. I hold in my hand a copy of this petition in which they asked the government of Canada: I quote:

1. To offer the sanctuary of Canada to refugees from political or religious persecution without regard to race, creed or financial condition.

2. To take immediate steps to facilitate the entry into Canada of refugees (especially those stranded in Portugal) whom it is possible to rescue.

3. To make any changes in the Immigration Act, regulations or administration thereof necessary to admit such refugees into Canada.

I do not know whether this petition ever reached the government, but I am aware that in order to encourage this movement a Canadian immigration office was opened at Lisbon, Portugal, in October, 1943, for the purpose of examining refugees applying for sanctuary in Canada and for granting appropriate visas. Later on, the house was informed that a few hundred refugees were coming into Canada each month under this new scheme.

Must I come to the conclusion that these petitions had a much better result than some other petitions that were presented to the Prime Minister by Canadian citizens and municipal corporations? On March 27 I asked the Prime Minister, as recorded at page 1861 of Hansard:

How many municipal corporations and public bodies have forwarded to the Prime Minister resolutions requesting the full application of the provisions of the Immigration Act with regard to any individual who wishes to enter this country?

This is what the Prime Minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am informed that there have been forwarded to my office a large number of resolutions on the subject referred to. The resolutions are similarly worded. It is perfectly evident some one or more persons have been circulating communications with a view to having them forwarded to my office. The question is of the kind which, were it to be answered literally, might convey a wholly erroneous impression. For example, I might say I have received thousands of communications identically worded concerning some things—the postage being free. Were I asked to recall how many of these have been received, and were to say that thousands had come in, such an answer would be wholly misleading. For the most part they would represent the opinions of a mere handful of persons. There have not been thousands in this case, but an answer as to the number that have come in would be misleading the public as to the significance of the reply given. I think therefore that the question should not be answered.

Having personally received some duplicates of these resolutions, I know they were passed legally and regularly at a meeting of each municipal corporation which had adopted them, and I really was amazed to notice how little concerned was the Prime Minister about these resolutions. Must we come to the conclusion that the Jewish refugees deserve much better attention from our government than our Canadian-born citizens?

At this stage of my remarks I should like to make a suggestion; I would not say for the solution of this very difficult problem, but at least as an attempt to bring about a solution. I believe that the Canadian government should follow the rulings of the British North America Act on this question, which we find at section 95 of the act which reads as follows:

In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may, from time to time, make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the provinces, and to immigration into all or any of the provinces; and any law of the legislature of a province relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long as it is not repugnant to any act of the parliament of Canada.

This section was in accordance with the Quebec resolutions of 1864 and the London resolutions of 1866.

I have always believed that in all our internal policies, if we followed as closely as possible the terms of the British North America Act, we would not be so often faced with so many difficulties as have been encountered more in recent years than ever before.

On this question of immigration there is no doubt that the provincial governments are much more aware of the needs and possibilities of their respective provinces. They are in closer relation with the people, with the municipal bodies, and are in a much better position to determine what kind of immigration they should allow in order that their economic life, as well as their social and political life, may not be interfered with and so that the efforts of the people to make this country the ideal place to live in may not be hampered.

In conclusion I would suggest that this government request the provincial governments to pass legislation, and, in this way, to make known their views on the matter. I suggest that this section 95 of the British North America Act has been too much overlooked in the past and that, after the present war, it will be more essential than ever before to have it put into application.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, once again that hardy annual, the budget, has made its appearance in the house. I think all would admit that it received a most lucid and eloquent interpretation at the hands of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I also feel assured that it had a very good reception at least from a majority of members in the house and from the public generally.

It will be noticed that it has not diminished very much in stature, since it made its last appearance. After all, I do not think that is contrary to the anticipation of hon. members or the public in general. It will be remembered that this is primarily a war-time budget and, although we have now experienced almost six years of this reign of death and destruction, it is quite evident that that tragedy of carnage has not yet ceased, and no one can forecast when the end will come.

Moreover, it would appear that we would be wise in anticipating that, from now until the end, this conflict will become more intensive in character than has been experienced in the war up to now. Therefore it is wise on the part of the government to provide proper financial arrangements, and wise for us who are interested in the war to be prepared to exercise every ounce of faith, enthusiasm, energy and strength within our power. It behooves us now to be prepared to put forth an even greater war effort than we hitherto have done.

I shall not tire the house by entering into a detailed recitation of the achievements of this dominion in its war effort, nor shall I set out what it has done in both economic and military fields of endeavour. I believe it would be sufficient to say that it has received the plaudits of the whole of the Canadian people, and that it has received the praise and admiration of our allies, and has merited praise from every worth-while journal on the north American continent. In fact, so wise has been our economic policy to maintain the strain of war and to prevent deflation after the war is over, that, in large measure, our economic policy was copied by the great nation to the south of us.

It was pointed out in the speech from the throne that the government had primarly in mind the successful prosecution of the war, and I think it will be accepted by the unprejudiced mind that it has adhered fairly closely to that policy. When we realize the cooperation the government has received from every element of our citizenship—from labour, industry, the farmers, the fishermen and the merchant marine—it appears quite clear that the nation as a whole has become conscious of the importance of putting forth our very best efforts in order to defeat the challenge of those who would dominate the world.

References also were made in the speech from the throne to other measures regarded as essential to deal with our post-war problems. There was reference in the speech from the throne to measures which would be introduced, debated and put on the statute books in order to deal with our post-war problems. These are classified as measures of rehabilitation and reconstruction, and I think all will agree that they are timely. I believe the government was wise, first of all to anticipate those problems, and then to introduce measures to deal with them. I think we owe that to our fighting men, the men who have experienced the hardships and the horrors of war. It behooves us to show these men when they return to their homeland that they will have security, and will live in a democracy worthy of the blood, sweat and tears they have expended in its behalf.

While I admit that the prosecution of the war should be foremost in the thoughts and intent of our people, yet I consider that the government is only showing wisdom when it has some regard and does some planning for possibly 2,000,000 of our citizens who are now engaged in industry and are on active service, and who will return to the land or revert to their ordinary pursuits in life. I think every unprejudiced person will admit that from the inception of this war the government has attempted to prepare plans and schemes to deal with our post-war problems. Three hours after war was declared, the government established the wartime prices and trade board. Every one knows the beneficial effects of this action. During the war there has been no hoarding or no unnecessary scarcities. We have not had the disgraceful spectacle we had in the last war where certain men and corporations waxed rich on the sacrifices and blood of the nation. This was a great and cautious measure undertaken by the government immediately after the beginning of the war.

We come next to soldier reestablishment. We all remember the old Soldier Settlement Act which did not prove very satisfactory. Throughout my constituency, and I believe on the island of Cape Breton generally, it was characterized as a racket. Apparently no precautions were taken to afford security to the settler. In many cases men with no farming experience were placed on unproductive farms. With the two main essentials for success lacking, the result was that in one or two years many of these farms were vacated. Not only have the new amendments improved the act of the last war, but its provisions have been extended.

To-day men are placed on farms under certain regulations. First of all the farm must be sufficiently productive to support a man and his family and, next, the man must have some knowledge of farming. If he has not that knowledge he is given an opportunity to prepare himself to work on a farm and make a substantial living. The same rights and privileges are extended to men who work in small industries and to fishermen, men who can devote only part of their time to agricultural pursuits. They will receive the same concessions granted to those who can devote themselves entirely to agriculture.

Then there is the compulsory employment act which was passed by this government during the war. This will be of some help in solving our post-war problems. When a man leaves employment to enlist for active service he has the right to claim that employment upon his return.

Then there is the Unemployment Insurance Act. No one will say that that is not a provision to deal with the unemployment problem which is sure to show its ugly head after this war. The introduction of that act was quite timely because it was brought in when there was no unemployment. The result is that to-day we have a repository of money which will provide much of the finances needed to help, at least temporarily, in solving any unemployment conditions.

We come next to the matter of reconstruction and rehabilitation. These matters have been under study for the last two years by a committee of this house. The knowledge obtained from experts who have been before the committee is certainly worth while. I trust that when the provisions of this scheme are put into operation they will be dominion-wide and that special care will be given to those parts of Canada where the need for rehabilitation and reconstruction is more strongly indicated.

At the risk of being accused of being too regional, I consider that Nova Scotia, Cape Breton island and the constituency I have the honour to represent in particular will be the first parts of Canada to receive a practical application of this rehabilitation scheme. There is no part of this dominion which has received less support of that kind. On Cape Breton island and in the constituency which I represent we have many resources, on the land, in the forest and in the sea. Wrapped up in the rocks and in the bowels of the earth is enough mineral wealth to make us all happy and rich. In addition, Cape Breton island is a veritable tourist mecca. If our economic condition is below par it is not because of a lack of resources; it is not because of a lack of brain and brawn; it is owing to the fact that in spite of the industry and intelligence of our people there remain problems which they themselves cannot solve without governmental assistance.

One of our greatest problems is that of transportation, and a large part of this problem is caused by the bottleneck which exists between the great city of Sydney and the mainland of Nova Scotia. Our transportation condition is such that at the present time a locomotive can haul only eighteen cars from Sydney to Point Tupper, but the same locomotive can haul eighty loaded cars from Moncton west. This haulage inadequacy, if I may so term it, is because of a very high grade and many curves on the road.

That is not the only trouble. Not only are we suffering from a lack of haulage facilities, but we are subjected to a delay of from five to seven hours on account of having to ferry our freight and our passengers across the strait of Canso. In other words, a loaded train arriving at Point Tupper which has to be ferried to Mulgrave will reach Truro seven hours later than it would if the train could cross a bridge or causeway. It costs $500,000 to operate the car ferries at Point Tupper, to say nothing of the capital replacement after a certain number of years. There is operating across that strait a highway, now operating at a loss. If a causeway were built there it would afford a passage for cars, and that project which to-day is operating at a loss would become a source of revenue simply through a toll being charged for crossing the bridge. The people of Cape Breton are vitally concerned in this matter. There is very much ado about the cost of this project; but we, in Cape Breton, realize that we have been contributing to projects in other parts of Canada from which we derive no physical or financial benefit, and when we consider what has been expended in that way we feel justified in saying that the matter of cost should not enter into this scheme at all. The first and only consideration should be to supply proper transportation so as to overcome the inadequacy from which we are suffering. It is pretty nearly time that the people of Canada when they are speaking of the eastern and western boundaries of this great dominion of ours should say, "from Sydney to Vancouver", instead of saying from "Halifax to Vancouver". I think this project is economically sound. It would be costly, no doubt, but it is certainly a project to which our people are entitled.

That is not all I have to say about transportation facilities in our part of the country. In my constituency there are two short lines of railroads. We have a railroad from Point Tupper to St. Peters in Richmond county. We have another railroad from Point Tupper to Inverness in Inverness county. Both of these roads should be further extended. The development which has taken place in the fishing, lumbering and farming industries north of Inverness warrants the extension of that railway in order to provide proper and adequate transportation facilities for that section of the country. There is another reason why this extension should be made. From the town of Inverness to Margaree harbour is a belt of coal which has lain undeveloped, I believe just for lack of the transportation facilities which this extension would provide.

I should like to add this further word about our transportation facilities. The train from Point Tupper to Inverness as well as the train from Point Tupper to St. Peters consists of one passenger coach and a number of freight cars. If you want to have a good example of one of the relics of olden times you should take a ride on the coach of each of these trains. The heating system is terrible. It is so bad that it renders the coach air-polluted rather than air-conditioned. The only compensating thing about it is that the coal gas renders the passengers, if they have any distance to go, sort of semi-conscious, so that they do not feel the bumps from the uncomfortable seats in that coach. I would suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) that he substitute for this air-polluted mobile contraption—I cannot call it anything else—a fairly decent passenger coach that would not tax the respiratory organs of the passengers and would not be so severe on their dorsalis and gluteus maximus muscles. I think that is something which our people deserve. We have been tolerant. We know the conditions of war; we know the scarcity of materials; nevertheless we feel that just so soon as it is possible to make this substitution it should be done.

Another thing that should be given careful consideration in the rehabilitation programme is our fisheries. We have in the north of Inverness county three large cooperative fisheries, and we have three private individuals who are carrying on that industry there in a big way. But under the circumstances, with a lack of facilities, they are not able to reach anything like maximum production or get the price which they should for their fish. We all know that the marketing of fish to-day has changed materially from conditions prevailing a few years back. You can no longer tie a rope about a cantle of fish and ship it and sell it on the market. Mackerel to-day must be filleted. You cannot put it on the market round. The best codfish to-day is processed into boneless fish. These products are perishable, and there are no refrigeration facilities. They cannot be processed profitably because of the lack of refrigeration facilities. Local refrigeration is a necessity in carrying on this work. I have been trying for the last three or four years to get a refrigeration plant in the centre of the north at Grand Etang. When one looks around and sees all that these people have done under the greatest handicaps I certainly cannot understand why we should not at least encourage them in the wonderful efforts they have already made by providing them with refrigeration facilities.

At Cheticamp a few years ago we had a life-saving boat. This possibly does not seem to hon. gentlemen a very important thing, but I can tell this house and the minister that the lack of that life-saving boat at Cheticamp is responsible for a lack of production of fish. I will tell you why. The men are operating in that section with small boats and they are not going to attempt to go any distance outside where probably the fish are schooling unless the weather is quite evidently fine. If there is any suspicion or forecast of bad weather they refuse to go out; whereas, if they had a life-saving boat at Cheticamp, they would feel that if they got into trouble there would be some refuge in the storm. I urge upon the minister the consideration of this very important matter. It would not be costly, because it would mean only a few hundred dollars, and I can assure him that it would have a great effect on the production of fish in that area.

Lumbering is another thing that will receive consideration under the rehabilitation scheme. The lumber industry in my constituency is one of our greatest industries. The province of Nova Scotia has done a great deal in the way of conserving our forests and in encouraging that industry in many ways. From the revenue that is accruing to the dominion from that industry, I really think something more should be done to encourage it.

What I have said about fisheries in the county of Inverness applies also to the counties of Richmond and West Cape Breton. These people, alone and unaided, have done wonderful work in that industry. They have established cooperatives there, and they are carrying on, under difficulties, a business which is very important not only to themselves but to the dominion as a whole.

Another thing that should come under the rehabilitation scheme is an intensive geological survey of our mineral wealth. I believe that if any section of this dominion has been almost absolutely immune from research of this kind it is the island of Cape Breton, and I would urge upon the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) that he see to it that as a post-war programme, and knitted into the fabric of rehabilitation, there should be an intensive research into our minerals, which I believe exist in abundance although they have not yet been revealed.

Another industry that will receive consideration, and one that should be considered particularly in my constituency, is the farming industry. As has already been pointed out to the house, there are hundreds of thousands of fertile acres in Nova Scotia which are submerged, and each year these submerged areas are increasing. This does not mean that our farmers are negligent or that they are not trying to help themselves; but this is a problem in which they cannot help themselves, and this reclamation of land, and the preservation of other land that will be overrun if some precaution is not taken, is one of the most important things I can conceive of in the province from which I come.

Talking about centralization and decentralization, another thing we are suffering from in the island of Cape Breton, is the lack of an abattoir. The result is that our people in Cape Breton during this war have not been allowed the bonus on hogs simply because the only abattoir to which we have access is in Moncton, New Brunswick, and the cost of transporting our live stock there is too great. Moreover, the inconvenience is quite a serious matter. I think we should have an abattoir on the island of Cape Breton.

Something else which I believe is indicated is some sort of experimental station, a farm owned by the government, for the purpose of encouraging our people in the industry, setting an example in the way of increasing our stock and improving it, and interesting our people in sheep raising or something of that sort, for which our country is well adapted. I know several sites in my constituency which would be very suitable for an experimental farm of that kind, not far removed from a market, with splendid water, enough acreage, good pasturage, and surrounded by the most prominent farmers in the constituency.

We have heard something about the civil aviation scheme. I hope, when that is put into effect, our section of the country will not be overlooked. We have one of the most suitable sites for an airport right on the very brim of Cape Breton Highland park, and after this war, with our tourist meccas we have all around us, we expect that the influx of tourist traffic will mean to us the greatest revenue of all our industries.

We know also that these men who come to visit our country, in order to admire our scenic beauties and to bask in our restful surroundings, have not very much time to spare, and I do not doubt that many hundreds, yes, thousands, of these people will come to our meccas by plane. I said before, we have, adjoining our national park, one of the best sites in Nova Scotia for an air field. I would ask the minister, who is so greatly interested in the matter, when the house closes, if he is looking around for a place to admire beautiful scenery and to get a rest such as he would never obtain in any other part of the world, to look over our prospects in that direction.

Mr. GILLIS: He had better take a lunch with him.

Mr. McGARRY: Why?

Mr. GILLIS: Well, after the description you have given us.

Mr. McGARRY: What description?

Mr. GILLIS: All the fixing up that the whole constituency needs.

Mr. McGARRY: Do you not agree with me?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly I do; but when you invite him he had better bring his lunch with him.

Mr. McGARRY: We are not paupers, you know, although we hope to be better off when we are given our just rights.

Mr. GILLIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGARRY: I would ask the hon. member this question: If you are not in harmony with the suggestions I have made with regard to improvements, will you not make a definite statement to that effect?

Mr. GILLIS: I have been asking for those improvements for four years.

Mr. McGARRY: May I not ask also?

Mr. GILLIS: Why, certainly.

Mr. McGARRY: Then why cast reflections on my constituency?

Mr. GILLIS: I did not do that.

Mr. McGARRY: You are not the only one who can ask for things.

There is another matter in this scheme that I should like to refer to, and it is the last one I shall bring up. Some consideration should be given in the plan to the erection of a drydock at Louisburg. I see that the minister is smiling. I may tell him that that particular site has been investigated by some of the best engineers in Canada, and they say that if ever there were a natural site for a drydock it is at Louisburg. Louisburg is an open port the whole year round. If we are to expect and take for granted what we are told by those who have confidence in shipping and shipbuilding, that it is an industry that will be one of the greatest that we have after the war, I myself think the problem of establishing a drydock at Louisburg is a very important matter.

These are a few of the things with which I wish to deal. I am sorry that I had to be more or less regional in my remarks; I am sorry that I could not deal more fully with everything that is contained in the budget, but I have taken that part of it which I consider to be the most important part and that in which my own constituency is interested. If I have been too regional in my remarks I apologize for it; but I say that, after all, when we are talking as some people are talking probably too frequently about things, we should harp about something that particularly concerns our own constituency and not talk too much and too often about things that do not concern our own constituency or others.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the words that I have to direct to you to-night are words which I can assure you are not going to be concerned with my own particular constituency. I intend to speak in a broader sense. My remarks will apply to the whole Dominion of Canada, because in some way or another I feel that once a member is elected to the House of Commons he ceases to be the representative of the small community in Canada from which he comes. He must take a larger perspective and try to improve the dominion as a whole. He should not particularly confine his efforts to one small locality in the dominion.

I wish to say a few words to-night on the budget which has just been brought down. All hon. members recall that last year when the budget was brought down we were exceedingly shocked at the size of it, only because it was the biggest we ever had. We were not unduly concerned because we knew that a war was on and it had to be financed. We thought then that $5,360,000,000 was a lot of money, and it was. This year we have gone over that again and have brought down the largest budget in the history of Canada. In spite of that, we are going to be able to carry on. There is no question about that.

One of the things which is most noticeable in the budget is that there is, generally speaking, no change in it, in so far as principle is concerned, from any other budget that has been presented. The same principle of taxation and borrowing is being followed. I could not help being impressed when the minister was speaking. One of the things he emphasized was the fact that there was not to be any higher taxation. I am sure we were all pleased with that. But I often wonder how there could be any higher taxation, because we have reached the height of taxation now. We are taking everything from the people that they can possibly afford to give. We have taken everything that the market can stand. The social credit conception would be that it is not necessary to place such tremendous taxation on the people, and yet we could finance the war just as efficiently as it has been. It has always been my contention that we could finance this war with less taxation, but not without some taxation. The taxation would not necessarily be as great as it is now.

I am not surprised at the lack of change in policy, because the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is—and I am sure he will not mind my saying this—a determined old, orthodox financier. He follows the school of orthodox financing as has been done by every government that has been in power. I am sometimes amazed at the official opposition criticizing the present government when I remember that their party were in power during the last war and they financed in exactly the same way. Why should they point a finger of criticism at this government? As far as I can remember they have never offered any suggestions to this government showing how they would finance differently. I see the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) shaking his head. I must make a correction there because the government has created a little national money. May I say to him that if it had not been for the teachings of the Social Credit party I fear they would not have gone as far in that direction as they have? In that respect may I congratulate the government because I think it was a worthwhile action. I am afraid we cannot expect from this government and certainly not from the Progressive Conservative party, when and if they get into power, any radical change in financial policy. Therefore we shall have to continue in peace as well as in war to finance in exactly the same way as we are now doing; that is, by taxation and borrowing, with the limited amount of nationally created currency that this government has issued. But I wonder how the Minister of Finance and his advisers can possiibly conceive of this system going on year after year, continually building up the tremendous debt that we are building up, without some change in policy.

A year ago the national debt stood at about eleven and a half billions of dollars. I have the figures here for this year. I think the increase was about two and three-quarter billions of dollars. That makes our national debt, funded and unfunded, about fourteen billion dollars. That is a tremendous load for the country to carry. It would not be so bad if that were to be the limit of the load. But the load is going to continue to pile up higher and higher, and as I see it we have not much prospect, despite the hopes and the pious platitudes of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, of our debt decreasing after this war. Therefore we shall have to pay the tremendous interest charge which is a continuing yearly charge upon the people, and we shall have to tax the people for it. When we do that we lower their standard of living to that extent. It is a fixed charge and cannot be changed.

I know the minister has financed in part by the sale of victory bonds. I am not going to say a great deal about that other than that if a man has the money to invest in victory bonds, then I think it is a good business proposition because he gets a good return on his money. It permits him to put money away for a rainy day or to use it after the war is over when there is no danger of inflation. To that extent I agree with the minister. But I fear that in too many cases there has been too much pressure put on the people to buy bonds, and then as soon as the victory bond sale is over and the people need that money—in some cases they had to go out and borrow the money to buy the bonds when they could ill afford to do it—they turn around and cash in on the bonds. That is so because the Minister of Finance must keep on cautioning the people against doing it. Every year he has cautioned them about the same thing, but when a man borrows money to buy a bond and cannot afford to pay it back, the only thing he can do is to cash the bond. However, I shall deal with that a little later on. The minister also mentioned the number of people who held victory bonds, while at the same time he was alarmed at the rate at which they were being cashed. He stated that about one-sixth of our people have bought victory bonds, which leaves about five-sixths of the people without bonds, but those five-sixths of the people are to be taxed in order to pay the interest on the bonds held by the other one-sixth.

Mr. ILSLEY: A large number of them are children.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, yes; but even allowing for that it is a tremendous burden upon our people. To offset the number of children, the minister must know that, as time goes on, more and more of these bonds will be turned in, so that that fraction will be reduced from one-sixth to one-seventh or one-eighth. At the same time the number of people who will be taxed to pay the interest on those bonds will become greater and greater. It all comes back to the complaint we have made year after year, that the interest on our bonded indebtedness will be paid to a very few people, while the great majority of Canadians will have to be taxed to pay it. So that the vicious circle continues. In my opinion that is all quite unnecessary, but if the people persist in electing orthodox governments which are dead-set against reform, they will have to take the consequences. It will not make any difference whether they elect a Conservative or a Liberal administration; they will be saddled with the old, orthodox financial machine that will carry on just as it did in the past.

As I read over the budget speech of the minister I recalled the words of the Prime Minister in 1935 when he said, "If you elect me to head the government of Canada I will go back and do battle with the money power." That battle has been rather a sad affair, as anyone would agree after attending the meetings of the banking and commerce committee. It seems to be going all in favour of the financial system, upholding the present banking laws. The Prime Minister also gave the great assurance that if he were returned to power he would issue currency and credit in terms of public need. Well, I think the people are beginning to realize the true situation, and they will judge this government accordingly.

I was pleased to see the government do one thing; that is, insititute family allowances. May I remind the Minister of Pensions and National Health that the principle of family allowances was first advocated by us; only we called it a national dividend. Well do I remember how hon. members on the opposite side of the house began to clamour, "Twenty-five dollars; you are going to give everybody twenty-five dollars." Well, you do not call them national dividends; you call them family allowances. That is a misnomer and very deceiving to the public, as I will show in a few minutes; but the point is that the principle itself is sound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is discussing family allowances, and there is a specific resolution on the order paper dealing with that matter. Therefore I submit that he is entirely out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But it is in the budget.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a resolution on the order paper dealing specifically with family allowances, and I say that the hon. member is out of order in discussing that matter now.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is addressing himself to the question of family allowances. There is on the order paper a resolution dealing with this very matter, which will be discussed at a subsequent time, and apparently the hon. gentleman is now anticipating that discussion. Therefore at the moment he is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not intend to refer to the legislation concerning family allowances, nor do I intend to discuss the matter in any detail whatever. I am speaking of it only as a method of carrying on the finances of this country. The matter was definitely referred to in the budget speech as one means by which the government was going to relieve the burden of taxation, and that is the only connection in which I intend to refer to it. I am quite well aware that the matter is dealt with in a resolution on the order paper, and I have no intention of discussing it in detail. I just wish to point out that when I mentioned this subject I thought I was rather helping the government a bit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not very often my hon. friend does that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Whenever I have an opportunity to congratulate the government I am only too pleased to do so, but that seldom happens. The government has been accused of bringing in this programme of family allowances as election bait, and I should like to say just a word on that point. As I have said already, I believe the principle is sound. The Prime Minister stated definitely that the measure would not come into operation until July 1, 1945, and therefore he concluded that no one could accuse him of attempting to buy votes. Just let us analyse the position. I say that the most honourable thing the Prime Minister could have done was to bring that legislation into effect right now and give the people their family allowances. As it is, what is he doing? He is holding a club over the heads of the people of Canada, and saying, in effect at least, "If you do not vote Liberal—"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why did you not bring in your measure with regard to paying national dividends?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I quite anticipated a question like that, and I shall deal with it later on. In effect the Prime Minister is saying, "If you do not vote Liberal you will not get family allowances. If you do vote Liberal we will give them to you." I think that is the worst kind of political intrigue. The Minister of Pensions and National Health referred to the $25 dividend which we advocated. I want to remind him that that is a principle; that is the philosophy of social credit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why did you not do it?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the Prime Minister had kept one of the other promises he made in 1935, that he was going to keep his hands off Alberta, we would have been able to carry out our programme, but from the very first he tried to choke the life out of my province. If he had left Alberta alone we would have paid the $25. This government have recognized and endorsed that principle, because now they are copying us.

But this is not a true family allowance; again the government is deceiving the people. This is nothing more or less than charity to the poor, and I do not like that kind of administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Now my hon. friend is discussing the merits or demerits of family allowances, when we have on the order paper a specific resolution dealing with that subject. I say that he is absolutely and definitely out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, I shall not say anything more about it, Mr. Speaker. When the Minister of Pensions and National Health refers to the $25 a month, however, I say that is part of our philosophy. We believe everybody should be given the $25, or at least a basic standard of living.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You have been pretty slow in Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In this case you are giving grants only to those people who are so poor that they do not come within the income tax brackets, and you are taking the money away from those with children who do come within those brackets. This is not a family allowance; this is charity. You cannot class it as anything else; and from that point of view I condemn it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I repeat my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has been told already that this discussion is out of order, and he must not continue it further.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall abide by your ruling. I know this is a touchy spot with the government, and I shall not continue. I do not want to embarrass them any more than they are being embarrassed. I am just trying to help them, if they want to save their political heads, although I am afraid it is pretty late for that.

Now, for a few moments, I should like to refer to that part of the budget dealing with agriculture. I am very much afraid that agriculture has been overlooked once more. As yet I have been unable to discover any definite policy laid down for agriculture. I know that on several occasions the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has made much ado about how he was directing agriculture. One year he says that the farmers should raise large quantities of wheat. Another year he says not to raise so much wheat but to go into hogs. The next year he tells the farmers that they had better go into beef, or something of that kind. So that they are continually going from one thing to another. I do not wish necessarily to give my opinion of that, because someone may question it. Rather, I should like to refer to what the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool had to say, when he made a statement on May 10, 1944. I shall read a portion of it:

The farmers are now in the middle of seeding—

And I have called attention to the date as being May 10.

—and we believe they should have the latest information regarding the wheat situation. We also believe they should be frankly advised of the necessity of substantially increased wheat acreage this spring before it is too late. We had hoped that before this eleventh hour a definite statement with final advice would have been made either by the dominion Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The last statement on production for 1944 was made from Ottawa following the production conference held in Ottawa last December, and the farmer was advised not to increase wheat acreage. The wheat situation has changed from one of large available supplies pressing heavily upon limited demand into a position where the wheat problem next year will be largely in terms of receiving and transporting enough wheat to supply the market.

Then he goes on to give the carryover in each of the years. I wish, however, to read a little more of the statement. And remember, this is the president of the wheat pool, a man who speaks with some authority. He declares, in regard to our production of wheat:

"The wheat glut is gone—our concern now should be a possible shortage in supply in the event of a short crop or crop failure". He recommended to farmers as a sound policy for 1944 production:

1. Make provision for necessary feed grain requirements with some surplus.

2. Get back to normal summer-fallow acreage to fit sound farming practice on each farm.

In other words, he is repudiating entirely what the Minister of Agriculture has advocated, when he has been jumping from here to there. He is advising the farmers to go back to a regular method of farming, because they are the best judges. All we have to do is to indicate to them the amount we want, and they will arrange their plans so as to produce it. Then it continues:

3. Sow every available acre to wheat with assurance that every bushel of wheat produced is going to be needed.

When you have things like that coming up year after year, is there any wonder that the farmers of this country—not only those in the west, but throughout the whole of Canada—find themselves in a great state of confusion?

I am not going to say that the government has not done something for agriculture, but what it has done has come rather late. One of the great mistakes that has been made in the past has been that prices of agricultural commodities have not been fixed so that the farmer would get his cost of production, plus a fair profit. I am not one who advocates that any industry or any individual should work for nothing. I think the individual is entitled to a profit. If he happens to be an industrialist, then I say that he is entitled to his cost of production, plus a fair profit. If that is true of one industry, then necessarily it is true of another.

When the war began, agriculture suffered particularly. They started out with low prices for their commodities, but the wages they had to pay and the prices they had to pay for machinery jumped immediately—as is always the case. Therefore I say that agriculture has suffered, from the beginning of the war.

What was the excuse given then? I remember a speech that was printed in the newspapers, reporting what had been said by the Minister of Finance when speaking in Toronto. On that occasion he objected to the increase in prices of farm commodities, for fear that it would cause inflation. Well, wheat was only ninety cents a bushel at that time; since then it has been increased to $1.25—somewhere near where it should be—and there is no inflation. But despite the fact that the farmers are now receiving a fair price—and most people think it is a really good price whereas, as a matter of fact, it is not a good price, when one considers the high cost of wages and machinery and of living, and all those other things the farmer has to buy—they are not making much money. I shall prove that, in a moment or two.

I have before me a return affecting Alberta, and published by the agricultural extension service of the Department of Agriculture in that province. This was issued in January, 1944, and was published at the direction of the Hon. D. B. Macmillan, Minister of Agriculture of that province. I have looked through this statement, with considerable concern, because I had in mind a statement put on Hansard by the Minister of Agriculture showing how agriculture throughout the whole of Canada was so prosperous. On this sheet, under the heading of grain crops, including wheat, oats, barley, rye, peas, beans, mixed grains and flax seed, we find that the total value of those crops for 1942 was $214,753,000, whereas in 1943 it was only $176,309,000, showing a decided drop. In the west, grain crops have always constituted the greater part of the farmers' cash income. In this instance, however, we find a drop of approximately $40,000,000.

I know the Minister of Agriculture would reply immediately, "Oh, well; they made up the difference in what they gained from their sale of live stock, including bacon and beef." Let us see what they did gain. Live stock, including horses, cattle, calves, sheep and lambs and hogs, were produced in 1942 to a value of $75,729,300, whereas in 1943 the value was $92,838,800, showing an increase of roughly $17,000,000. So that they did make a small increase there. But it will be noticed that they lost over $38,000,000 on their grain.

Let us see what the grand total is—and this is where we find out whether or not agriculture has prospered. The value of production of grain, root and fodder crops, animals slaughtered and sold, dairy produce, poultry produce, honey and wool in 1942 was $362,411,700, and in 1943 it had decreased to $347,280,900, showing a drop of $15,130,800.

Therefore it is certainly clear that agriculture is not making very much out of this war. I am not saying that the farmers should make money out of the war; I do not think anybody should make anything out of it. But some people have the idea that agriculture is making tremendous money at $1.25 a bushel for wheat. Of coure that idea is exploded entirely. And, as I am reminded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), the price of $1.25 has been operative only since last September. These figures will prove definitely that agriculture is not, in my estimation, getting what it should.

If we are to have agriculture as a basic industry in Canada—and I do not think we shall ever get away from that—then we must fix our future agricultural prices so that our farmers will be guaranteed, from the sale of their crops, a fair share of the national income. This may be difficult to figure out, but I think we can start on the basis accepted to-day. We can pay $1.25 for wheat, for example, along with the participation certificates. We could do the same in connection with cattle and hogs. Then, at the end of the year, after estimating the total revenue in that year, certificates could be issued to the farmers in amounts sufficient to make up their fair share of the national income.

Taking the average price during the period between 1915 and 1919, we find that that was the only period in which the farmer received his fair share of national income. I think that what I have suggested must be done. The only way that can be done is as we have expressed in a resolution which stands on the order paper in my name. I am going to read this so that all may see just what we mean. It was presented on February 7 and it reads:

Whereas agriculture has seldom received its fair share of the national income of Canada;

And whereas the cost of producing all agricultural products varies considerably from year to year;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house and in the interest of the nation as a whole, the government be requested to set the prices of agricultural products at such a level that it will guarantee to the farmers of Canada such a yearly percentage of the national income as will have the same relation to the national income as the agricultural population bears to the national population of Canada.

That, in effect, is exactly the stand we think should be taken. Agriculture would then have no complaint because it would be getting its fair share of the national income.

There is another problem facing not only agriculture but other industries. I refer to man-power. This has a bearing upon agriculture, industry and the active army, and the problem is becoming more acute every day. It did not result overnight; it resulted in the first instance from lack of a sound policy on the part of the present government. The fact of the matter is that the government used neither skill nor foresight in the formation of its policy, but was guided almost entirely by political expediency and consideration.

Now that the invasion has started and our casualty lists grow, replacements become more urgent. The difficulty will certainly not be lessened. The government must accept their responsibility; they cannot side-step the issue. It must be faced. As time goes on, it will become more serious. I am not going to say anything more about the man-power policy, but a lot of difficulty lies ahead for agriculture, industry and especially for the armed forces. I have spoken on the question before and I am not going to labour it to any great extent. However, for a minute I wish to refer to the labour problem and then I am through. I spoke on this on the speech from the throne and I do not want to cover ground covered already. I do not think the speech of the Minister of Finance delivered the other day is sound in logic, and I should like to quote briefly from his remarks as quoted in Hansard. I quote first from page 4177 as follows:

I have been forced to the conclusion—

Forced, mind you!

—that it would be a desirable change in our income tax law to discontinue the refundable feature of the income tax leaving as the full rates of taxation, the rates of pure, non-refundable tax as they now stand, and depending on voluntary savings to replace the proceeds of the compulsory saving provision.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

I cannot understand the logic of that. He wants to give relief by withdrawing the compulsory portion of the tax, and at the same time he wants the people to turn around and invest in bonds. Where will be the relief if they follow that advice? They will be short of money in any event. I believe the Minister of Finance was on sound ground when he had the compulsory savings. It was fair, and he so stated. To expect that that money will be put into victory bonds is not going to accomplish what he desires to accomplish. As he has pointed out, the people are continually cashing them in, which defeats his purpose. He goes on to say:

The refundable feature of our income tax law provided simply a method of borrowing and of borrowing for progressively shorter terms as the war goes on. With the provision of allowances for contractual savings, it embodied a principle of fairness which I regret to relinquish.

Then why did he relinquish it?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the reasons stated in the speech.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There again I think the minister was unsound in his conclusion. As I read this over, I begin to think he did that against his better judgment. I may be wrong, but certainly I think he was wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave the reasons in my speech.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister said, "I have been forced to the conclusion". What that means is a matter of interpretation; nevertheless it is there. It seems to me that in that statement the minister was admitting that this was another thing which had been done because of political expediency. I hesitate to make a statement of that kind, but I am almost forced to do it. The minister continued:

Nevertheless, if this particular method of borrowing, despite its virtues, has the one fault of discouraging production at this critical period of the war, or if by its rigidity it creates hardship among those, income groups whose incomes leave little room for adjustment, then another method of borrowing must be found.

It is recommended, therefore, that no further deductions for the refundable or savings portion be made after June 30, 1944.

He says that it discourages production; yet he is going to give back the refundable portion and ask the people to invest in bonds. They will be short just the same. That is not going to increase the amount of money they have. It will help them for the time being, but it will not relieve them of any burden of taxation. If the minister were sincere I think he should have left in the compulsory saving and freed from taxation all overtime which would provide the required increased production.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will speak about that later on. Has the hon. member really thought more than three minutes about it?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am just taking what the minister said. I do not think he has given a great deal of consideration to it himself because it is so confusing. I will not say anything further on that because he is going to add to the confusion at a later time, he says.

I wish to conclude my remarks by quoting a short paragraph which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, February 26, as a reprint from the Western Producer. I quote:

Whether we like it or not we shall be compelled to cross the boundaries erected by orthodox economists and politicians and to find and establish a method of distributing our products to our own people—a method which will not be affected by the volume of world trade. The problem is simply stated. We can produce food and other goods and services in abundance in Canada. There is no material reason why a single Canadian should go hungry or homeless or unclad because of the condition of world trade. We must, no matter how it may shock our conservative mentalities, set about finding a third method of building prosperity in Canada. We must devise and proceed to put into operation a system of distribution amongst our own people which will permit them to enjoy the full fruits that will flow from total use of all our resources.

In brief, that is exactly what Social Credit says is the solution.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell), which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Ralston, that the house shall meet at four o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

It being ten minutes past eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 4.20 o'clock.

PRIME MINISTER OF NEW ZEALAND

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE PRINTED IN THE OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move, on behalf of the Prime Minister, seconded by the Minister of National Defence:

That the address of the Right Hon. Peter Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the chamber of the House of Commons on Friday, June 30, 1944, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 150, for the relief of Eugène Charron.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 151, for the relief of Lillian Bessie Noall Salmon.—Mr. Hill.

Bill No. 152, for the relief of Joan Helen Gorham Glover.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill No. 153, for the relief of Elsie Hollingsworth.—Mr. Casselman (Grenville-Dundas).

Bill No. 154, for the relief of Louis Joseph Jules Laurencelle.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 156, for the relief of Ivan Walter Moore.—Mr. McIlraith.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this stage I would ask the house to deal with two very slight amendments made by the other house to bill No. 83. These amendments appear at page 513 of Votes and Proceedings for June 29. The first amendment is purely one of drafting, namely, to leave out the word "such" as it appears at page 2, line 34, of the bill. The amendment is of no consequence with the exception of draftsmanship. The second amendment is a new paragraph to be inserted as recommended by the other house. This too is found at page 513 of Votes and Proceedings. The proposed section reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament, within fifteen days after the meeting thereof, a report and statement of the transactions and affairs of the department during the year then next preceding.

This was advocated by several hon. members from the floor of this chamber.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Crerar.]

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is found at page 514 of Votes and Proceedings for June 29. The amendment is purely one of wording. It is suggested that at page 4, line 9, of the bill the word "has" should be substituted for "had."

Mr. GRAYDON: It looks as though the senate is dealing with tenses.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 82, to establish a department of reconstruction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I ask concurrence in these amendments, because they are non-contentious. Hon. members will find that section 8 as amended would read:

> 8. Any member of the civil service transferred to the department from some other department shall not forfeit any of the rights and privileges appertaining to a civil servant because of such transfer and, on ceasing to be employed by the department for any reason other than misconduct, shall be eligible, without loss of seniority or pension or other rights, for assignment to a position in the civil service of the class held in the department, or to any other position for which he may have qualified.

That is the new wording of the old section 8, prepared this morning, on the advice of legal counsel in my presence.

The second amendment has reference to section 10 of the bill dealing with offences. The suggested section reads:

> 10. (1) No person who obtains, under or by virtue of this act, information in relation to the business of any other person, shall, without the consent of such person, disclose or allow to be disclosed to anyone not legally entitled thereto, any information so obtained, in such manner as to be identifiable as being in relation to the business of such person.

This is a distinct improvement on the former phraseology. The purport, however, is exactly the same.

The next amendment made by the senate affects section 11. It is suggested that after the word "minister" the words "under the provisions of this act" be added. That limits the effect of the section.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SALARIES

INQUIRY AS TO ORDER IN COUNCIL PASSED IN 1941

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Labour has not the information available to answer the question I am about to ask, perhaps he would accept it as notice. A few days ago the press carried a report to the effect that an order in council passed in 1941, I believe it was, dealing with the freezing of salaries—not wages—was about to be amended, and that some announcement had been made either by the minister or his department to that effect. Has the minister any further information he would care to convey to the house at this time in the matter?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The salary order comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue, and I would ask that the question stand as notice for him. The Department of Labour has no jurisdiction over salaries.

HOUSING

PRESENT SUPPLY POSITION—PROGRAMME FOR 1944

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has asked me to make the following statement on his behalf.

On May 11, during a discussion on housing, I pointed out briefly that priorities "for small house building are being met in as effective a way as possible having regard to the requirements of war" and that I could not promise that housing construction would be given the same consideration as direct war production. I would like now to amplify that viewpoint and, in addition, give the house some highlights on our present supply position in relation to the building of houses.

This government has always recognized that shifts in population, which are a necessary part of our increase in industrial production and the expansion of our armed services, have overcrowded certain communities and created a definite need for additional housing accommodation in those areas. A part of the need for increased housing is, of course, directly connected with the war and will be eased with the termination of the war. This phase of the problem has been largely met by the operations of Wartime Housing Limited, which has built more than 18,000 units during the past three years. The other part of the need for increased housing has its basis in the permanent development of our economy, that is, houses identified with industrial projects which have been created or expanded during the war but which may also have a place in meeting demands for civilian production or export trade, after the war. Here, the changes are expressed not only by the need for additional housing but the desire for improved accommodation. To the extent that the materials could be made available after providing for war requirements this need has been met in a reasonable degree by permitting the erection of private dwellings or conversion of existing builders under licence from the controller of construction. During 1943, 23,575 licences were issued in this way and 12,945 have been similarly issued in 1944 up to May 31.

A few weeks ago in this house my colleague the Minister of Finance outlined some proposed amendments to the present National Housing Act which would assist considerably in financing new housing construction. In his remarks my colleague was careful to emphasize that the improvement in financing arrangements would be immediately effective in providing new housing accommodation only to the extent that materials and man-power could be made available and would not become, "fully operative until the end of the war, or at least until the period of acute material and man-power shortages has ended." Unfortunately there has been a tendency in some quarters to overlook the qualifications that were made and to assume, quite erroneously, that there is a general government policy of encouraging the immediate construction of private housing on a large scale all across Canada. Such is not the case.

During 1944 the housing programme must be limited. It will be limited by our war programme and the resultant shortages of materials and man-power. Of necessity we will not be able to permit the construction of all the houses we would like to authorize. Materials for housing are being produced only to the extent that it does not jeopardize, in any way, the flow of munitions to our troops and allies. The time is not yet here when we can provide unlimited quantities of construction materials.

Furthermore, such materials as we are able to provide must be stretched out in such a way as to allow the greatest possible amount of housing accommodation. Thus it is necessary to confine the issuance of housing construction licences to projects which are needed to provide homes for those without essential accommodation. Projects which aim merely to provide improved accommodation must be deferred until the period of scarcity is over.

This means that housing construction licences are being issued only in those areas where houses are required and only within the limits set by the expected availability of materials. Our latest survey shows that lumber, bricks, tile, concrete blocks, plumbing fixtures and furnaces are all in short supply in most areas. Those materials which are now available, or will become available in wartime, are not necessarily of the same type as in peacetime, and in many instances substitute or alternative materials must be employed. With such materials, buildings of inferior quality may result. This situation underlines the advantage of deferring construction, wherever possible, until the war is over.

It also emphasizes the necessity for careful planning of any construction which may be necessary at this time. I would urge every builder to blueprint his projects in accordance with the type of materials available.

The demand for lumber, particularly packing and crating lumber, required for war purposes in Canada and in the United Kingdom, the United States and empire countries continues to rise. Every effort is being made to increase the quantity available for housing in Canada and exports are being permitted only for direct war uses. In some areas, particularly on the west coast, the supply of lumber determines the number of houses which can be authorized.

In normal times Canada would have in stock at this time of year, 40 to 50 million bricks and 35,000 tons of structural tile. To-day such stocks are negligible. The brick production is now at a rate of only 68 per cent of what it was in 1940 and tile at a rate of 76 per cent. The rate of output of concrete blocks is even lower. It stands to-day at 37 per cent of the 1940 rate.

It is expected that the number of plumbing fixtures which can be produced in 1944 will not be sufficient to provide for the housing and house-conversion programme and, at the same time, for replacements in existing homes. To attain our goal—the creation of additional housing accommodation—it will be necessary to ensure that the available supplies of fixtures be channeled, as far as possible, into additional housing units rather than into the improvement of existing homes.

The supply of hot air furnaces will not meet by a wide margin our over-all requirements for replacements and new housing. The shortage of steel sheet, and a reduced foundry output, have combined to decrease the production of such furnaces. Thus it becomes necessary for the wartime prices and trade board to arrange a controlled distribution system by means of certificates of essentiality for the sale and delivery of hot air furnaces.

My purpose in giving the house this summary of the present supply position, as it relates to housing, is to emphasize that our housing programme is still on a minimum basis and that there can be no relaxation of this policy so long as our armed services and the conduct of the war require the full support of our production resources. Housing will be provided where it is essential and deferred under all other circumstances.

I would also like to point out to the house that these same shortages of bricks, lumber and tile will affect, equally, the construction of industrial or commercial buildings. And there is another shortage of particular concern to such projects. The recent increase in our shell programme has required that production of structural shapes for construction purposes be sharply reduced in order to transfer the maximum quantity of steel over to the shell programme. In fact our present steel rolling schedules call for not more than 3,000 tons per month of structural shapes, a drop of 55 per cent from the production in the last calendar quarter of 1943.

The combination of these shortages will make impossible the construction of any industrial or commercial building which is not immediately necessary and I would ask those now in possession of licences for such projects to consider seriously the advisability of postponing their construction until such time as the present period of scarcity is over. Such voluntary curtailment of construction, when coupled with the restrictions now being imposed by the controller of construction, will have the added advantage of building up a backlog of construction activity which will stand us in good stead when the pressure of war has been relieved.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant? I do not want to find fault particularly with his statement, because apparently many of the materials required for housing appear to be in short supply. But it is not many weeks ago—this is my reason for rising to protest—that I heard the Minister of Finance describe in some detail the terms of the proposed new housing legislation that was to be brought before the house. If my memory serves me correctly, and I have not the record here, he said that he was making the statement so that those who intended to build would know what the future held for them with respect to finance and need not wait until the legislation was brought down. He then gave some description of the financing of the plan for housing. In view of all this, I intimated in effect that there was little use in talking about a new housing programme unless the question of priorities was first cleared up. There was no satisfactory answer to that. But all across this country people, many of whom I know, believed that the government was now opening new avenues to greater housing accommodation by way of finance. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, in view of the parliamentary assistant's statement now that there is no desire to encourage housing—his remarks rather indicated that it is to be discouraged—why was not this statement of his made concurrently with the statement made by the Minister of Finance? Patently the two statements should have been made together, because made separately they only confuse the issue and bring about conflicting opinions throughout the country, as well as laying the government open to the charge that their departments are not co-operating in respect to this matter. I ask the parliamentary assistant to clear up that point, if he will.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Perhaps I might answer my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is another department entering into this?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no question now before the chair. The discussion is out of order, but I think an answer might be given by the minister to the question asked.

Mr. CRERAR: I can satisfy the curiosity of my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not curiosity. It is the situation that is curious.

Mr. CRERAR: If it is not curiosity, his remark that another department was coming into this was very inept.

Mr. GRAYDON: Another minister is speaking on the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman who leads the opposition endeavoured to score a point from a basis that does not exist.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. GRAYDON: It does exist.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for York-Sunbury would be well advised to keep quiet until I finish my statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You cannot lecture me, or anybody like you.

Mr. CRERAR: The first point the leader of the opposition makes is, why was not the statement which the parliamentary assistant made to-day made when the Minister of Finance made his statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: Right.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will read carefully the statement of the Minister of Finance, he will find that there is not a very good foundation for the interpretation that he put upon it to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister the statement there?

Mr. CRERAR: No, and my hon. friend has not got it either, and he should have it before he comments on it.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should have it before you interpret it.

Mr. CRERAR: In the second place the situation has changed in the interval since the Minister of Finance made his statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In what respect?

Mr. CRERAR: In that there is a greater demand for lumber going overseas than was anticipated at that time.

Mr. GRAYDON: We anticipated that when we questioned the government at the time.

Mr. CRERAR: Members of the government can scarcely be expected to have the prescience of hon. members opposite.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think anybody accuses them of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would hope not.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think there is very much to the point my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. GRAYDON: Certainly nothing has been cleared up with respect to it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I cannot allow this discussion to proceed further on the orders of the day.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): In view of the statement of the parliamentary assistant, may I ask him a question with reference to a conference which I understand was held between wartime housing and the Soldiers' Dependents Society in Toronto with regard to building one hundred units for soldiers' dependents. Is that to be proceeded with?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not familier with the conference to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. ADAMSON: Between the mayor of Toronto and wartime housing.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not familiar with the conference, but I shall be glad to inquire and give a reply.

Mr. ADAMSON: I will give my hon. friend the correspondence.

PURCHASE OF WARTIME HOUSES BY PRESENT OCCUPANTS—EVICTION OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Are any steps being taken by the department to facilitate the sale of wartime houses to war workers who are now occupying these houses? I know cases where the occupants are desirous of purchasing the houses. Can such sales be made? I think it will be generally agreed that they should be made as quickly as possible, both in the interests of the occupants and in the interests of the country.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): I did not get notice of the question, but I shall be glad to take cognizance of it and give my hon. friend a reply.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask a question arising out of the one just put regarding wartime houses. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply would take the question as a notice and give a reply at the next sitting of the house. One of the mayors at the recent meeting of the heads of municipalities which took place in Quebec made a statement—I have not it with me but I shall be glad to send it to my hon. friend so that he may be in a position to answer—to the effect that in a particular locality so long as the occupant of one of these wartime houses was working in a war plant he was allowed to live in the house, but the moment he enlisted for active service his wife and family were evicted. That occurred, according to the report, at a time when there were in that locality vacant houses in the wartime housing group. I will send the clipping to the parliamentary assistant.

FARM FLOOR PRICES

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On one or two occasions the finance minister has indicated to the house that we might expect a bill establishing floor prices for farm products, and I think he also intimated that the Minister of Agriculture might be the one to introduce the bill. May I ask the minister when we may expect it, and who will introduce it?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The bill is in preparation in my department in cooperation with the Department of Justice. It will be brought down in a very short time. I cannot give the exact date, but it will be brought down very shortly.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, June 29, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to the splendid address delivered by the Right Hon. Mr. Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand. As one who was born in the same country, indeed in the same neighbourhood, may I pay my humble tribute to one of Scotland's sons who has made a name for himself by his public service to New Zealand and thereby to mankind.

In rising on this occasion to take part in the budget debate, my purpose is to discuss one or two matters affecting particularly the people of British Columbia, but before doing so I wish to touch briefly on some of the matters outlined in the budget which have been mentioned by various speakers since the debate began.

The chief critic for the official opposition in his speech accused the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) of bringing down an election budget. While this may or may not be the last budget before an election takes place, the fact that only a few minor changes have been made from the budget presented last year to the house and country makes the accusation to my mind seem ridiculous.

I wish to say a word regarding the criticism that has been levelled against the refundable portion of the tax which has now been eliminated. The members of the war expenditures committee visited various factories throughout the country and discussed with the workmen in them matters pertaining not only to their work but to conditions generally, and their reactions to the various rules and regulations by which they were governed, and invariably we were told by many of the workmen, that they complained about the taxes which they paid to the government. When it was explained to them that a part of the taxes they were paying was refundable, this information came in many instances as a surprise to these people. From the information which we obtained, there must have been hundreds and hundreds of letters reaching the Department of Finance, because letters were written to many members protesting against what they felt was heavy taxation levied, while very few of the persons complaining realized that a part of the money taken from them was being held to their credit and would be returned. As a matter of fact, especially in the case of those who were paying income tax for the first time, many could not be made to realize that anything taken from them by the dominion government would ever be returned to them.

Another criticism that was made was with regard to taxation in the lower brackets. While it is true that there may be certain hardships in the imposition of taxation in the lower brackets, on the other hand the fact cannot be overlooked that many hundreds more of our citizens in Canada have money standing to their credit than ever before. I will place some figures on the record to show the improved financial position that many Canadians are in to-day. For instance, in 1939, if we take the savings accounts of the Canadian people, there were at that time 4,161,897 depositors having accounts in our savings banks, and to their credit in the banks there was standing the sum of $1,709,156,774. In 1943 these figures had increased respectively to 4,662,113 depositors and, standing to their credit, a total of $1,961,160,946. There was therefore in the savings accounts in Canada an increase in the number of depositors to a total of over 500,000, while standing to their credit there were increased savings amounting to over $252,000,000.

In regard to current accounts, it is also interesting to note the figures, and I am putting them on the record because many of us hold the opinion that no country to-day is in a better position than this Canada of ours. Regarding current accounts, in 1939 there were 684,119 depositors with a total of $821,717,082 standing to their credit. Let us take 1943 next, and may I observe that I am quoting the month of October, 1939, and the month of October, 1943, the latest date for which I can obtain figures. In 1943 there were 738,333 current accounts, and standing to their credit there was $1,826,837,690, showing an increase in current accounts of 54,214 and a total increase of accounts standing to the credit of these depositors, as against the year 1939, of $1,005,000,000. These figures, I believe, speak for themselves, and they show, notwithstanding the criticism we have heard with regard to men in the lower brackets being affected by the income tax, that, generally speaking, the people of Canada were never in a better financial position than they are at the present time, and that never have we had as many people holding deposits in the savings banks, and that, despite the many billion dollars taken out by the people of Canada in victory bonds and war savings stamps.

I wish to deal next with criticism levelled by certain newspapers and clergymen against those of us from British Columbia who are opposed to the granting of the vote to Japanese and who urge their repatriation. To the clergymen and others who go out of their way to criticize us and to call our attitude un-Christian, may I say that I do not doubt their sincerity in the views they hold, but I would point out that many people have held sincere views which nevertheless, in many instances, have been dangerous, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that the views held by those who oppose us are impracticable, however sincerely held they may be, and that those people may in the future regret the stand they are taking.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and some of the newspapers in British Columbia, when dealing with this question and our attitude toward it, endeavour to draw a comparison with what Hitler did in Germany with the Jews. To my mind, and I say this as strongly as I can, this is not only an unfair comparison but also an odious one. When those in British Columbia call it a political trick—well, I will say they know something about political tricks. However, as one who has held views on this subject for quite a long time, long before this question arose exactly in this way in parliament, I mean since the war started, I can sincerely say that I have held these views not from any political point of view but from practical considerations, and I am sure that those who are opposing us will yet regret the stand they are taking. The C.C.F., some ministers of the gospel and others have consistently refused to answer two questions which have been propounded not only since 1939 but since the days away back in the early thirties, and which I propound to them again to-day. I put these questions before the House of Commons and I would also ask hon. members from eastern and central provinces to answer them. I challenge those who have criticized us, particularly members of the C.C.F. in this house and in British Columbia, to answer these two questions which I am about to put to them. The first is this: Are the Japanese an assimilable race? Can they be properly assimilated, as can members of other races who have come to Canada? The second question, equally important, is this: Can a person, even though born in Canada, be truly a Canadian citizen if that person owes recorded allegiance to another country? Every person of Japanese origin, whether born in this country or not, is registered as a Japanese citizen and is recognized by the Japanese government as being a citizen of Japan, even though born in Canada.

May I add this as further proof. It is strange that those in Canada burying all Japanese prior to 1939 were requested by the Japanese government to send not only the birth certificates but the death certificates as well. That request applied to all Japanese, irrespective of where they were born. To put the matter in another form, suppose a Canadian child was born in a foreign country. The child would naturally be registered, or should be, with the British or Canadian consul. Such registration would make that child a Canadian or British subject. The fact of their being so registered I believe also prevents them from being claimed as a citizen by whatever foreign country they happened to be born in. Why then, in the case of Japanese born in this country, should people hold to the view that, although registered in Japan as Japanese citizens, they are still Canadian? That, Mr. Speaker, is the crux of the whole matter.

Let me point out this further fact. So far as I know, no one of Japanese race or origin in Canada has ever renounced his allegiance to Japan. Not even since Pearl Harbor has any Japanese in Canada taken that action. If the vote is allowed the Japanese that are at present in Canada, the voice of Japan will then be heard in our legislative halls. Since all Japanese are completely under and subservient to the Japanese government, the only ones who could actually be considered as strictly Canadian citizens—if even they can be—are the Japanese babies born since Pearl Harbor because they are unlikely to be registered in Japan. I ask our critics of the C.C.F. party and others to give the people of British Columbia and of all Canada a definite answer to these questions instead of raising bogeys and quoting Hitler. And to those members of the House of Commons from other provinces who have treated the matter lightly and as one belonging simply to British Columbia, I say in all fairness, give some thought to the two questions I have just propounded. I ask them to get out of their minds once and for all the idea that this is a British Columbia question. It is now a Canadian question, a federal question. If I know the people of British Columbia at all, and I think I do, they are adamant that the question shall remain as a federal question.

The other matter about which I wish to speak is one affecting our natural resources and which in turn affects the lives and welfare of our people. I refer to the acquisition by monopolistic interests of British Columbia's heritage of timber. For quite a number of years past the MacMillan lumber interests have been gradually acquiring timber limits throughout the various parts of the province, particularly on Vancouver island. The policy adopted by them is one of buying out mills, following which these mills would then be closed down and the timber limits which they own absorbed within the MacMillan interests. It has almost got to the point where practically no one can go into the business or, indeed, operate unless he has the good will of these lumber interests. The point has now been reached where a fight is on for the supremacy over all timber limits and the control of all mills. It has been indicated that the stronghold held now by the MacMillan interests will likely mean that in the end they will prevail. I endeavoured to warn the government and the people regarding this matter a few years ago, but no attention has been paid to the monopolistic control by this great lumber company. I pointed out then, as I do now, that the interests were such powerful timber and lumber operators that many smaller lumbermen were actually afraid even to make any comments, because the MacMillan interests might interfere with their logging business. Actually the position is comparable with that of the barons of old.

Mr. W. E. Fraser of Shawnigan Lake, charged the MacMillan interests have coralled the timber of Vancouver island. He warned that there would soon be only two mills cutting timber on Vancouver island. He warned also that the independents in the lumber industry would be starved out of business, and that, Mr. Speaker, in the midst of plenty of timber. Mr. Fraser charged also that thirty men who are fighting in Italy and in France at the present time, and who had left the Shawnigan Lake mills, would not be able to return to this mill because it was one of those that had been bought and closed down.

As I said a moment ago, mills have been bought up by the MacMillan interests for the sole purpose of obtaining complete control of the timber and forests of British Columbia. It may well be that I am staking my political future in bringing this matter to the attention of the government and out in the open, and urging that the federal government take steps, for the good and welfare of Canada, to investigate this monopoly. I am thinking also of the men overseas, who believe that they are going to come back to this country with an equal opportunity to work and, if desired, to go into business for themselves. If this thing is not stopped and rectified they will never have a chance of becoming mill owners, because these interests control or by that time will have control of the entire timber tracts of British Columbia. Not only has the provincial government maintained silence, but, what is more strange, the C.C.F. in British Columbia have maintained what I call a sinister silence. They have at times come out against the big monopolies, but neither the Winchs nor the MacNeills, so far as I know, have come out and named the MacMillan monopoly or its interests. It is my opinion that the MacMillan interests would rather have the Winchs and the MacNeills in power than the Tom Reids. Therefore, as I said a few moments ago, I may be staking my political future in taking the stand that I do this afternoon. I appeal to the federal government, because the provincial government out there have been lukewarm in tackling the large interests of the MacMillan concern. On Vancouver island alone they now own equal to thirty years' timber, and I wish to repeat as emphatically as I can that no one will be able to go into the lumber business or operate a mill unless he has the approval of MacMillan and his henchmen.

> Billions of feet of our choice Douglas fir, cedar and spruce, units of great value in the natural resources of the province which heretofore have been crown-granted or sold away by licence from public ownership, are being used as pawns in a fight for supremacy.

The article then goes on to show how this parent works and the great controls which it has. The article continues:

> Now there has been built up a close integration covering the entire business, starting from the ownership of the standing tree right through to the retail lumber yard in London or in some Canadian or United States city.
> The sawmill company is the parent. An affiliated company, owned by the sawmill, acquires the timber by licence or purchase; another affiliated company cuts the tree and hauls the log to a shipping point; still another corporation, owned by the parent sawmill, operates a tugboat company; still another subsidiary charters ocean-going tramp steamers to deliver the cargoes abroad—an extremely remunerative business, by the way. Each one of these subsidiaries is run to make a profit.

Mr. MacMillan has not been idle during his term in Ottawa as a dollar a year man. He has been able to get more Park steamships under charter than most other concerns. A list of these ships can be obtained from the department by anyone interested in this matter.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty to bring this situation into the open, and have done so with a view to protecting the heritage and the rights of our people, so that those who wish may have an opportunity to compete in the lumber industry. I urge the dominion government to take steps to carry out an investigation into this monopolistic concern. Since the matter affects the welfare of the people of Canada the government might very well proceed under the War Measures Act. I am quite aware of what may happen as a result of the stand I am taking against these interests. No great protest has been raised in British Columbia, except in the Vancouver Sun; as far as I know very few individuals have dared to come out and make any statements such as I have made to-day with regard to these interests. A moment ago I said that my political future might be at stake. I have no doubt that whoever opposes me in the next election will receive the blessing and help of these interests, because, as I say, they would rather have the Winchs and the MacNeills than the Tom Reids.

I am going to close with these words. This may be my last term, but at least I shall have the satisfaction and peace of mind of knowing that I tried to do my duty by protesting against the strangle-hold of this monster organization, and can say, as King Solomon said in his day, that in all my years of service I have accepted no gift to blind my eyes to justice.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is Dominion day, the seventy-seventh anniversary of confederation, and the fifth year our soldiers have been overseas. We as a people owe a great deal to the fact that the history of courage has been rewritten by the glorious deeds of young Canadians on land, on the sea and in the air. To-morrow will be a day of rejoicing, but also it will be a day of sadness for many people. Canada rejoices that she has produced these magnificent young men who have offered their lives for a better world, but to-morrow in the city from which I come there will also be a great deal of sorrow. Nine hundred young high school students have made the supreme sacrifice with the air force, and many others have lost their lives while serving with the other branches of the armed forces. We shall rejoice because Canada, as part of the British empire, has done her duty during two wars and through a long depression. As a nation we owe our very existence to those young men who, after Dunkirk, saved civilization in the battle of Britain.

I wish to pay tribute to the mother country, who went it all alone for two and a half years save for the help of the dominions. Apparently to-day we are having a meeting of the Scottish clans in this chamber, and I want to add my word of tribute to the Scottish people, to the great Prime Minister of New Zealand who was here to-day, and to the Prime Minister of Australia who visited us recently. When Mr. Curtin was in England recently he paid tribute to the mother country. He said that by their heroic resistance after the fall of France the people of Britain saved the world, and went on to say that the war effort which has been developed by the British isles is one of the wonders of the world. Mr. Curtin was absolutely correct, and I rejoice that to-day the mother country is getting some credit for the valiant efforts she put forth during those years when, but for her, we would have seen the end of civilization and would have had to endure the awful horrors of war on our own soil. On many Dominion days before this war broke out I urged rearmament, both in and out of this house. I have here a speech I made on July 1, 1939, just a few months before the war began, in which I said that Canada might have to suffer the horrors of war on her own soil if we did not wake up. I said that Canada was still asleep, and she did not wake up until the war started. Reference has been made to the province of Quebec. On March 19, 1942, I said in this house:

> We in Canada should be a united country from coast to coast. Wolfe and Montcalm lie buried together at Quebec, and the inscription on their monument attests the unity of the races in this country, as described in the motto on their memorials on the Plains of Abraham. Britain and France in the last war fought for a better world and for a better fate than has befallen them. I have always believed in the principles of confederation since I have been in this house—of the old Cornish battle cry of "each for all and all for each." There is no use in our thinking that this is going to be an easy victory. We have no divine right to victory. This is going to be a most difficult, hard and heavy task and we should face that fact before it is too late.

I am very much surprised at the stand taken by the Bloc Populaire and others in the province of Quebec, because, but for the glorious efforts of the mother country we would have had those awful German people in this country, not only in Quebec but on the Atlantic seaboard, in the maritime provinces, the central provinces and the west. We are a small nation, and we would have had to endure the spies, the sergeant major, the whip, the concentration camp, the loud speaker, the tramping feet, the gestapo, the brutality and savagery that the small conquered nations of Europe have known. This continent would have been compelled to suffer all these experiences, and I am surprised that this fact has not been recognized. I do not believe it is the fault of the people of Quebec; in my opinion the situation has been misrepresented to them, and I think there will be a great awakening in that province when they realize the atrocious crimes that have been committed by the Germans, such as the shooting of some of our young airmen which occurred recently.

I do not wish to take up the argument advanced by the hon. member who preceded me; he is an old friend of mine, but I would suggest that he should complain to his own government about the timber deals and matters of that kind, because it was this government that appointed Mr. MacMillan as the supreme czar over timber in this country. Ever since I have been in this house I have complained about the economic annexation of Canada to the United States. Hon. members will remember the great fight we had in this chamber for cheap light and power, and the Beauharnois and Georgian Bay Ottawa canal bill. We were here for weeks and months, with what result? We saw in one financial publication, "Houston's Annual," that all our natural resources from the Ottawa river right up to the Nipigon in new Ontario, including timber, asbestos, gold, silver, platinum, zinc and all the other metals, had been given away to these people in the United States and underwritten in New York. What party was in power at that time, and also at the time of the Beauharnois and other deals? It was the Liberal party. For many years I have been complaining about the situation in regard to timber control, because it concerns both the provinces and the dominion government. Although I do not know Mr. MacMillan, I believe he is the timber king of British Columbia. I understand that he was appointed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and if what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has said is correct, then I think there should be a new timber commissioner, and that Mr. MacMillan should never have been appointed.

It is all very well for us to criticize others. I believe that some of these dollar-a-year men have been good men, but there are others of whom I have grave doubts. I have opposed this control procedure generally, although I am in favour of some controls. In the house for the first two and a half years of the war I opposed the policy and administration controls, but did not receive any support. I believe that controls with respect to the necessities of life are necessary, in many instances. In some cases they have had a good effect. On the other hand, however, some have not been beneficial. I believe that some of the controllers have been using their positions for their own interests, and for the interests of the companies with which they are connected.

To-morrow will be a sad day in Canada for anyone who looks at the casualty lists suffered by Canadians in Italy and Sicily. It is appalling. We find that there have been 73,122 British, dominions and Indian casualties in Italy from the time of the first landings until the fall of Rome. That is the figure given by Prime Minister Churchill. The loss of Canadians in Sicily and Italy has been very severe. I predicted they would be, and that is what would happen.

I spoke in the house on March 24, 1938, about rearmament, and on that occasion I drew the attention of hon. members to the fact that we should have increased our armaments on land, on the seas and in the air. I pointed out that Canada might possibly suffer from air raids, and that we should defend ourselves from them. I compared what happened in Abyssinia with what might happen on the island of Montreal and at other points along the St. Lawrence river. But nothing was done in that connection.

I now come to matters discussed in the budget. This is about the only chance a member has during the session to speak in general terms. This is the 89th day of the session, and we have not yet had an opportunity to discuss, not only economic affairs but also our relations with the mother country, the empire, foreign affairs and the world at large. I believe it would be a good thing if, by statute, ministers of finance were required to bring down their budgets on a fixed date each year. That would be far better, because we have not had before us until now a statement of assets and liabilities. Nor have we had a look at the balance sheet, until a few days ago.

Every budget is an election budget, because all budgets are prepared with a view to the taxpayer and his power to revise things in an election. I believe there should be a fixed day set for the bringing down of the budget, and that it should be brought down immediately following the opening of each session. Every large corporation follows that procedure. We know that banks and many large corporations have their meetings in January or February. At those meetings they present statements showing business men what they must prepare for.

There is no doubt that this is an election budget, presented on the eve of an election, and it is my view that possibly an election should be held, because nothing can be done about all this post-war talk, all this utopia that is to come, and all these castles in the air, unless we have an election to settle matters; because, after all is said and done, an election would clear things up. Let us clear the air and tell the people what they want to know. They want to be told whether we are to have a totalitarian state, and whether the government under socialism is to take over the banks, the insurance companies, and other industries, or social control and a bureaucracy or freedom. All these matters will have to be decided first, before we can reach any conclusion in respect of other national matters and their solution.

I noticed, in connection with compulsory savings, that the budget offers very little to the white-collar worker, the middle-class people in Canada. It is interesting to note who get the most from the budget. Certainly it does not help those young people who are buying houses, loading themselves with mortgages and with life insurance policies. They are getting no relief. Yet they are being forced to save to pay for their homes on which mortgages have been placed. In addition they have to pay heavy federal income taxes and city taxes. They have their insurance premiums to pay, and they must pay for the high cost of living. Nothing has been done for them in the budget; they are forgotten, altogether. These householders have made their compulsory savings through the agencies I have mentioned, and the budget holds nothing for them. It does not lift any of the burdens they must carry.

This budget is an example of the old worn-out philosophy that we are taking too much money from the taxpayer. More should be charged to capital. This generation has suffered twice from world wars, and loss of flesh and blood. I fail to agree with the hallelujah and hip-hip-hurrah chorus coming from some of the press, from the controlled radio, and also from a great many of the columnists. They form a new sphere of activity in the present war; they did not do so in the last one. These men who write columns are, generally, good men; but I believe they are to some extent responsible, between the two wars, for beclouding the issue as to what has been going on in this chamber.

I complained about this on March 21, 1938, when I pointed out six months before Munich that the people were not being given the facts. I said that if war came upon us those who would be responsible would be the government and the ones who were going to allow the people to have only a certain amount of the truth, or news that they would allow them to have of the war occurrences and pictures.

In connection with victory loans it is my belief that they have cost too much, one or one and one-half points, and that the expenses were too high. Some of those expenses should be cut out, and more of our war debt should be charged to capital account.

The government seems to have been on a spending spree. It is spending money like water. If you look over the civil estimates and expenditures on the war you find that they total $6 billion. In my opinion a great deal of that is not for war at all. Wars are won by soldiers, sailors and airmen who are at the scene of combat and not at home. Something should be done to send overseas these reserves of 75,000 men which are costing us over $150 million.

In addition there has been a lot of extravagance in the civil estimates. I notice a policy has been adopted of sending shows and revues and all that kind of thing all over the country. The wartime prices and trade board have now adopted this fashion. What are they doing? The conservation supervisor of the consumers' branch at Toronto has announced that next fall she will have a revue take to the road, appearing in the high schools in all the provinces from coast to coast. In war time, what a farce! The same sort of thing is going on in other departments and something should be done to get reasonable economy in this connection.

The budget shows that fifty-six per cent of our income comes from the income tax, and I fail to see where anything has been done to give relief to the taxpayers. Great Britain is still our best customer. We talk about lend-lease and what we have given her, but we should not forget what she has purchased in this country in the way of war supplies. These transactions have been carried on to a very great extent, and this fact was not considered by those from Quebec who have been criticizing this thing in the house during the last few days.

The question of labour has come up in the house many times. I have always been a consistent supporter of labour. I have held many public positions and I have always had the united support of labour. My hon. friends to my left, particularly the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), should not think they are the only ones looking after the interests of labour. There are others who were in the cause long before there ever was a C.C.F., long before many of these principles were announced.

I have received a number of letters from young soldiers at the front. Some of these boys have marched across the African desert. They are complaining about what they read of happenings at home, about the strikes that have been going on in many industries. In Cincinnati 12,000 men stopped work and went on strike, and the same sort of thing is happening in many Canadian industries. Leading statesmen have also complained that we are losing the war on the home front. Recently I read an editorial in Life which says:

> The home front, speaking generally, seems to have no comprehension of the historic role that it is being called upon to play. Hence, instead of pulling together it is breaking apart. Thus in the last several months every major effort to streamline the home front for war has failed. The farm bloc has scrambled a subsidy programme for keeping down the cost of living. In three of the most vital industries—coal, railroads and steel—labour has defied the government and driven wages upward. Efforts to tax the swollen war incomes that the nation is enjoying have wholly failed.

I have been a strong supporter of labour. In the old country, where there are a great many labour unions, they rolled up a total of 2,250,000 votes in favour of carrying the war through to a finish. Strikes over there have been very few indeed. Most of their differences have been settled in an amicable way.

The government of the day are from five to eight years too late in what they are now proposing in their new deal of socialism. Many years ago the President of the United States announced a "new deal". While this was carried on down to Pearl Harbor day it was not altogether a success. It cost that country a great sum of money, but it was weighed in the balance and most of it was found wanting. After Pearl Harbor that "new deal" was placed before the country in various elections. Later the President of the United States dropped the words "new deal" and adopted the phrase "win the war." That is much more important and that is the present policy of that government.

Much has been said in and out of the house about a better world after the war, about the utopia that is to come, the world of the common man. But they do not describe what the comman man is; they do not say what collective security is and all that kind of thing. Those who talk about the days prior to 1939 forget some things. We shall have to struggle very hard; the people will have to labour very hard before we can regain our lost liberty, or before we can go back to it as in the days before 1939, before we can hope to have any proper prosperity in the whole world. History shows that after every war policies like this are proposed. This was the policy of the government in Great Britain after the Napoleonic wars. They advanced such a policy in the hope that it would bring about a better world.

We should not forget the glories of the Victorian era and other eras prior to 1939. I have referred many times to the advances made during those years in industry, trade and commerce, science, medicine and so on. They built up great assets for the future, but we have squandered them in many ways. There can be no new world unless every man and woman in the country seeks to make it so. Every individual must labour to the utmost. Do not forget that Christian ethics teach us that necessity is the mother of invention, that this life is only preparatory for the one in the next world. That is what the Christian churches teach, and if we are to have a better world everybody will have to do his duty all along the line.

The proposals of Lord Halifax contained per se no new doctrines or proposals. I have for many years urged complete unity with the other dominions for defence, migration, security, empire trade and civil aviation on a unit plan. The empire must remain as in the past an economic unit and act as one with the mother country, or go by default and into liquidation. After all who saved the world in this war for the first two and a half years when Britain went in alone except for the spontaneous and voluntary aid of the dominions and the colonies? It was the mother country that saved civilization, and the empire must be a unit carried into peace days or it will break up into several small states, none of which will be able to go it alone. Unless they stand together they will have little to say about the peace terms or in the new world to come.

The alliance with our brave allies, the United States and Russia, must continue into peace for the new world to come. I favoured closer empire ties and imperial preference as well as favoured nation treaties, and said that the mother country would, after this war, also continue to be our best customer as always.

Canada needs a huge building, housing and reconstruction programme immediately to prepare for peace, and an empire civil aviation policy. The latter would be a source of employment for thousands of our airmen after the war and, if properly developed, would, next to agriculture, be one of the most gainful of employments for thousands of returned soldiers and civilians.

I urge a forward migration policy within the empire. We should think first of the mother country. Tens of thousands could be brought out after the war on an assisted plan. Unless we do something soon, Canada will get little or no factory orders from the huge rebuilding and reconstruction policy of Mr. Churchill, one item of which is 500,000 prefabricated houses. It would mean work here for our industries—private enterprise adapted to the new world to be, and private initiative will, as in the past, do more for employment than the state, which has no money for all the castles in the air of the planners and socialists except what it gets from the taxpayer.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain was quite right when he said that he was not going to preside over the liquidation of the British empire, that he was not going to see the British empire go by default, or to throw away all that we have won just to satisfy a section of the United States press which was predicting the fall of the British empire in the dark days of 1941.

I am very much disappointed in the budget because it contains no reference to retaining our trade preferences within the British empire. As I read clause 7 of the lease-lend treaty which has been signed by Great Britain and the United States, it provides that the trade preferences shall not be interfered with. Clause 4 of the Atlantic charter also provides that these trade preferences between the mother country and the British empire shall not be interfered with without the consent of the dominions. That is a good proviso. There should have been an announcement in the budget as to where we stand on the Ottawa agreements and on the trade preferences within the empire. We have a family of our own in the British empire. The British empire has been our steady, loyal customer. We do fifty-five per cent of all our business with it. It provides a steady market, and I am opposed to throwing away that market for international cooperation. I believe that we should retain our economic freedom and that we should control our own home market and use it as we think fit for the welfare of our own population and the welfare of the commonwealth, of India and of the colonial empire. Britain will do the same thing, and so should the dominions. It is argued by some that if we reserve that freedom for ourselves we shall somehow be acting in restriction of world trade, that we shall be opposing a liberal movement which would otherwise progress. I cannot understand that argument. Sir Edward Grigg has said: "Russia controls a home market of 180,000,000 people. There is no question of her not having the most complete control over the whole of that vast market, and no one has suggested that by keeping control of that vast market, far larger than ours, she is acting in restriction of world trade. Similarly, the United States, which has a population of 130,000,000 with every kind and variety of employment, has absolute control over her domestic market, a control which no other people in the world have thought of exercising. The Hawley-Smoot tariff has been described by an able writer in England as the eighth wonder of the world, and it was enacted at the height of the depression. Who is to say to us that we are acting in restriction of world trade, with our small population, when 130,000,000 are protected behind a wall of that sort? The argument will not hold water. The reciprocal agreements are very much limited—at the present moment to fifty per cent of the existing tariff—and cautiously adopted even at that. They are also governed by an interpretation of the most favoured nation clause which largely deprives it of effect because of the meticulous subdivision of the United States tariff. If all these things are really to be modified, let us by all means meet them halfway. But do not let us sacrifice our liberty which is vitally important to us, to the commonwealth, to India and to the colonial empire." Let us decide these matters within the empire first. Britain cannot exist without the dominions. With all the imports of food which she has to make, she cannot exist without the dominions. This is the first thing to be considered, and I regret to see that it is not mentioned or our policy on it announced in the budget.

One of the great questions before the country is empire unity and we should do our utmost in that connection. There may not be unanimity of view on the war but there is identity of purpose. The budget ignores the whole question of preferences within the empire; yet these economic matters are life and death to us all within the empire.

I approve what the great Prime Minister of Britain said when he was speaking in the House of Commons at Westminster on April 21, and describing the conference of Prime Ministers which was held recently in London. He referred to the glorious part which this country had played in various wars. Down to the start of this century the mother country paid the whole cost in war of any assistance which the dominions sent. In the South African war, for instance, Canada sent several thousand troops, and so did New Zealand and Australia, and the mother country paid for them all. In the great war of 1914-18 one million men went from the overseas dominions to the aid of the empire and 130,000 of them fell in that war. They went under their own autonomy, under their own sovereign rights, and what they did changed the whole history of the civilized world. Let us look further at what the dominions did in the two great wars.

Mr. Churchill in his address to the British House of Commons on April 21 said:

> Looking at the British empire, say, 30 years ago, in 1914, on the eve of the first great war, all foreign opinion, especially German opinion, was convinced that this vast structure of empire, created and coming into full life in Victorian times, had reached a condition of ricketiness and looseness when a single violent shock would bring it clattering down and lay it low for ever. Then came upon the world a most frightful war, incomparably greater than any, thank God, we have suffered in this struggle. I remember coming out of the cabinet meeting on an August afternoon in 1914, when war was certain, and the fleet was already mobilized with this feeling: "How are we to explain it all to Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand; nay, how are we to explain it all to our own people in the short time left?" But, when we left the fierce controversy of the cabinet room, and came out into the open air, the whole of the peoples of the British empire, of every race and every clime, had already sprung to arms. Our old enemies, recent enemies, Generals Botha and Smuts, were already saddling their horses to rally their commandos to the attack on Germany, and Irishmen, whose names I always bear in my memory with regard, John Redmond and his brother, and others of the old Irish parliamentary party, which fought us for so many years in this house in pleading the cause of Ireland with great eloquence and parliamentary renown.

He went on to say:

> The mother country—I must still ask leave to use this name; anyhow, I think it is rather dangerous to plunge into new nomenclature, and I am not sure that anything like "The Elder Sister Country" would be a very great success. There was that old song, which I remember in my youth "A Boy's Best Friend is his Mother", and which seems to me to be sometimes worth humming again.

He went on to refer to the help that came in this war from the dominions:

> When the signal came, from the poorest colony to the most powerful dominion, the great maxim held "When the King declares war, the empire is at war."

He said it was a miracle.

> What is this miracle? I think the word was used by some hon. gentlemen yesterday. What is this miracle, for it is nothing less, that called men from the uttermost ends of the earth, some riding twenty days before they could reach their recruiting centres, some armies having to be sent 14,000 miles across the seas before they reached the battlefield? What is this force, this miracle which makes governments, as proud and sovereign as any that have ever existed, immediately cast aside all their fears, and immediately set themselves to aid a good cause and beat the common foe? You must look very deep into the heart of man, and then you will not find the answer unless you look with the eye of the spirit. Then it is that you learn that human beings are not dominated by material things but by ideas for which they are willing to give their lives or their life's work. Among the various forces that hold the British empire together is, and I certainly do not object to the expression which my hon. friend the member for Seaham used, "enlightened self-interest," that has a valued and important part to play, but I am sure he would make no mistake in placing that in front of those deeper and more mysterious influences which cause human beings to do most incalculable, improvident, and, from the narrow point of view, profitless things. It is our union in freedom and for the sake of our way of living which is the great fact, reinforced by tradition and sentiment, and it does not depend upon anything that could ever be written down in any account kept in some large volume.

In conclusion he said:

One last word before I sit down. Some assume that there must be an inherent antagonism between a world order to keep peace and vast national or federal organization which will evidently be in existence. I do not believe this is true. Both the world order and this great organization may be so fashioned as to be two parts of one tremendous whole. I have never conceived that a fraternal association with the United States would militate in any way against the unity of the British commonwealth and empire, or breed ill-feeling with our great Russian ally, to whom we are bound by the 20 years treaty. I do not think we need choose this or that. With wisdom, and patience, and vigour, and courage, we may get the best of both. We have often said of our own British empire: "In my Father's house there are many mansions."

So in this far greater world structure, which we shall surely raise out of the ruins of desolating war, there will be room for all generous, free associations of a special character, so long as they are not disloyal to the world cause nor seek to bar the forward march of mankind.

I believe that he stated the case for Canada also herein, and that the people of Canada will pay tribute where it is due, and tribute is undoubtedly due to the mother country and to the glorious work of the dominions in the waging of this war.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

FISHERIES

72. Development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $30,000.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): I have not the details of my estimates here, Mr. Chairman, because I understood that my estimates would not be proceeded with until eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why can we not rest quietly for a few minutes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Reading the Hansard report of the discussion when these estimates were last before the house, I find that there was a question with regard to the reduction of $10,000 and I explained that this had been transferred to another department. Item 70 is accordingly increased by $63,000. Inspection comes under "fisheries inspection including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and protection services."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the item that is now before us I propose to ask the minister, on resuming at eight o'clock, some questions regarding the development of deep sea fisheries and the position of the department with respect to aid to fishermen engaged in these fisheries, so far as the question of bait is concerned. I do not wish to develop the point at the moment because my papers are upstairs and I cannot speak without them. However, I notify the minister that at eight o'clock I intend to ask some questions in this connection. Would the minister be good enough to let me know at eight o'clock whether in Quebec the province supplies bait free to deep sea fishermen, having regard to the bay of Chaleur?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know whether bait is free to the fishermen there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am asking the minister to get the information and let me know.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Bank Act.
An act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.
An act to establish a Department of Veterans Affairs.
An act respecting Surplus Crown Assets.
An act to establish a Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the house is agreeable perhaps we might meet this evening at 8:15 instead of at 8 o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at 8.15 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

72. Development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $30,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, as I notified the minister before the dinner recess, I desire to review briefly the situation which has arisen in the bay of Chaleur district, province of New Brunswick, with respect to conditions surrounding the operations of deep sea fishermen at that point. Like those in the Gaspe district, the fishermen on the Caraquet coast are engaged, for the most part, in the catching of prime codfish. In order to do so it is necessary that they should have at all times an adequate supply of bait.

The bait most commonly used is the common herring. The fishermen themselves—or some of them—catch these fish, presumably in nets. Since they have no way of taking care of the bait, except to a very limited degree, and since the best bait comes from the freezers, it is customary for these fishermen to sell the fresh herring to the freezers and then, as they require fresh bait, they repurchase the herring.

Some years ago a number of freezing plants were established in the Caraquet district, especially at Shippigan and at Caraquet village. But during the depression, and even before that time, these freezers fell more or less into decay, and were not commercially operated. During the depression the plight of the fishermen on the Caraquet coast, in common with that of their brothers across the bay, was rather desperate. The prices paid for prime cod were so low, owing to the failure of the export trade, that the fishermen could not make a living. The consequence was that gear, fishing vessels and the like went into decay. During the depression these men had an exceedingly difficult time.

Between 1935 and 1940, the provincial government of New Brunswick, having decided to ameliorate the condition of these fishemen, induced a very large and wealthy corporation from Gloucester, Massachusetts, to establish a subsidiary corporation in New Brunswick. This corporation, known as Gorton Pew, N.B., Limited, with substantial assistance from the provincial government, and with a grant of a good many thousands of dollars from this federal treasury handed out to them, I think—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The grant was given by the federal government to the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My recollection is that it went direct to the company, although it may have passed through the provincial government. The minister's officials will be fully advised as to the details, and the point does not affect the situation to which I shall refer.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The result was that there was established at Caraquet, in the county of Gloucester, New Brunswick, a large freezing and processing plant which has been in operation more or less continuously ever since. Whether it has fulfilled all the functions for which it was intended, I am not in a position to say; and I do not purpose criticizing that feature of the case. I am going to draw the minister's attention to the fact that the prices paid by this company for fish, having regard to the present high prices received for the processed product, are wholly inadequate.

Before turning to that point, however, may I direct the minister's attention to another circumstance, the one I had in mind chiefly when I rose to speak. I point out to him that the prices paid by this company, which operates under a very large capital subsidy, to the fisherman for the fresh bait, as he brings it in, is exceedingly low. Only two cents a pound is paid for the herring. That herring is brought to the pier by the fisherman. It is then weighed in by company officials, put in the bins, salted, partly frozen, and there awaits distribution to the fisherman for his purposes in connection with the catching of cod fish. The prices charged by the company, on the other hand, to the fishermen for the same bait is not two cents a pound, but five cents a pound, or 150 per cent higher. I submit to the minister that that is an unwarranted increase in price, having regard to the fact that the only expense the company could have is that connected with the weighing in of the fish, and with salting and semi-freezing in order to preserve it against the time when the fishermen may want bait—which may be in the following week.

I hold in my hands two invoices which I shall be glad to show the minister, although I desire that the name of the fisherman should not be made public. One invoice is for a sale by a fisherman to Gorton Pew, N.B., Limited, of 150 pounds of bait herring at two cents a pound, for a total of $3. The second invoice is for a purchase of 5,400 pounds of herring bait for $27, which works out at exactly five cents a pound.

Mr. KINLEY: What is the date of each invoice?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One is May and the other is June; they are within recent days.

This is a situation which ought not to obtain. I do not know whether the minister has any remedy for this sort of thing, but the solution which occurs to me is one which I believe the federal government could very well afford to carry out. Before offering that, however, I would ask the minister if he has been able to ascertain whether the fishermen on the Gaspe coast, especially that part of the Gaspe coast fronting on the bay of Chaleur, are provided with free bait by either the federal or the provincial government.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They are not provided, by either the provincial or the dominion government, with free bait. The provincial government has built along the Gaspe coast thirty-four refrigeration plants, in which the bait is stored. Space is rented by the government; it is not free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not exactly free. Is the minister able to tell me the cost to the individual fisherman for having this bait located in the freezer, and for storing it and handing it out to him?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know. I know, however, that the rent is rather low.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very low, yes.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. And I know that the provincial government has been losing money for a few years on these plants.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In any event the provincial government in its desire to help the fishermen—and I commend the government in this respect—makes a small service charge for such facilities. No such facilities exist in New Brunswick. I am sure the department is sincerely desirous, as we all are, of making the fishing industry as profitable as it can be made—and is, I believe, to a degree, to-day—and with that in mind could extend some assistance in connection with this matter of supplying bait, either by the method adopted by the Quebec government or, if that is not possible, having regard to the capital expenditures required in establishing freezers, by intervening long enough to investigate the operations of the company.

I am not going to criticize the minister's department, but I desire to draw attention to a situation which was represented to me as being unduly hard on the fishermen in that locality, especially when vis-a-vis they see their brothers on the coasts of Bonaventure and Gaspe counties able to store their bait for what is more or less a nominal fee.

In my opinion 150 per cent profit on a transaction of this kind is far too large. I should like to be corrected if my information is wrong; but if this company does receive the bait at its own pier from the fishermen, weighs it in, carries it up by conveyors to the bins, puts in whatever salt is necessary, freezes and stores the bait and then hands it out, a profit of 150 per cent is, to say the least, exorbitant.

That is the situation which has developed. It is causing great uneasiness and annoyance to the fishermen, and they resent it. I am suggesting to the minister that he should have his inspectors visit these plants immediately and, if they have authority, examine the books and check on the information I have. I have even heard of a profit of 400 per cent being charged for this service. That is to say, as much as $8 per 100 pounds has been charged for bait instead of $5, as shown by the invoice I have in front of me.

I suggest that under this item the department should go farther and develop facilities in these fishing districts, not only to stop such things as I have indicated and which I believe are abuses, but also to establish refrigerator plants where they do not now exist. These small plants are not expensive. There is very little service the fishermen get from the federal government. There is very little we can do for them outside of trying to provide markets and what-not. It would be a great service for the men on the Caraquet coast and along the whole eastern shore of New Brunswick. Small freezing plants for bait should be established in cooperation with the provincial government or by the federal government acting on its own.

Bait constitutes an important item in the fisherman's inventory, as well as an important item in his cost of production. Something ought to be done about it. I am going to ask the minister if he will be good enough to have the whole position reviewed, and perhaps not this season—priorities are difficult—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are just looking into the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am very glad to hear that, and I am glad to be in the forefront advocating it. If the minister should do anything and I happen to be here in another season I shall be glad to commend him for his efforts. Certainly there is a need, and I think the minister's investigation will show that there is a need. The present need is to investigate the prices charged the fishermen by this one institution which has a monopoly on the whole Caraquet coast because there is not another freezer in that district. Just as a guess I would say that that coast extends for sixty miles, and if you go beyond the extreme eastern tip of Gloucester county in New Brunswick to the gulf coast proper, it will be probably one hundred miles. There is only the one plant where bait can be found.

Another point to which I desire to call the minister's attention is the price paid by this company for prime green codfish. Because of commitments made by the government dried codfish are in great demand. I was astounded the other day to find out the prices being charged in my town for dried boneless cod. That is a luscious item if you have never tasted it. The cost at a retail store was thirty-seven cents a pound.

Mr. REID: Is there no price ceiling?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know of any price ceiling. I was simply astounded when the dealer told me that the price was thirty-seven cents a pound. The fisherman gets three and a half cents a pound for the green codfish. I should not like hon. members to think there is no justification for a considerable spread between the cost of the green fish delivered at the pier and the price charged by the retailer for the dried product. There is a tremendous loss in processing, and there is the cost of handling, curing and distribution. The processor has his profit; the wholesaler who distributes, if it is not done by the processor, also has a profit; the retailer has a profit as well. There are thus three profits on the one piece of fish. I cannot conceive why there should be a spread of about 1,200 per cent; from three and a half cents a pound to thirty-seven cents a pound is a tremendous spread.

Let us say that the loss in processing is one-third. I am just guessing at that, although I have heard the figures. This would bring the cost of the fish up substantially. The other items to which I have referred would each take at least as much as the original price paid to the fisherman. The cost of transportation is an item. Even with the prices paid for dried codfish by the quintal of 112 pounds, either with the bone in or boneless, I cannot conceive that a price of three and a half cents a pound for the green product is adequate.

This is the situation that calls for remedy. I do not suggest a ceiling price, but I do suggest a floor price for the fisherman. He is the man I am talking about at the moment; he is the man who is entitled to a fair return for what, after all, is fairly arduous work. He has to go out in all kinds of weather. While the fishermen do not fish in the winter-time because that area is frozen, fall fishing is a serious and hazardous occupation. The best run of fish is in the fall. The fattest run of cod is always in the fall, and the same for the haddock. The spring haddock are thin and not nearly as edible. During the later part of September when there are many gales and windstorms and into October when the weather is getting colder, this occupation is carried on under the most arduous circumstances.

I should like to have from the minister an undertaking that he will look into what these companies are paying to these fishermen who cannot fend for themselves. I hope they are organized in a cooperative, but I am afraid they are not. That is the only cure that I see for the troubles of which I would call the shore-line fishermen. They have no beam trawlers but fish in the old-fashioned fishing vessels. Each man will take a share and a group will get together and go in one small schooner. They sell their catch collectively and divide the proceeds among them after paying the expenses. A fishing trip cannot be very lucrative to them, selling their fish at 3½ cents a pound. Remember these men cannot fish in the winter. Most of them go to the lumber woods and that sort of thing in the winter. But fishing is their principal occupation, and their season is relatively short. I am going to ask the minister if he will institute an investigation into the prices paid by the Gorton Pew company of New Brunswick for green codfish to the fishermen on the Caraquet coast and see if he cannot alleviate a situation which I think is just too bad at this time when prices for primary products have at least reached a decent basis. They have not reached parity by any means in many cases, but here I suggest that there is no effort to get parity for the fisherman, having regard to what he has to pay for his fishing tackle, his lines and what-not, and what he has to pay for his bait. I think the situation with respect to bait is odious. The fisherman has to pay five cents a pound for cured bait. That seems to be entirely out of line with what he ought to have to pay.

Mr. NEILL: How much?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Five cents a pound. I have the invoices.

Mr. NEILL: Dried herring?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Semi-frozen herring. They do not stay in the freezer very long because there is such an active demand. That situation should not be allowed to continue. I am going to ask the minister if he will be good enough, with the authority conferred upon him by this item, to investigate these two problems and see if he cannot find a rectification and a cure. I have outlined them in sufficient detail I think for him to know what I mean. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that he will approach the problems sympathetically. There is a disease there that ought to be cured, and a little wholesome government intervention will, I have no doubt, bring about a cure. These fishermen should not be getting less than six cents a pound for prime green codfish at to-day's prices, which is nearly double what the fishermen are getting to-day. The minister may say that that price is out of line. I confess I do not know because I have not had time to get any figures. But his department must have them.

Fish are in great demand to-day. Fresh fish in the United States, where there is no ceiling at all, has gone sky-high, and there is great competition to obtain these fish, in one case for the fresh fish market and in the other for the cured fish market. There is not enough supply to go around to satisfy the demand. This ought to be the time when the fisherman can get in his harvest. He has the opportunity only about once in every five years. I suggest to the minister; I solicit the minister, to make inquiry and to do something about this matter. I think I have laid sufficient basis upon which he can see that there is something radically wrong with respect to the operation of this company. In the United States it is one of the biggest companies there. If they were establishing themselves at this time in New Brunswick they would not want any government intervention. They came in there, of course, at a difficult time, and I never criticized very much the fact that they were given a subsidy although I remember criticizing in this house three or four years ago the magnitude of the subsidy given and the use that was made of it. But that is past history and I am not going to rehash any part of it. May I ask the minister to approach this matter as sympathetically as possible and to do something. That is what I want. Let us see if something cannot be done for these men.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, some time in 1939 a subsidy of half a million dollars was granted to the three maritime provinces, and the New Brunswick government granted a subsidy of $75,000 to Gorton Pew. The province was free to do anything reasonable out of the amount of subsidy granted. This government had nothing to do with the grant of this $75,000 to Gorton Pew.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The country's money went to them.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, but I understand that the maritimes also put up some money to make up a certain total by which they tried to alleviate the difficulties of the fishermen. On the Gaspe coast the provincial government has built thirty-four refrigeration plants, which at that time was thought to be a very big plan involving a large vote of money. The plants were built during the depression years and the fishermen have benefited from these plants to a large extent, especially during the last few years.

The fishermen are paying, as the hon. member indicates, a nominal amount to have their bait and their fish stored in these refrigeration plants. We have nothing similar in the maritime provinces, except that an order in council authorizes us to advance to a group of fishermen seventy-five per cent of the cost of bait freezer provided that the plant design is approved by the department. The cost of these bait freezers runs between three and four thousand dollars apiece. We have had one request this year from the Lameque Fishermen's Association and we are granting them $4,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on the island.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. A few years ago, in 1938, the sum of $36,000 was granted to the Jamieson company at Canso and a refrigeration plant was built there. By virtue of the contract between the Jamieson company and the government a certain amount of space has to be made available in the plant for the fishermen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the Lameque plant been built?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No; we granted the subsidy only three or four weeks ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The plant will not be in operation this year.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No. Apart from that we have no other plants. We want to benefit from the experience of the Quebec provincial government. At present our engineers in conjunction with the officials of the Nova Scotia fisheries department are looking around and preparing plans for refrigeration plants. We do not intend to make it merely a refrigeration plant as in Gaspe. We would like to have what is called a one-unit fishing plant, including refrigeration, a drying plant, and a smoking plant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A processing plant.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, processing in more than one form. It is our policy to do that if it is possible and even to ask for a certain amount in the supplementary estimates, because the engineers' plans might be ready within a very short time and we should like to do it as quickly as possible. We shall build three or four or five of these plants in the maritimes at different places not yet chosen. The price paid to the fishermen for dried cod is on an average of 6·6 cents a pound.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is green cod.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. The ceiling price at 3·5 cents, raw, translated into terms of dried fish for export purposes, means 13·28 cents that we are paying. There is no ceiling price for the domestic product.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the price to the government for export under its commitments—13·28 cents?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. I cannot say that the price of 37 cents a pound seems to be very high. However, it is not in my department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can give the minister first-class evidence on that point. But what about this question of bait? The minister has not given me any undertaking at all that he will comply with my request to look into the matter of bait.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The plants which we wish to build will be for the refrigeration of processed fish and also for bait purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that; but what about the present? I am asking the minister to look into the matter and see to it that the condition which exists to-day shall not continue. While I am on my feet, may I ask him whether the price of 6·6 cents is for the whole fish or the cleaned fish, because there is a marked difference between the two.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier). That is for salted fish not boned, 6·6 cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are the entrails out? They are an important part of the weight of the fish. If they are cleaned fish—

Mr. BERTRAND (York-Sunbury): Yes, they are cleaned fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —then that is not a very high price, because the head and entrails would be at least one-third of the weight, and that is a very low price to-day.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is very high in comparison with what was paid in previous years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the price in previous years was a distress price.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I may say to my hon. friend that I have been twice in the maritimes and the fisheries association were very happy. As regards the price charged by the Gorton Pew company, that is not in my province, but I shall inquire to find out what's what.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister says that it is not in his jurisdiction; that is what he is telling us. I will tell him this, if he will allow me, and I am not doing it in any fault-finding spirit, because I want action and I know that if I am to get action I must not scold the minister. This, however, is a part of the duties of the department in developing the deep sea fisheries. Bait is a very important item in the development of deep sea fishing, and it ought to be the object of the department to get this bait for the fishermen who operate these fisheries and to get it as cheaply as possible. The price that is paid for the bait to the original producers and the price charged by the same company to the same producer to produce cod fish represent too great a spread—150 per cent—and I have been told, although I have no evidence of this, that there has been an advance of even 400 per cent; that is to say, eight cents has been charged for what cost the company two cents, less, of course, the service rendered. The minister, in the course of carrying out the will of parliament in voting this sum of $30,000, which I see has been reduced by $10,000, although I am not quite sure why—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I explained that the other day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am not questioning that at the moment. However, the minister could very well conduct an investigation through one of his fisheries officers to find out what the company actually pay, what the charges are when they sell and what the cost of the service rendered would amount to, and arrive at a net figure of what this company's profit is, on what, after all, is a relatively small part of their operations. The minister has the authority to do this. If he has not, at any rate he can soon pass a regulation under the Fisheries Act which would enable him to conduct such an investigation. I ask him to have that done in order to have what I regard as an improper situation righted. I have no more to say in that regard, but I have thought of communicating with the war-time prices and trade board with reference to this matter and the other one. I have made myself such a nuisance to them, however, that I hesitate to call on them again. As a matter of fact, I must confess that I have never been able to accomplish very much with the war-time prices and trade board. They know more about everything than I ever knew about anything. That has been my experience with these gentlemen on Sussex and Rideau streets. They treat you with disdain sometimes.

Mr. REID: You are not alone in that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My hon. friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) had an experience whch I am not willing to go through myself. He was told in effect, as he indicated to the house on one occasion, that they were sick and tired of hearing from him. Well, they will hear more about it before this election is over.

An hon. MEMBER: The fish controller is from New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have never questioned the ultimate objective of the wartime prices and trade board, but on many occasions I have questioned the methods adopted. Perhaps this is out of order, but I wish to make one observation. I am going to ask this question of the membership of the house: Before the wartime prices and trade board put into effect a ceiling, or made a regulation or an order affecting production in your constituencies, has any member of this house been consulted?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I hear someone say, "Nor should they be"?

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): Yes, sir.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I disagree with that most profoundly.

Mr. GOLDING: They would have a tough time if they consulted all the members before they acted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They might or might not. However, I do not intend to pursue this question at the moment. Perhaps there will be another opportunity to do so, but they will get an honest opinion from the membership and probably some first-hand evidence which they have not to-day. I am not going to follow that line further, but something will have to be done in connection with the prices paid and received for bait. Something will have o be done to ameliorate the situation with respect to prices paid primary producers for green cod fish. Three and one-half cents a pound for uncleaned fish and 6·6 cents a pound for gutted and headed fish and salted fish are prices that are not sufficient, having regard to what the prices are to the trade. I am sure the fishermen are being done to a certain extent by the processors, who are making a profit.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): The item under discussion is a vote of $30,000 for the development of deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, and under this item there is a matter which, I believe, may properly be raised. I think we all agree that it is most essential in post-war rehabilitation for the fishing industry to be put in a position to continue to modernize their equipment and produce the best possible fish at the least possible price, especially since a large percentage of the fish must be exported. In the recent budget proposals farmers were given concessions in the way of farm implements being allowed to come into Canada duty free. I think similar concessions should be given to the fishermen. I would urge the minister to make the strongest representations that he can to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, with a view to making sure that equal treatment is given the fishing industry and that items for use in the catching and processing of fish and fish products be allowed free entry into Canada, whether those items be for new construction, repair or maintenance.

A moment ago the hon. member for York-Sunbury mentioned that a floor should be put under the price of fish. I am in complete agreement with him on that point. I think—and this is a matter that has been brought by other hon. members of the maritime provinces and myself to the attention of the minister—every argument that can be urged for a floor under the price of farm products can be urged with greater force in the case of fish. A comprehensive and well prepared brief was submitted to the Minister of Finance some months ago by the united maritime fishermen. A copy of the brief, outlining the reconstruction programme for the inshore fisheries of the maritime provinces, was sent to me; it was also sent to other hon. members of the maritime provinces. I am not going to go into all the matters that are dealt with in this brief, but there is one paragraph that I should like to read. It sets out with precision and without undue prolixity the position of the united maritime fishermen on this particular point. It reads as follows:

> It is the view of our members that if the fishery is to be reconstructed upon a basis which will provide freedom from want for the fishermen some means must be devised to maintain fish prices on a parity with other commodities. If the price structure in other branches of food production is to be supported by a floor it is equally necessary to make a similar provision for the fishery. It is well known that in the past the discrepancy between the prices received by the primary producer and general commodity levels have been greater in the fishery than in any other branch of production. For several years following 1930 the price of cod in most sections of the maritimes was under one cent per pound. Even as late as 1939 the Halifax price for market cod ranged from one and a half cents to one and three-quarter cents per pound. Due to the introduction of price controls this situation has become more evenly balanced under war-time conditions; but if measures are not taken to stabilize prices at an equitable point in the post-war period there is nothing to prevent the utter collapse of the price structure and the return of the hopeless conditions which prevailed in the pre-war years.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, in the hurried times we are facing there is not much opportunity for hon. members to devote too much time to the local problems of the maritime provinces. But here is one, the question of the price of fish, that should, I think, appeal to every hon. member of this committee and of the government. We are speaking not so much of to-day as of the days that lie ahead when war markets will be no longer available. We shall find ourselves back in the same position in which we were before the war unless measures are taken now to deal with conditions that will then arise. I submit these matters for the minister's consideration with the view of his urging on his colleague, the Minister of Finance, the consideration necessary to bring the fishing industry into somewhat the same position that the farming industry now finds itself in.

Mr. McGARRY: Following the remarks of the hon. junior member for Halifax, I wish to take a few minutes of the committee's time to refer to the matter with which he dealt. I am not going to deal specifically with any case in my constituency as did the hon. member for York-Sunbury. But in a general way I may say that I cannot understand why the fishermen, who are important producers, are not granted the same security that has been given to other producers. I cannot understand why a floor is not placed under the fisherman's product. The products of the sea are just as essential for the maintenance of the nation at large and for the economy and nutrition of the people as is the product of any other industry of the country. To me it is strange that the budget provides for free entry into Canada of all farm machinery and equipment and that equal treatment is not given to the fishing industry. I congratulate the farmers and am gratified that these concessions have been given to them. Yet at the same time I strongly protest against the apparent discrimination exercised against the fishermen who are just as essential producers. Furthermore, as is well known, the life of the fisherman is one of adventure. There is no other producer in the country who is subject to the same dangers as are the fishermen. Living in my constituency as I do, I know something of what happens in Nova Scotia. In some years the fishermen were selling their fish at fifty cents a hundred pounds and in some cases dumping them overboard because of the lack of a market. Unless security is afforded to our fishermen in the maritime provinces I fear we shall revert to those same dark and dismal days. If that is allowed while we are professing to render security to the producers of the nation at large, then all the talk about rehabilitation is meaningless. I would urge the minister to use his influence to see that this protection and security is afforded to the best producers in the country and the most substantial supporters of our national economy.

Mr. KINLEY: I have been concerned for some time about this matter of fish prices. Last April I interviewed the economist of the Department of Fisheries, Mr. Stewart Bates, special assistant to the deputy minister, and I believe it would be of interest to the committee if I read the letter he sent me:

> The combined food board, through its fish committee, began the allocation of salted fish in 1943, as it did with many other commodities. The world supply was divided up among the requiring nations and Canada was given definite allocations to certain markets. Prices of salted codfish and scale fish were also agreed upon internationally, and the supplying countries undertook to control their exports to fulfil the market allocations given them by the board and to ensure that the commodity was sold at the agreed prices. The administration of this scheme within Canada is under the control of the Minister of Fisheries, with an administrative office in Halifax and in Quebec, and an advisory committee made up of members of the export trade. In 1943 all exporters of salted fish were registered and quotas were given to each exporter on the basis of his exports made to various markets in 1941 and 1942. Readjustments had to be made in these quotas at a later date in order to accommodate exporters who had more fish on hand than they had quotas for. In 1944, the administration will try to increase further the degree of flexibility in this system. It is the intention that exporters who built up market connections abroad should continue to be given some protection in these markets, but in order to accommodate exporters who might have fish, but no quotas, the administration will retain part of the allocations to various markets to distribute among those exporters whose quotas prove insufficient.
> With respect to pickled fish in barrels, the combined food board has no allocation scheme. But in 1943, the department was asked to make allocations of pickled fish in barrels to ensure that sufficient supplies would be sent to the British West Indies and to certain other markets which have to be preserved from a long-run point of view.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I direct attention to the fact that this matter was discussed under the war estimates, and that it does not come under this item.

Mr. KINLEY: This item is for the improvement of deep sea fisheries.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is to increase the demand for fish. You can call it for the improvement of deep sea fisheries if you like, but it is the item for increasing the demand for fish in Canada, and the matter my hon. friend is discussing at the moment comes under the war appropriation.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister object to my reading a letter from his own department with regard to prices paid the fishermen, under this item which has to do with the improvement of deep sea fisheries?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I have no objection to the discussion under the proper item, but this is not the proper item.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister object to the reading of the letter?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I object to this discussion at this time.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, Mr. Chairman, what is your ruling? This item has to do with the development of deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish. If I know anything about it, the matter I am discussing has to do with the demand for fish. The letter goes on:

> On these fish there has been no international price, and so far as the department is concerned, exporters may sell at whatever price the market will bear. But there have been allocations in order to ensure adequacies of supplies for the West Indies. This arrangement is likely to continue in 1944. In other words, there will be allocations of pickled fish in barrels, but no export price control. Here again, however, it is the intention of the administration to try to grant more freedom to registered exporters, within the various allocations laid down, so that any exporter who holds fish will be reasonably sure of finding a ready outlet in some market for his commodity. In 1943, some exporters found that our quota system did not give them enough export permits to take account of their fish on hand, but in 1944 this situation should be less liable to occur. In other words, there ought to be increased competition among exporters for the fish in fishermen's hands in 1944, when these exporters are made aware of the increased degree of freedom that will be permitted them. The department hopes to have in the hands of every registered exporter, by the middle of May at the latest, statements indicating the policy for 1944. As I mentioned on the telephone, there has been no government fixing of fishermen's prices in Canada, although the wartime prices and trade board have put ceilings on processors' prices in many varieties. It is our belief that the greater freedom to be granted to exporters of salted fish in 1944 should do much to increase the competition among them for fish and thereby to yield the fishermen a reasonable price.

I want to help the minister, and I think this is an important letter. I was concerned because the smaller fishermen came to me and said, "We want access to the export market. We must sell to the middleman, and we think the spread between what we get from him and what he gets from the export market is too great." There may be some argument on that, but the point is that men were permitted to export on a quota based upon certain years. Some of the shore fishermen, especially those whose work is seasonal, would have years when there would be a run of fish and other years when there would be few fish, and they found themselves without quotas. As a result they were unable to ship their fish abroad and get the higher prices. It will be realized that on the south shore of Nova Scotia, where the Boston market is only an overnight trip, where in days gone by men could take their fish to Yarmouth on a truck, put them on a boat and have them on the Boston market the next day, there is a great deal of concern when that market is cut off. I am glad to learn that the department has in mind greater freedom in connection with the export of fish, and that there will be more competition in the sale of fish on the markets so close to Nova Scotia. In the old days they told me that fifty cents was a good profit for a merchant on a barrel of mackerel, and in those days there was competition to buy the fish. Now they believe $3.50 or $3.75 is too much spread, and it seems to me that both the allocation and the setting of prices have been largely in the hands of a board consisting of exporters. While it may be true that they have to get permission from the government to set their price, certainly they have control of the price that is paid the fishermen. Of course the fishermen are doing very well at the present time, but I think all of us who are in business are doing very well. I am not so much concerned about the situation at the moment, but I am concerned about the future.

At the present time the price of fish is controlled largely by the export market, but in most parts of this country the fishermen cannot take advantage of that export market. Therefore there should be control of the price of fish in order to ensure that the fishermen survive in times of adversity, and that they get out of the fish all that the business will stand. I realize that fish is a perishable product, in connection with which the hazards are great as to returns and so on. But when other industries in this country are to receive protection through a floor under prices, so that they may not have to sell their products at ruinous rates, I think the same protection should be given the fishermen. I hope the minister will see that in future they will be safeguarded. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that a price floor is a cure-all for either the farmer or the fisherman. He must depend upon the export trade, which practically determines the price of his product. I believe that about sixty per cent of our fish go abroad.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Seventy per cent.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, to-day we are in a war-time economy. For that reason I believe in putting a floor under the family; and by family allowances, which have been proposed in parliament, we are putting a floor under the fisherman's family to see to it that he and his family will not be stricken with poverty in the midst of plenty. Also, if we can guarantee him a fair price for his fish, perhaps we may put him in the place where he should be in the economy of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am greatly obliged to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the hon. junior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond for their support in the appeal I have made to-night on behalf of the fishermen in the maritime provinces.

I read this brief some weeks ago, and agreed with many of the recommendations contained in it. There were one or two I did not think were proper. I wonder what the attitude of the minister is toward this brief; has he given any reply?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The maritime fishermen's association were asked to prepare a brief for me. They came here in a delegation, and presented the brief. I studied it with them, carefully.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that is correct, and I am accepting the minister's statement one hundred per cent. But what I wish to know is this: What is he going to do with the recommendations contained in the brief? I have no doubt he and the officials of his department studied them from A to Z. But that is no good, unless we get action. I am prepared to wait and see what action the government is going to take in the matter.

I wish, however, to draw the attention of the government to another group of fishermen which has not been mentioned to-night. I refer to those fishermen who go down to the sea in the terrific waters of the bay of Fundy, perhaps the most tempestuous tract of water on the Atlantic coast. I wish to talk for a few moments about the sardine fishermen in the counties of Charlotte and Saint John, and the islands adjacent thereto. For many years prior to prohibition about ninety per cent of the production of sardine fisheries of the Passamaquoddy and bay of Fundy areas went to the factories at Lubec and Eastport in Maine, where they were processed and sold in the markets of the United States. With the advent of prohibition in that country, and the disappearance of the free-lunch counters found in certain institutions, the demand for this fish fell off very suddenly, and the industry was in a bad way in those two Maine towns. The result was that many of the processing and packing companies went bankrupt, and the fisheries languished.

Subsequently, through the enterprise of a citizen of the city of Saint John, and his associates, an industry was established in a sound way in New Brunswick. It had been operating in a small way in a plant in the county of Charlotte. New capital was introduced, new methods adopted and the new enterprise proceeded. A very large export trade was developed, not with the United States but with various parts of the British dominions—and especially under the impetus of the Ottawa agreements.

Then came the war. There has been developed a measure of control over the sardine fisheries. I do not know if the minister can tell me why, but the head of this large packing plant in New Brunswick was made fisheries controller.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He has no more interest in it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not accusing him at all; wait until I am through.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I just say that he has no interest in the Black Harbour plant any more.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be news to a lot of people in New Brunswick.

Mr. KINLEY: What is that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That Mr. McLean has no longer any interest in Connor Brothers. That is certainly news to me, and it will be news to a lot of other people. I know his brother is the managing director of the company, and I would assume that his capital is still in. However, I accept the minister's statement. He should know; I do not.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He might have some shares left; but what I mean is that he is not managing this firm.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh yes, but he is the man behind the gun; we know that.

Mr. KINLEY: Supposing he is?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not a thing wrong—and I am not condemning him.

Mr. KINLEY: He is a good man?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is a good business man, yes. He and his brother built up the industry, and I am not attacking him, at all. I shall come to my point in a moment, and it is this, that as fisheries controller he was vested with certain powers. I wish to be corrected if I am wrong, but I believe he established a ceiling price in respect of the sardine fisheries. I should like to know, in the first place, if that is correct. I want to know, secondly, if at one time there was a prohibition on the export of these fish to the Maine factories?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know that, but I would remind my hon. friend, when he asks these questions, that Mr. McLean and Mr. Morrow are both employees of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know that; the minister need not remind me. I am talking about the development of fisheries, and the export trade. I consider this germane to the point. I do not wish to be held down too tightly, because with me that just breeds opposition. I am willing to be quiescent and helpful, and I think my remarks so far have been fair.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I take what the hon. member says as constructive criticism.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was a ceiling put on the price of sardines in the Passamaquoddy and bay of Fundy areas, and is that ceiling price still on? Secondly, was there any period of time during the present fishing season or the past fishing season, when there was a prohibition on the export of these sardine herrings to the United States? My reason for asking the question is this, that if freedom of export were permitted, the fishermen could get double what they are getting to-day. I have no doubt about that. The demand is so great from both the armed forces of the United States and those of the allied nations, that the man who goes down before daylight to fish and who works hard and long hours—and in some days goes often and catches nothing—is entitled in my opinion to sell those fish where he can get the highest price for them. The season is very short; there is no winter fishing. Most of the plants are closed in the winter season, although I believe some of them do carry on. However, the catch is precarious, and it is a seasonal business.

Has there been to the knowledge of the minister and the officials of his department any situation such as I have inquired about? Was there at any time a ceiling on the price the fishermen might receive for their catch, and is that ceiling still on? If so, when was it established? Then, was there at any time a prohibition on the export of these raw fish to the United States; if so, when, and for what period of time? How long did it last? Was it removed or has it been removed, or is it still there? I should like to have the whole story, and I do not know any other item under which I could ask these questions.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): All of these questions are questions which officials of the wartime prices and trade board could answer. I am not able to answer all the questions. I may say that there is no restriction on the export of sardines to the United States now. Restrictions that existed were removed about eight months ago. I should like to give some explanation about our trade with the United States. In 1942 it was found that the West Indies were in great need of salt fish. They used to get this fish from Norway but that country could not, of course, export any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the West Indies bought from Nova Scotia.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They have not bought from Nova Scotia for some time. The united nations combined food board studied the situation, and the United States agreed to cut its imports of salt fish by fifty per cent in order to allow the exporting nations to send fish to the West Indies. Regulations had to be put into force and import permits were granted by the United States, with export permits being granted by the producing nations. This created a great demand for salt fish and for other fish in the United States because the supply was being cut by fifty per cent. Prices went up. We had to regulate the export of fish to the West Indies by establishing a quota based on 1941. This created a lot of difficulty because exporters wanted to sell their fish where they could get the highest prices. At one time the OPA prices in the United States were as much as seven to eight cents a pound more than ours, although ours were high enough.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no ceiling in the United States.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There was a ceiling then. That ceiling varied according to the season. Since then, prices of fish in the United States have been reduced to about the same level as ours.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are much higher.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Not for salt fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Fresh fish is much higher.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Salt fish was seven or eight cents a pound more, but the price is down now. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has mentioned a floor under the prices of fish products. We are exporting about seventy per cent of our fish, and if we put a floor under the prices we are sure that that floor may not be accepted by the nations taking our fish.

After having discussed the matter with members of the united fishermen's association, we believe that the fisherman must be put in the position where he can produce about twice as much fish. This fish must be sold at a price that will create a market. The fish must be in good condition and there must be a continuity of supply. Those are the three essential things and we are working along these lines in order to help the fishermen. Subsidies are being granted to fishermen for the construction of draggers and long liners which will allow them to catch more fish per man hour than they do to-day. As I explained to the hon. gentleman a few minutes ago, we are going to design unit fishing plants, encourage oyster and clam farming, and conduct further scientific investigations. Experimental work is being carried on along these lines. We do not think we can serve the fishermen by any other method.

Of course we shall have to find markets, and markets will depend upon price and quality. The western fisheries are another matter, and I intend to explain what we are going to do there when we discuss the appropriation of $1,000,000 to cover the development of fisheries on the Fraser and Skeena rivers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is not able to tell me what the sardine situation is on the bay of Fundy?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No, I cannot.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to support the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the hon. junior member for Halifax and other hon. members from Nova Scotia who have spoken on behalf of the fishing industry in that province. Those of us who have knowledge of the fishing industry must admit that it has returned to its workers the poorest reward of any industry in Canada. Fishermen have had to operate under the most difficult conditions and have received the smallest returns. They have had to live under the lowest standard of living of any class in Canada. I have been at a wharf when they were bringing in a catch and the price paid was only fifty cents per 100 pounds for whole fish. That was during the worst period for the industry. I am glad that the returns are higher to-day, although they are not as high as they should be, compared with those of other industries.

I wish to support what the hon. junior member for Halifax said when appealing to the Minister of Fisheries that due consideration be given to this industry. I wonder why the hon. junior member for Halifax does not appeal directly to the minister from Nova Scotia. He might get direct action by appealing through the minister of whom he is the assistant, the Minister of National Defence. In that way this industry might receive the justice and consideration to which it is entitled.

I am particularly interested in the brief that has been referred to, and I am disappointed that the minister has not given a direct answer to the requests made by the United Maritime Fishermen's Association. They have been holding conventions in Amherst in my constituency for some years and I am pleased that the minister was able to attend the last one. They made an appeal to the minister and they have submitted copies of their brief to members from the maritime provinces. The convention was held on November 24 and 25, 1943. I should think in justice to the fishermen of the maritime provinces and to the members of the house the minister, before his estimates pass, should give a statement with respect to the representations made by the United Maritime Fishermens' Association.

Everyone in Nova Scotia is interested in the welfare of the fishermen. I do not represent a constituency directly interested in deep sea fishing, although we are the centre of the lobster industry of the world. As I have said before, the waters between my constituency and that of Prince in Prince Edward Island represented by the Minister of National Defence are the centre of the lobster industry of the world.

In Cumberland the small rivers on the north Cumberland strait have another fishing industry, the smelt industry. There are a number of shallow rivers with winding outlets to the sea. For fifteen or twenty years they were allowed an earlier fishing season than applies to the other places on Northumberland strait. Because these are shoal rivers with outlets winding through sand banks these rivers fill with ice in early winter and the fishermen are not able to make their catch as fishermen can in deeper waters. Therefore, they were granted an earlier season, and it closed earlier. As a matter of fact, it closed automatically because they were not able to fish. Some years they are at a much greater disadvantage than in others, because the winter season sets in earlier, and ice conditions develop and they are not able to fish.

This change of season was made without consultation and without the consent of anybody engaged in fishing in these waters. They had made their plans to do their fishing as in previous years and had made arrangements for marketing their catch, and then the season was changed. I can understand the desire of the department, other things being equal, to have a uniform season; but in view of the fact that those who had studied the situation for that section had granted an earlier season and that it had been in effect for many years, it seems a great hardship to the smelt fishermen in that area that the earlier season has been denied them in the last few years. They have petitioned the department, and I have communicated with the department with respect to their request asking that the old season be restored. I wish to bring this matter to the attention of the minister again and to ask him to review the situation and see if the department cannot again restore the season for smelt fishing in that section.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I understand that there has been a controversy for many years as to when the season for smelt should open. If it is opened too soon when the weather is still warm the smelt are not preserved. The date was fixed later than the hon. gentleman would like principally because of that very fact.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The fishermen themselves should be the best judge of that. They surely would not want to catch fish if they could not preserve their product. It is not a large output, and to a man they want the old season restored.

Mr. NEILL: I just wish to ask for a little information, and I will not stray away from the item before us, Mr. Chairman. It is for the development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish. On page 82 of the estimates the details are given. It says that there are two demonstrators and lecturers at $2,400 each. I should like to know what they demonstrate what they lecture about, and to whom they lecture and demonstrate, and where. I do not mean the name of each little hamlet or town or village in which they demonstrate or lecture, but do they do it in country places or in the cities, telling housewives how to prepare fish for lunch? Where do they do the demonstrating and in what provinces? Then, underneath that it says that $8,840 is required for temporary assistance. That is nearly double what the demonstrators and lecturers are getting. Then wages amount to $1,560.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If my hon. friend will pardon me, there is nothing for temporary assistance this year. The $8,840 was for last year.

Mr. NEILL: I was looking at the wrong book. Apparently there is nothing for temporary assistance this year. But there is $1,560 for wages.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And there is an item for sundries.

Mr. NEILL: I am coming to that in a moment. The next item is cost of living bonus and other pay-list items, $400. That is something along the same line. Then there is an item of $5,000 for printing and stationery. You can get a lot of printing done for $5,000. May I ask the minister—I am not attacking this item, I am merely asking for information because I wondered what this was for—what is the nature of the printing done and to whom is it distributed? Then there is an item for sundries, $13,780. That has gone up about $3,000 since last year. That amounts to about thirty-two per cent of the total vote. When you ask your wife to keep bookkeeping accounts her biggest entry is under sundries because she does not know how else to make the books balance. This amount of $13,780 does seem large in proportion to the total vote. The minister will no doubt be able to explain it.

One other thing. As I said, this vote is for the development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish. I would call to the attention of my hon. friends to my left and of the minister that the deep sea fisheries of Canada extend to more than one coast. There is a place called the Pacific ocean, where there are deep sea fisheries which need extending. How much of this is to be spent on the Pacific coast? Is any portion of it? If not, why not? If the minister will answer these simple questions I shall at least be satisfied for to-night.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The main purpose of the demonstrators and lecturers is to demonstrate and supply information and literature on fisheries, also to provide departmental advertising in magazines and fisheries journals. There are also a number of small miscellaneous services for the development of deep sea fisheries. The demonstrators go almost everywhere in Canada, meeting women's circles and explaining to them how to cook fish properly and make it as palatable as possible.

Mr. NEILL: Are they ladies?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes; they are expert dietitians. The sundries item includes departmental advertising in fisheries periodicals and magazines. The item of $5,000 for printing is not very large. There is also provision of $2,000 for establishing an experimental kitchen for demonstrating; subsidies to freezers, $4,100; equipment and supplies for demonstrator, $1,200, and enforcing, $1,480. This amount has been reduced this year by $10,000 because, as I explained the day before yesterday, we have transferred the inspection department to item 70, which has been passed.

Mr. NEILL: The inspection department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Instruction, I should have said. Since the war we have cut this amount considerably because we do not need to develop the demand for fish to too great an extent for the reason that we have not a supply equal to that demand. As to deep sea fisheries development, I do not think the name is a proper one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree entirely; it is a misnomer.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Hon. members may rest assured that next year it will not be cited in that way, because it raises a good many questions.

Mr. NEILL: Am I to understand that none of this has been spent on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There is some in the magazines for advertising, and in the cook books and so forth, but on the Pacific coast the situation is not the same as it is on the eastern coast.

Mr. NEILL: God forbid.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I beg your pardon?

Mr. NEILL: God forbid that it should be.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): According to what the hon. member has heard, perhaps, God forbid that it should be; but the demand for help is not so acute there, or when the help is required it is for an amount much larger than these amounts.

Mr. NEILL: Well, the minister manages to conceal it pretty well, because it is not in this item. I wonder that members from Nova Scotia do not blush.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): These demonstrators demonstrate how to use western fish in the great centres like Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, so that the Pacific coast fishermen get some benefit out of it too.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. NEILL: I will let it drop and I will not say a word to-night about the $160,000 of which they annually rob British Columbia of our share.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Keep your hands off that; that belongs to us.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am not satisfied to allow this item to pass without a statement from the minister with reference to the brief submitted by the united marine fishermen. The hon. member for York-Sunbury, the hon. junior member for Halifax, and other members have brought this matter to the minister's attention. This brief arises out of the annual convention of the united maritime fishermen, held at Amherst, Nova Scotia, on November 24 and 25, 1943. I will quote from the covering letter:

> The committee prepared a questionnaire containing thirty-four (34) questions dealing with production, equipment, shore facilities, marketing, transportation, finance, organization and education. These questionnaires were sent to all organized groups of fishermen in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well as to many individual producers. The large number of forms returned is indicative of the interest the fishermen are taking in present day as well as post-war planning for their industry. Information was also obtained from leaders, officials, government statistics and royal commission reports on the inshore fisheries. From this information thus obtained the attached brief was prepared.

I think it is only fair to the members of this house and especially the members from the maritimes that a statement be made by the minister at this time as to what he will do with respect to this brief. Is he approving the representations made in it? If not, why not? If he is approving a part of them, then let him tell us about it. If some of the representations are under consideration and he wants to have more time, then let him tell us. Certainly we are entitled to some statement from him before the item passes.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have studied the brief to see what we can do. The hon. member was speaking about education. We have a vote of $50,000 which will come on later, and out of that there is $37,000 spent in the maritimes, through the St. Francis Xavier extension department. We are paying subsidies in connection with a new kind of boat, $165 per gross ton, and we are having our laboratories in Halifax and St. Andrews by the Sea develop the fishing industry. We are building mechanical driers to replace the old method of drying fish, and generally we are doing all we can to help the fishermen in the maritimes. If the maritime fishermen want to follow the advice of the department I am sure their lot will be far better in the future, because we believe that the reason why the fisheries have been lagging in the maritimes is that they were fishing with old boats, not getting enough fish and not landing their fish as fresh as they should have been, so that they could not reach the markets in proper condition. Fish is a product that must not be mediocre; it has to be absolutely right or the consumer will not accept it. We are helping the fishermen in that way. If four or five or six fishermen desire to get together and build a dragger, for instance, I am sure they can land twice as much fish as they have been landing by means of the old boats they have. We have built a long liner which is called the J. J. Cowie. It has made six trips and the results have been very good.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that a steam trawler?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, a long liner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the difference between a steam trawler and a long liner?

Mr. KINLEY: It is simply that they do not like the name.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not smell very sweet.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It brings a lot of fish to the wharf.

Mr. KINLEY: How much?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Six million pounds in one case, but I was talking about the long liner at the present moment. We have built that long liner in accordance with the specifications of boats which are fishing in the Aleutian waters. We have a very good captain from the west who has got a crew together and he is at present on the sea. He is an eastern man with western experience. I have here the figures. The first trip of course, generally speaking, is not as good as when the gear is in proper shape. The first trip was made between April 8 and April 25; they landed 38,465 pounds of fish valued at $2,456, and the members of the crew received $201.58 each. The second trip was from May 3 to May 13 and they landed a value of $1,450.30. The third trip brought 11,834 pounds and they were out for seven days. I may say that this boat is making trials on all banks which are reputed to be good. They are making trials of them all. They are making trial trips.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Exploration of the banks.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. The revenue from fish caught between the period May 21 of this year to June 21 has not been submitted to the department, but up to June 21 the Cowie had caught 81,500 pounds.

Mr. KINLEY: A Lunenburg schooner would catch that in three days.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Just a moment; and 51,400 pounds of halibut. The gross value of the total catch would be approximately $8,158. We know that with this boat the fishermen would be able to fish the year round. They would be able to land a lot more fish than they are landing to-day with the boats they have, and we would have a continuity of supply. If we have a continuity of supply of good fish, better fish than we used to have, in the big centres, there is no doubt that we can increase the amount of fish consumed, which is to-day about ten pounds per person. We could increase that to fifteen pounds. That would bring about $10,000,000 more to the fishermen. These are some of the things we have done and intend to do.

I said a while ago that our engineers are now in the field working with the officials of Nova Scotia trying to make plans to build what we are going to call unit fishing plants. They will be refrigerating plants, and with other ways of processing fish along with the experience gained in the province of Quebec we are going to do something better than has been done there. We shall have an item in the supplementary estimates for that. That is what we are doing, and that is more important than doing small things here and there. With regard to the removal of the duty on nets and so forth, I intend to recommend that to council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they not pretty largely free now?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Some of them are, but I am going to recommend that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all very interesting, but is the minister now advocating a policy which has been the subject of great debate in Nova Scotia over a long period of time? If I gathered the minister's statement correctly his department is now advocating a return to the mechanical trawler; call it the long-line fisheries or the beam trawler, if you will, but a rose by any other name would smell as sweet to the shore fishermen of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Long-line is different from the trawler or the dragger.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; there is no doubt about the impression that the minister has left on my mind at all events as to the new departure in policy on the part of the department. I say to him that it has a good many features to commend itself, but I ask him if he would make that statement in Nova Scotia on the eve of an election? Is it the considered policy of the department that the propagation of the beam trawler should have the support and blessing of the department? The establishment of a sample trawler, the J. J. Cowie, owned by the department is itself a new departure in policy on the part of the department. I think we ought to know if the department, without having announced it, is now committed to the policy of the beam trawler. I should like a specific declaration from the minister, because whether he calls it a beam trawler or any other name it means the same thing. Is it now the policy of the fisheries department to advocate the use and operation by Nova Scotia fishermen of this mechanical type of fishing boat in order that there may be more production? That is the ground upon which the minister makes his statement. He referred also to continuity of production. I agree that these are important elements. I agree that it is necessary that fish should be landed in a proper condition before transportation because transportation to the central markets of Canada is long. I agree with continuity of supplies so that the dealers in the various centres and the housewives should know with some degree of certainty whether they can rely on an adequate supply of fish from week to week or day to day as the case may be. The minister having made his statement, I think the time has arrived when there must be a statement of government policy on this important matter. I shall continue to press for it until I get an answer affirmatively or negatively before this item passes.

Mr. HILL: My county is very much interested not in the deep sea fishing but in deep sea fish that are caught in inland waters. The minister brought up a point which I think is most important, namely, that these fish should be kept in proper shape for marketing. What plans has the department for establishing cold storage plants in which these fresh fish could be kept fresh until it is possible to place them on the Canadian market? At the present time in my county the only possible market for fish is the United States market. They are transported by truck because the nearest cold storage plant is fifty miles away in the city of Saint John. What has the department in the way of plans for cold storage plants along the coast so that the fish caught in the bay of Fundy and New Brunswick waters can be kept in cold storage until such time as they are marketed?

In addition to that I wish to point out that unless a floor price is put under fish and maintained after the war we shall go back to the same very bad conditions we had during the thirties, when fish dropped as low as forty cents a hundred pounds for the very finest type of fish, haddock, cod and pollock. That is less than half a cent a pound. The price remained there for several years and the condition of fishermen in my county became deplorable. Their boats were absolutely worn out. They did not have sufficient funds on which to live, let alone repair their boats and their gear was entirely gone by the time four or five years of these conditions had gone by. It was not because there was not sufficient market for the fish; it was because the buyers took advantage of the conditions to force the fishermen to sell their fish at a ridiculous price. This low price at which the fish were purchased did not give the fish to the consumer at a lower price, because in the city of Montreal they still had to pay twenty-five or thirty cents a pound for the fresh fish at a time they were selling at half a cent a pound to the producers. The only protection that I know the fishermen can possibly have against exploitation by the buyers is for the government to step in and set a floor price under the fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want a declaration of policy from the minister with respect to the use of mechanical fishing boats. I want to know what he is going to do with this brief of the maritime fishermen's union to which attention was drawn by the hon. junior member for Halifax.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not believe these matters come under this item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that this has to do with deep sea fishing.

Mr. KINLEY: I agree, Mr. Chairman, but the minister himself introduced the dragger into the discussion, and I want to say something about this matter. We have an item here that has to do with deep sea fisheries. I think that is a misnomer, and the minister agrees. I wanted to say something about these experiments; I thought that would be out of order, but the minister interjected it and it seems to me we shall have to go on with the discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the ruling is that we cannot go on with the discussion under this item, then I want to know where and when we can go on with it, because I propose to get a declaration of policy from the minister.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I have no objection whatever to going into the matter now, although I suppose we should have gone into it under the war appropriation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We did not know about these experiments then.

Mr. KINLEY: I think I know something about it. The long liner was built in my riding. It is a medium size fishing boat built for the purpose of experimenting with long-line fishing, a system which is followed on the Pacific coast. If successful, it would be an innovation, and might be useful to some of our fishermen. According to the information given by the minister, however, I should say this boat is about half as efficient as the schooners there, but this is a good time to experiment. This boat uses a long line and has machinery for casting the line out and drawing it in. It is a rather expensive boat for a few fishermen to buy, but at the same time I am in favour of this experimentation with the long liners.

Mr. REID: What do those boats cost?

Mr. KINLEY: About $60,000, I think, though I am not speaking with full knowledge.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This boat could be built easily for $35,000 to $40,000.

Mr. KINLEY: In peace time.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We do not expect that costs are always going to remain what they are to-day. We now have trouble getting boats built. This boat should have been at sea five or six months ago, but it took that much longer to finish it.

Mr. KINLEY: I am not quarreling about the price, but I think that is about what it cost ready for sea.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister should be able to state the cost.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That boat cost the department a little over $40,000.

Mr. KINLEY: With machinery, fully equipped and ready for sea?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: Everything?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, I would not dispute that figure; I am glad to get it, because the impression on the coast is that the cost was $60,000, and some people thought that figure was excessive. I am glad to hear the minister say that the cost was $40,000, ready for sea.

Mr. REID: How many men does the boat carry?

Mr. KINLEY: Six or seven, I think; I am not sure.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Six men.

Mr. GILLIS: If I am permitted to break into this three-man debate I should like to say that after sitting here for the last two hours listening to this discussion one would be led to believe that the problem of the fishermen is something new in Canada. The funny thing about it is that practically every hon. member who has spoken on the matter at one time or another has been in a position to remedy the situation. I am not going to agree or disagree with anyone who has spoken. I am in accord with those who have suggested parity prices and a floor under the commodity the fisherman sells. I listened to the minister outline what he considered to be a policy. As far as I am concerned I do not think there is a policy now any more than there has been for the last thirty years. Some experimentation is being carried on because of the war, but the fishermen have been experimented upon and with by private fish buyers across the country for the past fifty years at least. That has been the problem of the fishermen. They are in the hands of the people who market their commodity, who are concerned only with themselves and what they can get out of it. That is the situation.

In the maritime provinces approximately forty thousand men depend upon the fishing industry. To-day many of them are in the service, in either the navy, the army, or somewhere else where they receive a livelihood. In 1939 the average income of a fisherman was around $240 for the year, out of which he had to purchase his nets and all the other necessary equipment. That was not an industry at all; it was a relief measure, and that situation existed throughout the industry in the maritimes, in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The minister says that this boat of which he has spoken cost only $40,000. At $240 a year it would take a fisherman a long time to save enough money to buy that boat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or a share in it.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, or a share in it.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): With what he is getting now it would not take so very long.

Mr. GILLIS: In my opinion that boat was designed to keep him in the hands of the fish companies, because neither now nor in the near future will any fisherman be in a position to undertake to purchase one of these boats. That can be done only by an organized company exploiting the industry, so that there is no solution here to the problem of these fishermen.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If I may say a word, the orders in council that have been passed, of which I think the hon. gentleman obtained copies, provide that these boats can be built only by a group of fishermen numbering four or more. The subsidy is $165 per gross ton, which is more than half the cost of construction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the tonnage of this boat?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is sixty feet long.

Mr. KINLEY: It is about eighty tons.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I will give the tonnage in a moment.

Mr. GILLIS: I was coming to that. I appreciate what the minister has said, that it would be possible to organize the fishermen on a cooperative basis to take advantage of that offer, and I was leading up to that. But the point on which I should like to focus the attention of the minister is this matter of cold storage facilities. That is one of the big problems of the fishermen in the maritimes. We have perhaps two thousand miles of coastline, in which there are not more than a dozen places where there are facilities for the freezing and handling of fish, or the providing of bait, through cold storage. The facilities in that connection are completely inadequate. What is the solution of this problem of bait? I think the men engaged in the industry should be qualified to speak. One hon. member mentioned the programme for rehabilitating the maritime fisheries in the post-war period. These men are realistic about the matter, but this is one industry in the whole field of reconstruction in connection with which I do not believe any recommendations have been made. Many of the boys who left that industry are coming back from the services, and at page 5 of the brief they have something to say on the matter of cold storage facilities, as follows:

> Quite obviously the setting up of a modern freezing and coldstorage plant is beyond the resources of any ordinary group of fishermen. That being so, we contend that it is the function of the state to provide these facilities for the people and to operate them under a board or commission as a state-owned public utility. The setting up of facilities of this kind which are essential for the proper development of a great industry, and for the welfare of thousands of our best citizens, is as much the responsibility of the state as it is to build and operate railways, electric power plants and similar projects. The subsidizing of cold storage plants controlled by private enterprise has proved most unsatisfactory in the past and will not serve the purpose in mind. Accordingly we urge that the government formulate a freezer and cold storage policy for the fishery under which a chain of freezers will be established at strategic points and operated as a state-owned public utility. It is suggested that such plants would charge the prevailing freezing and storage rates to those using them, but that service to the fishermen rather than profit be the ultimate objective.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is exactly what I said. Our engineers are in the field to-day.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the recommendation made. If the minister tells the committee that that is the government's policy, as requested in the brief, then I am quite satisfied. I am glad to hear the minister say that, because in no other way are cold storage facilities going to be made available along that long coastline.

Another recommendation made in the brief should be given consideration. This appears at page 6, and refers to the educational opportunities of those engaged in the industry. This is the paragraph appearing in the brief:

> Progress cannot be made in the fishery any more than in any other branch of endeavour unless those engaged in it are intelligent and well informed. Statistics indicate that there is a greater proportion of illiteracy in the fishing areas than in other sections of the country. In one of the fishing counties in Nova Scotia, according to the 1931 census, 14 per cent of the population above school-going age were totally illiterate. The cause of this situation should be removed, an effort made to stimulate a greater interest in the school, and the necessary steps taken to give the youth at least the common school fundamentals.

I would say in that regard that I agree with the statement made in the brief. In connection with rehabilitation, so far as the fishing industry is concerned, I believe there is in the estimates a grant which has been passed in the past few years. Reference was made to that to-night by the minister. I believe there is an amount of $37,000 which goes to the cooperatives in the maritime provinces for educational purposes among fishermen. I believe that grant is filling a greater need in the maritime provinces, among the fishermen, than any other expenditure made by the government.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I agree.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no doubt about that. If in the post-war period there is money available for the purpose of the rehabilitation of the fishing industry, I believe that group of people who went out, on their own, and undertook the responsibility of educating the fishermen as best they could, in groups and study clubs, concerning the processing of fish, and also gave elementary education to some extent, should be used after the war to do this work. They have the interests of the fishermen at heart. They work with them and for them. Right along the shoreline a group has been developed, among the fishermen themselves. This group is most capable, in respect of both marketing and processing, and every endeavour connected with the fisheries. In my view that is the group which will solve the problems of the fishermen of the maritimes in the post-war period.

As has been pointed out in the brief, a great percentage of this good work begins with the children of the fishermen, by giving them the necessary educational opportunities, so that they may know something about their industry when they are ready to play their part in it. In my opinion that grant to the cooperatives in the field of education should be increased a thousandfold in the period of reconstruction after the war.

With respect to the use of trawlers, may I say I am not technically qualified to speak with authority on the subject. This has been a subject of controversy in Canada for some considerable time, as is indicated from a reading of the debates of the last parliament in which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenberg and one of the members from Halifax took part. There was a wide difference of opinion between those two members.

The writers of the brief, however, who should know something about the matter, have made a recommendation. This is what we find at page 7:

> The royal commission investigating the fishery of the maritime provinces in 1928, as well as the Nova Scotia royal commission of economic inquiry, 1934, and the royal commission on price spreads, 1935, were unanimous in their advocacy of cooperative organization among the fishermen. Much progress has been made in the development of cooperative processing and marketing organizations and in the setting up of credit unions. To the extent that these organizations are increasing in numbers and in usefulness there is hope and confidence developing among fishermen. This movement should be encouraged and fostered for it is only by acquiring ownership and control of their own business through cooperative organizations that they can play their full part as good citizens of Canada.

They go on to point out with respect to beam trawlers, after careful inquiry:

> Clearly, then, the unrestricted use of trawlers is inimical to the interests of the inshore fishermen, and on behalf of its members this association must continue its opposition to them.

They are definite and emphatic. They preface this statement with many reasons why the trawler should be discouraged.

I am not going to continue the discussion, because I know the minister wishes to have the item passed. I wish, however, to focus attention on the fact that the whole discussion here to-night is merely another indication of the failure of private enterprise in Canada in one of our basic industries. That is the sum and substance of the discussion, as I have heard it. The solution is ownership by the people themselves. That is advocated in this brief, referred to by practically every hon. member who has spoken on the subject to-night. The full utilization of the educational facilities provided by the cooperative workers among the maritime fishermen, along the lines suggested by the brief, is necessary to the problems faced by the fishermen in the maritime provinces. Otherwise, so far as I am concerned, there is no solution.

Mr. KINLEY: Apropos of what the hon. member has said I think I must object to any suggestion that private enterprise in my section of the country has failed, in respect of the fisheries. I do not call it private enterprise; I call it free enterprise. I might even go farther and say that cooperative enterprise as between capital and labour has been the way the fisheries of Lunenburg have been conducted for the last half century. I say, too, that Lunenburg is the greatest commercial fishing centre in Canada, so far as the deep sea fishing industry is concerned.

These companies are not so bad. I have a statement before me respecting one of the big fish companies of Nova Scotia in Halifax. According to their annual statement last year they had an operating profit of—

Mr. REID: Prince Rupert is away ahead as a fishing centre; keep the record straight.

Mr. KINLEY: This is one of the largest fishing companies in Nova Scotia. Last year they had an operating profit of $671,687.89. They put away for reserves for depreciation on plant and vessels, $54,961.68. After deducting salaries for executive officers and directors' remuneration, they had $616,726.21, and income and excess profits taxes of $526,025.59. It seems to me that when a company contributes over half a million dollars to excess profits and income taxes in war time it would appear to be a successful company.

Mr. GILLIS: What did the man who caught the fish get out of it?

Mr. KINLEY: I will come to that. I want first to deal with the brief of the united maritime fishermen. With regard to the trawler, they say:

> This association is unalterably opposed to unrestricted operation of otter trawlers or draggers. Trawlers and draggers are designed solely for the catching of ground fish such as cod, haddock, rosefish and flounders. It is incapable of capturing any other variety. If all our fishermen, or even a substantial portion of them, were deep sea fishermen and interested only in the production of groundfish it is conceivable that the industry could, without much disruption, be trawlerized. But with eighty-seven per cent of our fishermen engaged in a diversified form of fishing which includes in addition to cod and haddock the production of lobsters, mackerel, herring and a score of other varieties not producible by trawlers this instrument is utterly impracticable.

And again:

Clearly then the unrestricted use of trawlers is inimical to the interests of the inshore fishermen, and on behalf of its members this association must continue its opposition to them.

Lest the charge be made that we are unprogressive, may we call attention to the fact that in the past fifteen years the fishery of the maritime provinces has been a subject of inquiry of three royal commissions namely the royal commission on fisheries 1928, the royal commission on price spreads 1935, and the royal commission of economic inquiry Nova Scotia 1934. All three commissions recommended against the trawler.

The minister has stated that he is subsidizing draggers by order in council. I first objected to the order in council, because the preamble designates a dragger as a small vessel and then in the body it says that she may be as large as the minister may decide. I objected to that, because we are subsidizing the latest type of trawlers and they are now being built in Nova Scotia.

For years I have been concerned about the employment of our fishermen, and I did not think they could get full employment if we permit trawlers to supplant the fishing schooner and the other boats of the fisheries. Three fishing schooners will catch as much as a trawler and the charge that they will not land the fish in as good condition is unfounded. The whole economy of the fisheries and other allied industries in Nova Scotia has been built up on the use of schooners. They have been the best producers of fish; they have been successful and are paying large amounts to this government in the form of income taxes.

The people in my county are not scared of the trawler, because they have been in the forefront of the fishing business. But they do object to being subsidized out of business. This subsidy is being paid to draggers and long liners, and the fishing schooner, which has been doing this work for twenty, thirty or even fifty years, is to be subsidized out of business by the payment of $165 per ton to another type of vessel.

I object to discrimination. As the member for Lunenburg, as a member representing fishermen, I cannot be expected to support anything which would discriminate against the fishing industry in the part of the country I represent. I realize that much of this subsidy money will come to my riding since two of these vessels are to operate there. If we have reached the stage where we must experiment, if we must try out these vessels, let it be done, but let us carry on and let it be a free field without favour. I am going to be fair with the minister and tell the committee that I went to him and said that I would not stand for this. I thought I had his promise of equitable treatment and he did give us depreciation for fishing schooners for one, two or five years. The order in council provides that the subsidy paid will be substracted from the cost when depreciation is received. If we are successful in our fishing the schooner will be in a good position and I thank the minister for that.

Mr. REID: Does that apply to the other boat?

Mr. KINLEY: That applies to the other boat except that it will get $165 subsidy. While in the long run you are just as well off with your depreciation as you would be if you got the subsidy, the fact is that when you sell your boat you get the subsidy if it has been paid, whereas in the other case you must adjust the depreciation to the age of the boat according to ordinary depreciation rates. I do not blame the minister because I think he was sympathetic. However, I think he met difficulty. My people have been in the forefront of the fishing industry for nearly a hundred years. The county of Lunenburg did not come to the government for relief during the depression. They carried on their industry successfully, and I strongly object to discrimination being shown against a fishing fleet which has been such a success in producing the wealth and the culture that is to be found in my county. After trying as much as possible to get this matter adjusted, I think the time has come for me to say that I think we have been given only part of what we should have received.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to have a statement from the minister.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This is all out of order as far as the item is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister agreed to take it up now.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Perhaps it would be just as well to go on. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has spoken about the brief and I agree completely with a lot of what he said. I am absolutely in favour of cooperatives. Year after year the department has been providing certain amounts for the education of adult fishermen and these men have organized cooperatives in many places. I do not want to give the number of cooperatives because I might be wrong, but there is a large number. They have also organized credit unions. It is a very good policy that we intend to follow, and there is no doubt that after the war a larger amount should be granted for the purpose of helping the fishermen in that way.

As to the long liners, it is a boat similar to the boats used in the west for fishing for halibut. There is a long line, 300 fathoms long, which is set mechanically in the water, with hooks on it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A long trawl.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is a long line. It has not a pocket-net like the dragger.

The schooners which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg speaks of have been very good boats and are still good fishing boats for salt fish at certain times of the year. They carry dories manned by two of the crew, and they are left on the sea fishing, while the mother ship goes elsewhere, perhaps seven to fourteen dories, according to the size of the ship. The hon. member knows very well that to-day it is very difficult to get fishermen for these dories because it is very hard work. The consequence has been that the boats have been diminishing in numbers since long before the war. I have the figures here. In 1920 there were 146 of these schooners, up to forty tons and over; in 1925, ninety-nine; in 1930, eighty-three; in 1935, fifty-three; in 1940, forty-nine; and in 1942, forty-four. Then of vessels between twenty and forty tons, and these are also schooners, there were in 1920, eighty-eight, and the numbers varied in the following years from seventy-one to seventy-three, eighty, eighty-five and seventy-seven.

Smaller boats between ten and twenty tons are not considered schooners, and their numbers have increased.

Now as to the number of fishermen, the number of fishermen, including those on the small boats, was in 1920, 5,568; in 1925, 4,473; in 1930, 3,948; in 1935, 3,526; in 1940, 4,112, and in 1942, 3,757. Those figures include the smaller boats between ten and twenty tons, the number of which rose to 750 in 1942. So that the schooners have been going down in numbers and the men employed have also been going down in numbers.

There is another aspect. These vessels have been obliged more and more to use Newfoundlanders.

Mr. KINLEY: What is wrong with that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Will you please allow me to answer? There are certain circumstances that the hon. member did not mention. In 1926 the estimated crews numbered 1,840 men; in 1927, 1,660; and then it goes down to 320 in 1943, when sixteen vessels were operating. In that year there were 183 residents of Newfoundland among the fishermen, or fifty-seven per cent. I have here figures of the fish landed at Lunenburg and Halifax by vessels. Take first the Fairmose, which is the best boat according to this return. It landed 3,596,395 pounds of fish at Lunenburg on twenty-eight trips, or an average of 128,448 pounds per trip, and the vessel worked for forty-eight weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a good record.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A very good record. I have also figures for the draggers. The Cape Agulhas in 1941 landed 6,059,400 pounds.

Mr. KINLEY: She is a beam trawler.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is the same principle. It landed 6,059,400 pounds in forty-eight trips, or almost double the amount landed by the Fairmose. The average days per trip were 7·6, which means that the vessel was out for almost fifty-two weeks in the year.

Mr. KINLEY: What did that boat cost?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It carries a smaller crew. There is one more man in the Fairmose. The trawler crew is twenty men and the schooner carries between fourteen and twenty-eight men. The Fairmose is a big boat and would have a crew of about twenty-eight.

Mr. KINLEY: About twenty-seven.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It might cost more, but it has been landing a great amount of fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all under charter, as a matter of fact, from the other side.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are also granting a certain amount of subsidy for these boats. But we found that in the east nobody was using the subsidy, and the fishermen have accordingly asked us to reduce our requirements as to the size of the boat. We had specified a minimum length of seventy-two feet. Now they ask us to reduce that to fifty-five feet to allow groups of fishermen to get together and build a dragger, which works on the same principle as the long liner, to a length of fifty-five feet or more, and that we grant the same subsidy. There are two applications before us now. One boat was started before the order in council was passed. These draggers are well known in the United States. A lot of them go fishing on the Grand Banks, and we feel that we should have our share of the fish caught by this method. They have also draggers on the west coast, where they are very successful, so much so that we shall have to come to an agreement with the United States probably to limit the number of fish caught.

The brief presented to us by the united fishermen says that they do not want the unrestricted use of trawlers, meaning that they do not want the trawlers to fish anywhere. We are going to see, through the system of granting a licence, that the trawlers fish far away from the shore.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They never fished inshore.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They will have to fish at a certain distance from the shore which has not been defined because we have not yet granted any licences. We feel that these two kinds of boats, the dragger and the long liner, in which the fishermen can work more easily than in the dories, and furnish the purchaser with a continuous supply of fish, are going to be of great importance. That is the view of a good many fishermen. If they do not like the draggers they can go in long liners. The hon. member has been arguing in favour of the schooner, but we know that while the schooner is good, it cannot compete with the others because it cannot fish at any time of the year.

Mr. KINLEY: One fished for forty-eight weeks.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): One did fish for forty-eight weeks, but there are thirty here and I see that some of them fished twenty-seven, twenty-four, fifty-one, twenty-four, forty-two, twenty, fifty weeks and three weeks.

Mr. KINLEY: These boats are carrying their own fish to the West Indies and they could not get transportation. Furthermore, they have been induced by the wartime shipping board to carry produce from the United States to the Caribbean sea ports, so that they are in other war business at the moment.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But during the winter season, when the weather is rough on the banks, you see trawlers and draggers from the United States which are fishing and you hardly see any schooners, according to our reports.

Mr. KINLEY: Suppose I admit that for the purpose of argument only.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am not through; I wish to finish. The hon. member said that the schooner is a profitable boat and that is true. Everyone knows that the shares are divided into sixty-four, and gentlemen may buy a share at $300 or $500—I do not know—and it brings a very large return to the shareholders. That is true; but it does not bring as large a return to the fishermen as the long liner will bring.

Mr. KINLEY: I hope that what the minister says is true.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The reason is that the latter will land much more fish so that the fisherman's share will be larger.

Mr. KINLEY: Suppose for the sake of argument we admit that the other is a superior machine—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, let us try it.

Mr. KINLEY: —why then does the minister want to subsidize our people out of business? It seems to me that by giving a subsidy to the long liner and the beam trawler he is admitting that they cannot survive without that assistance. For years I have heard about the efficiency of the beam trawler, and here, when we find fishing at its most profitable in the history of the industry, we have to subsidize with government money the building of beam trawlers. The minister says that the fishermen do not do so well in the fishing schooners. Well, let me tell him that the fishermen in Lunenburg do better in the fishing schooner there than fishermen in any other type of fishing vessels in the maritimes. As regards the beam trawlers, the minister will find that the men on them are not Canadians but many are Icelanders and Newfoundlanders, and they are good men. To argue that our fishing schooners should be out of business by reason of the fact that Newfoundlanders are coming to Nova Scotia to fish does not appeal to my reasoning. Let me tell the minister that many of the Lunenburg fishermen are to-day in the army, the navy, the air force and the merchant navy, the result being that we are denuded of men on the shores of Nova Scotia. The reason why there is a shortage of labour is that the war-time effort of the people of my county is such that there is bound to be a shortage, and he gives shortage of labour as his reason for the order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have had an important declaration from the minister, given somewhat reluctantly—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Given very freely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and it is to the effect that it is now the policy of the government to propagate on the Atlantic coast the establishment of mechanical fishing boats and to subsidize them. That never had to be done before. Under the old system the beam trawler was chartered from the other side and put into operation by the fishing companies. It served a useful purpose, but it encouraged the most outstanding opposition on the part of the inshore fishermen that anyone in this house can imagine and that feeling exists to-day. Indeed, the brief referred to by more than one of the members from Nova Scotia, as well as by myself, corroborates entirely the feeling entertained by the fishermen themselves. I am glad to have the minister and the administration on record as having come out into the open—dragged out into the open if you will—with the policy that they are now encouraging the establishment of mechanical trawlers on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That policy was put into effect long ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be very interesting reading in the Halifax Herald to-morrow morning, and I hope the press will get it across to the reading public in Nova Scotia. It will be very interesting reading to the inshore fishermen of Nova Scotia who live on the south shore, those who live in the eastern part of Nova Scotia and on the bay of Fundy and on Cape Breton island. I wonder what the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry) is thinking. What thoughts are going through his mind to-night as he hears this declaration? Was he consulted when that policy was put into effect? Was the hon. junior member for Halifax consulted when that policy was put into effect? Was the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) consulted when that policy was put into effect? Apparently the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) knew something about it; he endeavoured to ameliorate the condition of his fishermen, as it was his duty to do, and he made out a case for his fishing schooners—a good case.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): This is part of the war measures adopted to increase the production of fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not let us sidetrack it with the red herring of the war, a war measure. The fishermen of Nova Scotia know that once the beam trawler and the mechanical fishermen are introduced into the Atlantic fisheries they will be there to stay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): We have had them for years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have been licensed from year to year. There are no more than three to-day. I am not personally condemning the beam trawler, because there are features about it that commend themselves. The minister stated them and I repeated them, but I want to fasten upon the government the declaration of policy made to-night and I will see that it is made public in the province of Nova Scotia. I am satisfied with this night's work.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Would the minister care to comment now on my submission that the same import duty concessions granted in respect of farm implements be extended so as to include articles designed for fish production, curing and processing plants?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. McGARRY: While I agree that in this time of war extraordinary provisions and regulations obtain in the matter of production, yet there seems to be something paradoxical about the whole arrangement. In the first place, I consider that the production of the fishermen in Nova Scotia is one of the most essential requirements for the war effort. Now, the paradox, as I see it, about this incentive to produce, particularly in the matter of fish production, is this. On the one hand they are asked to produce lavishly and generously. On the other hand, when I ask that greater facilities be afforded to them to produce, it does not seem to be a matter of concern to those who are calling out loudly for production. In my constituency we have large cooperative fisheries and individual men who are carrying on the fisheries, but they have to-day no approach to their wharves to land their fish, or any place of security in which to put their boats where they could place them and not be exposed to the hazards of the sea. I have asked the Department of Public Works to make some provision for that. I am protesting against the paradox. A paradox is something that is neutral and negative in its action. In my constituency I have three very important places where the cooperative fishermen have no access to their wharves to land their fish and no secure place in which to put their boats. I know the Minister of Fisheries is vitally concerned with the fishing industry of this country. Would he not help me to prevail upon the Department of Public Works—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I did on two occasions. I would ask the hon. member to get in touch with the Minister of Public Works. I did it on two occasions.

Mr. McGARRY: Would the minister intensify his efforts in behalf of the fishermen of my constituency?

Mr. GRAYDON: He wants you to do better.

Mr. McGARRY: Yes, to do better with regard to the conditions in my constituency. There we have honest, earnest cooperative effort carried on in behalf of war purposes. I ask the minister to do what he can. I wonder if I can incite him to try to impress upon the Department of Public Works to afford proper facilities for the men to carry on their production on at least a minimum scale? If he did that he would have my appreciation and I would extend to him everlasting thanks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to corroborate what the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has said. I saw with my own eyes on a Sunday last summer a situation that I could not believe existed. I am not going to name the place, but the access to the harbour where the fishing boats might lie at safe refuge was absolutely blocked and the wharf was down. While I was there I made inquiry from a prominent resident of the locality, and he told me that although they work in a cooperative society, although they had made representation, I presume through the hon. member, absolutely nothing had been done to reestablish the facilities that were installed there between 1930 and 1935. That situation is intolerable. A very minimum of expense is required to reestablish those facilities. The hon. member is just 100 per cent right when he calls upon the government and the department to recondition the facilities that the fishermen must have if they are to have their boats lie there in safety. The fishermen cannot build those facilities themselves; it must be done by the government as it has always been done. In recent years the difficulty has been that those facilities have been allowed to run into decay and to become destroyed by the action of the elements. I heartily support what the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has said with respect to the absolute neglect of this important public work on the part of the present administration.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PETER FRASER, P.C.

Prime Minister of New Zealand

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

FRIDAY, JUNE 30, 1944

Mr. Fraser was welcomed by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, and Mr. Gordon Graydon, Leader of the Opposition, and thanked by Hon. Thomas Vien, Speaker of the Senate, and Hon. James Allison Glen, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister of Canada): Your Royal Highness, members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: We are delighted to have as a guest of Canada to-day the Right Honourable Peter Fraser, the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

I desire, Mr. Fraser, to extend to you the warmest of welcomes on behalf of the people of Canada; and on this occasion more particularly to welcome you on behalf of all the members of both houses of Canada's parliament, members of all political parties, and, perhaps I should add, one or two who for reasons best known to themselves claim they are not members of any party.

I am sure I may also be allowed to express a word of personal welcome.

During the years of war you and I have shared like responsibilities, and recently have been closely associated in the meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London. I have greatly looked forward to the honour of introducing you, as I did quite recently Mr. Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia, to my fellow parliamentarians. That great pleasure and honour I have to-day.

You will be interested in knowing that Mr. Churchill, who presided over our meetings in London, also spoke from this table to members of our parliament on a visit he paid to Ottawa in December, 1941. Ottawa has also had the honour of a visit from Field Marshal Smuts. That, however, was as long ago as 1930. I regret it has not thus far been possible for the Prime Minister of South Africa to pay us another visit. We shall hope to welcome him at some time in the near future. The welcome will be all the greater should the defeat of our common enemies have been accomplished meanwhile.

This is Mr. Fraser's third visit to Canada during the present war. It is, however, the first time he has been in Ottawa when our parliament was in session. We are delighted that he has consented to address us this afternoon, and I wish to thank him at once for his kindness in so doing. Our interest is redoubled by the knowledge that he has recently visited the battlefront in Italy where fighting men of New Zealand and Canada have been in action side by side.

Before I ask Mr. Fraser to speak to us, I should like to say a few words intended not only for the Prime Minister, but equally for the parliament and people of New Zealand.

When Mr. Fraser visited Canada in the late summer of 1941, the war might well have seemed to his countrymen remote and distant. In miles, no country was farther from the battlefronts than New Zealand. Yet no country had entered more whole-heartedly into the struggle. Early in the war, naval forces of New Zealand had taken a brilliant part in the battle of the River Plate, in which an end was put to the Graf Spee. Soldiers from New Zealand had already covered themselves with honour in the western desert, in Greece, and in Crete. The young airmen of New Zealand, many of whom had been trained in our midst, had already distinguished themselves in the unending battles in the skies. I cannot tell you, Mr. Fraser, how favourable is the impression which the young airmen from New Zealand have made upon us all in the course of their sojourn in Canada.

It will ever be remembered that New Zealand did not wait for the forces of tyranny to approach her shores; that she recognized that freedom threatened anywhere meant freedom theatened everywhere. From the outset, the young men of New Zealand went forth to uphold freedom wherever it was assailed.

When a year later Mr. Fraser visited us a second time, the war in terms of geography was for New Zealand no longer distant and remote. While to Australia the threat of invasion by Japan was more immediate, to New Zealand it was also perióusly close. Despite their great anxiety, the people never faltered. The fighting men of New Zealand—those who were not already serving in European and African theatres—took their place beside their comrades from Australia who were resisting the invader. Together they held him at bay until United States forces were also in the firing line. In turning back the Japanese tide the New Zealanders have played a valiant part.

We are indeed proud to-day to recall that armed forces of Canada and armed forces of New Zealand have throughout the war fought side by side in many parts of the globe. I wish this afternoon to give you, Mr. Fraser, the assurance that this comradeship in arms will continue until, in both hemispheres, the defeat of our common enemies is accomplished. Thereafter the comradeship between our peoples at a time of war will become a partnership, closer than ever, in all that pertains to the arts of peace. Meanwhile, as a further evidence of the community of interest which exists between Canada and New Zealand, there will be tabled to-day, in your parliament and in ours, copies of a mutual aid agreement between Canada and New Zealand which was signed at Ottawa on the eve of your arrival in our country.

May I add how pleased we are that on your present visit you are accompanied by Mrs. Fraser and General Puttick, chief of the general staff, New Zealand forces. To Mrs. Fraser and to General Puttick I would also extend a very cordial welcome. We wish you all, and all of your party, a pleasant sojourn in our capital and a safe return to your homeland. We wish your stay in Canada might have been a little longer. We would ask you to take with you to the people of New Zealand an expression of the admiration of the people of Canada for their outstanding contribution to the war effort of the united nations. We would like you to tell them of the pride Canada feels in the deepened friendship of our two countries. And we should be pleased if you would convey to the members of the armed forces and to all the people of New Zealand our best wishes for the success of their great endeavours.

I shall ask Mr. Graydon, the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the House of Commons, to join me in the welcome being extended to-day on behalf of all members of the parliament of Canada to the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Prime Minister and hon. members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: I deem it a high honour to be granted the privilege of making unanimous the courteous and cordial welcome accorded so fittingly to New Zealand's distinguished Prime Minister on this war-time occasion by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Although that small but mighty island member of the British commonwealth is widely separated by distance from this dominion, no people stand higher in Canadian esteem. No people anywhere are closer to Canadian hearts. The exemplary character and conduct of those fine lads of the Royal New Zealand Air Force while here in training during this war have served to unite more firmly than ever the bonds of friendship between us.

New Zealand has strained her last sinew to lay her all on the altar of liberty. More than one out of every ten of her population will be found making their magnificent contribution in the armed services, while major decorations for gallantry awarded to her valiant fighters exceed in numbers those won by the forces of any other nation of like population in this war. Added to this, she had the distinction and honour of being the first of the Commonwealth powers to range herself at Britain's side when the present world-wide conflict came. On the home front too, her workers, her farmers, her industry and her citizens in general have shown the world, by their high level of war-time production and their personal sacrifices, what total war really means.

Mr. Fraser, we honour you to-day not only as the war-time leader of the New Zealand people and a power in commonwealth affairs, but for what your life and your example have meant to us all. Truly it can be said, as it has been said of many another Scotsman, that you are one more honour graduate of the school of hard knocks and experience who has made good in the broader field of public affairs. Your preparation for the heavier responsibilities involved in national leadership, gained as it was in the ranks of the workers, in the trade union movement and in the field of journalism, gave you a foundation and furnished an inspiration which cannot fail to be of inestimable value.

We in this parliament and country extend to you and Mrs. Fraser a royal welcome to-day. May you both experience a safe and pleasant journey home; and may I suggest that you carry with you the greetings and best wishes of the Canadian people, who join with yours in a fervent prayer that God may speed the day when the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

Mr. Fraser, I join with our Prime Minister to make this nation's welcome unanimous.

Right Hon. PETER FRASER (Prime Minister of New Zealand): Your Royal Highness, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of both houses of parliament: I wish to thank you most sincerely for the welcome you have extended to me, first of all, as the representative of New Zealand. I wish to thank Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Graydon for the all too kind words about myself, and for the friendly and hospitable references to Mrs. Fraser and General Puttick and our other friends who are with me.

I am glad to have this opportunity of speaking under this historic roof, in this home of the representative institutions of the oldest and the largest British dominion. I thank the speakers for their kind references to New Zealand's part in the war effort and the fight for humanity and freedom. But I also know what your country has done. I know its great contribution, and I wish to extend to the government and parliament of Canada my very sincere thanks for their cooperation, and for the help they have invariably extended, when requested by New Zealand, in the form of munitions and other war requirements. We never ask in vain. I echo the sentiments of your Prime Minister when he expressed the hope that this cooperation, trust and good will may extend far beyond the utmost boundaries of the war period and prevail in the future, contributing to the success as well as the friendship of our two peoples.

I wish to express a word of appreciation of the latest instance of that cooperation, comradeship and assistance. The Prime Minister has announced that during the present week New Zealand and Canada have signed a mutual aid agreement. This gives me an opportunity to express appreciation of the mutual aid principles that have been so carefully worked out by the Canadian government. And I think you will join with me, Mr. King, as all others will, in paying tribute also to a great man, the President of the United States. Of course I step aside from politics, both in the United States and Canada; but irrespective of political parties or leanings, we pay a sincere and heartfelt tribute to President Roosevelt, as a true friend of humanity, as the man who evolved the plan under which a most generous contribution was made by a neutral nation to the cause of those of us who were fighting for freedom. History does not record any more generous action on the part of a non-belligerent country toward countries which they knew, were fighting the battle of humanity.

The principles embodied in the mutual aid agreement just signed between Canada and New Zealand are appreciated greatly, because of the clarity with which they state that mutual aid transactions carry with them no hampering post-war financial liability. The agreement is for mutual aid. I stress "mutual aid," because while Canada with its great industry has made a remarkable contribution to the needs of the united nations, and while the agreement will extend aid to the country of which I am privileged to be Prime Minister, New Zealand in turn, wherever and whenever Canada can be helped by the use of our resources, will gladly make them available. She will be proud to reciprocate within the means at her disposal.

This war requires a common effort in which we are all pledged to join, individually and collectively, to the utmost extent in order to achieve victory for all. In that pledge of unremitting effort we in New Zealand, with you in Canada, hope to carry out to the fullest degree the true spirit of mutual aid.

May I mention another important contribution of this country toward the solidarity of the united nations. I refer to the good neighbour policy which has been in effect for so many years with our friends in the United States. If in the whole world there is one example more striking than another of the benefits of such a policy it is to be found in the St. Lawrence river, the great lakes, the long miles of western prairie, on which there is no fort and no gun, and where on both sides of the line there is friendship and cooperation. That example of two great countries on the North American continent, with the understanding which in the past has been established between them, has stood us in good stead in our hour of trial, and its influence has extended to all the united nations. Canada has given the lead.

I am not going into details with respect to your war effort. You know about that. The fact that 800,000 men and women have been enrolled in the forces, and the further fact that 2,000,000 persons are taking part in the industrial war effort of this country, are sufficiently eloquent and convincing testimony as to the whole-hearted way in which Canada has thrown itself, without reserve, into what it knew was a struggle for the existence of all that is decent in the life of mankind.

Canada, like New Zealand, had no doubt in September, 1939, as to where it would stand. Canada, like New Zealand, like South Africa and Australia, knew that our mother country had gone to the limit—yes, had gone beyond the limit—and had risked dangers in her endeavour to convince people who would not be convinced that the path of righteousness was the path of safety and security for everybody.

Our countries had not piled up arms. They had not invested their capital in huge, hidden forces to be let loose in a flood of destruction upon mankind. Whatever may be said as to the wisdom of policies immediately preceding the war, this at least will be counted to the credit of the United Kingdom and the British commonwealth of nations, that our feet were turned into the paths of peace, and our thoughts were toward benefiting our people rather than dominating and trampling other peoples under foot.

You have fought in every field of action. Your men fought bravely against overwhelming odds at Hong Kong. They took part gallantly and brilliantly in the commando raids, particularly at Dieppe. They took a share, too, in the hazardous and dangerous landings in Sicily and Italy, and the other day they again covered themselves with glory, being among the foremost fighters for freedom in the landings in Normandy.

I am not going to deal with your amazing industrial contribution—and I underline the word "amazing", for the development of your munitions industry, your factories and your shipbuilding is indeed a surprising and gratifying story and something beyond what your most sanguine citizens had a right to expect. I might mention, too, your contribution on the seas, and your help in convoying ships of the united nations, including New Zealand ships carrying New Zealand food. Again, your acceptance and your carrying out of the air training scheme, with all its complexities and perplexities—all these services to our cause have placed the rest of us under a debt of gratitude to your dominion, a debt which we gladly recognize. Canada can say, equally with the United Kingdom and with other countries of the British dominions, that she has given to the limit of her resources. No more can be done.

One word of gratitude for the hospitality extended to our New Zealand boys, of whom such generous recognition was made only a few moments ago. We are very proud of them. I knew we had every right to be proud of them when, the other day, I saw them in our division in Italy, right from the base camps up to the firing line where our Maori battalion, composed of representatives of one of the finest races on earth, was fighting and leading the attack against the enemy at Atina and Sora. I saw that division working; I saw its efficiency, its smoothness, its good spirit. Its spirit was democratic, too, for every officer in that division had come up through the ranks. It has been a most successful experiment in democracy.

It is a splendid fighting division—as no doubt your divisions are also; indeed we know their qualities—but we realize that our divisions to be first class must also be efficient business concerns. There is the feeding of the men, the organization, the huge transport of a modern force; all these require business capacities as well as soldierly qualities. They require efficiency and acumen as well as courage. I was proud to see the New Zealand lads assume their responsibility and carry on so well. I have seen these lads, as no doubt you have seen your own in the army, the air force and the navy, rise to great responsibilities and carry on steadfastly and efficiently.

It is mainly because of the widespread capacity to take advantage of democratic opportunities, educational and otherwise, that our boys have done so well. As was stated by Mr. Mackenzie King, the boys of our army, our air force and our navy have been fighting wherever there is fighting to be done. Our boys were in the desert, in Greece and in Crete. They fought in that terrible fight, which was one of the worst experiences that could be undergone, the battle of Sidi Rezegh. They were there when Rommel was sweeping everything before him to the very gates of Egypt. Our men made a record journey from Syria down to Mersa Matruh. I well remember a letter to me from General Freyberg in which he said he was going up on to the escarpment the next morning, that his division was going up "to meet Rommel head on." They did, and they held on for two days. They held Rommel and his army back and the 8th army was able to re-form at Alamein, part of it in trenches dug by the New Zealanders months before. We are proud of what the New Zealand troops did at Alamein; we are proud of the contribution they made to saving the Middle East. We are proud of their subsequent sweep, along with the rest of the British and Dominion forces, right through to Tunis.

We are glad that to-day New Zealand troops are fighting side by side with your boys in Italy. I saw some of your lads there, and I saw others in the United Kingdom before the invasion. I saw your second-in-command in Italy, General Burns, and I was much impressed by his ability, his grasp of the military situation, just as I was impressed by General Alexander and all those who have contributed to the successes there.

Mr. Mackenzie King will agree with me when I say that a splendid opportunity was afforded to us when we visited the United Kingdom recently and met at the Prime Ministers' conference to study the strategy of the United Nations. He will agree that we saw preparations for the invasion that exceeded anything we ever dreamed of. The advance already made has gone beyond my most sanguine anticipation. It was a splendid thing to see Eisenhower and Montgomery, Portal and Tedder, Cunningham and Brooke and all the other United States and British officers working together just as though they had all come from the same country. Never has there been such complete cooperation as in this command, which is destined not only to achieve victory in Normandy but to defeat Germany.

I am not going to prophesy, but things may happen that will bring victory quicker than we anticipate. Be it soon or be it delayed—it cannot be long delayed—victory is certain. We have been told enough of the plans of the combined general staffs to know that after Germany is accounted for, after the Russians come in again with their sweeping advances from the east and our united forces come in from the west; after the people of France rise; after Germany has been swept back into her own territory and then swept out of it—then the general staffs in Washington and London will give to Japan a larger measure of attention than already has been very effectively and efficiently directed to her.

Japan also is being swept back. When the time comes to direct all our forces against her, we expect Mr. Mackenzie King will come down to New Zealand and Australia, along with Mr. Churchill and the other leaders, to see for themselves what has been done there, and help to complete plans for the final blow.

Just a word about the future. We are fighting for great principles, and we can testify that those principles have not been dimmed, nor has the spirit of the people diminished. We hear a lot about Great Britain just now, about the flying bombs, the pilotless planes. We cannot underestimate these, or treat them too lightly. But the people of Britain under this new affliction are standing as they stood at Dunkirk, when their shores were open to invasion, and when the words of Mr. Churchill, ringing out not only through Britain but through the world, raised an echo in every heart that beat for freedom, when he said they would fight on the shores, on the streets, on the hills and in the valleys. That spirit is still there. After four and a half—it is getting on to five years of war, the British people are still unflinching. That can be said of all of them from their Majesties the King and Queen, who have stood constantly in the forefront in a manner which has shown that they are truly associated with their people, right down through all walks of life. That spirit is still unbroken, still undimmed; it is destined to endure. The British people feel as they did when their armies were miraculously delivered from France. They will be able to face up equally well to any new inflictions. Even if many may be killed, even if many may be injured, even if many homes may be destroyed, there is no trembling, no going back. There is nothing but courage unsurpassed, a courage rising to heights that have never been exceeded.

The sacrifices made by our men and women on land, in the air and on the sea, and in their homes when these have been attacked, as in Britain, must not—I speak most seriously and earnestly—be in vain. We are fighting first for the principles set forth in the various declarations of the united nations, and, secondly, for the principles set forth in the Atlantic charter. We went to war, not for Poland alone, but Poland was the occasion. We had seen Manchuria turned into the puppet kingdom of Manchukuo; we had seen Abyssinia trampled under foot; we had seen Austria go next; we had seen the Rhineland taken, and Czechoslovakia overwhelmed. We knew there had to be a stopping place; otherwise, the world would be given over to tyranny, bloodshed and cruelty. The stand was taken. The principles then enunciated have been stated in my hearing and that of your Prime Minister time and time again during our conferences. They are these: The United Kingdom and the British dominions are not out for aggrandizement or territory, not out to conquer or dominate anybody whatsoever. They are out to free mankind, and that means the nations that have fought beside us. I would refer particularly to France. There were many Frenchmen who pinned their faith to the cross of Lorraine and did not bow the knee in the house of Mammon. We have had our own New Zealanders escaping from Italy, through Switzerland, and then through France to Spain. French men and women in all walks of life risked their lives cheerfully and willingly to aid them, even against the protests of those whom they were succoring and helping to escape. The people who have shown that spirit will rise triumphant and their country will once more become a great leader among the nations and a great repository of human freedom.

These nations, according to the declarations of the leading united nations, must be fully restored, and their territories must be given back wherever they may be; because unless our word is carried out, the very foundation of faith will shake and fall, and there will be no resting place for honour in the world. France will be restored, as will Poland, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Greece, and their overseas territories.

I pause for a moment to thank the government and the people of Canada for the help they sent to the starving people of Greece and Crete, for the wheat they have sent over there by the thousands of tons, and for the assistance in other respects that they are continuing to give. I would tender my own and my country's appreciation of the splendid offer of assistance that came from here when millions of people in Bengal were sickening to death through the famine. Our friends in Australia also assisted, as we did according to our capacity. These are gestures, deeds, actions that will cement the world and bring us into greater friendship and comradeship to face the problems of the future.

The principles of the Atlantic charter are not platitudes, nor meant to be platitudes. They are principles that must be honoured because thousands have died for them. Your boys, boys of New Zealand, South Africa, India, the United States and all the united nations, have given their lives that the four freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from fear and freedom from want—may be established and the masses of the people given greater opportunities than ever before. Unless we strive to carry out those principles we shall be undoing in peace what has been won on the battlefield.

I heard it said many years ago that there were two kinds of enemies of progress: those who stood still and looked backward, and those who looked forward and stood still. After the last war, promises were made in various countries—I am not singling out any country or people or government; I am stating a fact—promises were made, and made in good faith. They were made because it was believed, even by those who made them, that they would be carried out. But the years came and the years went, and instead of the promises being fulfilled, we had an overwhelming sense of impossibility, the overpowering feeling that they could not be fulfilled. So, instead of enthusiasm on the part of the masses, particularly on the part of the young people who with their generous hearts, having fought the war, wanted to reach out to a better future, we have had cynicism, disappointment and despair. We must give faith to our young people. We must tell them that as they have fought, and as they will win the war, so must they take their place and help to garner the fruits of victory for all the peoples of the world. If that is not done people will say cynically: "These promises were all right when the war was on, but you cannot do anything about it now." If these promises are not fulfilled, there can be no doubt that the forces of despair will develop into reaction; once more the ground will be ripe for the seeds of nazism and fascism, and democracy's final chance will be gone.

Conferences are being held to help the world towards a better day—conferences on commercial questions, on monetary and financial questions; on production of food, conferences that do credit to the good heart of the democracies; conferences to rehabilitate the nations that have been trampled under foot by Germany, Italy and Japan. These are excellent, and I have no doubt that the requirements, in particular the necessities, of all the respective countries, will be considered and allowance made for them. But unless the mass of the people feel that in return for their efforts on land, on sea and in the air, in the workshops and on the farms, on the docks and in the mines, the vision of a new world is a reality, that the leaders of nations were in earnest when they preached fundamental democracy, not only political democracy but educational, economic and social democracy, then I say there is a black outlook for the world.

But there is no reason why the outlook should be black. The British nations are more solidified to-day, as they are more determined and more enthusiastic for democracy, than ever before. Here is a paradox which the world outside the British commonwealth finds it difficult to understand, the paradox that the freer we become the closer we are together; the more our constitutional bonds are relaxed the more closely we are held in bonds of friendship; the greater the extent to which government sovereignty is extended to the various parts of the British commonwealth and empire the more truly one we are in sentiment, in heart and spirit—one in peace as well as in war.

That is something which the nations do not understand. The British peoples—and when I say the British peoples I mean all the races under the British flag—have responded to the principles of self-government and of trust and friendship extended by the mother country, and have raised with their sons, around the mother country, a wall of fire, and have forged bonds as light as air, though as strong as steel, bonds that are stronger now than ever before. A fortnight ago I was with a friend in the north of Scotland. He pointed out to me a certain fort, and said there were one or two of the kind in Scotland. There is no cement, no lime, no concrete in the construction of that fort. It is built of vitrified stones, the residue of a huge bonfire whose heat was so great that it melted the stones and united them into a solid mass. Well, my thoughts turned from that to our commonwealth. In the fires of war, in the trials, the tribulations and the dangers of war, we have been welded together so that we are stronger than ever. We want to extend that sense of solidarity, that sense of security to the other nations.

I am going to mention only one country. I devoutly hope, from the bottom of my heart, that India will see through all the senses of injury or wrong of the past, through all the mists of prejudice of one kind or another, to the fact that there is no greater freedom can be attained than that of a sovereign state in the British commonwealth. We all should like to welcome India in as one of ourselves, for she also is rendering a great service to humanity.

In conclusion, I would say that at this moment conditions are different from those that prevailed when I visited here in 1941. Then all was black except for the light of faith in the eyes and hearts of the British people, not only in the United Kingdom but everywhere. They are different again from when I came here in 1942, nearly two years ago. For then the United States had come in, and we were just beginning to ascend the ladder of victory. To-day we have the enemy on the run. He will stand and fight bravely and unscrupulously, and he will make use of all the diabolical weapons that the ingenuity of the human mind can bring into existence. But it will all be in vain. All the powers of hell cannot prevail against those who believe that they are fighting the battle of righteousness, of truth, of justice and of freedom, and are determined that the new world shall be a new world in truth and in deed, as well as in spirit, and that we all shall go forward—you in Canada, we in New Zealand, the people of the motherland, and the people of all the British dominions—marching shoulder to shoulder in war time, prepared to march shoulder to shoulder afterwards toward that new world that will be a new Jerusalem.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will ask Their Honours the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons to express our thanks to the Prime Minister of New Zealand for the deeply moving address to which we have just been privileged to listen.

Honourable Senator THOMAS VIEN (Speaker of the Senate) (Translation): May it please your Royal Highness, Mr. Prime Minister of New Zealand, I am very happy to offer you in my mother tongue, one of the two official languages of this country, the heartfelt and sincere thanks of the Senate, of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada, whom you have honoured to-day by your presence and by the moving address you have just delivered.

In the Old World, Celts and Gauls take pride in their common ancestry, in their close affinity of mind and temperament. Was there not once a celebrated woman who was at the same time Queen of Scotland and Queen of France?

In Canada, after the Battle of the Plains of Abraham, the Fraser Highlanders Regiment was demobilized and a number of Frasers settled in this country. One of them gave his name to Fraserville, a lovely little town on the shores of the lower St. Lawrence. In British Columbia, the Fraser valley, one of our most fertile plains, is watered by a river which bears your name. All of which illustrates, Mr. Prime Minister, that the name which you have made famous in the south Pacific is known and honoured everywhere in Canada.

In our geography textbooks, we first learned of the two islands which comprise your country and of the tremendous distances separating it from our own. But current history soon taught us that New Zealand, often called the "Britain of the South Seas," although established barely a century ago, is already renowned throughout the world for the volume of her external trade, for the liberal and progressive character of her social legislation, for the heroism her men have shown on every battlefield during two world wars, and for her magnificent contribution to the United Nations' effort.

We know also the part you have played personally in these great achievements, and therefore, feel a deep satisfaction in thanking you for having visited our land and inspired us by your eloquent message.

You may tell your people that we are determined to fight by their side to the end, until the triumph of right over might is secured. With you we pray God to bless our armed forces and to grant us promptly a decisive victory and a durable peace.

(Text):

Hon. JAMES ALLISON GLEN (Speaker of the House of Commons): Your Royal Highness, Mr. Prime Minister, to-day we welcome on the floor of the Canadian House of Commons one of the Prime Ministers of a great fraternity which we call the Commonwealth of British Nations, in the person of the Right Honourable Peter Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand.

The bearer of such a name is always assured of a welcome in Canada; for within our land we treasure the Fraser river—discovered probably by one of his ancestors, certainly by one of the clan—whose rugged shores and tumbling waters will remind our guest of the rivers and streams of his own native Ross-shire.

In the incidents of life the course of one's career is directed by powers beyond one's control, and you, sir, might have become a citizen of Canada when you left your native land in 1910. But we do not begrudge your choice, for what we in Canada lost, New Zealand gained, and I think you will agree with me it is well that all countries should have a leaven of Scots in their midst. This little expression of insular pride will, I hope, be forgiven me. Speaking to a brother Scot, at our own fireside, I cannot refrain from a personal touch, and I am sure it will not destroy that self-effacing modesty so characteristic of our race.

Sir, it is one of the glories of the common heritage of New Zealand and Canada that in our House of Commons you can, in expressive language, voice with receptive understanding those ideas and principles which you set forth so clearly in London, the seat of the commonwealth and empire, during the recent conference of the British Prime Ministers. Your position there, as here, and your qualities so universally recognized in New Zealand, have received the acclaim of the empire, and Canada takes this opportune moment to congratulate you, and through you New Zealand, on the magnificent contribution which your men and women have made in this war.

We have not had that intimate association with your army we would desire, but we do know of their exploits in every theatre of war, and it must never be forgotten that in that moment of extreme peril to our nations, when the daring and heroic adventure to save Greece was determined upon, New Zealand troops fired the first shot in the conflict—a glorious page in your country's history.

But if we know not your army intimately, we do know your airmen. That they are typical of your countrymen we have no doubt; and I can say to you, sir, with, I hope, convincing sincerity, that their conduct while in this country and their achievements overseas make us proud to call them kinsmen.

We are delighted to have you with us. We thank you for your address, and I wish you would convey to your country the assurance that Canada's door will always be on the latch to you and all your colleagues and citizens. I urge you, do not stay away too long. In the happier days which we now envisage as being so near, let us in Canada, and you in New Zealand, demonstrate to the world that "though mountains divide us, and the waste of seas", we are bound by ties which nothing can break.

The proceedings were concluded by the singing of God Save the King.

Monday, July 3, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION DAY

MESSAGES OF GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES ON THE OCCASION OF THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Leader of the Government): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) received a number of messages from other governments on the occasion of the seventy-seventh anniversary of confederation. As they conveyed greetings and good wishes to the people of Canada, I should like at this time to give to hon. members the substance of the messages.

In the message from the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt said:

No nation is nearer to us and with none have relations been more cordial. The friendship of years of peace has been deepened and strengthened by years of brotherhood in warfare for the common defence and for the maintenance of those simple freedoms by which our peoples have lived. Victory is still to be attained but we can soberly say that it is in sight and I know the peoples of the United States and Canada will join their efforts in laying the foundations of a just peace as they have joined their sacrifices in defending common civilization.

The message from the Prime Minister of Australia, Right Honourable John Curtin, reads as follows:

On behalf of the government and people of Australia I desire to express our sincere good wishes on this the seventy-seventh anniversary of Canada's birth as a nation.

This war has brought Australia and Canada closer together than ever before. The many thousands of our young men who have gone to Canada for training under the empire air training scheme have cemented the personal link binding our two peoples. The kindness and hospitality with which you have received them is widely known and will ever be remembered in many thousands of Australian homes.

Not less do we appreciate material assistance which Canada has given us under the mutual aid system. The large quantities of military supplies and equipment of all kinds which Australia has now received from Canada has been of inestimable value in our war effort.

This year on Dominion Day your thoughts will be with the thousands of young Canadians who are acquitting themselves so gallantly in Normandy. The magnificent war effort of Canada is a source of pride to all those who have been associated with her in this long struggle for freedom.

The people of Australia send you their cordial greetings and their sincere good wishes for Canada's future happiness and prosperity.

Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek sent the congratulations and best wishes of all China. His message continued:

The important part you have been playing in furtherance of our common cause has filled the heart of every Chinese with the deepest admiration. As a result of the decisive victories won by the allied forces on all fronts the days of our enemies are numbered and I am confident that when the war is over our two countries in cooperation with the other united nations will succeed in building a better world order.

The message from the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs of the French Committee for National Liberation reads in part:

In these glorious days, when a decisive battle against our common enemy is under way in which Canadian troops are heroically shedding their blood for the liberation of France, the French nation expresses its most sincere wishes for a great and prosperous Canada.

Messages from the Prime Ministers of Belgium, Czechoslovakia and Poland all referred to the part Canada's armed forces are taking in the liberation of Europe.

Messages of greetings and good will were also received from the President of Haiti, and the foreign ministers of Mexico, Brazil and Chile, as well as from representatives in Canada of other governments.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) moved:

That the second and third reports of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on June 29, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NEW BRUNSWICK DEHYDRATING PLANTS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What assistance was given to dehydrating plants in the province of New Brunswick; giving name of person or company assisted, and value of assistance to each, (a) machinery and equipment; (b) development?
2. Was rent paid in any case for machinery or equipment?
3. Has any machinery or equipment been sold or offered for sale to any person or company? If so, at what percentage of cost price?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Loan of special machinery and equipment to: Pirie Potato Products Limited, $12,003.69; New Brunswick Potato Products Limited, $16,182.48.
2. No.
3. No machinery or equipment has been sold. An offer was made for the sale of machinery and equipment, but this offer was withdrawn when the Crown Assets Corporation was established as the official government agency for the disposal of crown assets.

JOHN C. NICHOLSON

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Was Mr. John C. Nicholson employed by the government for rehabilitation or other special work in the maritimes?
2. If so, what are his duties?
3. When was he employed?
4. What salary does he receive?
5. What have been his expenses to date at, (a) the Lord Nelson hotel; (b) additional expenses; (c) total expenses and salary?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Engaged as investigator—National Selective Service.
2. Chairman of the mobilization survey committee, under whose direction all industrial surveys are screened for man-power supply.
3. January 17, 1944.
4. $3,000 per annum.
5. (a) $631.39—January 17 to May 31, 1944. (b) $310.83—January 17 to May 31, 1944.

(c) Salary $1,120.97; total expenses $942.22. Grand total $2,063.19—January 17 to May 31, 1944.

FLAX PROCESSING PLANTS

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many bushels of flax for linseed oil and oil cake purposes were produced in Canada in 1943?

2. What is the anticipated production of such flax in 1944?

3. What flax processing plants were in operation in 1943, where is each located, and who is the owner of each?

4. What flax processing plants were constructed in Canada in 1943, where are such plants located, and who is the owner of each?

5. What flax processing plants have been constructed in Canada in 1944, where are such plants situated, and who is the owner of each?

6. What flax processing plants are under construction in Canada at the present time, where are such plants situated, and who is the owner of each?

7. What is the total flax crushing capacity in Canada at the present time?

8. What is the total anticipated flax crushing capacity in Canada in 1945?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Approximately 17,900,000 bushels.

2. Acreage intentions in 1944 are reported at 2,069,600 acres.

3. Dominion Linseed Oil Co., Limited; plants at Baden, Ontario; Montreal, Que.; St. Boniface, Man.; Canada Linseed Oil Mills Limited; plants at Toronto, Ont.; Montreal, Que.; Sherwin-Williams Co. of Canada, Limited; plants at Montreal, Que.; Winnipeg, Man.; Toronto Elevators Limited; plant at Toronto, Ont.; W. R. Carpenter (Canada), Limited; plants at Hamilton, Ont.; Vancouver, B.C.; Alberta Linseed Oil Mills Limited; plant at Medicine Hat, Alta.

4. W. R. Carpenter (Canada) Limited Hamilton, Ont.

5. No plant has been constructed in Canada in 1944.

6. Two plants are under construction in Canada at the present time but neither of them will be exclusively operated for flaxseed. The plants in question are: Victory Mills Limited, Toronto; and Prairie Vegetable Oils Limited, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. These plants will be operated by means of expellers and/or solvent extraction and will, therefore, be versatile and may process any vegetable oil-bearing material whatsoever.

7. The total flax crushing capacity in Canada including capacity which is interchangeable for other oil-bearing material is estimated at approximately the equivalent of 6·4 million bushels.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

8. The estimated crushing capacity for all vegetable oil-bearing materials will probably amount to 7·7 to 8·2 million bushels. It is impossible to say just what percentage of this capacity will be utilized for flax crushing purposes.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MOBILIZATION ACT—LAVAL-TWO MOUNTAINS—DIVISION E MONTREAL

Mr. LACOMBE:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the department concerning the following recruits from the county of Laval-Two Mountains (division E, Montreal), who were called under the provisions of the mobilization act:—Berchmans Laurin, Anatole Lauzon, Lorenzo Gauthier, Jean-Paul Lauzon, son of Oscar Lauzon, Maurice Glindon, of Oka, county of Two Mountains, and Jacques Lalonde, Yves Lavoie, Cyrille Lepage, of Cap St. Martin, county of Laval.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains has a copy of the files, and I would recommend that this motion be dropped from the order paper.

Motion dropped.

ARMY RECRUITING—PACIFIC COMMAND

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all reports on army recruiting received from the Pacific command during the period from the first day of April, 1944, to date.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, the documents asked for in this order are confidential and are not those usually producible. I submit for that reason the motion should be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GREEN: These are reports dealing with recruiting. We get reports in the house from time to time with respect to recruiting, and I say they do not come in that category at all. I am not willing to have the motion dropped.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, we get reports in the house, but from a minister; the hon. member does not get reports from officials. The reports asked for here are reports from officials of the department, which from time immemorial have been regarded as confidential. I submit the motion should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD—CHIEF INVESTIGATOR, INSPECTION STAFF

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the Department of Labour and the wartime labour relations board, dated since March 1, 1944, relating to the appointment of Mr. James Leslie as a chief investigator for the inspection staff of the wartime labour relations board, including a copy of all correspondence with trade union organizations relating to the said appointment.

MONETARY CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance arising out of a report respecting representation of the United States and Canada respectively at the united nations monetary and financial conference. I wish first to make my protest, and then shall ask the minister a question.

The delegation from Canada, apart from the cabinet delegates, the departmental and technical experts who normally go to conferences of the kind, included two admirable and highly esteemed members of the house, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Blanchette). I should not like any one in the house or outside of it to feel that I raise this question because of my views respecting the qualifications of these two hon. members. This matter might have passed unnoticed had it not been for the fact that while Canada sent two private members and supporters of the government, and no supporter from any other party was either invited or allowed to attend, the situation in the United States was entirely the reverse. This will be borne out by the following quotation from the Wall Street Journal of June 30, 1944, which in one paragraph states:

> The congressional delegation consists of the Chairmen (Democrats) and ranking minority (Republicans) members of the senate and house banking committees. Senate representatives are Messrs. Wagner of New York, a Democrat, and Tobey of New Hampshire, a Republican.

The article goes on to speak about the qualifications of these men. Then it says:

> The house members are representative Spence, a Democrat of Kentucky, and representative Wolcott of Michigan, a Republican.

In drawing this situation to the attention of the government I protest against the government's failure to include in the delegation representatives of other political thought, as was done in respect of the United States delegation. Someone has suggested that the government might have chosen the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer)—but I did not rise specially to advocate that. I am advocating, however, that the government should have proceeded as the United States did in the selection of their delegates.

I do not raise this question from the merely party political point of view. But I do think, if I may say so, that the next government in Canada, which we believe will be our party, should have had representation at the conference as well as the party at present in office. Will the minister tell the house why this was not done?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not think it occurred to anybody, when selecting a delegation from among members of parliament, to select delegates from any but the government party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand there is no precedent for it in respect of similar conferences.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The United States did it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking about Canadian precedents. An entirely different system obtains in the United States of America. This government will have to decide toward the close of the conference what its position will be, and will have to do so on the advice of its delegation. If a representative were taken from the Progressive Conservative party, then it seems to me the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party would have a fairly good claim to have their school of thought represented, as would also the Social Credit party.

Mr. HANSELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: I beg the hon' gentleman's pardon?

Mr. HANSELL: Hear, hear, I say.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the Social Credit party had been asked to nominate a member he would have gone according to the statement of the Premier of Alberta, with one view in mind, and that would have been to prevent the conference from obtaining its objective. It had been known for a long time that this conference was to be held, and if the matter had been brought up in the house we certainly could have given it consideration. Other matters of this kind are brought up in the house from time to time, and I do not think it ever occurred to the house leader of the Progressive Conservative party—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I answer that? The reason it did not occur to us at the beginning was that we were unaware there was to be a representation from the House of Commons. At least I did not know of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: That perhaps is an answer, but certainly there was no great interest taken in the representation by any of the opposition parties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have been frozen out so often it is hardly worth while.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think if I were to put the question to the leader of the opposition, whether he thought it would be advisable—I do not think it could be done, because the official list of delegates was given out weeks ago—whether he thought it would be helpful and make for the success of the conference to have representatives of all the parties in this house at the conference—

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not say that. I only suggested our members as representing the next government.

Mr. MAYBANK: May I make this point with reference to the proposal?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MAYBANK: I do not want to impose my views, but I thought probably the gentleman who has spoken would welcome my remarks. I think the government is in some difficulty in choosing a person to represent the next government, supposing it be not the same as this government, because—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MAYBANK: —no one would have suggested sending a non-member of parliament, and to get a representative of the Conservative party would mean the government would have to go outside and secure their travelling salesman, Mr. Bracken.

Mr. ILSLEY: I had no knowledge before Friday of last week that the representatives from the United States were to be selected from both Democratic and Republican parties.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, June 30, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I desire this afternoon to speak briefly on the budget, but before doing so I wish to make a few preliminary remarks arising out of a reflection on this party made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the early part of his remarks on Thursday afternoon last, no doubt occasioned by the reflection cast upon his group in the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). On that occasion the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stated that the nearest approach this country had ever come to revolution was under the Tory party between 1930 and 1935. That was an insult to a great government. It was intended to cast a slur upon the late government; it was intended as an appeal to prejudice. I resent the implication of that statement.

May I say that with respect to appeals to prejudice the hon. member and his group are rapidly becoming past masters. I assert with every degree of confidence that when an impartial history of that dark period between 1930 and 1935 is written, when conditions existed which were not created by the government of the day, it will be shown that the only gesture toward revolution was a manufactured gesture fomented by the communistic and socialistic elements in Canada. That movement, if there was such a movement, was led by the Tim Buck's, the Harold Winch's and others like them. These same people are knocking at the door of the socialist party here in this house and they will soon be in charge. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that while I would not for a moment accuse him personally of preaching revolution or of being a revolutionist, he and his predecessors in office have been encouraging those in this country who preach revolution. He and those around him have started forces which they cannot control. Revolution is a nasty word. Revolution plus force means treason.

I desire now to revert to the consideration of the budget.

In the course of the past twenty-three years I have listened to no less than nineteen budget addresses, delivered by no less than seven different ministers of finance. I recall the clarity of the budgets of Mr. Fielding and the admiration I always felt for his annual budget and the delivery of his annual budget address. I can honestly say that apart from the magnitude of the figures, the colossal and staggering increase in the national debt, and the announcement of contemplated increased expenditures on both war account and peacetime activity, I have never listened to a drabber budget speech than that which my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, delivered in this house this day week. There were no flashing highlights, no spectacular announcements, nothing to make the blood run more quickly through one's veins; there was nothing to stir the imagination, no sparks and no thrills—you pay your taxes and you take your choice.

If by any stretch of the imagination one could call one feature of the address a highlight, it was that part of it in which the minister, by implication or tacit admission, indicated that the ministry was departing from the oft-avowed policy of the government to pay for the war as you go, as far as possible out of current taxation, and announced a policy of increased borrowing to make up the difference. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the membership of this house, that that is in marked contrast with the pronouncements of ministers of finance since the first war session of 1939, with respect to a policy which I supported at that time and continued to support down through the years. It indicates a change of front, a change of policy, dictated not by any inherent defect in the policy itself, but by a reversion to political expediency, a manoeuvre that has always characterized hon. gentlemen opposite on the eve of an election.

What is the essence of this budget? It is certain now that the essence of this budget is that substantial increased borrowings are to be relied on to absorb a substantial and marked increase in the war appropriation and in peace-time expenditures. Along that path lies inflation, and no one knows it better than the minister. What has become of the policy of controlling inflation? Has the lid been kicked right off? If not, it is pretty near all the way off. I venture to suggest that the minister and those advising him are fearful of the results of this budget. And so I assert with every degree of certainty that such a position is a marked departure from previous policy and is motivated by a desire to appease the electorate by throwing out a crumb here and a crumb there, all of which is doomed to failure at the hands of an outraged electorate, and nobody knows it better than the members on the government benches themselves. They hear it from their own followers; they read it in the daily newspapers; they hear the echoes down through the thousands of miles that extend from Vancouver to Sydney.

We are to raise by taxation and borrowing six billions of dollars, and at the same time we are warned of a loss of income tax revenue to the tune of a hundred million dollars, not to speak of other possible losses, such as, for instance, the millions of dollars withdrawn by the socialization of business, such as the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company expropriation. We are told that we must borrow at least $320 million more than we did last year because the cash deficit will be that much greater.

The income loss suggested by the minister is found in the budget resolution which provides that after June 30 there will be no more compulsory savings for individuals. The system was set up two years ago with a twofold purpose—to take purchasing power from the people and thus prevent inflation, and to add to war revenue. I am bound to say in all honesty that at the time that policy was introduced I supported the principle of compulsory savings, although I did not support all the provisions under which the policy was being worked out. Whatever may have been said as to the soundness of the principle, as to its necessity—and it was largely based on necessity—and as to its efficacy, it is now certain that it never was well received by the public. Personally I rather regret that. It was not received well by the public because it bore too hardly on those in the lower income tax groups who had not perhaps the means of substituting insurance premiums or mortgages payments and had less ability to pay. It bore less hardly on those in the higher income brackets, who, while they may have had the ability to pay, also had readily at hand the means of evading the payment of compulsory savings by way of substituting life insurance premiums and mortgage payments under the law as it has obtained to date. All these conditions were well known to the public, and certainly they were well known to the minister when he brought down his proposals two years ago. Now at this last and dark hour confronting the administration a change of heart takes place—not necessarily a change of conviction; because I believe that the minister was convinced two years ago that the policy was right, and that he is so convinced now. The change is based once more on political expediency, a policy so often resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite. Vain hope! It is too late. The damage is done in the minds of the public. The resentment against enforced savings, withholdings from payrolls already diminished by numerous levies such as subscriptions for war savings certificates, victory bond purchases on a monthly payroll payment plan, contributions to unemployment insurance, enforced deductions for income tax collected at the source, and I was going to say a dozen other like deductions from the workers' pay cheques, rankled in the minds of the wage-earners in the lower income tax groups, and they are not likely to be appeased by an eleventh hour conversion. This party warned the government at the time the exemptions were reduced to the low level at which they stood recently that they had been reduced to too low levels. Time has proven that we were right.

Especially are the lower bracket wage-earners not to be appeased by this gesture, because it is indicated as clear as daylight itself that the deficiencies created by this gesture of appeasement were accompanied by the announcement that more money must come from the same source in the form of larger and larger so-called subscriptions to victory bonds and war savings certificate campaigns, and presumably by the same strong-arm method that has characterized the administration with respect to inducing men in the home army to enlist in the active army.

We are now in the sixth year of the war. While the end is not in sight, we are all hopeful that victory will soon be ours. I desire now to draw the attention of the house to what I consider to be a glaring omission from the budget, and that is the failure of the minister to indicate in even the slightest degree to business and industry and to the workers in business and industry, and by the same token to agriculture, what is to be the taxation policy of this nation in the post-war world. I know that the minister will say immediately that no government can announce in advance what the fiscal policy of a succeeding government is to be—and there is bound to be a new administration succeeding this one at no distant day. But this government could announce at this time that the tendency of post-war taxation should be downward. That should be the aim of every one of us; because if there is one thing more than another that is causing anxiety to business and industrial executives and to the wage-earners and to the workers and to agriculture, it is this uncertainty, this lack of information or even intimation as to what level of tax structure this country is to have in the post-war period. I say this with confidence, that until the principles, and I go further and say that until the quantum, of post-war taxation are considered and the country is informed what they are to be, business enterprise in this country, while willing and anxious to do so, will be unable to formulate plans for full employment. That full employment must come from private industry, no matter what theories we may hear advanced across this floor. It will come without question from private industry if tax policies are suggested now under which capital may devote itself to new construction, reconditioning, deferred maintenance, and the capital cost of change-over from war production to peace-time activity, in an intelligent and capable manner, and designed to give that full employment which we all so devotedly desire. With corporation taxes as high as they are, and with no suggestion made or indication given as to what tax policy is to prevail henceforth, it is impossible, I assert, for industry to plan for the future.

I hear this on every hand, and I have no doubt that the government has heard of it. With excess profits taxed at 100 per cent, no company, no industry, can increase its working capital to take care of its post-war requirements. This expenditure, so necessary, must come out of fresh capital investment—risk money, which will not be available until the risk is known and evaluated. I challenge anybody to contradict the soundness of that position. True, my hon. friend knows and we all know that at some time the refundable portion now collected from incorporated companies is to come back, but until this budget was presented that was in the dim and distant future, wholly unavailable until long after the close of hostilities, and then only piecemeal. Meantime the refundable portion has been an asset in name only. I happen to know that for a time it was not considered that this should be taken into account in the assets side of a company's balance sheet. There was much debate on that point; finally it was the consensus that it should be taken into account as an asset. If it was an asset, it was an asset in name only—frozen, inconvertible, of absolutely no use except to swell the figures in the balance sheet. Even under the proposed amendment it is little more than a frozen asset; it is not a liquid asset. I suggest that this has been and is a bad condition—bad for business, bad for employment, and bad for the country. There is no measure of relief for business in this budget.

But my hon. friend will say that there is encouragement and assistance to industry in the corporation tax amendments which he has announced, designed presumably to promote capital outlay for the purpose of post-war conversion. Let us examine that position.

The government has been made aware of the situation to which I have alluded, and I gather that reluctantly it has come to the conclusion that this situation should be eased. That is about all you can say about it. Two or three pseudo-remedies have been proposed by the minister. None of them will be particularly helpful; they will fall far short, I predict, of what is required.

What is proposed with regard to this refund? It is proposed that business firms may borrow, if anyone will lend them the money on that class of security, the refundable portion of the income and excess profits tax already paid, by way of assignment, upon which they will pay interest of five per cent, or four per cent, as the case may be, while the government allows them no interest. But it is to be done only in cases where in the opinion of the government it should be done. The government is to constitute itself the sole judge; the individual company, to whom the money belongs, has nothing to say about it; and the government has retained to itself the power to say whether the purpose of the assignment is to enable the taxpayer to make capital expenditures which will—again in the opinion of the government and at their whim and pleasure, without any measure of right on the part of the taxpayer—contribute to the post-war conversion of the taxpayer's business and provide substantial employment. All these conditions have to be fulfilled, and the government has to be convinced.

What a power that leaves in the hands of the Minister of Finance! This government is becoming an oligarchy. We have this session the amendments to the Transport Act and to the Aeronautics Act, and only now is business in this country beginning to wake up to the colossal powers which, under these measures, are being vested in one man. I suggest that the government ought to revise this type of policy, and not establish ministers as dictators —because that is what they are becoming. The minister is setting himself up as a dictator as to who will get his money back and who will not get his money back.

I suggest, sir, that lending institutions will not lend solely upon the security of an assignment of the refundable portion of taxes paid. Of course they will accept it as collateral; they will take as collateral anything they can get, but to say that any lending institution will lend solely upon the strength of an assignment of this refundable portion of taxes paid is just silly. The C.C.F. might. I do not know what they might do. They do not know themselves.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are you sure that the Tories do?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we do. We always have had principles, and we have always lived up to them. That is more than some other people have done. If I wanted to go into that sort of thing I could recall what occurred in Saskatchewan the other day, when principles were put into storage for the duration of the election.

One reason why you will never get a lending institution to lend money on the sole security of this assignment is that the time of repayment would be too distant and too uncertain. Such an assignment would, I repeat, be acceptable only along with other collateral, and the character of the borrower.

But that is not my principal objection to the minister's proposal. This refundable portion is the taxpayer's own money, taken from him, if you will, by compulsion, but his own money, lent to the government.

Mr. McGEER: Without interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Without interest. Some day, after a period of time, he will receive payment. Why should be be obliged to hypothecate his own money? In a bona fide case the government, if it wants to contribute to post-war conversion of a taxpayer's business and provide employment, should give the money back as a matter of right, not as a favour. That is what I object to. This money is going to be handed out as a favour to the taxpayer, and I suggest that fundamentally it is a matter of right to the taxpayer.

Mr. ROWE: His own money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Another pseudo-remedy is that suggested by section 31 of the resolution to amend the Income War Tax Act, which provides that one-half of expenditures on maintenance and repairs incurred by any taxpayer, in a period to be at the whim of the government, be regarded as deferred maintenance and repairs and to be deductible as an expense at the option of the taxpayer in certain periods. For that concession, many thanks. But it is too little. We all know what deferred maintenance is, and there is a tremendous lot of it piling up to-day because of high taxation. Ask any industrialist and he will tell you. Obsolescent and worn-out machinery that cannot be replaced—every industrial company to-day has an immense quantity of deferred maintenance, and the need of repairs is great, taxation being what it is. But I ask the minister, why an arbitrary one-half? If it is a good thing and they need the money, why not give full allowance for deferred maintenance? If the principle is good, then it should be applied according to the needs of the industrial establishment itself. Some people may want seventy-five per cent; others may want twenty-five per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Unless they pay half, there is virtually no check on the amount.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be a mechanical or a taxation reason—

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —but that is viewing it from the point of view of departmental administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not viewing it from the point of view of the needs of industry. The minister's interjection indicates to me that expediency in administration has dictated this arbitrary half, and nothing else.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman does not understand my interruption, but I will explain it later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I understand what is meant by the proposal.

Mr. ILSLEY: But not my interruption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): However, I will wait and hear what the minister says. I am not surrounded by a group of braintrusters. They do not tell me what is in the backs of their heads, nor do they tell the public.

There is one thing that has exercised my mind ever since I heard about it, though some may not consider it a very important matter, and that is section 32 of the income tax resolution. I would like hon. gentlemen to listen to me, because the matter is important, as I see it. Prior to the budget of 1942 provision was made that corporations might deduct from income moneys paid by way of donations to charitable and educational organizations. I am interested in both charitable and educational institutions in Canada, which by the way are suffering because of high taxation. These corporations were allowed to donate up to ten per cent of their profits—

Mr. GIBSON: Five.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Prior to 1942 it was ten per cent. If the minister will be good enough to follow me he will see that I am right, and we both mean the same thing. In 1942 the general limit of ten per cent was reduced to five per cent without any strings or limitations. That was the established policy of the administration, announced here. It was a tremendous reduction, but I have no doubt the ministry had good reasons for it. I questioned it somewhat at the time, but after all I do not think any of us raised very much controversy over it. Industrial companies were allowed to give five per cent of their profiits without strings or limitations at all. In the case of those in the 100 per cent excess profits brackets it was well understood by industry, by the government and by the membership of this house if they followed the announcements of the Prime Minister, that such donations came out of the 100 per cent excess, and therefore wholly out of taxation—well, practically so. Now, what have we? I was astonished to read a few days before this house met an announcement by the minister that the settled policy of parliament was to be done away with by a stroke of his pen; and here we have retroactive legislation withdrawing the provision and substituting a new formula, the effect of which is a serious detriment. In fact, it is a knock-out blow to our educational institutions. Retroactive legislation, especially with regard to taxation, is wholly reprehensible. It is a bad principle; retroactive legislation is vicious at any time. I cannot visualize any more honorary degrees for the Minister of Finance. It is now proposed to withdraw the reasonably mild, I will not say generous, provisions under which institutions stood to benefit and to provide that the amount of donations made in excess of the average of the taxpayers donations, in the last two fiscal periods ending before July 1, 1942, shall be allowed as deduction for the purposes of the income tax and excess profits tax only—and listen to this—to the extent that the total taxes payable by the taxpayer under those acts are thereby diminished by forty per cent of the excess, unless made before February 1, 1944, and paid, or evidenced in writing before that date.

That is an involved formula, and one has to sit down and study it carefully and have illustrations before one in order to know just what it means. But it is just as clear as daylight that it means a definite reduction in the amount that taxpayers may give to charitable institutions under the tax-free clause. In fact, for the reasons which I now give, there will be no further contributions to education from this source. The average of such donations in the two fiscal periods made by corporations which are within the excess profits clause before July 1, 1942, in most cases, was exactly nothing, and therefore in most cases the amount now allowed will be exactly nothing. The larger institutions were very alert. In one case millions were obtained in payments and written pledges. No wonder they gave the minister an honorary degree. The smaller institutions, not so well informed, less alert, not so well organized, got practically nothing. I consider that the minister's action in changing the regulation and giving notice of the change on the eve of the meeting of parliament, and without parliamentary sanction, was a distinct breach of faith that merits the condemnation of the country. I cannot imagine any greater breach of faith with the educational institutions of the country than we find in the minister's actions.

I desire briefly now to refer to two special income tax problems to which the minister referred on page 4179 of his address. The first refers to the treatment of annuities and other like payments, and the second relates to the problem created by the combined incidence of income tax and succession duties upon the holdings of deceased persons in private corporations with accumulated surpluses, which holdings cannot readily be converted into cash, like publicly-listed shares, and because of too-heavy imposts falling at the same time on the same property, cause great hardship. I have not time to deal with the first problem except to say that it is acute and the cause of hardship in certain individual cases, and these hardships ought to be removed, in justice and equity. That they can be removed I have no doubt. It may mean a loss of revenue, and that is no doubt the real reason it has not been dealt with before or even now. Such cases have usually arisen out of wills made prior to great increase in taxation.

On the other point I have some observation to make. I have always taken the view that the federal government should never have entered the succession duty field. I still adhere to that view. The other view prevailed and we had the spectacle of the same dollar being taxed always by two jurisdictions, and in some cases I could mention, by three taxing authorities. I submit that this is an intolerable situation and should be remedied at once. We in the federal field could well afford to yield up the succession duty field of taxation to the provinces, because it yields only $15,000,000 a year. This double taxation endangers the whole future of private and family business. From the small community point of view, and from the point of view of local employment and decentralization of industry and business, the family businesses should and must be maintained. The present tax structure works directly against that view. I have some more material on that point that I should like to put on the record but I understand that my time is very short.

I now desire to say a word or two about the proposed amendment.

I entirely concur in the important principles enunciated in the amendment. Income tax forms and methods of taxation must be simplified and modernized. They are moving in that direction in the United States. Relief must be granted to taxpayers in the lower income brackets, not only because of the increase in the cost of living but also and more particularly to deal with the growing evil of absenteeism in industry. I venture to assert, Mr. Speaker, that there are many hon. members sitting in this house who are in favour of the proposals enunciated in the amendment sponsored by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and who would, if left free, vote for them. That privilege is denied them and they will perforce be obliged to vote against their convictions and the known views of their constituents. Take the position of hon. members representing industrial ridings. Dare they vote against this amendment? I put it to them to-day. Well, they are on the horns of a dilemma. They must choose here and now. Vote against the amendment and face destruction at the polls, or vote according to the dictates of reason. I challenge hon. members from industrial ridings to vote against this amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing inflationary about the amendment at all?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I had the time I could answer that, but I have not. I desire to deal more particularly with the concluding paragraph of the amendment, which indicts the government for failure to deal effectively with the question of full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources as well as our man-power. For man-power is only one phase of this problem, albeit the most important.

As long ago as January, 1942, nearly three years ago, I made a speech in this house on this important problem. At that time I introduced an amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. As I look upon that speech to-day I must have been a seer and a prophet, because everything I enunciated in that speech has been brought about by this government except one. If the house does not believe me I page the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) and the speech he made in this house in which he blamed the administration for accepting so many of the principles I proposed. I am not going to take up the time of the house to read that resolution, but I have lived to see the day, very shortly after January 26, 1942, when the government began to adopt one by one, piecemeal, every principle I advocated in the amendment, save one. It did not need the statements of the present director of national selective service to tell us that there was an acute man-power situation. There has been but one pool to draw from. After the plebiscite of unholy and unsavoury memory we had conscription and the draft. Have we had honest enforcement of the military draft laws of Canada? The answer cries "no" to high heaven. The obligations of good citizenship demand that we face this position regardless of all considerations.

Then there is the disgraceful situation relating to the establishment and maintenance of a home army of trained, seasoned troops, said to be seventy or seventy-five thousand strong, costing the nation $150,000,000 each year, held immobilized, neither in the war nor out of it, neither in industry or agriculture nor out of it. This government has simply stalled on the whole question. I appeal to every member of parliament to examine his conscience and his regard for his own self-respect on this issue. Let us for the moment forget the dubious record of the past and with ringing resolution resolve to do the right thing before it is too late.

I appeal to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), to his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), to his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), to his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). We well know what their position and principles are in regard to this matter. It is well known they have held opinions that coincide with mine, and they have practically so declared in this house. I appeal to them to comport themselves like men, not mice; to cast into oblivion the policy of appeasement which has too long disgraced this nation—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I have three minutes more?—and then I shall be through. I appeal to them to cast into oblivion the policy of appeasement which has too long disgraced this nation in the eyes of the allied nations, and particularly in the eyes of our neighbours to the south, who have marvelled times without number at the poltroon position which we occupy.

Our gallant sons, fourteen battalions strong, perhaps more, have assaulted the embattled fortress of Europe. Casualties so far have been moderate, but the assaults have hardly begun. They need and will continuously need a large and ever-increasing stream of able, strong, well-trained troops to take the place of casualties which will grow in ever-increasing numbers. Where are these men to come from if not from this immobilized force, Canada's home army? These men apparently never were intended to fight. The fact is they will fight if the government wills that they fight. This playing of partisan politics has been a foul blot on Canada's national effort and unity in this great conflict. This government has consistently not done that which it knew to be the right and the logical thing to do, that is, enforce equal service and sacrifice everywhere in relation to the war. Let us end all this. If we do not, the verdict of history will be that as a nation we were poltroons and failed in our duty. On this whole question we have an inglorious record. Let us blot out that record, gird ourselves like men and once more lift up our heads, courageous and unashamed.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I do not intend to deal with the many ramifications of the budget. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made a general survey of that subject, and I think set out clearly and specifically the opinions of the people we represent in this house. The only comment I have to make on the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is that, as usual, he took a left-handed swipe at the members of this group, and his whole speech would indicate that he does not like the government or the C.C.F. Well, as long as the people of the country like us and recognize the fact that we are doing the best job we can, we are quite satisfied.

With regard to the budget, the minister did his usual good job in presenting it to the house. It was rather an easy job this time in that there were very few changes in it. He made one change that I think was very important and long overdue—the lifting of the duties against agricultural machinery. But there was one thing I believe he overlooked. What he did in respect of importations of agricultural implements he should have done in respect of the materials and equipment necessary to the proper functioning of the fishing industry. They too should have been relieved of the heavy imposts levied against the necessary equipment they must import. I leave that thought with the minister, in the knowledge that representations have already been made to him from different sources since the budget was brought down.

This afternoon in the time at my disposal I shall endeavour to straighten the record concerning certain statements that have been made in the house. First I wish to make the record clear in connection with certain comments of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), in the course of which he made a comparison of interest, debt and the like in Canada and New Zealand. His figures are not correct, and when he made the statement I pointed out to him that he was telling only half the story. In order that the record may be complete I shall now give the rest of the picture. I believe we do a disservice to ourselves when we quarrel with any of the nations who are fighting this major conflict with us. Surely we should be most careful in any statements we make as to their internal economy. It is for that reason I correct the record so far as the statement made by the hon. member is concerned.

Only a few days ago we listened to a speech by the Prime Minister of New Zealand. In my view he made one of the best contributions I have heard since I came to parliament. His speech was steady and statesmanlike.

The statement of the hon. member for New Westminster to which I refer is to be found at page 4112 of Hansard for June 23. The hon. member gave no information as to dates, nor did he state the rate of exchange between New Zealand and Canada. He said he got his figures from the New Zealand and Canada year books. The only comparable information is to be found in the New Zealand and Canada year books of 1941-42, covering the year 1940. Information regarding Canadian provinces and municipalities in the 1942 year book covers 1940 only.

I shall not repeat the figures given by the hon. member for New Westminster; they are already on record. I wish to place on Hansard comparative figures for Canada and New Zealand, because the statement made by the hon. member is absolutely incorrect. The figures are lengthy, but I believe it is necessary that they be given. Of course if hon. members would permit me to place them on Hansard without reading them, I would not have to take the time to read them in full.

Mr. REID: I object to their being put on without being read.

Mr. GILLIS: Then I am sorry, but I shall have to read them, if the hon. member for New Westminster insists. These are comparative figures for New Zealand and Canada. The figures given by the hon. member were brief, and certainly they were not at all explanatory.

The direct debt of the dominion is $4,703,964,000. The direct and indirect debt, including government guaranteed loans and securities for Canada is $6,013,322,000.

Mr. REID: What do they owe Great Britain?

Mr. GILLIS: The comparative figure for New Zealand on the same date is £322,146,633. Our provincial debt is $1,957,279,000. Our direct and indirect—and this is provincial, again—including guaranteed loans and securities is $2,179,885,041. New Zealand has no provincial debt.

Our municipal debt is $1,227,360,000. Our direct and indirect, including guaranteed loans and securities—and this is municipal—is $1,280,640,494. New Zealand's municipal debt is £71,502,170.

Mr. REID: Does the New Zealand debt include what she owes Great Britain?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. The total dominion debt is $7,888,603,000. The total dominion direct and indirect, including government guaranteed loans and securities is $9,214,920,000.

Mr. REID: What is the indirect debt of New Zealand?

Mr. GILLIS: I am giving their debt now. That of New Zealand is £393,146,633.

Mr. GARDINER: That is direct debt?

Mr. GILLIS: Direct and indirect; that is their total debt. Our population is 11,420,084 while that of New Zealand is 1,640,000. The same figures apply in working out both direct and indirect debts. Our direct per capita debt works out at $690 and our indirect at $807. In New Zealand it is $840.

The debt figures given by the hon. member for New Westminster were $680 per capita in Canada, and $1,010 in New Zealand. These figures are not borne out by the search I have made.

Mr. REID: What authority has the hon. member for his New Zealand figures?

Mr. GILLIS: The Canada and New Zealand year books, for 1941-42.

Without going into all the ramifications of these figures, I shall give a boiled-down statement. The hon. member for New Westminster, in respect of per capita interest charges, said that the interest in Canada was $14.65, or an average interest rate of 2·90 per cent. The figures he gave for New Zealand were $28.75, with an average interest rate of 3·42 per cent. According to my search those figures are not correct. The figures I have show the total debt, dominion and provincial, as $6,144,258,809, and in the case of New Zealand, £322,146,633. The total interest charge in the case of Canada is $205,582,850 and in the case of New Zealand, £7,982,505. The per capita interest charge for Canada is $18 and for New Zealand, $16.66, and the average rates of interest are 3·34 per cent for Canada and 2·49 for New Zealand. There is a discrepancy there, and yet these figures are from the same source.

I do not think any one will quarrel with taxation, with what he has to pay provided he gets something for it. If you are giving the people something for their taxes, they will not quarrel. I am going to give some more figures for Canada and New Zealand covering education and social security. These are the 1940 figures.

Mr. TUCKER: Was that the debt of the dominion and the provinces of this country?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. TUCKER: And the municipalities?

Mr. GILLIS: The municipalities are not here. For old age and blind pensions and national health, Canada spent $72,845,000 as compared with an expenditure for social security by New Zealand of £12,288,340.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect, because the hon. gentleman is omitting the provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: I am coming to that. The provincial expenditures in Canada on medicine, health, relief and public welfare amounted to $78,315,000, and the expenditures on medicine and health alone in New Zealand amounted to £2,328,283.

Mr. ILSLEY: I still say that in the old age pensions figures the hon. member is not including the contributions made by the provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I am.

Mr. ILSLEY: In what figure?

Mr. GILLIS: In the last figures, the expenditures by the provinces on medicine, health, relief and public welfare. The old age pension contributions are included in the first figure.

Mr. ILSLEY: What figure is that?

Mr. GILLIS: That is the figure of $29,976,000, which along with $42,869,000 for national health makes up the total of $72,845,000. That covers old age and blind pensions and national health. The minister can check those figures.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not have to check them. I know that our contribution is about $30,000,000.

Mr. GILLIS: This is 1940.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what it was then.

Mr. GILLIS: If you recheck them I think you will find that this is right.

Mr. REID: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. GILLIS: These are the 1940 figures in the 1941 year book.

Mr. REID: I was quoting from the 1943 book; my figures were more up to date.

Mr. GILLIS: There are no other figures.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is that the contributory figure?

Mr. GILLIS: Any one who wants to can recheck and correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why waste time checking? Let us get it correct now.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not worrying about wasting time; I am wasting my time now. If the hon. member for New Westminster had been a little more accurate I would not have had to do this on my time in order to correct the figures in connection with our sister dominion.

The per capita expenditure on provincial medicine, health, relief and public welfare in Canada was $7 as compared with $4.97 in New Zealand. In the field of education Canada spent $28,929,001 as compared with £4,619,134 in New Zealand. The per capita expenditure in Canada was $2.53 as compared with $8.53 in New Zealand. The total per capita expenditure in the field of education and social security in Canada was $15.83 and in New Zealand, $39.57.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but has he taken into consideration the amount of money spent by the provinces on education?

Mr. GILLIS: Surely. I have already given that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then I do not think the hon. gentleman's figures are correct.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I am talking on my own time now. I have put the statement on the record, and if it is wrong, any hon. member has a right to correct it. So far as I am concerned they are the only figures available. I endeavoured to get them up to date, and that is the statement as I got it.

Mr. REID: I shall be satisfied if you will quote 1943.

Mr. GILLIS: You cannot get them; you cannot get our own for that year.

Mr. REID: We will give you our copy. Here is the proof.

Mr. GILLIS: The second matter I wanted to comment on was the statement made in this house by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on June 19, 1944, to be found on page 3926 of Hansard. I am sorry the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is not in the chamber, because a few days ago he was anxious to hear this. The statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply was in answer to a question put by myself as to why some coal mining collieries in Nova Scotia were not working on Saturdays. My question was prompted by a resolution which I had received from some of the mine workers' unions.

At that time the Minister of Munitions and Supply—I am not blaming him for this, because I believe he is anxious to find a solution to the problem—read into the record a statement which he had received from the fuel production board. That statement pointed out that production in the coal mines of Nova Scotia was down to an alarming extent and that absenteeism had increased beyond what could be considered as at all sensible. In effect the minister led the house and the country to believe that the deplorable state of affairs outlined by him was due to one cause only—absenteeism. He led us to believe that the miners of Nova Scotia were not working and that as a result production was down. That is the way I would have taken that statement had I not been in the house and known the circumstances. As I say, I am not blaming the minister for making the statement, but I do want to place the other side of the story on the record.

I want to make it very clear that I am not condoning absenteeism in any way, shape or form. To the extent that absenteeism may militate against production in the collieries, I say it should be removed. It is the prerogative of those charged with the getting of production, the emergency fuel board, the operating companies and the miners' unions, to see to it that that particular cause is removed. But it is not responsible for the drop in the production figures as the minister was led to believe and as this house was led to believe from his statement.

I want to jog the memory of the house on one point. In the 1943 session the Prime Minister declared that an emergency existed in this country in connection with fuel. Upon that declaration being made, the government appointed an emergency production board, which was given sufficient authority and administrative latitude to see that the production in the mines of Canada was brought up to the point where it would assist our war effort and guarantee domestic fuel supplies. Rather than an indictment against the mine workers of Nova Scotia as one listening to it might be led to believe the statement put on the record by the Minister of Munitions and Supply stands as an indictment against the emergency fuel production board. The board had supreme authority, and I know that the Minister of Finance, through his department and other agencies of the government, has made available to the board the necessary financing and everything it needed to see that production was increased. Why was production not increased? What happened that it was not increased? I say that the statement put on the record by the Minister of Munitions and Supply stands as an indictment against the efficiency of the fuel production machinery set up by the government. There is no other way you can look at it. If I am given a job and the necessary machinery to do it, and the necessary finance, and I do not get that job done, the responsibility is mine.

I wish the Minister of Munitions and Supply were here, because I am going to endeavour to show him, as I did on a previous occasion in this house, exactly why you are not getting coal production in the mines of Nova Scotia. We did that when the board was set up from our places in the house, and if the machinery which was recommended by myself and by the mine workers had been set up, the situation would not be what it is to-day I am certain of that.

Was this present production situation not anticipated? Did it drop out of a blue sky? I do not think so. The premier of Nova Scotia appeared before the reconstruction committee on December 2, 1943. He commented on the production situation and fully anticipated the very situation we have now. He elaborated on the number of tons that had been produced last year and forecast for the following year a shortage of approximately 1,200,000 tons. Why? Because he knew the situation. He was at least realistic about it. Anyone who wants verification of this statement will find it in the minutes of proceedings of the reconstruction committee volume No. 35. There you will find Premier MacMillan's statement that he anticipated the production situation we have now. The only people who did not see the picture as it really was were the heads of the fuel production board. Who were they? First you took in Mr. Henry Borden. My friends to my right have him now as organizer, and I hope he does as good a job there as he did on the fuel production board. He was the head of Barclays bank. Do you expect to get fuel production by bringing from Toronto to Ottawa a banker and giving him authority to organize your coal mines of Canada? I talked for an hour with him when he first came here; I was told by the Minister of Munitions and Supply to go and see him. He is a nice fellow, but he had not the slightest idea of the job he had to do—not the slightest. Right along, instead of picking men who knew production in the collieries to assist these boards and organize the machinery at the point of production where you would have had a solution to the problem, you fastened on men from the top down who were interested in maintaining private enterprise and their control on the economy of this country, and not interested in getting coal production by organizing the people who were producing the coal, because that might mean losing a little bit of their authority. That is the reason you did not get production, and there is an indictment against your fuel production board that will stand for all time, the indictment that was read into the records of this house by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend will admit that steps were taken to organize war production committees to increase the production of coal. That was done by the Department of Labour and by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but they were not organized.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are organized.

Mr. GILLIS: Your production committees as you visualize them in that industry will not get production, because in the mining industry of Nova Scotia you have a one hundred per cent organization of the workers, and you have a mine committee that functions six days a week, acting as a liaison between the manager of the colliery and the local union. That committee has certain definite functions to perform within the limits of the contract signed by the company. The solution is not there.

Mr. MITCHELL: If that is not the solution, perhaps my hon. friend will tell me what his solution is. We tried sincerely to increase production. We set up a special board on which organized labour and the employers were represented here in the city of Ottawa, and we have also two field men in Nova Scotia with the end in view of setting up production committees. My information is that an understanding has been arrived at between the management and the mine workers' union of America.

Mr. GILLIS: You have not got a solution there. We gave the solution to this house when the board was first set up. The mine workers' union presented a brief to the board in which they set out machinery that was necessary. Production committees are not going to solve the problem. The machinery briefly is this, and the minister can check it from Hansard because it was all put on record before. The mine workers' union and I recommended this machinery. We had pointed out that putting men down in the collieries was not going to increase production, and that has been borne out. We said that a reorganization on the job where the coal is produced was necessary, together with the elimination of certain conditions, particularly the remote control that exists between the head office in Montreal and the collieries in Nova Scotia, which means that a local official at the colliery before he can make an expenditure of one dollar that is not covered by the contract, an expenditure that might mean the saving of 1,000 tons of coal, must first get authority from Montreal—chasing all around the circle to Montreal to get the necessary authority, and that might take a week. The machinery which the mine workers recommended and which I recommended would work. We recommended setting up on the island of Cape Breton this machinery: Take the manager of the Dominion Coal company—the miners were not biased; they picked the manager—and the manager of each colliery and set up a regional production board functioning on the job, with equal representation from the local unions on that regional board. Your mine committees in your collieries, who are in touch with the day-to-day grievances, relay to that regional production board whatever information they may have on conditions that militate against production. The board would have authority to deal with that problem immediately instead of having to go to Montreal for a solution. They recommended the same machinery for the mainland of Nova Scotia, with the same set-up. What you are getting there is direct representation from the men and from the company; people who are practical, who can remove some of the conditions which are militating against production. The mine workers set out at that time what those conditions were.

First, the transportation of the men to their work overground. They are bringing them eight, nine and ten miles, in some cases with an obsolete train. I do not want to go over that again, but there is a job to be done. Then there is the improvement of the pressure necessary to cut the coal. Horses are working double time, and there is no feed for them from the time they leave the stables in the morning until they are taken back at night. In many cases the horses which have to work double shift collapse, and the men have to go home without producing any coal. Then there is the placing of timber at points convenient to the men. There is a job to be done in making conditions underground more satisfactory; at the present time they are deplorable. I shall support that statemeent by direct evidence received since last week from some of the collieries affected.

I had the pleasure, if one can call it such, of meeting Mr. Mike Dwyer, one of your regional directors of selective service, who was selected as regional production boss in Nova Scotia under the machinery which the government set up. I met him right after the house adjourned, subsequent to the declaration of an emergency in the matter of fuel, at the selective service office in Sydney, with the selective service officials. These officials knew their job if it could be done their way. The director had certain ideas. I told him that in my opinion he would not get any production by sitting in his office arguing with men who knew their work, but if he would come with me next morning I would take him down in some of these collieries and show him what had to be done if production were to be increased. I pointed out that you could collect a lot of men from the armed forces and other services all over Canada and pour them into these operations but that you would drop production by thirty-five per cent in the process. However, he would not come. It was too much trouble; he would have had to get up at five o'clock in the morning and spend a day underground roaming around and finding out what was wrong. The net result is now evident.

The reason I am so anxious about this coal situation is that I am not so sure that the mining industry of Nova Scotia is not being sabotaged. At any rate it is being stupidly managed. I am not so sure that some people are not ready to walk out of that section and leave it as they left Inverness, with holes which have been robbed to the point of not being profitable any longer, and then passed over to someone as a gift to carry on as a relief project. It looks to me like awfully stupid management by somebody who is getting ready to leave.

A royal commission is about to be set up by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and no doubt the personnel will soon be announced. The terms of reference must be sufficiently broad to include a complete check of all the operating companies in Nova Scotia plus their subsidiaries. They may leave the holes in the ground and operate subsidiaries which have been bought with money produced from those mines. There is a long story to be told in that connection, and it is not a very pleasant one. I stress the matter because I believe it is important that the commission should know exactly what the situation is.

In passing I would say that the subject of absenteeism has been played up in the Ontario press. It was reported that miners were away on a binge for weeks because of the money which they had to spend. That kind of stuff is not borne out by the facts. I have here a clipping from a Nova Scotia paper setting out that the credit union at New Waterford has 2,750 members and savings amounting to $152,768.34. The important thing to know in this connection is that the society had its biggest week recently, when $40,000 of the retroactive pay received at New Waterford was paid into that credit union in savings. Those men did not go on a binge. I have here several other clippings pointing out the increase of savings in credit unions across Nova Scotia because of that retroactive pay. The publicity which the miners have been receiving in certain sections of the press from one end of the country to the other, imputing to them extravagance and dissipation, does not do Canada any service because it is not borne out by the facts. The situation of the credit union at New Aberdeen is even better. I notice that a reporter of the Toronto Star visited this district and was disappointed that he could not get pictures of people throwing away ten dollar bills and the like. He was amazed at the number of people who were depositing their retroactive pay in the credit union at New Aberdeen.

Here is another clipping, taken from the Glace Bay Gazette of June 13. It relates to the members of the Phalen local, connected with one of the largest collieries. There are two collieries there. One, No. 120, is operated by a tunnel driven up from No. 2. The conditions about which they are complaining—quarreling with the superintendent and management and other minor grievances—could be cleaned up in short order if the machinery which I spoke of a moment ago were in existence.

I have a letter from the president of United Mine Workers of America, district No. 26, Mr. Freeman Jenks. I am not going to read it into the record, but he sets out the causes of dissatisfaction which exist among the men, and makes the observation that it looks as though someone was trying to sabotage the industry.

One of the first things which happened when that dollar-a-day plus vacation with pay was granted was that the company went around chiselling rates which had been in operation for years, including dead work which was being paid for. In some cases, Mr. Jenkins points out, men receiving the dollar a day, after losing the other concessions, wound up by being about three cents better off than they were prior to getting the increase. That kind of thing does not make for harmony, nor does it get you production.

Mr. McGEER: Why were they only three cents a day better off?

Mr. GILLIS: For the simple reason that the company went about chiselling on other rates, to such an extent that the men wound up by being about three cents a day better off than they were before the dollar a day was granted to them.

Here is a letter from Douglas McDonald, who is a member of the legislative assembly and also a board man of the United Mine Workers of America in the New Waterford district. He writes this letter of his own volition; I did not ask him for it. He says:

> This morning, June 20, thirteen loaders from 17 West Wall No. 12 colliery were forced to come home after going down to place, the face was left unprotected, no hardwood blocks or props for men to put up, and piles of hardwood and thousands of props on surface. Here is a loss of approximately 220 tons of coal. . . .

He goes on to tell me the story. It confirms what I pointed out a moment ago. With your other machinery functioning, with contacts through the medium of your mine committees and your production committees which could be utilized later, conditions of that kind would be reported direct, the machinery would function properly on the job, and these conditions would not exist.

In connection with working on Saturdays—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall be through in a minute. There is something more in that story than the Minister of Munitions and Supply would indicate. I have here an editorial appearing in the Glace Bay Gazette of June 29 in which I observe that action is going to be taken by the miners' union against selective service for not enforcing the regulations with respect to the men being kept on the job. According to this, men are reporting for work on Friday nights and reporting on Saturdays, and they are being sent home from the colliery, which constitutes a violation of a certain section of national selective service regulations. I know that these men are not quarreling with the officials and the people down there, trying to get the mines working on Friday nights and on Saturdays because they want to create an impression somewhere. They are not.

If I may take a minute before I close, I would like to point out that one factor that is being classified as absenteeism, and incorrectly so, is that hundreds of the younger miners who produced coal in 1939 to the extent indicated in the minister's report, working a fairly decent man-day, through which production was built up, are to-day in the services in France and Italy. We have now in the mines in Nova Scotia, and I presume the same is true of the west, older miners whose backs have been broken, so to speak, loading coal and working five or six days a week, and who are not able to maintain the production which the younger men could maintain up to 1939. They were working only two and three days a week; every pound of coal that could be produced was produced within two or three days, so that the figures given by the minister in that connection are not correct.

I merely wanted to emphasize the two points I did, without going into the budget specifically, because I thought it was necessary that the record should be clarified in these two particulars.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Our country is almost at the end of the fifth year of its participation in the greatest war in human history. Amendments to the budget emphasize the various alleged sacrifices at home, but I suggest that the real sacrifice at this time in this war is that of the young lives that are being cut off, or the sacrifice made by young men who are being seriously injured on the very threshold of their lives. If we are to bring to fruition the better things for humanity made possible by the untold sacrifices that are being made, we of the united nations should continually remind ourselves that we failed our young soldiers, sailors and airmen, to a great extent following the last war. We had high hopes at that time and talked very much as we do to-day; we said that it was a war to end all war and that we were going to build a world fit for heroes to live in. Our failure to live up to the high hopes then held out—and that failure cannot be denied, for another world war has occurred within twenty-five years of the close of the last one, and we have had widespread unemployment, such as prevailed particularly in the thirties throughout the world—should indicate to us that it is not enough to have good intentions. We must have very well thought out plans in order to avoid the same results following this war.

Obviously Canada cannot within and by herself totally take care of the problems which face us, because no self-contained reorganization of our internal set-up can entirely prevent a similar failure again. We must this time avoid past mistakes and resolve to do our part both within the country and externally to see that these mistakes are not repeated after this war. This will entail our taking full part in the world organization to guarantee peace. Personally I cannot think of anyone who is more likely to see that Canada does everything that is possible to promote this end than the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In my judgment it would be a tragedy if anything happened to prevent him from representing Canada at the peace conference. Any hope of a lasting peace must be based on our doing all we can to see that a just peace is established, so that we shall have a peace that will not break down in spite of our efforts to preserve it. The present Prime Minister's long experience of world affairs, as a negotiator and conciliator, should make his contribution a most important and perhaps vital factor in a successful peace conference. In this connection I submit that we must not only restore the brave peoples of France, Poland, Norway, China, Czechoslovakia, and other overrun countries, to full freedom and liberty; we must support other peoples in their aspirations toward freedom, liberty and self-government.

In this respect there is one people in particular in whose welfare Canada should take a special interest. They are people who have made in the past and are making now a substantial contribution to the building of Canada, and in this war they have taken a most worthy part in our war effort, having enlisted in our armed forces, and in every other way having done their full share in supporting the war effort. Their splendid efforts have been the cause of admiration and pride on the part of all Canadians. I refer to the Ukrainian people. I hope that the day is not long distant when the Ukraine will be a unified, free and self-governing nation. When that day arrives, the Ukrainian nation will be one of the great powers of the world. It will consist of forty-million people inhabiting one of the richest parts of the earth's surface. The Ukrainian people in Europe, by their courageous defence of their homes, by their enormous sacrifices in this war, have surely earned the right, if any people have, to their full measure of freedom and self-government, and I hope they will have it immediately following this war. I urge this government to give this matter their special attention so that when the peace conference comes it can give these aspirations of the Ukrainian people its full support.

I cannot let this occasion pass without again paying my humble tribute to the way in which those of all racial origins in Canada have united in the common service of the country. I feel that they have all done and are doing their part now, and after the war people of all racial origins in this dominion will be able to look back on this era of great accomplishments with pride in the achievement of the various sons of Canada, regardless of their origin.

Turning now to the domestic arena, in which we must not again fail to guarantee a minimum standard of well-being to our people, young and old, I welcome the various steps already taken and to be taken by this government to bring economic security to our people. I feel that a tremendously worth-while step was taken in this direction by the enactment of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which gives the farmer some measure of economic security when he loses his crop or there is a crop failure. I believe this measure will have to be extended in western Canada by a greater measure of individual crop insurance. As it stands, however, it has been a most worthwhile contribution to economic security in western Canada.

I welcome the family allowances bill because it will ensure a certain income to all families in Canada with children under sixteen years of age, regardless of loss of position, regardless of loss of crops, regardless of the death or incapacity of the bread-winner. And since it is such a real humanitarian measure I personally find it hard to understand the opposition to it by some radical labour leaders.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the family allowances measure is now before the house in the form of a resolution. He will have an opportunity to discuss it when it again comes up. He must not discuss it now.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, I had in mind the fact that the money for that purpose was provided in the budget and that it would not be out of order to mention my support of the measure in the budget address.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss it when it comes before the house. On another occasion I had to call one or two hon. members to order on the same point.

Mr. TUCKER: The same objection may apply to what I intended to say in support of the health insurance scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; that is not before the house yet.

Mr. TUCKER: I would say that I welcome the measure to provide a real health insurance scheme for this country. I understand that all that is necessary to put it into operation as a workable and comprehensive scheme, perhaps as good as that of any country in the world, is the full support of the provinces. I hope that it will receive that support and that we shall have in the near future a real measure of health insurance in Canada.

I also welcome the farm improvement loan scheme, because it is designed to improve the homes of our farming people. Since I have been in this house I have taken the attitude that our farming people are as much entitled to the amenities of life as people living in the cities, and if the provisions of this measure are brought into effect I think it will halt the tendency of people to move from the rural areas to the cities. I certainly welcome the bill by which the farmers may hope to improve their homes and equipment.

I commend the government most heartily for its provision that profits in agriculture may be charged back in regard to income tax against loss for one year or forward against loss for three years. It is well known that farming is a most uncertain industry, and while it was on a yearly basis, of course the profit of one year on which the taxes would be paid might be entirely wiped out by losses the next year or the following year. I am sure that that measure of relief to our farmers will be much appreciated throughout Canada.

As to the floor under farm prices, that again is a recognition of something that has been perhaps overdue, but, at any rate, I welcome it. For many years it has been recognized that labour is entitled to minimum wages. At last it is recognized by our government which takes the attitude that farmers are entitled to minimum prices for their products, just as labour is entitled to fixed minimum wages, and for that reason I think the farming community of this country should welcome that measure being brought in at this session.

However, Mr. Speaker, underlying our ability to finance and provided a high standard of living for our people in Canada without tremendous dislocation and interference with our individual freedom is the preservation of markets for the commodities which we produce in such enormously larger amounts than we can possibly consume in Canada. We know that in the decade before 1913, when we had a good market for our products, Canada enjoyed prosperity; likewise, we had real prosperity in the decade from 1919 to 1929, at which time there was also a real market for our exportable surpluses. During the period from 1930 to 1939 when world trade was dislocated by severe restrictions to trade by various nations we had a depression and suffering not only in Canada but throughout the whole world, and that includes Soviet Russia which was under a socialist government. Now the question is, has the world learned its lesson in regard to the futility of each nation trying to live unto itself alone and build up a self-contained economy? I hope it has, but signs indicate that we should not take this for granted and should see to it that we in Canada maintain in office a government which does believe in promoting and improving world trade.

Canada is more dependent for prosperity upon retaining a market for her vast agricultural surpluses than perhaps any other country. I realize that to-day in theory we all believe in retaining world markets; theoretically we do. But world markets like everything else in this world can be obtained only at a price, and I suggest that that price is our willingness to accept payment for our exports by imports. So far as we in Canada are concerned, except for the small part of our imports which come from countries which can grow produce that we on account of our climate cannot grow, the bulk of our imports consists of goods which we can produce in Canada albeit at higher cost and sometimes much higher cost. A protective tariff is designed to keep out goods which we cannot produce in this country as cheaply as we can import them. By so doing not only does it raise our cost of living and production but, what is even more disastrous, it destroys the means of other countries buying any of our exports. As I have stated, anyone who studies the effect of trade on Canada's economy must be struck by the fact that we in Canada depend perhaps more than any other country on export trade. Approximately one-third of our national income comes directly from the sale of our exports in foreign markets. A large part of the remainder of our economy in turn depends upon the purchasing power of the third within Canada which does depend directly upon foreign trade. Therefore the part of our economy which depends upon purchasing power based upon world trade is very large. One has only to think of the difficulties of our farmers from 1930 to 1939 owing to the curtailment of our export market to realize this point. Think of what would happen if by trying to establish a self-contained economy we lost our export market for wheat. Not only would about three-fifths of our western farmers have to turn to some other occupation, but the value of their lands, buildings and machinery would be practically wiped out, if only a fraction of the land now used was required to grow the wheat which could be used and exported.

In this connection I most earnestly commend the government for removing the customs tariff on farm machinery, including milking machines and cream separators, for removing the war exchange tax of ten per cent from these articles and for removing the tax on component parts of the same articles imported in connection with their manufacture in Canada. One of the things that seems to be overlooked is that, as I understand the situation, these items will now enter Canada from any other country of the world duty free. I do not think the words of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) in this regard are warranted in referring to the total abolition of such imports as a "mincing step," as he did in this debate. He said that farm machinery is monopoly controlled and that something should be done about this. If such a condition does exist, no more decisive blow could be struck at that monopoly than to make all such articles free of customs duties, no matter from where imported, as is now being done. The leader of the C.C.F. took this attitude himself in times past and his late leader took the same attitude. If machinery can be brought in free, not only from the United States but from any other country, no monopoly can long exist and control prices, under those conditions.

The leader of the C.C.F. also used the argument that when the tariff on farm machinery was reduced, prices to the farmers actually rose. He, and others who use this argument, know very well that this is a specious and incorrect argument against tariff reduction. The reason for the rise in prices of farm implements in past years, in spite of a lowering of tariffs on imports from the United States of America, has been that cost of production, including freight rates, raw materials and taxes, has risen both in the United States and Canada. Wages, too, have risen. A large proportion of the increase in prices of farm implements has actually been due to the rise in the cost of labour.

The average annual earnings of labour engaged in the manufacturing industry has risen by 212 per cent between 1910 and 1942, and from 1935 to 1942 by 45 per cent. As I understand it, the C.C.F. holds out the hope to labour that this upward movement in wages will be encouraged, not discouraged; so that I do not think the argument about the rise in prices being due to tariffs should be put forward by that party.

This raises another point. If the C.C.F. gets into power, and the farm implement industry is socialized, wages raised and working hours reduced, and it is found that, for example, Russia, with longer hours and lower wages, can make farm machinery cheaper, what would my hon. friends of the C.C.F. do? I do not think they would raise the tariffs; it would not be necessary, because they would operate our trade under an export and import board. Imports could come in only with the permission of the import board, which the C.C.F. promises to set up. All imports of farm machinery from any other country could be excluded.

The socialized farm implement industry could then pay as high wages as it wished, and be as inefficient as it probably would ultimately become, under bureaucratic management. It could provide work at good salaries for hundreds of inspectors and government officials, and no one would be worse off except the farmer, who would probably be paying twice as much for his machinery as would, for example, his competitor in the Argentine.

Would this not extend to every other necessity of the farmer which could be made in Canada? Farmers' costs would necessarily sky-rocket. Where would this put the farmer, when he was placed in competition with farmers in other countries? I know the C.C.F. have an answer. They would pay more to the farmer for his produce. Having severely curtailed imports, they, of course, would have curtailed exports because nations after this war will be able to pay for our exports only if we take their exports in payment.

The C.C.F. would be in the position of having to buy the farmers' products, the market for which they had largely destroyed. And they would have to buy at increased prices. What would they do with those products? Who would pay the increased costs? They could not let prices of farm products go up in Canada, for that would take away the benefit of increased wages to labour. Taxes would be the only answer. On whom would those taxes fall? Necessarily they would fall on the people who earn money and have property. Since all major industries, except farming, would be socialized, under their present programme, it looks as if that industry would come in for pretty heavy taxation in order to supply the income the government would need to enable it to pay the farmer for the produce which it would buy and not be able to use.

I have condemned high tariff policies of Canadian governments in the past. The policy of the C.C.F. in handling our trade by export and import boards, on which of necessity the majority of the members would be from the central part of Canada, would in my judgment be far more disastrous to the farmer than any conceivable policy of high tariffs ever tried by any government in the past.

I believe we are entering a phase in world affairs when we, of all countries, should not think of entering into a socialist experiment which inevitably would lead to our losing a substantial part of our world markets, and our having to try to establish a self-contained economy resulting in terrific convulsions in our national economic organization, with consequential terrible hardship on our people.

So far as I am concerned, therefore, in the best interests of the farmers of this country, and particularly the people of Saskatchewan, I feel I should uphold the Liberal party, not because it has always done everything I should have liked to see it do, not because it has always moved as fast as I should have liked to see it move in the past—

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, and call your attention to citations numbers 238 and 239 in the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. I take it that those citations rule against the reading of speeches in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: All the speeches made so far in this debate have been read.

Mr. TUCKER: All I would say to that is this: I am not as skilful at reading my speeches as is the leader of the C.C.F. party, and his followers. I have not been doing it for so long.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is evident.

Mr. TUCKER: If they can do it, I think I can. I wished to-day to take up as little time as possible, by putting what I had to say in as concise language as possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: In previous years I have referred to the practice of reading speeches which has grown up in the house. Where ministers have read their speeches a certain amount of latitude has been given, because it is understood that they are stating policy. In that circumstance, latitude was given. However, that was not applied to other hon. members. During this debate I had not noticed any great amount of reading, with the exception perhaps, of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who stayed with his notes more than he should have done to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He read every word of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who is now speaking has been reading, a procedure which as already pointed out, is contrary to the rules.

Mr. McGEER: On the point of order, it seems to me the time has come to revise that rule. You see, it does not make much difference what a member says in the house, or whether he knows much about his subject. He would probably be able to get someone to write a speech for him, and that person might write a much better one than he could write himself. But when one of the ministers is privileged to rise in his place and read something that is written for him, that is a different matter altogether. The ministers of the government ought to know enough about the subjects they discuss to be able to speak on them. It seems to me that it is a violation of all the rules of parliamentary procedure to permit seniors to read and to deny the same privilege to juniors. I do not think anyone should read his speech, and I think that ought to include ministers as well as private members.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have nothing further to add. The provision has been accepted by the house that a certain amount of latitude be allowed the ministers. That is a provision with which I entirely agree. If a minister wishes to read, in the circumstances I have indicated, the practice has been that he do so. But when hon. members speaking on their own behalf read their speeches, as the hon. member has been doing, they are breaking the rules of the house. And, since the question has been raised, I must ask that the rules be complied with.

Mr. GARDINER: Speaking to the point of order, I have been listening to this debate since the beginning of it, and there has been only one member who has not read his speech. That was the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Every other hon. member who has spoken has read his speech, whether he was a minister, or whatever he was. I suggest that at least we ought to continue what we have started, until the hon. member who is now speaking has completed his speech.

Mr. JAQUES: On the point of order, I agree entirely with the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). We who sit in the body of the house, Mr. Speaker, can see what Your Honour cannot see from your seat. What the hon. member for Rosthern has said is perfectly true. I would suggest that perhaps the majority of speeches delivered in this house are read.

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. JAQUES: I have never done it. I have never acquired the skill to do it. But it is a fact, and I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern. Perhaps it is not done in committee, but in formal debate many speeches are read.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled already as to the practice and custom of the house.

Mr. TUCKER: I made up my mind that on this occasion I would follow the precedent established by all members of the C.C.F. who have read their speeches ever since they came here or at least for the past two or three years. I watched the leader of the C.C.F. read the speech he made in this debate, and I decided that if that were going to be done by the C.C.F. party and by the leader of the C.C.F. party, I had as many rights as the leader of the C.C.F. party and that if he were to be permitted to read his speech, I could read mine. It is the first time in my life I have read a speech in this house. If I am to be called to order for reading my speech then I insist that the members of the C.C.F. party be made to deliver their speeches and not read them. Just because they can hold them far off and follow them with their finger is no excuse. I watched the leader of the C.C.F. party following his speech the other day with his finger, and now we are greeted with the spectacle of one of his followers raising a point of order because I am reading a speech, something which I have never done before. I refuse to use any subterfuge. I was following my notes; I was reading my speech, but I read it on purpose partly, I may say, with the thought in mind that if objection were made it would bring this matter to a head. I am going to ask that the C.C.F. members be made to deliver their speeches in future without reading them.

Mr. REID: The point of order was raised in order to spoil your speech.

Mr. TUCKER: So far as the situation confronting this country to-day is concerned, we have the alternative of the Liberal party which proposes to go ahead and provide the economic security which the country is willing to support by taxation. It is going to base that economic security upon world trade, which is the only sound basis for it in the long run. I have pointed out already that the C.C.F. party are making promises that they will raise wages. If they raise wages, they will raise the cost of production of the goods made in this country. That will raise further the cost of production of the farmers. By action of import and export boards, imports then will be excluded, and the result will be that other countries will be unable to buy our exports. That will do more to destroy the economic production of this country than high tariffs ever did.

They will destroy our exports, and then they turn around and say that they are going to buy those products from the farmers at higher prices. They are holding out that inducement. That is the situation; that is the phoney policy which is being put up to our farmers. They are going to raise wages, which of necessity will raise the cost of production of the farmer. Then in the next breath they say that they are going to promote industry by protecting the production of industry by import boards. This will exclude imports from coming into our country, and then what will happen to the production of the farmers?

I suggest that the inevitable result will be the establishment of a self-contained economy in Canada. We, of all countries, depend most upon exports, upon what we can sell other nations, and yet here is a programme to set up a self-contained economy. If they do not intend to set up a self-contained economy they cannot possibly raise the cost of production in this country by raising wages. If the cost of production is raised of everything the farmer produces, how can he be expected to compete in the markets of the world? Therefore they must intend to subsidize the farming industry and, in doing that, they will have to tax heavily. As I pointed out, these taxes will of necessity fall upon those who are left to run their own affairs, those in receipt of incomes. It will simply mean that the farmer will have his markets destroyed and that all he will have will be the promise of higher prices for the things he will not be able to sell, to be paid by himself in higher taxes. These products will simply pile up. A situation based upon such plans is bound to collapse.

It is on that basis that they have gone throughout this country holding out the hope of higher wages and higher pay to everybody who works, holding out the hope of higher rewards to the farmers and everybody else. They know very well that to carry out their promises Canada would have to reorganize her whole economic set-up on a self-contained basis. It would mean the replacing of at least three-quarters of our farmers in other work which they would not be able to do as well as what they are now doing. That is the fallacious system upon which the C.C.F. policy is based.

So far as I am concerned, I believe that the Liberal party will reestablish the returned soldier as well, if not better than any other country. I believe that we have a leader who has the admiration of every other leader in the whole world. He will be able to make a great contribution to establishing an international system which will guarantee the winning of a peace that will be just and lasting.

Our present programme is one which aims at the establishment of the greatest possible measure of trade between the nations of the world. That is of more importance to Canada than it is to any other nation. It would be a tremendous and terrible mistake for our people at this stage to elect to power a party which believes that you can somehow establish a self-contained economy without rearranging the economic structure of our people.

Canada is going to occupy an important position at the peace conference. She will be one of the British commonwealth of nations; she is a nation on the American continent and will have a great influence upon the attitude the United States will take. Canada is in an influential position in regard to any attitude she may adopt. If we put into power a party that believes in a self-contained economy, a socialist economy, we shall have to get away from freer trade; we shall have a self-contained economy, the very thing that helped produce this war. In spite of all that, we have the C.C.F. party pretending that their policy will lead to an era of greater peace. I submit that their policy of a self-contained economy is one of the basic reasons for the outbreak of this war. That is one of the things that helped to put Hitler in power; it is one of the things that helped to bring about the present war.

They are proposing that Canada which must depend upon world trade should embark upon the setting up of a self-contained economy. The adoption of such a policy would be one thing that would help to destroy individual freedom in this country. Are they prepared to reorganize our people, to transfer perhaps three-quarters or two-thirds of our farmers to other industries? A number of countries in Europe endeavoured to be self-contained, and the adoption of that principle led to all the controls and interference by government officials we do not like in this country.

The issue which lies before this country in the near future is whether we want greater prosperity with more individual liberty or less prosperity with more bureaucratic control by the state; more in the way of self-contained economy and less in the way of well-being for our people. That is the great issue that will be put before the country.

The C.C.F. are to-day rejoicing in their measure of success in Saskatchewan, but I think in the near future the people of Canada, not only those of Saskatchewan and Ontario, once the issue is clear will adopt a policy by which Canada will once more be one of a family of friendly nations, one of a family which is willing to live and let live and to provide the greatest measure of freedom to its people and the greatest possible measure of social and economic security as great as the world has ever seen.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the sixth war budget I feel that I am starting out at quite a disadvantage, because my speech like all the others I have given here is not written, nor is anything I am going to say imported. My words will be entirely my own and based on experience. So that if my speech is not up to the high standard maintained so far, do not blame me because I am doing my best.

I feel it my first duty to pay tribute to the men and women who have gone overseas to fight our battles over there and to express to the relatives and friends of those who have fallen or been seriously injured my deepest sympathy. Having done that, I turn my thoughts for a little while to the budget.

Like a good many others who listened to or read the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), I am quite disappointed in it. We were looking for great things and we have got great things in some directions, but I am sorry to say, not in the right direction. The minister has on previous occasions referred to the revenues of this country, and we must, of course, give him credit for being a very good collector, or at least a very good suggester for the other fellow to do the collecting.

I should like to refer for a moment to the $813,000,000 of personal income tax collections. I am not in opposition to the principle of personal income tax, but I feel that it is not administered just as well and as equitably as it should be. For that reason I am opposed to the income tax as proposed in this budget. I feel that those in the lower income brackets should be relieved of much of their taxation, and I am also in favour of the compulsory savings portion of the income tax which has hitherto been in effect being continued if certain amounts of revenue have to be raised. I believe that it would be much better to maintain the compulsory savings feature and alleviate the income tax on the lower income groups. I believe that that would be much sounder and that it would accomplish the minister's ends much better.

I also believe that in the interests of this country income tax on pay for overtime should be abolished. When people work overtime they are entitled to a little breathing space so far as income tax is concerned, and with the country needing extra production the minister would be well advised to drop the income tax on overtime earnings.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? If overtime were relieved from taxation, would he suggest that the money that the farmer earned because of overtime work be also freed from taxation, and, if so, how?

Mr. FAIR: The minister is admitting now for the first time that the farmer does work overtime. If he wants to base it on that I shall have an answer for him on another occasion. But this is the first time I ever heard the minister admit that the farmers work overtime.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have never denied it.

Mr. FAIR: Then why not see that the farmer gets a little pay for his work?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no objection at all.

Mr. FAIR: And his wife and children should not be forgotten.

I shall refer only briefly to family allowances because Mr. Speaker would rule me out of order if I dwelt upon that subject, but the minister made reference to it in his budget speech. I accuse the Minister of Finance of stealing some of our platform. I am also going to accuse him of calling this provision family allowances and of paying these allowances under a system that should not be in existence. We advocate a dividend for all, paid with debt-free money. The minister advocates allowances for children up to a certain age, and paid for either with debt money or by taxation. His proposal amounts only to a redistribution of the poverty we still have in this country. The programme is not wide enough, and, when the minister studies things a little longer, I believe he will see that there is a better way of putting his plan into effect.

I consider that the old age pensioners have been neglected. A short time ago an amendment was made to the regulations to permit an old age pensioner to earn up to $125 a year without any deduction being made from his $25 a month pension. When a man or woman reaches seventy years of age there should not be any restrictions on the amount of money he or she may earn because, if they are ambitious and strong enough after all those years of toil to go on working, they should be free to earn all they can without affecting the amount of their pension which should be $50 a month at sixty.

Another problem that we have in this country is our educational system, and perhaps there is a reason for keeping it in existence. The taxes imposed on business are always charged back to the farmer, so that the farmer is the basic taxpayer of the country, and he is overridden by taxation at the present time. Our municipalities and provincial governments cannot supply an adequate system of education under our present taxation system, and if we want competent teachers to stay in the teaching profession grants will have to be made by the dominion government to the provinces and these grants will have to be administered by the provinces in the interests of Canada as a whole. Our educational standard is not high enough. It is better perhaps than in some other countries; but why compare a poor system of education with one that is poorer? The best that we could have is none too good for Canada, particularly when Canada could well afford a better educational system if only our affairs were properly managed.

Some proposals have been brought down with respect to a health programme. These are long overdue. I should like to see different means brought about for financing these health services. Of course, I am well aware that the health services are yet only on paper and that it may be some time before they are a reality, but I hope we do not have to wait long for these health services, which Canada can well afford to put into operation.

I come now to agriculture. I must not forget that, particularly because the Minister of Finance has given the farmers some consideration in this budget. In his budget speech at page 4184 of Hansard I find this:

> Canadian agriculture will be faced with important opportunities in the post-war period and if it is to take full advantage of them, its costs of production should be at the lowest practicable level. Recognition of this fact was given by the farm improvement loans bill and several important provisions of the bill for the extension of the bank charters now under consideration by the banking and commerce committee. These measures have as one of their most important objectives the provision of credit facilities to farmers which will enable them to purchase agricultural implements at the lowest cost on a cash basis. With the same end in view, the government believes it appropriate to provide at once and without waiting for the completion of reciprocal arrangements with other countries for the removal of all customs duties on agricultural implements. It is therefore recommended that agricultural machinery, including cream separators, and parts thereof, be made free under all tariffs. While it is impracticable from a revenue standpoint to remove the war exchange tax on the general range of commodities, the war exchange tax on agricultural machinery and cream separators and parts thereof is being removed along with the customs duties.

On behalf of farmers all over Canada I say to the minister, "Thank you for removing those custom duties and the war exchange tax". I feel that they should never have been put on. I do not think there was any excuse for it. Agriculture was down in the gutter and being stepped on right along, and those things are just further impositions to keep the farmers down where they should not be.

In connection with credit facilities to purchase farm implements, the rate of interest in the past was too high; it is still too high; and any benefits which may accrue through the farm improvement loan bill can speedily be offset by an increase in the prices of the implements we have to buy. It is my belief that the implement business has been a racket for a number of years. My suspicions were confirmed by the committee which, I think in 1938, investigated the farm implement business. So that if the government would see to it that unnecessary profits were not reaped from this business it would do agriculture a great service. I feel also that the farmers are being turned over once again to the bankers, with part of the credit guaranteed by the government, so that we can see where the government's friends come in.

I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in his place. I have here quite a few figures which support statements made by me on several occasions that the farmers are being robbed through prevailing prices for their agricultural produce. This government came into office in 1935. They were in full control of prices during the crop years 1935-36 to 1942-43 inclusive, and farmers did not live any too prosperous a life during that period. I admit that at the moment conditions are better than they were in 1935; but why should one be expected to compare conditions which are not up to standard with poorer conditions? In 1935-36 the farmers of Canada marketed 216,273,373 bushels of grain at a price of 87½ cents a bushel. Had we received what we were entitled to, the price paid would have been $1.60; that is, if we were given the same treatment as organized labour, and who will argue that we are not entitled to similar consideration? I am stating this because organized labour was allowed the highest level of wages between 1926 and 1929. Using the 1926 to 1929 figure for fixing our parity price—and I do not agree that that is the proper period to be taken for this purpose—we should have received $1.41 a bushel for our wheat. This means that upon that crop alone we did not receive $116,579,373 to which we were justly entitled. That is based on the 1926-29 period, when the farmers received 16·6 per cent of the national income, although constituting approximately one-third of the total population. In tabulated form the figures of wheat sales for the crop years 1935-36 to 1942-43 are as follows:

Year	Bushels sold	Price	Suggested parity	Amount not received
1935-36	216,273,373	.87½	$1.41	$116,579,373
1936-37	165,628,731	1.22		32,087,322
1937-38	125,471,078	1.31		12,913,533
1938-39	290,539,457	.80		179,189,417
1939-40	427,312,750	.70		306,740,947
1940-41	458,382,611	.70		329,093,741
1941-42	227,854,572	.70		164,590,378
1942-43	268,219,159	.90		139,403,292
				$1,280,598,003
Less wheat board payments				60,000,000
Loss to farmers based on $1.41 per bushel				$1,220,598,003

So that when some people tell us that the farmers are living in clover during the war years, I say that such people had better study the problem all over again. The figures I have given cover wheat only; if we go into other products, here are some prices to which we are justly entitled but which we are not getting. In the case of oats—based again on the same terms for labour—we should receive 69 cents a bushel, and we are receiving 61½ cents. For other products the corresponding figures are: barley, 79¾ cents instead of 90 cents; flax, $2.75 instead of $3. Again let me point out that if we were getting parity prices the figures should be based on the period 1915-19 instead of 1926-29. In the fourth year of the last war wheat averaged $2.24 a bushel, and up to the present time our high price this year is $1.25. Perhaps I should quote the prices for the various crop years: in 1935-36 87½ cents; in 1936-37 $1.22; that is on the open market, there being no wheat board purchases; 1937-38, $1.31 on the open market. In 1938-39 the initial price of wheat dropped down to 80 cents. In 1939-40 we were threatened at first with a price of 60 cents a bushel, which would have netted farmers for the top grade of wheat a little over 40 cents, but this was finally raised to 70 cents. In 1940-41 and 1941-42 the price of 70 cents was maintained. In 1942-43, after more than 400 farmers and other business representatives came from the western provinces to interview the government, the price was raised to 90 cents; and only last September, for the crop year 1943-44 the price was increased to $1.25, guaranteed.

For the purpose of computing income tax a five-year instead of a two-year period should be used, because there are plenty of ups and downs in the farming industry. While a farmer might break even or even make a little profit in one or two years, over five years he might experience a considerable loss.

Another question, which I believe is receiving the consideration of the Department of National Revenue, is that of taxation on payments we are getting from the wheat board on the 1940-1941 and 1942 crops. I notice that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) is present. I would point out to him that we farmers, while waiting for our money from the wheat board, were paying interest on debts which should have been discharged with this wheat board money, also paying storage on the grain and interest on the initial payment. During the years 1940, 1941 and 1942, income taxes were much lower than they are at present, and it would be entirely unjust to require the farmers to pay the high rate of tax which prevails on incomes at the present time. I understand that the committee is working on this matter, and I hope the point I have raised will be taken into consideration. Last year I asked the Minister of Finance to exempt farmers entirely from the income tax brackets until the injustices that prevail are removed. He did not see fit to do so, and I am renewing that request to-day.

There are other things that are not satisfactory. For instance, there is hog grading. We had a change of system which is very good, but it is not working out in dollars and cents from the point of view of the farmer. Someone near by says that it has been fixed up for him as a start. That may be another way of fooling the farmers a little longer. The packers who finally handle the hogs when they are ready are guaranteed the full amount of profits, and the farmer gets what is left, or a certain share of it.

There are other things to be fixed up and I trust the Minister of Agriculture will see to it that a number of them are attended to. The same thing is going on in connection with the beef cattle market. The farmers are not satisfied with the services that are being rendered. Wool prices are in the same unsatisfactory condition. While last year the minister made comparisons with prices paid in the United States, his argument did not hold very much water, because he was arguing on the basis of our wool being shipped to the United States and sold there. My argument is that there is no reason why our wool in Canada should not bring as good a price here as United States producers receive there for their wool, because in most cases they buy at a better price than we are allowed to buy at.

We are told that when we have legislation providing floor prices under agricultural products everything will be all right. I can agree with that, provided that the floor is placed at the proper level. If it is placed in the basement, or if the basis for fixing prices is taken on what prevailed during the depression years, in 1932, for example, when farmers received five per cent of the national income, then we might as well have no floor. We have to get to the point where the farmers will have their proper share of the national income before we shall have a proper adjustment basis. In that connection I might say that we have on the order paper a resolution which has been standing there since February 7 in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) as follows:

> Whereas agriculture has seldom received its fair share of the national income of Canada;
> And whereas the cost of producing all agricultural products varies considerably from year to year;
> Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house and in the interest of the nation as a whole, the government be requested to set the prices of agricultural products at such a level that it will guarantee to the farmers of Canada such a yearly percentage of the national income as will have the same relation to the national income as the agricultural population bears to the national population of Canada.

On these grounds I believe we shall get that which is properly coming to us, but while we continue to figure on some false foundation there is no possibility in the world of Canada becoming the nation it should be. There is no reason either why the farmer should be treated as the poor relation. The farmers are finally waking up to the fact that they are not receiving just treatment. Perhaps that is why our Saskatchewan friends cannot agree with the reading of speeches in the house or even speeches delivered in any other way by some hon. members, because the farmers of that province not very long ago told the government in very plain terms that they were not satisfied and that something had to be done. When I say that I do not mean that the farmers of Saskatchewan and the businessmen out there voted for socialism. They were simply not satisfied with the machine they had. They did not think it was giving them what they wanted and they thought they would break the machine and then get the necessary changes. I believe the farmers of Saskatchewan want security with freedom just as the rest of us do, and perhaps in the very near future we shall have things built up in that province on a more satisfactory basis.

Dealing again with the old soldier settler problem, I suggest that we have to continue pressing for this, particularly because of certain articles that appeared in the Legionary, the official organ of the Canadian Legion. I have seen the May issue, which contained a bitter attack upon the requests that have been and are being made by soldier settlers for clear titles to their land. It was written by a civil servant of the government, who, I understand, went to the legion convention and got in his work there. He wandered into a committee room where a committee was dealing with the resolution on soldier settler business, and burnt-out veterans, and said that he hoped he was not intruding. When the facts are known I think it will be seen that he was intruding and that he is not wanted by the soldier settlers of Canada. I cannot place all the blame on this particular civil servant. The minister in charge has to accept his responsibility also, and if the Veterans' Land Act which is being administered at the present time is to be a success, then the business of the old Soldier Settlement Act and the Veterans' Land Act must be removed from the charge of the Minister of Mines and Resources and a different man put in as director. I am quite satisfied that we shall not and cannot have a satisfactory administration while the present set-up exists there.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. FAIR: When the house rose at six o'clock I had commenced to deal with the problem of soldier settlers who settled on the land after the last war. I had made one or two recommendations and I do not intend to deal with this matter in detail this evening, because several members including myself have dealt with it in detail on other occasions.

On June 14 I went into this matter very fully and I feel that the government is now well aware of the conditions existing. It is sufficient at this time to say that after the end of world war No. 1 some twenty-five thousand veterans settled on the land. After twenty-five years we find that just over four thousand of those have obtained titles and that at the end of March of this year 6,153 still remained on the land, being indebted to the extent of some $7,700,000. I am making a further plea to have clear titles granted to those people.

Under the present set-up of the Veterans' Land Act, 1942, the free grant provided for those settlers amounts to approximately thirty-nine per cent of the total amount expended by way of credit. At the present time the 6,153 are still indebted to the board to the extent of only twenty-nine per cent of their original debt. If this amount is forgiven, if clear titles are issued, those old soldier settlers who were settled on the land under the improvised scheme will not receive nearly as much as those who are to be settled under the Veterans' Land Act. Under the new measure the persons affected are asked to pay off only sixty-one per cent of their total indebtedness. I think the government might very well take this into consideration, when they deal in the near future with the problems of old soldier settlers.

My time has almost expired, and with what is left of it I shall refer to only one or two further matters. I would speak first about our national debt. I believe that, since confederation, in only fifteen or seventeen years have we had a balanced budget, or a surplus. Yet we have been told by the present Minister of Finance that we can and will pay off our national debt. The only way I can see in which that can be done under our present system is by refunding or by renewing the old notes. That is not good enough, because the interest being paid is eating up a lot of the money which should be used for social services, and other things for the welfare of the people.

I say, therefore, that some new system of financing will have to be devised; otherwise we shall soon be the total slaves of our financial system. The main function of the government, as I see it, is, first, to win the war and, second, to make preparations for winning the peace. We have been told time and again that unless those preparations are made before the end of the war, it will be too late. On several occasions we in this group have recommended that certain changes be made in order to make that preparation for winning the peace. To do this, our basic industries—and, first of all, agriculture—will have to be placed on a sound footing. That is one thing which has not yet been done in Canada. All sections of the country and all occupational groups must be treated fairly and equitably; otherwise we cannot have a prosperous or contented people.

If hon. members want any illustrations of this, let them note how the farmers have been treated in the past, and then compare that treatment with the treatment given bankers. I believe one of the best exhibitions of the way in which bankers have been treated has been shown in the banking and commerce committee in the last weeks. What has happened in that committee has opened the eyes of the people of Canada. They have found out just what is going on along those lines. The battle against the money powers, which was promised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1935, is being fought and lost, so far as the people of Canada are concerned.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Saskatchewan Cooperative Consumer of March 15, 1940. I believe this is well worth reading this evening, and I am reading it particularly because we have heard a number of government supporters tell us just what a great man the Prime Minister is. This article will, I believe, state my case just as well as I could in my own words. The article is headed "That Astonishing Person"—and I am adding the words "The Prime Minister". It is as follows:

This parable, by an unknown author, illustrates the sad dilemma into which civilization has drifted.

"Man can circle the earth without touching the ground; men can kill other men twenty miles away; man can weigh the stars of heaven; man can drag oil from the bowels of the earth; man can compel an icy waterfall to cook his meals hundreds of miles from the stream; man can print a million newspapers in an hour; man can breed the seeds out of oranges; man can coax a hen to lay 365 eggs in a year; man can persuade dogs to smoke pipes and sea lions to play guitars. Man, in other words, is quite an ingenious and remarkable package of physical and mental machinery.

But, when this astonishing person is confronted with one problem, he retires defeated to his hut. Show him six men without money and six loaves of bread belonging to men who cannot use it, but who want money for it, and ask him how the six hungry men can be put in possession of the six surplus loaves and watch him then. It is then that—"

The Prime Minister—

"—attends conferences and appoints committees cries out that a crisis is upon him. He does and holds elections and makes speeches and a score of useless things and then retires to his hut, leaving in the shivering twilight the tableau of the six hungry men and the six unapproachable loaves."

Mr. BLAIR: Poppycock.

Mr. FAIR: In order to get the Prime Minister out of this dilemma I am going to suggest just one solution. There is only one way in which he can get out of that terrible mess into which he has got himself, and which he apparently does not seem to be able to get out of. The answer is: Social credit. There is no other way out of it. I can find no more suitable words with which to finish my speech this evening than to ask the Prime Minister to put into effect a genuine social credit policy, and give the people of Canada economic security with freedom.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, while I do not share the social views held by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), yet I believe that if the war effort of Canada is to be financed according to orthodox methods, then in the present minister we have as fair a servant of the people as could be found.

When one considers the record of the present government, since a minister of finance presented the first war-time budget in 1939, he must be impressed by what the people of Canada have done under the stress of war. The minister has exploded pretty completely the theory that the efforts of any nation should be limited in any way by the amount of gold available in bank vaults, or any other place. It has been demonstrated that whatever is physically possible can be made possible by a nation in war time.

We see that while in 1939-40 the total peace-time requirements were only $308,000,000, in the next year those requirements had increased to $390,000,000, while in the next year they were $444,000,000 and in 1942-43 were $561,000,000. The estimated amount for 1943-44 is $630,000,000. But if one looks into the war-time expenditures he finds that they have been increased from $118,000,000 in the first year to $752,000,000 in the next, $1,339,000,000 in 1941-42 and over $3,324,000,000 in 1942-43. In the present year, 1943-44, the amount is $4,624,000,000.

Then, when one considers the expenditures of one department, such as the Department of Munitions and Supply, he finds that those expenditures have increased from $79,000,000 in 1940-41 to $725,000,000 in 1943-44, or almost ten times as much in four years.

When one takes note of these very large expenditures he might think that hon. members would have been able to support the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. May I say in passing that while I support the amendment offered by the official opposition, I should like to have it clearly understood that if I had to choose between having as Minister of Finance the present minister and having as minister the financial critic of the official opposition, I would much prefer retaining the present minister. If one considers the amendment submitted on behalf of the Conservative party he will see it is obvious that it does not really deal with anything fundamental. The first clause reads:

That no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation.

I hope when we are in committee the mover of that resolution will submit a form that will be simple enough to enable the administration to collect money from the taxpayers by a painless method. The official opposition found it impossible to support the subamendment, which reads:

This house regrets, further, that the government has failed to make provision or plans for the expenditure of, at least, five billion dollars during the first two post-war years for the purpose of establishing a comprehensive national system of social security and of maintaining full employment through public investment in such projects as a low-cost housing programme in town and county, rural electrification, the conversion of government-owned war plants to the production of peacetime goods, the public development of Canada's oil and mineral resources, the promotion of scientific research, and artistic and cultural work throughout Canada.

The fact that the official opposition was unable to support that amendment indicates pretty conclusively that they really did not believe in an alternative to the methods now being presented by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. GRAYDON: You had only one speaker who rose and supported it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The official opposition did not give us any support; to a man they voted against it.

Mr. COLDWELL: We said all that was necessary to say.

Mr. GRAYDON: You spoke, and of course that answered it all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was pretty clear that the so-called Progressive Conservative party is really as Tory as ever with the Meighens and the people of King and Bay streets, Toronto, controlling the policy of this newly named political party. When one considers the very large government appropriations in times like these; when one considers that this year the federal government will spend over four billion dollars in directing Canadian production, he must realize that if this country is not going to guarantee an expenditure of at least two and a half million dollars for the first two years after the war is over, then Canada will slide into the worst depression we have ever known in our history.

Some time ago one Progressive Conservative suggested that the synthetic rubber plant at Sarnia should be left to free enterprise. While there are several large companies interested in the management of this plant, there was no private enterprise prepared to expend $48,000,000 to experiment in producing a substitute for natural rubber. The people of this country collectively supplied that money. Now that it has been demonstrated that a product which compares favourably with natural rubber can be made in large quantities, a product that promises to be an important factor in Canadian economy when the war is over, we see what must be the policy of this government when the war is over.

Is the government to hand this industry over to free enterprise? Are we to have one synthetic rubber plant or are we to have five or ten? Are ten times $48,000,000 or ten times the amount of material and labour used in the construction of this plant to be expended in the building of unnecessary enterprises? I submit that unless the administration of this country is prepared after the war to continue the spending of large sums of money, then Canada will not be able to provide full employment for those in the armed services and those now working in war industry.

I think the minister has overlooked the importance of popularizing some of the work done under his direction. While some years ago he boasted of his faith in free enterprise, he found that it was imperative to have control of foreign exchange, to set up the wartime prices and trade board, to have rationing and priorities. As I say, I think it is unfortunate that more publicity has not been given to the important functions carried on by these branches under the Minister of Finance and the part they have played in our national economy. Instead of allowing those who have been cramped by these regulations to count the days until the war is over, until they will be free from these controls, until prices will rise without any restrictions, until the sky will be the limit in the making of profits, we should be giving the public the details of what has been done. The minister should endeavour to bring the public with him in supporting these controls, not only in war time but after the war is over, because the danger of inflation will not disappear with the firing of the last gun and the signing of the peace treaty.

I wish to use most of my time to-night to discuss a subject which I think will be a very important one in the post-war period, a subject which unfortunately has not received the attention it should have received in parliament. Since the war started very few members have taken the time to discuss the place that housing plays in the life of Canada. I should like to congratulate the government—the members of this group do congratulate the administration from time to time—upon the excellent report on housing and community planning which was tabled on March 24 and which has recently been printed.

In January, 1943, the administration set up a sub-committee on housing and community planning as part of the advisory committee's work on reconstruction. Professor C. A. Curtis, professor of economics of Queen's university was chairman, and E. R. Arthur, professor of architecture, university of Toronto, was a member. Mr. J. S. Galbraith; Mr. F. W. Nicolls, director of housing, Department of Finance, Ottawa; Mr. J. M. Piggot of Wartime Housing Limited and a number of others were also members. Doctor Marsh acted as research adviser and Doctor Firestone also did valuable research work, as did Mr. Greenway of the dominion bureau of statistics. Never before in Canada have we had such a comprehensive study of housing legislation in the different provinces and communities. It contains some very useful suggestions and suggests a pattern of the things to come. I should like to remind the house that while Canada has had a great abundance of lumber, cement and other building materials, our housing achievements have been anything but spectacular.

Housing legislation in Great Britain dates back to 1851. The first legislation passed in that year was based on the findings in the Chadwick report. Apparently in those days in Great Britain it took some time to get things done. That report was tabled in 1838 and it took about thirteen years to get action, but by 1851 they had legislation on their statute books and had made a real start toward the clearing of their slums.

A start was made some years ago in the United States, and when I last discussed the question of housing I devoted a great deal of time to describing some of the housing projects I had seen in Boston and in the green belt in Maryland. I want to make it clear that they have not solved their housing problem in the United States. In all their large cities there are slum areas which are eyesores to the people who have to live in them. The cost of maintaining those slums is a very important factor in the taxation structures of the communities, but in Canada we have a very short history in the field of housing.

During the last war the government recognized that you could not have full production if men working in war factories had to travel many miles to and from work, or if three or more families had to live in crowded quarters. It was realized that an appropriation would have to be made to relieve the housing shortage. But following the war it was not until 1935 that the Dominion Housing Act was passed. The results of its first two years of operation were quite disappointing. By 1936 only 936 units were built, but the following year this number was doubled and some experience was acquired which convinced the people of the country that some improvement should be made in the act. Later, in 1938, the National Housing Act was passed. That act has made it possible for people in the higher income brackets to acquire a house at lower costs than previously prevailed. By advancing twenty per cent of the cost and only ten per cent for the lower price houses, people were able to acquire ownership of homes on monthly payments amortizing principal, interest, insurance and taxes which did not amount to much more than they would have had to pay for rent. But the National Housing Act has not relieved the situation in some areas. It has not made any appeal to the people in the lower income brackets. There are very few lower paid workers who are ever in a position to advance even the ten per cent necessary to get them started owning their own homes.

Since the war started we have had Wartime Housing Limited, which has relieved the pressure in some of the larger industrial areas, but we cannot view that experiment as having solved anything. Many of the houses built under Wartime Housing were of a temporary nature. The undertaking was given that they would be demolished after the war, so that they would not become slum areas, but experience has proven that temporary houses are never demolished as long as less desirable houses are being occupied. With very few exceptions where these wartime houses have been built there is a shortage of permanent houses, and it is hardly conceivable that any administration will compel people to move out of these wartime houses into the public parks so that these hastily built houses may be demolished. They have not been built with a view to permanence, although the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) indicated on occasions that basements for them would be constructed and some attempt made to have them become permanent houses.

When members consider the very large shifts in population that have taken place since the war started they will appreciate the immediate problem of having quarters available for our heroes when the war is over. Many of these young men got married just before enlisting and going overseas. Their brides stayed on with their families. It is not good enough to ask these young people to wait for four or five or six years after the husbands return before they will be able to get into quarters of their own.

In Halifax, for example, the number of employees in 1939 totalled something over 8,000, and in 1942 over 16,000, an increase of over 108 per cent. In Saint John the number of workers increased from 6,000 to 11,000 between 1939 and 1942, an increase of seventy-eight per cent; in Quebec, an increase of ninety-eight per cent; in Montreal, an increase of forty-nine per cent; and further increases were: in Ottawa, forty-seven per cent; Toronto, fifty-six per cent; Hamilton, seventy-one per cent; London, twenty-nine per cent; Windsor, 121 per cent; Winnipeg, thirty per cent; Vancouver, eighty per cent, and Victoria, ninety-five per cent. The total increase in these twelve metropolitan areas was from 521,000 in 1939 to 826,000 in 1942, an increase of 305,000.

The instructions to the committee were issued in January, 1943. Here we are in the first week of July, 1944. We have this excellent report, but we have no machinery at Ottawa or in the provinces to start the real task of building houses when materials are available after the war. I think the time is long past when the administration should have announced in detail its housing plans. While some criticism might be made of this report I want to urge the administration to implement it, making whatever changes in it they think desirable, but without further delay to announce its plans for housing to the house and have some of the suggestions contained in this report carried out.

It is imperative that the federal administration should make known its plans with respect to town planning. Since the start of the war there has been a very large movement of population to cities like Hamilton, Windsor, Halifax, and the people of these cities naturally wonder whether this influx of people is to be permanent or whether the people will be returning to the prairies or some other part of Canada. It is pointed out in this report that at the time of confederation Canada did not have any large metropolitan areas. Winnipeg, one of the largest cities in the west to-day, at that time had a population of about 200; Moncton, now a busy city, had a population of only 500. There were three fairly large centres at that time: Montreal with a population of 130,000, Quebec with 59,000 and Toronto with 59,000. Ottawa at that time had a population of about 20,000. While Halifax has a very long history, it had then a relatively small population. At the time of confederation those wise fathers of confederation did not anticipate that Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal would in the course of seventy-five years grow to the very large centres they have become, and accordingly did not provide for dividing the responsibility between the dominion and the provinces in regard to town planning and housing. We have not yet determined whether an extensive housing programme should be the responsibility of the federal government, provincial governments or municipal governments. The question has been a convenient football to be kicked around from one administration to another on the ground that the British North America Act did not clearly define the responsibility.

Therefore I suggest that without further delay a conference of the nine provinces with the dominion should be called, with representatives also from the cities and rural municipal organizations across Canada, to discuss the one, single problem of housing with a view to reaching an agreement for the setting up of machinery after the war to relieve the housing situation, so that men now engaged in the construction industry building factories and war plants will be available to go into high gear building homes for our people.

One interesting section of this report deals with farm housing. Again I am grateful that at last a department of government has recognized that people on the farms in this country deserve better houses than they have hitherto had. I find, according to one of the bulletins issued by the bureau of census on farm dwellings in Canada, that in Saskatchewan where I live only one farm house out of 100 has running water; in Manitoba, two out of 100; Alberta, three; Prince Edward Island, nine; Nova Scotia, fourteen; New Brunswick, eighteen; Quebec, twenty-five; Ontario, fourteen; and British Columbia has the largest proportion, with thirty-four out of 100.

The situation with respect to electric lighting is similar. Saskatchewan has the worst record in that respect, with only five homes out of 100 having electric lighting. British Columbia has the best record, with thirty-six out of 100. In Saskatchewan, where we have plenty of frost in the winter time and people should be able to store up some ice for summer use, owing to depressed conditions over many years only seven farms in every 100 have mechanical and ice refrigeration.

In connection with the value of farm dwellings, I find that in Saskatchewan the value of the average farm house is $950. New Brunswick, however, has the poorest record in this connection. It has produced very large quantities of lumber, and it should have been possible to acquire some paint there, but the average value of dwellings in that province is only $861. Values in the other provinces are: Prince Edward Island, $1,049; Nova Scotia, $953; Quebec, $1,019; Ontario, $1,421; Manitoba, $966; Alberta, $999; British Columbia, $1,173. Hon. members will be interested in knowing that in the cities in these different provinces people have much better houses. For example, in Halifax ninety-eight per cent of the houses have running water; in Quebec city, 100 per cent; in Regina, eighty-four per cent; Saskatoon, seventy-six per cent. As regards houses equipped with baths or showers, the proportion per hundred in Halifax is seventy-three; in Saint John, New Brunswick, sixty-three; in Regina, sixty-four; in Saskatoon, fifty-eight.

The fact that the people on our farms in all parts of Canada have been obliged to sell their products at such low prices and have had to pay high prices for farm machinery and other manufactured goods has been largely responsible for the small amounts made available for housing.

In the November, 1943, issue of the Economic Annalist, published by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), there is an interesting report of a survey made in several parts of Saskatchewan; in the prairie area, where we have our good farm lands; in the park area, where we have good lands too but where a good deal more work was involved in clearing the land; and in the pioneer areas, where the heroes of the last war were obliged to eke out a living. In this survey the houses were classified as "poor", "fair" and "good". In deciding whether a house would go into these different categories, the enumerators noted poor foundations, faulty roofs, lack of paint, windows missing, et cetera. In the best area in Saskatchewan only 6·1 per cent of the houses were classified as good, seventy per cent as fair, and twenty-three per cent as poor. In the park area, 9·6 per cent were classified as good, fifty-eight per cent as fair, and thirty-one per cent as poor. In the pioneer area, only 3·7 per cent were good, thirty-nine per cent were fair and fifty-six per cent were poor. In one of these areas—the pioneer area—the average value of the poor houses is given as $207. I am amused, when members of the Progressive Conservative party outline ambitious programmes of housing, to recall the attempts which were made under the premiership of Viscount Bennett, when he was here, to re-house our farm people. We had in Canada in those days plenty of carpenters, lumber and paint. The only thing which seemed to be lacking was gold. Because we were short of money the farmers were not able to acquire lumber. The average value of the poor house in the pioneer area of Saskatchewan was, as I have said, $207. The fair house was valued at $524.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why pick out Bennett? What about the government in power from 1935 to 1939; what did they do about it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: As I explained on a previous occasion, the new administration from 1935 to 1939 were more generous.

Mr. HOMUTH: You traded a horse for a rabbit.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The houses built during the Bennett regime in northern Saskatchewan were on a $50 unit basis. Engineers and architects were engaged to draw up blueprints to explain how a $50 house could be constructed, where the windows should be; and you were required from this $50 to pay for the lumber, the nails, the windows, the roofing and the floors—everything for $50. But the new administration in 1935 increased the amount from $50 to $75.

Mr. HOMUTH: They supplied the nails.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You can build a much better house for $75 than for $50, but it is still a $75 house. The nation which this year is going to spend very large sums of money did not seem able to visualize a more ambitious programme for carpenters and other men in the building trade, who had committed no crime, who were the victims of unemployment. It was the men in the building trade who were hit the hardest. I have in mind three ex-servicemen of the last war who were carpenters in Regina, who came north to my constituency, and were assisted by the administration of the day—$100 each from the federal government, the provincial government and the city administration—to build fifty-dollar houses. These three men are fighting to-day for the second time in their lifetime and their sons are serving with them. Some people argued a few years ago that these men were lazy and good for nothing, but they demonstrated before and are demonstrating again that they are made of the very best stuff.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who said they were lazy?

Mr. NICHOLSON: We heard it in the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: The only member who ever said that the unemployed were lazy was the hon. member for Wellington North.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Apparently it was the policy of both administrations to keep the people ground down, living in these log shacks, without floors or adequate windows, for they had no other way of getting the wherewithal to build a house. Although they could get lumber at $5 a thousand cut from trees on their own farms, they could not get from the administration $5 a thousand to cut lumber to put partitions in their houses.

Therefore, it is encouraging to find that some recognition has been made of the deplorable conditions on the farms in Canada. In this connection I note some comments regarding the case for farm electrification:

> The report of the Manitoba electrification inquiry commission has made the most substantial contribution to understanding of the subject and to the material needed for formulation of policy, in recent times. Its considered judgment is that electricity on the farm has profound and far-reaching effects upon the social as well as upon the economic aspects of farming. It reduces drudgery upon the farm as it has done in the factory; it increases income; reduces costs of production and, by removing the disparity between the rural and urban way of life, brings a large measure of contentment to people on the farm.

I hope that this administration will be able to carry its pious hopes into practice. I wish that hon. members to my right would support the C.C.F. in our drive to have $2½ thousand million spent each year for two years after the war is over, with a view to having rural electrification carried out.

Mr. HOMUTH: After the next election you will be supporting us.

Mr. COLDWELL: What optimism!

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is going to be difficult to convince men in the training centres—on Vancouver island, in Newfoundland, on the prairies, at Dafoe—where they have running water and electricity, electric slaves to do much of their hard work, that although we could build power lines, although we could electrify the country during these years, when there was a shortage of man-power, it will be necessary because of the want of money, for them to tighten their belts when they come back and return to the conditions that prevailed in the days of the coal oil lamp. While I was in Saskatchewan recently I visited Island Falls in my riding where we have a large power development. Electricity is so cheap there that the houses are electrically heated and lighted and the citizens have every modern convenience that electric power can furnish. When you think how electricity has transformed that northern country, what it has meant in the development of the Flin Flon, you naturally long for the time when all the people on our farms will have the right to the use of electric washing machines and electrical appliances of all sorts in their homes. The two and a half billions suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) would make available an appropriation so that power lines could be put at the disposal of the people in all parts of rural Canada. But if we are to wait for the farmers to launch the programme they will be in the position where they will not know whether farm prices will fall to very low levels again. It is true we have been promised a floor under farm prices, but we are still waiting for details, and unless the administration is more generous in its treatment of farmers in the post-war period than in the years before the war, the farmers will look forward to falling prices of agricultural products and increasing prices of the products they buy.

One other chapter in this book should be mentioned before I get through, namely, the section dealing with cooperative housing. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) would be much better qualified to discuss this question than I, but members from Nova Scotia, I think, deserve a good deal of credit for the start made in that province in the field of cooperative housing. In 1932 legislation was passed that made available seventy-five per cent of the total cost involved in starting a cooperative housing project, and the staff at St. Francis Xavier college at Antigonish deserved most of the credit for selling to the farmers the importance of banding themselves together and working out a solution of the housing shortage. I find here that the costs of these projects are unbelievably low. One project involves monthly amortization payments of only $9.65, which includes interest, insurance and taxes.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not want to interrupt, but would the hon. member give some idea—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let him go ahead. I think he should clear up one question. What is the value of the house, and what does it contain?

Mr. NICHOLSON: These houses have been built—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the house gives its unanimous consent, the hon. member may continue.

Mr. HOMUTH: Can the hon. member give us an idea of the value of the house and what it contains?

Mr. NICHOLSON: These are eight-roomed family houses. I have visited them and they are very comfortable. They are built by the miners and would sell at from $3,000 to $4,000. They were built cooperatively in groups of twelve. The provincial government made the money available at 3½ per cent over a twenty-year period, and as a result these miners have living quarters such as would rent at from forty and fifty dollars a month in Ottawa, for less than ten dollars a month.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have they all conveniences?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has any questions to ask he must rise and address the Chair.

Mr. HOMUTH: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): There is nothing more vital to the preservation of a democratic nation than the unswerving maintenance of the right of free speech in parliament. Anything that challenges that right is an invasion and a threat of the most dangerous kind to free institutions.

That Senator Bouchard, when he spoke in another place, was discussing a subject of very special importance to Canada, there should be no question. That it was his undoubted privilege and indeed his duty to express his views is beyond debate. That he expressed those views in language befitting parliament there is also no room for debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand the hon. gentleman is referring to a speech in the other house. That is out of order. He may not make reference to a debate that has taken place in the other house, for that is out of order in this debate.

Mr. BRUCE: I am simply saying a word in defence of freedom of speech, and I think I am entitled to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was inquiring whether the hon. gentleman was referring to a speech made in the other chamber. If so, that is out of order. If he is making an argument for free speech generally then, of course, he is in order.

Mr. BRUCE: I am making an argument for free speech and I am entitled to do so. Because this man did what he deemed to be his duty,—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRUCE: —because he put his sentiments and arguments on record before the people of Canada, he is hurled from a high post in the business life of his country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Because the hon. gentleman represents the constituency he does represent, he cannot flout the rules of parliament and the ruling just given.

Mr. BRUCE: The Minister of Justice would be in order if—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member said that he was discussing freedom of speech and he continues by referring to some speech made by an hon. member of the other chamber. That is what Your Honour has just ruled to be out of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of Justice did not have to refer to the hon. gentleman's constituency, because we know what that means.

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member was speaking I thought he was referring to a speech in the other house, but he assured me—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He certainly said so.

Mr. SPEAKER: —that he was discussing the question of freedom of speech and of course in that case I allowed him to proceeed. Exception is taken now by the Minister of Justice that what the hon. member was referring to was a speech made in another place and I again point out to the hon. member that this is out of order in this house.

Mr. BRUCE: I am referring to that only as an indication that the right of freedom of speech has been deprived a member of parliament, and I think I am perfectly in order—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —in continuing my remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. What I have said is not the opinion of the Chair but is the rules of the house. That standing order is 41, from which I quote:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

I would refer the house to citation 293, subsection (b):

> A member while speaking must not
> (b) refer to any debate in the senate, but he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house.

The hon. gentleman is referring to a debate that took place in the other house and is therefore not in order according to the rules and the standing orders of our house.

Mr. BRUCE: I presume I must abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is entirely incorrect to deny an hon. member the right to protest against the absence of freedom of speech in this or in the other house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not say that he is being deprived of any right in this house. That is a reflection and an implication that the Chair has not been extending to the hon. member the privileges of the house. All that I am doing is reading the rules of the house which I am bound to administer and with no personal reference to the hon. member. He must abide by the rules of the house.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I still maintain that I was referring to curtailment of the freedom of speech and that therefore I was perfectly within my rights as a member of this house.

Mr. McCANN: With reference to whom?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is referring to the curtailment of speech. He is entitled to state his views, but he must not, in referring to freedom of speech, refer to some other matter which has already taken place in the form of a debate in the other house.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, may I just quote an eminent Frenchman, Voltaire, who once said:

> I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.

I therefore wish only to have the same freedom in this house as they have in other parliaments of the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: You just keep quiet. It is the Speaker's job to keep order, not yours. We cannot hear the debate for your cries of "order".

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are the most frequent interrupter in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am quite sure the hon. member for Parkdale—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leader of the opposition was not in the house when it happened.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am quite sure the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) does not intend to convey by his words that I have refused him permission to exercise his privilege of free speech within this house, but that is the only inference I can draw from his remarks. I must ask the hon. member to dissociate himself from any such meaning.

If the hon. member for Parkdale does not hear me distinctly I wish some of the hon. members would convey to him what I have just said.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Withdraw what you said.

Mr. HOMUTH: Withdraw nothing; what are you talking about?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parkdale does not hear me. I wish some of his colleagues would convey to him the meaning of what I have already said to him, because I must ask that he should dissociate himself from any meaning that I might take as a reflection upon the Chair in that I am preventing him from exercising his right of free speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I just came into the house—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), but I have already taken the position that the hon. member must withdraw the implication or the meaning which his words convey, namely, that I was exercising the rights of the Chair to prevent him from the right of free speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, all that I wanted to say was this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am always willing indeed to hear the leader of the opposition, but on this matter—

Mr. GRAYDON: I fail to see what this is all about and why I cannot say a word on the matter—

Mr. SPEAKER: In the meantime, the position so far as the Chair is concerned is distinct. I ask the hon. member for Parkdale to withdraw the meaning he implied in his remarks.

Mr. BRUCE: I had no intention of implying that Your Honour had been unfair. I meant only to say that when a man is punished for exercising his undoubted right of freedom of speech in this parliament, then I think it is time that somebody should speak up for him. I would have expected that the leader of this house, who has always been so careful about the privileges of parliament, would have said something in this regard before now, but nothing has been said. That is pretty nearly all I had intended to say. It does seem to me and to others that men who are outside this parliament should not have a right to punish members of either house for something they say in the house. We have had an illustration of that happening within recent days. It is against that method of interfering with freedom of speech that I wish to protest in the strongest terms possible, and it is only because of that that I have intervened in this debate this evening.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): In discussing the budget which according to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), calls for an expenditure of over $5,000,000,000 in this the most decisive stage of the war, I am not going to delve into figures. I am not even going to spend very much time on the problem of the justice or the injustice of certain taxes. I wish to deal instead with the problem of national unity.

To me the destruction of fascism does not merely mean the destruction of fascism overseas. I believe that our men fighting overseas feel that while risking their lives there they would not want to come back home where they would find groups of fascists threatening Canadian democracy. I am not an alarmist, but I believe that at all times it is better to face issues than to resort to the ostrich policy.

In 1938, a few years before the name of Quisling became generally known throughout the world, I wrote a little pamphlet in which I warned about the danger of small fascist groupings, a danger that I said must be met or it might become serious in a critical period. In the pamphlet I used the following words:

> There is no doubt that at present the various fascist movements constitute a very small minority among the great political movements in our country. But this is no reason why fascism in Canada should be ignored. Far better to turn the spotlight of truth and reason upon it right now and to take those measures at the outset of its growh, to make it impossible for fascism ever to grow into a force strong enough to challenge Canadian democracy.

There are certain people who believe that just because the foundations of fascism are being destroyed overseas, people with fascist ideology here will give up, cave in. I do not share that opinion. I would say that just because the cause of fascism is failing, because it is being defeated on various European battlefronts, fascist groups here, like nazism, will fight like a wounded beast. What makes this dangerous is the fact that we are in a decisive stage of the war. What makes this dangerous is that it divides the people, that it raises doubts in the minds of many people, that it weakens morale. That is why the issue must be faced.

What does Hitler want? He wants to see division. He may even fight a war of defence on all fronts. He hopes the war will drag out as long as possible, while his supporters throughout the various countries of the united nations will work up a campaign of disunity. This, he hopes, may bring about a patched-up peace. That sort of peace would not last. That is not what the people of Canada or of the united nations want.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Not long ago the United States Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau Junior, gave the following warning:

> Our enemy has one real secret weapon, the weapon of division. As disaster confronts him he will use that weapon cunningly. He will try to shatter unity we have achieved, will try to blunt and confuse our purposes and soften the defeat which he now knows he cannot escape. He will try to make our victory partial, rather than complete.
> If we yield to such blandishments, if we allow doubt of one another to divide us, if we soften in our resolve to stamp out this hideous nazi curse—we shall have lost this war. Worse we shall have betrayed all those who suffered and bled upon the soil of Europe—the living and the dead alike.

I fully agree with that statement, and that is why I emphasize this problem of national and international unity, and wish to warn the people against division and confusion.

We shall have betrayed the living and the dead alike, if we stand aside and minimize the events which have taken place in Quebec in the past few weeks. There is, of course, the possibility that someone may try to say, "He is attacking the province of Quebec." I am not. I say that I have much more faith in the people of Quebec than many who would use that argument against me. I have said in the past, and I repeat to-night, that small dangerous cliques are carrying on that type of activity which is hurting the people of Quebec and Canadian morale.

I was coming down through the Laurentians in a car, and picked up a young airman who happened to be travelling on foot. He was an air gunner; in fact he looked more like an air cadet, because he was so young. This boy had been stationed at Valleyfield when the fights took place. I had tears in my eyes after listening to his story. He said that these young boys, young air gunners, boys doing the most dangerous type of work, and who would be going overseas in a few weeks, did not dare to walk alone. They had to go in threes or fours.

Was anyone arrested? I have not heard of a single arrest. The young airman told me that many air force boys were beaten up very badly. In that same town of Valleyfield another gang attacked a meeting of the textile workers' union. That gang entered the hall where the meeting was being held, and smashed all the furniture. That was a union of people of Valleyfield. And still nothing was done; no arrests were made.

Then, in the city of Quebec a synagogue was set afire a couple of months ago. Prior to that fire a campaign was carried on by an intolerant clique within that city, against the rights of Jewish people to build their synagogue. In that campaign signatures were collected and meetings were held. The people who addressed the meeting were known. Among those who addressed meetings in that city was a fellow named Roch Poulin, a member of the young Laurentians. This same Roch Poulin was, only a few weeks later, at a meeting in Quebec which was to have been addressed by the leader of my party, Tim Buck, and roused the young boys to break up the gathering.

Anti-Semitism: suppression of free speech—they go hand in hand. But that is not all. A few days after the attack on the union hall in Valleyfield a well-known union organizer went out to Huntingdon. We was met by a group of people there who told him, "You are not going to hold a meeting"—despite the fact that the textile plant at that place is organized within the union. He was prevented from holding the meeting, and there was no protection given him.

A tense situation is being created. One would not be surprised if the workers decided that if such things are going to occur they will organize defence groups of their own. That would be dangerous, and might lead to all sorts of trouble. Something drastic has to be done.

It is unfortunate that so many people who are responsible for these shameful activities call themselves nationalists—which they are not. They say that they work in the interests of the people of Quebec. I say that they do not. When they go out to smash up union meetings they are not working on behalf of the French-Canadian workers; they are working on behalf of Blair Gordon. When these people go out to tell workers that they must not belong to neutral unions, they are taking away from those workers weapons through the use of which those workers in many industries of Quebec have attained equality in wages with other provinces.

In some industries in Quebec, notably aircraft, shipbuilding and some others, the workers have attained equality. Who brought this about? Was it the group of people who rave about equality, or was it the trade union organizations of the workers? The trade union organizations of the workers did it.

These nationalists say that they are interested in the welfare of the people. But when there is talk about health insurance they say, "Oh, no, no; that is socialism. We do not want any health insurance. We do not want to interfere with the individual." What does that lead to? It leads to a situation under which the health of the people in Quebec is bad, and it will continue to be bad if the people in that province follow the clique I have mentioned.

Let me give some figures. Per 100,000 of population 80·6 people in Quebec die yearly from tuberculosis, as compared with twenty-six in Ontario, or three times as many in Quebec as in Ontario. Here are some figures for some of the cities: Quebec city, 108·1; Chicoutimi, 143·4; Three Rivers, 216·6; Thetford Mines, 259·5, and Rimouski—shameful figure—542·2, or twenty times the rate for Ontario. The nationalists do not want any health scheme; they do not think the people of Quebec need it. The infant mortality figures give a similar picture. The rate per 1,000 live births for Canada as a whole in 1941 was 59·7 and that for Ontaro, 45·6. The rate for Chicoutimi was 95·5, and for Quebec city 107.

Those figures are altogether too high. We need more health schemes for our province rather than no health schemes simply because reactionaries say that it smacks of socialism, that it interferes with the individual. The so-called nationalists have opposed the idea of compulsory education. Doctor Paquette, Duplessis' lieutenant and former provincial secretary in charge of education in the province, in a discussion on compulsory education had the following to say:

> When families are disorganized by the war, when young men are being conscripted for the army, is this time to conscript children for obligatory schooling?

That argument underestimates the intelligence of the people of Quebec It was all right for Doctor Paquette to graduate as a doctor and do well in politics. If he has any children I am sure they are getting a fine education, but other children must not get an education because he considers it conscription for education.

Then again they oppose the idea of Quebec having anything to do with Canada or Canada having anything to do with the world. What will happen to the huge plants that have been built in the province and the tens of thousands of workers employed there if Canada is to isolate herself from the world?

Mr. HOMUTH: We never will.

Mr. ROSE: I am much more optimistic than the hon. member to my right. I have faith in the good sense of the people and know they will make sure they will get their jobs. The so-called nationalists may have a solution, back to the land. They are ready to suggest that the people dig stumps and starve, that they keep away from the cities.

But during the war the people have learned that they can do useful work; they have acquired skills, and they will not want to go back to the land. The solution of isolationism is not the solution for the people of Quebec.

The supposed nationalist leaders are not working in the interests of the Quebec people. They use all sorts of demagogy to cover up their reactionary ideology, their pro-fascist ideology, and they care very little about the people. What is their idea about the people? I find this in a declaration issued by a group known as the bloc universitaire and drafted on April 11, 1942. In that declaration this group called for a corporatist state in the province of Quebec where, according to their theory "not all men are born equal". That is the most reactionary sort of attitude to take. A small group of people will set themselves up in the castle and the people down below will work for them. They will have the brains; the others must know nothing.

I now want to go back a little into history. Since I have been in the house I have heard several hon. members go back into the past, to the years 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937. I have done a little digging myself, and I should like to quote what has been said by some so-called nationalists and isolationists who are more interested in an axis victory than in the welfare of the people of Quebec. First I want to quote from a paper La Nation, issued by Paul Bouchard, a paper which was suppressed or which disappeared after the war broke out. He was quite close to all the so-called nationalist leaders in the province; in fact, in 1937 he appeared as a candidate in Montreal-St. Mary's riding and was sponsored by a number of organizations, one of which was headed by André Laurendeau, the present provincial leader of the Bloc Populaire. This Bouchard wrote quite a number of editorials in his paper. For instance, speaking about Spain, he said:

> Before a strong and determined Spain, Gibraltar will be worthless. But the political role that a rich and powerful Spain can play is of much greater dimension. . . . She will take back her ascendancy over the peoples tied by blood and culture. We can't imagine the future role of Spain without thinking that outside of Brazil, the United States and Canada, all America is Spanish speaking. The next era will belong to the Spanish world.

Meaning they will take all of South America. He went on further to say:

> May Franco be inspired by Mussolini's success—

I should like to see Bouchard's face to-day.

> —and adapt Mussolini's forms to his country in order to transmit to Spain the same spirit of energy, of progress and solidarity which animates Italy, and then the immense reaction started in Rome against Asiatic barbarism will arrive by way of Spain to the Latin shores of America.

That is 100 per cent fascism; that is 100 per cent fascist foreign policy. Not only did he speak about Spain but he advised France as follows:

> Ah! If only France could at last find, under a monarchy or a national dictatorship, a great minister of foreign affairs to sell the British empire to Germany and Italy, in exchange for an alliance and French neutrality.

Those are treacherous words, but they did not stop him from running in 1942 as a candidate against the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). What did he have to say about Canada? What did he have to say about a united Canada?

He said as follows:

> Very well, I will be told; but what if Japan should want to invade British Columbia? Let us be clear that British Columbia is not the whole of Canada, and in the east, for what it costs us and what we get out of it, it means nothing to us.

He was willing to give British Columbia to Japan. These are the nationalists, the isolationists, but really internationalists in the sense of being fascists.

The so-called nationalists will not deny that they hold in the highest esteem the opinions of Henry Bourassa. Speaking in Montreal on October 8, 1941, Henry Bourassa said that the only force in Europe capable of bringing an end to Slav chaos was Germany.

Yes, Hitler tried to bring an end in his own way to what Henry Bourassa called Slav chaos. Hitler tried to murder millions of Slavs. But they refused to die, and are playing a magnificent role to-day and giving Hitler a sound beating.

Here is what Henry Bourassa said about Hitler:

> Hitler is much more a product of democratic expression than are the governments of the United States, Canada and Britain. . . . One of the excellent sides of the (nazi) regime is that it has put an end to the scandalous abuses of capitalism.

When we think of the Krupps and Goering and their trusts we can see that this was but misrepresentation of the facts in order to deceive the people.

Speaking of the post-war world Henry Bourassa said:

> If good sense is to prevail in the settlement of European affairs in the post-war world . . . I think that France of Petain, Spain of Franco, Portugal of Salazar, also Italy of Mussolini, will exercise a salutary influence for the world.

What a world that would be! Bourassa has since repeated the same sort of statement on a number of occasions. He still clings to these ideas and calls himself a nationalist! Like the nazis from whom they draw their inspiration the corporatists resort to anti-Semitism as a means of doing their dirty work. It is unfortunate that such thoughts should creep into the speeches even of some members of this house. Not long ago I heard an hon. member speaking about the Aryans and the non-Aryans in this country. I did not know that we had any Aryans or non-Aryans in this country. I thought Hitler was the only one who was blessed with them.

Again on Thursday evening last the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) said:

> We are wondering whether or not we are engaged in this war for the sole purpose of saving or helping out the Jews all over the world.

That is Hitler's argument. Hitler has said that on a number of occasions—this is a Jewish war—and we had a revised version of that given us the other day by an hon. member of this house.

To-day's Montreal Gazette carries a very sad story. It told of 1,715,000 Jews who had been killed, exterminated in gas chambers in two camps in upper Silesia. If some escaped being murdered are we supposed to say to them: Keep out of this country. That is not humanity. That is cruelty. This question of refugees has been mixed up by certain political leaders with the problem of immigration. Certain papers are carrying cartoons on the subject. Here is a cartoon in Le Moraliste, Duplessis' sheet, showing Jews as did Streicher in the Sturmer. I think it is disgraceful. What would have happened to the great leaders of Canadian democracy, Papineau and Mackenzie, if they had been refused a refuge in the United States. The fate of the Acadians driven from their soil in the eighteenth century, a sad chapter in our Canadian history long remembered in our province, is to-day being repeated on a greater scale in a more murderous fashion, and to make an issue of it is to disregard decency and humanity. But these pseudo-nationalists do not go back to history. They find their own cruel solutions.

Here is an article in the official organ of Bloc Populaire, Le Bloc, of May 6, 1944. The article is headed "Canada, England's Garbage Dump," and this paper gives its full front page to names of some of the refugees allowed to come into this country and makes sure to specify beside each name "Juif," "Juif," "Juif" —"Jew," "Jew," "Jew"! I am not a Christian myself, but that is un-Christian as I understand Christianity.

I want to read what a great man, David Lloyd George, wrote about the Jews and Jew-baiting in 1923. He said:

> Of all the bigotries that savage the human temper there is none so stupid as the anti-Semitic. It has no basis in reason; it is not rooted in faith; it aspires to no ideal; it is just one of those dank and unwholesome weeds that grow in the morass of racial hatred. How utterly devoid of reason it is may be gathered from the fact that it is almost entirely confined to nations who worship Jewish prophets and apostles, revere the national literature of the Hebrews as the only inspired message delivered by the Diety to mankind, and whose only hope of salvation rests on the precepts and promises of the great teachers of Judah. Yet, in the sight of these fanatics the Jews of to-day can do nothing right. If they are rich they are birds of prey. If they are poor they are vermin. If they are in favour of a war, it is because they want to exploit the bloody feuds of the Gentiles to their own profit. If they are anxious for peace, they are either instinctive cowards or traitors. If they give generously—and there are no more liberal givers than the Jews—they are doing it for some selfish purpose of their own. If they do not give—then what could one expect of a Jew but avarice? If labour is oppressed by great capital, the greed of the Jew is held responsible. If labour revolts against capital, the Jew is blamed for that also. If he lives in a strange land he must be persecuted and pogrommed out of it. If he wants to go back to his own, he must be prevented. Through the centuries in every land, whatever he does, or intends or fails to do, he has been pursued by the echo of the brutal cry of the rabble of Jerusalem against the greatest of all Jews—Crucify Him!

These are very fine words, but what are we going to do about it? I suggest that the situation is serious enough to demand what I suggested in my maiden speech in this house, the appointment of a royal commission to go into this whole problem. But even that is not the whole story. There must be a reason why people in Quebec province will follow these elements, and that basis lies in certain inequalities which still exist. The government must find ways and means to meet the needs of the people, to do away with these inequalities, and the people will be only too happy for anything that is done for them to bring about that equality which they deserve. What is more I say that we have to encourage the trades unions as a powerful factor in the fight for democracy. We need a bold policy, because the problem of national unity is a serious one to-day, in the final phase of the war, and will be just as serious to-morrow, in the post-war period.

Mr. ROBERT RYAN (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the able manner in which he presented the budget.

In this regard I think it would be proper for me to read into Hansard a number of paragraphs from an article entitled "Your Taxes Will Go Down", by Mr. Beardsley Ruml, appearing in the Magazine Digest for June. Mr. Ruml, author of the pay-as-you-go income tax plan, is chairman of the federal reserve bank of New York. In this article he refers to federal budgets and taxation, and he says:

The federal budget itself has an important influence on the value of our money. Whether the federal budget is inflationary or deflationary depends on the kind and amount of federal taxes. The real purpose of our federal taxes in the providing of revenue is to make sure that we have a budget that has the right kind of economic influence on the country.

The federal budget commits us every year to a set of expenditures, most of them necessary and desirable, and yet always with some waste, tradition and unreasonable sentiment.

We have federal taxes because we have national expenditures. If we had the expenditures without any taxes at all, the budget would be extremely inflationary.

The reason we have federal taxes is so that the federal budget will have the right influence on the rest of our economy—that it will do its part in keeping employment and production high year after year. . . .

We have another good reason for expecting lower taxes—we do not want a deflationary federal budget when we have too much unemployment. We shall have to figure out how much employment and production we want as a "standard normal" and then make our federal tax programme so that income will balance outgo when we are at this desired normal level.

Such a tax programme will produce a budget surplus without changing the rates, provided that the outgo is kept steady and employment goes beyond what we think normal ought to be.

If employment and production go below our standard normal level, and if we keep our rates the same or even reduce them, then the effect of the budget will be to add to public purchasing power and thus help raise employment and production to our normal level.

Expert estimates all agree on one point: with high employment after the war, national production and national income will actually be very much higher than ever before in our history.

For future taxes, this means that either we shall have a high level of employment and production and can therefore have lower tax rates and a balanced budget, or we shall have lower tax rates to arrive at the employment and production level we feel is desirable.

Lower tax rates will help us achieve high post-war employment, but we must remember that during the first year or so after hostilities cease, strong inflationary influences will be at work. They must be combated, and taxes will have to be used to help fight rising prices.

In this uncertain period we must proceed cautiously with tax reduction, even if the budget is balanced and possibly shows a surplus. But after the American economy is established, we can use the tax programme to help provide the means of going where we want to go, in terms of high production and high employment—and this will mean far lower tax rates than we have to-day.

[Mr. Ryan.]

I believe that the paragraphs which I have read apply very fully to the present budget of the Minister of Finance. It has been my opinion since I have been in this house that the minister, in bringing down his annual budgets, has always had in thought the welfare of the country and has built up his taxing system with that in mind.

There is a question in regard to the importance of control, and I should like in that regard to quote a statement made by Sir George Schuster, one of Britain's foremost business men. He says:

We must have some measure of government control over the nation's commerce after the war. If each business seeks to run its own affairs according to its own single interest, I see little hope of avoiding state control at every point. The main problem is achieving a balance between the organizing power of the state and the driving force of the free individual.

That, I think, can be easily understood.

Further with reference to controls, let me quote the following statement of United States price administrator Chester Bowles:

That price control has saved the people of the U.S.A. $67 million and that much would have been added to the building of the military machine had there been no price restrictions.

Comparisons of the cost of the two wars compiled by the O.P.A. research division show that $22 billion more has been saved consumers through price control over civilian goods and service. That saving alone amounts to $169 for each person for 1943, and that figure is growing every month.

It would be interesting to have an estimate of what Canada has saved by price control.

I wish to make one more quotation, which is taken from "Democracy Reborn", by Henry A. Wallace, Vice-President of the United States of America:

Dollar principles are all right when they serve human principles and free enterprise must be maintained, but the "Big Three", big business, big agriculture and big labour must work together for the general welfare and—above everything—adhere to the principle of complete utilization of all sources, all manpower, all skills in the service of the common man in his search for jobs.

On Friday we listened to an able speaker, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, who told us what he thought of the all-out war effort carried on by this government; that it was not only his opinion, but that of the most important men in the world to-day that Canada has done a wonderful job. There is no doubt about that. It has been well known by everybody except those who wish to criticize the government. On the subject of the war effort, the Prime Minister of New Zealand referred to man-power, war equipment and so forth. On Saturday morning, while going on the train to Montreal, I clipped from the Ottawa Journal the following short article:

British Believe Canadians Best Street Fighters

British soldiers rate Canadians the best street fighters in Italy, Lt.-Col. Frederick L. Nicholls of Toronto, former commander in Italy of the Carleton and York regiment, a New Brunswick unit, said in an interview to-night.

He said the morale of the Canadian soldiers is "tops" and expressed belief it is high because of the fact all the Canadians overseas are volunteers.

"Therefore they're over there because they want to fight. They have a job to do and they want to clean it up."

Col. Nicholls was in command of the Carleton and Yorks along the Adriatic coast during the Cassino fighting. He has just returned to Canada to join the military training branch at defence headquarters.

I congratulate the government upon the new legislation and the new departments that are being created which will permit the government to carry out a post-war effort with the same success as they have carried on the all-out war effort since 1939.

It is laughable to listen to statements made that the Liberal government has stolen the programme of the Progressive Conservative or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) informed this house at the first or second session of this parliament of his intentions with regard to social legislation that would be submitted for approval before this parliament was prorogued and, at the opening of this session, a definite plan of social reform was outlined in the speech from the throne.

I believe this government is working out the very best form of cooperation with the commercial banks and industry. The government's intention, I understand, is to cut out everything in the management of the banks and industry that has been found to have been a hindrance to the full development of Canada and the welfare of our people.

The Minister of Finance has advised us that understandings have been arrived at with the Bank of Canada and the commercial banks which will permit them to finance any development the government will find it necessary to undertake, and also place the banks in a position to finance all legitimate demands made on them by industry and commerce. He has also informed us that the government has complete control of currency and credit, and the system of banking to-day is not the same system that existed from 1929 to 1939. A new system has evolved since 1939.

The government is gradually weeding out what might be termed bad in banking and free enterprise systems without destroying what has been found good, which I would term constructive evolution.

I do not think this government will hesitate for one minute to take over any industry or to organize any industry that they decide should be established in the interests of the public, if they find private capital is not forthcoming or sufficient for the full development of such industry.

I would say to the leader of the C.C.F., in answer to his statement on page 4019 of Hansard, that the Canadian soldiers will return to the same beautiful and free Canada that they had left to fight the enemy and offer their blood so that we, who were left at home, would be able to continue to live in this glorious and free land known as Canada, but may I say to him that they will not return to Canada and find the same economic or social system that existed when they left their homes and loved ones.

Before I came into this house in 1940, I had arrived at certain conclusions of what I considered were the financial or economic reforms that should be made, and I am pleased to say that I am satisfied with what has been done up to the present. There are reforms that I believe should still be inaugurated to permit the government to stabilize employment and successfully carry out their social security programme.

However, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are confident that the reforms which are being evolved will be sufficient, and I am convinced that if the government find out later on that other changes in our monetary or economic system are necessary, they will not hesitate to make such changes as are necessary to make a success of post-war management and development. I have confidence in the government and very much faith in the future.

In conclusion, I would say that the people of Canada, yes, the people of the British empire, should thank God that we have had in this country such a man as Mackenzie King as Prime Minister with his able government to guide us through those terrible years of the war. Canada has done a great war job and has done it well. It is therefore my belief that Mackenzie King was a good peace-time, a good war-time and will be a good post-war Prime Minister.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne): Canada is one of the most beautiful countries in the world; I would even say the most beautiful. Hurled as a challenge against the Americas, it is remarkable because of the vastness of its territory and the inexhaustible wealth of its resources. A young country whose prospects of development are unlimited, Canada is altogether immense and rich. Three oceans, filled with wealthy products, border its shores as a fairyland of lace; to the south, an imaginary boundary separates it from the most powerful of modern countries, the United States, with which it holds harmonious relations which could be set as an example to the whole world. Within, nine provinces, unequal as to size, diversified as to their particular character and products, share a territory often broken by immense rivers and lakes on which sail ocean-going ships which supplement two railway systems serving from ocean to ocean an agricultural and industrial population. So far, Canada has played an important role in world politics; to-morrow, it will be more important. But what has the future in store for us?

Wealth, resources and progress do not make a nation. Indeed, progress is a law of humanity. For generations, the present is the transition between a mediocre past and a better future. But a nation will subsist only if it can draw from itself a sufficient amount of reason to ward off causes of internal ruin or relaxation. Material forces, alone, are inefficient; the real power of a nation rests in its ideal, this invisible power which, by creating visible objects, shows the way to our souls. A nation is a soul; as Renan said, a nation, like an individual, is the convergence of a great sum of efforts, sacrifices and devotion. We shall come out of this war overburdened with the most gigantic financial effort in our history, struggling with an economy upset by the present conflict, and compelled to undergo numerous privations and sacrifices for many years to come. What class in our society will have suffered the most from the war? The one which has paid more income tax? No. The one whose easy pre-war way of living has been curtailed by rationing? No. The one upon whom war has imposed lower revenues and all kinds of annoyances? No. What class will be most affected by this war? It is our youth.

Youth will come out of this war wounded and angry. These words may surprise a few; nevertheless they are true. The foundation of a nation, youth is its ideal, and its progress also. It renovates generations; the youth of to-morrow will be what the youth of to-day formed it to be. Youth, therefore, becomes the cell which gives superiority to a nation, or renders it more decadent.

To turn our attention to youth is one of the present-day problems. I wish to speak for the youth of my country, whatever be its language, its creed, or the province it lives in. I know youth, because yesterday I was still in its ranks; I know its ambitions, its tastes, its reactions, its fears, because I have been living with it for the last four years, and shared its lost hopes, its set-backs, its bitter feelings. To-day I rise to state this: War has killed our youth, morally and physically. As a reward for the sacrifice it rendered the national cause—or rather the universal cause—youth has the right to be heard, and the right to be understood.

I have been a member here for four years. What has been said about our youth except for such purposes as mobilization or war effort? I pay tribute to the courage of our youth. Its valour gave democracy thousands of soldiers, thousands of airmen, thousands of sailors, who, on all continents, in every sky and on the seven seas, are reaping glory for themselves, besides the glory falling back on their own country. But glory fades away—military glory like any other. No sooner will the signatures be dry on the peace treaty than nations, already oblivious of the horrors of the war, will become intoxicated with the delights of peace. When they look at the future, they will unknowingly forget those whose superhuman efforts and frightful ordeals drew a veil on the bloodiest tragedy of the world's history. The characteristic of human nature is to forget; but will youth ever forget?

Youth will come out of this war with deep wounds. How many, not yet thirty years old, have come out wounded, sick, physical ruins? From now until final victory, how many will emerge in the same physical conditions, unable or almost unable to earn their living, after giving in two years, even in one year, the maximum yield of their physical power? How many, who had built up a future at a period in life when ambition overcomes all obstacles to success, were compelled to drop everything when they were called to the colours and thus destroy with their own hands the projects their courage had built up? Broken careers, jeopardized futures, ruined lives, broken-up homes, lives wilting away before full bloom; these are the actual sights. Let them start over again, one might say. This is easy to say. Easy for those whose parents are wealthy, have established industries or financial influences. But what about the others who are more numerous? I know what it means to make a success of your life when you have no influence and when your way is strewn with obstacles which the ambitions of the powerful render it all the more difficult to surmount.

I have known that personally. When it comes back from the war, our youth, after waging military battles, will have to wage social fights. Will it be able to regain the lost ground? Youth does not lack ideal; its ideal, propped, developed and fostered by its elders and its government, would become the faith which moves mountains. On the other hand, if we neglect youth, will it be capable, without help, of facing the hard struggles of the future? Will it be able to create a home and believe in happiness if, when it attempts to make its way through a mode of life more difficult than ever, this youth is not convinced that it still has retained its place under the sun? If the powers of the day disregard it altogether, will the youth that withstood the brunt of this war be able to come back to the homes it had temporarily left with the same bright hopes it had formerly nourished? Will it ever be able to dismiss from its mind the thought that in twenty or twenty-five years, through the stupid ambitions of men, the children it will bring forth in this world may again become the new victims of war and of all its miseries? Will youth be able to settle down to work if it lacks an ideal? Will it be able to create one if its soul remains downhearted? Discouragement leads to disgust; and disgust unavoidably opens the way to chaos.

Youth will also be angry when it comes out of this war. To a greater extent than any other class of society, laws will have affected it. It will have borne the weight of the mobilization act; the intricacies of selective service, rendered unrelenting throughout a series of sinister improvements, transformed the youth into an object to be handled, and this is a very serious error for democracy. When youth belonged to a category callable to the colours, it was automatically refused any position. After weeks of moral tossing around, it was compelled to enlist. For those who were too young to be called up, there were still no jobs. Instead of acquiring this happpy mentality resulting from work honestly secured, they are more or less compelled to earn their living through means which are not always commendable. Neglected, paralysed, baffled, turned down, dismissed, banned, hunted down, youth has become panic-stricken. Instead of breathing the pure atmosphere of the nation, it has absorbed, day after day, vexations—a poison which directly breeds dissatisfaction.

Will it be surprising if youth comes out of this war angry? Angry against what? Against everything. Angry against whom? Against everyone. First of all, against the authorities. Against the arrogance of its superior officers in the army. Against the insolence of the bureaucrats. Against capitalism—the shady kind—which has been taking advantage of its sacrifices and sufferings. It is said that to-morrow will see the most considerable evolution of history. I believe it. But if this evolution does not give those who have suffered the benefits of their devotion, I may say this: add one letter to this magical word "evolution" and you have the worst of all human evils: "revolution".

Some will smile at my fears. I know I am not mistaken. Youth demands back, for to-morrow, its just and recognized place in society. It says: "You are preparing plans of social security; but, in those projects, have you thought of me who waged this war or who has suffered from this war?" Youth says: "You are planning wide material projects which will add to the assets of the nation and supply work for everyone; but did you think of reserving a place for me, the best asset of the country?" It says: "Progress would connect the world with airlines in which Canada will be an important link; did you think of me, the indispensable link to the continuation of life in this country?" It says: "You vote estimates to engrave in marble the heroic deeds and the known heroes of this war; did you think of me, the obscure hero of the war who, to-morrow, will still be the obscure labourer in the renovation of the country?" It says: "You are talking about peace; you are studying measures which will secure it; I want peace, because more than any other class of society, I hate and curse war. You want the Atlantic charter to be the foundation of a new order of justice and human intelligence; are you aware that peace throughout the world rests on the motion of peace which every nation cultivates within its own boundaries? Shall we have peace if the rights of everyone are not recognized in this country, if my own rights are ignored?

Youth says: "You are willing to assist other nations by throwing your doors open to immigration, by appealing to the great laws of humanity; have you the right to do so; have you the right to even think of doing it before I, who bore the brunt of the war, who suffered from the war, have found in this country, which is my own, the work, security and happiness to which I am entitled?"

Youth says: "You have voted billions to help Great Britain and the united nations finance their war effort; you have voted fantastic amounts to create instruments of war which I have handled; you have voted very large sums of money to set up a series of commissions, a few of which were severely condemned after leading the unfair life of parasites; shall I not be entitled to the consideration of my country when I shall be called upon to-morrow, to bear the crushing burden of these debts, to sacrifice myself and my own people in order to repay them?"

The youth of my country has the right to demand the right of being heard, and the right of being understood. Therefore, I wish to state that if every economic, financial, physical and agricultural domain is represented in this parliament by a department which animates, supports and develops it, why should youth, the very soul of all the domains of human activity, be not also represented by its own department? I demand tonight the setting up of a federal department of youth.

Various departments were set up to finance or prosecute the war; departments were created to solve post-war problems. At this momentous hour we are about to face, an hour which is rightly dreaded by economists, why should the government not institute the department which, in my opinion, is the most important for the salvation of the country: the department of youth. This department would render such important services that they would have results and repercussions in every cell of the social organism. If you do not create it, you are hampering the welfare of the country. If you create it, you will make the nation strong and solid. One may answer that such a step comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that the federal government does not wish to encroach upon the rights of the provinces. This is a very easy and convenient excuse. The Department of National War Services was set up, and it mobilized the youth. The Department of National Defence was given a larger strength, and youth filled it up. Selective service was instituted, and youth was the first to submit to its requirements. In selective service, a mobilization section was set up, and again youth was its first and perpetual victim. Therefore, if it has borne the stiffness of our laws to a greater extent than any other class of society, it has a vested right in requesting and demanding the introduction of legislation, acceptable both by itself and by the provinces, which legislation would be the official and national recognition of its devotion and of its social helpfulness.

How can we assist youth? Young men who have been to war deserve special attention. Indeed, when the war is over, numerous laws will be enacted to assist those who have contributed to victory. But those who will apply these laws should not neglect or deal unjustly with these young people merely because they are young; the youth who fought this war and who will be its victims, who entered in it voluntarily or through the force of circumstances, will set forth its rightful requests, even if it has to resort to arbitrary means. Is it excessive to ask that youth that has fought this war be given an organism whose duty will be, when needs arise, to protect its rightful claims, or to facilitate its obtaining a just preference in employment.

There is also the youth under twenty, at eighteen already much older than its age, since it is by statute sent to the army before it is physically developed and ready to fight for its living. There are all those who are growing up, already restless at sixteen, and all those who have not yet reached sixteen, and who are acquiring deep in their hearts, when their elders relate their experiences, feelings of contempt and sour memories which they will undoubtedly retain, unless such feelings are dispelled.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. I dislike doing this very much, but hon. members have been warned against reading their speeches. The hon. member for Terrebonne is reading his speech, word for word. I object to it, and I do not think it should be allowed.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) read his speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: You should have checked him up, then.

Mr. RALSTON: Why did you not check him up?

Mr. HOMUTH: Because it is your duty to do it.

Mr. RALSTON: I was not objecting to it.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am.

Mr. RALSTON: Why did you not object to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, then?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Charity begins at home.

Mr. BERTRAND (Terrebonne): This coming youth, the government can assist it in many ways:

(a) By setting up, in every district where an unemployment insurance office is located, a section specially devoted to the placement of youth.

(b) By expanding without restrictions the professional training programme, which recently replaced the war-time emergency training programme; by giving substantial grants to provinces so that arts and crafts schools can be accessible, not only to students from towns and cities, but also to those from rural municipalities of the least importance.

(c) By instituting in every county, with the cooperation of the provinces, scholarships which would be available to children in lower and industrial classes, and would help them reaching technical schools or other secondary or superior schools.

(d) By granting generous subsidies, through the medium of provinces, to associations interested in youth movements, like parish circles, for instance, in order to develop among young people a taste for reading by facilitating the use of public libraries, or in order to develop its physical health by means of sane and vigorous sports.

(e) By building in cities and towns, and even in municipalities of any importance, public parks where younger people could find playgrounds, swimming pools and amusements.

(f) By enlarging the scope of the national film board so as to give, even in remote municipalities, numerous free movies on matters of national interest or of educational character.

(g) By giving grants to associations interested in promoting artistic tastes among youth —such as Les Amis de l'Art, in Montreal—in order that these associations, with the cooperation of the provinces, may extend their activities, and that youth may follow for a nominal charge artistic lectures and teachings—the best sources of art and ideal.

(h) By erecting parish halls.

(i) By creating bureaux dealing with statistics and information with branches in every province, and available to students as well as to young labourers.

(j) By creating an organism entrusted with setting up a list and prohibiting the entrance into Canada of this abundance of United States magazines which glorify vice and praise robbery and murder. This literature is ridiculous, useless, immoral and against the welfare of the nation; it will turn a young man, even before he is twenty, into a loafer, if not into a thief or a murderer.

In a word, by setting up a body capable of securing young people their proper share of employment, and of applying measures calculated to maintain the physical standards of youth, its moral health, its sense of responsibility and its love of life.

Will this suggestion be received in this parliament? Will it be accepted in principle only, and gradually set aside by the stream of new problems which are constantly assailing public administration? Will it be heard by youth which will learn through newspapers and radio that some one spoke on their behalf before the whole nation? I do not know. Nevertheless, I am convinced that youth must be consulted on the course of our reconstruction projects. We shall have to reconstruct, and reconstruct in every domain, and with the live powers of the nation. In these times when the most fantastic doctrines take shape and are spread abroad, when dealers in happiness offer at every cross-road elixirs of unlimited prosperity, when the most subversive ideas hide under disguise in order to win approval and sympathizers, measures of national defence become necessary. Only through this national defence will Canada be able to live in justice, progress and peace. Capitalism must acquire certain virtues and forego certain vices; in times undergoing scientific evolution due to the influence of war, governments must endeavour to observe the smallest details which make up democracy, and also attempt to promote every idea which will assure its solidity and full development.

Social security applied in all domains; the glorification of labour; the improvement of the fate of lower and industrial classes, and ownership made accessible to everyone; assistance to families; the spreading of education; the preaching of better understanding of public health; repressing the abuses of capitalism; assistance to private enterprise; the expansion of small industries; freeing trade and commerce from paralyzing restrictions; assistance to agriculture; a better and broader system of colonization; the safeguarding and development of national resources; the respect due to morals; doing away with social sores; in all domains of human activity, a betterment brought about by just, sane and happy laws inspired by love which Christ preached to mankind.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to observe the rule which I have endeavoured to enforce to-day. I thought the hon. gentleman was making a statement, but apparently he is reading his speech.

Mr. BERTRAND (Terrebonne): It will take me only a minute to complete my speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BERTRAND (Terrebonne): These are as many domains to which democracy may spread its numerous activities without falling into depressing and guilty socialism, as many domains which it may animate at a much lower cost than what we will spend on this war. General prosperity is the basis of the individual welfare. The individual welfare assures peace to a nation. Therefore, all classes of society should be invited to cooperate in the task of reconstruction and in balancing our economy upset by the war; youth especially, since no other class can better defend our social structure. Let us give ideal to youth. Let us help it and give it momentum. Youth is the foundation of the nation. Let us secure its welfare and consequently its happiness. I want the youth of my country to be happy and prosperous. If it is happy and prosperous the whole nation will also be happy and prosperous.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, during the course of his remarks on the budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made reference to the coming dominion-provincial conference and indicated that at that conference attempts would be made to arrive at an agreement with regard to taxation. I intend to use the minister's reference to the dominion provincial conference as a cue to some remarks I should like to make with reference to the issues which will no doubt arise in that conference.

The constitutional relationship of the provinces and the dominion on various matters will no doubt receive most of the attention of this conference, and this evening I should like to discuss some of the implications of the conference. First I want to say that I am dissatisfied with the constitutional position obtaining in Canada at the present time and I am also dissatisfied with the trend we are witnessing in constitutional matters. "We are fighting for democracy" is a statement which has been worn almost threadbare, and I think the time has arrived in our national history and at this stage of the war when we ought to define what is involved in the term "democracy".

I have listened to speeches; I have read editorials and articles, booklets and pamphlets and books, and it is my view that everything from anarchy to absolute dictatorship is being propagated in the name of democracy. Calling a philosophy democracy does not make it such any more than calling a skunk a pussy-cat will make it one. I think it is high time that we indicate what democracy actually consists of. My view is that one of the essential characteristics of democracy is decentralization of power and control. As dictatorship involves centralization of power and control, conversely democracy must involve decentralization of power and control.

I think it is apparent to everyone these days that we are witnessing, not only in Canada but throughout the world, a trend toward more and more centralization. It would appear that we can never get large enough organizations. Instead of having organizations in which one or two countries are associated, most people are now talking in terms of world organization.

[M. L. Bertrand.]

Personally I think that is a very dangerous trend. It is just possible that it can end in a world dictatorship. We are being told in this house and throughout the country that in order that the dominion government may attempt to solve some of the pressing national problems adequately the provinces must more and more relinquish their powers. We hear that argument presented constantly in this house and elsewhere. It is my view that it is positively false to contend that under the British North America Act the dominion government has not sufficient powers to discharge its responsibilities. Under the terms of the British North America Act the dominion government is vested with full control over all matters pertaining to banks and banking and over all matters relating to money, and money control is absolute control. The government which has the right to exercise control over money matters has control over everything. Therefore I assert that it is false to say that the dominion government has not sufficient powers under the British North America Act to discharge its responsibilities.

Not long ago we had a discussion on old age pensions, and it was argued that we would never have a proper uniform system of old age pensions until the whole matter was concentrated in the dominion government. I differ decidedly with that policy, as well as with similar policies which have been advanced. If the dominion government exercised the right which it has under the British North America Act it could make available money sufficient to meet the needs not only of the provinces but of the municipalities. That I consider is one of the major responsibilities of the central government. If the dominion government saw that the provinces and municipalities had at all times sufficient money to make financially possible that which was physically possible there would be no need for all these discussions over jurisdictional disputes. I say that the dominion government has been adopting a dog in the manger attitude. It will not eat the hay itself and it will not allow anybody else to eat it. The dominion government has been making the British North America Act the scapegoat for all its own sins, its sins consisting of its neglect and its obstinate refusal to exercise the powers which the dominion government has under the British North America Act. That, of course, is an argument on the basis of the British North America Act.

Yet I wish to assert this, Mr. Speaker. Even though I believe the dominion government has sufficient powers under the British North America Act as it stands to discharge all its responsibilities, I am still not satisfied, notwithstanding this belief, with the constitutional position obtaining in Canada at the present time. It is my view that we have not been for some considerable time and that we are not now governing ourselves democratically. Our constitutional position is full of anomalies and contradictions and they are not conducive to democratic government. In times past in this house I have lodged my protest against this situation and I have indicated what I considered was the logical thing to do under the circumstances.

I have not since the commencement of this war made any reference to the subject, but now that we are thinking and talking in terms of post-war and of the new Canada that we desire to build, I feel that the time is appropriate once more to raise this question. Hence my reason for doing so at this stage when I omitted making any reference to it during the years of the war that have already passed.

The youth and others of Canada are paying with their life's blood to preserve what we call the democratic way of life. Surely since that is the case we should practise democracy in Canada and see to it that we have a set-up which is in harmony with democratic principles. I wish to see established in this country those principles for which the youth of our land are giving their lives. I wish to see a genuine, true democracy, and that is the thought which inspires my remarks here this evening—that and nothing else. I must say that the circumstances which prevail in Canada constitutionally and have done for a number of years certainly do not inspire one. I should like to make reference to a few of the things in Canada's constitutional position which certainly do not inspire one.

Despite the magnificent contributions which Canadians are making in the war effort; despite the contributions which Canadians have always made to the history of this country and to economic and other phases of our national life, the constitutional position is such that there is no provision in Canada's statutes for a Canadian as such. No one in Canada, whether he be a native-born citizen or a naturalized citizen, has yet the privilege of calling himself a Canadian. He is not permitted to be enumerated on the census as a Canadian.

Furthermore, we proclaim that we are a self-governing people, that we are autonomous, and yet when matters of jurisdictional dispute arise we speak of proceeding to another country to amend our so-called constitution—another contradiction of which we certainly cannot be proud.

In recent years the power of disallowance of provincial legislation has been resorted to. I consider that a most undemocratic practice which certainly should not exist in a country calling itself a democracy. Yet the power seemingly is there.

Once more we refer to Canada as a confederation and to the British North America Act as a federal constitution. Yet the fact is that the British North America Act was never submitted to the people of Canada for their approval. The people of Canada neither in 1867 nor since were consulted about the British North America Act.

Furthermore, the central government is often referred to as the federal government, and yet we have no federal district proper, such as the District of Columbia in the United States, or the District of Canberra in Australia, or other federal districts which exist in countries which have federated.

We claim that we are a sovereign self-governing people, and yet we have no distinctive national emblem to symbolize our position.

These are just some of the contradictions and anomalies that exist in Canada's present constitutional position. There are many more but I have not time to enumerate them.

As a private citizen I feel much humiliated at being obliged to accept these contradictory positions in our constitutional structure. I have protested against this situation before; I do so again tonight, and I shall continue to do so until it is remedied.

We are proposing at the present time, since victory is certain, to reconstruct Canada particularly for the benefit of our nation's heroes. The Minister of Finance stated that at the dominion-provincial conference which is to be held, revisions of taxation and other matters of mutual interest will be considered. I wish to suggest from my place in this chamber that among the most important things which could be considered at this conference are the matters to which I have just referred.

In the remainder of my remarks I wish to indicate what accounts for all these anomalies, why they exist and what ought to be done to remove them. In doing so I am not posing as a constitutional expert. The matters on which I wish to speak are such as every citizen, in fact every high school or public school student, should be familiar with. In saying this I am reminded of a statement made by W. P. M. Kennedy, professor of constitutional law, Toronto university, in 1935 in giving evidence to the special committee on the British North America Act. He said:

If we are not capable of interpreting our own constitution we should not have a legislature at all.

That is an appropriate remark. Hence I consider that I am not in the least presumptuous in attempting to discuss a matter of constitutional relationships in Canada. Certainly the elementary principles which govern these relationships should be familiar to everyone. There is not a citizen but should know by what authority we in Canada are governed.

In the few moments yet at my disposal I shall endeavour to present what I regard as a reasonable and logical argument, and to support the statements I make with such evidence from recognized authorities as it is possible to present on this occasion. To those who are inclined to disagree with the statements I make, I say, if they disagree let them counter my arguments with arguments which are reasoned and logical. In times past when I have presented this case I have been subjected to a good deal of scoffing and jeers and ridicule. Such conduct is usually the mark of defeat. Personal abuse and ridicule are not an answer to reason and logic.

In an endeavour to account for the anomalies to which I have referred, and in order to suggest what I think is the solution to remove these anomalies, I am going to endeavour to prove this proposition: that, since the enactment of the statute of Westminster, on December 11, 1931, all power to govern in Canada has resided with the provinces of Canada, and that all power legally remains there until such time as the provinces sign an agreement and ratify a constitution whereby they may delegate such powers as they wish to a central government of their own creation.

To support this proposition a few facts of history must, I think, be adduced. The first point I wish to make is that when the fathers of so-called confederation first thought of confederation they did actually conceive of a federal union proper; it was the aim and the ambition of the fathers of so-called confederation actually to consummate a federal union in Canada. That is the view I hold as a consequence of the history I have been able to examine.

One of the things which indicates this to me is the preamble of the Quebec resolutions, which reads as follows:

> The best interests and present and future prosperity of British North America will be promoted by a federal union under the crown.

The term "federal union" is used.

Then again, there is clause 70 of the Quebec resolutions, which indicates that whatever agreement was arrived at would be submitted to the provinces and to the people. The clause reads as follows:

> The sanction of the imperial and local parliaments shall be sought for the union of the provinces on the principles adopted by the conference.

In the draft British North America Act which was prepared by the fathers of confederation we find a repealing clause which certainly indicates that this draft bill provided for a proper federal union. It reads as follows:

> From and after the union, all acts and parts of acts passed by the parliament of Great Britain, the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the legislature of Upper Canada, the legislature of Lower Canada, the legislature of Canada, the legislature of Nova Scotia, the legislature of New Brunswick, which are repugnant to or inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall be and the same are hereby repealed.

That certainly indicates, I believe, that what the fathers of confederation were actually aiming at was a federal union proper. I believe they were well aware of what was involved in creating a proper federal union, for at that time there was a civil war raging between the federal union and the confederacy in the United States.

I assert that, from the history which I have examined, neither the spirit nor the terms of the Quebec resolutions were carried out in the British North America Act. There is no evidence which I have been able to discover to indicate that the preamble which we find on the British North America Act in printed copies here to-day was ever mentioned either in the House of Lords or the House of Commons. The preamble which appears on the present British North America Act refers to Canada as nothing but a united colony, whereas the Canadian preamble intended that Canada should be a federal union. When the preamble was discussed in the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon, who introduced the bill on February 19, 1867, used these words, as reported at page 559 of the British Hansard:

> The bill opens by reciting the desire of the several provinces to be federally united.

And again we find Lord Campbell, speaking on the bill, on February 26, making this statement, at page 1012-13 of the British Hansard:

> The bill is founded, I believe, on what is termed the Quebec scheme of 1864. . . . Our lights indeed may be imperfect upon this part of the subject, and I will not dwell upon it. But one thing is clear: The preamble of the resolution comes before us in full and perfect authenticity.

I think it is quite evident from the quotations I have read that the preamble which was discussed was the preamble of the Quebec resolutions, but the preamble we find in the printed copies of the British North America Act to-day was not even mentioned. I spent some considerable time on one previous occasion indicating the consequences of such a position, but I have not the time to go into that to-night.

Another point of significance in the passing of the British North America Act at that time is the undue haste with which it was passed. The second reading was called for, but the bill was not even printed. It was given third reading on February 26 in the House of Lords, and the second reading was called for on February 28 in the House of Commons without the bill having been printed.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are more modern precedents than that.

Mr. KUHL: No doubt there are, but I would point out that this is a matter which cannot be treated lightly. Sir John A. Macdonald did not approve this. When the draft bills were being considered at the London conference, as I pointed out in this house once before—and I have a copy of the draft bill at the London conference which Sir John Macdonald had and which we find quite disfigured—he indicated his disapproval of the words that referred to making Canada a united colony, and he substitutes the words, "federal union". I could elaborate on that much more extensively, but time will not permit my doing so. I conclude that aspect by saying that although the fathers of confederation did intend to create a federal union in Canada, for reasons which I have not the time this evening to discuss, they were not able to consummate the federal union they desired. All they accomplished or were permitted to set up in Canada at that time was a united colony, and to substantiate that statement I will quote from Sir John Bourinot in the book "In Canada Under British Rule" at page 215:

> It is interesting to know that in the original draft of the bill the united provinces were called the Kingdom of Canada, but when it came eventually before parliament, they were designated as "the Dominion of Canada", and the writer had it from Sir John A. Macdonald himself that this amendment did not emanate from the colonial delegates but from the imperial minister.

Another point which substantiates that is the clause in the Interpretations Act, section 18, paragraph 3, which defines the term "dominion". We use the terms "dominion" and "federal" interchangeably, but they are not one and the same thing. The Interpretations Act was passed expressly to define the term "dominion", because we find this:

> The expression "colony" shall mean any of Her Majesty's dominions exclusive of the British islands and of British India; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central legislature and local legislatures, all parts under the central legislature shall, for the purpose of this definition, be deemed to be one colony.

It is therefore clear from this that Canada's position after the enactment of the British North America Act was that of a colony under the term "dominion". I had intended to point out the differences constitutionally that existed before the British North America Act and immediately after, but my time will not permit. The fact is that through the British North America Act Canada was demoted from a self-governing country to a colony. All the powers of self-government in Canada were removed and most of the power was personally in the governor general as agent of the imperial parliament. Section 11 gives him power to summon, appoint and remove from time to time members of the privy council for Canada. Section 14 gives him the power to appoint a commission to the Yukon accountable only to himself, and under section 24 he appoints the senate, while under sections 55, 56 and 57 the power of disallowance over dominion legislation is reposed in the governor general and under section 90 the power of disallowance over provincial legislation, and above all, prior to the British North America Act, the Colonial Laws Validity Act of June 29, 1865, gave the governor general the right to disallow any legislation by simply publishing the fact in a newspaper. Section 6 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the effect of which incidentally was removed by the Statute of Westminster, declares:

> Any proclamation purported to be published by the authority of the governor, circulating in any newspaper in the colonies, signifying Her Majesty's assent to any such colonial law, or Her Majesty's disallowance of any such reserved bill as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of such disallowance or assent.

I see it is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I have five minutes left. If it is agreeable to hon. members I do not mind concluding, but I should like to have my five minutes. I take it that the house is agreeable. I was attempting to establish that Canada did not become a federal union in 1867 but rather was demoted to the position of a united colony with the supreme control of power still residing in the imperial parliament through their agent the governor general in Canada.

Just a quotation or two from the special committee on the British North America Act of 1935 in Canada. A federal union is defined by Beauvier in his law dictionary as follows:

> It consists of a union or confederation of sovereign states, created either by treaty or by mutual adoption of a federal constitution.

That implies that a treaty or agreement must be signed by the appropriate authorities and ratified. As to whether the British North America Act was an agreement or a treaty, here is some evidence. Doctor Ollivier at page 54 of the special committee, says:

> To revert to the statement that confederation is a contract, this proposition contains a number of fallacies: First, confederation so-called is not a confederation; and second, it is not a contract.

Again, Doctor W. P. M. Kennedy, at page 69, says:

> I approach this problem as a practical problem and I think we have got to get away from the idea that the British North America Act is a contract or a treaty. I do not want to go into that, but it is true neither in history nor in law.

At page 115 we find Mr. Norman Rogers giving evidence and he is questioned by Mr. Cowan:

> You do not subscribe to the belief that this was a pact or contract?
> Mr. Rogers: I am thoroughly convinced it is not either in the historical or the legal sense.

Our own Clerk, Doctor Beauchesne, at page 125, said:

> It is quite true that if we applied to the British North America Act the principles followed in the interpretation of statutes, it is not a compact between provinces; it is an act of parliament, which does not even embody all the resolutions passed in Canada and in London prior to its passage in the British parliament where certain clauses that had not been recommended by the Canadian provinces were added.

I think that is sufficient evidence to substantiate my claim.

I was going to draw a comparison between the federal constitution of Australia and what we have in Canada, but time does not permit me to do so. Therefore I wish to conclude by asserting that we continued from 1867 to December 11, 1931, as a united colony. That situation was changed on December 11, 1931, by the statute of Westminster; whereas we were not self-governing we became self-governing. But what was the position? The provinces were not able to federate in 1867. They were not permitted. They would have to draft their own agreement, draft their own constitution and submit it to the people for ratification. They did not do that in 1867. The privilege to federate was therefore a future privilege and therefore, before the provinces could federate, they must become free, independent and sovereign. By section 7, paragraph 2, of the statute of Westminster the provinces of Canada were made sovereign, free and independent in order that they might consummate a federal union which they had wished to consummate in 1867 but were not permitted to do so. Since December 11, 1931, the provinces have not acted on their newly acquired status. There has been no agreement signed between the provinces since 1931. There has been no constitution adopted; the people have not been consulted on anything. There is not a scratch of a pen in Canada showing where there is any agreement between any of the provinces constituting anything.

I think the most important aspect of this whole situation is the sovereignty of the individual citizens of Canada which is involved. John Locke has this to say on the question of individual sovereignty:

> Men being by nature all free, equal and independent, no one can be put out of this estate and subjected to the power of another without his own consent. The only way whereby anyone divests himself of his natural liberty and puts on the bonds of civil society is by agreeing with other men to join and unite into a community.

I wish to assert, Mr. Speaker, on that basis that the people of Canada did not have the privilege in 1867 to agree to anything and they have not done so since 1931. I contend as a citizen of this country that I have been put out of my state of independence without my consent, and that applies to every citizen of Canada. I demand, therefore, that proper steps be taken in the Dominion of Canada to establish a constitutional position which is in harmony with our status.

If the house will bear with me these are my last words. What is the starting point? This brings me back to some more evidence given to the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935. At page 116 Mr. Cowan was questioning Mr. Norman Rogers and he said this:

> Mr. Cowan: You get back to this: your start is another interprovincial conference?
> Mr. Rogers: I am afraid it is. I see no feasible alternative.
> Hon. Mr. Lapointe: There is no doubt about it.

Then we have the evidence of Doctor Skelton at page 42 which is as follows:

> No other country in the world looks to the parliament of another country for the shaping of its constitution. This solution would only be supported if we believe that Canadians are the only people so incompetent that they cannot work out a solution of their constitutional problem, and so biased that they alone among the peoples of the world cannot be trusted to deal fairly with the various domestic interests concerned.

On a previous occasion in this house I quoted Doctor Beauchesne's suggestions as to how to overcome the situation which exists in Canada, and if the house will permit me I should like to give the quotation at this time. Doctor Beauchesne had this to say, and with this I shall close:

The Statute of Westminster has altered our status. . . . What we want is a new constitution.

The new constitution must leave nobody with a grievance. A spirit of conciliation should predominate. For these reasons, the task must be entrusted to an independent body in which all the elements of the country will be represented. I want the assembly to sit in a city in the west. It would not be necessary for a delegate to be a member of parliament or of a provincial legislature. I would suggest that the assembly do not sit in Ottawa, in order that it may not have the appearance of being dominated or even influenced by the dominion power; and, as the western provinces are of such paramount importance in the country, I suggest the best city for the representatives to gather in would be in Winnipeg.

Whether our country should be changed from a dominion to a kingdom is also a subject which might be discussed. I would suggest that the country could be called "The Federated States of Canada." There have been many disputes about provincial rights since 1867 and it seems certain that when a new constitution is drawn up the distribution of federal and provincial powers will have to be modified.

I have presented what I consider is a reasoned and logical argument. It is a subject which cannot be discussed properly in the short period of forty minutes. I take this thing very seriously. I think the time is long past due when we the people of Canada should do something about this serious situation. I believe the statements I have made warrant a reply on the part of some one of the government, either the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) or some other spokesman for the government. I think they also warrant a statement on the part of the provincial premiers of this country and I shall await their remarks and observe what attitude they take.

On motion of Mr. Homuth the debate was adjourned.

It being eight minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 4, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Everett Roy Clow.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill No. 158, for the relief of Elmore MacLean MacKay.—Mr. Douglas.

GENERAL DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will be interested to learn that General de Gaulle has accepted the invitation of the government to visit Ottawa. It is expected that he will be here in about a week's time, for a brief stay immediately following his visit to the United States. In view of the great interest which will be aroused here by the presence of this distinguished French leader, arrangements will be made, with his consent, for General de Gaulle to appear publicly on parliament hill before the proceedings of parliament open on the day he happens to be here. Details of the arrangements will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I thank the Prime Minister for informing the house as to the arrangements made for General de Gaulle's visit. As the Prime Minister will recall, I made inquiry on an earlier occasion and my right hon. friend was good enough to say that he would give the information as soon as possible.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

FELICITATIONS TO THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as this is Independence day in the United States, will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has made any move toward sending our felicitations and best wishes to the United States government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes. As my hon. friend is aware, I received from the President a most cordial communication on Dominion day, and I have sent to him to-day on behalf of the Canadian people a communication which, I hope, may prove to be equally felicitous.

WHEAT

ISSUE OF CHEQUES FOR PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, with respect to the hold-up or delay in the issue of cheques for participation certificates in respect of the sale of wheat. Would he explain what the situation is, and when it is expected this job may be completed?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have not the information which would enable me at this time to answer the hon. member's question. I do know that a very considerable amount of work has been involved in getting these payments out. I shall make inquiries, and I may be able to give the hon. member a report to-morrow.

Mr. PERLEY: Read the report of the committee on agriculture, where the question was asked and answered.

INTERNMENTS

MR. CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. Has he received the medical report following the examination of Mr. Camillien Houde, together with the document he is supposed to have signed?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Text): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has inquired if I have received a report from the physicians concerning the physical condition of Mr. Camillien Houde, and if I have received a certain document he is supposed to have signed. I know of no document he is supposed to have signed, and I have not yet received any report from the medical men who, I understand, have made a physical examination of Mr. Houde. I inquired this morning, and no report had yet reached the Department of Justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest that this question might have been placed on the order paper. Any further questions along this line will certainly have to be so dealt with.

HOUSING

UNITS FOR SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS—SALE OF HOUSES TO PRESENT OCCUPANTS—EVICTION OF FAMILIES OF ENLISTED MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): On Friday of last week the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) asked if a conference had taken place between Wartime Housing Limited and the Soldiers' Dependents' Society of Toronto, with regard to the building of one hundred units for soldiers' dependents. The answer is yes, and a contract has been entered into between Wartime Housing Limited and the city of Toronto for the construction of a certain number of these houses. Construction will proceed shortly.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) asked if any steps were being taken by the department to facilitate the sale of wartime houses to war workers who are now occupying them. Thus far it has been the practice of the department to refuse to sell wartime houses under any circumstances, the reason being that these houses are considered necessary for essential war purposes. If there is to be a change in this practice it will be a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the parliamentary assistant yet in position to answer the question I propounded to him, I think either on Thursday or Friday, with respect to eviction or removal from wartime housing accommodation of dependents of war workers who had enlisted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I received the clipping from my hon. friend this morning only and I am not yet in position to make a reply. I will do so as soon as I can.

Mr. ADAMSON: The position of the soldiers' dependents is frequently desperate, and these houses are urgently needed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, July 3, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, there is an old adage that chickens will come home to roost. Considered in relation to the problems with which this government is faced, perhaps no truer statement was ever made. Some of these old ghostly, moulting and non-productive chickens are coming home to the Liberal government hencoop. Their condition is such that they threaten to destroy the whole flock. It is with some of those chickens that I wish to deal to-day, because they have cost and are costing the Dominion of Canada millions of dollars.

As I sit in the house I often wonder what passes through the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as he sits gazing around the house and counting the number of parties therein. I look back a few years when the Prime Minister stood in his place in this house, pointed to the third party which then existed and asked, "Who is responsible for that?" He said, "The Conservative party is responsible. Why are they responsible?" The reply was, "Because they have brought so much discontent into the country, they have caused so much disunity that the malcontents have formed a party of their own."

I look over the house to-day and count the number of parties. It is a goodly number. First, we have the Progressive Conservative party. I name that party first because when the election is over it will be first. Second, we have the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. Then we have the Social Credit party. Then we have the unity party; then the Bloc Populaire party; then the Two Mountains party. Then we have the Liberal party divided into three parts. On the one hand we have the party of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Corman), the party to which he referred in his speech in Hamilton as the "dead guinea pig party." Then we have the party of the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), which was referred to at the same meeting as the "nothing party." I would say that that is the largest group in the Liberal party. Then of course we have the official Liberal party, which is gradually dwindling.

This gives a true picture of the discontent, the disunity and the dissatisfaction that have grown up in this country during the last few years as a result of the administration given by the present government. It has been a government of bureaucrats, of orders in council, a government which in spite of its promises has neglected to take labour, farmer and other appreciable groups in this country into its confidence in order to discuss their problems with them.

I intend to-day to deal particularly with the income tax and manpower policies. There are many inequalities in the income tax act. If there is one act on the statute book that should be ironclad, that should not be subject in any way to the likes or dislikes of some administrator, that should not be subject to appeal by some member on behalf of a taxpayer, it is the income tax act. When the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) was speaking in the house the other day he referred to the tax on farmers, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) said that they were allowed to spread this over five years.

There is nothing in the statute which permits the government to do that, but apparently they can do it if the officials wish to do it. In other words, there is a law which permits the government to exercise its friendship or dislike in order to give to its friends a five-year spread, and to those it dislikes only one year. There are farmers who have had to pay it. Perhaps if they appeal to the department they may get that spread, but it should not be necessary for a man to have to go to his member to have an appeal made on his behalf to the income tax department.

Mr. GIBSON: That is only where the entire stock is being sold, a dispersal sale. It is not a case of distributing annual income over a period of years.

Mr. HOMUTH: Quite right, but in some cases it has been taxed and in other cases it has not. If there is one law, I say, that should be ironclad and not subject to the interpretation of departmental officials it is the income tax act.

There is another provision in the income tax act which I think is grossly unfair. I refer to the taxation of the various ministerial pension and relief funds. I believe appeals have been made to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with regard to this, but nothing has been done. They have been advised that when the money is paid out in the form of annuities it will not be taxed. It cannot be taxed because these old ministers who have put in years and years in the service of their churches will not receive sufficient as annuities to be taxed. These are some of the inequalities that exist under this act.

One matter which is perhaps causing the most concern is the income tax on industrial workers. We have had a peculiar set-up since the war began. There has been tremendous extravagance since the war began; millions of dollars have been wasted in the construction of army camps and other necessary buildings.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Necessary?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOMUTH: Millions of dollars were spent in the construction of plants to make munitions of war. Much money was wasted because men had to stand idle while plans and specifications were changed. The people of this country realize that that was necessary and they did not find fault. They knew we were at war and they were willing to make any necessary sacrifice. But as we went along we built up in many of these centres an average of wages that was far beyond the wages paid in other parts of the country. The average of wages around some of these military camps had reached such a level that if a man knew one end of a hammer from another he could get a job tacking tar paper on buildings at seventy to seventy-five cents an hour, with double time on Sundays and time-and-a-half for overtime. Men left the farms to go into the towns and cities to earn these wages, and the result was that the whole industrial and agricultural economy in those districts was disrupted. Then came the freezing of wages. Where men in one section were getting very high rates of pay, that was the rate at which wages were frozen in that section; where men in other sections were getting low wages, that was the rate at which wages were frozen there.

New plants were completed, but one thing more was needed—employees. We had a tremendous shortage of tool makers, machinists, skilled workers in all the different iron trades. The men in these trades were willing to work long, hard hours; they were willing to work overtime; they were willing to do anything in the war effort, because they felt it was part of their job. Then some bright mind in the Department of Finance or within the ranks of the government conceived of the income tax as now applied to industrial workers. First there was the national defence tax. That was done away with and a straight income tax was imposed instead. Who are the bright minds in the department who know anything about industry? Who are the men in the cabinet who know anything about industry? You have a couple of men there who used to be farmers, you have some lawyers and you have some business brokers, but you have only one man in the cabinet who knew anything about industry and that was the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) himself. He did know industry; he did know labour; he did know the conditions under which labour works. When he was first appointed to the cabinet I felt, and I believe the feeling was general across this country, that at last the government of the day was extending itself to the point of taking into the cabinet someone who was was non-partisan, who was not of the Liberal party, because of the knowledge that he had of the department over which he was presiding. I remember meeting him one morning in Toronto on his way to his by-election campaign in Welland. I congratulated him upon his appointment. I suggested to him that he had the confidence of the people of this country and of labour particularly. I think perhaps I have known the Minister of Labour longer than any other man in this house, but in congratulating him I said this: "I believe you can do a job in that department if you are permitted to do it, but I am afraid that your job will be predicated not upon the needs of labour or of industry or of production in this country, but rather upon political expediency." I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is what has happened, because I cannot conceive of the Minister of Labour sitting in a cabinet and agreeing to the enactment of an income tax act the effect of which could only be to cause absenteeism in industry.

We have a tremendous labour shortage in this country. We go to men and appeal to them to work overtime. But the Canadian people have learned how to work out the income tax. The Canadian people cannot be fooled. The Canadian worker sits down and figures out that if he works on Saturday afternoon over and above his regular time he gets very little extra pay for it because of the income tax; if he works overtime he gets very little pay for it.

Then the appeal went out to women to work in industry, married women who could get away from their homes. Come into industry—we need you. That was the appeal, and the women came. Some will say that they came for the money. I know many of them who came into industry and who had sons overseas. They came in—why? Because they felt they could do a job, because they felt it was their duty to come into industry and produce the things that were so necessary in the carrying on of this war. They came in, and what happened? As soon as they started to earn money the whole tax structure in that home changed. Immediately these women were penalized for going out and doing a necessary war job. Is it any wonder that we say now, and I have always contended this, that any extra pay for overtime should not be taxed, that we should sit down and work out a system of taxation that will bear less heavily on the industrial worker so that we may get longer hours of work and greater production, and at the same time bring more money into the treasury?

On June 19 a meeting was called in the city of Toronto by one of the officers of the wartime prices and trade board. The heads of industry of western Ontario were invited to attend. I went there. Evidently a very large gathering was not expected because the first thing they knew there were between four and five hundred men at the meeting, and they had to hurry out and grab more chairs until the ballroom of the Royal York was filled to capacity. Who were the four or five hundred men who attended that meeting? They were men who were operating industry in western Ontario. They were men who knew all about industrial headaches. They were men who knew all about the troubles of industry in getting production, in keeping the lines working, in keeping the machines busy. These men came to that meeting because they felt that they would have an opportunity to discuss their problems. They were men who knew the headaches of absenteeism and could do nothing about it.

We went into the meeting and were handed the agenda. The agenda provided for a speech from one gentleman from selective service. It provided also for a speech from a gentleman from the Department of Labour, and then it provided for the showing of a motion picture. At the bottom of the agenda it said: "No discussion will be permitted, but if you have anything to discuss there are a large number of men here from the Department at Ottawa and you can sit down privately and discuss those matters with them." Five hundred men had given up their time and money—

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to know the name of the man who said that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go and look at the agenda. It says right on the agenda: "No discussion will be permitted."

Mr. MITCHELL: Whose agenda was it?

Mr. HOMUTH: The agenda was drawn up by the wartime prices and trade board, who called the meeting.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend said selective service.

Mr. HOMUTH: Pardon me; I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, you did.

Mr. HOMUTH: I said that a man was there from the selective service to make a speech. My little friend from Vancouver Centre will please keep quiet—I mean little mentally.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would be better if you did too.

Mr. HOMUTH: I said that a speaker from selective service spoke at the meeting.

Mr. MITCHELL: You got mixed up in your thoughts.

Mr. ROWE: You got mixed up in your agenda. Who wrote the agenda?

Mr. HOMUTH: A Mr. Mackenzie and, I think, a Mr. Hooker.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is trying to be too clever.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not have to take any lessons from the Minister of Labour as to truthfulness; let me tell him that. I have known him too long.

Mr. GARDINER: You might be mistaken.

Mr. HOMUTH: This meeting was called, as I say—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By whom?

Mr. HOMUTH: These men came there in the hope that they could discuss these problems, that as a result of the knowledge thus gained they could send recommendations back to the government, and that the government would then benefit by the advice of perhaps the most representative group of men who could be gathered together at any time in any part of this country. Instead of that, no discussion was permitted, until in the afternoon groups gathered again. There was no general discussion; little groups gathered here and there, but these men could do nothing, they could not take recommendations back to this government. Why? The speeches they made were fine and were well delivered, but they dealt with things which we in industry have known for years and which most industries have put into practice. The advice they gave would have been excellent four or five years ago, but now is not the time to tell the industrialists of western Ontario how to do these things. These men simply came to tell us, without discussion, what to do. They had no cure for such industrial ills as absenteeism. Everything that was done had to be predicated on government policy. When these various laws which deal with industrial workers were being drawn up, how often were the heads of labour and of industry invited to take part in the discussions? I venture to say that if the government had selected any six men from the employers' group and any six representatives of labour that day they could have sat down and worked out income tax provisions covering industrial workers which would have brought the government more money, would have given us greater production because it would have led to more work, and would have borne less heavily on the people who pay the taxes. Instead of that course being taken, recourse is had to so-called experts, college graduates, economists and so on, men who have no idea whatever of the headaches which industry experiences in trying to maintain production. Now—

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member should read his speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: One thing I will say about the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is that he, like myself, has never read a speech in this chamber. Perhaps it would be better if we did.

Another of the headaches of industrial workers is in the making out of income tax forms. I do not know of any official requirement which has caused them more concern.

Year after year they are told that a simplified form will be provided, but when the form comes out it is more of a mystic maze than ever. I believe that an easier and better way of collecting income tax could be devised for our industrial workers. Many who since the war began have been forced to make out income tax forms never before had to deal with government, and when the order was issued that on such a day the return must be in, they were worried and bothered. The same trouble occurred in the United States, so that recently they simplified the collection of income tax from those who pay on an income of $5,000 or less per year. In the Monetary Times of July, 1944, is an article on the tax simplification measure which has been passed by the United States Congress. I quote a clause on page 73 which I think is interesting and to which the government could well give attention with a view of trying to work out some such system here:

> It is in the handling of taxes on wages and salaries the greatest simplification has taken place. An individual earning up to $5,000 a year, with $100 from other sources allowed, will have his total tax withheld at the source of income. He will be permitted to claim a flat deduction of 10 per cent to cover donations to churches, charities, et cetera. At the end of the year he will receive from his employer a statement showing his total earnings and the amount of tax deducted. The individual will put down on this paper his marital status and dependents and whether he had earnings from other sources. Total income and tax deductions will be set out. The statement will be sent to the treasury department and the officials there will do the calculating. If he owes the government additional taxes he will be billed in thirty days. If too much has been deducted he will get a refund.

Now that compulsory savings has been done away with it may be much easier to simplify the income tax return, because taxpayers will not have to cite their various insurance policies and so on. If there is one object at which the Department of National Revenue should aim, it is the simplification of these returns. At the present time they are a headache to the people who have to fill them out, and also to every branch of industry, because office staffs are kept busy making out returns for their employees.

Let us deal for a moment with the question of compulsory savings. In his budget speech the other day the Minister of Finance said that the decision not to continue compulsory savings would be a great boon to industrial workers and others, and he pointed out that there would be more money in the pay envelope. It looked to me like a subtle attempt to bribe the industrial workers of this country with their own money. If he wished to do something effective he should have reduced the income tax rate, and then the compulsory savings could easily have been kept going. But the workmen in the factories are not going to be misled into supposing that they are getting something from this government; all that has been conceded to them is money which they would have eventually received any way. What they are interested in, and the one thing they are interested in, is the rate of income tax. In supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), I express the opinion that every hon. member who represents an industrial riding believes as we do, that there should be an exemption at the very least up to these amounts, and that in that way we would be able to encourage our industrial workers to work more hours and get much greater production.

Here we have a cry going up from the Department of Munitions and Supply for thousands more men to go into the shell factories and the shell filling plants because it is found suddenly that there is a greater need for shells than was anticipated. Well, where were they going to get these men? At the same time, the selective service was calling men from the farms and factories, and so these men were removed from one industry to another with the result that the whole industrial picture of the country was disorganized, until to-day industries that are working on necessary military production have in many instances reduced production by fifteen, twenty, and twenty-five per cent. If there is one thing that has caused disorganization it is the manner in which the whole man-power policy has been handled.

I realize apparently men are needed for the army—not from anything in particular that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has told us in the house as to requirements for the army, but certainly his officers who go from one end of the country to the other, and the advertisements that have appeared in the newspapers of the country, which must cost a very considerable sum of money, have made it known only too well how badly men are needed for reinforcements for overseas. Yet at the same time we keep calling men from the farms and from necessary industrial jobs and sending them into this home defence army. I do not think the people of Canada will ever forgive this government for the way in which they have handled the whole man-power situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are not calling men from the farms.

Mr. HOMUTH: You are calling men from the farms.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are not.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go and talk to some of your selective service boards across the country as to whether you are calling men from the farms. In spite of the promise made on more than one occasion that men in the army could get relief for seeding and harvest, you cannot get it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a different thing altogether. My hon. friend said that we were calling men from the farms, and I say we are not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have evidence of it.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member cannot see the forest for the trees. If he were out in the Styx once in a while instead of living here in Ottawa he would get some idea of what is going on in the country.

Mr. McILRAITH: The Styx of Waterloo South?

Mr. HOMUTH: There are a few sticks there and they are pretty good sticks too. I say that these men are being called into this army out of industry and from the farms. The whole man-power policy has been wrong from the very start. First we had a month of training, and then four months, and then training for the duration, but only within Canada, and that was extended beyond the Canadian shores. Now we have these men being called from the farms. What has been the idea? Efforts have been made, even under the four-months training plan, to shame and humiliate men to go active. The Minister of National Defence has at times suggested that he had no knowledge of that, that that was not so. Ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is true. Ask him what men told him at a meeting in Waterloo county a couple of years ago as to what was going on in military camps, trying to humiliate men to go active. Ask the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt), who knows the story. Ask the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray). He knows about it. Ask other hon. members of the house. Was there anything more disgusting in connection with our whole man-power situation than when the order came through the department saying that young men of 18½ years were to be called, and the next day, in every newspaper across the country, there appeared large advertisements saying, "You are going to be called at 18½ years; why don't you join now and choose what service you want to go into?" Imagine saying this to young men under the age of 18½ years. That has been the story of the whole man-power situation. It is a serious situation. If these men are not needed for overseas there is only one place for them, and that is back on the farms and in industry. If they are needed for overseas service, they should be told so. They ought to know what is ahead of them. Let us be honest with them and let us say to them just what their position in the country is.

I have only a few moments left, but I did want to deal for a few minutes with the question of family allowances. I will say this, Mr. Speaker, that if there is one thing that labour wants to watch it is the hand-out it is being given supposedly by this government that is in power. Labour wants to watch them as closely as it possibly can. It wants to watch the hand-outs it is getting from this group that forms the government of the country. Why? Because, when you start to subsidize industrial wages—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: Go ahead.

Mr. HOMUTH: When you start to subsidize industrial wages out of the treasury of the country by passing certain paternal legislation which is going to give money to people, then I say that labour is in a very dangerous position, because on that day you lower the whole trend of labour in the country. That day you put labour in the position where its wages will be based on—what? On requirements? On output? On the job they are doing? No; it will be based on money that is coming into their homes. One of the most important things for labour is to watch this tendency, and that is why organized labour throughout the country has protested against this paternalism. It has protested against it because labour knows what it is going to mean. I say to labour, be very careful of these gentlemen who bring gifts to you; because, in my experience in this house in the last four years, since the election of 1940, regardless of all promises—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have seen—

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, yesterday of your own motion, as reported at page 4443 of Hansard, you stopped me from discussing the question of family allowances.

Mr. HOMUTH: I did not say family allowances.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, you did. You are discussing that.

Mr. KINLEY: He is discussing the tariff.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest that he is discussing family allowances as much as I was, and the same rule should apply to him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the hon. gentleman intended to speak of family allowances.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was not speaking of family allowances, and I have never been as much out of order as the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL: What are you talking about, then?

Mr. HOMUTH: I do say that labour must be careful, because in spite of the promises that no matter what board was set up, where labour was interested labour would be consulted, labour would have a say, labour would have something to do with initiating such legislation, or orders in council—in spite of the promises, that has not been the case. What is the situation with regard to all the boards on which labour was to be represented? It is this. Government policy had been laid down and these men could agree with it or not; it was government policy anyway. That is the whole picture all the way through; otherwise we would not have had these difficulties with labour in the first place.

An hon. MEMBER: Ah!

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend says "Ah!" Well, after the next election he will not be able to say it in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have been watching the clock closely, Mr. Speaker, and I believe I have one minute left. I did want to say something about the hon. gentlemen to my left. I have not time to do that now, which I am sure will please hon. members. However, there is some satisfaction in knowing that now they feel they have a Moses who is going to lead them to the promised land. I checked up on what Moses really did, and found that it took him forty years and then he never got to the promised land, so that we are fairly safe. After the next election, when we come into power, we will bring the Canadian people to the promised land without any particular Moses.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): In listening to the sort of appeal we heard from the last speaker (Mr. Homuth) I hope the people will not conjure up the kind of promised land we had in this dominion after the election of 1930. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that there are many reasons for believing that the people of Canada have not forgotten the attempt of a Conservative government to cure a national depression with an appropriation of $20,000,000. As I read the election returns it seems to me the people have not forgotten the kind of plutocracy that was established when the privately-owned plutocratic monopoly of the Bank of Canada was established by a Tory administration. If that is the kind of promised land Progressive Toryism has to offer, I think it is the kind of promised land the people of Canada will be glad to wander in the wilderness for at least forty years to avoid.

I do not want to get into the bickerings of party politics to-day, Mr. Speaker. I want to deal with what has been to me, during my experience in parliament, the most important and far-reaching of all its institutions, namely, the budget. I think every hon. member will agree that the growth and distribution of wealth, not the persistence of poverty, must provide the true way to a more useful life, a greater regard for order, and that love of independence which alone can assure a greater and more enduring freedom. You know, sir, that we of the British race have always prized freedom above everything else. Our whole constitution was born of the revolution inspired by a hatred of autocracy and a love of freedom; and in the armies of liberty that have marched down the ages of our civilization we have built an empire, the greatest force in our modern world, upon the foundations of freedom. To-day our great leaders meet and propound the issues as we see them in this conflict, as centering around four great freedoms. But I want to come to that great freedom which is involved in the budget.

As a young man I started out in life with a fear of debt. I made up my mind there would never be a mortgage on my home. While that home was very modest, I achieved my aim; but I completely overlooked three things. I forgot that there was a crowd up in my city hall; I forgot that there was another group of fellows in the provincial legislature, and that there was still another galaxy down in my national parliament, all conspiring together to make a mockery of my ideal of having a home without a mortgage. My city fathers succeeded to the extent of putting a billion dollars on it; my provincial legislators put on another two billion and my national parliament already has added another thirteen billion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much did you put on when you were mayor of Vancouver?

Mr. McGEER: I reduced the debt; I borrowed the only money ever borrowed by the city of Vancouver at three per cent; I built the best and cheapest city hall in the British empire, and still found time to come down here and try to put you right as leader of the Tory party.

I should like to draw the attention of the Liberal members of this house to a passage which I studied many long years ago. I thought then and still believe it is a splendid conception of the economics of industry and humanity. It was written by a man who had been minister of labour in Canada and who is now, next to Winston Churchill, one of the most distinguished prime ministers in the British empire—the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. Listen to what he says about debt:

Workmen's compensation, sickness and invalidity insurance, widows' pensions, maternity and infant benefits, recognize wherein personal relationships in industry have changed, and where as a consequence of new conditions permanent handicaps arise. The social legislation of which these measures are an expression rejects, as unworthy, the thought that men and women voluntarily incur accident, sickness, disease, enfeebled health or dependence in distress, any more than they willingly seek enslavement of any kind. It recognizes the difficulty of differentiating between industrial accident and occupational disease, and between disease occasioned by occupation or its environments and illness otherwise contracted; also the impossibility of dissociating from economic conditions the social waste caused by excessive and preventable illness. It seems that debt binds health as it binds freedom.

These are letters that should be written high in the mind of every Liberal in Canada—"it seems that debt binds health as it binds freedom." Mark that statement, with the debt load being developed in the Dominion of Canada under the leadership of the Prime Minister who wrote those words. It was not surprising that a man acknowledging and declaring as a principle that debt binds health and freedom should in parliament, at a later date, when the question of the supremacy and enthronement of plutocracy by toryism was the issue of the day, should declare:

As I said the other evening, once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government——and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. Those are strong words, they constitute a strong argument, and they are words which this house ought to take full account of before it is too late.

And not merely restored, Mr. Speaker.

Now I come to our situation to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To the apostasy.

Mr. McGEER: I come, not to the idle twittering and chattering of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who laughs at a nation in a great crisis—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no; I am laughing at the apostasy of your own leader.

Mr. McGEER: You are laughing and sneering as a nation passes through its most dire situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not at all.

Mr. McGEER: And faces its most difficult problems.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not at all.

Mr. McGEER: If you feel that it is time for laughing and sneering, then it is your privilege; but, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to direct the hon. member to keep quiet while I have the floor, because I have no facility for speaking in choruses, much less in choruses with him. It may be a matter of laughter; it may be a matter of jeers and sneers, but it was not so—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And abuse.

Mr. McGEER: It was not so in 1939. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am fairly tolerant on the floor of the house; but I must ask that that remark be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear it.

Mr. McGEER: He referred to abuse. I never offered him any abuse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No? You don't do anything else but abuse people who do not agree with you.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members who wish to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, to address the Chair and to ask permission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGEER: I have followed the debt course of the dominion ever since I have been in public life. Let me recall the figures to hon. members. In 1919, at the commencement of the last war, our net debt was slightly under $400,000,000. We wound up in 1920, after four years of war and two years of demobilization with our net debt lifted from $400,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. From 1921 we followed a leadership in monetary economy which declared, first, for a balanced budget and, second, for surpluses with which to reduce the national debt. That course was followed until the depression forced its abandonment in the early thirties. In the election budget of 1930 the then minister of finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning, was able to make this statement:

> The revenue and expenditure statement may now be summarized. The ordinary and special receipts amount to $447,322,000. The total expenditures for all purposes amount to $402,815,000, thereby leaving an estimated surplus of revenue over expenditures of $44,507,000.

That had been the policy throughout. We had reduced the national debt in the ten-year period by something in the vicinity of $250,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, remember this, that, having followed the policy of a balanced budget, with surpluses and a reduction of the national debt, we ran headlong into the worst depression the Dominion of Canada has ever known.

Now I come to the budget statement of 1938, made by the same distinguished gentleman who, after having taken a rest for a few years, had come back. This is what he says as reported at page 3914 of Hansard for June 16, 1938:

> The progress which this government has made in approaching its objective of a balanced budget within the shortest practicable period is indicated by the fact that, while the over-all deficit in our first year, 1935-36, was $159,989,000, the deficit was reduced to $77,851,000 in 1936-37, and to $13,775,000 during the past fiscal year.

Unfortunately in 1939 he again had to apologize for being unable to achieve a balanced budget; for we find that on April 25 of that year he is reported at page 3150 of Hansard as follows:

> Leaving aside therefore any expenditures in regard to wheat, there will be a probable gap between our revenues and expenditures during the new fiscal year of about $60,000,000.
> Needless to say, I am disappointed to have to contemplate another deficit of this size. I had fervently hoped that this year I would be able to offer to the house a balanced budget and as a result be in a position to begin the process of reducing debt and taxes. I have already outlined the reasons why this "consumation devoutly to be wished" must be deferred and I have discussed at some length the forces which must be set to work to make it possible.
> Let no one think that I have changed my mind in regard to the necessity of a balanced budget.

That was a great minister of finance—presumably the greatest since Alexander Hamilton—who, from the high place he has attained in directorates of the Dominion of Canada as an orthodox financier must still be recognized as the peer of the line. Was he right in that policy, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. McGEER: Well, I am not so sure that we can dismiss one who was taken out of retirement and placed in charge of the nation's finances by the Liberal government of 1936 and kept there until the appalling strain of the policy he was following forced his health to collapse. I do not believe we can dismiss the conclusions of one so understandingly skilled in all the practices of orthodox finance, without first giving them some grave consideration.

The point I want to bring to your consideration is this. We lifted our debt from four hundred million in 1914 to two thousand million in 1920, to three thousand million in 1930 and in 1940 to roughly four thousand million dollars. Under a load of less than $4 billion the economy of Canada collapsed because this nation was unable to meet its uncontrollable obligations and to finance the needs of the growing and expanding nation. Because of that the whole nation collapsed with millions of jobs to be done in every part of the Dominion of Canada, and hundreds of thousands of people wholly unemployed or only partly employed, and the whole standard of living collapsing and deteriorating in the midst of abundance. Now, what happened in the last four years? I quote from the report of the Bank of Canada, which states that the net debt outstanding as at August 31, 1939, when war was declared, was $4,693,000,000; as at December 31, 1943, it was $11,302,000,000.

That is not the end. We come now to this budget and you must add to that $11,302,000,000, another $3,200,000,000 for the coming year, making a total debt on the presently known factors at the end of the present fiscal year of $14,502,000,000. If the former minister of finance, who expressed a devout wish for a balanced budget and the reduction of taxes, was unable to sustain the economy of Canada from 1936 to 1939, tell me how under orthodox finance the minister of finance who must carry the burden in the post-war years is going to carry, how much?—$14,500,000,000? It will be much greater, Mr. Speaker, than that. The course of this war will be the same as the last war. It will come to an end, as all wars do, and there will be a period of demobilization following this war which will be much more expensive than that which followed the last. There will be a vast programme of rehabilitation much more expensive than the last one. If this war follows the same course as the last war; if demobilization finances follow likewise, we can look forward under the present system to binding the health and freedom of our people with a load of interest-bearing debt that will total something over $20 billion. I do not think there are many who can take much comfort from that. A nation is just like an individual. The day comes when the load of debt becomes an intolerable strain and then something breaks. The governor of the Bank of Canada warned this government and this parliament of that danger when he said:

> I do not wish to suggest that public debt could be increased at the present rate for an indefinite period without placing an intolerable strain on our economy.

When is the time when that intolerable strain is going to be placed on our economy? I suggest to the government that the time of that intolerable strain is already here. The people of this country are in revolt against a system of finance being maintained in the nation which leaves no outlook for the creation and distribution of wealth. Where the hobbling, hindering features of unpayable debt and unpayable charges for interest go on as the inevitable fate, not only of this generation or the third and fourth generation but of all generations yet unborn.

If men resign themselves to the fate of debt; if men will assume that there is no other way of financing a democratic government or the progress of civilization than by accumulating a pyramid of debt, then the day when disaster will overtake us is inevitable. No freedom-loving people are going to submit to a system that piles up an increasing load of debt, that binds their health and their freedom.

I say that you are not living under a democracy to-day, but you are seeing a plutocracy, blind, indifferent and subservient to the rules of its own creation, a plutocracy committing suicide by its own unwise and demoded methods. I am going to suggest to this government that the day has come when a complete revision of our monetary system as far as public finance is concerned is overdue.

I believe we should have in Canada a great conference betwen the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments where a national programme could be defined upon which the people of Canada could and would unite. I believe that the first fundamental of the work of that conference should be an appreciation of the need of a redistribution of the responsibilities and powers of our respective departments of government. Our parliament has neglected its responsibility to the junior branches of government ever since it came into being in 1867. It is always assumed that it could shoulder on to the provincial and municipal governments the direct needs of the people, the care of their health, the care of their education, the building of their local roads, the maintenance of their local institutions; and it left them to carry on that tremendous responsibility, not with wide powers of taxation, but only with the powers of direct taxation. The federal authority reserves to itself the power to do the general things and to use all the powers of taxation, to glean its revenues in the easy way from the sources of indirect taxation. What is the result to-day? The standard of living in our cities in Canada, the standard of living conditions throughout our provinces, even the maintenance of our present order, our educational system and our whole system of government, are far below what they should and could be in a Canadian civilization. I may be wrong about the possibility of improving that standard of living, but other men greater than I have assumed that that is one of the responsibilities that fall to our lot.

As this war comes to a close, may I quote a great man from South Africa, Field Marshal Jan Christian Smuts, who, speaking to the British House of Lords and the British House of Commons, said this:

> I feel that in this vast suffering through which our race is passing we are being carried to a deeper sense of social realities. We are passing beyond the ordinary politics and political shibboleths.
> It is no longer a case of socialism or communism or any of the other isms of the market place, but of achieving common justice and fair play for all. People are searching their own souls for the causes which have brought us to this pass.
> May it be our privilege to see that this suffering, this travail and search of man's spirit shall not be in vain.
> Without feeding on illusions, without nursing the impossible, there is yet much in the common life of the people which can be remedied, much unnecessary inequality and privilege to be levelled away, much common sense opportunity to be erected as the common birthright and public atmosphere for all to enjoy as of right.
> Health, housing, education, decent social amenities, provision against avoidable insecurities—all these simple goods and much more can be provided for all, and thus a common higher level of life be achieved for all.
> As between the nations, a new spirit of human solidarity can be cultivated, and economic conditions can be built up which will strike the root causes of war, and thus lay deeper foundations for world peace. With honesty and sincerity on our part it is possible to make basic reforms both for national and international life which will give mankind a new chance of survival and of progress.
> Let this programme, by no means too ambitious, be our task, and let us now already, even in the midst of war, begin to prepare for it. And may Heaven's blessing rest on our work in war and in peace.

Do you think for one moment, Mr. Speaker, that going ahead under this policy of plutocratic power, pyramiding billions upon billions of interest-bearing debt, the dream offered in 1942 by the Prime Minister of South Africa to the British House of Lords and the British House of Commons can ever be achieved? Oh, I know it is hard to break away from securities that have long been relied upon. But no man in his senses, no man in his sane moments has ever assumed that for his well-being and the well-being of his own household the accumulation of a mountain of debt was a good thing. If it cannot be a good thing for an individual, how can it be a good thing for a collection of individuals?—for that is what a nation is.

We have established great reforms. We have cut the interest rate. We have provided the facilities for issuing an inexhaustible supply of medium of exchange in the form of bankers' debts, in the form of public debts. Let me put this to you, Mr. Speaker. The government has the power to issue money, and to-day Canada has adopted and is operating and is winning this war with a system of managed internal paper currency not secured by gold and having nothing for security behind it but the integrity of the government, the common sense of the people, and the going-concern activity of the nation. There is no other security. Yet what does the government do? It gives away to a private monopoly that power to issue money. It creates that private monopoly, bonuses it with Bank of Canada cash, and then goes bankrupt borrowing bookkeeping entries built up on Bank of Canada cash reserves. Yet although that is an undeniable fact, I heard the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) the other day say: You cannot get something for nothing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I still believe it.

Mr. McGEER: You are not a banker. If you were, you would know better.

Mr. MITCHELL: I still believe it.

Mr. McGEER: I do not hope to convince you or anybody else tied to the present system. But I want to tell you that even though I have no hope of convincing the government, I know the day will come when I shall be glad that I had the privilege of standing alone and warning against the inevitable disasters that will come if this nonsense is not stopped. You say that if we issue money we are going to destroy the value of money. What do you think of the value of an investment in Canada's national debts as they were in 1939 now that you have flooded into the same investment pool another ten thousand million dollars or thereabouts? Do you think that this Dominion of Canada can carry a burden of fourteen thousand million dollars with the same ease with which it could carry four? Mind you, your banking monopoly stands not upon the security of gold but upon the security of the appallingly inflated debts which the Dominion of Canada has issued. I do not speak in criticism. I argued in 1934 for the establishment of a national bank and the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need, not private gain. I hoped that we would issue our own currency through the Bank of Canada to free the government from the binding force of unpayable debt. We have the opportunity to build the Dominion of Canada into a great, vigorous, and powerful nation. We have the power to continue to be the linchpin between the United States and the British empire. We have a part to play in creating a new and a better standard of living, a new and better hope of the future by making Canada a nation, powerful, growing and expanding, the greatest overseas dominion in the British empire. We can do that, sir, when we move to operate a monetary system that will take the shackles of debt and interest off the body politic of this dominion, so that the government of this dominion—and that will mean the people of Canada—may live in a future of peace free from those obligations of which our own Prime Minister wrote in his great book, those debts which bind a democratic government, the health of the people and the freedom of the land.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): In rising to take part in this debate I wish only to touch on a few agricultural items.

I am disappointed that the government has not as yet seen fit to establish a board of live stock commissioners. That is something for which the farmers of Canada have asked for a long time, and in view of the almost unanimous demand I do not know why something has not been done about it. The board would be on a similar basis to the board of grain commissioners. If I quote, Mr. Speaker, from the brief presented by the Canadain Federation of Agriculture I am sure that hon. gentlemen will understand better the nature of the request:

> It requests that the said board be empowered to administer, under the Department of Agriculture, the Livestock and Livestock Products Act, and that the members of the board shall be appointed in consultation with organized agriculture. The Livestock and Livestock Products Act should be amended and consolidated with other legislation in order to vest in the board the power to license, regulate and control the facilities for assembling, transporting, yarding, slaughtering, processing and packing, together with the facilities for grading and selling all live stock and carcass products designed for human consumption, and in addition all live and dressed poultry and eggs should be subject to the jurisdiction of the board, in the above manner.

I am sure that gives everybody a good idea of what is wanted by the farmers. When we applied in days gone past for the setting up of this board we were asked where the money was to come from to finance it. In a previous talk in this house I said that I was quite sure the money could be found by taking over the condemnation insurance; that is the board of live stock commissioners would handle the condemnation insurance. In the veterinary directors' report for 1943, page 31, you will find that ·19 of one per cent was sufficient to handle condemnation insurance as far as hogs were concerned. It is indicated on the same page that the costs as regards cattle and sheep were higher, but taking the averages together you will find that a quarter of one per cent would have carried these charges in 1943. This would mean that neither the government nor the farmer would need to pay any more than they are paying to-day.

A tremendous number of animals are slaughtered in a year. The last figures I have, taken from the report of the Department of Agriculture, are: Hogs, 6,140,614; cattle, 929,157; sheep, 832,070. I do not wish to enlarge on this matter; I have drawn it to your attention, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that the government will do something about it.

I would also appeal at this time to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to do something about the 186-pound hog. It is his argument that there must be a jumping off place somewhere, but on to-day's market that one pound of pork costs the producer $2.32, which is too large a jump at one time. I ask the minister to try to get it halved. The effect is perhaps worse to-day than it has ever been before, because transportation is difficult. We have quite a job getting our hogs away in time; they easily get over that 185-pound weight. An alteration of the present regulation would create a favourable impression wherever hogs are produced.

On a previous occasion when I was trying to speak to the Minister of Agriculture about wool and sheep I was ruled out of order. I understand that it is permissible to bring the subject forward to-day. It is unfortunate that the agreement for a bonus on wool requires that the provincial governments must pay their share or the farmer gets nothing. The federal government pays a bonus of two cents for the production of good wool. In Manitoba our provincial government do not consider it their business to subsidize wool or anything else; they regard that as a federal obligation. But across the border, in either Ontario or Saskatchewan, one finds the farmers getting four cents for good wool. I can assure the house that Manitoba produces just as good wool as the other provinces, but because our provincial government is not sympathetic we do not get anything. I again appeal to the government to do something about this matter, so that Manitoba producers may receive at least the two cents which Ottawa pays farmers in other provinces.

I have here a cutting from the Winnipeg Tribune, October 15, 1943, showing that sheep sold for seventy cents each on the Winnipeg market:

> Whole live sheep weighing 120 pounds sold to-day on the local market for 70 cents each. Local live stock men thought this was an all-time low. The quoted price at the close was 50 cents a hundred pounds.

There were 500 sheep on the market that day. I understood when the meat board was established that it was to be their duty to protect these markets. The sheep which were bought on that market were sold at the ceiling price. The Minister of Agriculture may tell me to-day, as he told me before, that no doubt they were old sheep. Suppose they were old sheep. There were two shanks and a brisket of mutton there. We had meat rationing and meatless Tuesdays and that was valuable meat because it was good for stewing purposes, no matter how old a sheep was. Moreover, on the back of that sheep there was a fleece worth $1.80, and it cost only thirty-five cents to process the carcass; that is, to clean it and get it ready for the butcher. Where was the meat board? It should have done something about that. But let us carry that a little further. In my constituency there are a good many sheep growers. It cost them fifty cents a hundred to ship sheep to the Winnipeg market. You can understand what was left for the farmer when he got his returns back selling at fifty cents a hundred. I do not think the meat board were up to their job when they allowed such a thing to happen.

Now that I have mentioned the meat board I might as well say something about them. Most hon. members know who compose the board. There is the Hon. J. G. Taggart. Then there is Mr. A. Morin, Associate Deputy Minister of Agriculture in Quebec. There is Mr. L. C. McOuat, general agricultural representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There is Mr. S. E. Todd, managing director for the council of Canadian meat packers. Mr. J. G. Taggart is chairman; the government appointed him. He has been superintendent of experimental farms, a member of an agricultural school, and he has been a minister of agriculture, so that he should fit into that job to perfection. As to the next man, I do not know why we need another minister of agriculture. We have one already, Mr. Taggart, who should be able to look after that part of the bargain. Then we have Mr. L. C. McOuat, general agricultural repsentative of the Canadian Pacific. I do not know why he was put there. It would be interesting to the shippers of the west if the government would come out openly and tell the farmers of western Canada that he has no interest in the eastern packing concerns. Then we have Mr. S. E. Todd, managing director for the council of Canadian meat packers. But there are no farmers there; there is no one representing the producer. He is left out entirely. There is no representative of organized agriculture on that body. If it is necessary to have on that board, the managing director of the meat packing industry in Canada, then I say that it is necessary that the farmers should be represented on it. I think it is a big mistake that organized agriculture has no say on the board. When you analyse the composition of the board you find that these gentlemen know more about the packing industry than they ever did about producing.

Mr. GARDINER: They were all farmers at one time.

Mr. BRYCE: I believe that to be true, but I can assure the minister that many of them have forgotten that they were ever on a farm. As someone says here, they may have been born on farms, but as for being actual producers, I know the minister will admit that they are not producers in that sense to-day. I repeat that organized agriculture should be represented on such a board. You will never give the farmers satisfaction until you give them producer representation.

And now a word about the bacon agreement. We farmers have waited patiently for a statement from the minister regarding this four-year-old contract. It will be a great stabilizing thing if he will come out and tell us that we shall have a steady price for the next four years; and, as I say, we are patiently waiting for that.

I appeal to the government to hurry up health legislation, and I mean particularly preventive medicine. In Manitoba to-day one person dies every ten hours with cancer and one person every twenty-four hours with tuberculosis. Surely it is time that we had health regulations and preventive medicine. That is a terrible death rate; something should be done about it.

The subsidies that are being paid to the farmers to-day are causing them a good deal of annoyonce. We really do not know where we are. The government has already taken action to establish cost-of-living bonuses as part of the basic wage rates for urban workers. If it is the intention of the government to have subsidies added to and become a part of farm prices, then at least a reasonable differential between urban and rural workmen must be maintained. I do not want to take up the time of the house but I would like to quote two items. The government is paying a subsidy of ten cents a pound on butter. Why? Because it was not profitable to produce enough butter before. Six months after the war ends we shall be back where we were before we got that ten cents. If it did not pay us before it will not pay us then. Something will have to be done about that. That has to be worked into the price of butter. Either that or it drops off and production will go down again.

As regards milk, we have a bonus of thirty-five cents a hundred pounds. Because it was not profitable for the farmer to produce milk he gets a subsidy to-day to help him. If nothing is done about that there will be a great hardship. I hope the Department of Agriculture is alive to the situation and will take the necessary action.

Floor prices are worrying everyone, out west especially. If the nation can undertake complete control of the price structure in war time and prevent prices rising unduly, it can and should use price control in the post-war period to prevent prices from falling unduly. The people believe that a general price floor may be as urgently needed, from the point of view of the general national welfare, as an over-all price ceiling has been during the war years. Agricultural producers were gratified to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) assure them in a radio broadcast over a national network on December 4 of last year that it was the intention of the government to establish a floor under farm prices. His statement was as follows:

> The government recognizes that farmers are anxious about their post-war prospects. They do not want to face a disastrous fall in farm prices within a year or two after the war. If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to ensure them against an agricultural depression after the war. As an essential part of its post-war policy, the government intends to ask parliament, at the next session, to place a floor under the prices of the main farm commodities.

The purpose of such a floor would be to support and stabilize farm prices in order to maintain a proper balance between farm incomes and those of other groups; and to assure to farm people a satisfactory level of purchasing power which at long last is becoming recognized as basic in the national well-being. The value and success of such floors will depend upon how and at what level they are set. This is a matter which will require the careful and constant watchfulness of every branch of our industry—agriculture.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested yesterday when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was called to order. I was reminded of a story of two clergymen, one of whom believed in reading his sermon while the other did not. The man who believed in reading his manuscript said, "When I am in my study I am clear, calm and collected, but when I am before the congregation and see all the different people I am not quite so clear." The other man said, "That is all right, but you leave little blanks in the manuscript, and when you come to a blank you tell a story to illustrate your point. The devil is looking over your shoulder and he suggests something that spoils the whole thing for you, but when I am speaking the devil himself does not know what I am going to say." So that I am not going to read my speech.

I am not a financial expert, but I know what it means to earn a dollar; I know how far that dollar goes, and I know how useful it is after it is earned. I have not yet come to the place where I felt that I could get a dollar out of nothing. I should like to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for not increasing the taxes this year. I certainly looked for some increases, having in mind the many things that must be done and the many plans now under consideration. I would thank him, too, for cancelling the compulsory savings. A great many people did not understand what compulsory savings meant; they thought it was a tax instead of a savings account. Now they are satisfied, and I am grateful to the minister for having lifted that load, even though it was never intended to be a load. I am thankful for the removal of duties on farm implements, so that now there are no duties payable on farm implements coming to Canada from any other country in the world. One could speak on that point for some time, but it is not necessary. I am grateful to the minister for the increase in old age pensions, although my difficulty in that connection has not been and is not now the amount but rather the trouble of getting the pension for those who may wish to hold some small asset in order to pay for their funeral services. I am thankful, too, that the minister has extended tax exemptions to include in-laws. Why should a man receive exemption for his own mother and at the same time have to pay in respect of his mother-in-law who is living with him? I think this change is sensible and practical. I am thankful, too, for the change that has been made in our smallest silver coin. I can remember asking former ministers of finance why that big nickel could not be changed, because it was a nuisance. Now the minister, or someone under his direction, has created an entirely new nickel. There has never been anything like it in shape, colour or design, and we have every right to be grateful for the change.

I have received several letters from labour leaders suggesting that I should say something in this house about the sessional indemnity. I should like to tell the minister how he can give us a lower sessional indemnity and at the same time increase our incomes, and I am not trying to make something out of nothing. I am going to suggest that the sessional indemnity be reduced to $2,000, so that the minister would have to pay us only half the amount he pays now. Then I suggest that each member should receive $2,000 for the upkeep of his car. I understand that at the present time cabinet ministers receive an allowance of $2,000 in respect of their cars, on which they do not pay income tax. I am sure I drive my car farther and faster than any other minister in this house, including the members of the clergy who are in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I know some hon. members of this house are not as well fixed as I am, because I have access to an unlimited supply, on which I have been drawing for forty years. I have always had a dollar when I needed it; if I did not have it there was no one to blame but myself. However, I will deal with that in another way a little later on, because I believe it is even greater than money.

At the head of the lakes we have some things which stand out and which I believe contribute to the national budget. Therefore I will speak of mining, lumbering and farming at the head of the lakes. During the depression we had every reason to be thankful for the mining industry in the Thunder Bay district. But for that I do not know what we would have done. The wages the miners received were the highest, and the encouragement they were given was wonderful. The mining industry does not ask for preferential treatment in regard to taxation, nor does it want to shift its tax responsibility to anyone else. It wants to pay its own taxes, but it would like to have mining taxation placed upon a sound basis. It would ask also that a reduction in taxation should be undertaken as soon as possible, because at the present time it is impossible for mining to carry on. There is a high labour cost in the mining industry; about sixty per cent of the cost of mining is accounted for by labour. One man employed underground necessitates the employment of fourteen others, so that you see what happens.

I have certain suggestions to make. First, the geological survey branch of the Department of Mines and Resources should be increased many fold. I went out with the surveyors in our district, and I was amazed to see what is done there.

Second, the present cooperation with provincial departments of mines should be increased, especially in connection with the construction of mining roads. When roads are built in to mines, it has always developed that more mines have been discovered. Then those roads will be available for lumbering operations, and also will be a great attraction for tourists.

Third, plans should be made for opening up out-of-the-way areas, through the use of aircraft. Many of our young men are pilots, and if this were done they would have work when they come home.

Fourth, revision of the present tax concessions, pending their complete removal, should be undertaken. Most of the mining companies have built up huge liquid reserves. I do not think this is necessary. I would say that if the mining companies would declare dividends of from fifteen per cent to thirty per cent instead of from five per cent to ten per cent, and have the shareholders pay the taxes, instead of the companies, it would be far better.

The present income tax legislation allows generous deductions in respect of money invested or speculated in connection with exploration of new minerals. This concession should be extended to all minerals.

I know the dominion government does not do much in connection with education, but I have one or two suggestions to make along this line. We should have one history for all Canada. That should be a history which would suit Quebec and suit Ontario, and which would satisfy the provinces in the east and in the west. It should set out both the good things and the weak things about Canada. I believe this is coming.

I know there are many schools in which radios are found. However, I know, too, that there are a great many schools in which there are no radios, and many homes to which no local papers are delivered. I would suggest that these little red schoolhouses, away from the larger centres, should have their radios, even if they are only battery sets.

I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that parents of nurses in training should receive tax exemptions for those girls. I know—not "I think"—that a girl who is taking a course in nursing will cost her parents more than she cost before going to public school. Surely this is necessary, and especially at the present time when nurses are so greatly needed. This tax exemption would help a great deal.

The bright students from those little red schoolhouses away out yonder should be encouraged. They should receive special treatment, and be given an opportunity of earning their way, so that they can take more advanced education.

I now come to farming. I am grateful to the responsible parties for establishing floor prices in respect of so many farm products. The farmer must pay the price quoted him by the storekeeper or the implement agent, and it is just as necessary that the farmer be in a position to tell the business man in the city what he must pay for pork and beef. This is a fine step in the right direction.

At this point I should like to give a picture of farming in that section of Ontario from which I come. Some farmers from Ontario may have the impression that there is no farming carried on at the head of the lakes. May I tell them that we have farmers in that district who are second to none in Ontario. A young man on a farm seventeen miles outside Fort William, near Murillo, Geo. Elchuk took first prize for potatoes for all Canada, and ten other prizes, in competition with both eastern and western Canada. May I state further that Fred Stewardson of Slate river district raised 140 bushels of Ajax oats per acre. I doubt if one would find many farms in Ontario which would give that yield. Two hundred and twenty-five bushels of potatoes per half acre are 450 bushels per acre. That is a huge crop, especially when it is from a place which some believe consists only of rock, scrub, logs and timber. And yet we have farms and farmers that are doing those things.

In our district we have the potato king. This man, Mr. J. R. Hutchison, is noted for the potatoes he raises, and for the market price they demand. We have, too, the corn king, a gentleman named George Sovereign. One could go into his field and see corn which would delight the eye of any farmer from Ontario, and he would wonder how Mr. Sovereign does it?

Then I have the picture of a young man who went into farming about four years ago.

This man had to have exemption from military service, and was called back every once in a while. He was told a little while ago that he should increase his production. That young man now has 425 pigs on his farm, 26 cattle, 50 sheep, 650 chickens, 70 acres of oats and barley, 75 acres of hay, and a young wife into the bargain. He is certainly showing the farmers of that district, and others who know him, how to do things. I learn now that his number is called, and I am going to work hard to see that he is not called—and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is supporting me, up to the hilt.

When I think of farming in my district I must pay a tribute to the Department of Agriculture for placing a substation in that area. In the past five or six years this has been a splendid stimulus to the farmers, and has done a good job.

When I think of the farmers who are carrying on during the present war, I think of a man and his wife who are producing as much as was produced on that farm when there were two sons at home, working. One of those sons is now in the air force, and the other, who also had his wings, is in Kingdom Come.

Coming next to the Department of Labour, I find that one of the first fruits of this war has come to labour. If hon. members will look up the Labour Gazette of May, 1944, they will find that away down yonder in Italy labour unions have been reestablished. In those unions the principle of collective bargaining has been set up, whereby employees and employers work together. That is one of the most encouraging things to come out of the war, so far as labour is concerned. For twenty years they were silenced by fascist rule.

I have always said, and I now repeat, that if there are two working on the same job, one a man and the other a woman, if anyone gets less pay it should be the man, because he has more strength to do the work. It is my view, however, that, doing equal work, they should receive equal pay.

I now come to Sunday work. I do not think they should have any Sunday work, under any consideration, except in cases of great necessity, and to carry out acts of mercy. One day in seven. Some of those across the way who have Scottish blood in their veins will note that I am quoting the Shorter Catechism, which has had a great influence in the shaping of human character. Yes, one day in seven. One can trace the need of one day in seven if he looks through history. I carried that out, and received a great thrill in doing so. Homer told of it. Chinese literature reveals that one day in seven was necessary, and that it was to be a day of rest. We say that, too, and we add that it should be a day of worship.

One day in seven. I say that if a man must work on a Sunday, he should have double pay—and even then he would not be repaid for the loss he has sustained.

One day in seven. I would warn the house and the people that we may just wink at the man who goes out to do things on Sunday that he should do on the other six days of the week—whether it be making political speeches, or anything else—and say, "Well, he does not know it all." I do not need to quote anybody but myself.

I come now to the Department of Pensions and National Health. I was privileged to speak at the dominion convention of army and navy veterans held in Fort William, and I was thrilled to hear a young officer from the navy say that when the men come back from the war this time things will be different. He told about vocational training on the boats and behind the lines and how men were being fitted for something different from what they could do before. I enjoyed hearing that man tell the truth. That is the type of truth which is slipping out from sources other than members of parliament.

I have been greatly encouraged at the treatment our returned men have been receiving. If any hon. member knows of a man who is not well treated it is his bounden duty to report that to the minister. I would advise him to send the minister a telegram collect. I know he will find that the minister does not want to save the taxpayers at the expense of the man who has risked his life overseas.

In Fort William there are many people who were not fortunate to be born where I was; there are many who are not Anglo-Saxons. Many of these people speak English when I am with them in order to suit my convenience. There are Ukrainians, Czechoslovakians, Slovacks, Finns, Italians and many others who have banded together to put across the war effort of this country.

I try to listen to everything that is said in the house but much of it slips away. However, I was pleased to hear the Minister of Labour say that there has been no trouble in connection with call-ups at the head of the lakes. Port Arthur and Fort William are patriotic places. When the victory loan campaign was on, many places had a terrific time in trying to keep ahead of Fort William. I believe that city came second in the collections for all Canada.

I should like to say a word about our timber resources. I was informed by an expert in a great lakes pulp and paper company that without the use of mining, fishing or farming he could keep all the population at the head of the lakes employed in turning out wood products.

I should like to pay a tribute to the Red Cross, the Salvation Army and our churches. I wish to pay a tribute especially to the chaplains in our war services. They are a great bunch of men. They know what they are doing. When a man is seriously wounded the chaplain knows what direction to give him in order that he may rest in peace and go to victory in the other land.

I should like to say a word about Doctor Davidson. You do not shake your head, so that I suppose it is all right. I was the first one to bring Doctor Davidson's cancer cure up in the house and I was ably supported by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). He was a $75 a day man before he came to this house. Doctor Davidson is no quack, and he never was when he played on the medical football team. We knew what he was worth when we went up against him. Doctor Davidson has worked for the good of others. He is not a rich man, and I say to the Minister of Finance that some money should be provided in order that the work done by Doctor Davidson may not go by the board. I gave the history of two cases in Fort William that had been sent to Winnipeg and been cured. It is not only the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) who wants to see the expert work and the records of this man saved for the good of the country. We all do.

I come now to the Department of Justice. I am sorry I was not in the house the other day when the amendments to the criminal code were up, because I know something about criminals. I have made arrangements to have over one hundred men and five women released from the provincial gaol and the penitentiaries. Everyone of them has made good. Four of the men did get me for a little bit of cash, but I got more from another source.

I know one man in Stony Mountain penitentiary who is serving four years for manslaughter. I have appealed by means of a petition to have this man placed on probation because he is not a criminal. I take the stand that when a man ceases to be criminal, when what he has done is owing to an accident, he should be freed. If a man is a criminal he should never be freed. I know whereof I speak. I asked that this man be let out on probation. I asked that a boy from Fort William be let out and I promised to take him into our home, but I have not as yet succeeded. I think if we had him there for a little while it would do him good. It would do us good as well just to see the difficulties under which he has been working.

I have another case of a man serving four years for bigamy. I have a lot of sympathy with him because if a man can get along with one wife he is doing very well, but this man tried to get along with two. I wanted to get him back to his first wife but I have failed so far.

I ask the Minister of Justice to pay some attention to the literature available in this country. I have two magazines here which are printed in Toronto and which were sent to me by a soldier on the west coast. These magazines are of such a character that you, Mr. Speaker, would not let them into your district; yet one can pick them up on any newsstand for twenty-five cents apiece. I do not want to advertise these magazines by giving their names because some of my hon. friends may want to buy them.

More important than money, more important than monetary reform, more important than jobs, more important even than health is the teaching that can be given by the best book the world has ever known, the greatest seller to-day. I suggest to the new Department of Reconstruction that they should see that a bible is placed in every home. I want to pay a tribute to the Gideons. Some hon. members know what they do, but we never hear them being talked about. They go along quietly doing their work, but when you enter any hotel room you are able to pick up a Gideon bible. Perhaps for the first time you read a chapter; you go on and you may come across the story of the prodigal son. You then decide to write home to your better half and by doing that you make others feel a little more comfortable.

It is absolutely necessary for the reconstruction of this country to have Christian literature, to have the bible in every home. What did the police chiefs recommend at their conference the other day as a cure for juvenile crime? They said to teach them the bible. I see some men who I know read it every day and then I compare them with others who never read it. I am sorry for what they lose. What we need is not more money because we never had as much money before; what we need is good men, men who will put God first, others next, and themselves any place. If you get that, you are going to have a Canada that will be greater than ever, a Canada that will ring true and be an example to the world Thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, ever since I came to this house fourteen or more years ago I have felt it my duty to say a word on every occasion when I could do so for those engaged in industry and for those associated with industry. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave his comprehensive budget address on June 26 I listened carefully to hear what there was in it for the industrial worker. When I heard him announce that he was going to abolish the compulsory savings which employers of labour have had to deduct from the pay cheques of their men I wondered what the reaction of the industrial workers would be. I went home for three days over the week-end, and in the course of my visit I talked the matter over with a great number of men and women working in industry in my riding. I found their reaction to be this. They appreciated the increased spending which they will now have, although of course they will have less later on, but what affected them most was what they were going to do when they left the jobs at which they are now working. There are approximately one million men and women engaged in munition plants and plants making component parts, and many of these workers said to me on Friday and Saturday last, "What I am interested in, Mr. MacNicol, is, where am I going from here if this plant closes, as it is sure to close, very shortly after the war?" The average industrial worker does not kid himself, and rightly so, that industrial plants making munitions will continue making munitions when the war is over. It never has been that way and I doubt if it ever will be. So that what the war worker wanted to know was, "where am I going from here after the war when this factory closes or when my machine stops running?" That is the big question with him.

In the fourteen years or more that I have been here I have listened to and taken part in many budget debates, but I have learned one thing and that is that nothing that I can say can add one dot or one dash to what is contained in the budget. While I should like to say something about the budget to-day, and perhaps will when the items are before the committee, I am not going to deal with the budget itself or with what was said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), except that I intend to vote for the amendment which he moved.

I wish to deal with another problem, a western problem and I deal with a western problem once again because I have observed from much travel and study that the west has not received that to which it is entitled, and because I know that unless the west can be restored to full-out prosperity, or at least be given a chance to exist, we eastern people cannot advance as Canadians should advance.

I have in mind a situation which in my judgment is a menace to a very large portion of southern Saskatchewan, that portion of the province which is most populous, and which extends all the way from the capital city of Regina to the South Saskatchewan river 125 miles west. What I am going to say I shall say without any tinge or flavour of politics, because I want to help the west and I cannot do so if what I say has a political flavour.

The area I speak of is menaced through a lack of water. There is an old adage familiar to engineers which states that a city can grow only in proportion to the abundancy and permanency of its water supply. There are two fine cities in southern Saskatchewan, the capital city of Regina and the city of Moose Jaw. Perhaps a dozen or two dozen communities between Regina and the South Saskatchewan river were thriving centres some years ago. I visited a number of these communities last summer and to-day these once thriving centres are ghost centres. They have become extinct because the area roundabout and the villages themselves have dried up for lack of water. There is a verse in the bible, I believe it is the 19th verse of the 2nd chapter of II Kings, which tells the story of the return of Elisha to Jericho. He was met by a delegation, a delegation of the city fathers of those days, and they said to Elisha, who was supposed to be able to do anything, having performed many great miracles, that what the city wanted was not only pure water but ample water because all roundabout the country was dried up.

I am going to appeal now to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in this government, after he surveys the problem which I now intend to put before the house, to come forward and ask for any amount of money required to give fair play to the city of Regina and the city of Moose Jaw. I am not going to find fault with anything that has been done. I am not going to find fault that something which should have been done was not done. Perhaps never before did anyone come forward and ask parliament for what they likely knew was required out there. But always heretofore they did not have enough money to do what many commissions at one time or another told them should be done I will support the minister and the government to the limit in any appropriation they ask for if an honest-to-goodness effort is made to give an abundancy and permanency of water to these two cities of the plains.

Someone might say, what business is it of the member for Davenport to speak for Regina or Moose Jaw or any other city outside his riding? Well, Mr. Speaker, it is my business, and since I am going to confine my remarks to these two cities and the adjacent municipalities, just as I could speak for a score of other districts throughout Canada, I wish to say that from the riding of Davenport there goes each day to those two cities not less than one carload of goods made by the workers of my riding, by people I know, many hundreds of them, who make these goods to be shipped out to build up the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw and other adjacent municipalities in Saskatchewan. Since they have purchased not less than one carload a day for forty years—it may be longer than that but I will say forty—it means that we have shipped out not less than fifteen thousand cars, and taking the average as twenty tons to the car, this means that 300,000 tons of freight have been shipped from Davenport riding to help build up that area of the west. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the people of my riding owe a lot to the people of Regina and the people of Moose Jaw as well as to the people of other cities all over the west, but I want to confine my remarks to those two cities and their problems. I shall speak for them because I know that if they could have water in abundance and permanently it would be greatly to their advantage. They cannot procure it to-day from the sources upon which they now draw for their supply. An abundant supply of water on a permanent basis would result in many new industries going into those cities.

I read a few days ago that because of lack of water Moose Jaw is likely to lose the shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That would be a calamity; it must not be allowed; they must be given sufficient water. If by obtaining an abundant water supply the population of Regina could be raised to 150,000 and of Moose Jaw to 75,000, what would that mean to my workers in Davenport riding who make agricultural machinery, radiators, boilers, valves, fittings, furniture, tools, electric and plumbing goods, and one hundred and one other lines? It would mean more orders, more business, more jobs, and not only for Davenport riding but all across the country, because as those towns and cities grow they will provide, as they have done for years, orders for eastern manufacturers and invite to their communities branches of industry and new manufacturers that will build up their populations. The more they grow, the better it will be for the whole country. If such measures are not taken I would fear that the unity of this country would be affected.

A man said to me, what concern is it to Canada whether Moose Jaw or Regina gets water in abundance or not? Well, it has been Canada's business from the very inception of those cities. It was the federal government which selected the site of Regina, and from the very first the major trouble was that of an adequate water supply. In 1894 the government of the Northwest Territories appointed Mr. J. S. Dennis, an engineer, who made a survey from Regina to the South Saskatchewan river and reported that that river was the only potential source of an ample and permanent supply of water. After Mr. Dennis' time, in 1905, the government of the Northwest Territories went out of business and the province was formed. After it became organized, in 1911 it faced the water problem, and three different groups of engineers made surveys in that year from Regina and Moose Jaw to the South Saskatchewan river. The first survey was made by Mr. T. Aird Murray, a celebrated engineer, who pointed out something which is very important in reference to the flow of the South Saskatchewan river, namely, that the federal government, being in control of interprovincial rivers as well as international rivers, should set aside a permanent division of South Saskatchewan river water so that 100,000,000 gallons a day should be allotted to these two cities. That amount represents only 185 cubic feet per second, and is only a comparatively small flow, but it should be safeguarded. The next man who made a survey in 1911 was Mr. W. J. Francis, an eminent engineer. He recommended that a dam be built across the river near Riverhurst, where a suitable foundation could be found—and that is perhaps the most important part of any dam—and that a conduit—I suppose, a British Columbia fir conduit—be constructed to convey the water from the river to Regina and Moose Jaw. In the same year another engineer, Mr. B. Russell, who is still living, made a survey, and he, too, recommended that a dam be built across the river and a pump and conduit constructed to convey the water from the river to Regina and Moose Jaw.

Mr. Dennis reported fifty years ago, but nothing was done. Messrs. Murray, Francis and Russell reported thirty-three years ago, but nothing was done, except, I assume, talk. In 1913-14 the federal government made a survey and obtained a report that the only permanent and adequate supply of water obtainable was from the South Saskatchewan river. In 1913-16 the provincial government nominated a commission to make a survey, and it reported that a ditch should be built to convey water from the South Saskatchewan river to the two cities.

I have examined very carefully the whole area. The river bank at that point is 310 feet high, so that a substantial amount of power would be required to pump water over the bank; but, once over the bank, it would flow by gravity seventy miles to Caron and a further twenty miles to Moose Jaw, or ninety miles to Moose Jaw and 120 miles from the river to Regina. The topographical situation is peculiar, in that once the water is pumped over the river bank it will flow by gravity 120 miles east. It is not a difficult engineering problem, although considerable power would be required to elevate the water.

From 1914 to 1919 both those cities suffered from shortage of water. I have ascertained from an examination of the reports of city engineers that at no time did they have a sufficiency of water as we would regard it in Ottawa, where every citizen averages 117 gallons a day. Regina would scarcely know what it means to have that much water per person for domestic purposes.

By 1919-21 the situation was so bad that the cities, the province and the federal government cooperated in making a very careful survey, after which the report from the combined engineers recommended that a conduit should be built to convey water from the South Saskatchewan river to the cities. I examined the report carefully and I did not see where a dam was recommended to be built, but I presume a dam must have been included, because the report states that the whole works would cost approximately $6 million. I do not see how it is possible to render any real and adequate service to those two cities unless a dam is built across the river to provide an adequate reservoir from which the water could be pumped. In 1929-30, again, there was low water and the people suffered considerably. In 1930 Regina engaged an outstanding New York engineer, Mr. N. S. Hill, and he was associated with Mr. R. O. Wynne-Roberts of Toronto. These two engineers made a thorough survey and reported that, to supply a permanent and adequate amount of water to the two cities, it would be necessary to bring it from the South Saskatchewan river. In 1930-33 Moose Jaw city engineer was consulted, a very capable man. I met him last summer and discussed the matter with him and I know his qualifications. I refer to Mr. A. W. Ellson Fawkes, and in association with him there was a local financial man, Mr. A. E. Martin. They recommended the building of a dam across the river near Riverhurst and conveying the water by conduit to the two cities after pumping it over the river bank. They proposed to pay for the construction, operation and maintenance by irrigating 500,000 acres of irrigable, but low moisture land, between the river and Regina, and from the profits thereof they would have defrayed all costs. Nothing, however, was done. That last proposal was made eleven years ago.

By 1936 the water situation, after having been investigated and pronounced wholly insufficient for the growth of the two cities, was again thoroughly discussed. I have a whole sheaf of clippings from the Regina Leader and the Moose Jaw Times, as well as reports to the city councils of both cities, all indicating the magnitude of the problem and the necessity for the development of an abundant, permanent and adequate supply of water. A citizens' committee was appointed; they associated themselves with the province and with the federal government and a plan was proposed in conjunction with the prairie farm rehabilitation board. The P.F.R.B. men have done a splendid job in the west, and later on I shall have the pleasure of speaking of the good work they have accomplished. The P.F.R.B. engineers made a survey of the situation, as it would appear that from the beginning it was recognized as the business of the federal government. You cannot expect two cities in the financial condition of those cities out there, and having regard to the financial position of the province of Saskatchewan and the magnitude of the whole problem, alone to undertake a project of this magnitude. As an easterner I know what the government has done in the east and I endorse it; and as an easterner I take the stand that the time has come when the federal government must take a greater interest in assisting such projects in the west. We have built here canals that have cost between $650 and $700 million, and I endorse these, too. What have we spent in the west on canals? A paltry $2½ million. In Montreal we have built a bridge costing $20 million, and I endorse that; but where have we built a bridge of that kind in the west? I say, therefore, that if it does cost ten or fifteen or twenty millions to erect works equal to the provision, for those two cities and the municipalities between Regina and the river, of a permanent, adequate and abundant supply of water, it is something that merits the support of everyone. I am sure that every board of trade, every chamber of commerce, and eastern members of parliament would be glad to support whatever the government might determine was required to give those two cities an even chance with others. If they go down through lack of an adequate water supply, if the people move out of them, it will be a tragedy that will have its repercussions in the east as well. That is why I say as an eastern member—and I know that all eastern members will agree with me in this—that provision should be made for an adequate, permanent supply of water for those people. I appeal to the minister to bring in a gigantic programme, if that is required, in order to give those cities the water supply to which they are entitled. Many industries would be attracted to them as a consequence of such an undertaking and they would expand and give handsome returns to the people of the east, the workers of the different ridings in the east, by providing jobs to make the goods that would be required.

By 1938 that commission finally presented a programme and by 1939 commenced to build the present works. I will not say anything about the present works apart from this. I am satisfied that if the P.F.R.B. engineers had been furnished with the number of millions of dollars necessary to do a real job they would have done it, and a permanent, adequate supply of water for those cities would have been provided. More than that, I believe they would do as good a job as any other engineers could perform. That is the best I can say for them. But of course they did not have the money. I will not say anything about the work they have done, but I will ask the minister to come forward with a real programme, and a real programme would consist in the building of a dam across the river. According to the figures I have, a dam fifty feet high would provide water for the two cities but not for irrigation, but it would provide the power required to deliver an abundance of water to the two cities. But there are dams that can be built piecemeal. The Ambursen Company of New York city have built a number of dams, some of which I have examined. Some of them have been constructed to a certain height, say fifty feet, at the commencement, and as more power was required they have been added to. There is one in New Hampshire, at Bristol, I believe. That dam was raised thirty feet some years after it was first built. But that is neither here nor there. If the government decides that only water for domestic purposes shall be provided, a fifty-foot high dam may be sufficient. If it decides that the land must be irrigated between Regina and the river it may require a 150-foot dam to produce the 75,000 horse-power, more or less, that would be needed to pump the water over the hill and to provide irrigation water as well as domestic. At any rate, while it is an engineering problem it is not an insuperable one. If the engineers are directed to do it they will do a good job. I have sufficient confidence in the engineers to believe that, given the necessary money to do the job, they will overcome almost any obstacle; and it is not an impossible task.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I strongly recommend this. The people there are entitled to it; they need the water. Just consider what would happen if either of those cities were overtaken by a catastrophe. In the recent fire in Montreal caused by the falling plane—and that was a comparatively small fire—they required twelve lines of hose which poured out 3,000 gallons per minute for two hours to do the work. In that time they required 360,000 gallons of water. At that rate a fire lasting ten hours would require a million and a half gallons; or a fire lasting a full day would require three and a half million gallons. I hope neither of those cities will be so unfortunate as to require this amount of water for this purpose, but could either of them supply the water necessary if it should be required? Moose Jaw could not supply 3,500,000 gallons in twenty-four hours. The total capacity in Moose Jaw to-day, even under the most favourable circumstances, does not exceed two millions gallons a day, and that would not allow water to be used as it is here in Ottawa.

I made a careful tabulation of the requirements of thirteen eastern cities and arrived at an average of 117 gallons a day per person. I do not believe either Moose Jaw or Regina ever had that capacity. To adequately meet that requirement Regina, with its sixty thousand inhabitants, would need a capacity of eight million gallons a day, while the twenty-five thousand population of Moose Jaw would require not less than four million gallons a day. In order to have that supply of water available they will require a pressure line, and they will need a large reservoir, which in turn will require an adequate dam and pumping plant to get the water over the hill and through conduits to the two cities. If it were put into a pressure conduit the line would be much straighter; perhaps a good deal of it would be underground, and hence much safer. It would have to be of wood, because steel would not stand the frost, and then it could operate all year. The present ditch has never even had its maximum flow of water. I do not want to enter into that question, but I can say that in 1941, when the test of the present ditch was made, the plant pumped 550,000,000 gallons of water, but the amount that reached the Caron saturation plant was infinitesimal. When it finally reached Caron, according to a letter I received, the stream of water was about fourteen inches wide and seven-eighths of an inch deep. It was run at this capacity for only a very short time. In 1942 it was not run at all. In 1943, the year I was out there, an engineer at the plant told me—I am now speaking from memory—that in operating for nineteen days he had pumped down to the Caron saturation plant about fifteen million gallons of water, and that the maximum in any twenty-four-hour period was only 270,000 gallons. That is wholly insufficient for cities of that size.

Mr. GARDINER: They did not try to pump any more.

Mr. MacNICOL: The pumps went out of commission, anyway. I do not want to get into any argument; I want to help the minister, and I want to help those cities. I am just saying that while the present plan may have some merits, it is utterly inadequate as far as those two cities are concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: The present system would not take care of Regina at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, Regina needs water also. I am getting close to the end of my time, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to ask for an extension. My argument is that the west is entitled to a much better deal, as far as engineering works are concerned, than it has had up to the present. I have no doubt that before long a delegation will be coming here from cities in western Ontario such as London, Chatham, Stratford, Ingersoll and other cities and towns in the Thames river valley, asking this government to do for that valley what it has begun to do for the Grand river valley. I spoke on this subject ten years ago; as far as I know I may have been the first to bring it up in this house. I did so after making exhaustive surveys of the rivers in the northern United States on which flood control and water conservation works had been erected. In that survey I learned that the United States federal government paid 37½ per cent of the cost of such works; that the state governments also paid 37½ per cent, and that the municipalities benefiting paid the remaining 25 per cent. That is a good ratio. That matter was argued in this house, and the government of the day—I have forgotten which government it was but that is neither here nor there—agreed to build the Shand dam north of the town of Fergus on the Grand river, the first dam built in Canada, as far as I know, for the purpose of flood control and water conservation. This government paid 37½ per cent of the cost of that dam. It should do the same in connection with flood prevention works on the Thames or any other river.

Therefore I am going to appeal to the minister to bring forward a real plan to provide an adequate, permanent supply of water for the two cities I have mentioned, Regina and Moose Jaw, and the surrounding municipalities. According to the city engineer of Regina that would cost approximately $10,000,000 for water for the two cities for domestic purposes alone. According to the city engineer of Moose Jaw it would cost approximately $15,000,000 for both domestic water for the two cities and water for irrigation purposes. The government should determine what ought to be done; then this government should put up 37½ per cent of the cost; the provincial government should contribute 37½ per cent, and the two cities and other municipalities should make up the remaining 25 per cent. I will go further. Since neither those two cities nor the province of Saskatchewan can borrow money as cheaply as this government can borrow it, I would say that this government should meet the whole cost and accept notes or bonds from the province and the municipalities for their share, which might be paid off as per agreement. This money could be advanced to them at a rate not more than three per cent, which is the rate at which this government can borrow money.

I am in earnest on this subject. I have kept away from politics; I have attempted to speak from the point of view of one who has been associated with industry for a long time, one who saw what it meant to industry to have the west grow. I am thoroughly convinced that if both Regina and Moose Jaw are given water to the extent I have suggested, that is not less than eight million gallons a day in the case of Regina and four million gallons a day in the case of Moose Jaw, with provision for doubling those amounts if and when that is required, it will result in the population of those cities doubling and in the rebuilding of many of those little dried-out communities between Regina and the South Saskatchewan river. As an easterner I hold that it is the duty of the east to see that those cities and the little municipalities in southern Saskatchewan whose growth has been restricted so greatly through the lack of water are given a chance to live in the sun. Every dollar spent for this purpose will be returned in profits from the manufacture of the goods required to build them up and the goods that will be distributed through the growth of those centres. The government will be repaid through taxes of one kind and another, and in the long run it will not cost the country anything.

Let me close with these words. As an easterner I feel that this is the least we can do. As I said in commencing my remarks, my suggestions could be applied to many other centres in the west, but I believe this is the least we can do in return for what those cities and communities have done to help build up the east and to bring about harmony and unity across this country. To me this is a national problem, as well as a municipal and provincial matter.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as a fellow member I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the manner of presenting his budget, but as a social crediter I am afraid I cannot congratulate him upon the matter contained in the budget. There seems to be nothing new in it to meet new conditions, or perhaps to anticipate the new order which we are told we must have. It is based on the same old method of piling up debt.

In every budget debate since the war started I have raised my voice against the method of debt finance. I still believe that it would have been possible to finance the war without debt. It seems obvious to me that if the debt is widely and equitably distributed then it surely would cancel itself out. On the other hand, if the greater part of it is held by a small fraction of the people, it means that the poorer and larger section will be in debt to and must pay tribute to the richer and smaller portion of the people.

On those grounds I cannot see that it will lead to anything but trouble in the future. And, speaking of the new order, from what I have heard I have not been able to find anything new in it. Apparently we are to have a work state. Everybody is to be put to work. There is nothing new about that. Moreover, that is exactly what Hitler did. He put Germany to work; then he put Europe to work and now he is putting the whole world to work.

We do not hear anyone say that what we need is a happier world. People say that we need a harder working world, and perhaps a richer world. But it would seem to me at the present time that the world is under the domination of fear and hatred. Surely the best antidote to fear and hatred would be love and laughter. I should like to hear someone voice the opinion that after the war is over we should have a happier world—not merely better and richer, in a materialistic sense. Many people are saying to-day, of course, that we must have a new order, and that the old order of individual enterprise and individual freedom is finished. They say that it will no longer work. I do not hold with that view. I believe that with some adjustments to the financial system the old order would work very well. We could preserve all that is good in the old order, and at the same time bring about a state of affairs in which poverty and insecurity will be things of the past, without sacrificing our individual liberties, as the socialists say we must do.

I do not understand how people can think that individual enterprise will fail to bring the necessary results. I have always noted that if there is any demand, there are always plenty of people who are more than ready to fill that demand. I think if our socialist friends had ever been in productive business they would find that the difficulty is not so much to find the individual for the enterprise, as to find an opportunity or an opening for the enterprising individual.

Of course we in this group have often been referred to as funny-money people, and as those who believe in something for nothing. I was pleased the other day when I received a publicatioin of the federal reserve system of the United States, dealing with the method adopted by the United States treasury in acquiring their gold reserve from the federal reserve banks. As everybody knows, the federal reserve system is a system of private banks and private institutions. This little bulletin answers a question asked by a United States senator as to what steps the United States treasury took in securing their gold reserves from the federal reserve system.

Roughly, the procedure was this: The United States treasury went to the federal reserve banks and said, "We would like to buy or acquire your gold, but we have no money." Therefore the federal reserve system very kindly lent the treasury of the United States the money to buy the gold. According to this bulletin, that depleted the credit of the United States treasury with the federal reserve system. But the credit of the treasury was restored immediately they had possession of the gold, although they had borrowed the money from the owners of the gold in order to acquire the gold. In the words of the governor of the federal reserve system the treasury of the United States had acquired the gold for nothing. It cost them nothing, so that you see it is possible to have something for nothing. It seems to me to be obvious that if the treasury of the United States, or the government of the United States if you like, can acquire $20 billion worth of gold for nothing, then it could very easily finance public works or anything else of that kind equally at no cost to itself.

There is no doubt a drift at the present time toward socialism. I am quite sure that the average member of the public does not realize what socialism really is. In my opinion the votes that have been registered during the last year or so have not been votes against this particular government or any other government; they have been votes against the frustration from which the Canadian people suffered for so many years before the war. In spite of the war the people of Canada, generally speaking, are better off than they have been for many years, and they assume—I do not agree with the assumption—that their better condition is due to planning and control. In our social credit opinion it is due simply to the fact that there is plenty of money about and that the problem of marketing has been solved.

It is a curious thing that while the whole world is fighting to resist the imposition of one German philosophy, people are blindly adopting another German philosophy known as socialism. The founder of socialism, Karl Marx, was certainly a German, and a Prussian at that. It seems to me that what we need is a Christian solution of our economic problems. Socialism in my opinion is not a Christian solution. Christianity is based on the freedom and responsibility of the individual, whereas socialism, to put it shortly, means irresponsible masses controlled by irresponsible individuals.

I am quite sure that one reason for the spread of socialistic ideas in Canada and elsewhere—I have heard this out in the country, especially in western Canada—is the totally misleading propaganda about Russia. I am not going to criticize Russia in any way at all. What they do in Russia is the affair of the Russian people, but when the radio and other means of communication are used to spread propaganda that Russia is even more democratic than Canada, then I think it is time somebody made a protest. I want to make that protest with all the strength I possess.

I am not libeling any one when I say—I have not his exact quotation, but I think I remember it correctly — that President Roosevelt has stated that Russia is as complete and absolute a dictatorship as any that has ever existed. That is true, but most people do not know that. They are occupied with their own affairs, and they listen to those who should know and are given a totally false picture of communism in Russia and elsewhere. I should like to quote a man who will not be accused of being prejudiced since he is a socialist himself. Professor Laski is professor of political history at the London school of economics, and a few years ago he published an essay in the United States entitled, "Recovery through Revolution", from which I quote:

> The communist hypothesis . . . insists that no socialist government can attempt seriously to put its principles into practice without encountering determined resistance which will issue in civil war. To maintain socialist principles, in short, socialists will be driven to become communists or to betray their socialism. If they become communists they will find themselves involved in the grim logic of Leninism—the dictatorship of the proletariat, the drastic suppression of counter-revolution, the confiscation of the essential instruments of production, the building of the state, in a word, upon the principles of martial law until the security of the new order is firmly established. The transformation of capitalism into socialism means revolution, and that implies an experience akin to that through which Russia has passed.

Last winter it was my privilege and pleasure for a few days to occupy a seat in the gallery of the mother of parliaments. I was seated in the gallery reserved for members of dominion parliaments. This is a little gallery and I found it filled with men, all of whom were in uniform but myself. They represented the armies of New Zealand, South Africa, Australia, Canada and the United States. On one occasion in the House of Commons at Westminster the post-war settlement of Europe was being debated, and it seemed to me as I listened to some of the speakers that they were apologizing for the surrender of the interests of the smaller countries in Europe which they thought might have to be made at the end of the war. A man sitting next to me, an officer, a chaplain in the Royal Air Force, turned to me and said, although he did not know me from Adam, "Is there no one in this house with the courage to get up and speak the truth?" I should like to pay a tribute to those countries and peoples that at the beginning of the war stood by Great Britain to the best of their ability and fought the Germans when everything looked black and apparently all was lost. The Poles put up a magnificent fight. Their air force in Great Britain I was told had a very large share in the victory of the battle of Britain over the German air force in 1940. The skill and daring of the Polish airmen were, I was told, unsurpassed. The Polish government has never surrendered and its soldiers still are fighting against the common enemy.

Then there was Yugoslavia, which also fought gallantly against the Germans when everything appeared lost, and they are still fighting. Then there were the Greeks, who also fought magnificently, and whom we tried in vain to relieve. I heard from responsible men, members of the House of Commons at Westminster, that their faces burned with shame when they thought of the treatment which these countries had received, how they had been denounced as fascist, and how all the credit and even the help were now being given to those who had held their hands until Russia was invaded. I discussed this question a great deal with responsible men in Great Britain who knew what they were talking about, and I should like to pay my humble tribute to these gallant peoples who, when apparently everything was lost, fought and are still fighting. They seem now to be discredited and forsaken, but I hope they will not be forgotten by the Canadian people when they realize the part they played in winning the war.

I should like to close with a story that I was told in the House of Commons at Westminster which made a great impression on me. As I suppose all members know, the house itself is not very old. It is a part of the old palace of Westminster, of which Westminster Hall still stands. The office of the Empire Parliamentary Association is situated in Westminster Hall and I used to go there every day when I visited the House of Commons. I had to walk though Westminster Hall itself to get there. I had seen the hall as a boy but I was much more impressed with it now than I was then, possibly because I could compare my own puny efforts at building with the work of those old master builders. I noticed one of the old beams lying in a corner of the building. Members will probably remember that just before this war the roof of Westminster Hall was found to be unsafe owing to the borings of the death-watch beetle and the roof had to be restored. One of the members of the house showed me this old beam. There it was, honey-combed by the death-watch beetle. He told me this story. When this great hall was being built some eight hundred years ago the old builders decided to construct the finest roof in Europe. They said, "We shall have to have the finest oak timber in England, in order to build the finest roof." They searched all over England and finally they found what they wanted in a spot in Sussex and bought the oak from the owner of the land, who was then a member of the House of Commons, and out of that oak they built the roof of Westminster Hall. Eight hundred years later when they came to repair the roof the modern builders said, "We shall have to have the finest timber in England to build the new roof." Accordingly they searched all over England for the best timber, and finally they found it growing in the very same spot where their ancestors had found it eight hundred years before. More than that, the land on which the oak grew belonged to a descendant of the owner of eight hundred years ago, and the present owner is also a member of the House of Commons. I thought it was a remarkable story from which we can draw a great lesson now. The lesson is this: When you come to build permanently you should always use local material. Those old builders had the faith and the courage to build for all time, and the roof they built stood for nearly a thousand years and would have stood for another thousand years had not the death-watch beetle bored its way into the very heart of the oak beams supporting the roof. When they decided to rebuild the roof they did not say, "We should have a new order of roof; we should have an alien roof made of alien materials"; they said, "We must have the finest English oak to build the finest English roof." And so the roof stands to this day, defying not only the elements but the blitz; and it will stand for another thousand years, a sublime monument to the skill and faith of those builders of old.

And so it is with our constitutional roof of British justice and liberty which our ancestors have taken centuries to build, in the faith that it would stand, and that Britons always would be free. To-day our British constitution is under attack from within and from without by the death-watch beetles of state socialism, fascism, communism and international finance-ism. We are told that we must have a new order, designed by aliens, an alien structure of alien materials, in place of our old and tested British constitution of justice and liberty. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not need a new order of alien design. Let us build on our old British foundations of liberty and justice which our ancestors laid down through the centuries. Let us destroy these alien death-watch beetles, these isms that would undermine our own foundations of freedom. We must repair our own Canadian structure. Let us renew our faith in our own ability to build, as did our ancestors to the end that there will always be a sovereign Canada of justice and freedom.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Although I address the house on the occasion of the annual budget debate, I do not imagine that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would be grateful, although I am thankful to believe he would survive it, if I should suddenly at this time and in this place begin to discuss the question of money or the closely allied problems of finance which are so often a part of budget discussions. In the brief remarks which I intend to make to-night I propose rather to say something in a more general way on the subject of planning, and I have elected to make those remarks on the annual budget debate because, in the experience of ages and in modern experience everywhere to-day, ideas of practical planning are inextricably interwoven with the fiancial structure of the country. However, I do not propose to-night to relate those general remarks on the subject of planning to the financial or the taxation structure of this dominion except in a very general way.

I have had the somewhat unique experience, shared by nearly everyone in the house, of seeing this country pass through two of the most trying periods which happened in the lifetime of anyone living: first of all, the period of the major depression which preceded the war; and second, the period of the war itself. Perhaps no two periods in the history of any country were or could be more conducive to planning and the realization of the need for planning, the need for thinking ahead, than those periods have been.

Back in 1935 I remember writing a letter to the people who are now my electors, and have been since that time, and discussing with them the conditions which then prevailed. I remember saying to them that I was not one of those who venerated something because it had always been that way, but I thought it would be possible to examine those things which had been done with the same critical eye as one applied to those things which were proposed for the relief of the conditions in which we then found ourselves. Throughout the period of time since then I have had no reason to change my view of the practical need of retaining something of that which has served us well, while not being afraid to examine those proposals which come to us from time to time and from various sources looking to the amelioration of present conditions or an improvement in the future.

I was not dismayed in those years by the often-expressed view, so common in eastern Canada at that time, that the west, economically speaking, was done. By 1939 we had begun to come out of that black period, and the hope and confidence shared by a large percentage of us had begun to be justified. Then war came; and for a little while, following the depression throughout the country, people were anxious to get something of that immediate war prosperity which seems always to come with the taking up of the slack between civilian occupation, particularly after the depression, and the somewhat feverish activity of war. Then, as the next phase, fear came, and during those fateful days of 1940 everyone was willing to pay almost anything in order to preserve what we called our way of life. For a little while during that period which I have called the period of fear we forgot the black days which had preceded it; and those were days when people went about saying, I think without realizing the unconscious irony of what they said, "This time we are all in the war". But as the pendulum swung slowly and painfully, almost imperceptibly for a long period of time but nevertheless steadily, in our favour, people began to look backward again. As we began to take victory for granted we looked backward with a measure of unhappiness and forward only with distrust. It was at that period, I think, that we in Canada began to experience what one might call the active period of the planners.

Sir, there are plans and plans just as there are planners and plotters. There are plans which are based on dreams of the future, and there are plans which have their origin in what one might call the nightmares of the past. It seems to me that from Beveridge to Tim Buck most of our professional planners have based their plans on the backward look, on the nightmares of the past, and that very few have visualized the brighter future which I for one believe faces this country, or boldly planned to make that come true.

I do not anticipate a return to the depression of the thirties. I am not afraid of the future for Canada once this war has terminated, but if I were, frankly I should be more afraid of an artificial and unnatural boom in the immediate post-war years than I should be of a depression. But, sir, it is my conviction that we shall go forward to better things, and that for two reasons. One of them is this. Already in this country we have progressed far beyond the conditions which made possible the depression of the thirties and though we may lose something here and there, that type of progress will not be wiped away by any adjustment period following the war.

The second reason why I believe we are going forward to something better is that the young people of the country, mobilized largely in the forces but to some extent in industry and in business, will it. They have made up their minds that they are not going back and we agree with them; and all the forces of reaction cannot keep back either them or us, who must go with them if we are to continue to function. Under these conditions those who are skilled in the arts of leadership, and experienced in leadership in this country, will either look forward and lead in that direction or cease to function, or new leaders will arise. To those who have dominated the modern world picture, as well as the Canadian scene, the leaders of a society of free enterprise, it is not too early to say a word of warning. Certainly it is not new, and in my opinion it cannot be said too often, that even in the ranks of those who to-day have offered their lives, if needs be, for the preservation of the freedoms of democracy, even among them there are some, far more than some of us think perhaps, who, because of the backward looking of those who direct themselves to their attention, and some of them because of their own memories, would be willing to sacrifice some measure of these freedoms for security. I was more than impressed, talking with a considerable number of people in the service, to find the effect which those past years had, either on their memories or on what they have picked up since, and to find a grasping for security, which, without direction and leadership, might tend to breach the very ideal for which they are fighting. And so I say to the leaders of a system which is led by free enterprise, you must make your system work and make it work fast, if it is not to perish for generations, if not forever.

It is fair to point out to those who seek, in considering these matters, the socialistic ideal, that in the endless conflict for progress and security man must be ever supreme over his own creature, the state; for if you breach in any material sense that fundamental concept you find man quickly in the position of being subservient to the state which he has created. To those who look to the Liberal philosophy of life, with its emphasis on man himself and his right to improve himself in free association in the state, the challenge is as clear as it is sometimes unheeded. The issue is drawn; it is a challenge to make the system work for the benefit of all who contribute to it, for all those who live according to the dictates of decent social practice, or they must be prepared to stand aside.

Governments do not hesitate to deal with people who violate the civil or the criminal law. The same force, by the same common consent, can deal with those who violate social law. Governments can, and in my opinion governments must, follow that course. That, sir, is one thing; but the conception of the state administering all phases of production and of social relations is something else. Bad times are not inevitable. They may come again and again if we adopt the philosophy of life which encourages people to ask the question, "What will you do for me?" We should rather encourage another question and should have the answer for it, and that question is: "What opportunities will I have?"

Between those two questions there is all the difference between despair and hope. We have had very little of it and I should hope that we shall have none of the "land fit for heroes" type of thing. I think we can be saved from trouble only if we assure our people, both in the service and elsewhere contributing to the war effort of the country in other than their normal routine employments, that they will have a free chance, in the after period, to build the kind of Canada they want themselves. We shall in that way inspire more confidence in them and be on a safer basis for the future, and less liable to the type of recrimination which followed before. Political parties which hope to survive, and deserve to survive in Canada after the war, must recognize that the war has put a fresh emphasis on youth; if they fail to recognize that they must surely disappear.

To the men and women of the services a fifty-year-old is an antique. But these people are tolerant. In so far as they are concerned, they may forget yesterday; their day is to-morrow. From the day they put on their uniform until the time they take it off, consciously or unconsciously they live in to-morrow. What have we done about to-morrow? The budget has given some indication that the Canadian government is preparing to answer the question, "What opportunities will I have?" For this reason I am glad that those of us who wish to see industry and business encouraged to have some partnership with the government in the period of reestablishment, have received a little encouragement in this budget. It is not enough to challenge the spirit of private enterprise and to tell people they must pull their own weight or cease to exist. There is a place in government planning for assistance and encouragement to those established institutions which provide so much of the wealth and so much of the employment of the country in normal times.

I could have wished to see more consideration given to mining, because I am reasonably certain that we in Canada are neither forgetful of what the mining industry has contributed to this country during the difficult pre-war years, nor unaware of what it can do for us in the time to come. With the problem of housing, the full impact of which will come upon us instantly once the cessation of hostilities comes, I could have wished that it had been possible to include in the budget some encouragement to the industries of the forest. I suggest to the Minister of Finance now, whatever he may or may not be willing to do in the way of implementing it at this moment, that when he has an opportunity, in closing the debate, he take that opportunity, if he will, and give some indication of policy and intent with respect to the government's plan for something in the nature of a more cooperative effort between established business in the country and the government; this with a view to assisting those tried, established industries, to carry what they recognize and realize fully is their share of the load of rehabilitation and reestablishment; for we in Canada do not really believe that everybody can live off everybody else while nobody pays. At times we may give the impression that we are imbued with that philosophy, but the practical demonstration Canada has given in financing for war, in the matter of loans, the purchase of war savings stamps and certificates, is an indication that large numbers of the people of Canada, in managing their household affairs and in their private thinking, still have a reasonably sound conception of the use and power of money.

The speech from the throne this session is replete with clear indications, now being implemented by legislation, that the government plans to help our people help themselves in the post-war period by providing both a measure of security and an open door to self-support. Supplementing that legislation we have the regulations which have been brought into effect with respect to the reestablishment of veterans during the period following the war. So that the principle of what can be done to help our people help themselves seems to be running through the whole programme. The opportunities being given returning soldiers, sailors and airmen, and the women in the service, to improve their own opportunities through training, through re-training, through education and so on, all point in the direction which I think most Canadians desire to see taken; that is, assisting people to be self-reliant in their own selected ways of making a living. Consequently I did not want this debate to close or this session finally come to an end without expressing my own approval and that of many others of the principle which I think has been so clearly established in the three phases I have mentioned; that is, the principle of assisted self-help.

Before I resume my seat I should like to do something I do not believe I have done previously in this house; this is, I should like to refer to certain specific cases which in my view require reconsideration on the part of the Minister of Finance and those concerned with respect to the income tax. Perhaps the simplest way of putting a point across at any time is to give an example, and that is my only reason for giving two examples, for both of which I can vouch. Exemptions are provided now under the income tax regulations with respect to children who, having passed the age at which the exemption normally would cease, are attending educational institutions. I have had brought to my attention a great number of cases of young women who, instead of electing to go to university or to take their senior matriculation, have chosen to go into the general hospitals of the province from which I come—and perhaps this is general in other provinces—to do work which is difficult and which they are encouraged to undertake by appeals from this and other governments. These young women are entering our hospitals to train as nurses, because of the great need for trained nurses throughout the country.

Anyone who gives any consideration at all to the problems of a girl who goes into a general hospital to learn to become a nurse, and who places her in the category of a wage-earner rather than that of a student, seems to me to be missing the point of what happens to a girl who undertakes training in these institutions. I am aware of the fact that during the period of training some hospitals do pay these student nurses small monthly amounts. It happens that the major hospital in the city from which I come pays nothing at all. Student nurses are given their room and board, and that has been used as an argument for saying that their income was such that they could not be classed as dependents. In that regard I should like to point out that when a nurse graduates from a hospital, then returns to that institution to nurse a patient, the hospital itself values her board and lodging at only $1 a day. On this basis, which seems fair, the earnings of a student nurse would be less than would be sufficient to disqualify her as a dependent. I have tried every method I know of to bring the cases of these young women and their unfortunate parents to the attention of the government in the hope that they might receive some consideration. I have supplied names and facts and am prepared to do so again at any time. I know the number of such cases would not be very great, but I hope that before we come to deal with the income tax provisions the minister will reconsider the matter or, if it has not been brought to his attention so far, that he may find out about it and be prepared to discuss the matter at that time.

There is another type of case in which I believe a hardship is inflicted which is not intended under the act. I have in mind a commercial traveller, a widower with one daughter who is a student nurse in a hospital. This man is seldom at home and has no particular reason for maintaining a domicile in the city of Winnipeg except to provide a place where his only daughter may have some of the advantages of a home. For income tax purposes, however, that man's whole income is classed as that of a single man, because his daughter has quarters in the hospital and his domicile is used by her as a sort of auxiliary home. There is not a great deal of difference between these cases, but I cite them now in the hope that, if possible, the regulations may be reconsidered. I have been informed that no change has been made in the provision barring student nurses from the consideration which would have been granted them if they had chosen the comparatively less useful course of studying for their senior matriculation, or had gone to university.

I do not think anyone greatly resents the terrific pressure of our present taxation, but I suggest to the minister that some of these considerations, perhaps small in the aggregate but important to those concerned, might be reconsidered with a view to building up on the part of our people a spirit of greater good-will in connection with the sacrifices they are called upon to make.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mutch) mention nurses in training, because I have received a great number of letters in regard to this matter. One gentleman has this to say:

> There seems to be one particular injustice in the regulations which, I believe, is to the detriment of Canada's war effort, that is the fact that nurses in training cannot be claimed as dependents by the taxpayer. As you very well know, there is a scarcity of nurses in all districts and we in Ontario are required to train some five hundred additional nurses for the coming expected emergency when the invasion starts.

This letter is dated April 21, 1944.

> At the school of nurses in Kingston, for example, we understand that the students receive no allowance so that the parents are obliged to pay for clothing and other necessities (other than board) and besides must provide spending money for their daughters during the three year course. On the other hand, students in university, up to the age of twenty-one years, may be classed as dependents, and their relative importance to the national economy is debatable.

I have other letters along that line, and I honestly believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he is revising his budget—and he is not listening to me—should take into account nurses in training. I hope he heard that.

When I heard the Minister of Finance make his budget speech I thought it would meet with the approval of almost everyone in Canada. However, while I was home during the week-end I met a number of industrial workers, not only from my own riding, but from ridings outside. Some of them were from Toronto, others from Hamilton and other points. I asked one person what he thought of the budget, and in one voice the group replied that it was terrible—and used other words that I cannot use, because they are not parliamentary. One said, "The Minister of Finance is an Indian giver, because his compulsory savings regulation is not going to help us very much. In many cases we have insurance policies and payments on our homes, and the compulsory savings are taken care of. Then, we get it back after the war is over. But what bothers us more than anything else is the fact that, although the compulsory savings regulation is eliminated, the Minister of Finance has increased his budget to such an extent that it will mean, at the next victory loan, that he will ask the people of Canada to subscribe a much larger amount than before. When he does that it means that the industrial worker will be asked to subscribe, not the amount he or she subscribed at the time of the last loan, but perhaps as much as their compulsory savings would have amounted to."

These industrial workers told me that it would not be a case of, "Will you subscribe to the loan?" It was their opinion that pressure would be so great that it would be a case of, "You will subscribe to the loan." They said that they did not mind subscribing if the government would stop up the sink holes into which their hard-earned money was going. They said that there were many of these, and that the government should stop the wastage. They also mentioned injustices the government were inflicting upon the people. I shall not go into detail in respect of the wastages, but perhaps I should mention one or two items to which attention should be given.

I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman, in which he states:

> I learned quite accidentally the other day that one of our local junk dealers is able to purchase these files in ton lots at 15 cents per pound in assorted sizes and types from a government aircraft factory. You will note from the advertisement that they are offered for resale at 10 cents each. I am sending you samples of the files.

And he goes on to say, further, that from the government literature and press notices it would seem that the War Assets Corporation is going to do a real thorough job of disposing of our surplus goods. But this does not look like it. There is an ad. in the paper, "Thousands of good files, all shapes and sizes, 10 cents each." The minister has not heard a word I have said, because he has been talking to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). But for his benefit I shall call a page and send to him these files which have been discarded from our aircraft factories. I am asking the page to give these to the Minister of Finance. These are files that I consider first-class; and if the Minister of Finance does not know anything about them, he had better call in the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who is an expert. Those files have just been touched, and that is all. They are almost brand new. Yet they have been discarded in ton lots. I say that is a condition which should be looked into.

There is something else I should like to bring up at this time. I believe I have mentioned previously the fact that the war information board has been wasting a lot of money. I was criticized in some Liberal papers for what I said. However, I expected that criticism, because they have to hold up their end. I hold in my hand an item from the United Church Observer, headed "All A Mistake". It states:

A few days ago we, along with many other Protestant ministers across Canada received from the wartime information board a small booklet—

And I believe that is a little bit of sarcasm—

—of 144 pages, beautifully printed on most expensive paper, and neatly bound. It was called "The Nazi War on the Catholic Church." Later we received a letter from the wartime information board saying that it was all a mistake. . . .

And that it should not have been sent out. Now, you know and I know that the Roman Catholic church, for which I have great respect, has no need of any build-up. Nor has the Protestant church any need of a build-up of that kind. I said before that literature of that kind should not be sent out to the churches of Canada. It is an absolute waste of the people's money.

Here is another item which in my view is a waste of time and money, and also a waste of the time of our air force boys. I understand that questionnaires are sent out to the different classes in the air force pools—and I understand the same is being done in the army. This is marked "Air Force poll No. 6", and it is stated that it is an attempt to determine the opinion of members of the air force on various subjects. It is suggested that they simply read the question and encircle the answers which best express their opinions. At the top are the words, "experiment in group opinion." Then the first question is:

What party did you vote for in the last elections?

Federal.—Liberal, Conservative or C.C.F.

In the next federal election which party do you think you will vote for, or which party do you think you will not vote for?

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will understand this next question:

Reasons for voting or not voting:

(1) Present government has done a swell job;

(2) Present government has done as well as anyone else could.

An hon. MEMBER: Far better.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I expected to hear that. The third alternative is a beauty:

The present government has bungled and should be replaced.

Then further down the page:

The Progressive Conservatives will run the country as it should be run.

And further down:

All politics are a waste of time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where is that from?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Air Force poll No. 6.

Mr. GRAYDON: And you are paying for this.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I say it is nothing but waste.

I have been speaking about injustices. It was a week ago to-day that I asked the Minister of Finance this question: Why is it that creameries in Quebec can gather cream three times a week, whereas those in Ontario can gather cream only once every two weeks?

An hon. MEMBER: More cream.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, that is not right. If you know anything about farming you will realize that that is the most foolish answer anyone could give.

An hon. MEMBER: They had more sap.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The butter production in Ontario has gone down because they can collect only three times every two weeks. The result has been that the small butter factories are shipping their butter in the form of seconds because the cream is soured before it can be made into butter. Ontario butter is really the best in the world. as the hon. member for Fraser Valley knows. These creameries should be able to collect once every two days. On Thursday I asked the Minister of Finance if he could give me an answer and he said, "Put it on the order paper and save time." On Saturday I went into a creamery and the first thing that greeted me was, "Well, those sons of guns down at Ottawa, the wartime prices and trade board, have evidently seen the light; there is an order out to-day that we can collect cream three times a week."

Mr. HOMUTH: Did they "sons of guns" or what?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I will not repeat it because it would not be parliamentary. The wartime prices and trade board should treat every one fairly and squarely. It should not be up to a member of parliament to rise in this house and complain when an injustice is being done. A few months ago I referred to the slaughtering of cattle and hogs. They were allowed to do this in Quebec without a permit but we could not do it in Ontario. However, that was changed to some extent. That is as far as I am going on that and from now on I am going to deal with the budget.

I have here an editorial which I should like to read because I think it covers the ground very well. It is from the Peterborough Examiner of Friday, May 19, 1944. Sometimes this paper treats me well and sometimes it does not, but when it knocks me it is generally a boost, and when it boosts me it generally means a knock; they are fair, however. The editorial reads in part:

> Is Mr. Ilsley going to do anything to remove the feeling of the ordinary taxpayer that he is being bilked? In a recent complaint which he made about expenditure Mr. Ilsley seemed to take the attitude that all the money in the country is under his control, and that the portion of a man's income which is left to him when his taxes are paid is a favour which he enjoys from the government. Quite the contrary is the case: the portion of a man's income which he pays in tax belongs to the government, and the remainder is his own. It is well that we should not lose sight of this simple truth. And many taxpayers feel that they are treated in an unjust and punitive manner because of abuses in the tax system. These abuses have been widely discussed, but it will not be amiss to set them down here again.

And further down it says:

> At present our forms are so complicated that a taxpayer may easily make a mistake and pay either too much or too little. But if he pays too little he may be billed for the balance, plus accumulated interest, any time within twenty-six years of the time of payment. But if he finds that he has paid too much, he must make his claim for redress within a year of making the mistake, or he gets nothing. And he gets no interest on the money which he has involuntarily paid to the government, either. Neither Great Britain nor the U.S.A. permit this tricky business of reopening old tax bills.
> The powers possessed by tax officials are exercised, to a great extent, on their own discretion, and thus vary greatly from one district to another. There is no good reason why so much power should be reposed in officials, and there is a strong feeling that their powers should be clearly stated, and applied equally everywhere in the country. This is important, because there is no appeal against the decision of one of these men except through the Exchequer Court of Canada, and proceedings in that court are far too costly for the average citizen to invoke them. In Great Britain and the United States there are courts for handling tax matters which are easy to appeal to and which do not cost more than the humbler taxpayers can afford. Why should Canada have tax officials against whom there is virtually no redress?

I know the taxpayers of Canada feel that there should be a limit upon the number of years which the income tax branch can go back.

Mr. GIBSON: Even in case of fraud?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is a different proposition, but they should prove the fraud. It is an imposition to go back twenty-five or thirty years. If the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) gets caught by their going back thirty years he will be the one who will do the kicking. I know the minister knows of many cases where they have gone back quite a ways.

If they go back that number of years the income tax branch will charge you interest on the amount computed. There should be a limitation of not more than five years on the time they can go back. No interest should be charged on the unpaid portions of succession duties. Many estates have been tied up for two or three years. I realize that the dominion government entered this field of taxation only a short time ago. As I say, the government should not charge interest on unpaid balances unless an account is first sent in to the trustee or the executor or whoever is in charge of the estate. This should apply also to income taxes. An account should first be presented before interest is charged.

The government said that the simplified tax forms which were issued last year could be filled out in ten minutes. Apparently the forms for those in the higher brackets are also extremely easy to decipher, because it appears that the income tax branch provides for the income tax officials a book on the income tax act which is printed in Montreal and priced at $1.25. They give all the officials in the income tax branch one of those books absolutely free so that they can work out what the government has set down. In other words, the government feels that the income tax officials in Ottawa and throughout the country cannot possibly work out the income tax problems unless they have this book costing $1.25. If they give these books to the officials, why should not the ordinary taxpayer be supplied with one? He certainly is the goat; he is the one who has to pay.

Last year I made a suggestion to the Minister of Finance. He took me up on it and he carried it out. He put in item 36 in the 1942 income tax form and it would appear that the Department of National Revenue did very well under that time. The following question appeared in a return under my name:

What is the total amount of money received to date under item 36, general income tax T.1 form for the year 1942?

The minister's answer was:

The total amount of deferred tax received as of May 31, 1944, under item 36, T.1 general 1942 is $4,743,111.

I should like again to make a suggestion to the minister which I made last year. The time for paying that deferred tax, the 1942 tax, for those who had an investment income, was April 30 of this year. That tax brought in $4,700,000. Would the minister not be wise to allow that to continue on in 1945 and 1946 or even longer? It is based on an expectancy of life table anyhow. If that went on, I know that many dollars would come in. We need the money now; we do not need it fifty years from now. I think the minister would be wise to accept my suggestion and allow that to carry on. I believe the minister would also be well advised to send out a notice to all those who are on that list telling them what their deferred tax is, and also send them a table of life expectancy such as I have here. I know very few people know that there is such a table got out by the government; in fact, many people do not know that there is such an item as item 36 in the tax form. They do not know that when they die the estate has to pay the balance of the tax. Many would like to pay it now. I would also suggest that instead of making people pay the whole tax at once, they be allowed to pay half or one-quarter or three-quarters or any portion they like, but at the same rate of discount as allowed before.

In regard to payroll deductions I have talked to industrial workers and many of them say, "We would rather that the government took 100 per cent of the tax instead of only 95 per cent, so that at the end of the year we would not have to pay the government five or ten or fifteen per cent, but would likely have the whole tax cleared off. If not, we should have to pay only a very small amount, and in some cases the government would owe us money and we would have money coming to us."

The budget imposes different rates of duty on different articles entering this country. There is one duty or luxury tax which I think should be removed entirely. I have mentioned this in the house before and I am mentioning it again now. I refer to the tax on the poor man's alarm clock. I think the tax should be taken off entirely on alarm clocks costing not more than $4.50. It is hard enough to get an alarm clock as it is, and the luxury tax should be taken off altogether.

I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of National Revenue. I have mentioned it before and am mentioning it again, and then I am through. In the city of Peterborough we have been asked to subscribe to the different victory loans. In the first loan our objective was $2,750,000 and we subscribed $3,085,000. In the second loan our objective was $2,750,000 and we subscribed $3,027,900. In the third loan our objective was $3,250,000 and we subscribed $3,546,450. In the fourth loan our objective was $4,350,000 and we subscribed $4,679,550. In the fifth loan our objective was $4,600,000 and we subscribed $4,700,000. In the sixth loan we went away over the top, subscribing over $4,700,000. The people of my district are doing everything possible to help the war effort, and I am going to ask the Minister of National Revenue, as I asked him last year, to open an income tax office in Peterborough, at least during the time when the returns are being filled out, and have there one or more men to help the taxpayers to make out their returns.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my main purpose in rising is to ask for consideration for infant industries in my riding of Lisgar in Manitoba. I know that is a very unusual request to make on the budget, but that is my main purpose in rising.

Before doing so I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) especially upon removing entirely the duty on agricultural machinery. Prior to this budget the duty was only 7½ per cent, but that duty weighed heavily on the agricultural producer, especially in the west, because the implements of industry are so essential in production there, and with the mechanization of farms the cost is steadily rising, and therefore the task would have become increasingly burdensome. The removal of the duty has been something which has been sought ever since I can remember, and it is very gratifying indeed that it has actually come to pass at last.

I should also like to refer to the announcement which was made within recent weeks that United States funds would be forthcoming for those who wish to travel in the United States. I would suggest that the amount be extended so that those who require treatment for health, especially those with a delicate constitution, be permitted to visit the southern states in the winter time, particularly between October and May, when the sun's rays become very oblique and when one becomes impoverished more or less from not receiving those rays on one's anatomy. Few of us are rugged Stefanssons, and very few of us regard the Arctic as friendly as Mr. Stefansson did. With the month of October or November arctic weather begins to encroach on the Dominion of Canada and one cannot very well receive the rays of the sun to advantage in this climate during the winter months. For that reason I believe it would be advantageous to the health of the Dominion of Canada if sufficient United States funds were forthcoming to permit people seeking health to visit the southern states. I do not anticipate that there would be any great difficulty in making the necessary arrangements. It would be an investment that would soon bring a return. Further, I do not think this country would lose a dollar by it because, as those of us who have ever travelled in the United States know, there are dozens of people wherever you go down there seeking information as to Canada's summer resorts and every Canadian who visited the southern states would be a missionary for our resorts. It would mean that twelve people from the United States for Canada's one would travel increasingly in Canada. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this country would not lose one dollar.

Speaking of tourists, when this war ends, as we all hope it will soon, and it may end suddenly, the United States tourist, who is a great traveller by car, will possibly try to enter the Dominion of Canada. The constituency of Lisgar, which I have the honour to represent, extends along the international boundary line for seventy-eight miles. There is no barrier, no river whatever, nothing to prevent anyone from crossing the border. Five United States macadam roads approach the boundaries of my constituency. Two of them meet Canadian roads; the other three do not. I assume that this situation could be described as fairly general in the Dominion of Canada, where we are not too amply equipped to meet the tourist demands which will likely follow the war. I therefore suggest that consideration be given to the creation of a fund which would permit the provinces, already impoverished as we know, to enter upon the construction of all-weather roads which lead to the United States.

There are two industries to which I wish particularly to refer. The first, which is only two years old is known as the bentonite industry. There is in Canada only one deposit of this material which is being worked. As the age of the industry would indicate, it is a wartime enterprise, and made possible only by the war. I emphasize the words "made possible." As many know, this metal is a volcanic ash which was deposited on portions of this country in prehistoric days, or rather, deposited on the ancient sea and washed into coves and deposited in beds ranging from a few inches to several feet deep. That clay or rock is mined very readily. Inasmuch as at one time it was subjected to intense heat it is suitable for certain purposes connected with war-time industry. It acts, among other ways, as a filter which is necessary in the production of oil and gasoline. It also acts as a catalyst in the production of synthetic rubber. Its most useful purpose before the advent of the oil business was as a binder for moulding sands in steel foundries. These are the three purposes for which it is needed, and one can readily surmise that war industries cannot get along without it.

There is one corporation in the United States with which this company is now competing. The Manitoba company is a joint stock company organized among farmers, although there are a few lawyers and quite a number of artisans interested in it. One might call it a shoe-string company; it used a lot of makeshift machinery since the promoters did not know what they would be up against, but they now have a pretty good plant, because of the expansion made possible by the war. The United States firm could easily run them out of business, but for one thing: at the present time it has about all it can look after in filling United States orders and practically none of its product is coming to Canada. Under these circumstances one would think that ordinarily the Canadian industry would have a fairly good chance to survive, but here is what it is up against. The company is not asking for tariff protection to exclude the United States competitor after the war, but it would like to be treated at least with fairness with regard especially to freight rates.

I wish to place a few figures before the house regarding freight rates on the raw clay from Jackson, Mississippi, to Sarnia, as compared with the rate for the same commodity from Winnipeg to Sarnia. In Canadian dollars the rate from Jackson is $7.40 per ton, as against $8.50 per ton by the Canadian National Railways from Winnipeg. Of course the distance from Jackson is shorter than that from Winnipeg, being 995 miles as against 1,500 by the Canadian National; however, a direct line from Winnipeg to Sarnia would lead through the United States, this route having a mileage of 1,113. There is not any great complaint about the difference as regards freight on raw clay, but the activated clay, that is clay which has been treated and rendered suitable for the purpose for which it is intended, is a different matter. The freight in Canadian funds from Jackson, Mississippi, is only $9.46 per ton as against the Canadian rate of $16.00 per ton. This indicates far too wide a differential, $8.10 per ton on Canadian shipments as compared with $2.06 in respect of United States shipments. If that disparity is permitted to continue after the war, the Canadian company cannot begin to compete with the United States company, and, it is safe to say, would be forced out of business. What would be lost? First, the company, which now employs a good many people—I do not know the exact number—would cease to exist. Last year it paid in freight rates to the Canadian National Railways over sixty thousand dollars. The other loss would be that of post-war expansion, the hope of enlarging the plant and thereby giving employment to ex-servicemen when they return.

There is another handicap under which the company operates and for which it has sought redress, but without result so far. It has asked for the milling-in-transit rate. Those hon. members who are accustomed to concerning themselves with the wheat milling business know that Canadian mills are accorded a milling-in-transit rate, which is a nominal rate with a stopover privilege; that is, the grain is brought a considerable distance in the bulk state, and is dumped into mills or elevators, at Kenora, at Winnipeg, at the head of the lakes and farther east too. This stopover privilege means quite a bit to the millers; they can, as I said, ship and mill products with a nominal charge for the stopover privilege. The bentonite company, which is known as Pembina Clays Limited, has been refused this privilege; and I think the time has come when this matter should be made public, because it is apparent that this young company, energetic and virile as it is, cannot hope to survive post-war competitive conditions unless it has some redress for the handicaps which I have described.

There is in my constituency another industry which is also in the infant stage; it is that of corn growing. It also was pioneered, as far as western Canada is concerned, in the constituency of Lisgar, and in the eastern half of that constituency practically all the grain corn in western Canada is grown. In 1941, when we had a very good crop, about twenty per cent of Canada's production was raised in that small area. Since then we have run into difficulty. In 1942 we had eight killing frosts in September, night after night, and the crop was virtually ruined. In 1943 there was a considerable improvement, but still there was very cold weather all through the season and cold weather is not at all suitable for corn growing. In that district we have twelve commercial corn driers, and it could safely be described as a thriving industry up to a point. In my own case, corn on the farm with which I am connected is used as a substitute for summer-fallow, but in most cases it is used as a cash crop by the small-acreage farmers.

In 1941 freight assistance was started in connection with the bringing of grains to eastern Canada. It was first announced that corn would be included in those grains, but later that was withdrawn and still later it was mentioned that, instead of western corn coming to Montreal, which is the main market, it would be accorded a freight subsidy from Calgary and Edmonton to Vancouver, instead of from the head of the lakes to Montreal. Under that arrangement in 1941, from October to December, 17,420 bushels were shipped to Vancouver; in 1942 a portion of the crop, 162,200 bushels, and in 1943 only 80,679 bushels, which would indicate that less than ten per cent of the product from our district has been shipped to Vancouver. All the rest, I am told by those who engage in the drying, shipping and selling, has been disposed of, mainly in Saskatchewan and some in Alberta.

It has come to my notice around the corridors of this building, I have been told by several persons, that the Ontario farmer does not like to see Manitoba corn sold in Ontario. I think that is a mistaken idea, because there is as much difference between Ontario and Manitoba corn as there is between Ontario and Manitoba wheat. The wheat of Ontario produces the best pastry flour; our wheat, of course, is, as we think, better for producing bread flour. The same holds in regard to corn. Eastern corn is starchy and produces corn starch and corn syrup, which the western corn cannot under any circumstances as yet produce. Western corn is highly protein and produces the best chick feed and corn meal. In 1941 western corn was sold in Ontario at twelve cents a bushel over Ontario corn, the reason being that the demand for corn meal and chick feed was such as to force the price up. This did not mean that the situation would always be so, but that was the condition then. I think that explains roughly why our western corn is sometimes in demand over eastern corn, although at times during the last two years eastern wheat has been at a premium over western wheat.

What we would like to see is a fund set aside so that a freight subsidy on corn will be returned to the Fort William-Montreal point after the British Columbia market has been satisfied. We have run into this difficulty, that the companies of British Columbia, which are in the habit of dealing in corn, do not particularly like our Manitoba corn. They are accustomed to Argentine and South African corn, and a good many dealers in Manitoba who have been shipping say that they will ship no more corn there. If we should again have as large a crop as in 1941 we would be under a considerable handicap in having to ship it to Montreal in competition with other grains which receive a freight subsidy.

In that connection I would refer to sessional paper 345 dated June 2, 1944, moved for by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy). What I am endeavouring to show is that in asking for this freight subsidy the people of Manitoba are not asking for anything unreasonable because, when one looks over the freight subsidies over the years, it would indicate that Manitoba has not been at all grasping in what she has obtained. This order asks for costs of federal assistance for twenty years. I have in my hand only the part that refers to the Department of Agriculture which covers the years from 1936 to the present time. In that period $53,937,000 was paid by the dominion government in freight subsidies. The province that received the most was Ontario, with $15,357,000—I will not give the odd dollars. Saskatchewan and Quebec almost tied for second place. The second last was Prince Edward Island, with $944,000, and last of all was Manitoba with $352,000. The total, as I said, was $53,937,000. So that in asking for the return of the freight subsidy on corn from Fort William to Montreal we of southern Manitoba are not asking anything unreasonable.

There is in my riding another industry, not yet born, which I would refer to in passing. It is to be known as the vegetable oil extraction industry to be located at the village of Altona, where 16,000 acres of sunflowers are being grown by cooperative producers in that vicinity. In addition to the 16,000 acres there are a great many more on nearby farms not under arrangement with the cooperatives, although it can safely be said that corn and the sunflower industry go hand in hand. It appears that, inasmuch as the cooperatives desire themselves to go into the oil extraction business, there has been considerable feeling on the part of private industry that this is a mistake and should not be permitted or encouraged. On the other hand, I think that attitude is a mistake, because I am a firm believer in the idea that cooperatives and private industry can exist side by side. I do not wish to go into details with regard to the attempts to establish this industry, but I mention it in passing and will refer to it when it comes up under another item.

I should like to say before taking my seat that I have been a member of one or more cooperatives since 1915, and at the present time I am a member of two. I also take an equal or a greater interest in private industry, because I am connected with agriculture and I have great faith that agriculture will remain a private industry inasmuch as we are individualists. I think that is all I need say at this time.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech has made it clear that our war expenditures, far from being decreased, as we had been given to understand in previous discussions, will be increased to such an extent that they will reach the tremendous figure of $5,300,000,000, which will bring our total expenditures to $6,000,000,000 for 1944-45. In view of the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made in this house on March 30, 1939, when he said that our country did not have unlimited powers and referred to the heavy burden of our national debt which then amounted only to $3,385,000,000, while to-day it reaches the sum of about $11,000,000,000 and will be $14,000,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year, Canadians have every reason to entertain fears about the future of their country.

I for one do not hesitate to repeat that our war effort is beyond our means, that it is leading us to ruin, and that it is a breach of the pledges that were given to the people. To meet those expenditures, the government is resorting to taxes, especially the income tax, and to loans.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) complained the other day about those who sell their victory bonds. That is unavoidable for the very reason that the country has exceeded its financial capacity—

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Why has it exceeded its financial capacity? Do tell us.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): —and that even if the people can be intimidated and compelled to purchase bonds, they cannot be prevented from converting them into ready cash because they need it to live.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Under legislation which you supported.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): As regards the income tax as usual the budget does not make sufficient allowance for family obligations. A living income must not be lower than a certain minimum, and the larger the family is, the more money it takes to support it.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): And you ought to know that.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): This budget, like the others, discriminates against the family. The tax should have been lowered in the case of those whose salary is insufficient to meet the cost of living, especially those who have families to support.

Thus, according to the Marsh report, the average cost of the support and education of a child in Canada is estimated at about $140 a year. But the head of a family is not allowed to deduct from his tax more than $108 for each child. That is a glaring injustice against large families.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): You did not say that in 1938.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to see that these interruptions cease.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question of the hon. gentleman who is now speaking, he may do so; but he must rise and address the Chair. Interruptions such as he has made cannot be permitted.

Mr. LACOMBE: These are not interruptions. These are remarks on the speech being delivered by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie may not be interrupted except with his consent, and he objects. There must be no further interruption.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Immigration has been mentioned. Instead of spending money to bring in refugees who will take the place of our own people, let us help our large families by every means at our disposal, especially by tearing down slums where death is rampant.

I would now like to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the budget debate to make a few remarks about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The independence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, its autonomy, the lack of government interference in its administration and of political partisanship have been loudly proclaimed, and, last March, the chairman of the board of governors said that the corporation operated solely in the public interest, and reference is always being made to the guiding principles draughted in 1939. May I recall some of these guiding principles.

Section D:

35. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is opposed to and will resist any effort which seeks to regiment public opinion or stamp out freedom of speech.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): That's a joke!

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation):

It favours free access to airwaves for useful discussion. . . .

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Another hoax.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation):

. . . of all controversial matters. It is firmly convinced that the safest way to preserve freedom of discussion lies in the adoption of a policy which allows the holders of the greatest possible number of opinions, to express these views, be they ever so varied and dissimilar.

And Section 46 reads as follows:

The thorough exchange of ideas constitutes one of the means of safeguarding the freedom of our institutions. In every democracy, each individual is recognized the right of rebuttal.

The airwaves belong to the public and the constant purpose of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to place within hearing of all the main viewpoints relating to matters of primary import.

Before the special committee on radio broadcasting, the Minister of National Services (Mr. LaFlèche) spoke as follows:

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Of War Services, don't forget.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Of National War Services. Thank you.

As has already been stated by the Prime Minister and by my predecessor, the corporation is not a department of the government. On February 8 of this year the Prime Minister said: "Certainly the government's view is not that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a department of the government. It is not; it is a separate corporation.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): It is through the facilities of that corporation that the hon. member has spoken as official candidate, in 1940.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wish again to call the attention of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) to what I have said already, that the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) must not be interrupted while he is making his speech.

Mr. LACOMBE: I will permit my hon. friend to interrupt me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must take his seat.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want to know the truth about this question, Mr. Speaker. This is a question, and I want to know the truth.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: And we all—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must take his seat, and I must warn him that I will not allow the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) to be further interrupted in his speech.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): In the month of June, 1943, the chairman of the board of governors explained to the select committee on radio broadcasting the general principles that were being followed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

> The independence and flexibility of administration of the national broadcasting authority to be assured by its constitution as a public corporation. . . . The independence of the corporation from partisan control to be assured by its constitution. As a trustee for the people of Canada and the payers of licences, the board of governors should render an account of its stewardship regularly to parliament and be subject to ultimate parliamentary control.

I made it a point to enumerate the guiding principles that were being followed and to quote the statement of the minister, who is responsible for the radio broadcasting activities as well as that of the chairman of the board of governors.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Who is he? You say: the minister. Is he the Hon. Mr. Mitchell? The minister, that is not very plain. We want to know. Are you afraid to say?

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie please be seated.

I have already said to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) that I would not tolerate any further interruptions of the speech made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie. It is apparent that the hon. member does not intend to obey the injunction of the chair, and I will have to name the hon. member.

I therefore name Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two Mountains.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the rules of the house—

Mr. LACOMBE: I only put a question to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In accordance with the rules of the house, and in the absence of any explanation by the hon. member, I shall have to move, seconded by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock):

[Mr. Lacombe.]

> That the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, Liguori Lacombe, be suspended from the service of the house for a period of seven days.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to remove the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DORION: I would not rise at this time, but—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no discussion.

[Whereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms touched the hon. member on the shoulder, and he thereupon retired.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie may now resume. In view of the fact that his speech has been constantly interrupted since the beginning, he may go over his speech again, and commence his forty minutes from this moment.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): As I was saying a moment ago, I wished to set out the guiding principles quoted in support of the claim that the CBC was an independent and self-governing body, free from governmental interference. I regret to say that the facts are not in accordance with these contentions. I call the attention of the house to the 1942 plebiscite. As soon as the plebiscite was announced, the League for the Defence of Canada was organized in Montreal. On February 13, 1942, the secretary of the League wrote to Mr. Augustin Frigon, assistant general manager of the CBC, requesting the use of the CBC radio stations. On February 16, 1942, Mr. Frigon replied as follows:

> Most likely, our regulations, which apply to general elections, will be enforced during the campaign which, in all probability, will precede the plebiscite announced by the government of Canada.
> Our services are offered free of charge to all recognized political parties, and according to a policy which was adopted almost three years ago. I feel that so far we have observed, in this regard, a strict neutrality.
> To sum up, your league may use individual private stations, but our corporation, in view of its national character, must remain neutral in any political matters.

The secretary of the League for the Defence of Canada replied that it was not a case of conducting elections or electoral campaigns or ascertaining the views of the parties or electing a party in preference to another, and that the policy mentioned in Mr. Frigon's letter should not apply in this case.

On February 24, Mr. Frigon wrote as follows to the secretary of the League for the Defence of Canada:

> Our regulations in regard to the broadcasting over the CBC stations and networks of political or controversial matters are quite clear and do not allow any other interpretation than that given in my letter of February 16.

I shall deem it a duty to convey to the proper authorities the remarks contained in your letter of February 18. In view of the importance of the plebiscite and the peculiar conditions of the campaign which will be waged on this issue, it is quite possible that our board of governors will place a special interpretation on our regulations.

And on February 28, 1942, Messrs. Murray and Frigon communicated the following message by telephone:

(Text):

The broadcasting arrangements for the publicity are still under consideration, and the league's claims are being taken fully into account; decision cannot be taken until the enabling bill becomes law. Meanwhile the league for the defence of Canada is in the same position as any other political organization.

(Translation): The act ordering the plebiscite was passed on March 5, and there was another exchange of correspondence. On March 11, Mr. Frigon wrote to the secretary of the league, as follows:

Nothing has been decided yet about the use of the stations and networks of our corporation for the discussion of the problem connected with the plebiscite recently ordered by parliament. So far, your request is the only one which we have received for the use of our stations.

On March 30, the secretary of the league wrote to Mr. Frigon, as follows:

The newspapers announce that the Prime Minister will soon speak on the question.

Should we understand that you have come to a decision, and would you be kind enough to let us know what that decision is.

There was no answer to that letter. But on April 4, the press announced that the Right Hon. Mr. King, Hon. Mr. Hanson, Mr. Blackmore and others would broadcast on the question. The league wrote another letter, and finally on April 8, the secretary received the following answer:

Ottawa, April 8, 1942.

Mr. André Laurendeau,
League for the defence of Canada.

Dear Sir,

In accordance with instructions received from the federal government, our corporation has placed at the disposal of the administration a certain number of periods on its various networks for the use of speakers who will discuss the plebiscite.

Your last letter, dated April 4, shows that you already know how the transcontinental network is to be used in that connection. Eight half-hour periods will also be allotted to this matter on our French network. We have not yet been informed of the names of the speakers.

Such is the position. It is claimed that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is absolutely independent of any governmental control, but we have a convincing proof of the contrary, in the letter from Mr. Frigon, assistant general manager, who states:

In accordance with instructions received from the federal government, our corporation has placed at the disposal of the administration a certain number of periods on its various networks for the use of speakers who will discuss the plebiscite.

You call it an independent corporation. Yes, to camouflage all the government's propaganda over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's stations.

We had been asked to answer "Yes" or "No", but all those who were in favour of an affirmative answer had the opportunity of speaking over the radio, including the leader of the social credit, Mr. Hanson and Mr. Coldwell.

But all those who were in favour of a "No" vote were prevented from using the facilities of the national network. Even our offer to pay for the use of the radio, was turned down. Let us stop fooling the public by leading them to believe that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is independent while it is a political tool of the government. We hear much talk of freedom, justice and democracy. It would be better to respect those principles in Canada before attempting to enforce them somewhere else.

The 30 per cent of our people who voted "No" and who contribute to the maintenance of the corporation had the same rights as the other 70 per cent who voted "Yes", if it be true that the corporation's object is to ensure the expression of opinions, and that its guiding principles, that I just quoted, are that the radio waves belong to the public and that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has among its objects that of ensuring that the various views on matters relating to questions of foremost importance will be expounded.

Here is a matter of foremost importance, yet the proponents of the negative vote were barred from expressing their views through the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I wish to quote the following excerpt from an article published in Saturday Night by Mr. Sandwell, who is at present, I believe, one of the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I quote:

(Text):

The French-Canadian press is regarding with a sort of cynical amusement the attacks which are being directed against the CBC in connection with the Bracken broadcast and—though these are dying down—the "Things to Come" series. For the French-Canadian press has a long memory, and it is now recalling, with ample justification, the fact that from no English-speaking source did there come any protest against the extraordinary error of policy by which the CBC refused to allow any broadcasting from its stations on the No side of the plebiscite campaign. It is difficult at this distance of time to understand, and quite impossible to justify, that profoundly illogical policy. The people having been asked by their government to express their views upon a specific question, the arguments upon both sides of that question should have been presented with equal freedom. It was not treasonable, it was not even contrary to the defence of Canada regulations, to vote or to argue on the No side. The press was permitted to disseminate No arguments; the private radio stations had equal freedom. But the CBC carried the Yes arguments and the Yes arguments alone. The policy was not only illogical, it was most unwise. Its result in French-Canada was to increase the No vote by creating the impression that the Yes case was being stuffed down the throats of the French Canadians.

We have to express our own penitence for not having raised our voice against this piece of unwisdom at the time. Our only excuse is that we entirely failed to realize its import.

(Translation): I am very glad that Mr. Sandwell has been appointed one of the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I hope that such mistakes will not recur.

Here is another instance. Two or three days after Doctor Gauthier had been appointed organizer for the Bloc Populaire in the Quebec district, he was arrested and it was announced all over the country, through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that Doctor Gauthier, organizer for the Bloc Populaire in the Quebec district, had been arrested and court-martialed. There was no ground for the charge laid in that case, as was shown by the evidence; that fact was known and an attempt was made to bring him into disrepute only because he had just been appointed organizer for the Bloc Populaire. For many weeks that trial was mentioned over the radio, and each time it was stated that Doctor Gauthier was an organizer for the Bloc Populaire. When he was acquitted after the court which tried the case had deliberated for a few minutes only, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation merely announced that Doctor Gauthier had been acquitted. For once, the words "organizer for the Bloc Populaire" were omitted, and some people would afterwards have the public believe that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is not a political organization, that it is a body free from political influence and government interference.

I wanted the public to be aware of these facts. If the complaint is sometimes voiced that we lack confidence in our public men, all I can say is that they well deserve what they get since they have been deluding the people far too long.

One more remark before I conclude. In the course of the debate this afternoon, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) intimated that farmers' sons were no longer called up for military service. I regret to say that I know of cases where such men are still summoned for military duty. I regret to say that some farmers' sons asked for postponement months ago that they might work on the farm, and they have received no reply or have been turned down. I also regret that the inquiry requested by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) concerning happenings in British Columbia where force has been used to have recruits signed up for active service has not been granted. I have received many letters dealing with this matter and a recent message was really heart-rending. It concerned a sick recruit who called on the doctor for treatment. The first question which the doctor asked him was: "Have you signed up for active duty?" As the recruit replied "no," the doctor refused to look after him. These are the means resorted to in order to compel men to enlist for active service. And yet the public is still led to believe that we are following the voluntary system! Well, if we wish to retain the confidence of the public let us cease to mislead them.

(Text):

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker in taking part in this budget debate I intend to restrict my remarks to one particular section of the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), namely, that dealing with trade and tariff policies.

I think we are all agreed that the freer movement of trade in the after-war years is essential not only to our own prosperity but for the peace and welfare of the world as a whole, and any movement made to bring about that desirable end is welcome at this time. I should like, however, to point out to the minister the position of the various countries of the world. They have changed to a remarkable degree during the past five years, and if we are to export our goods to them we must be prepared to take in exchange for our goods either manufactured goods or raw materials from the rest of the world. Every nation both large and small has increased its manufacturing capacity during the war years, and every other nation will be doing just what Canada is doing after the war, seeking to find a market for exportable surpluses. This can mean only one thing, that we must be prepared to take other goods in exchange for our own.

It appears to me that the problem of prosperity after the war is not entirely one of finding export markets but rather one of every nation being able to increase its own capacity to use goods and services. In other words, each individual nation has to organize its internal economy so as to raise the purchasing power and standard of living of its own people, so that we may all be able to use more goods than we were able to consume in the nineteen-thirties. The freer exchange and export of goods has its place but, as I listen to government members and read certain papers in this country, it seems to me that in placing responsibility for a prosperous Canada on export trade alone they are on very narrow ground indeed. As a matter of fact, I think it is just looking for an excuse to go back to the conditions which existed before the war. During the depression years that was the story to which we listened, that we could have prosperity only if other nations were prepared to buy from us larger quantities of goods and services than we were prepared to buy from them. For five years under the Tory government of Mr. Bennett we starved at home in order that we might have a favourable balance of trade and in order that we might export more than we imported. We in this group believe that if we are to have this freer movement of trade which everyone desires we cannot leave it to the exporters and importers. We believe that we must have government export and import boards that will be prepared to give direction and, if necessary, assistance in these exports.

In the past we have only exported when the exporter could make a profit, and to make that profit the exporter very often found that he had to force the price of the article which he was exporting on the domestic market down low enough to make a profit on it when he wanted to export it. Therefore we found that a small exportable surplus of five or ten per cent of any particular article controlled our domestic price. Take beef and butter, for example, before the war, and eggs as another example. Before the war we found that in the summer months in western Canada eggs could be bought at seven cents a dozen, while five months later in November and December the same eggs were worth fifty cents a dozen. No industry can be prosperous with price fluctuations such as that, and the price fluctuations are caused largely by the fact that when surpluses come on the market they have to be exported and the exporter has to force the price down to where he can make a profit on it. On the other hand, we have found that certain companies which had a monopoly and complete control over the price structure of the article which they had to sell have often used our domestic market as a means of bonusing their export trade. We have found this in our cereals. I have seen advertisements, for instance, for breakfast foods made in western Canada in the city of Saskatoon offered for less money in London than had to be paid for them right opposite the factory at home. These conditions have not led in the past to freer trade but rather to restrictions and world cartels and monopolies which have divided the world into economic spheres of influence, which has been one of the major factors in causing world wars in the past.

We believe that the duty of these government export and import boards would be to see to it that we have a freer movement of goods both out of and into Canada. These boards would be used as an instrument of government policy in creating better and larger markets for Canada's exports and controlling our imports so as to fit them into an expanding Canadian economy.

We do not believe, however, as the government does that we should use the fact that other nations are not prepared to go as far as we are as an excuse for doing nothing at home. Our domestic market is our largest market. Up to the outbreak of the war approximately seventy-five per cent of all the goods and services produced in Canada were used here. This is something over which we have complete control, and we cannot say that we have done our best as long as there is one home in Canada that lacks anything which can be produced in this country. This leaves a wide field open, and neither this nor any other government has the right to use the hackneyed excuse that lack of world trade prevents us from having prosperity. It is, after all, only surpluses that we need for export.

In this pre-election budget the Minister of Finance keeps a promise that was given by the Liberals some twenty-five years ago when he removes the tariff on farm implements. In other words, he gave to the implement manufacturing companies twenty-five years notice of the government's intention, and then the government seems to be surprised that these companies have so arranged their business largely to nullify, so far as the farmer is concerned, the beneficial effects of this lower tariff. The minister himself states at page 4183 of Hansard of June 26, 1944:

> Changes in the custom tariff would here and now have little, if any, effect on the supply or cost of goods.

That was the government's experience in the past when they reduced the tariff on farm implements. In 1935 the government reduced the tariff on these products from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, and the price of farm implements promptly went up 4·4 per cent. As a result a committee was set up in Ottawa to investigate the prices of farm implements. That committee brought in certain findings. But have the government done anything about those findings? I am going to read a few as they appear in the minutes and proceedings, report No. 20, on farm implement prices by the special committee appointed by the House of Commons in 1937. I will not read all these recommendations, since there are thirty-six of them, but will read just a few to show what the government have failed to do in carrying out the committee's proposals:

7. That farmers have a right to expect the level of farm implements to be based on the most efficient and economical manufacturing and distribution cost. . . .

13. That the matter of freight rates on farm implements should receive immediate attention with a view to restoring lower rates thereon.

There has been no change in freight rates on farm implements since that time.

22. That indirectly this retention of profits in the United States affected the price level of farm implements in Canada, as the true profits arising out of their Canadian operations were not properly appreciated by the United States companies.

I shall have more to say about that later on.

24. That the companies should encourage the further standardization of replacement parts in the same implements manufactured by different companies and in addition standardization of the implements themselves.

Well, the government has done nothing during the past number of years to see that these recommendations in regard to standardization are carried out.

28. That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive, and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

They have been going up steadily ever since.

29. That the increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies in so far as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

Yet nothing has been done about it.

30. That over the period 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry, during that period. . . .

33. That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

These are recommendations made by the Ottawa committee. As a result of the failure of this government to carry out any of these recommendations, in 1939 a Liberal government in Saskatchewan set up another committee to investigate this matter. On page 10 of sessional paper No. 124 of the Saskatchewan legislature it has this to say with respect to this matter. The findings and recommendations of the select special committee on farm implement prices and distribution include the following:

Early in 1936, the companies announced an increase of price in farm implements amounting to 4·4 per cent as found by the Ottawa committee. It was this particular increase, announced after a substantial reduction in the tariff from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, that gave rise to the Ottawa inquiry. Despite a further reduction in the tariff to 7½ per cent and despite the findings of the Ottawa committee that this increase was not justified and that the prices of farm implements had been, over the years 1913-1936, too high, despite, too, a definite finding that there was an excessive mark-up over cost on cream separators and repair parts, and that the prices of these should be particularly and substantially reduced, this committee finds that none of these findings were given effect to, and that, in addition, further price increases occurred in 1937.

As this report states, the dominion government set up in 1937 a special committee to investigate this matter, and despite the fact that they spent thousands of dollars in this investigation and made the findings some of which I have read into the record to-night, they failed to follow up the investigation by taking any concrete action to give effect to those findings. As a matter of fact, the only people who made anything out of those proceedings were the counsel hired by the government, and they were paid a nice fat fee for their services on the various commissions. It was as a result of this that in 1939 a Liberal government set up another committee. They, too, brought in certain recommendations, but —again—the government failed to take any action with respect to them. I am going to read some of the things which the Saskatchewan investigation committee recommended. It states, on page 27 of its report:

This committee is of the opinion that, in the light of the findings in these two reports—

That is, the Ottawa report and the Saskatchewan report.

—and because of the general knowledge of the maintenance of prices at a given level by all companies engaged in the industry, a fair inference can be drawn that a tacit agreement exists between the companies to maintain substantially uniform prices above the level justified by manufacturing and distribution costs plus a reasonable profit.

This committee made a recommendation which, as stated on page 47 of the report, is as follows:

That, as the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act of the dominion appear to have been violated by the major companies in the industry, consideration should be given to instituting proceedings under the said act.

I ask this government if they have taken any action with regard to this monopoly control of the price of farm implements. Did the Saskatchewan government take any action with regard to it? None whatever. One of the reasons for the defeat of the Saskatchewan government in the last election was that they had taken no concrete action with respect to the findings of this committee. I say further that one of the reasons for the defeat of the present government when they go to the polls this fall will be the fact that they have failed to take any concrete action with regard to the findings of this committee and other committees which have been set up by this government. It reminds me of a story which an old gentleman who was the chairman of one of my recent meetings in the west told me. He said that the present old political parties reminded him very much of a flock of old hens which he kept over one year; he said they did an awful lot of cackling for all the eggs they laid. That has been the position of the present government; they have done a lot of cackling for all the concrete action which they have put into effect to remedy some of these things.

Mr. GARDINER: Do you think the new government will take action?

Mr. WRIGHT: We will wait and see about that. If they are as remiss in their activities as the last government was, they will probably suffer the same fate; but I do not think they will be.

It would therefore appear that, from our experience as farmers in the past, we can have little hope of any material lowering of the cost of implements through the present reduction in the tariff, unless the government is prepared to go further than it has ever done in the past and to see that these reductions are passed on to the consumer. Where we have international companies operating on both sides of the border they are able to flout any change in tariff and to maintain the price structures in both countries at whatever level they see fit. At the present time there is little, if any competition in the farm machine industry. I have here an extract from a speech delivered by Professor A. B. Macdonald speaking at a convention of the Canadian live stock cooperatives, maritimes, in Moncton, in December of last year. He said that monopolistic control had reduced the standard of living of farmers steadily over the past sixty-five years.

Farmers throughout the maritimes, he declared, were compelled to pay the highest prices for needed commodities while receiving only the lowest prices for their produce. In 1905 there were 503 manufacturers of farm machinery in Canada and the United States. In 1927 there were, as a result of mergers, only twenty-five and in 1942 there were only eight, with two of these controlling ninety per cent of Canadian sales.

Mr. GARDINER: Under a socialist government there would be only one.

Mr. WRIGHT: I shall have something further to say about that later on, as to who will control that company. In the report of the committee appointed in the United States in 1935 to investigate the farm machine industry the following appears:

> The effect on prices of this concentration of production is such that, with respect to the most important farm implements, the prices established by the leading manufacturers, especially International Harvester Company and Deere and Company, constitute in so far as the machines are of a closely similar character, the price level which all manufacturers observe.

The Saskatchewan committee in investigating this phase of the matter state:

> This committee has noted the simultaneous increases which have been put into effect by all of the companies, since 1935, and have taken notice of the well known fact that, generally speaking, the price of each comparable implement is fixed at approximately the same amount by each company marketing such an implement.

The Ottawa committee, appointed by this government, state:

> The committee is of the opinion, as a result of the above finding, that there is competition in the matter of securing sales but little or no effective competition in the matter of prices as between companies. . . . The companies state that it is the practice in the industry to exchange price lists and it may well be that this practice enables the companies to quickly gain uniformity in the matter of price levels.

Now you have the opinion of every committee that has been appointed, and I think it is quite evident from these findings that if this government is genuine in its desire to assist the farmers it will have to go much further and take further action than simply the removal of tariffs from farm implements. I would ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to remove the dumping duty on the importation of farm implements and parts? That is to say, if farmers or a cooperative wish to go over to the United States and go bargain hunting for cheaper implements, should they secure such implements will they be allowed to import them without duty, or will the dumping duty be placed on them and the retail price in the United States paid? This is a very important matter if we are to get any benefit from the reduction in tariff, and I believe it is something which the minister will have to take into consideration.

I am strongly of the opinion that if the government is genuine in its desire to help the farming industry one of the best ways in which it can do so is by assisting the cooperatives in western Canada in entering the farm machine industry. That was the finding of the Saskatchewan committee, and it was one of the recommendations of the Ottawa committee. As indicated in the Saskatchewan report at page 29, the committee—

> . . . recommends the development in this province of a cooperative movement among the farmers to handle and distribute farm implements with a view to substantially reducing the cost. The committee feels that the farmers of this province, individually, and collectively in such cooperative groups, should have every source of supply opened up to them if their efforts to reduce prices are to be successful.

One of the ways in which this government might assist in this matter is by seeing, when the war is over, that government plant and equipment which might be suitable for the manufacturing of farm implements should be turned over to the cooperatives already formed in western Canada for the purpose of manufacturing and distributing implements at reasonable prices, and every assistance should be given them in supplying their needs.

In 1939, as a result of the Saskatchewan investigation, Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited, a cooperative company, was set up with head offices in Regina, to take definite action with respect to the manufacture and distribution of farm implements. It was incorporated under dominion act with an authorized capitalization of $1 million, and a large portion of this capitalization has already been collected in cash from the farmers supporting this cooperative in the west. The cooperative, however, have been unable to obtain the allotment of farm machinery because they were not in operation prior to the setting up of the wartime prices and trade board. They are at the present time affiliated with United States cooperatives and have bought a manufacturing plant in the United States which is now engaged in manufacturing war supplies but which, immediately on the conclusion of the war, will be used for the manufacture of tractors for distribution cooperatively in both the United States and Canada. It is only reasonable to expect that this government should first give to this cooperative a quota of farm implements and repair parts. That is something the government should see to immediately, as soon as implements are available.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. GARDINER: That has already been taken care of.

Mr. WRIGHT: Well, they are certainly not able to distribute farm machinery as yet; the only thing they handle is second-hand machinery.

Mr. GARDINER: The correspondence in the matter has got to the point where understandings are being reached.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am glad to hear that and I hope that something definite is done about it. It is over two years since the company was set up.

In the second place the government should see to it that, after the war, plant and equipment are made available to the cooperative for manufacturing any particular line of cooperative farm implements in the dominion that they wish. As shown in these reports, to all intents and purposes a monopoly in this industry exists in Canada and the United States, and this monopoly has flouted the government in the matter of reducing prices when tariffs were reduced. In fact, the Saskatchewan committee, at page 35 of their report, state:

> This committee is of the opinion that, where a reduction in duty does not result in a reduction in price, it is because of a tacit agreement between the leaders in industry that the savings resulting from the tariff reductions will not be reflected in a lower price and the resultant maintenance of the former and unjustified price level. The committee is further of the opinion that, where the effect of such reductions in duty is ignored by the companies concerned, this should be constantly and persistently brought to the attention of the consuming public. If this is done, the committee believes that it will have a salutary effect on the companies and that, as a result, the companies engaged in the industry will be forced to pass the savings on to the consumer.

What a pious hope, that one of these monopolies in the United States will be affected by public opinion in Canada when our own government has not backbone enough to institute proceedings against them under an act which the government itself has drawn up and which it admits that it believes the companies are flouting!

Mr. GARDINER: The act provides that any six people can start action.

Mr. WRIGHT: I must say that this public opinion has never had the desired effect in the past, and I would strongly urge that the government take definite steps at this time to see that the 7½ per cent tariff reduction is passed on to the farmer, together with the ten per cent reduction in the war exchange tax. The only reason given by the companies for not passing on these benefits to the consumers was that they were losing money on their Canadian companies. This fact, however, was not borne out by evidence submitted both to the committee in Ottawa and to the committee in Regina. The Ottawa committee found that the International Harvester company, Deere and Company, and other companies in a similar position when importing from the United States to serve the Canadian market, retained substantial profits arising out of the Canadian business, and that in examining the Canadian results no consideration was given to this amount retained in the United States being properly attributable to the Canadian business. To illustrate, in the period 1926 to 1935 inclusive, which it will be noted included five quite abnormal depression years, the International Harvester Company showed in its Canadian books a profit of $7,500,000 before payment of income tax. However, it was found that an additional $17,000,000 of profits had been retained in the United States, making the total profits accruing from the Canadian business some $24,000,000. In excuse the company stated that they were of the opinion that unless they invoiced all their goods to the Canadian company at a fair market value as determined by the Department of National Revenue, a dumping duty would be imposed. That is why I say it is very important that this government do something about the dumping duty.

In view of all these investigations and the findings which have been brought down I would strongly urge upon the government the desirability of either establishing a government-owned plant for the manufacture of farm implements in Canada immediately after the war, or giving the necessary assistance to enable the cooperatives of western Canada to establish a plant of their own in order to break this monopoly which, without doubt, exists in the farm implement industry in Canada.

This government has paid a great deal of lip-service to cooperatives. I should like to see it lay a few eggs that would be of some benefit to the cooperative industry. The Canadian federation of agriculture and various other agricultural bodies throughout Canada have been urging the necessity of a cooperative act in Canada. I should like to read from a booklet entitled, "Post-War Reconstruction for Agriculture", issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in which they say:

> Canada would be well advised to go all-out in encouraging people's cooperatives as a positive feature of reconstruction policy.
> A federal cooperative act, to clearly define the principles, the rights and the place of cooperatives in our national economy is needed at once.

While paying this lip-service the government has failed to clarify the position of the cooperatives in Canada with respect to taxation. Therefore I say that two things which should be done immediately are these. The government should give assistance to the cooperatives in western Canada which have been formed for the purpose of manufacturing and distributing machinery, and should bring in at this session a cooperative act which will clarify the position of the cooperatives with regard to taxation in Canada.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 5, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. W. ROSS MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the conciseness and clarity of his budget address. May I also pay a tribute to him for the manner in which he has directed our country's financial policy. It must indeed be a source of great satisfaction to him to know that other nations have adopted these policies which have prevented a vicious spiral of rising prices, otherwise known as inflation. In past wars this has not always been possible. I would remind the house that during the last great war prices rose sharply. Perhaps I could give a few instances. In 1919 flour sold at $7 a bag; to-day it sells for $3.10. Sugar reached 25 cents a pound in 1919; to-day it is only 8 or 9 cents a pound. Butter sold for 80 cents a pound; to-day you can buy it for 38 cents. Eggs cost $1 a dozen; to-day you can buy them in any store for 43 cents a dozen.

Canadians should indeed be proud. Not only have other countries adopted our fiscal policies and our plans for the rehabilitation of our armed forces; they have marvelled at the great industry of our industrial workers and our farmers who have produced such prodigious quantities of war equipment and food. Over and above all this is the crowning glory which comes to us through the gallant deeds of our soldiers, sailors and airmen. The Right Hon. Peter Fraser, speaking in this house on Friday last, paid great tribute to Canada when he said:

> The fact that 800,000 men and women have been enrolled in the forces, and the further fact that 2,000,000 persons are taking part in the industrial war effort of this country, are sufficiently eloquent and convincing testimony as to the whole-hearted way in which Canada has thrown itself, without reserve, into what it knew was a struggle for the existence of all that is decent in the life of mankind.

Canada and her allies among the united nations are by nature peace loving people. We were not prepared for war in 1939, and it has taken us four years to attain maximum production. To-day we are geared to a high tempo in war production. It is only natural therefore that there should be few changes in the budget.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), whom I should like to congratulate upon being recently elevated to the important post of financial critic of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition—had very little to say of a critical nature with respect to the budget. In one sentence he objected to the abolition of compulsory savings on the ground that it would result in lowered financial returns to the government and might start an inflationary trend. Then, in the very next sentence, on behalf of his party he proposed even greater reductions. If a small reduction would cause an inflationary trend, surely a greater reduction would cause a greater inflationary trend. I have never heard anything more inconsistent and more insincere—and this, I may say, from a party that prides itself on total war.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. I think I heard the hon. member say that the statement of the member for Dufferin-Simcoe was insincere. If he did say that I ask him to withdraw it. I know he would not intend such a reflection.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): If I said "insincere" I withdraw it, but I did not intend to say it. I believe I used the word "inconsistent".

Let us consider income taxation as it affects those in the lower income brackets. We all feel that we are heavily taxed, but we should not forget that under the proposed budget an unmarried person earning less than $1,100 per year and a married person earning less than $1,600 per year are the lowest taxed persons in the whole civilized world. The proposed changes will affect thousands of girls who are working in factories and as stenographers and clerks in the smaller cities and towns. They will now have deducted just one-half of what was deducted in the past.

A married person with two children making up to $2,000 a year, and a married person without children making up to $1,800 a year, will have only half the deduction that was formerly made. Taxpayers who have not taken allowances for insurance will also find their cheques considerably increased. By the amendment the opposition would abolish certain income taxes, but if you will notice the wording of the amendment you will see that nothing is said as to whether they would abolish compulsory savings.

If the taxpayers are to continue to pay compulsory savings, the amount of reduction in the lower income brackets would be no greater than under the proposed changes in the budget. As I have pointed out, these people are now paying the lowest tax in the world. A single person in Canada earning $800 a year pays less than 87 cents a week, and a married person with two children earning $1,600 pays 51 cents a week. With Canada's income tax for the wage-earner the lowest in the world, does anyone think that a further reduction would raise our prestige with the united nations which may be having greater difficulty in financing than we are? What do you think the boys overseas would say now that the hour of conflict has come for them, now that the hour of battle has arrived when many of them must pay with their lives, if they heard that the people in Canada, who are paying the lowest income tax in the world, were to cease paying taxes altogether? I was impressed by an article in the Brantford Expositor, written by Hal Boyle, Associated Press war columnist, who stated:

> The boys overseas have an idea that the people at home still think of the war as a ball game—and that they are enjoying the seventh inning stretch.
> It does look like if all the energy being used in fighting the battle of the income tax could be expended on the battle of the Anzio beachhead, Rome would fall in short order.

If I know Canadians, Mr. Speaker, they would resent any further reductions in income tax at the present time. I am confident that they will cheerfully pay the present taxes, which are the lowest amongst the united nations, and are practically nothing when compared with what the boys overseas are paying.

The financial critic of the opposition did not confine himself to finance, but had to advise on military affairs also. He complained about the use or non-use which was being made of our so-called home army. At the outset of his remarks I expected a bold forthright statement of policy on this question, but in that wavering, vacillating, typically Tory fashion he talked all around the subject and said nothing definite. But after all, how can anyone expect anything definite from him, when he gets different leads from different leaders and no lead at all from one leader? Charles McTague said that the home defence army should all go overseas immediately, while John Bracken, according to a certain section of the press, mumbled a nervous approval, which he has never since confirmed; and during all this time the house leader of the one-time mighty Tory party sits in this house in an uncomfortable silence. I have read and reread the amendment, and the only conclusion that anyone can come to is that the Conservative party would disband the home defence army and send them back to civilian life to pick off all the good civilian jobs before the boys return from overseas, and that is one thing that I will oppose with all my strength. As long as there are good civilian jobs let us retain as many of them as we can for the boys to get when they come home. That is the very least we can do.

I may be asked what I would do with the home army. I would hold them in reserve for reinforcements. They are highly trained and they are an efficient body of men. If our soldiers who recently stormed the shores of Normandy and have now started on their long and arduous trek to Berlin must have reinforcements, these men should and will be sent. Some say that reinforcements will never be needed. I hope they are right, but do not be too sure about it. This war is not yet won. Germany is still a resourceful and a formidable foe. The end may come soon, but we must not take too much for granted.

Suppose it does cost $150,000,000 a year to maintain the home defence force. Is it not far better to spend that large sum of money and win the day than to disband this force and lose everything? Let us not forget that for four years we spent many times $150,000,000 a year to prepare our soldiers to fight in Sicily, in Italy and in France, and if the day comes when the men of the home army should be sent overseas, no one will begrude the cost of their training. If we take the advice of the official opposition in this house and disband this force, and should there not be reinforcements when they are needed, then Canadians for generations to come will hang their heads in shame. No, Mr. Speaker, this force must not be disbanded. It must be held in reserve to fill the gaps when reinforcements are called for.

While I am referring to the armed forces there are two questions I should like to mention which I trust are not entirely irrelevant to the budget. The first one is with respect to the allowance paid to mothers of men who are serving overseas. At the present time as the house is aware, a dependent mother receives $25 per month, together with $20 assigned pay from her son. She is also allowed to earn $40 from work which she might do. But imagine, Mr. Speaker, an invalid mother trying to live on the magnificent sum of $45 a month. On the other hand, a wife receives $35 a month, together with cost of living bonus, together with a minimum assignment of pay of $23 a month, and an allowance for each child. Personally I could never see why mothers are discriminated against. I understand it is stated that there is a different legal responsibility. I took the time to look over the statutes of the various provinces, and I find that in six of the provinces, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, there are statutes which require a son to support his parents. Section 166 of the Quebec civil code has this wording:

> Children are bound to maintain their father, mother or other ascendants who are in want.

In the other provinces I have mentioned the acts are known as the Parents' Maintenance Act, and these statutes state that a son or daughter shall be liable for his or her dependent parents.

I would also draw the attention of the house to section 242 of the criminal code, which makes a man criminally liable if through neglect a parent's health is or is likely to be permanently impaired. So that there is little if any difference legally between the obligation on the part of a son to maintain his mother and the obligation of a husband to maintain his wife. Accordingly I trust that the allowances to mothers and wives will be equalized.

The other matter to which I would refer is the clothing allowance which is given to a soldier when he is discharged. At the present time he is given $65 for that purpose. I am bound to say that I do not think he can clothe himself properly on that amount. How the amount was arrived at I do not know. Recently I visited a number of stores and obtained the prices of clothing. Here are the average prices: Hat, $5.00; cap, $1.75; two shirts, $4.00; B.V.D's, $3.00; socks, $2.25; shoes, $8.00; suit, $35.00; extra working trousers, $7.00 and overcoat, $35.00, amounting in all to $101.00. I have not included a spring overcoat, overalls, handkerchiefs, et cetera. From these figures I think the house will realize that a man cannot possibly clothe himself on $65. He may possibly get by in the summer, but in the winter, when he has to have an overcoat and other clothing, he cannot buy them unless he receives from $100 to $125. Again I would ask the government to consider raising the clothing allowance, before the snow flies, in any event.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I revert once again to the budget? There is but one tariff change, and by that change farm implements are placed on the free list. I am somewhat disappointed that not one member of this house who has taken part in this debate so far has concerned himself with the effect that this reduction may have on the workers in these implement factories. Every speaker has either approved the change or has remained silent. I therefore must take it that all parties agree on this tariff change.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Therefore it remains for me alone to plead within this chamber that some consideration be given to the men who toil in these plants. One of the foremost policies of the Liberal party is consideration for the men who work in factories, and as long as I have breath in my lungs I shall fight in the interests of these working men.

The tariff has always been a lively controversial issue. The Liberal party, true to its pledge, year in and year out when it has been in power has consistently reduced the tariff.

Mr. GRAYDON: It said it would.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I repeat that it has consistently year in and year out, when in power, reduced the tariff.

Mr. GRAYDON: I said, it said it would.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): In fact the Liberal party in its reduction of tariffs has stood against the forces of the world, and its policy has been vindicated by events; the tariff policy of the Prime Minister of this county (Mr. Mackenzie King) is now that of the leaders of the united nations. Every statesman of the united nations has pledged himself to remove tariff barriers. I am in complete accord with that aim. It is not the reduction in the tariff of which I complain but rather the manner or the method by which it was done. The united nations have virtually agreed to reduce tariffs by a multilateral agreement. The farm implement tariff was taken off through no agreement whatsoever with any country; it is the only tariff item affected; and it is for that reason I protest. There is discrimination. It is said that this will not affect industry. It may not affect the industry at the present time, but what about the future? Who can tell what the effect will be when there is no shortage of supplies and when all farm implement companies can get all the material that is necessary to turn out these implements?

With the consent of all hon. members there is no doubt that this tariff change will be put into effect. All I can do is to plead with hon. members to see what effect this tariff change will have on the working men in these factories. I ask their sympathetic consideration for these men.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Get them to move west.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am rather concerned that my hon. friend from British Columbia has no more consideration for these workers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the farmers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): He above all others should have consideration for these workers, many of whom served in the last war, as he did,—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did not the farmers serve too?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): —and many of whom are working long hours in this war. It is not a question of setting the worker against the farmer, as some people would do; we must consider Canada as a whole. Nobody wants to injure the farmer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman who is speaking must not be interrupted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I would not now delay the house further on this question, but when the resolution is before the house I shall have something to say as to the effect of this reduction both on the farmers and on the workers.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Make your motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must again call the attention of hon. members on all sides of the house to the fact that the hon. member who has the floor must not be interrupted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I much appreciate your remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I may mention that I do not mind a few interruptions.

As I said before, as far as the removal of the tariff on farm implements is concerned, I have waited all these days for someone to get up and say something on behalf of the workmen in that industry.

I should now like to address myself for a short time to something which I trust is not too far in the future; I refer to the days of reconstruction which will follow the war. The government is now making plans to see that returning warriors and people in the munitions factories are given employment when the war is over. We must never forget that our soldiers, our sailors and our airmen offered their lives to keep Canada free. They made it possible for us to follow our Canadian way of life, and I trust that we shall make it possible for them to have employment when they return to their homes. I trust also that no member of the armed forces will be discharged against his will from the forces until he has a job to which he can go. The men and women in the munitions factories must also be provided for; work will have to be found for them too.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has suggested that five billion dollars be set aside for this purpose over the two-year period immediately following the cessation of hostilities. With the principle of that suggestion I am not at variance; I would however suggest that no limit should be mentioned; whatever amount is necessary to find work for our people should be found. Our government is pledged to that policy. The Prime Minister, speaking last year before the American Federation of Labour, stated that that was the objective which he held most important. The words he used were, "useful employment for all who are willing to work." In other words the government must be responsible for seeing that jobs are provided for all willing workers. No limit, not even five billion dollars in the two year period, should be placed on the amount required for that purpose. Whatever funds are necessary, private funds as well as public funds, must be utilized for that purpose, and whatever jobs are not provided by private industry must be provided by public enterprise.

I would, however, emphasize that large quantities of money will not alone solve our problems of the future. Other nations have obtained large quantities of money by printing press methods, and in every instance it has resulted in national financial disaster, invariably causing great suffering to every man, woman and child in the country concerned. Nevertheless the supply of money can be increased within certain limits. Just what those limits should be no one at the moment can say. We do know, however, that beyond that limit lies national disaster. Our national financing in the years immediately following the war must be directed by men who are bold enough to go forward and cautious enough to avoid the pitfalls that have invariably brought about financial disaster. The necessity of supplying war materials has taught us much about financing our domestic needs. These lessons we must carry into the peace. The governor of the Bank of Canada and the deputy minister of Finance and their associates have made bold financial strides during the last few years, and I am confident that they will go forward with equal boldness in the years to come. The Minister of Finance has stated publicly that we have learned very much and gone a long way in our development in Canada during the past four years. I join with him in stating that when the war is over we shall turn our financial capacity to the improvement of the Canadian standard of living. Here are his words:

> During the war our economic controls and our financial and productive efforts have had to be directed to the destruction of the enemy. We have had to restrict our general standard of living, while protecting that of those near the minimum, in order that we could attain the highest possible standard of fighting. When the war is over, however, we must and will, I believe, turn our economic management, our newly found productive power and our financial capacity to the improvement of the Canadian standard of living. It is then that we shall reap the fruits of the peace we have secured and of the experience which we have gained.

Without doubt the years that are before us will be years of great stress and strain. We need at the helm of all branches of government men of tolerance and experience. The peace conference will not only settle the terms which we shall impose upon our adversaries but will also plan for the future of mankind. There is one statesman in Canada who has far greater knowledge of the intricacies of international law than any other man in this country, and to my mind as great a knowledge as anyone in the world. Recently our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) visited Great Britain and attended the imperial conference, and I believe that members of all parties in this house will join with me when I say that he brought great credit to himself and also to the country of his birth. He alone has an intimate acquaintanceship with the President of the United States and with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Canada must send her most outstanding statesman to the peace conference, and if the people of Canada will sit down quietly and consider the qualifications and experience of all Canadians, they must come to the conclusion that Canada's representative at the peace conference must be our present Prime Minister.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Before I discuss the budget and the amendment thereto, I wish to say a few words of encouragement to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). For many years now he has been carrying a great burden, certainly one of the heaviest burdens carried by any man in public life in Canada. At times his work must become very discouraging, and yet I think he should know that from one coast of Canada to the other people admire him for his devotion to duty and for his great sincerity. Personally, while I cannot always agree with the stand he takes—in fact sometimes I think he is rather foolish—I must say I greatly value our personal friendship.

In introducing his budget the other day the minister set out that in framing it he had kept in mind four basic considerations. They will be found at page 4174 of Hansard, and are these: The first consideration was the huge cash requirements that must be raised by the Canadian people during the present fiscal year. They amount to in excess of $6 billion, which is nearly $16½ million for every day of the year. He stated that about $2,800 million of that amount would be raised by taxation of one kind or another, and that the balance of over $3,200 million would have to be borrowed from the Canadian people. That of course is a prime consideration. The second consideration he listed was the urgent need for greater production. He described that in the following words:

> The second consideration is the urgent need to achieve and maintain the highest possible production of goods and services of which our available working force and management is capable. The urgency of production is very great, and it is immediate. This is not a matter of building up a great organization from which output will flow in one or two years time. The need is for maximum production now—from our present capacity and working force. It cannot be met except by maximum production per person.

The third consideration was the desirability of relieving certain hardships and anomalies in our taxation structure, and the fourth and final basic consideration was given by the minister as the need to prepare for the post-war period. This he expressed as follows:

> Finally we have felt it necessary to keep in mind that we are nearer the end of the European phase of the war than we were.

He went on, quite properly I thought, to explain that the war was not yet won, that we were really just getting into the toughest part of the fighting, and then he said:

> Nevertheless it is no more than prudent to give sober consideration to some of the problems which will arise when we are able to release some portion of our productive capacity for the purposes of peace.

I thought he might have added a fifth basic consideration, and in the course of his speech he really did place great emphasis upon it; it was that great reliance is to be placed during the present fiscal year on voluntary support. He mentioned the national war finance committee and praised their work and the support given by the Canadian people, and again I thought he was quite right in doing so. The way the Canadian people have responded to the calls for money has been inspiring. It shows what can be done by Canadians if they direct their energies to the reaching of an objective and work as one united group of people. I really think we could have here what Eric Johnston, the brilliant young president of the United States chamber of commerce has called "America Unlimited". We could have here "Canada Unlimited". We can build this nation into one of the greatest nations of the world. The way in which the Canadian people have responded to the call for funds shows what wonderful things can be accomplished.

After going carefully over the budget speech I came to the conclusion that it was much the same type of speech that might have been delivered toward the end of the first great war, perhaps in the year 1918. It is true that the budget reflects the attitude of the ministry, but I am convinced that it does not reflect the attitude of the Canadian people, that it does not meet present-day conditions, and that it is not in line with present-day thoughts. Throughout, the speech and the budget overlook the attitude of the ordinary man and woman in Canada, of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck and their family. They are the vast majority of our people; they are Canada. They are the ones who, with a son and perhaps also a daughter in the forces, are doing the war work; they are primarily responsible for the war effort of Canada. These ordinary men and women of Canada are the ones who are buying most of the bonds and obeying the laws and regulations no matter how foolish they think them to be. They are the ones who are getting the telegrams containing messages of death or the information that a loved one is missing.

Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck and their family are intelligent, thoughtful, idealistic, courageous, and freedom-loving. They have been doing a lot of thinking in the last few years. They have been through difficult, almost impossible times; they have been through two wars. Every one of them is uneasy at the present time because of the many restrictions on his or her freedom, and is wondering about the post-war years. They are all determined that there must be work for everyone who is willing to work; that there must be reasonable security for all Canadian people. They are not only asking that preparations be made for the post-war period but looking for some sign of this fine new world which has been promised to them by so many public men and which they have the right to expect. They are greatly concerned, and I think that most thoughtful members of the house will agree with me—I know that all hon. members are thoughtful—that they are filled with a sense of frustration. Whether this government is to blame for that or not, the fact remains that by and large the Canadian people are filled with a sense of frustration.

Obviously this budget was not drawn with them in mind. It shows no realization of their attitude; it shows no plan to help them to become established in the post-war world and to keep on their feet. There is very little indication that the ministry had that in mind in drawing up this budget. Therefore I make bold to suggest to the Minister of Finance that he give careful consideration to each paragraph of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party, and to any other suggestions that come out in the course of the debate on the budget or on the budget resolutions. I believe that the amendment moved on behalf of my party more nearly meets present-day conditions than the budget. It is more nearly in line with the thoughts of the ordinary men and women of Canada. I cannot deal to-day with all of the paragraphs of the amendment, but I propose to deal with some of them.

In effect, the first one advocates that adequate steps be taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation. At the present time our income tax system is a wonder to behold. Like Topsy in that famous old book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," it "jest growed," and during the war years it has grown faster and in many more directions than it did in years of peace. The position now is such that many people find it extremely difficult to make out income tax returns accurately The good citizen is worried about that. He wants to do what is fair by the country; he wants to do his duty, but he finds it almost impossible to make out those new tax returns. The result is that many people have to engage someone to help them, perhaps a lawyer, a notary public or an accountant. People all over Canada are worried about these income tax forms. I realize that some attempt has been made to simplify them, but I suggest to the minister that they must be simplified a great deal more. The Income War Tax Act should be gone over with a fine-tooth comb and simplified so that the ordinary citizen can make some sense out of it. I find that many of the income tax officers themselves have great difficulty in understanding the provisions of the act; a simplification would be of benefit to them as well as to the ordinary taxpayer.

Then, as to the methods of taxation. Here there is great danger of bureaucracy running wild; perhaps there is the greatest danger of all to the freedom of the Canadian people in just such things as the methods by which they are taxed. The great majority of our people are honest, even about income taxes; yet some officers—I do not say all the officers, but too many of them in the departments that collect our revenues, treat the people as suspect. A person is treated as a criminal until he proves himself innocent. It is not a case of the customer being right, but of always being wrong. Some assessors are apt to forget that they are the servants of the Canadian people and not their masters. The great weakness is that at the present time there is no effective check on those government officers; there is no effective control over them; hence it is quite possible for bureaucracy to run wild. I have here a letter from a responsible business man in Vancouver carrying on his own business, not in a large way. He complains about the manner in which small firms have been dealt with. He says:

> Hundreds—

I will not endorse that. I shall use the word "many" just to be on the safe side.

> Many have left the office—

That is the income tax office.

> —bullied and insulted, and burning with resentment, with a full knowledge that they were being imposed upon and "gypped". And yet, after a short time, they paid the assessments so that they could get the worry off their minds and get on with their business, knowing well the difficulties and costs of appeal.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is in the Vancouver office, is it?

Mr. GREEN: This is in reference to the Vancouver office. The minister may reply that there is provision already for appeals against assessments. It is true there is an appeal, first of all to the Minister of National Revenue, which in effect means to the senior officers of that department, and then the taxpayer may appeal to the exchequer court. But he has to put up $400 as security for costs; he has to incur the expense of engaging a solicitor; he is let in for all kinds of expenditures, with the result that for Jack Canuck, the ordinary Canadian, there is no appeal. He just decides that it is cheaper not to fight, that he might as well pay, and for the rest of his life or at least for a very long time he will harbour resentment against the government and against our whole system. This makes it so much harder for him to be a cheerful, willing citizen. I suggest, therefore, to the government that there should be some cheap and summary appeal in cases which do not involve large amounts of money. Perhaps some arrangement might be made for an appeal to the local county court judge. All these county court judges are very highly respected in their districts; they understand conditions, and I believe could very well handle appeals from income tax assessments. You see, Mr. Speaker, the war has caused hundreds of thousands of people to pay income tax for the first time. They have come in contact with the income tax officers, and probably will remain in contact with them for many years to come, during which time the income tax probably will be very heavy and will affect a very large number of the citizens of this country. I cannot stress too strongly the importance of having the Canadian people feel that in these income tax matters they are being treated fairly and that their rights are being preserved.

I propose also to say a few words about the second paragraph of the amendment, which advocates effective action to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income tax brackets by raising the exemption for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum. If the exemptions were increased it would help Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck, the ordinary men and women of Canada, prepare for the post-war period. The budget makes provision for helping business prepare for that period. The minister dealt with the matter at page 4174 of Hansard, where he said:

> I am concerned only with clearing away some of the uncertainties of fiscal policy—opening the way for business firms, both large and small, to proceed on as definite as possible a basis with the drawing up of plans for the post-war conversion and expansion of industry and trade on which employment after the war will depend.

I have no quarrel with that, though I think the provisions mentioned by the minister will work mainly to the advantage of large businesses as distinguished from small businesses. It is quite clear that the government is relying upon the individual initiative of business men to provide employment in Canada after the war, rather than upon stateism which of course means the government running everything. I entirely agree with that policy; I think it is right, but I suggest the government should also rely upon and encourage the initiative of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck. The initiative of the individual Canadian is of tremendous value to this country. Sometimes it is very easy to overlook that fact, but actually Canada was built by the initiative of her people. Canadian troops made their name, both in the last war and in this war, primarily because they displayed as much initiative as any other troops, if not more, and I believe that encouraging the initiative of individual Canadians will result in most of our people being put to work when the war is over; that initiative must not be smothered, as it would be by stateism. At the same time, mind you, it is certainly the duty of any government to prevent unfairness and strictly control monopolies.

There is one way we can help the Canadian people prepare for the post-war period; that is, by increasing these income tax exemptions. Take the men who are being discharged and who will be discharged from the armed forces. Already they number almost 150,000, and more are being discharged at the rate of three or four thousand a month. These men come back and begin to reestablish themselves; at once they are faced with this very heavy income tax, which makes it just that much more difficult for them ever to get a start. Then there is the wage-earner who went through the depression days and has never had a real chance to get back on his feet. There are thousands of office workers, both men and women. There are thousands of small business men; thousands of low salaried men and women; thousands of people working on their own, such as salesmen on commission, taxi proprietors, men doing odd jobs and engaged in many other occupations. By and large these people are the backbone of Canada, and getting them started in the post-war period, encouraging their initiative, is of vital importance to the country. It is not a wise plan to bleed them now, just as we are about to enter the post-war years. Yet in this budget there is no attempt to increase exemptions. The minister has gone the other way; he has wiped out compulsory savings. Personally I think it would have been wiser to increase the exemptions, retain the compulsory saving, and to extend the contractual payments allowed as offsets such as premiums on life insurance policies, and principal payments on a mortgage. Those allowances might well have been extended. Perhaps they might have included the payment of other debts, so that many of our Canadian citizens for once in their lives could get out of debt. Consideration might have been given also to providing some offset in connection with the construction of new homes, and so on. If the income tax exemptions had been increased and the compulsory savings retained there would have been very little loss to the treasury during the war period. I grant that it would have meant repaying compulsory savings after the war, but during these critical times it would have given people a better chance to accumulate something with which to reestablish themselves in the post war years.

The third paragraph of the amendment, to which I wish to refer, is as follows:

(c) This house regrets that no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting overtime pay from income tax.

I ask hon. members to remember the second basic consideration of the minister in framing the budget. That was the urgent need for greater production. We must keep in mind the fact that the average Canadian man and woman has been working under great pressure during all the war years. Many Canadians have been doing extra jobs. Men are taking training at nights in the reserve army or are doing A.R.P. work. Many are doing part-time work in the evening after spending all day at their regular jobs. Women are working for the Red Cross and are carrying on innumerable other activities. Our people have been working very hard, and all the time they have been under the constant worry which comes with any war. Our people are weary, and I suggest that when they work overtime the pay they receive should be exempted from taxation. I believe that would help greatly in increasing production until the end of the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is impractical and inequitable, as I will show.

Mr. GREEN: Nevertheless I make my submission believing that it is well worth consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: There might be even a better opinion than that of the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give my reason, but nobody else has given his.

Mr. GREEN: I do not propose to deal at the present time with paragraphs 4 and 5 of the amendment. One concerns agriculture and the other has to do with our vitally important mining industry; but there will be opportunity to discuss these matters when the budget resolutions are under consideration.

The sixth paragraph reads:

This house regrets that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150,000,000 per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent.

I would like to carry the thoughts of hon. members back to June, 1940. I am sure that those who were here at that time, and most hon. members were, will remember those terrible dark days. I well remember blue Monday, June 10, when we were informed of the death of the late Norman Rogers, that great friend to all members in the house, who had been killed in such a tragic way. That was the day that Italy struck at France, and our whole civilized world seemed to be falling down about our ears. At that time the house properly passed what was known as the National Resources Mobilization Act, which in effect gave the government of Canada the power to utilize all the resources of the country, both human and material, in whatever way they were needed for the successful prosecution of the war. There was only one exception, that the men called up under the act could not be sent beyond Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

In 1942, almost two years later, we went through another tragic period. This was after Japan had struck and the world again looked very dark. At that time the house passed an act known as the Dominion Plebiscite Act, which provided that a plebiscite should be taken on this question:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

A very active campaign followed throughout the country in which members from all sides of the house took part. Advertisements appeared in all papers. I have one here, the main words of which are, "Free Canada for all-out war—vote 'yes.'" Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck and their family answered "yes" in no uncertain terms. A majority of over sixty-four per cent of the Canadians who voted, voted "yes." An overwhelming majority voted "yes" in eight of the nine provinces. In three provinces, Prince Edward Island, Ontario and my home province of British Columbia, and in the armed services, the "yes" vote was over eighty per cent, and Nova Scotia and Manitoba were only about one per cent behind that figure.

After that vote the government eventually brought in an amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act which removed the restriction to which I have just referred, but during the debate on the bill the Prime Minister announced that he would not actually send men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act overseas without first passing an order in council to that effect and then coming to the house for a vote of confidence. In effect, although the act was changed, the policy remained the same, and that policy continues to this very day. The whole plebiscite was nothing more or less than a sham, nothing more or less than a fraud on the Canadian people.

What followed was that in some cases the men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act were persuaded to go active, to enlist for service overseas. That persuasion has consisted sometimes of coaxing, at other times of bluffing, and I am afraid sometimes of bullying. As hon. members know, three divisions were raised for home defence in Canada, the sixth, seventh and eighth. In due course two of those divisions were disbanded and what units remain have for a long time been made up almost entirely of home defence troops, being men who had been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Last year some of those troops were sent as a task force to Kiska and took part in the landing there, Kiska being considered by the government as part of the north American continent. They worked beside United States troops, but when the show was over the Canadian troops were brought back to Canada while the United States troops went on to fight the Japanese in other parts of the Pacific.

This spring the position was that Canada had at home between 60,000 and 70,000 in a home defence army, of whom about 50,000 were in a physical category that would permit them to be sent for service overseas. Most of these were men fully trained in the use of arms, and some of them had been seasoned by taking part in the expedition to Kiska. Right along the government apparently has been afraid to pass the order in council which is necessary in order to permit them to be sent overseas.

A few months ago a campaign was put on by the Pacific command to persuade the home defence troops in that command to go active. I have here the press clippings of that time which show just what was done. The campaign was under the direction of Major General Pearkes, V.C., one of the outstanding soldiers of Canada, and certainly must have been undertaken with the approval and consent of the Department of National Defence. General Pearkes in his first appeal used these words in speaking to his men:

> I regret that we were not allowed to chase the Jap right into his homeland—

Referring to the men who had been to Kiska.

> —that time. But that was out of my hands.
> I am very proud to tell you that the experience you gained at Kiska makes you invaluable as invasion forces.
> The need is urgent. Play the man's part—the part of young Canada.

[Mr. Green.]

We ought to be well on the road to victory this year but it will require the assistance and the cooperation of every single one of us.

Then he made this statement to the press:

> I tried principally to appeal to their pride in Canada and to the fact that the outcome of the second front might rest upon the number of home defence men who are ready to back up the troops already overseas.

Brigadier Macklin, who was in command of the camp where many of these men were stationed at the time, used these words:

> The response to appeals to men to go active has not been satisfactory.

A few days later General Pearkes said this:

> No man should wear that khaki uniform unless he is willing to wear it anywhere.

That is what our commander on the Pacific coast thinks of the government's man-power policy. What do the home defence troops themselves have to say? These same dispatches give their attitude. I quote from the Vancouver Sun of April 21:

> The men themselves place the blame squarely on the shoulders of the government.
> "Why" a number of them asked, "do we have to make the decision? We joined up on being told that we were to receive four months training. That was two years ago. We went to Kiska ready to fight. The fault is not ours. The blame lies on the government policy."

Several weeks later we find this further report:

> The main stand taken by non-volunteering home defence troops for failure to go active was that they were quite willing to go under nation-wide conscription, but that they did not see why they should volunteer.

There have been reports submitted by General Pearkes and Brigadier Macklin, and I suggest that the contents of these reports would be very interesting to the house and to the nation if they were made public. I asked the other day for the filing of the reports on recruiting, but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that they could not be produced. I think that they would be very helpful in enabling us to find out just what should be done about this question of man-power.

The campaign is still being carried on, and there is no doubt that there either is or will be great need of men overseas. General McNaughton used these words on June 6, on D-day, just about a month ago. He said:

> The call for men for the armed forces is now immediate and insistent.

Brigadier Mess, in charge of recruiting in Canada, on the following day, June 7, is reported as follows:

> Speaking of the "vital and urgent need" for "more and more" fighting men to reinforce Canada's invasion army. Brigadier James Mess, deputy adjutant-general in charge of recruiting, to-night criticized several classes of young men who he said were waiting "God knows what for".

I am convinced of two things: first, that our fighting units must be supported at whatever cost; second, that trained and seasoned troops, such as most of these men now in the home defence army are, should be the first sent to reinforce our troops overseas regardless of whether these trained troops are home defence men or volunteers. It just is not good enough to send over half-trained youngsters simply because they have enough public spirit to volunteer. I say that the government's policy is risking a shortage of reinforcements, that it is making all the talk of equality of sacrifice, which was heard on every side when the war broke out, just a mockery in this land. It is creating bad feeling and bitterness between Canadian and Canadian that will last for generations. This man-power policy of the government is not frank, it is not courageous, but it is political. It is an attempt on the part of the government to keep itself in power. It is a policy which effectively prevents any full mobilization of financial, industrial or material resources and of man-power for industry and for the farm. I think it can be fairly described as a disgrace to Canada.

A government that will continue such a policy at this critical time in the nation's history certainly is not fit to lead the Canadian people in the difficult years they are about to face. Mr. and Mrs. Jack Canuck deserve and will demand—and they will get—a government that will give them bold leadership.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, with a number of arguments which are being used in support of this amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that Your Honour do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means I find myself in disagreement, but with respect to most of them I am content to leave the expression of my disagreement to the vote which it will be my privilege to record when the amendment is put to the house.

There is, however, one argument which appears to me to be particularly objectionable and about which I wish to make a few observations. This is what was said by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) on Monday, as reported at page 4435 of Hansard:

I venture to assert, Mr. Speaker, that there are many hon. members sitting in this house who are in favour of the proposals enunciated in the amendment sponsored by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and who would, if left free, vote for them. That privilege is denied them and they will perforce be obliged to vote against their convictions and the known views of their constituents. Take the position of hon. members representing industrial ridings. Dare they vote against this amendment? I put it to them to-day. Well, they are on the horns of a dilemma. They must choose here and now. Vote against the amendment and face destruction at the polls, or vote according to the dictates of reason. I challenge hon. members from industrial ridings to vote against this amendment.

I vigorously disagree with the implications of that challenge, both on principle and in respect of the facts which it assumes. I represent an industrial riding, and I am going to vote against the amendment. When the time comes around for an election I intend to go before the constituents of that riding, if those who supported me in February of 1942 will do me the honour of again selecting me as their candidate, and I do not expect to face destruction. I disagree with the challenge on principle because it appears to me to be destructive of the very basis of British parliamentary institutions. That basic principle was over a century and a half ago stated in eloquent language by Edmund Burke. It has more than once been put upon the records of this house, but I venture to quote it again because I think the lesson should be always present in the minds of hon. gentlemen who sit in this house. I quote:

Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But, his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you; to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

My worthy colleague says, his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all, the thing is innocent. If government were a matter of will upon any side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not of inclination; and what sort of reason is that, in which the determination precedes the discussion; in which one set of men deliberate, and another decide; and where those who form the conclusion are perhaps three hundred miles distant from those who hear the arguments?

To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear; and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions; mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote, and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience—these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenour of our constitution.

Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament. If the local constituent should have an interest, or should form an hasty opinion, evidently opposite to the real good of the rest of the community, the member for that place ought to be as far, as any other, from any endeavour to give it effect.

That doctrine is particularly wholesome and necessary when parliament is dealing with large issues which affect the very existence and liberty of the body politic. This budget relates to the financing of Canada's part in the great struggle which is being waged at this very moment for the security and freedom of our country as well as for the security and freedom of mankind. This parliament has decided that Canada should take part in that struggle in the fullest possible measure commensurate with its resources. On June 13 I reminded the house of the definition given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of what we on this side of the house understood to be total war, "the devotion to the prosecution of the war of all the available energies and resources of the nation in excess of those required to maintain the health and efficiency of the people." That policy has been and is being carried out. The total effort of the nation is nothing more than the aggregate of the total efforts of each individual; and just as, for the nation, everything which is not required to maintain the health and efficiency of the population should be devoted to the prosecution of the war, likewise with the individual, all that he does not require to maintain his health and efficiency should be devoted to the pursuance of the object in which his nation is engaged. I quoted again from Hansard, at page 3784, from the same speech of the Prime Minister:

> The foundation of the total effort of any country is a correct decision as to the minimum requirements of the civilian population. Once that is determined, production and consumption, except for war, must be steadily and progressively cut down to the minimum. Waste must be eliminated; the manufacture of all luxuries and many comforts must cease. The surplus . . . must be used to make war.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

It is the members of parliament who have the responsibility of determining the minimum requirements of the civilian populations and of gauging the extent to which each man can be reasonably called upon to contribute to the national effort. Not only must that effort be made but it must be financed, and each one is also required to do his part, commensurate with his ability to pay, to meet the financial requirements of total war. To suggest that any hon. member should be deterred from asking his constituents—all his constituents—to do their part because of fear that he might give offence to some in asking them to do so, seems to me to strike at the very root of hon. members' responsibility to their conscience and to their country.

So much for the principle. I am also in profound disagreement with the assumptions of fact implied in the challenge of the hon. member for York-Sunbury to those in this house whose privilege it is to represent industrial ridings. That challenge places too low an estimate on the intelligence and understanding of the constituents of Quebec East and too low an estimate on the intelligence and understanding of the constituents of other so-called industrial ridings. The pith and substance of that argument is that industrial workers want an exemption from income tax of at least $800 for unmarried men and at least $1,600 for married men; that from their point of view such a raising of the level of exemption is to be preferred to the elimination of the refundable portion of the income tax as it exists at the present time, and that any failure to support the amendment of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) will constitute a refusal to comply with their desires.

I need not take many words, Mr. Speaker, to remind the house of the true purport and effect of this amendment. The Minister of Finance has moved that you do now leave the chair so that the house may resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider ways and means to finance this year's part of Canada's war effort. The amendment of the hon. member is that the house, instead of going into committee of ways and means to determine how we shall finance this year's portion of our war effort, will content itself with expressing a few regrets—because that is the amendment. The motion is that you leave the chair. The amendment is:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house regrets—
> (a) that no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation;

(b) that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum;

(c) that no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting overtime pay from income tax."

And so on.

That is the amendment. If that amendment were to be carried by a majority vote of this house, what would be the effect? First of all, it would mean that the financing of the current year's war expenditure would be in accord with the financial provisions which are on the statute books at the present time, and no change would be made. This year, taxes would be paid at the rates provided in the statutes as they exist without any amendment by parliament at this session. Not one penny would be added to the level of exemptions; not one penny would be subtracted from the obligation to pay into the exchequer the refundable portion of the tax; not one penny of relief would be granted on any one of the numerous adjustment provisions covered by the resolutions of the Minister of Finance as placed before the house to be considered when it is in committee. Everything would remain in statu quo.

Let me enumerate some of the things which the resolutions propose to do and which could not be done if the amendment carried: Adjustment of medical expenses allowances; additional expense allowance to the blind; extension of tax credits to include all children dependent on the taxpayer; allowance to persons paying alimony; amendments related to contributions to pension funds; extension of delay of appeal against income tax assessment; consideration to be given to the taxation of annuities and to the succession tax on shares in family corporations; the proposal in respect of the excess profits and corporate income taxes; elimination of customs and war exchange tax on agricultural implements, including cream separators; removal of prohibition against the importation of certain articles—all serious proposals, which the Minister of Finance, in view of his economic survey of the situation, thinks it is desirable to have at this time, but which could not be had if this amendment were to receive the approval of the majority of the members of this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: You would have all the good things in the budget under a new government. That would be the result.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am just going to deal with what is buzzing in the minds of some hon. members.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a little mental exercise going on over there too.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The second effect would be the dismissal from office of the present government and the necessity of holding an immediate general election.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think you are going to hold it anyway, are you not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend will ask for further information about that from the leader on this side.

Mr. GRAYDON: We have not the right one over there just now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the meantime I will proceed with the remarks I wish to submit to the house. The second effect would be the dismissal of this government from office and the necessity of having at once a general election and having the affairs of the country administered, during perhaps the most critical weeks of this world war, by a government without a majority of parliament behind it. In the meantime, until a new House of Commons had been elected, until a new session had been held, the taxing provisions of the legislation of 1943 would continue to apply, and none of these things for which the resolutions of the Minister of Finance provide could be done.

I submit quite seriously that if hon. members who support the amendment really felt that there was any serious danger of bringing about such a result at the present time they would hesitate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just politics.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And if they did not hesitate it would be because they have not, in truth and in fact, that consideration for what happens at the polls that is implied in the challenge of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

I wish to make a few comparisons between the raising of exemption from income tax suggested in the amendment and relief from payment of the refundable portion of the tax proposed in the resolutions of the Minister of Finance. Of course the exemptions cannot be raised by an affirmative vote on this amendment; but even if a great many things were to happen and there were appropriate means taken to bring about the raising of the exemption level, let us compare what would be the result with the result of what is proposed by the Minister of Finance. The raising of this exemption would affect the whole body of taxpayers and would give some taxpayers relief of seven per cent of the normal tax on $400—some married taxpayers, and others unmarried, $340, plus the relief on the graduated tax. The relief would amount to 50 per cent on a $5,000 income; 55 per cent on one of $10,000; 75 per cent on one of $50,000; 85 per cent on a $100,000 income—a relief to every taxpayer of something which would vary between $28 and $340. The man not having to pay any graduated tax would get $28, and because of the size of their incomes those paying graduated tax would get up to $340.

I do not know exactly what the raising of this exemption level would mean in loss of revenue, but I venture to suggest that it would be very considerable, and I hope the Minister of Finance in dealing with this budget will have figures to give to hon. members.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be $135,000,000.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I venture to suggest that the greater portion of that would remain in the pockets of those whose incomes are such that they have to pay graduated taxes. On the other hand, the foregoing of the refundable portion of the income tax proposed by the Minister of Finance can have little or no effect on those in the higher income brackets, because they already have offsetting items which dispense them or most of them from dispersing to the federal exchequer any part of that refundable portion. The Minister of Finance has told us that the refundable portion of the personal income tax would be $110 million. There is no doubt that the class of Canadians from whom this $110 million is obtained can well afford as a class to provide that sum for the financing of Canada's war effort. There is also no doubt that there are some of them in the class for whom it was a definite hardship to have to provide their portion of it, while there are others in the class who can without hardship provide more than the portion they were providing of the refundable part of the income tax. The $110 million will have to be obtained; but under this provision, everyone, in the face of his conscience and his duty to his country, will determine the extent to which he can contribute to it.

On the basis of raising the exemption level from $1,200 to $1,600, a married man with two dependents having no graduated tax to pay, because he has two dependents and his income is $1,600, would get a benefit of $28, which is seven per cent of $400. If my calculations are correct, under the present tax law his tax amounts to $56, and the reefundable portion which he would not be required to pay in and leave there until the end of the war would be exactly $28. At the present time the same man with an income of $2,000 would pay $214.80, and he is relieved from having to disburse $107.40. If his income were $2,500 his tax would be $430.80 and his relief $215.40. At $3,000 his tax would be $668.40 and his relief $334.20. At $3,500 his tax would be $908.20, and his relief $420, figured on this basis, ten per cent of $3,500, which is $350, and one per cent more for each child, which makes $70, or a total of $420.

A man with an income of $4,000—and by the way that happens to be the amount of the indemnity of members of parliament—and two dependents, would pay as a tax $1,148.40. I am sure if he were a member of parliament and had no other income there would not be much left after deduction of the tax to use as savings, forced or otherwise. This budget would mean, however, that out of that salary there would be retained $480 less than at the present time. That is the relief which is being given to those who will be able to say to themselves conscientiously in face of their duty to their country, following the criterion expressed in what is meant by total war, that they cannot devote any part of their savings to the financing of the war effort.

My next submission is that the abandoning of the enforced savings is in every way to be preferred to the raising of the exemption level at the present time. It has already been pointed out and was again stated by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) this afternoon that the exemption level in this country is now higher than that existing in the United States, in the United Kingdom, in Australia, in New Zealand, and he might have mentioned some other countries. They, like ourselves, are in the war. I fully agree with the suggestion that this is no time to tell them that Canada is letting down on her war effort. But on its own merits I submit that Canada's war effort is necessary and that it is necessary that it should be financed and that that financing should be along the lines of the definition of total war as laid down by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at page 3784 of Hansard, as follows:

> The devotion to the prosecution of the war of all the available energies and resources of the nation in excess of those required to maintain the health and efficiency of the people.

In other words, the requirements are so great that wherever there is ability to pay there should be taxation; but where there is no ability to pay it would be quite wrong to enforce savings. The taxation is to pay for the war that is being waged at this very moment while we are debating in this house. That is what the taxation is devoted to, whilst the compulsory saving is added to the public debt just as much as the amounts lent voluntarily on victory bonds. The purpose of the savings is to enable the taxpayer to put aside purchasing power that he may have to use after the war is ended. What comparison should we establish betwen the urgency of dollars to pay for what is going on in Normandy at the present time and the putting aside of dollars so that the individual may have purchasing power for himself in the years that follow the war? If there is no ability to pay a tax—and there should be no relief from taxation on any other grounds so long as this war lasts—there certainly is no ability to make enforced savings. Of course, we all hope that that situation will not always continue. The burden of taxation is very heavy, and there is no doubt that it should be lightened just as soon as it may be possible to do so. In my opinion there is no doubt that the lightening should commence in the lower income brackets. I am sure that no one will be better pleased than the Minister of Finance himself when he can consistently come into this house and announce some substantial reduction in real taxation; and expressing my hopes, but basing them upon the relations I have had with him over the last two and a half years, I trust that the first consideration will be given to those whose need is greatest, and that he will feel as I do, that the greatest need exists just above the present level of exemptions.

The Minister of Finance has stated that another reason for abandoning the enforced savings provision was its effect upon production and the reluctance of those in the lower income brackets to bridge the notch between full exemption and incipient taxation. Apparently the hon. member for York-Sunbury is in agreement with that. He said at page 4435 of Hansard:

> Relief must be granted to taxpayers in the lower income brackets, not only because of the increase in the cost of living but also and more particularly to deal with the growing evil of absenteeism in industry.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury also said that the high rates of deductions rankled in the minds of the wage-earners in the lower income groups. Well, we must still face facts. This is no time for distributing compliments or otherwise. The facts are these: an unmarried man earning $660 a year or $55 a month, pays no tax. If his wages are made $56 a month he gets $12 a year more. He then pays $8 tax and has $4 left out of the $12. Maybe he earns $12 a year working overtime. He gets $4 out of $12; the tax is $8. If he gets $24 more than the $660, or rather if he earns $24 more the tax is $16 and he gets $8. If he earns $60 more the tax is $40 and he gets $20, and so on right up to $67 a month where the tax, including the refundable portion, is $96 out of the $144 he earns over $660. If he earns $75 a month his income will be $240 over the exemption portion and his tax will be $135. It has to go to $90 a month, or $420 over the exemption portion before the tax gets down to less than fifty per cent of the increased amount. That is the situation with the compulsory savings as they exist at the present time.

I am neither justifying nor condemning anyone's conduct; I am just stating the situation created by this tax schedule, and acknowledging the fact that together with it there is absenteeism and unwillingness to increase the earnings in that range. But the bridging of the gap between no tax and some tax will not be helped in any way by increasing the exemptions. At $66.66 a month, which would be $800 a year, there would be no tax; but at $67 a month or $804 a year the tax would be $2.66; at $68 a month, or $16 over the proposed exemption, the tax would be $10.66. At $80 a month, or $160 over the exemption, the tax would be $106.66, and at $100 a month, or $400 more for the year than the exempted portion, the tax would be $204. The wage would have to go to $500 over the exemption before the wage-earner would retain as much as fifty per cent of his additional earnings. The proposal in the amendment, even if it were something more than an expression of vain regret, would not be a panacea to cure any of the resentment that may exist over the rate of taxation when it first commences to affect wage-earners.

Well, Mr. Speaker, when I go before my constituents in Quebec East these are some of the reasons I am going to give them to justify the vote I intend to register in response to the challenge of the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I hope at that time the necessity for waging total war at least in the European theatre may have passed, but I will make no apologies for what this country has done. On the contrary, I will congratulate the people on the energy, the resourcefulness and the fortitude with which they have responded to the needs of the country in these trying hours and days and weeks and months and years. I will remind them that no part of the magnificent effort which has been put forth would have been possible if the other parts of our war programme had not been maintained. To paraphrase the Prime Minister once more, I feel that the most difficult task in total war was the decision as to the correct balance between the different aspects of our war effort. I will ask them to remember that without a correct balance in the scheme of taxation the opportunities with which they have been provided to serve in the armed forces or to work in war industries could not have been maintained, and it would not now be possible for the Bank of Canada to report, as it did in the February-March statistical summary, that the number of employees on payrolls where there are not less than fifteen employed was 1,908,000, and that the weekly payroll for those 1,908,000 was $60,600,000. I will congratulate them, but I will ask them to congratulate us on the decisions we had to make and carry out, the decisions we are having to make and carry out during these trying times, as to the correct balance to be maintained between these different aspects of our war activities. And because I am not going there to face destruction I will ask them also to believe that in the post-war period we can make like correct decisions as to the proper balance to be maintained between the different aspects of the social and economic problems which will have to be coordinated and dealt with in a satisfactory post-war reconstruction.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): In making a short contribution to this budget debate, Mr. Speaker, I desire first to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the preparation and delivery of the budget. He has had many baffling problems with which to deal, but he has won a high place in the confidence of the Canadian people. A few moments ago someone said something about an election in the near future. When that day comes I believe this government should be returned, to promote the welfare and happiness of the people of Canada. They have headed into the storm; they have done what had to be done, and they are well equipped to represent Canada at the conference table and to deal with the problems of rehabilitation. The great issue before the Canadian people at the present time is the war, which is never very far from our thoughts. As long as history is read, as long as memory lasts, the glorious deeds of skill and courage performed by the members of our fighting forces will remain with us, ever to their credit.

It has been said that one of the chief causes of the great depression which followed the last war was agricultural distress. I do hope that following this war the industry of agriculture will receive first consideration at the hands of the government, because if we have a prosperous agriculture we shall have prosperity throughout the whole economy of the country. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister two problems that are of great importance to the district from which I come. Ever since the early eighties people farming in that district have found themselves at times in a condition of poverty, owing to crop failures. At such times they have had to obtain relief and seed grain and fodder from this government. The amount of such assistance was placed as a lien against the title of their land, and very little of that money has been repaid except when there was a transfer of title. Commissions have been set up in each province to deal with these old seed grain liens, but those commissions have not been very generous, and those unfortunate enough to have had to accept relief find themselves overwhelmed with the interest charges which have accumulated during the last forty years or so.

I should like to give some reasons why these old seed grain liens should be cancelled, in addition to the fact that such action would bring about a feeling of good will and of justice among these people. In the first place, as I have said, interest charges have mounted very rapidly. I have in mind the case of two people, Mr. and Mrs. Wing of Ranchville, who had to accept some relief thirty years ago. The day came when they wanted to retire. To their great surprise they found that the little equity they hoped would be theirs was completely wiped out by these liens, of which they had known nothing. They had thought these liens were long ago cancelled. I have another case of a man who received $293 in 1915 in relief fodder and seed grains. During the years he has paid $249, but he still owes $334.90, which is away beyond his ability to pay.

The officers of the provincial government are in close contact with actual conditions and that government has seen fit to cancel its share of what was advanced for relief. The dominion allowed the people to settle in those districts and certainly should bear some responsibility. The principle has now been established that there should be a minimum standard, and it seems pretty hard to have children and grandchildren, some of them returned soldiers, having to pay for relief that was used to save their parents or grandparents from actual starvation at that time. If those bad crops had come along in more recent years the condition would have been corrected by means of bonuses or payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Surely that is sufficient reason why leniency should be shown. Someone has said that those who have paid would feel that they had been dealt with unfairly if some remission were given to those who still owed on their debts, but I do not believe there will be one person who will object on that account.

A permanent policy should be adopted to deal with the recurring droughts in those districts. Those who live there are convinced that they cannot depend upon moisture from the sky. During the last thirty years there have been, because of lack of rainfall, only about five paying crops. We do hope and put forward the plea that adequate provision be made, so that a permanent policy can be worked out in order that these relief debts and bonuses will be quite unnecessary. The people of that district are convinced that a great step would be taken in that direction if every acre foot of water now flowing to the sea could be used for production. It is quite impossible to find private capital to build these irrigation schemes. Experience has shown that governments must advance a certain amount of money to cover the capital cost. But there would be increased production; there would be increased traffic for the transportation systems; there would be increased trade; there would be more taxes collectable, and it would not be necessary to provide relief and assistance.

If you go into those districts you find that the homes are often badly in need of repair. The people are isolated; they are long distances from their neighbours. They have no grass and trees and they cannot make real homes. If water were provided; if use were made of the water that is there, there would be flowers and gardens and dairy products. A community life could be built up and there would be food provided for the proper nutrition of the people. The people of this country are not getting a balanced diet. If they were we would be consuming eighty per cent more milk, forty-one per cent more butter, fifty-five per cent more eggs, twenty-nine per cent more meats and about 120 per cent more fruits and vegetables. These are the very products that could be produced as the result of irrigation.

Many of those districts are suffering from drought at the present time. If you went through them you would see that the grass was thin and brown, that the crops were poor and that the cattle were in need of water and pasture. Then if you drove into an irrigated district you would find an entirely different atmosphere. You would find the grass tall; you would find large stacks of feed; you would find the cottages and homes painted and more homelike; you would find a much better feeling, more hope and courage.

The provincial government has been approached regarding this programme and it is ready to do what it can within its means. Petitions have been circulated and signed by thousands of people in those districts. Every member of the cabinet in this government has been approached and has been made familiar with the situation. It is true that something has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the way of building small dugouts and stock water reservoirs and other irrigation schemes, but these all depend upon the spring run-off. When there is no snow there is no run-off and the reservoirs are soon dry.

Surveys have been made, and I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for sending in surveyors at the beginning of this year to complete the survey of one large district, the Redcliff-Ronelane district. These problems have been before the reconstruction committee of this house on at least two occasions. In June, 1943, the reconstruction committee recommended that immediate steps be taken to bring about cooperation between the dominion and provincial governments to the end that these districts may be completed.

Mr. Meek, chief engineer of the Department of Mines and Resources, has been over the Milk river project on different occasions and he is thoroughly familiar with the whole proposition. He is convinced of its feasibility and practicability. Mr. Hayes, an engineer of great experience, pointed out to the committee that there were difficulties in irrigating, but he also pointed out that in the light of experience gained and knowledge now acquired great prosperity could be brought about if these districts were completed.

In the St. Mary's-Milk river district 345,000 additional acres could be brought under the ditch at a cost of about $44 an acre. This matter is urgent because, if this project were completed, the waters of those international streams could be used and if it is not completed they may be lost forever. There are 120,000 acres under irrigation but with deficient water supply with consequent lighter and poorer crops. Additional water is needed.

The Redcliff-Ronelane scheme was built up largely by private capital, and 180,000 acres could be brought under water for the cost of around $20 an acre. The people there are in deadly earnest. At a large meeting held in April of 1944, a resolution was passed recommending that the construction of these districts be proceeded with as soon as men and materials can be released from war work. The time has come when another step should be taken, a step that will really move some earth and get water into the ditches. If that is done an enduring work will have been constructed, a work that will be a monument to those who have completed it, a work that will last long after we are gone and be a great blessing to the people of future generations.

A little area near the ranching station at Manyberries, an area that would feed only one cow without irrigation, produced last year 2,400 bushels of feed grain and about 250 tons of hay. In the near future, and even at the present time, soldiers will be and are returning from the war and men must be moved from those dried districts. Land suitable for farming is becoming scarce. Here we have a great area close to schools, hospitals, telephones, churches and railways that could be brought into production at a very reasonable cost. Dehydration is a common process nowadays and milk and eggs and a large number of vegetables can be dehydrated and preserved in that way. Quick-freezing plants would soon come into operation. By these means these protective foods can be made available all the year round for the people who need them. Then there would be seed plants, canning factories and beet sugar factories to complete the picture. The by-products of the beet sugar factories would be a great help to the live stock industry. Altogether it would revive and give permanency to the towns and cities there. It would create happy homes.

Education at the present time is valued very highly. Parents will sacrifice almost anything to get it for their children, and children often dream of it, but in the farming districts where the hazards are so great these dreams seldom come true. I am making an appeal to the members of this house to support irrigation projects because, by so doing, they will help to bring joy and happiness to many people. It would be a step away from that despair which comes when human hopes are crushed for lack of the economic means of fulfilment.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the amendment to the budget I should like to direct the attention of the house to the following points: First, to the need for increased exemptions in the lower income brackets. If I understand them correctly, some of the calculations of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to the normal tax were not entirely correct. For instance, I do not believe that the increase in the brackets from $660 to $800 would relieve anyone of normal tax except those in the bracket between $660 and $800 for single persons and, for married men, those in the brackets between $1,200 and $1,600. Only to that class would relief be afforded.

[M. Gershaw.]

The second point to which I wish to address myself is that employers should be permitted after three years, and that time has already elapsed, to increase the pay of deserving salaried workers by a ten per cent upward adjustment.

Third, the conception of a modern budget. It is no longer what you earn that counts, but what the government lets you keep or hands you out.

Fourth, the need for a committee of ways and means, with power to call for witnesses and to consider alternative plans of taxation to the proposals which have been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), which are seldom allowed to suffer any major change at the hands of members of the house.

Fifth, why compulsory savings did not work.

Sixth, the need for an announcement of the government's general policy on post-war taxation. Business men cannot go ahead without a chart, and an announcement of the general post-war taxation policy would be a great step in giving the people of this country some basis on which to construct their own reconstruction policies which will afford employment to our people.

The amendment to the budget moved by the Progressive Conservative party would provide much needed relief to taxpayers, particularly those in the lower income groups, and at the same time provide a measure of relief that would not be inconsistent with the general financial policy of this country. In particular I refer to paragraph (b) of the amendment which reads as follows:

> (b) that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum.

With the exemption on a single person's income limited to $660 per annum or $12.70 a week, and on a married man's income limited to $1,200 per annum or $23.07 a week, there is not enough left on which to live, much less enough left on which to begin to pay income tax. The cost of living makes the raising of the income tax exemptions necessary. Very small items bulk large in the worker's income. For example, two years ago the government permitted restaurants and hotels to increase the price of tea and coffee by five cents a cup. That meant, if the taxpayer were living away from home, an increase of fifteen cents a day, or not less than $54.75 for the year. Assuming that five cents was already charged for a cup of tea or coffee, which would surely be the minimum, we must add another $54.75, or a total of $109.50 a year, which the taxpayer would have to pay who uses three cups of tea or coffee a day. In view of the hardships which taxpayers living away from home were already up against, it would seem that the government might well have been advised to divert some of the taxation on alcoholic beverages and use it to subsidize the use of tea and coffee in public restaurants and hotels.

To give another example, take government employees in grade 1. Their salaries are inadequate; yet they are subject to the tax. If one visits local restaurants in Ottawa or makes inquiry it is found that just prior to the next pay cheque coming due many of these government employees cannot afford proper meals. They will have for lunch probably a sandwich and a coca-cola. The result is that they are undernourished. Yet this class of employees is subject to income tax, even though it is a small one, and it is our belief that they should be given a little higher exemption before they are brought into the income tax brackets. What is the use of the government taking away by taxation the income of these employees in the lower tax brackets and at the same time giving the cost of living bonus to some, and in varying amounts? As matters now stand, men and women in the lower income groups, both married and single, cannot live in decency, much less with comfort, on what is left of their wages and salaries after taxation. I urge the government to increase the income tax exemption on single men to $800 and on married men to $1,600. The cost of doing this would not be great; in fact, rather small after the cost of collection is deducted. It is true that it may be said to be inflationary, but only in a small degree, and not nearly to the same degree as is the need for some relief to those of our citizens in the lower income brackets. It comes with ill grace from this government to raise the cry of inflation when it sponsors family allowances costing over $200,000,000.

Salaried workers, including those above the cost of living bonus class, should after three years of frozen salaries be permitted, where they have become entitled to it, a ten per cent salary increase. Salaried workers as in the civil service ordinarily get small increases from time to time, because in their early years they receive extremely small returns for their labour. As they continue in their employment they become of more value to their employers and because of this, and in many cases because of their growing family responsibilities, it is customary and part of the implied contract that they should receive periodical increases. After three years with greatly increased taxation the plight of many of these workers is serious and economically much harder than that of other classes. I therefore urge upon the government that the salaried worker be allowed one upward adjustment of ten per cent in his basic salary. I do not believe that there is a member of the house who will not agree that this permission to employers to give a ten per cent increase is not only fair but overdue.

To return to the estimates that were given to the house by the Minister of Finance, we have an estimated expenditure of $5,152,000,000 or $458 per person. We have an estimated revenue from taxation and incidental sources of $2,617,000,000, or $233 per person, leaving a deficit of $2,535,000,000, or $225 per head. We are paying for just over half the costs of the war through taxation; the remainder is provided by our people purchasing claims on the future through their subscriptions to victory loans and war savings certificates. But they are not sacrificing a present spending or purchasing power with anything but the firm expectation that, when the maturity of these war savings certificates or victory bonds comes around, they will be able to purchase just as much as they are giving up at the present time. They do not expect that a suit of clothes will then cost $100 or that a $1,000 motor car will then cost $2,000. They expect the same kind of dollar as they are giving up and lending to the government at the present time. If we were to pay as we go entirely we should have to double taxation in this country, and that would be arithmetically impossible in the higher brackets, and humanly impossible in the lower brackets, because something must be left on which to live. It may indeed be interesting for hon. members to speculate on what would happen to production if we paid for production as we went along, instead of borrowing against the future. What would be the effect on production if, for example, we paid out, not $5,152 millions but only what we took in in revenues and taxation, namely $2,617 millions? What would be the effect in lessening incentive to our workers? And then we must ask ourselves, how long can we continue to spend twice as much as we collect?

In addition to the enormous expenditures which the house has already before it, we find that the Minister of Finance tells us that approximately $848 millions additional has to be raised in Canada in order to pay our workers and other producers for what the governments intend buying this year. The question of course arises as to what is going to happen to it. The minister said that there will probably be large shipments for which we shall have to take payment only in the future. In other words, someone will be indebted to us and we shall have to take payments only in the future, or present payment in a currency other than Canadian—something we cannot spend at the present time, but which may be of value in the future. May I ask him, what is the nature of the transaction which involves such a large amount of money, $848 millions, over one and one-half times our ordinary peace-time budget? We are merely given a hint as to what it may be. Is it to be mutual aid to our allies who are going to use on the fighting front the goods represented by this money? I believe the minister must give us as full an outline as it is possible for him to give before this budget passes. Certainly, if we learn nothing about it, and parliament has adjourned, we have been warned already that the money will probably be spent; we do not know how it is going to be raised; if necessary, I presume, it will have to be manufactured by the printing press or the government will have to go to the Bank of Canada—it is almost the same thing—and the people's representatives will never have been consulted.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a committee of ways and means with the powers which I have already outlined is urgently required to pass upon these matters, unless the executive is to take complete power away from the legislative branch. About the only power left to us, namely the legislature, is that of scrutinizing expenditures and supplying money to the crown. Surely some right has to be left to the legislative branch of parliament.

The budget has really assumed tremendous proportions. Against our normal budget of about $500 million, our present budget is over ten times that amount and our cash requirements are about twelve times as great. Unlike the ordinary taxpayer or individual in this country, parliament does not figure out where the money is coming from before it spends or appropriates it. It is very much like putting the cart before the horse; and I believe that if we had a committee of ways and means we would be able to cut our coat more closely according to our cloth and have some realization of where the money is coming from before we decided how it is going to be spent. Certainly the present method cannot go on for ever without having very serious consequences to our whole economy. The only exception I would make to that stricture on the government is in connection with the war. Certainly we must not count the cost there before we spend it; we must spend every cent and every dollar we can which will shorten the war or save the life of a single man. That is not only our duty but our self-interest and our solemn obligation.

May I point out to this house, however, that finance is not an abstract affair apart from the people with whom it has to do. It does not operate in a vacuum. I believe that the temper of the people will allow the present method of financing to continue until victory is assured. But finance deals with people; its possibilities and limitations are rooted deep in human nature, and hence I use the qualifying phrase, "temper of the people".

In the post-war period we must make financially possible that which is physically possible, and may we hope that the temper of the people will allow that to be done. The question will undoubtedly arise at that time, will three million Canadians continue to buy government bonds and war savings certificates? I was reminded in this connection of a statement of Field Marshal Ironside, who, when he was congratulating our armies on the capture of Cherbourg added:

> Every war ceases by the fact that men will not fight any more. Whatever the order given by a general or a government, when men cease to fight then the war is over. That I hope is just coming.

Or as General Montgomery says:

> You can do anything with an army if the morale is high.

And I suggest you can do anything with production or with finance if the people are willing or have confidence. Despite the tenets of certain political doctrines there is a limit to what the people will stand, and they will stand different things at different times. Education and new ideas are a great help, and we all live and learn. But I maintain that a system which has built up the modern industrial world, based on individual initiative, is the system which is best calculated to provide the highest standard of living for all.

I should now like to say a few sentences about the conception of a modern budget, because I believe that not only will some hon. members be interested, but the people should understand what we are doing when we discuss budget matters in this house.

In a little booklet entitled, "Full Employment and the Budget", by Hugh Molson, M.P., is the following:

> In the days of Gladstonian finance, it was considered that the state should concern itself as little as possible with the economic and social life of the country. Its activities were so narrow that in 1887 Lord Randolph Churchill resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer rather than introduce a budget of 88 million pounds. It was thought best to leave money "to fructify in the pockets of the taxpayer."

And, quoting further from the same pamphlet:

As Mr. Quintin Hogg, M.P., said in the House of Commons on 14th April, 1943: "we are gradually passing through a transitional stage betwen two different conceptions of what our budget is. It still is in form a statement of the accounts of the treasury—the ordinary expenditure and revenue of the year—but it is gradually developing into an annual review of our whole economic life and resources. I believe the process should continue, because I think it will lead in the end to a much wiser view of our economic policy."

The modern budget, unlike its predecessors, results in the redistribution of the national income, although that is a new conception in this country. Here it was not found necessary until some years ago, because in Canada individual initiative counts and here the children of the same family have the same opportunity, and these same children can occupy the highest or the lowest places in our economic society depending on their own abilities and application. But now the national income, which is the adding together of all our wages and salaries, those of every one of us, into what I may term, and it is so-called by many in fact, the national pie—this national pie is divided by bureaucrats under the ægis, if you will, of the Minister of Finance and under the authority of the government. You and I are merely a collection agency until the budget is brought down. It is no longer what you earn that counts, but what the government lets you keep or hands out to you. It is no longer what you receive from your employer, in competition with your fellow men, which determines how much you shall have, but simply how much the government decides that you may be allowed to keep at the end of the year. The old virtues of self-preservation, hard-work and self-denial will, I believe, reassert themselves because they are part of the fundamental law of nature. We may hope that glittering prizes for sharp swords will not be held out after the war, but at the same time we may hope that there will be payment to everyone according to his ability and his contribution to society. Fortunately, the principle which leads to the greatest production still obtains, namely, free enterprise and individual initiative; and, as Mr. John Bracken has said, it is that principle which leads to the distribution of plenty and not to the distribution of scarcity.

But it is this importance of the modern budget which I wish to emphasize to members of the house, because it surely gives rise to the need for a committee to examine these matters, since probably nothing is of greater importance to the people of Canada than the manner in which the budget redistributes their earnings throughout the year. It has a direct effect on every taxpaying individual and nowadays, therefore, on practically every individual. There is an imperative need that a committee should be set up which knows the needs of the people and what the people will stand for, rather than to have the whole matter settled by a mere handful of people in Ottawa. Such a committee would avoid gross errors. For example, I do not think the situation in regard to compulsory savings would have been so unhappy and so disastrous had there been a committee composed of members of this house. This redivision of the national income, that is, everyone's wages and salaries, is of much greater importance than many other measures in this house on which we spend endless time and which do not begin to compare in importance with the budget.

The second basic consideration which the minister outlined in his budget address was that we must have the highest possible production, and that the urgency is very great and is immediate. This is surely not a new principle either in war budgets or even in peace-time budgets. It should be the all-compelling one, although I am afraid that sometimes other principles are allowed to take precedence over it. May we hope that, in the post-war period, whatever government is then in power will allow the principle of production to take priority over any principle of tax collection, because the budget is surely made for business and not business for the budget.

In the 1942 budget the minister upped the personal income tax and introduced compulsory savings. The latter was by far the major matter of the two. At that time he mentioned the three determining principles in framing his budget as equity, incentive, and the need for savings. The minister said this:

There is danger that high progressive rates of income tax may interfere with the incentive for harder and better work for efficient production. We can and must rely upon other than economic motives to a large extent these days. Nevertheless, we cannot afford to dispense entirely with the incentive of improved earnings as a stimulus in the continued week-in week-out production work of the nation at a time when production is of vital importance.

I suggested at that time that he was guided if not dominated by bureaucrats, and as a result the compulsory savings measure has utterly failed, and failed perhaps to a large extent because this country has not had during the war the spiritual leadership which we might have expected and which some other countries have happily had. Now we find compulsory savings partly done away with. The error, in the minister's judgment, or in the judgment of his advisers, which he accepted, is obvious and admitted.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would point out that several of the hon. member's colleagues want it continued and have so stated.

Mr. JACKMAN: Under certain conditions. I hope I may be able to outline why the provision as to compulsory savings has failed so badly. It is due to the fact that it is run entirely by bureaucrats, and after the minister has listened to me I should not be surprised if he agreed with me, that is, if he ever allows his mind to agree to a new suggestion. How much production that error has cost Canada, how much in the way of revenue which we might have obtained under a taxation policy which would be more in keeping with the government's man-power policy and lack of leadership, we do not know. But it has undoubtedly been a detriment to the carrying on of the war effort and the minister now, with the great urgency for production, sees fit to change it at the last moment. In the present budget address he says:

> Referring to absenteeism, I am not in a position to judge fully how far this is true, but I do know that now is the time when the need for greater production is urgent and immediate.

Last year we had an amendment to alleviate the rigour of taxation on the lower brackets between $660 and $820 and also on the married brackets just above the minimum. One-third was to be taxed; one-third was to be refundable, and one-third was to be clear gain in the hands of the taxpayer.

At that time, however, I put the following question to him:

> I would like to ask the minister what assurance he has that this will prove an adequate incentive to keep workers working after they come into the taxable bracket. Will it be sufficient to stop absenteeism, or is it just a trial and error method which he is presenting to the committee?

I also at that time suggested that we should have a budget committee which would be empowered to call experts so that the house would know exactly what the response to the various measures would be by the people who would be concerned with them. At that time I also suggested as a method of raising increased revenue, or to take the place of any loss of revenue which might be incurred, an increase in the sales tax or the imposition of a purchase tax on non-essentials. But the humiliating part of the cancellation of compulsory savings to the government must be that in doing away with compulsory savings they are not doing away with any tax at all. The fact is that the people of the country do not place reliance in the government's promise to repay the amount withheld from the pay envelopes at two per cent interest. It merely gives an indication of the low ebb to which this government has fallen in the minds of the people of the country. Their word is no longer regarded as secure. Compulsory savings were undoubtedly good in theory because they were a bulwark to a small extent against inflation and at the same time provided the government with money. The minister has now reluctantly given up this aspect of fiscal policy. He has been forced to the conclusion that it is desirable to discontinue it. But I would suggest to him and to the hon. members of this house that there is no need to blame the workers for distrusting the government's promise to repay this money. The compulsory saving certificate is a most informal document. It is not even necessary for one to retain it in order eventually to put in a claim for compulsory savings. Let me just read to the house the "simple" language in which this savings certificate is couched. It is as follows:

> The amounts refundable shall be paid to the taxpayer after the cessation of hostilities between Canada, Germany, Italy and Japan at such times and in such instalments as may be prescribed by regulation made by the governor in council, but in the case of taxes paid upon income for nineteen hundred and forty-two taxation period not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government of Canada commencing after a date to be fixed for the purposes of this act by the governor in council as the date of the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan.

Could anybody understand that without reading it two or three times, much less an ordinary industrial worker. Yet this is the thing he is asked by the government to accept. If the government were in touch with not only the workers in the factories but with the people who handle certificates or evidence of indebtedness they would soon learn that such a wording utterly confuses the minds of the persons concerned and causes a complete lack of confidence. Why not say "not later than five or even seven years," and be done with it? People would know where they were and would therefore be content. I realize that a definite period like that does not cover all the legal and war possibilities, but it is practical and that is what the people are concerned with. They are not concerned with all this stuff that interests the people in the east block who do not know what the people of this country understand or what they will put up with. It is true these certificates bear interest at two per cent, but they are not negotiable and perhaps that is necessary in order for them to have any savings feature. Certainly it was a prize example of how not to package what you want to sell the public. The goods were all right, but no business man would ever try to sell the public something they could not understand. A new product must be advertised even if the government has to resort to "soap operas."

The government accepted the suggestion with regard to compulsory savings certificates. I think it was supported by members on our side of the house, and certainly the fundamental principles of this policy were to guard against inflation and to bring in some money for the government. Those principles were sound and I fully realize the reluctance with which the minister gives up the idea. Yet he has no one to blame but the ineffectiveness of his own department and the department of National Revenue in their inability to get the idea across to the Canadian people, and there is nothing wrong with the Canadian people.

I also suggested that facsimile certificates be introduced and placed in the factories where the workers could see them. I understand that has been done to a small extent, but more important and notwithstanding the odd legalistic language in which this certificate was couched it was suggested by a number of speakers on this side in former years that the actual certificate, the actual evidence of indebtedness, should be put into the hands of the workers, but of the 1942 class of taxpayers only sixty per cent have received their certificates. I understand that the government have some problems in connection with it, but they want to be too exact. Surely when they get the return from the employers showing that so much has been deducted for compulsory savings they can issue a certificate up to the nearest $100. The government has the money. There cannot be very much chance of a mistake. Anyway the certificate is only evidence; it is not an actual receipt which you have to turn in when you want the money. The government in its desire for preciseness has allowed the very heart of this plan to die.

I shall not mention anything about the refundable portion of the excess profits tax, but I may tell the minister that having had to calculate at times what these were in various companies I almost instinctively had by no means complete faith in them. On reasoning it out, I knew the word of the Dominion of Canada was behind them and that they were all right, but there was no date of payment attached to them and they would have to take a heavy discount because people are not interested in dealing with documents of that kind. I cannot understand a department being administered carrying out the laws laid down in this house in such a fashion. They have no idea what the people of the country will stand for or understand.

On a number of occasions the minister had to change things which had been advocated in this house at various times. For instance, in the early days of the war and only after insistence from members on this side of the house were the income of husbands whose wives had taken war jobs allowed to remain in the married men's bracket. It was found that if the wife took war work the husband's income was reduced to the single man's bracket and the net gain to the family as a unit was very little. That was changed in order to encourage war production. Then we had the matter of interest on mortgages where the husband had put the property in the wife's name for very good reasons and still paid the mortgage interest himself because it was the only source of earnings in the home. The minister refused to make that change until a year had gone by. All of which indicates that the minister is not in touch with what the people will reasonably stand.

Then last year we had the payments in under dominion government annuity contracts. They were not allowed as an offset against compulsory savings. Although the minister said that he could see no reason why they should be, the change was made. It was impossible to make the people understand why those payments into annuities should not be allowed as an offset against compulsory savings. The minister finally changed the regulation. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these matters clearly indicate that the Department of Finance in the drafting of the budget and the Department of National Revenue in the carrying out of the Income War Tax Act are hopelessly out of touch with the people of Canada. I hope that some day the Minister of Finance will learn that human nature exists and that he is not likely to find out very much about it from a selected group of officials whose contacts are not very broad. Let us adopt the committee system where people's representatives may express the people's views. The resulting legislation may not be quite as nice looking as theory in textbooks; nevertheless it will be workable, whereas the present method produces much unworkable legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: We might refer it to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suggest that we find some better committee than that. After all, while we have trouble in some of our committees, yet we either believe in democracy or do not. We either believe in the people who sent us here or we do not. We should discuss these things more with the representatives of the people here; otherwise we may as well dish the whole thing. Certainly the Minister of Finance and his advisers in the east block do not know more than all others, and they should consult the people's representatives. I suggest that there has been far too much of not consulting the representatives of the people. I agree with what the minister says about the banking and commerce committee, but the fundamental principle is either we believe in democracy or we do not. The only way to prove that we have a democracy is to consult hon. members of this house, but that is not always done.

The minister gave further consideration to certain anomalies and hardships in the present law. I have not time to go fully into them and there will be ample opportunity in the resolution stage. For the most part the changes are very good. The provision for medical expenses and the plan of extension of tax credits to taxpayers to include all children and also relatives by marriage are good. The amazing thing about the provisions of the Income War Tax Act is that the wife's relatives were differentiated from those of the husband even though living with the family unit. That was an amazing circumstance and the minister has at last seen the justice of making the change. Now the minister states that the government desires to recognize more fully than before the varying circumstances of family responsibility. Last year when I argued that every child in Canada should be the subject of income tax exemption I called upon the minister to adduce reasons why he was not willing to do so. The minister replied at pages 2406 and 2458 of Hansard. Perhaps he was somewhat worried because of the length of time it was taking to get the budget through, and his reply was both petulant and rather self-righteous. Now that a complete change in the section has been made I wonder whether or not the minister's air of deep sincerity is always to be taken at face value. Perhaps it may be the result of having been held up by the committee, and not having his resolutions go through as quickly as possible. In any event, when I urged that every child in Canada should be the subject of income tax exemption, unless in an institution, this was the minister's reply:

> Why stop at children? Why not include all worthy recipients of private benefactions, all worthy recipients of support? If the hon. gentleman received the letters that we receive from people who say, "You should allow me an exemption because I am supporting a friend or relative who is ill in my home", he would realize what this means. We must have some rules and some limitations to this thing.

Later in the long paragraph he said:

> I am just pointing out that we are opening up a field here of tremendous extent and the hon. gentleman cannot stop at children. He would have to include any child, a niece, a nephew, a stranger or anyone a taxpayer might take in and feed. He cannot stop there; he has to take in everybody whom he helps in this way, and it is not consistent with the principles on which our system is built.

Those were the words of the minister at that time; yet now I find that the change which I advocated, which was surely reasonable—it must have been reasonable because it has been adopted—is now to be incorporated in the laws of the country. Yet the minister refuses to listen to those of us who endeavour to keep in touch with the people of the country and to point out the pitfalls in the legislation he brings in from time to time. He prefers to lean upon the bureaucrats who are his sole source of guidance, as far as anyone can find out, instead of coming to the members of this house who, after all, are the representatives of the people of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Castleden the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

SIXTH VICTORY LOAN

STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO RESULTS

On the order for motions:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a brief statement with regard to the results of the sixth victory loan campaign.

Total sales of bonds amounted to $1,407,576,650. This represented 3,077,123 applications. These sales were made for payment in cash. The sixth victory loan did not involve the issue of any new bonds against the surrender of maturing securities.

It will be recalled that the total objective for the sixth victory loan was set at $1,200,000,000, and that this objective was split $525,000,000 for individuals covered by the general canvass and payroll savings canvass, and $675,000,000 for large investors, mostly business firms and corporations, covered by the special names canvass. Each of these objectives was exceeded by a wide margin.

Combined sales by the general canvass and payroll savings canvass amounted to $643,690,700, representing 3,070,601 applications. Sales in the special names canvass were $763,885,950.

The sixth victory loan attained new record levels in the total amount of bonds sold, in the total number of applications received, and in the dollar amount of sales to individuals covered in the general and payroll savings canvasses.

I should like to point out that applications by members of the armed forces form part of the figures I have given on sales to individuals. On the sixth loan, armed forces applications numbered 461,688 for $47,826,250 of bonds. Applications from overseas personnel of the armed forces, included in these totals, numbered 141,510 for $13,383,550 of bonds. All of these figures show a considerable increase over the results of the fifth victory loan. The record of support of victory loans by members of the armed forces, particularly from the men in the navy, army and air force overseas, is one of the most stimulating features of our victory loan campaigns. In supporting victory loans, the armed forces are showing their appreciation of the value of a reserve of savings for use after the war. This evidence of their firm confidence in victory, and of their faith in the future of Canada, is an inspiration and an example to all of us on the home front.

These data have been compiled by the national war finance committee from information obtained at the time of public offering of the loans, and from other sources. The results of the sixth loan should be regarded as subject to revision when final figures with respect to this loan become available.

Costs of issue of the sixth victory loan, while incomplete at the present time, are expected not to exceed 88 cents for each $100 of bonds sold. Costs of issue on the first victory loan, in June 1941, were just over one per cent, but costs on all issues since that time have been less than one per cent.

With the consent of the house, I should like to place on Hansard for convenient reference a statement showing the estimated derivation of subscriptions to the sixth victory loan and preceding victory loans. All figures in regard to the sixth victory loan are subject to final verification on the receipt of reports of actual bond deliveries by banks, trust, and loan companies. The figures which I have used, and which appear in the statement I am placing on Hansard, are based on the final reports received in Ottawa from the provincial offices of the national war finance committee.

The following table shows the estimated derivation of applications for victory bonds at the time of issue of each loan.

The applications for each loan are divided into two broad classes, designated "Individuals" and "Non-Individuals".

The class designated "Individuals" includes two sub-divisions, described as "Special Names" and "General and Payroll Canvasses." The amounts shown for special names represent applications received in the special names canvass from individuals believed to be capable of buying $25,000 or more of bonds at the time of each loan. The amounts shown for general and payroll canvasses represent the combined total of applications received in these canvasses. General canvass applications include some sales to small commercial and small non-profit bodies. Total applications from these non-individuals would be a relatively small part of the total amount shown opposite the designation "General and Payroll Canvasses".

The non-individuals class has been subdivided to show applications from banks for their own account; government accounts; insurance companies, pension funds, etc., and savings banks; and miscellaneous, this general group reflecting, with minor exception, applications from business firms and corporations.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF HOWARD B. CHASE AS CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF C.B.C.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, may I table copies of orders in council P.C. 5060 and 5061 of the 4th of this month. With regret may I say the first accepts the resignation of Mr. Rene Morin as chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the second appoints Mr. Howard B. Chase to replace Mr. Morin.

May I explain that Mr. Morin has been connected with the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation since September 10, 1936. He consented to his appointment as chairman being renewed in November, 1942, but at that time he told me he could not give any guarantee that he would serve for the full period. Some time ago he intimated that his other duties had increased to the extent that he should tender his resignation as chairman. In doing so, he expressed appreciation of the staff of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and of his colleagues, and he was kind enough to say a word about the minister as well.

I am particularly pleased to be able to announce the appointment of Mr. Chase, which marks, I believe, some special recognition of labour. He has merited well of Canada and I know he will do so in his new appointment.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National War Services, on motions rather than on the orders of the day, a question arising out of the statement which he has just made. Is Mr. Morin still serving on the board of governors?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Oh, yes. He has been good enough to remain as governor.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask when we may expect the order in council appointing a general manager of the corporation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It cannot be before I receive a recommendation from the board of governors, which recommendation I have not yet had.

Mr. GRAYDON: There never was such a delay as that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are doing very well, indeed.

Mr. GRAYDON: You do not have much support for that in the house.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Not from you, no.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCCANN—REFERENCE TO PRESS DISPATCH IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF JULY 6

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege and as chairman of the parliamentary committee on radio broadcasting, I wish to make a brief observation based upon a press dispatch appearing in the Globe and Mail of July 6. The dispatch reads as follows:

> Ottawa, July 5.—The parliamentary committee on radio broadcasting likely will recommend removal of the $2.50 licence fee, Douglas G. Ross, P.C., Toronto, St. Paul's, said to-day. The committee is currently in final session to draft recommendations to parliament.

This statement has been given wide publicity, and will no doubt receive further publicity. Let me say that the last two meetings of the radio broadcasting committee were held in camera; the statement issued did not emanate from the radio broadcasting committee and must be regarded as the personal opinion of the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. REID: I hope there is some truth in it.

TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1944

CANADA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION SIGNED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 8, 1944

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 159, respecting a certain tax convention between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Ottawa, in the Dominion of Canada, on the eighth day of June, 1944.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister to explain?

Mr. GIBSON: I gave a full outline of the provisions of the convention for the avoidance of double taxation in regard to succession duties on June 16 in this house. The bill is to ratify the convention with the United States.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRAINING FOR SERVICE IN AMGOT

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are officers in the army, navy and air forces in Canada being given an opportunity to take courses preparatory to service in "AMGOT"?
2. If so, how many have actually been given the course?
3. How many Canadians is it anticipated will be utilized or absorbed in "AMGOT"?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Navy, army and air force officers from units in Canada have been trained at staff courses for civil affairs.

2. 1 naval officer, 108 army officers and 19 air force officers from units in Canada have been given the Canadian civil affairs staff course at Royal Military College. 11 army officers were despatched overseas in December, 1943, for a course in civil affairs, and in addition 28 army officers will shortly be despatched for a course commencing in August, 1944.

3. It is expected that all officers now trained or being trained in civil affairs work will eventually be utilized. It is not possible to say whether this will be the ultimate number as this depends on conditions in Europe.

WARTIME HOUSING—UNITS BUILT AND PROJECTED

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many separate housing units have been built in Canada by Wartime Housing?
2. How many more are under construction or to be built?
3. Where are these situated?

VENEER LOG SUPPLY, LTD.—BIRCH AND MAPLE VENEER LOGS

Mr. DORION:

1. What is the quantity of export quality and second quality birch and maple veneer logs, separately, produced, purchased or acquired by the crown company known as Veneer Log Supply Ltd., of Montreal, during the years 1940-41, 1941-42, and 1942-43?

2. What quantities were produced, acquired or purchased in the provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick, and Quebec, separately, during the said years?

3. Was decimal C Scribner scale used in each province?

4. What quantities of veneer logs were exported to the United Kingdom or other countries during the years mentioned?

5. What quantities of birch or maple veneer logs of both qualities were sold to: The Guelph Cask Veneer & Plywood Co., Limited, Scotstown, Que.; Canada Veneers Ltd., Saint John, N.B.; Dominion Shuttle Company, Lachute, Que.; Commonwealth Plywood Ltd., Ste-Therese, Que.; The Singer Manufacturing Company, Thurso, Que.?

6. What prices were paid by the crown company for birch and maple logs in each year?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. During its first fiscal year's operation which ended August, 1943, Veneer Log Supply Limited purchased 14,810,570 feet of standard quality veneer logs and 164,850 feet of second-grade veneer logs.

2. During the fiscal year ending August, 1943, the following quantities of standard quality veneer logs were purchased by Veneer Log Supply by provinces as follows: Quebec, 7,293,740 feet; Ontario, 2,449,630 feet; Maritimes (N.B. and N.S.), 5,067,200 feet.

In addition, 164,850 feet of second grade logs were purchased in Ontario.

3. As each province uses a different scale, Veneer Log Supply Limited decided that they would apply the Scribner decimal C log rule in all cases.

4. By Veneer Log Supply Limited during its first fiscal year of operations, ending August, 1943, (a) 7,147,560 feet of standard quality veneer logs; (b) none.

Except for the period of time stated above, the export of veneer logs, if any, is not known to the department.

5. During its first year's operation ending August, 1943, Veneer Log Supply sold the following quantities of standard quality veneer logs to the companies mentioned.

Guelph Cask Veneer & Plywood Co., 1,062,570 feet.

Canada Veneers Limited, 3,073,890 feet.

Dominion Shuttle Company Ltd., 727,890 feet.

Commonwealth Plywood Co. Ltd., 2,170,950 feet.

No sales were made to the Singer Manufacturing Company in this period.

6. Prices paid by Veneer Log Supply as follows:

FREQUENCY OF CREAM COLLECTIONS, QUEBEC AND ONTARIO

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. How often are the Quebec creameries allowed to collect cream from the Quebec farmers?

2. How often are the Ontario creameries allowed to collect cream from the Ontario farmers?

3. Is there a difference between the collection by Quebec and Ontario creameries? If so, why is there this difference?

4. Do any Quebec creameries collect cream in Ontario?

5. If so, how often do they collect cream in Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Three times weekly during months of June, July and August, twice weekly during May and September, and once weekly from October 1 to April 30, both inclusive. (Due to road conditions, collections in many Quebec areas are suspended, or made only intermittently, during most of the period last mentioned).

2. With minor exceptions, twice weekly from July 3 to August 26, three times every two weeks from May 1 to July 2 and from August 27 to September 30, and once weekly from October 1 to April 30. Exceptions are collections made on behalf of creameries serving two sparsely settled communities in northern Ontario and one in northwestern Ontario. In these, collections are permitted as often as twice weekly from May 1 to September 30 (once weekly during the balance of the year) for reasons indicated in the reply to question No. 3.

3. Yes. The maximum frequencies authorized for the collection by truck of churning cream at different seasons in Ontario and in Quebec (under the provisions of Administrator's Order No. A-533 of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board) have been governed by the frequencies found to be required in order to prevent deterioration of the product and, in turn, largely by the extent and effectiveness of farm cooling facilities available generally in the respective provinces. Experience has shown that on this basis the more frequent collections permissible in Quebec than in Ontario during the months of May to September, both inclusive, are necessary, and that currently authorized maximum collection frequencies in Ontario are adequate. Recently as a result of weather conditions, an increase was authorized in the maximum frequency of collections of churning cream in Ontario generally during the period July 3, 1944, to August 26, 1944, from three collections every two weeks (as in 1943) to two collections weekly.

4. A very small number of Quebec creameries situated near the interprovincial boundary have been authorized to collect cream in nearby Ontario areas, but only over routes served by them before the controlling order became effective (January 1, 1943). The volume of such collections is relatively insignificant.

5. Such Quebec creameries are permitted to collect cream in Ontario. No more often than Ontario creameries operating in the same areas may collect in that province, as set out in the reply to question No. 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SEED GRAIN

Mr. PURDY:

By provinces, what has been the cost to the federal government (including unpaid balances outstanding) for seed grain during the past twenty years?

TERRACE, B.C., AIRPORT

Mr. BRYCE:

1. Has a hardware store operated by E. T. Kenney, at Terrace, B.C., supplied stores to the airport at Terrace?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

2. If so, what amounts have been involved in the supply of such stores?

3. Were such stores supplied on a commission basis and, if so, what amounts were involved in commissions?

4. If such stores were not supplied on a commission basis, on what basis were they supplied?

HEMLOCK AUTOMOTIVE CRATING

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many carloads of hemlock automotive crating were shipped from British Columbia into Ontario for the automotive crating trade in the first five months of 1944?

2. How many carloads of hemlock, from what mills, and what quantity from each of the mills was supplied in the above period?

3. What are the names and numbers of cars of hemlock and fir received by each motor company or box factory in Ontario in the above period?

4. Is it on record in any government department that the Coast Sawmills Limited is affiliated in any way with H. R. MacMillan, or the H. R. MacMillan Export Company?

5. Is Mr. K. M. Brown, the present deputy timber controller, on loan from Coast Sawmills Limited at $1 per year, or is he paid by the government? If so, what is his salary?

6. Is Mr. A. G. Wilmot, automotive crating director, paid by his own company, Canfield-Wilmot, or paid by the government? If he is paid by the government, what is his salary?

7. Are there any government records showing that Canfield-Wilmot or Coast Sawmills Limited received any commissions or remuneration on any of the hemlock automotive crating shipped in the first five months of 1944? If so, on how many cars did each company receive commission or earnings?

8. Is a complete record of all lumber shipped in Canada kept by the timber control office so that the above information must be a matter of record and not difficult to produce?

9. How many cars of merchantable spruce lumber were shipped from Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to the United States in the first five months of 1943?

10. Are hemlock boards 1⅛" thick still being shipped to the automotive trade in Ontario from British Columbia? If not, why was shipment stopped?

11. Were 1⅛" hemlock boards costing the box and motor companies approximately $50 or more per thousand delivered in the above period? Was this approved by the controller?

12. Were a large quantity of these boards green and wet, and about how much of the $50 cost was allowed by the controller for extra freight?

13. If $50 was not the delivered cost, what was the approximate delivered cost?

14. Was the ceiling price of eastern spruce 1⅛" boards delivered Toronto, Ontario, in above period, $41.50 plus overweights of about $1.50 per thousand feet, making the delivered cost not more than about $43 per thousand on a Toronto freight rate?

15. Were there any protests registered to the Department of Munitions and Supply or the timber controller by the box companies or the government inspectors, or any one else against the use of hemlock boards in automotive crates in the last five months? If so, give details and names of those protesting.

16. Are automotive boxes made from this hemlock causing trouble and have they deteriorated? Are hemlock boards still being shipped as automotive crating?

17. Is some of this replacement and repair work being done by ordnance at Longue Pointe, Quebec? Is it being done at any other depots?

18. Has the transport controller or any other controller protested to the Department of Munitions and Supply or any other department of the government about the unsatisfactory condition of these hemlock boxes? If so, give particulars.

19. If these hemlock boxes are already giving trouble, what does the department anticipate their condition will be if they are exposed to sun and rain for another ninety days?

20. What will be the cost of re-crating or repairing these hemlock boxes; how much has been spent to date, and what expenditure is anticipated this year to re-crate this material so that it can be shipped to the war theatres?

21. Has Mr. A. G. Wilmot, automotive crating controller, resigned? If so, who has been appointed in his place, and what are his qualifications, or why was he appointed?

22. Have any of the automobile companies asked the government or the timber controller to allow them to nominate a man from the lumber purchasing department of one of their automobile companies to act as automotive crating director to replace Mr. A. G. Wilmot?

23. Have any of the lumber companies interested in supplying automotive crating made any recommendations to the Department of Munitions and Supply or the timber controller in the past year and a half with regard to the selection of the automotive crating controller? What was this recommendation, and was it considered?

24. Was any suggestion made to the timber controller or the Minister of Munitions and Supply in writing by any company in the lumber business with regard to the resignation of the deputy timber controller, K. M. Brown, or the appointment of his successor?

WHEAT—PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Have the participation certificates been paid for the wheat crop years 1940-41, and 1941-42, and 1942-43?

2. If not, would the government give the reason for the delay?

3. For the purpose of income tax, is money received by farmers by reason of participation certificates, considered to be part of the income for the year in which the payment is made?

4. If so, has the government considered it advisable to make suitable adjustments to have these payments considered to be income for the crop years to which they apply, and, when does the government expect to announce their decision in respect to this?

FLAX PROCESSING—PRAIRIE VEGETABLE OILS LIMITED

Mr. BENCE:

1. What assistance, if any, was given by the dominion government to Prairie Vegetable Oils Limited of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, with respect to the construction of a flax processing plant at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan?

2. From what source did the said Prairie Vegetable Oils Limited obtain the machinery now being used at its plant in Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan?

3. What permission, if any, was given by the dominion government, with respect to the importation of such machinery?

4. Who is the president and/or managing director of the said company?

FLAX PROCESSING—W. R. CARPENTER (CANADA) LIMITED

Mr. BENCE:

1. What assistance, if any, was given by the dominion government to W. R. Carpenter (Canada) Limited, with respect to the construction of a flax processing plant at Hamilton, Ontario?

2. From what source did the said W. R. Carpenter (Canada) Limited obtain the machinery now being used at its plant in Hamilton, Ontario?

3. What permission, if any, was given by the dominion government, with respect to the importation of such machinery?

4. Who is the president and/or managing director of the said company?

PROCESSING OF VEGETABLE OIL BEARING MINERALS—VICTORY MILLS LIMITED

Mr. BENCE:

1. What assistance, if any, was given by the dominion government to Victory Mills Limited, Toronto, in connection with the construction at Toronto, Ontario, of a plant for the processing of vegetable oil bearing materials?

2. From what source did the said Victory Mills Limited obtain the machinery now being used at its plant in Toronto, Ontario?

3. What permission, if any, was given by the dominion government, with respect to the importation of such machinery?

4. Who is the president and/or managing director of the said company?

IMPORTATION OF POTATOES FOR STARCH MANUFACTURE

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. What quantity of potatoes were imported from the state of Maine through the port of St. Leonard, New Brunswick, during the months of March, April and May, 1944?

2. Were any of these potatoes manufactured into starch, and were they imported for that purpose?

3. If so, and to the extent that such potatoes were manufactured into starch, who manufactured them and at what plant?

4. Was the approval of the Minister of Agriculture secured before such importation took place?

5. Did the Minister of Agriculture for New Brunswick request or seek such importation?

CANADIAN ARMY

CLOSING OF BRANDON TRAINING CENTRE AND ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): On June 26 the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) stated, as appears in Hansard, page 4145, that it had been brought to his notice that on the closing of the A-4 training centre in the city of Brandon a large amount of surplus supplies were destroyed instead of being sold for salvage or turned over to citizens who could use them. I advised the house at the time that inquiries in the matter would be made forthwith.

I now want to say that a very full investigation has been made. Statements have been received from officers concerned with the disposal of the supplies. Colonel W. G. B. Dailley, the chairman of the army salvage and disposal board, proceeded to Winnipeg and to Brandon, where he interviewed not only officers concerned but also a number of civilians who were mentioned as being critical of the manner in which the surplus supplies were dealt with.

The supplies disposed of were barrack stores consisting for the most part of earthenware, enamelware, and retinned mess-hall and kitchen utensils. All serviceable and non-serviceable stores which could be repaired or had salvage value were first gathered together and turned over to a central point for storage and shipment to ordnance. All stores considered to have no salvage value, such as plates, cups, saucers, enamelware, garbage pails, brooms, brushes, et cetera, were then gathered together in central locations throughout the camp for final inspection and disposal. They were then examined piece by piece by an officer and non-commissioned officers and a decision reached as to whether they were fit for further use or worth the cost of their return to ordnance in Winnipeg.

A total of 3,343 articles, having an original value of $2,169, were condemned and destroyed out of a total of 34,712 articles returned to ordnance by the units concerned, having a total original value of $45,338. This represented 9·6 per cent by number and less than five per cent by value. Approximately eighty per cent of the stores condemned and destroyed were enamelware articles, which had been condemned by the medical authorities.

The articles destroyed were put on the city dump and not sold as salvage because their value as scrap in the location where they were was considerably less than the cost would be of the handling of them and the freight for their transportation to any place where they could be sold. The army authorities examined the articles carefully and took every precaution to save any which were reparable.

I should point out that articles which might appear suitable for civilian use on a cursory examination might nevertheless be properly condemned for military use under army regulations in the interests of the health of the troops, and of the health of civilians as well for that matter.

I am satisfied there was no breach of regulations or any waste of army property in the action taken at Brandon.

CLOTHING ALLOWANCE TO DISCHARGED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of a return filed on May 18 as to the sufficiency of the $65 clothing allowance. Has anything been done since then? Returned heroes are going around in winter clothing.

Mr. RALSTON: As I stated before, the matter is having consideration along with a number of rehabilitation measures, and I think an announcement will be made with reference to it, along with these other matters.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ACADIA COAL COMPANY—ALLEGED CHANGE IN WORKING CONDITIONS WITHOUT CONSULTATION WITH UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, based on a telegram received from the board member of the United Mine Workers of America, at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, to the effect that miners at the Allan shaft, Acadia Coal company, have been notified by the management that working conditions have been changed, without consultation with union officials. This constitutes a violation of contract on the company's part. Miners are idle, protesting against this action by management. Is the department aware of this situation? If so, what steps are being taken to avoid serious loss of production?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, this would seem to be a labour matter, as the question refers to an agreement between a union and a private firm. I suggest that my hon. friend direct his question to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. GILLIS: Yesterday when I received this telegram I took the matter up with the Department of Labour. So far as that department is authorized to do so they are handling that end, but they advise me that the matter of production is one which comes within the province of the Department of Munitions and Supply and that I should raise it there.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I think it should be said that this is a normal industrial dispute. I say on my responsibility as Minister of Labour that immediately we had the notice of this dispute one of our senior conciliators got in touch with the parties concerned. That is the normal proceeding; it happens almost every day of the week, although people do not always go on strike; sometimes we can get in before they walk off the job. Hon. members can rest assured that everything that can be done is being done by the conciliation branch of the Department of Labour to get the men to go back to work and resume normal operations.

WHEAT

ISSUE OF CHEQUES FOR PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): A few days ago the hon. member for Lake Centre addressed a question regarding what he stated was delay in the issuance of participation certificates covering the balances coming to farmers in western Canada. I told him that I would get some information upon it.

I find that the matter was under consideration in the committee of agriculture when the chairman of the wheat board appeared before that committee on June 28, and Mr. McIvor gave a full statement about it. Any supplemental information I have simply indicates that the cheques are going out as rapidly as possible. Something over 100,000 cheques have been issued, and the rest are going as quickly as an office force, which I understand comprises 200, can get them ready to be sent out.

HOUSING

EVICTION OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES—NOTIFICATIONS TO VACATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): On the orders of the day of June 30 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked a question based upon a press clipping which he was good enough to send me. The question was whether or not in a particular industry families of war workers who had enlisted for overseas service had been evicted by Wartime Housing Limited. The answer to the question is no. It is not the policy of Wartime Housing to evict families of war workers who have enlisted for overseas service or who have been called up for military training. In fact, the officials of wartime housing with whom I have been in communication inform me that they know of no case in which war workers enlisting for overseas service under these circumstances have been evicted from any of their units. The policy in fact has been quite the contrary. At Welland, which was mentioned in the press clipping, there are at the moment twenty-eight soldier families now being housed, who are living in those units.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I point out to the parliamentary assistant that this particular matter was raised, I believe, by the mayor of the municipality of Welland. He was the person who made the statement. Will the department consider communicating with the mayor to clear this matter up? He is an important and responsible official, and the statement having come from him at a convention of municipalities, it seems to me that the matter should not be allowed to drop just there.

Mr. LOCKHART: Arising out of the statement made by the parliamentary assistant, may I ask whether the policy of notifying soldiers' wives to vacate has been discontinued? If the parliamentary assistant wishes to know of cases where they have been notified to get out and where pressure has been brought to bear upon them, I can give him information. There must have been a change of policy.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know of no case where notices have been given by Wartime Housing Limited to families of soldiers who have enlisted for overseas service or have been called up under the regulations.

Mr. LOCKHART: At any time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed by the officers that there are no cases where notices of eviction have been given. If my hon. friend knows of some I shall be glad to take them up.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am not speaking of eviction, but of definite notices to vacate. I did not say they were evicted, but I want to know whether the policy has been changed in regard to notifying them that they are expected to move out.

Mr. CHURCH: The Minister of Munitions and Supply will have on his hands a serious situation in housing next fall all over Canada unless something is done right away.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 5, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to refer briefly to certain clauses in the budget which to our group are objectionable, and in a general way to point out wherein the 1944 Canadian budget has failed to meet the needs of 1944 Canada, which is looking to the future.

It is just a month ago to-day that the allied forces swarmed across the English channel to the Cherbourg peninsula and there established themselves on what appears at the present time to be the prelude to victory. The price is being paid to-day, as it has been paid by Canada for a number of years. The constantly increasing lists of casualties which reach our desks daily keep Canada informed of the price she is paying—the price which the common people of this country are forced to pay in order to establish and maintain peace and a hope for the common man in the future of the world.

There are evident now some very broad shapes of things to come. Some of them are these. Among the victorious allies there is a determination that a return to some of the old things of the world as we knew it must never be permitted. The dead past cannot return. To-day the common man is on the march to a better world. It is only natural that this war should bring about some great changes in the thinking and demands of the people throughout the world. In the first place, we have to remember what the world has suffered in the past fifteen years—first, ten years of a devastating depression, and then five years of a devastating war. The impact of these two events upon humanity throughout the world, and the constantly improving conditions and facilities for communication between different parts of the world, must of necessity bring about some change in the thinking of people everywhere. We do not condemn the budget as a war-time measure in support of the war; we are all solidly behind it; but we do condemn its failure to look forward to the needs of the people of Canada who are and have been suffering for the past two decades.

The common man as he looks over Canada's budget in 1944 is impressed by one or two things. Number one is that he sees his pay envelope with fewer deductions from it, but he knows that this means greater victory loans. One thing that does alarm him, however, is the constantly increasing national debt. We are not paying for the war. It will have to be paid for in the period that follows the war. Therefore we believe that this budget should have given some vision and some hope to the people that plans are being made now to make it possible for Canada to carry the load.

Prior to this war the national debt of approximately three billion dollars taxed the capacity of Canada's national income to carry it. Year after year we were borrowing money to pay interest on that debt. The debt was constantly increasing. I had hoped that the Minister of Finance, before he completed his discussion of the budget, would outline to the Canadian people what plans he has under the economy which he supports to take care of post-war financing the war and paying for it. Or are the Canadian people to expect a return to the excuses handed out to them following the last war? We are told that there is no money for social reform. "If you must enjoy the luxury of war, you have to pay for it." As one member of a delegation appearing before the reconstruction committee said, referring to paying for war, "If you are going on a spree, you must expect a headache to follow." We were told that we could not have security because of the great debt we had incurred. We feel that the budget of 1944 has failed because it has failed to meet that particular demand. The Canadian people are looking forward to something better than they had in the pre-war days.

What is the story of Canada? Seventy-seven years ago on July 1 last Canada was formed into a confederation. It was the richest land for its population, in the world. The comparatively few people in it have nearly half of the north American continent with all its vast resources. The governments of this country were entrusted with the job of developing those resources—for what purpose? Surely the first purpose should be to supply the needs of the people in this land, to provide our people with the things that they require for decent living. Can anybody in this house maintain that they have succeeded in that? They have given away the resources of this country, largely to private industry, in many cases to monopolistic industry. All the Canadian people have asked is that they be given the opportunity to work in the factories and plants of industry to develop the resources, and in return for that labour be provided with an income with which they can supply themselves and their families with a decent living. In spite of the fact that these industries have our resources, large deposits of coal, nickel and other minerals, the vast resources of water-power, vast forest resources, the wealth of Canada from one end to the other, the economic organization of this country has failed to provide the Canadian people with the bare requirements essential to enable them to attain a decent living standard.

Mr. REID: It is on a much higher level than that of any other country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Tell that to the millions of people who were on relief in Canada in 1937.

An hon. MEMBER: Take some other period.

Mr. COLDWELL: Take it for ten years before the war.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. REID: Stand up and say it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about doing that yourself?

Mr. REID: I will.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am making my speech now. I listened to you making yours and I did not interrupt. If I have time before my forty minutes are up I will permit questions from the hon. member.

Let us look at the 1944 budget and find out what has been done with regard to certain concessions to industry which operated in this country prior to the war. I refer hon. members to page 4181 of Hansard of June 26. I should like to read to the house a portion of the first paragraph on that page. It is as follows:

> The proposal is that one-half the expenditure on maintenance and repairs, incurred in a period to be fixed by the governor in council, may be charged against the income of a previous fiscal period but not farther back than the fiscal periods ending in 1943.

The next sentence is particularly significant:

> In the case of the mining industry, maintenance and repairs will be held to include also underground development work.

With regard to income tax, that means the mining industry of Canada are going to be permitted to charge one-half of the expenditure of underground development against their income. Notice that the governor in council is given the power to determine the particular period. Order in council government has certainly reached dangerous limits in this land when the budget turns over to the governor in council the right to determine the period, and later on what particular areas, shall be affected with regard to oil development. This is the kind of thing which Canadians would do well to watch and curb.

The next paragraph affects practically all industries in Canada. This is what the budget says when referring to research work:

> The classes of expenditure for research are not allowed as an expense of doing business: capital expenditures such as for laboratories, pilot plants, et cetera, and current expenses for research which are not directly related to the firm's immediate production activities. It is recommended that these limitations be removed and that all expenditures on research be allowed in the year of expenditure and that research expenditures of a capital nature be written off as an expense over a period of three years.

In effect, that means that industry can carry on research and charge the cost of it back as a part of the expense of doing business, and thus reduce their taxable surplus. In other words, it means that to a large extent, the Canadian taxpayer is to pay for the research, but will get nothing out of it. Industry will gain all the benefits of the research. It will not be available to the people of Canada except that they have to pay through industry for the price of the commodity. It means that the benefit of scientific and technological development will go only to those who have the power to continue their exploitation of the people.

Mr. HOMUTH: No; that is not fair.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The results of scientific research in Canada will become the property of that particular industry. They will put the cost of it in the price of the commodity, and if the people can afford to buy it they will pay for it. If they cannot afford to buy it, they will not get it.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is a most unfair argument.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The costs of research are now charged as a part of the operation of business, thereby reducing the taxable income of the companies.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is according to the budget. You may read it yourself.

I should now like to refer particularly to what is said about the oil industry. I refer hon. members to page 4183 of Hansard where the following appears:

> The budget resolutions therefore include a recommendation to provide a tax credit of fifty per cent of the cost of any well drilled in the selected areas and spudded in between June 26, 1944, and March 31, 1945, if such well proves to be unproductive. This tax credit will be allowed only with respect to projects recommended by the Minister of Mines and Resources and approved by the governor in council.

Again special consideration is to be given to those particular cases which are recommended by the Minister of Mines and Resources and approved by the governor in council, and the special prospecting grants with regard to which a tax credit has been given are being extended for another year to the prospecting syndicate.

Mr. HOMUTH: Whose money goes into it?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The tax exemptions are there, but the company makes the profit. It really means in the end, so far as such concessions are concerned, that private and in many cases monopolistic industry in Canada, dying of its own selfishness, now bleeds the public treasury to prolong its life and increase its power to exploit both Canada and Canadians.

Mr. GIBSON: Do you object to the encouragement of oil production?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not think that the big oil monopolies of the world require any special concessions such as they have had in the past, particularly through orders in council of this government. Most of the oil companies are well able to take care of themselves. I do not see why special concessions should be granted to them. So far as this budget is concerned there is no indication as to whom the concessions are to go, to the small man or to the big man.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, you have reduced wages in Saskatchewan already.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are indications that we have need of a budget which will provide for the economic and social welfare of the people before consideration is given to these rewards to capital. The health, education and well-being of the Canadian people should take precedence over the dividends paid to shareholders. Surely the Canadian economy can be so organized that our people will not be forced to stagnate under a system of private enterprise which recognizes no social responsibility and operates only to the extent to which it can extract profits.

The Canadian people were looking for something more than this in the budget of 1944. They were looking for something that would curb the powers of those people who in the past have done so well at the expense of the worker and the common man. The great Canadians of to-day should receive first consideration in any budget, and by great Canadians I mean those who have laid down their lives in this world conflict; I mean the wounded who are returning to us in increasing numbers; I mean the soldiers who have done their bit and are being brought back to this country; I mean the men and women in khaki, the fathers and mothers, the wives and sweethearts of our soldiers, some of whom have lost their dearest and best in this war. I refer to the workers in the factories and fields, to the toilers who produce the wealth of the nation. What do those people want? What do they ask for to-day? Were the wants, the hopes and aspirations of these people in the minds of those who framed Canada's budget? I do not think so. Surely the sacrifices they have made deserve more than the hopelessness of the past, the low wage standards, the want, the slum conditions, the low educational standards, the denial to our young people of the right to live, the right which was denied them in the era to which hon. gentlemen to my right refer. Shall the Canadian people beg of industry the right to toil at low wages? Shall the farmer and producer continue to beg for a decent return for his products from monopolistic processors and those who purchase the products of their toil? Shall the consumer be compelled to continue to pay toll to those who control the very necessities of life?

The economy of Canada should be so arranged that there would be no scarcity in this land. Leisure could be used for recreational and cultural development.

Let me outline a typical project which might be undertaken at a time like this if there was any assurance that the necessary money would be forthcoming, that the economy of this land would be so changed that we could afford it. We have now something like 32,000 women in the armed forces of this country. When the war is over a large number of these women will be looking for a place in our economy. From that group of women we could develop a force of trained, experienced social service workers who could go into all parts of Canada and assist in instituting a health programme, in educating our people in the standards of nutrition; in carrying on cultural activities in various community centres; in bringing the story of our great Canadian national life to all parts of the country, promoting national unity and giving people all over Canada an opportunity to give expression to themselves in the work they do. But if the 1944 budget is any indication, I am afraid Canada will not be able to afford that.

In this very city we have an example of what can be done in a democratic way by a group of enterprising people. I refer to a voluntary organization known as the Civil Service Recreational Association. Hon. members would be well repaid if they would take the trouble to look into what these people have done in order to enlarge the lives of those people who otherwise would be limited to humdrum office work. Now they have recreation; they have cultural activities; they have choirs and music; they have drama; they have sports and recreational activities of all kinds, almost one hundred in all. Many of them have discovered within themselves talents they never knew they possessed.

The Canadian people live to a great extent in frustration because of a lack of opportunity; throughout their lives they are forced to conform to a particular design, sitting behind a desk with no other means of expression.

Mr. REID: They should take up the bagpipes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was speaking of music.

There are signs that the Canadian people will no longer tolerate what has gone on in the past. The other day the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said that the leader and members of this group had started something they could not control. I should like to take a few minutes to outline just what we have started. I think perhaps the hon. gentleman's remarks arose from his regret that we had started something that he and his party could not control.

In 1932 and 1933 this party started a truly democratic people's movement in this country. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is an example of the real, democratic operation of a party. In any small poll or community in Canada a group of people may meet to discuss the problems of the country, and they join the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. They send their delegates to the provincial convention, which is held every year. To this convention come representative workers, farmers, business men, doctors, teachers, lawyers and people from every walk of life. There they draft the programme, the policy and the philosophy of the C.C.F. party. At the annual convention these people chose their leaders democratically, and these leaders—

Mr. CLEAVER: How is that different from any other party?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that these interruptions are not permissible except with the consent of the hon. gentleman who is speaking.

Mr. REID: I was interrupted all the time I was making my speech.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These interruptions do not bother me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members must not interrupt the hon. gentleman without his permission. He is entitled to proceed with his remarks unless he indicates his willingness to answer any questions.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. gentleman has said he does not mind interruptions.

Mr. COLDWELL: The other evening, Mr. Speaker, you named an hon. member for continually interrupting.

Mr. REID: I rise to a point of order. I am not to be referred to in the same manner as the hon. member who was named the other night.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The point of order having been settled, I shall continue. This movement, which hon. members are afraid we cannot control, holds also its biennial national convention. Executive leaders are chosen at each convention. There are executives and councils in the various provincial parts of this movement across Canada. I say there is no more democratic political party in existence in Canada. There are those who would like to control democracy. We want to see democracy controlling governments, and government by the people of Canada.

The common man in Canada to-day is aroused. He is determined that social well-being shall come first. Health, education and human welfare are to be the first aims and objects of the industrial life and political organization of this country. If private profit prevents well-being, then I say it should be replaced by a democratic and cooperative organization in society where service shall replace selfishness, as an expression of life.

May I say in closing that there are indications that the march of the common man is not confined alone to Canada, nor is it confined to the British empire. There is to-day the sound of the feet of the "common man" on the march, in his demand for a true recognition of the rights and importance of those who toil. It will not be denied. I condemn this budget as being reactionary. It may be Canada's last reactionary budget.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I wish to make this afternoon are suggested to me by three other speeches made in the house. I refer first to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in introducing the budget, and next to the criticism of the budget by the nominated critic of the Progressive Conservative party. I should like also to make some observations upon the speech delivered a few days ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer).

I would say in the first place that, all things considered, in such times as these the budget is a good one. Pretty nearly everything possible by way of ameliorating conditions has been done—perhaps not everything, but the adjustments are many, and they are welcome. We cannot have, nor do I think we have any right to expect, a general lowering of taxation in war time.

Despite this truth it seems to me there is running through the speeches of members of this party sitting immediately to my left, the Conservative party, a longing, a sort of homesickness for the halcyon days of the last war, when wealthy men made large profits and did not pay much in taxes. Well, that sort of thing may be desired by some; but I am convinced that it is not desired by the rank and file of the people of Canada. We do not think that belts should be loosened at this time. With men bleeding and dying on the battlefields, in the air and on the seas we all know that the Canadian people cannot let up at this time; nor do they wish to do so.

Even in war time, however, there are some adjustments in taxation which can be made. Undoubtedly there has been pressure upon some people beyond what was just and equitable. An example will suffice to show what I mean. We had girl wage earners getting as low as $55 a month. If an increase were granted making $60 a month, taxation immediately stepped in and cut down that $5 to $1.50. In a year a $60 increase would be reduced to between $18 and $20. Absenteeism and damage to production were bound to result from that sort of thing. So that for practical reasons, as well as for the sake of justice, changes which should command approval have been made.

I say at once that I prefer to have an absolute exemption with respect to taxation, not an exemption such as we have at the present time which lasts only as long as a person does not have earnings above a certain stated amount. When we have a dividing line of that kind we are bound to get too great a spread between people on either side of the taxation exemption line.

Among the sixty odd changes which have been outlined in the budget speech, I think the one respecting alimony is worthy of attention. It is more important than would appear at first sight. Some of the injustices in the law as it stood were indeed simply outrageous. I know of a man who married a woman who had two illegitimate children. It was not very long before they added to the family, called "hers", some more children called "theirs." Then they were divorced, and he was ordered to pay alimony. Later he remarried, and there was more family. Then came the taxes. Well, you can well imagine what happened. He was like the old woman who lived in the shoe, who had so many children she didn't know what to do. In his case it was that of having so many wives that he didn't know what to do; and also of having so many children that he didn't know what to do. On top of all, there were so many tax gatherers and so much taxes he was frantic. Everybody suffered. The budgetary proposal of to-day will remove such injustice, but it illustrates the nature of the change.

I now come to the criticisms of the budget offered by the Conservative party. I am bound to say that that criticism was well delivered. I remember hearing an old golfer speaking to another golfer who was looking for some praise in respect of his game. The old one said that the other fellow's stance was good That was as far as he would go. And so in this case I think we have to say that the critic of the Conservative party delivered his words of criticism in a very acceptable manner. So far, however, as the subject matter of the speech is concerned, the offering is entirely negligible. The speech was inconsistent, evasive and uncertain. Any positive suggestions are of decidedy small calibre.

So far as being evasive is concerned, let us take the position of that party on the subject of social security. In that respect they clearly evade the issue. The critic did pay some lip service to the general idea of social security. But all he offers, after opposing family allowances, is to set up a debating society to consider social security, to discuss it and to commune over it.

Their uncertainty of policy arises particularly in respect of their policy on manpower. The hon. member wants the men taken out of the army and put to work. Mr. McTague says that they should be kept in the army and sent to war.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, he did not. He would put them one place or another.

Mr. MAYBANK: The static has started again.

Mr. HOMUTH: Static is all right in the hon. member's speech.

Mr. MAYBANK: I can understand the hon. member saying that static is all right. I can easily understand that he has some love for static. However, he does not like it so much when it comes into his own speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: It went over very well, though, didn't it?

Mr. MAYBANK: No person can talk against the rumble of a truck. Mr. McTague, as I say, desires to have the men kept in the army, and sent to war. Mr. Bracken, who is the personification of uncertainty, says nothing at all. There is a well-known series of cartoons going around just now, in which the hon. member is pictured under the caption "Don't Ask Me."

Mr. ROWE: On a question of privilege, I believe I have the right to suggest to the hon. member that he is misinterpreting my statement. I did not suggest that they should be taken out of the army and sent back to the farms. I said they should be marshalled for the purposes for which they were conscripted. Therefore I say he is misrepresenting what I said. I would ask the hon. member himself whether, if the army needs men, and we have only three per cent of the allied forces, he would not agree to what I proposed that these men be sent overseas.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is no question of privilege.

Mr. MAYBANK: I felt quite certain when the hon. member began, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling would be that there is no question of privilege. I am quite certain that I did not misrepresent what the hon. gentleman said, I listened to him with great care when he was speaking the other day and read his remarks afterwards. Perhaps he may not have had as much to do with the preparation of his speech as is sometimes the case with persons who deliver speeches, and he may have forgotten what its contents were.

Then with respect to the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman, first he placed his party squarely against the abolition of compulsory savings on the ground that he was opposed to inflation, but shortly afterwards he advocated a different form of tax reduction in the nature of exemptions. Obviously if there is inflation in the one there is inflation in the other. You cannot very well say that there is anything consistent about an hon. gentleman who at one moment says that you must keep spending power out of the hands of the people and keep this impost of compulsory savings upon them, and in the next breath say that you must put more money into their hands to spend by way of granting them a tax exemption.

I have said that his speech was well delivered, and I certainly stand by that; I do not want to go back on that—not one word. But when you come to consider the matter which the speech contains, it is not any wonder that Mr. Bracken hid himself away. Last year Mr. Bracken sat opposite his chosen financial critic and watched him and heard him perform. But this year, having doubtless had something to do with the preparation of the speech, it seems that he felt that he could not stick it. Consequently we had the spectacle of him avoiding his usual observation post across from his nominated chief critic and sitting away back in the farthest gallery almost hidden by a post. At that distance, far away from the eyes of the pitying people, he probably felt that his duty to his party could be made supportable.

So much for the criticisms of the financial critic of the Conservative party. At that, I have probably spent too much time upon it.

The exceptional oratory of the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) holds every person, and it is not until one shakes himself free of the thrall of that oratory that some questions and doubts begin to arise in one's mind. I thoroughly enjoyed his speech the other day, but to-day I want to ask some questions and express some doubts.

The hon. member spoke of the national debt probably growing to $20,000 million and asserted that it would be unpayable and that the interest charges would crush us. The figure of $20,000 million is his guess, his estimate only. I consider the assumption a gratuitous one. Our experience in these very heavy war years hardly warrants the statement of such a figure. True, we are piling up debt, although we pay for a big share of our expenses as we go. Our total debt rose between 1939 and 1943 from $4,700 million to $11,300 million. It seems to me that recent events on the fighting fronts justify the belief that the end is not too far away, although certainly we have no justification for softening in our attitude towards the war. The figures I have mentioned, however, show that we have a long way to go to reach $20,000 million even if we keep up the rate of debt increase of the last few years. But the burden of debt is the interest that has to be paid. The total 1943 costs in interest were $304 million. The lower level of 1939 resulted in a cost of $169 million. In the interval—and indeed for some period before 1939—we were reducing the rate of interest. The rate was reduced between 1939 and 1943 from 3·61 per cent to 2·69 per cent. In other words, interest has not risen in proportion to the total of the principal of the debt.

We have no reason for fearing that such a load cannot be carried by the Canadian people. It is all wrong to try to make people frightened about their future. As a matter of fact, with practically all of this interest payable within Canada, the income of Canadians themselves is increased to the extent of $304 million. All this yields taxes. The actual interest load is not as great as at first sight appears.

The hon. member read a quotation from the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, but he read only one sentence. I wish to read the whole paragraph, because it strongly supports what I have already said. That paragraph reads as follows:

> In making these comments I do not wish to suggest that public debt could be increased at the present rate for an indefinite period without placing intolerable strain on our economy.

That is as far as the hon. gentleman read. Now I will read the remainder of the paragraph:

> I do feel, however, that the war debt, and the increases which will inevitably take place for a time after the war ends, can be handled without serious embarrassment. The key to this problem, as to many others, lies chiefly in the maintenance of a high level of employment and income.

In saying that we probably would have $20,000 million of debt, the hon. member directed our attention to the fact that, immediately following the last war, expenditures were equally as high as or higher than they had been during the war years. It will help us to keep cool by recalling that expenditures right after the last war were expenditures made under conditions of a very serious inflation. The whole price structure was high, and naturally this was reflected in government expenses. High interest rates for war loans had the same effect. All this is different now, and there are many other different favourable factors.

The two things we have to guard against to protect our future are runaway inflation and a decrease in income through unemployment. Government policies have certainly been effective thus far with respect to inflation, and this is something about which we cannot afford to take a chance. Our next duty is to make sure of the maintenance of a high income after the war. The Canadian people have no need to be timorous about this. With the great backlog of purchasing desire, with the millions of things to be done in this country, with the needs of the world outside this country, and with the strength of the post-war policies of this government, we can view the future of our country not merely with hope but with confidence.

I am not at the moment seeking to rule out the ideas of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I could not do so until these ideas are clarified. I approach them, however, with caution particularly induced when I notice the use he makes of quotations. For example, the hon. member quoted a splendid and stirring passage from a speech of Field Marshal Jan Christian Smuts. I do not suppose that there is a man or woman in Canada who will disagree with what Smuts says are the needs of our situation with respect to social security and other matters. The field marshal is speaking upon an economic matter and the hon. member seems to approve the field marshal. Well, I find that his government, the government of South Africa, is financing along the same so-called orthodox lines as the Canadian government is financing, and as the British government is financing, and as most governments of the world are financing. The hon. gentleman must be a little extreme in his denunciation of the policy, in view of the fact that Smuts, of whom he approves does himself in turn approve the present day system.

But in this respect we can come much closer home. Another stirring, eloquent, inspiring passage has been read by the hon. member from an oft-quoted book of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). This is followed by a quotation from a speech which the Prime Minister made. Its most significant lines are as follows:

> Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

The hon. member considers that to be sound economic doctrine. So do I. He holds the Prime Minister to be one who is deeply and keenly interested in the welfare of humanity; so do I. I think he further exhibits the Prime Minister as one who knows how, when opportunity offers, to effectuate his desires to improve the lot of mankind; so do I. Now this economic mind, the mind of the Prime Minister of Canada to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard pays tribute, is in favour of the present fiscal policy of Canada. The fiscal policy of Canada is his own policy. The taxation plans of this government and the victory loan plans of this government are his. This also was the case before the war.

I have difficulty then in following the hon. member when, in one and the same breath, he extols the Prime Minister with respect to his economic thinking as well as his emotional reactions, and denounces the Prime Minister's chief economic instrument as something which is utterly without health and no good at all. An all-out attack I can understand; and I can understand full-throated complete approval; but kicking and kissing at the same time has never been comprehensible to me.

Not merely is there a need of clearing up such ideas as I have referred to, but I think the hon. member and those who believe with him have to go farther and have to clarify a number of points before we can give a proper examination to the supposed new monetary policy. I have listened to and enjoyed a great many of the hon. member's speeches, and yet I do not exactly know what he would have us do. Generally when he finishes a speech I find something in it which is suggestive of his plan, but I have never heard a complete and a precise and a concise disclosure by him. I note his condemnation of what he calls "unpayable debt," and I note that he flays the very idea of paying interest. But negation is not enough. Until he can get down to the point of writing his own idea of a budget speech, indicating what should be done respecting war expenditures and other expenditures, and all other details in connection with government financing, I shall find it impossible to follow him because I cannot tell where he will lead.

The nearest thing to any concrete proposal upon the subject of monetary reform which I have heard was the proposal of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I do not know whether it can be justly termed the joint idea of these two hon. members, though it seemed to me that one did support the other. At any rate, to me that proposition did not look very good. It was, you will remember, a proposal that we print a billion dollars' worth of money—some such figure—or, if not print it, otherwise create it; it does not matter whether it be done with a fountain pen or with a printing press—and use this billion dollars for paying our expenses. I say it need not have been a billion; it could be more or it could be less.

All will admit, I think, that such a plan is not new. Various countries have tried it. It must be admitted, too, that it is not without benefit to some. To me it looks like a scheme which will enhance prices, and enhance them very greatly. This would benefit somebody. It would be a benefit to a man who has something to sell; that is, it would benefit him until he had to replace his goods. It would probably benefit large mine-owners; at any rate the wealthier. But for all people below the rank of the very wealthy it would mean disaster. A sharp upswing of prices would simply result in stark, unrelieved poverty for all except the very wealthy.

If I am wrong in claiming that such a policy means higher and higher prices, I submit it is up to the advocates to show that I am wrong. This is another thing which has not yet been done.

I know it may be argued that by our controls we keep prices down at the present time and could continue to do so under such a proposed plan. But we do so, now, partly because we keep away from creating money in the manner of that proposal. Moreover, it is only because of the patriotism of our people for the prosecution of the war that controls work at all. If we should have to put up permanently with all the restrictions of to-day, life would not be worth living. There is no hope for all this fascist control in peace-time Canadian life.

Again I repeat that whatever the new budgetary policy is, it should be set forth clearly and, if possible, concisely. There is no hope of frank discussion until that is done. But in the meantime let us take stock calmly of our position and we shall know that we have no cause for fear. The Canadian people have met many complicated and difficult situations in their history, and they have not been worsted by any of them. All our history teaches us that we have a great destiny. We have evoked the admiration of every country in the world by the manner in which we have performed our tasks over the last five years. We have only to go away from home for a little while to find how good a place it is. Let us stop crying these horrendous tales of fear into the ears of people, making them uncertain about the future of the country. If there is a new money system which will make our life easier from now on, let us see it and let us learn all about it. No person is afraid to look. But there is no advantage in merely criticizing the system under which we have done the great deeds which we have done, and crying that it is all outmoded and outworn. In other words, there never was any advantage to any person in merely crying "stinking fish" on his own doorstep.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, there are two occasions during the session of parliament on which the private member has a little more latitude than usual. The debate on the budget is one of them. I am going to make a few remarks with respect to the budget, and I hope to keep within the ambit of the subject and not transgress the rules.

First, may I express appreciation of the difficult task which always faces the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he is preparing a war budget such as this. This is his sixth, and it is one of the largest budgets we have had. I believe however that the Minister of Finance is most sincere, and I trust that every other member of this house is equally sincere, in his desire to devise ways and means of raising the funds that are necessary to carry the war to a successful conclusion. And after that has been done we must also find the ways and means necessary for the reconstruction that is to take place in the post-war period so that we may have something worth while to which our gallant fighting men can return. We must win this war, and there is no question about it that we are winning it. I am sure every member was pleased to listen on June 29 to the speech delivered in this house by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, who made the definite statement that the war is in process of being won. He went further and referred to the gallant part our Canadian men and women have played in the different theatres of the war, and was gracious enough to express his appreciation of the part the Canadian people have played and will continue to play in supplying reinforcements for our men, munitions, food, and so on.

This budget will furnish those provisions. That is the purpose of it, and the government will no doubt find the necessary funds. I think that we are all agreed that any sacrifice that we on the home front can make, or which we have been called upon to make, is trifling in comparison with the sacrifices that our gallant men and women have been making on the fighting front. There are some outstanding features of this budget. First of all, the overall cash requirements will be $6 billion That is more than ever before by $200 million. Secondly, there are the borrowing requirements which are set out by the minister amounting to $3,200 million. That is $320 million more than last year's, and I have no doubt that in the borrowing process the minister will find the Canadian people as keen as they have been on previous occasions, and will have no difficulty in respect of the next loan. I have no doubt the next loan will go over the top. The compulsory savings feature has been eliminated. That represents $110 million, according to the minister's statement. It will mean, I believe, that the people will have that much more money to spend, and I think it is important that if they spend it they should buy bonds. If they do so, everything will be satisfactory. But if they use the money to buy other things, it may bring about the inflation of which the minister is so fearful, and he may have a little difficulty in that regard.

There is more for mutual aid by several millions. I am heartily in agreement with that, and I think that every member of the house endorses it. We all heard what the Prime Minister of New Zealand said; we know what is taking place in connection with mutual aid supplies to Greece and others of the allied countries, and it is all splendid. I am sure that every member of the house will be willing to support that feature of the budget.

There is an amount of $200 million for family allowances. I am going to wait until the resolution is before the house before discussing the question, but I might say in passing that I could produce letters which I have received from people not only in my own constituency but in other places in western Canada. However, I will leave that until we get to the resolution.

There is little change in the income tax; where there is, it will help those in the lower brackets, and we all agree to that. Some members, one to my left especially, have based their whole speeches on the fact that farm implements are to be put on the free list. I am free to say that this may help, and it should be a help with the experience that we have had with our neighbours to the south during the war itself. I support it as far as it goes, but how far will it go? I may say to the minister that unless the import quota restriction on farm equipment is removed it will be of little value. However, there are some features of this matter to which I would call the attention of the house. First there is the ten per cent war exchange tax which is to be removed. It is a war measure, and that is all right. Then there is the seven per cent duty which is to be removed, and that is an act of parliament that could be undertaken at any time. Both these are levies at the border where the goods come in on the basis of the retail price, which is nine per cent over the wholesale price, and that should be taken into consideration.

I would point out that the total farm business in implements in Canada, both imports and domestic, shows that tractors form sixty per cent, while the total imports from the United States of implements show fifty-two per cent as tractors, coming in free of duty now. Bear that in mind. The total business, domestic and import, is sixty per cent tractors, and fifty-two per cent of the imports come in free now. Take the other forty-eight per cent of the imports of implements into Canada and you find that some of them bear a seven per cent duty, some three per cent, some nothing at all, and the average is 3½ per cent duty. What will the farmer pay? Anyone can get the figures from the bureau of statistics. The farmer spends on the purchase of implements only three and three-fifth cents out of every 100 cents he pays out in farm expenses. How much will he pay on the forty-eight per cent that comes in from the United States when the duty is three and a half per cent? Let me reduce this matter into the language of the farmer. Take wheat. The farmer averages net $1 a bushel. There is a ceiling of $1.25, but he averages now practically $1.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no ceiling at all.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, $1.25; that is the set price. Now, on one bushel of wheat how much will the farmer save? The duty being three and a half per cent, if out of every $1 of his expenses the farmer spends 3·6 cents on implements, on a bushel of wheat, that is a dollar's worth of wheat, the saving will be one-eighth of a cent. Therefore, if a farmer spent the returns of one thousand bushels of wheat on implements coming into Canada, what would he save? Under this budget he would save exactly $1.25. Hon. members can figure it out for themselves.

In a few respects I do not think this budget gives enough consideration to the chief industry of agriculture. True, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said, the three primary industries of agriculture, mining and forestry provide the major portion of our national income. But, Mr. Speaker, I would say that agriculture is the chief one. When it is considered that one-third of our population are either on the farms or are interested in farming, and a review is made of the portion of the national income that they have received over many years, it will be found that they never received more than fifteen per cent, and in many years much less. The reason I am speaking as I am to-day is that no one can properly represent a constituency in Saskatchewan or in western Canada who does not centre his attention on agriculture. It is our chief industry. Relatively speaking a very small percentage of the funds which are to be raised by taxation under this budget will go to agriculture. We are not complaining about the amount required to win the war. Therefore, in many respects I support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. So far as the amendment affects the farmers I think it is very good.

I agree with what the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said, namely, that the farmer's income should be averaged over six years. Last year the minister said he was agreeable to three. I remember the discussion that took place. On that occasion I suggested it should be longer. I am quite frank in saying that I would go farther than either the amendment or anything that has been done by the government. I would exempt the farmers from taxation altogether.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PERLEY: Hon. members may laugh, but I shall tell them why I make that statement. I say that there is no industry in Canada that has had more years of operation that show a loss. There is no industry in Canada that is operated under more hazardous and difficult conditions than farming. If hon. members will review the income statement they will see that in the year 1942 only 1,488 farmers paid a tax, and it was the paltry sum of $100 apiece. I say, why bother with them at all? Give them some encouragement.

May I quote what I said last year, and which I wish to repeat to-day? Speaking on the budget on March 15 of last year I said, as appears at page 1239 of Hansard:

> I am going to offer a suggestion with respect to these farm incomes, because the tax collected really does not make it worth while bothering 750,000 farmers. I am going to suggest that the farmer, especially the farmer of western Canada, be allowed to charge as part of his operating cost a fair wage paid to his wife and daughters and young sons who help him on the farm. I am going to ask that every farmer in Canada be given exemption from the payment of income tax unless he can show $2,000 of a net income.

That is what I suggested last year. The proposed amendment of this year goes pretty nearly that far, but not far enough. I would go farther, and as I said in my final suggestion last year, I would exempt the farmer.

I now come to the important question of floor prices. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat. He sent me a note saying that it was impossible for him to be here. I appreciate that. On Friday last I asked him a question with respect to the introduction of the bill providing for floor prices. He said that it was being prepared and would come down in due course. I say we should have had it when it was first suggested that it would be brought in. We should have had it at least two months ago, and we should be considering it along with the budget. When we get it I hope it will contain a price that is at least parity. I do not know whether hon. members know what parity means, the word has been used so often. We now have a ceiling price on farm products that is out of all reason. So far as wheat, oats and barley are concerned it should be a price comparable to that which is received net by our United States cousins; it should be comparable to that which the United Kingdom farmer is receiving. If it is, it will be at least $1.42 for wheat alone, and perhaps nearer to $1.50.

Instead of putting on the ceiling and stopping the price of wheat to prevent inflation, as it was said, had the law of supply and demand been allowed to prevail we would have had $2 wheat before the first of January last. I hold in my hand the prices of wheat at the beginning of each month of the last six months prior to the setting of the price. It started at 99 cents and went to $1, $1.11, $1.15, and it was $1.21¾ the day the government stopped it. If it had not been stopped to prevent inflation, we would have, as I have said, $2 wheat. We shall see what the bill contains when it is brought down. I have been consistent in this house in asking for a fair price, a price comparable to the times, conditions and circumstances, and I shall continue to do so.

I should now like to refer to the wheat board report, which was tabled by the minister in March last and referred to the agriculture committee. That committee met on June 27, five months after the session commenced. We had before us the chairman of the wheat board. The report of the wheat board consisted principally of reference to the marketing of the wheat crop of eighteen months ago and some of it for two years ago. To a great extent it was of no value to us because it was out of date. Although it was of little value I am going to make a few comments on it. One or two hon. members sitting close to me sat in on that committee. The report covered the 1942-43 crop year. As everyone knows, the wheat board is the instrument through which the government markets the cereal crops of western Canada. The operations of that board affect hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens. The act creating the board gives it wide powers. It uses those powers and, in fact, it considers itself immune from the law courts, as I may demonstrate a little later. It considers itself a sub-department of the government.

I desire to draw the attention of the house to the important part the western producer has played in the three years covered by the report. The report covered the 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops. In that time the farmers of western Canada produced a total of 1,375,000,000 bushels of wheat—new wealth. This government has not been too prone to recognize, or I was going to say, has ignored, the importance of establishing some industries in western Canada to help in the war; and when that is considered it is important to keep in mind the great amount of wheat, 1,375,000,000 bushels, that were produced by the farmers of western Canada. Of that grand total the wheat board had delivered to it some 662,402,545 bushels in the three crop years, or not quite fifty per cent. The report indicates that in handling that wheat the board built up a surplus of $39,872,275 for distribution by way of participation certificates, of which we have heard so often in this house. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) made a statement in connection with this matter only to-day. In order to be fair it must be said that this surplus has been increased by some $20,000,000 through the action of the board in setting the price at $1.25 on September 21 of last year, and in valuing the wheat of these three crop years on hand at $1.21¾ at the time the market was closed, as compared with the fixed initial price which was 70 cents for 1940, 70 cents for 1941, and 90 cents for 1942. That makes a total surplus available for distribution of about $59,000,000, and I am quite prepared to give the board credit for that.

I should like to indicate what it cost the board to handle less than fifty per cent of the crop. In the first place I would point out that the wheat board itself has at least three or four memberships on the grain exchange, so that it did not need to use the brokerage or commission firms, or even the export firms, if it had made full use of its powers. Just last night we heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announce in a radio address that because of the tremendous increase in the work of the wheat board he has found it necessary to set up a new branch in his department, to be known as the wheat and grain branch, which will have almost complete control over the western wheat crop. Then we find that the board paid in brokerage fees some $765,578, while in storage charges it paid the staggering total of $78,027,388, of which, of course, the farmers received some $6,796,095 for the crop years 1940-41 and part of 1941-42. In interest and bank charges the board paid a total of $4,927,283, while the cost of administration during the three crop years, including office equipment, rentals and office staff, travelling expenses and so on, was $2,140,222. All these figures are taken from the report of the board, which I hold in my hand. The total of these various payments is $85,860,471, which represents the handling cost of less than half the crop, so that I think it will be agreed that the grain firms, the commission companies and the banks received an exorbitant share of the total value of the grain. Some of this money, especially the amount paid in brokerage fees, was more or less a form of relief to the commission men and brokers, who received over three-quarters of a million dollars for doing very little.

What did the farmer receive? This is the important part. Well, the farmer received some $378,250,629, on the basis of the initial prices, for the 662,402,545 bushels of wheat, which sum will be augmented, as I have said, by another $20,000,000. In other words the farmer received something like 57 cents a bushel while the total expenses I have mentioned, which are included in the handling charges, work out at about 12⅛ cents per bushel. So the farmer received 57 cents a bushel and the commission firms, banks and elevators received 12⅛ cents. It will be seen, therefore, that too much was paid for the handling and marketing of the wheat, and the farmer did not receive a fair, square deal.

I may be asked what I would do. I say there is something wrong in the handling of our wheat crop. In this connection I may say that a farmer named Oatway has sued the wheat board; the case has been appealed but the appeal court as yet has not given a decision. If I were asked what I would do, I would completely nationalize the marketing, handling, shipping, storing and financing of our wheat crop, under the Canadian wheat board. That is going a long distance, but I would set up one national organization to take control of the whole thing. That might involve taking over all the elevators. The other day it was stated in the agriculture committee that we have some five thousand interior elevators, in addition to all the terminal elevators, of which many are owned by the government. The chairman of the board estimated that these interior elevators would cost an average of perhaps $12,000 each. If they were taken over at that figure the total would be $60,000,000 but, Mr. Speaker, as I have pointed out, the firms owning these elevators were paid $85,000,000 to handle only half the crop. If the board handled the whole crop the cost of the whole elevator system would be paid in two years. Is there anything wrong with that? To substantiate what I have said I would refer to the report of the grain inquiry commission of a few years ago, in which Judge Turgeon said the grain exchange could not carry on in an emergency, that the wheat board had to be kept intact in order to take over if that should become necessary.

Last Saturday evening I listened to a radio broadcast which I wish could have been heard by every hon. member of this house. It was an address delivered by a Mr. Lincoln, who was addressing a conference in the United States on the subject of cooperation and cooperative organizations. After he concluded his remarks I heard Mr. Neil Beaton, of the Scottish Cooperative Society, also speak on the question of cooperation. Both these gentlemen laid emphasis on the importance of cooperative organizations, stating that practically every country in the world was proceeding along that line, particularly in regard to the handling of natural products. Mr. Lincoln said that this would build up a great international food supply. He pointed out that at the international food conference held last year, at which Canadian delegates attended, resolutions were passed suggesting that all the allied nations should devote their energies toward establishing cooperative organizations. He said it would build new and vital energies, and do something for humanity. I do not hear very much applause for that across the floor. If hon. members had heard those two broadcasts they would have heard something worth while.

I come now to the question of live stock marketing. Much has been said already in the debate on the subject. One hon. member sitting to my left devoted all his speech to it. I agree with much that he said, because he set out the whole mess in which the industry finds itself. I have said before—in fact I believe I was one of the first members in the house to suggest it—that we should have a board of live stock commissioners. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be forced to do that. I would have government control of marketing and processing. Certainly I would control the Canadian packers. I would control the industry in such a way that the results would be beneficial, and would react to the profit and good of the farmers who work to produce the supply of live stock.

These are some of the points I had wished to bring to the attention of the house. I support the amendment offered by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), a copy of which I hold in my hand. I shall not review it in detail. The amendment states, first:

> That no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation.

Much has been said on that point, and time will not permit me to discuss it in detail. The second paragraph is:

> That no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600.

I am in full accord with that. As I said earlier, I would go even further and exempt one class altogether. Hon. members opposite probably do not agree with my stand in this connection. But I am telling them that we are coming to it, and we are coming to it sooner than we believe.

The third paragraph is:

That no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting overtime pay from income tax.

I believe there is nothing this government could do which would have a greater effect in stimulating the production of material and equipment for war purposes.

The next paragraph states:

That sufficient provision has not been made for the elimination of the inequities presently existing with respect to agricultural taxation.

I believe I have endeavoured to make myself clear on this point. Certainly I agree with that paragraph.

With respect to the simplification of the income tax form, I know that many people are confused beyond all measure. I myself have been confused. When making out my form I had to go down to the Ottawa office, and, I am frank to say, the officials down there did not know as much about it as did those out in Regina, where I finally got it straightened out.

I shall not take more time of the house. It has been my purpose only to bring a few matters to the attention of hon. members. I could have said much with respect to soldier settlers' debt, but the house knows where I stand on that point, because I advocated two years ago that the minister would have been away ahead if he had written it off.

I shall not discuss banking, because that matter has been discussed to some extent in committee and in due course will be the subject of discussion in the house. I shall reserve for the committee stage anything further I have to say. I hope then to be able to discuss in greater detail one or two points to which on this occasion I have made little more than a passing reference.

Mr. A. J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, since I have often had occasion to speak in French in the house, in the course of the few remarks I shall make to-day I should like to express myself in English.

In rising to take part in this debate I do not intend to discuss the budget at length, but I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to express my views on certain questions which I deem to be of national interest. In the first place, I want to voice my wholehearted admiration for our troops who are fighting so gallantly overseas. The signal victories won particularly in the past few weeks were achieved at the price of heavy sacrifices on the part of our soldiers, sailors and airmen. We owe them eternal gratitude for the brilliant feats of arms they accomplished and for the glory they have shed on the whole Canadian nation.

I wish to revert to a subject I repeatedly had occasion to discuss in this house. I refer to the development of the natural resources of Gaspé peninsula as a measure of post-war reconstruction. If I again bring up this subject to-day it is because I consider that the immediate after-war period will be the most propitious for the carrying out of the projects involving Gaspé peninsula, that have been urged for so long. I desire to congratulate the government warmly upon its clear-sightedness in establishing the committee on reconstruction whose object is to study various projects with a view to putting into effect a vast plan for the development of the resources our country possesses and providing at the same time against any possible unemployment crisis. The Canadian people, after having consented to all sacrifices during the war, will never again tolerate a recurrence of the misery and privations which they suffered during the crisis that followed 1929. Our country is endowed with too many resources for such a situation to recur.

Gaspesia, and especially the interior of the peninsula, constitute a region where abound varied natural resources that but await development to increase the capital and revenues of the nation. I should like to mention its far-flung forests that will soon become a total loss if they are not cut over within a short time, for they have already reached the age of full maturity. I should like to refer to its mines, its oil deposits the value of which is now established, its tillable land referred to in the following terms in a report of the geological survey dating as far back as 1883: A strip of relatively level land forms a large interior plateau and it extends probably in the vicinity of Matapedia lake as far as Gaspé basin. This plateau may cover an area of from 1,200 to 1,500 miles and a section of it is at an elevation of from 500 to 700 feet. The soil is generally of an excellent quality and its value from an agricultural standpoint is extensive. I gave particulars of these resources in a speech I had the honour to deliver in this house on March 4, 1937. The text will be found at pages 1523, 1524, 1525, 1526 and 1527 of Hansard of the date I have just mentioned.

Lack of communications is the barrier that has prevented the development of those resources up to now. In the course of the speech to which I have just referred I submitted to the government a five-year plan whereby the federal and provincial governments cooperating together would each spend $500,000 annually in order to establish means of communication with the centre of the peninsula, still in a wild state. These means of communication would have consisted of a highway crossing the centre of the peninsula throughout its whole length, then a railway paralleling this highway. This railway project has been the subject of many discussions and speeches over a long term of years, going back I might say to confederation. Mr. Alfred Pelland, former publicity officer of the department of colonization, mines and fisheries, of the province of Quebec, states the following at page 8 of his book "La Gaspesie" printed in 1914:

> If the project involving the construction of a railway passing through the interior of Gaspesia is carried into effect, we will thus have another beautiful domain to offer to the tireless activity of our stout-hearted settlers.

Mr. Speaker, Gaspesia has been woefully neglected in the past by reason of the lack of interest of the various governments that followed one another. It is high time that this injustice be rectified. In passing, I wish to thank Mr. Robert Rumilly, the distinguished and widely known writer, for the interest he has shown in matters relating to Gaspé and for the economic survey he made in the country itself. In his report of this survey, dating back only a few months, he says:

> The Gaspesian problem is a manifold problem, and certain solutions depend on individual initiative, but a major solution, the establishment of avenues of communication, is the concern of public bodies.

Then he adds:

> Let us repeat that Gaspesia long remained isolated, cut off from the remainder of the country. No other province would have tolerated such a situation inflicted on one of the largest and oldest of its regions. As a matter of fact, it was the first of all Canadian regions to be discovered and the last to be served.

I should also like to thank very seriously the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for the real interest which he has shown on certain occasions in our beautiful Gaspé district. I wish to repeat after my good friend the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Poirier): Give us the communications and we will do the rest.

In spite of the neglect from which it unfortunately suffered at the hands of our governments, Gaspesia has shown great patience, for which it should be given credit. It has never failed, in spite of all, to respond generously to the country's appeal when it was in need. During the last war, as during the present conflict, it displayed great generosity. Thousands of its sons have voluntarily enlisted in the armed forces and are serving in the various units that are now winning immortal renown on the battlefields of Italy and France.

I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to pay a tribute of esteem and admiration to the clergy of Gaspé for their fine patriotic spirit. Several parish priests of Gaspésia were not loath, even from the pulpit, to encourage the population to support the war effort. Let us chat with Canon Victor Côté, the worthy parish priest of Matane. He will tell you how proud he is of his parishioners, of his young men who donned the uniform and who are now winning fame on the battlefields of Europe.

Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to break the rules of this house, and that is why I do not intend to refer to an incident which occurred outside these walls. I must say, however, that I have little sympathy for those who all across Canada, regardless of the party to which they may belong, take advantage of every circumstance to further their political ends, to the detriment of our national unity. In critical times such as these, the Canadian people must stand more unitedly than ever. While the martyred peoples of old Europe groan, and stretch toward us their shackled hands; while our brave soldiers face fire each day, and while a goodly number of them accept death so that we may continue to live happily far removed from the horrors of war, let us not offer them by way of supreme consolation the sad spectacle of our internal quarrels.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would like to place on record the following verses, which Gaetan Major penned after Dieppe, and which seem to be rather suitable in the present circumstances. Many hon. members know them, no doubt, but I wish to read them for the benefit of those who have never heard them. I quote:

Peut-on songer à Dieppe et ne pas réfléchir
A tous ceux qui hélas! n'ont pas pu revenir!...
Bonheurs, espoirs, amour, ils ont tout sacrifié
Pour nous permettre à nous de vivre en liberté.

Combien de nos marins dorment au fond de l'eau
Dans ces cercueils d'acier qui furent leurs bateaux!...
D'autres ont pris leur place, au mépris du danger,
Et meurent pour que nous, nous soyons protégés!

Dans le ciel chaque jour, sans repos ni répit,
Nos aviateurs s'en vont affronter l'ennemi!...
Ils ont accepté tous de mourir à vingt ans,
Pour que nous, nous puissions vieillir paisiblement.

A l'abri, grâce à eux, nous oserions nous plaindre,
Calculer notre argent, nous lamenter et geindre?...
Pouvons-nous bien oser compter nos sacrifices
Pendant qu'eux, sans regret, pour nous sauver périssent.

Speaking to-day in this house I should like to voice all the affection I hold not only for my Gaspesian land but for the whole of Canada. I love the Atlantic coast, whence so many convoys have departed to serve overseas in order to protect us from Hitler's lust of conquest. I love the vast stretches of northern Ontario where so many of my Quebec compatriots, after leaving the shores of our great St. Lawrence river, have settled. I love, too, the fertile plains of the western provinces, Alberta with its lofty-peaked Rockies which I had occasion to admire with great emotion. And I love the sun-bathed coast of the Pacific, with its sweet-scented gardens and its snow-capped mountains. I love Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific because all of it is my own country. Too much importance is sometimes given to the sayings of certain people in the province of Quebec who perhaps may not share my views, but I am convinced that the great majority think as I do. I hope with all my heart that the sacrifices made by all during the tragic period through which we are passing and the magnificent example which is given us by our brave soldiers on the battlefield should serve as a lesson to us.

I wish to make a suggestion which should be given serious consideration when the present conflict is over and our lads return victorious. The government should set up some kind of organization whose function it would be to study impartially the complaints of certain provinces, looking to the removal of all causes of misunderstanding. It should also take strong measures designed to put an end to the noisy activities of a small group of extremists in various provinces who specialize in stirring race hatred by constantly pouring oil on the fires.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, in developing its vast resources, has accomplished a stupendous war effort which has aroused the admiration of free peoples everywhere. When the smoke of the conflict has lifted from the battlefields, the great sacrifices this country has made will entitle it to a post of honour side by side with the great nations of the world. A great future lies in store for our country. Let us not lose the fruits of our efforts. With the help of divine Providence our sons will soon return to us, covered with glory; and each and every one should act in such a way that when they return they will find a strong, united people ready to march towards the realization of a great ideal.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I would first congratulate the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe) upon the fine sentiments he has expressed, and his just pride in the members of the armed forces from his constituency who are serving overseas. I have some knowledge of the part of the country he represents, and it deserves all that he says of it. It is a beautiful country. Before saying much about the budget I wish to take exception to some remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). On several occasions he has said in this chamber that conditions between 1930 and 1935 were the responsibility of the government of the day. I would remind him and the house that if any government were responsible for those conditions it was the Liberal administration which held office between 1926 and 1930. They laid no plans to withstand the results of world-wide depression, stimulated by intense nationalism and accompanied by falling prices. As a matter of fact they did not even know in the early part of 1930 that there was any unemployment. That same year a Conservative government took office and found that no preparations had been made by its predecessor to meet the terrible situation which then confronted the country. Let me point out that Mr. Bickerton, speaking before the banking and commerce committee, said that Mr. Bennett provided the mechanism which helped to take the country out of the chaos it was in at that time. Mr. Bennett and his government were responsible for the establishment of the Bank of Canada; and Mr. Bickerton of the Federated Association of Agriculture gave great credit to that government, remarking that he did not know how this country would function at the present time had it not been for what Mr. Bennett's government did.

Our first responsibility to-day is to win the war, not only against the nazis but against the Japanese. We do not know how long it will take to do that; the time may be short or it may be long. One thing is certain, that all the money which will be required to finish the job will be willingly furnished by the people of this country. Our armed forces will not be let down, if Canadians have anything to do with it, through lack either of supplies or of reinforcements for overseas. As far as our own party and I myself are concerned we shall do our best in spite of everything to see to it that these supplies and reinforcements get overseas to our troops.

There is to-day great fear on the part of our people. They believe that the government is doing no more planning for the future than it did in the past. No wonder there is distrust and unrest. That is what is troubling our armed forces; they do not know what will happen to them when they come back.

The government has always been so full of indecision that there is much distrust in the minds of the people.

The speech from the throne is mere window-dressing; it contains all or nearly all the accumulation of progressive legislation which should have been introduced during the past nine years. The government displays the same old policy of drift and the same reluctance to do anything for fear a vote or two may be lost. So far as my observation goes the government has never done anything unless it has been forced to do so by the official opposition. For us this is a matter of pride. Evidence of its truth was furnished by a former Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). He has not changed his mind, I believe, on that point.

One could not help noting that many of the policies adopted by our party at the Winnipeg convention have been included in the speech from the throne. Provision for some of them will be found in the budget, and I congratulate the ministry upon that fact; it shows good judgment. It requires some outside force to give leadership to a government whose policies ever since 1919 have never indicated any element of leadership. Their pre-election policies appear in the speech from the throne and —now—in the budget. Throughout its war-time administration the government has had one eye on the war and the other eye on the ballot box. It has shown the same old reluctance to deal positively with matters of importance unless forced to do so, the same unwillingness to accept positive, constructive criticism from the opposition or from the public. Now that it is in need of a bait for the election, there are dangled before the people many illusory lures in the hope that they will attract some votes on this political fishing expedition. Also, in the dying days of this government, in this last and most decisive year of the war—or so the minister has told us, and we believe it—they right-about-face on the policy against inflation. This is the year of the largest expenditure in Canadian history, the year when there has been a greater demand for workers than was ever known before. The government have caused all these welts and bruises to the people of Canada by raising the bogey of inflation and committing many other mistakes. They have created dissension by their determination to fight a Liberal war; and, because the welts and bruises have not been laid on impartially, but have always been the result of political expediency, the public is resentful.

Take the enforcement of national selective service. If it had been enforced impartially on all, the people would have stood for it willingly; but when it is imposed rigidly on the willing horse in some parts, and otherwise on the unwilling, the willing horse of course resents the discrimination. However, in spite of all that, the people of this country have responded magnificently. Our voluntary enlistment has been splendid, but our call-up system has been a farce. It has not been enforced impartially. When one speaks of partiality and impartiality, can anything be more partial than the singling out of certain articles of consumption such as beer, liquor and wines? Is there impartial administration there? Why were these articles singled out to be rationed by the provinces? Why was not gasoline rationed in that way? Why was not sugar or cigars or cigarettes or tobacco singled out to be rationed by the provinces? Why should rationing be under the auspices of the provinces with all the discrepancies that have taken place in the meantime and the disunity that has been caused in this matter? I will tell you. When all the other rationing was done under the auspices of the War Measures Act an exception was made in this case, because it was obvious on the face of it that there was too much political dynamite in it, and therefore the buck was passed to the premiers of the provinces. There were too many circular letters from prohibition advocates. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was afraid to face the issue, and so he escaped responsibility by putting it on the shoulders of the provincial premiers.

Our factory workers have done an admirable job not only in the factories but outside in their spare time, and our white-collar workers have also done very well indeed. Despite hardships and trying circumstances under which they have had to carry on, they have endeavoured to keep the places open for the boys who will be coming back from overseas. Many white-collar workers in my own city have been offered jobs elsewhere at higher salaries, and their salaries have been frozen. They could go over to the government departments, however, and get an increase, but in spite of that they have stuck to their guns because they wanted to help the boys who have gone overseas. Our business men also have done a wonderful job and have given freely of their time. Our farmers, too, deserve a great deal of credit. Their production has been enormous. The people's subscriptions to the victory loan have also been admirable. As the minister pointed out to-day, our effort in this regard has been magnificent. When we consider that $1,407,500,000 was raised in the last loan, it shows that our people will rise to any occasion for a good cause.

Our armed forces have been magnificent. They have had to sustain hardships and tedious waiting. Many have been away for a long time, and that is something else that I have already spoken about, because I could not see why we should retain here a home army who had nowhere to go while we have had those boys over there all these years. They might have been easily relieved by some of these 70,000 men, who could have given them a chance to get back. It is a little late now, I suppose, to urge this once more. However, our troops overseas have covered Canada as well as themselves with glory. They have made a name for this country in the world, a name which will live forever; we must never forget. But all these things have been done in spite of frustration and lack of full leadership simply because the government has had one eye on the war and the other on the ballot box.

The people have responded to regimentation and regulation. With some of the budget proposals I agree and, while I do not want to go into details, I will mention, in passing, relief from the savings portion of the tax, certain relief in connection with medical expenses, relief in connection with the blind, married persons separated, allowance for full-time housekeeper, superannuation and pension fund, payments to trade unions, relief for business to help full-time employment so that business can plan, and so on. But many of these things have been advocated before by His Majesty's loyal opposition. All through the war the opposition have advocated many of these and others as well. Take, for instance, the tax deduction for guest children. Repeatedly this government has refused to do anything in this regard, on some technicality or another, except in a few instances. Take the deduction in connection with illegitimate children, in-laws and alimony. Were these suggestions given consideration by the government? No. The public must grin and bear it because they had to be reserved as bait for the electors on the approach of an election.

Has the government policy with regard to anti-inflation been altogether sound, or has it militated against production? Has it ground down the workers in the lower brackets below the actual decent cost of living standard in many cases? Has it not been very difficult to get any relief under these circumstances? There are many illustrations of the manner in which this policy has militated against the decent standard of living of many of our workers, more especially those who were not in essential war work or who were not in a position to do war work.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Comparisons have been given by the minister to show our taxation and the taxation in various other countries. Comparisons, of course, are odious at any time and more particularly in this case, because a comparison of taxation in other countries with taxation in Canada cannot be made unless we have the full gamut of all the taxes that are to be taken into account, both direct and indirect, provincial and municipal, and more so when we consider the cost of living in Great Britain and Australia, for example. These are compared from time to time, but you cannot make comparisons with Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain. The food may be the same or it may be different; clothing may be the same; but there is one item, more important than others as far as Canada is concerned, and that is fuel to keep Canadians warm in the winter. That has not been taken into consideration. When these cost-of-living indices are given to the people showing that this has gone up so much and the other has gone down so much, you cannot compare the cost of living in Canada with the cost of living in other countries. We have a severe winter in Canada. What family in this country can get by, even in the poorest circumstances, with less than $100 a year for fuel to keep them warm? And there are other circumstances that must be taken into account in a cold country. There is greater expense in connection with clothing; there must be more food and different kinds of food as well as more expensive food, and then there is the question of sickness. When there is sickness in Canada it takes a person longer to get better. All these things enter into the picture. One could go on at great length enumerating different items that enter into the cost of living.

Now, leaving that for a moment, another proposal of our party which has been conceded by the government is that of relief to business in the form of allowing reserves to be built up for the post-war years. There is no difference in that. The relief is there. That is to say, businesses will have an opportunity of planning for the future so that they will not go broke in the years when business is not good. If this relief were not given and they ran into a bad time they would be forced to put hundreds and perhaps thousands of their workmen out of jobs.

A great deal has been said about compulsory savings being a nest-egg and a hedge against inflation. What effect will the abolition of the compulsory savings portion of the tax have on a family in the low income brackets in so far as post-war security is concerned? The government knows as well as I do that the small amount they will have saved up by that time will be a mere pittance and will not amount to anything. If the government wishes to do something for the low wage-earner and the people who are in poor circumstances, let them come out frankly and forget about this talk of inflation in connection with the low wage-earner. Let them come out frankly and lift up the exemption on the single man to $800 and on the married man to $1,500. After the low wage-earners have fed and clothed their families and paid their rent, the amount they will have to spend would not mean anything. As far as affecting inflation is concerned it is just the same old bogey.

The whole object of the government seems to be to keep these poor people frozen at low levels, people who are unable to make wages that are in any way comparable with those made by others on war-time jobs. If we want to be fair about this thing what we should do is put a proper floor under wages so that every person in the country would have a decent standard of living. The government have been propounding, and rightly so, their anti-inflation policy. In many respects I agree with them, but as far as the low wage-earner is concerned it seems to me that the government have built up a house of cards only to knock it down. I do not think it is necessary in this case to think so much about inflation.

The controls we have had on consumption goods have been good, although I believe they have been fairly strenuous at times. The people of Canada are quite willing to obey the law. They have a great sense of responsibility with regard to these matters, but you cannot tell the man in the low wage brackets that the few extra dollars he is going to get are going to raise blazes in this country as far as inflation is concerned.

With regard to the compulsory savings portion of the tax, the people had no faith in the fact that it belonged to them. They had nothing to show for it. It was just considered as a tax. I think the people of Canada will supplement a portion of the compulsory savings tax and buy victory bonds and stamps far in excess of what they did before, and they would do better than that if the exemptions were raised a little.

With regard to anti-inflation the government's policy has, in the main, been sound. Has it militated against production? I say here and now that it certainly has. There has been no leeway in the matter, and when it comes to asking a workman to work overtime in one of those war factories he says, "What is the use; the government gets it nearly all?" Why is this answer so prevalent? Well, I will tell you. He sees hundreds of workmen idling around in factories with nothing to do. When the veterans of the last war and the great many other men who are past military age see young men in factories being transferred from non-essenial jobs to essential jobs to get postponement and knows also that the home army is costing the country $150,000,000 a year; when he knows that in the neighbourhood anywhere up to a quarter of the employees in a factory could be utilized in other jobs, why should he work any longer or harder for very little or nothing? There is no patriotic spirit aroused, and I do not blame him. He sees there are lots of people in the factory who would have less to do if he worked longer than a certain length of time each week. Is this an anti-inflation policy, to have a quarter to one-third more employees in a factory earning high wages and more leisure time in which to spend the money? Certainly the greatest caution must be exercised in the prevention of inflation, but the method used in connection with factory workers seems to the people to defeat its own purposes.

In passing, may I say this further word? One of the reasons for the distrust and unrest among so many people in Canada is that the war expenditures committee is sitting in camera behind closed doors. The public well know that many matters which they have been investigating have very little bearing on the question of the war or of giving comfort to the enemy. I know of only two or three matters that have been dealt with by that committee, one of which was the shoe contract. How could that have anything to do with giving comfort to the enemy? Another one was the purchase of the Gimli airport. How could that have anything to do with giving comfort to the enemy? I do not know whether these contracts were right or wrong, but the point is they were investigated in secret. As a matter of fact the public have a right to know how the money has been spent, and if there is anything wrong they have a right to know that. There is no doubt that there has been waste and that it has been unavoidable, but again there have been extravagances which could have been avoided. Nobody blames anybody for justifiable and honest mistakes. They are bound to occur, but no one can say that there have not been many made. An explanation could easily have been given for many of these matters, but these in camera, behind closed doors, star-chamber sittings of the war expenditures committee have cast a veil of suspicion over the minds of the public in general.

May I now say just a word about the best possible man-power policy of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell)? The function of national selective service is to transfer workers to vacant jobs. On June 13 Mr. MacNamara, director of national selective service, announced that there were 202,323 job vacancies other than in logging or farming for 134,000 men and 67,323 women. Now, just think of the incongruity of the statement issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics when they announced that 14,095 men and women—and I might say that this is three times the number for last year—had unemployment benefits during the month of May! Not only that, but they averaged seventeen compensating, unemployed days apiece. Think of that, plus nine waiting days' time which must elapse before the benefits can be paid! This makes a total of 366,470 man and woman days not only lost to the production of the country, but paid for in unemployment insurance.

Another matter with which I wish to deal is the question of housing. Ever since I have been a member of this house I have appealed to the government in connection with conditions in my own city. I have had some success, but very little. Part 2 of the housing act has never been brought into force; that is the part dealing with low-cost housing. It is true that part 1 of the act has been in force and has been of great benefit to home owners, but it has not helped those in the low income brackets, the people for whom some provision must be made. They are the forgotten men. The home improvement plan has done some good; to a limited extent it has improved the lot of the low wage-earner. Some old houses in the slum sections of my city have been fixed up; but this has not helped the children, for these are still slum areas, and the conditions under which these children have to live has resulted in a great increase in juvenile delinquency. Perhaps on another occasion I shall have more time to deal with this question of low-cost housing, but another lure has been dangled in the political fish-pond by the government, which purports to intend to do something about low-cost housing. We shall have to wait and see what happens. All these years have gone by and the people of my city have had to grin and bear it. I have in my hand to-day's issue of the Globe and Mail, containing an article dealing with this matter, which reads in part as follows:

> Eviction orders were refused, or stays of execution of such orders were granted, thus leaving many families in the premises they occupied—and thus, also, tying up an indeterminate series of moves by other families who were automatically frozen when one in the link of moves was unable to provide vacancy of the premises.
> Since that date all of the months of May and June have passed and July is on its way to antiquity—and the situation is becoming more serious because of this factor, according to Miss Dorothy Dennison, director of the housing registry. People were able to take temporary refuge in summer cottages, tents and hastily erected shacks. When fall comes, however, they have to seek permanent quarters, and Miss Dennison estimates that there are hundreds of families in this plight.

At the present time some 1,900 families are on the Toronto housing registry. The situation is very serious. The home conditions of workers in certain sections of my own riding, as well as in other sections of the city, are very bad; they were slums before the war, and certainly they are worse now. I have brought up this matter on the floor of the house time after time; I even read one of the many telegrams I have received. I was almost ashamed to read it, to show the terrible conditions that existed in my own riding: vermin-infested; overrun with rats; families of four, five and six living in one or two rooms, not from choice but because they have no other place to go; overcrowded parts of the city still more overcrowded. Conditions were bad before the war, but with the influx of people to the city the situation has become intolerable. The only answer we have been given is, "Why should the federal government look after Toronto?" I suppose it is on the same old basis as the famous speech made years ago by the Prime Minister, when he did not know there was any unemployment in the early part of the depression, and when he said he would not give one five cent piece to Tory Toronto. I brought the matter of the eviction of soldiers' wives and families to the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), but his answer was that he did not see what he could do about it. The mayor and board of control of my city have come to Ottawa in an attempt to get some action, and I give them great credit for what they have done. We interviewed many of the ministers, but were given the same old answer; Toronto was turned down.

After all, Mr. Speaker, whose responsibility is it? What brought about this situation? The people employed in plants ten or fifteen miles from the centre of Toronto had no place to live but the city. Some fifty or sixty thousand workers in the surrounding district were overlooked and forgotten by wartime housing; no provision was made to enable them to live near their plants. It is a strange anomaly when we have the government on the one hand asking the workers to live near their plants, for the sake of efficiency, and at the same time saying that the city of Toronto must take care of them. Very little has been done in the Toronto vicinity by wartime housing. I believe some six or seven hundred houses were put up near Long Branch, which is fifteen or sixteen miles from Toronto, and some others were built at Pickering, which is twenty-five miles away. Other cities, such as Hamilton and Montreal, have been treated differently; wartime housing saw to it that accommodation was provided near the factories, in order to relieve the congestion in those cities, but not so Toronto. Think of the time it takes these people to travel back and forth every day. At a rough estimate they lose upwards of two hours a day to get to and from their work. I know of cases where people have to get up around four o'clock in the morning in order to get to their work at these plants. The transportation commission has done a wonderful job in trying to take care of them, but when we have such a scarcity of gasoline why should we have to waste thousands of gallons in order to transport workers ten or fifteen miles each way every day, instead of building these houses near the factories? On July 4 the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Chevrier) dangled some more political bait before the electors, when he said the government had consented to build a few wartime houses in Toronto, but they are not to be for workers; they are to meet the requirements of soldiers' wives and children. Of course that is vitally necessary. I could read letters I have received from Mrs. N. Hall Humpherson, president of the Soldiers' Wives Association, in which she points out that the housing registry has received some 1,700 applications for accommodation for wives of men serving overseas. The situation as far as they are concerned is appalling, and I hope some relief will be given.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in order that the record may be complete, I should like to read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). It was as follows:

(a) that no adequate steps have been taken to simplify the forms and modernize the methods of taxation;

(b) that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum.

(c) that no provision has been made to encourage greater war-time production by exempting over-time pay from income tax;

(d) that sufficient provision has not been made for the elimination of the inequities presently existing with respect to agricultural taxation;

(e) that no adequate provision has been made to ensure increased post-war employment through the discovery and development of metallic and non-metallic mineral resources;

(f) that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150,000,000 per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent.

I am heartily in favour of all those paragraphs in the amendment. Time will not permit my saying much about them at the present time, but when the resolutions are in committee I shall have an opportunity to do so.

There is no doubt about this being primarily a pre-election budget. When it is fitted into all the rest of the jigsaw puzzle of the government's proposed legislation, it will show that the bait is being set in the political fishpond to catch the many and various classes of voters.

My chief criticism is that all this proposed legislation should and could have been enacted years ago. The government has been callous in letting the people bear unnecessary suffering in the past, in order that it can now take the position of solicitously administering to their relief—and this just before an election. But by this time the people of Canada have had enough experience to say, "Once bitten, twice shy." They will look before they leap. My warning is: Beware of the Grits, when they come bearing gifts.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, the budget debate is an occasion which offers a wider scope for discussion of public questions than is afforded by ordinary items in committee. I should like first to make a suggestion of an expenditure which might be considered for the post-war period and which has a bearing on the riding I represent. I suggest that assistance be granted in establishing at least the smaller type of airfields. The constituency I represent is one of our great tourist areas, a magnificent playground, but the resources of our people are not sufficient to provide landing facilities for the smaller or civilian type of aeroplane. There is ample water for landing seaplanes, but of course the seaplane is a plane that is too large for the average citizen. I believe that if assistance were given not only in this area but in other areas to establish such landing facilities, it would pay ample dividends in the years to come.

Coming more directly to the budget I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the removal of the ten per cent income war tax on farm implements and upon placing these implements of production on the free list. I think it was the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) who suggested this afternoon that this item was of very little importance. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been associated for a substantial period of my life with farm organizations, and I do not recall a single instance when representatives of these organizations were presenting their views to succeeding governments when they did not press for farm implements being put on the free list. Our farmers for more than a decade past have continually pressed to have the implements of production put on the free list and now their objective has finally been realized.

I think it was the same hon. member who suggested that the amount involved in this item would be very small indeed. I turn to the appendix to the budget to demonstrate that all the implements put on the free list are of substantial importance. I shall refer to a few of them.

First, there are cream separators and complete parts therefor, including steel bowls. They are now free under the British preferential tariff and under the intermediate and general tariffs. Previously the intermediate and general tariffs on the goods covered by this item carried a duty of ten per cent, so that here there is a ten per cent reduction.

Then take item 409a: milking machines and attachments therefor; centrifugal machines for testing butterfat, milk or cream: complete parts of all the foregoing. These are now free under all tariffs. Previously this item carried a ten per cent duty.

I now come to the more general list of farm implements found in 409b: cultivators, harrows, seed-drills, horse-rakes, horse-hoes, scufflers, manure spreaders, garden seeders, weeders, and complete parts of all the foregoing. They are now free under all tariffs. The intermediate tariff on goods covered by this item was formerly 7½ per cent. The general tariff was twenty-five per cent.

Then item 409c: ploughs, farm, field, lawn or garden rollers: soil packers, complete parts of all the foregoing. They are now free under all tariffs. The intermediate tariff on goods covered by this item was 7½ per cent and the general tariff twenty-five per cent.

Then item 409d: mowing machines, harvesters, either self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers, harvesters in combination with threshing machine separators including the motive power incorporated therein, and complete parts of all the foregoing. They are free under all tariffs. The intermediate tariff on goods covered by this item was 7½ per cent and the general tariff twenty-five per cent.

Then take the next item, 409e: spraying and dusting machines and attachments therefor used by fruit growers. These all now come in free.

Then take item 409f: hay loaders, hay tedders, potato planters, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, ensilage cutters, grain crushers and grain or hay grinders for farm purposes only, and many other articles. These come in free under all tariffs. This means a reduction of at least 7½ per cent.

Then take item 409j: fanning mills; corn husking machines and many other items. These come in free under all tariffs whereas the duty was 7½ per cent under the intermediate tariff and twenty-five per cent under the general tariff.

I shall not mention any more items. These examples are sufficient to show that the reduction which has been made in this budget amounts to a reduction on the general line of farm implements running anywhere from 7½ to 10 per cent.

Just at the present time when there is such a strong demand for metal products of all kinds for war purposes, placing these implements on the free list may not be of any great immediate benefit to the farmers; but in the years to come, and particularly in the post-war years when there will be a great backlog of demand for farm machinery, and when the farmers will have money with which to buy machinery, I am sure that they will reap substantial benefit from this budget provision for which they have been striving for such a long period of years.

Another matter mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was with regard to farmers being placed in a privileged class so far as the payment of income tax was concerned. The suggestion was that they be exempted entirely from payment of income tax. I am a farmer like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and personally that would be very fine for me. I do not think any administration could take any action that would do more to promote a back to the land movement than to place all agriculturists in a privileged position so far as payment of income tax is concerned. I do not know of any action that could be taken that would do more to promote larger farming units. Thousands of people who had made their pile would retire to the country, if agriculturists were exempted from income tax, and would set up a little farm to escape payment of the tax. That proposal might sound well on the election platform, but I am sure that it would not be a sound provision in a budget of the Dominion of Canada.

I wish to make a few remarks upon the magnificent production of agricultural products by the farmers of Canada during this war and to compliment the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the splendid direction and leadership he has given in promoting this remarkable production. I am sure that there have been times when the Canadian people have had misgivings regarding possible food shortages, when they feared that there might be a shortage of food, not only to ship across the seas to feed our armies abroad and the British, but even a shortage of food in Canada to meet the demands of the Canadian people at home. But from year to year we have had an increased production of food products until now everyone in this country seems to be satisfied as to the food situation. I believe that in food production we have established a record that is outstanding in the history of Canadian agriculture.

That brings me to the point of giving some thought to the post-war problems of agriculture. Such thinking and planning must not stand in the way of winning the war as decisively and quickly as possible, because that, of course, represents the major responsibility of the Canadian people.

What will some of these post-war agricultural problems be? The longer the war goes on, the more I am convinced that we are likely to face many of the very same problems faced after the last war, particularly if we fail to support and maintain the price control policy. In my opinion, finding markets for the surplus farm products which the farmer can and will want to produce will be the biggest one. I think the house will agree with me that farmers want to produce all they can. They are never so happy as when they are working at full capacity. Our farmers have surprised Hitler, Tojo, our own people and, in fact, the people of the whole world by showing how much they can produce with a war-time incentive and fair prices. The year 1943 shows the greatest production of food on record in Canada, and 1944, with favourable maturing and harvesting weather conditions, will exceed the record of 1943. This has been accomplished under the handicap of labour shortages and an insufficient supply of machinery and equipment. When we return to peace-time conditions, with the experience we have gained, with the ordinary supply of farm labour and sufficient machinery and equipment, and with fair demand and adequate prices, we can produce, I think hon. members will agree with me, double our pre-war volume of farm products. We have found out in war time how much good, nutritious food the people of this country will consume when they have a sufficiently high income to purchase it in ample supply. But what kind of incomes will our people have in, say 1948? Will our industrial activity be as high as now? Shall we exhibit the same degree of knowledge and determination to conquer unemployment as we have displayed in assisting our allies to conquer the common enemy? The problem must be attacked in that spirit.

But suppose we do have an increase of from fifteen to twenty per cent in our domestic consumption of food—allowing for the normal increase in our population, that is about the best we can hope for—there will still remain a huge surplus to be disposed of in the markets of the world. In facing this great problem let us be honest with ourselves. Even if credits are extended to peoples more unfortunate than we, to buy some of these products, if we are going to sell these surpluses in world markets we must accept the surplus goods of other countries in payment for our exports. This is a hard, indisputable fact. It is not so unpleasant if we remember that we can export our surpluses if we accept the surpluses of other countries—products which they may be able to produce more efficiently than we can—in exchange for our products. Are we ready to advocate lower rather than higher tariffs? Are we ready to agree to fewer trade barriers rather than more? Are we ready to accept and adopt the principle that world trade is a two-way highway, not a single track?

But even if we do succeed in finding an outlet for all our farmers can produce, still we must have a fair price for it before our economic problem is solved. What is satisfactory? Some farm organizations say that parity is a fair price. I prefer to speak in terms of parity of income for farmers rather than parity prices, because parity prices may not result in parity of income. Others say, whatever the law of supply and demand dictates should be the price, even though they know that farmers seem to be the only class subject to this law in its crude, unvarnished form. Too often in the past agriculturists have realized that the greater the supply, the less the demand, and consequently the lower the price.

This brings me to the question of bonuses and fixed prices. Frankly I think these instruments should be retained for a considerable time to come as a protection for both producer and consumer. However, in making this suggestion I am not unmindful of some difficulties which may arise.

First, you can set a price for a commodity but you cannot force the public to purchase it at that price. If the public will not buy as much as the farmers produce, you are in trouble. If the product is perishable, you have not long to wait; if not, it can be stored but the evil day is only delayed.

Then in the matter of prices, what we in Canada think is a fair price may be a high price to some other countries. In fact, if world prices were as high as ours, world production would probably be much higher, causing a curtailment of demand for our surpluses.

Let us also review past experiences with bonused or subsidized products which were exported. The experiences were not too happy. It can drive down world prices still farther, because in a buyers' market everyone tries to meet the low price and the price frequently falls. If our price is substantially higher than the world price it is an inducement for other countries to sell in our markets. The suggestion that tariff or trade barriers will set things right is not a sound one. As a solution, I suggest that these problems are world-wide and must be attacked from that point of view. Nations cannot longer live unto themselves alone. In Canada measures have been taken during war time which should be very helpful in the post-war period.

First and foremost of these is the price control policy so ably devised and administered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). This policy has won the admiration of financial leaders and critics throughout the world. It should be more appreciated and better understood by the Canadian people. So far it has beaten inflation. Given support to carry this policy through, we have overcome post-war's most formidable enemy.

We must approach the problems of reconstruction determined that unemployment must be licked. I think we have learned that the greatest single example of waste in the world is permitting human hands to be idle when food and goods which people need could be produced. We surely can agree that increasing consumption to support prices is cheaper and more effective than restricting production to support prices. This should go for industry, labour and agriculture. The bill which will soon be before the house to provide for family allowances is an example of a move to increase consumption and support production in the manner I have just indicated. We have learned much out of the experience of the past, and if we intelligently apply that knowledge we should go forward with courage and confidence. We have found the money to do our share in winning the war; we must do likewise to win the peace. In the broader field of world affairs, particularly as applied to the war, Churchill, Chiang Kai-shek, Stalin, Roosevelt and Mackenzie King have found a common foundation upon which to unite their efforts to win this, the most titanic war in history. I am not going to suggest what should be done in other countries, but I would suggest, as far as the Canadian people are concerned, that we should maintain at the helm of our ship of state the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King to meet with these world leaders and to find a common foundation upon which they can unite to win the peace as they have united to win the war.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): The budget this year is indicative of a tremendous gamble. The underlying principles of the entire speech are based on the possibility of an early collapse of Germany. There may be some justification in taking this gamble, and gamble it is, for this is the only excuse for the inflationary measures proposed by the government's policy. The government has entirely reversed its previous policy, and instead of endeavouring to provide a high level of employment, it has adopted the specious and entirely unacceptable policy of paternalism. Paternalism never has been and never will be a substitute for independence through individual effort. If the gamble taken is successful and the shell of fortress Europe, once broken, detonates an internal collapse, then the government will be immediately faced with the problem of rehabilitating our armed forces; for once the now overwhelming weight of allied power is concentrated against the ferine and barbaric island of Japan, her utter destruction will not take long to accomplish. Without in any way minimizing the task ahead, I wish at this time to discuss one of the major problems of the reconstruction period and one which I believe will do more than any other to preserve our present bountiful economy on a high level of employment.

I wish to speak of the mining industry and in particular of the question of mining taxation. As is generally known, we have been blessed with a larger potential area for mining development than any other country in the world. Climatically, the Canadian shield may be considered to be rigorous, but when compared with the extreme temperature of Siberia, reaching as low as ninety degrees below zero, and the other extreme of Africa, India, and South America, where the rock temperatures underground may reach as high as 120 to 140 degrees Fahrenheit, it will be seen that we are indeed very fortunate. In the period of depression Canadian mines, particularly the precious metal mines, provided one of the greatest sources of permanent employment. It is said by the Wallace committee that 107,000 people were directly employed by the industry, giving employment indirectly to 1,200,000 or over one-tenth of our total population. At no time during the depression did our relief roll approach this figure, and I suggest to the house that had our mining industry been fifty per cent larger than it was, there would have been virtually no men on relief in this dominion during those years.

The mining industry is unlike all other industries. To be continuous it must be constantly replenishing itself. New mines must be found; the ground must be prepared; capital, particularly risk capital, must be encouraged and the prospector must at all times find a ready market for his services; for he holds the key which will unlock the golden treasury. Our present taxation policy has brought about the very opposite of this, until to-day we find our mining industry in the following shocking condition. Of Canada's 1942 metal production, fifty-six per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered prior to 1910, over a third of a century ago; twenty-eight per cent was derived from the mineral areas discovered between 1910 and 1920; that is, eighty-four per cent from areas discovered over a quarter of a century ago; eleven per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered between 1920 and 1930, and only five per cent came from mineral areas discovered since 1930. This is one of the most serious indictments against the federal government.

Mining, Mr. Speaker, is essentially a risk business. When success is found the rewards are great, but the ratio of success to failure will, I think, surprise hon. members of this house. It is a fact that less than one per cent of the companies incorporated for the purpose of metal mine development during the thirty-five year period from 1907 to 1941 inclusive could be classified as having attained economic success. The average actual tax-paying or profitable productive life of a precious metals mine in the central provinces is indicated to be less than eight years. Furthermore, during the thirty-five year period from 1907 to 1941 inclusive only one-third of the productive metal mines in Ontario had reached the stage of taxable profits recorded earnings, which enabled them to return invested capital to their shareholders. It therefore follows that the remaining two-thirds of these mines were actually taxed on capital.

As an example of the amount of capital required to develop a mine, it is authoritatively stated that the Hudson Bay Mining company at Flin Flon, Manitoba, required an expenditure of $30 million before any return was made to the shareholders. The Noranda mine—I think the minister will support me in this because he has made this very statement himself—required $25 million to enable it to produce and refine the metals of copper and gold. Furthermore, the average straight gold mines required from $2 million to $5 million to bring them into profitable production and to begin to return capital invested. These are very large sums and they must be considered as being risk capital.

This is one of the most valuable of all types of capital because it directly develops a primary industry of the nation. It is easily discouraged, and because of the hazardous natural and physical obstacles which it has to surmount, the addition of tax burdens will rapidly kill it at its source.

One of the fundamental errors made by the government is the method of assessing mine profits. In this connection I should like to quote from the brief on mining taxation by the Ontario and Quebec governments, submitted jointly by the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy in February of this year. I quote two paragraphs:

(a) Taxing authorities do not appreciate sufficiently the fundamental difference between mining and other industries.

(b) Insufficient provision is made in the allowance for depletion to ensure return of invested capital. Anyone investing in mines recognizes that he has no profit until his capital is returned. The government should likewise recognize this fact. Taxes on real profits can begin only after provision has been made for the return of invested capital.

Before 1934, depletion allowance for gold mines was fifty per cent of the net earnings on both mine profits and dividends. Base metal mines were allowed depletion of twenty-five per cent. In 1934, depletion allowance for all mines was set at 33⅓ per cent and on dividends paid to Canadians was reduced to a minimum rate of twenty per cent. These rates are still in effect, and I should like to quote again from the brief on taxation:

This unexplainable reduction in depletion allowance has been one of the most serious factors contributing to the decline in prospecting and new mine development. The federal tax is applicable to income and not to capital return. The present 33⅓ per cent depletion allowance is presumed to be the proportion of annual earnings earmarked for this return; but when actual distribution of this capital is made in the form of dividends the federal taxing authorities rule that only twenty per cent of each capital shall be tax free. Surely this is at least illogical. It should be noted that the increased revenue derived by the government through this reduction in depletion allowance was not for war purposes. The change became effective five years prior to the outbreak of the present war.

Analysis of the application of the present depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of company earnings, and twenty per cent for dividend, clearly demonstrates that, while the intention may have been to make provision for 33⅓ per cent of earnings as tax-free capital return, the actual return to the shareholders falls far short of that proportion.

I have two short tables which I think would be interesting to members of the house and I shall read the first and second. I wish to show how this works out in actual practice. The tables are as follows:

Assume operating profits of a gold mine are	$300
Deduct depletion of 33⅓ per cent	100
Taxable profit is, therefore	$200
Dominion tax at 40 per cent	80
Total income remaining	$120
Add depletion allowance	100
Total available to shareholders	$220
Depletion allowed shareholders at twenty per cent	44

Actual per cent of earnings allowed shareholders as depletion $\frac{44}{300} = 14{\cdot}6$ per cent

If the government will agree to the fifty per cent depletion allowance which has been advocated by both the Ontario and Quebec governments in their submissions we shall have this:

Earnings before taxes	$300
Depletion at 50 per cent	150
Taxable profit	$150
Dominion tax at 40 per cent	60
Net profit after taxes	$ 90
Add depletion allowed	150
Amount available for distribution	$240
Shareholder's depletion at 50 per cent	120

Shareholder gets as a return on capital free of income tax $\frac{120}{300} = 40$ per cent

It is generally agreed that a gold mining stock should pay ten per cent or sell at ten times the dividend paid. If this be true, let us suppose a mining company pays $1 a year in dividends, and that its stock sells for ten times $1 or $10.

Under the allowances of 33⅓ per cent and 20 per cent it will take a shareholder $^{100}/_{14{\cdot}6}$, or nearly seventy years to get his capital back free of tax.

Under the proposed fifty per cent to company and shareholder alike, it would take the same company $^{100}/_{40}$, or twenty-five years to do the same thing.

[Mr. Adamson.]

In the tax brief that I have quoted previously, it is shown that, taking all gold mining companies that have paid the so-called profits tax in Ontario, the average taxpaying life of such companies is about eight years.

The experience of our mining history has shown that to be true. Under such circumstances, asking that the period be not over twenty-five years, when the average chance is limited to eight years, cannot surely be considered as unreasonable. By the same token, seventy years must be unreasonable.

As a further concrete example of what mine taxes are doing I wish to quote three specific instances of companies. The first is Noranda Mines, the great copper-gold operation in Quebec, and it is as follows:

Total tax cost per ton of ore hoisted	$0.60	$2.29
Total tax cost per cent of annual sales value	6·1%	25·3%
Total tax cost per cent of estimated assessable profits	24·0%	60·0%
Per cent of total taxes accruing to dominion	63·2%	89·9%

That is the factual situation with regard to Noranda. I should like now to tell briefly the story with regard to the major asbestos mine of Quebec. The taxation of asbestos mines in the province of Quebec shows similar main effects on operations as those for gold and base-metal mines as follows:

	1932	1941
Total tax cost per ton milled	$0.14	$0.54
Total tax cost per ton fibre shipped	1.17	7.21
Total tax cost per cent of dividends (1937)	46·4%	64·6%
Total tax cost per cent production value	4·9%	16·4%
Total tax cost per cent assessable profits (1936)	29·7%	53·6%
Per cent total taxes accruing to dominion (1936)	52·6%	82·6%

If we take the profits of a straight gold mine we find this picture. The McIntyre Porcupine operation, which is a successful operation in every way, paid the following taxes during the last fiscal year. The total taxes were $1,214,437, representing an amount of $1,029 for every man employed, or $6.42 for every ounce of gold recovered, or $1.52 for every share of stock outstanding. In addition there are the municipal taxes and the taxes paid by individual shareholders. The over-all picture in Ontario from 1915 to 1941 is as follows: Dominion taxes increased from $130,000 to $11,324,000. The total tax per ton of ore milled increased from 24 cents to $1.15. The cost per ounce of gold increased from 56 cents to $4.51. The total tax on operations of the Ontario gold mining industry, plus estimated dominion income tax on all dividends, increased from 9·4 per cent in 1917 to 48·5 per cent in 1941; or, expressed in another way, it increased to 48½ cents for every dollar of dividends, or 52·2 per cent on established gold mines not subject to section 89 of the income tax act. It is estimated that the taxation at present is approximately 60 per cent of the total returns made to the shareholders in Ontario mines. This compares with 18·5 per cent in 1928 which unfortunately was the last year of intensive mining development.

The situation in Quebec is possibly more serious because of the generally lower grade mines in that province. No province in this dominion has a deeper interest in this question of low grade ores than Quebec. Of that province's twenty-four gold producing mines no less than thirteen have a grade of $5 a ton or less. These thirteen produce sixty per cent of Quebec's gold. To-day $5 a ton is considered pretty close to the line; with numerous mines in Canada the costs are well above this figure. It is only by dint of the fact that Quebec's ore bodies are large and lend themselves to large scale mining, and because of good management and the helpful interest which the province of Quebec takes in its mines, that these low grade propositions are able to run at all. The people of Quebec are closely watching this government to see whether it follows a policy which encourages mining endeavour, or pursues a policy of discouragement. I say this because the people of Quebec have utilized the disclosures of gold and other mining resources in their northwestern areas as the foundation of a very important plan of agricultural settlement. The frontier farms upon which numerous people work skilfully and prosperously lose all the market outlets for their labour when the gold mines fail. Hence the very deep concern when the operation of any Quebec gold mine appears to be endangered by shortage of labour. Fortunately for Quebec, no important Quebec gold mine has had to close down by reason of labour shortage, although in the rest of Canada many gold mines have had to quit completely and leave their communities in a very difficult state, in some places on the edge of bankruptcy. I mention Quebec because, as every one in the mining business knows, its mines, while very important, are often on the low grade side. Taxation of a character which cripples the use of low grade ores and which checks the enterprise of mine-makers is of very special interest to the province of Quebec.

Of the forty pure gold mines operating in Ontario—those that rely solely upon gold—only five have a grade of $5 a ton or less. I do not know whether this means that Ontario is more blessed with higher grade gold mines than the other provinces of Canada. Probably it means that conditions in Ontario have not been such as to encourage the development of low grade propositions. Undoubtedly Ontario would have more such mines if the taxation set-up was more favourable to people taking chances on mines in the low grade category.

In order to make my point clear as to the value of low grade ore—

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, which does he think is most important, nickel or gold, in the prosecution of the war?

Mr. ADAMSON: I am coming to that, if the minister will contain himself. If he had listened to the beginning of my speech his question would have been answered. Perhaps he will read it to-morrow in Hansard.

In order to make my point clear about the value of low grade ore some brief discussion of the way the ore bearing solutions were injected might overcome some misconception which I believe to be common. This is a dangerous subject to tackle, because it is difficult to generalize and the science of geology is vast and complicated. However, with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, let the house imagine a drum of boiling white paraffin. Now into the bottom of this drum is injected, under great pressure, a number of cupfuls of boiling red paraffin. The drum is then allowed to cool. When the wax has solidified, if we cut into it we shall possibly find the red paraffin in a pillar-shaped or lenticular-shaped mass, depending on the method of injection. However, we will find it not in one even mass but mixed with the white paraffin, and while the centre of the mass may still be quite red in colour it will soon become pink; then only slightly coloured as we proceed from the centre of the mass until there is no trace of colour whatsoever.

This is something of the same way the ore bearing solutions were absorbed into the native pre-Cambrian rock of the Canadian shield. The solutions rich in the centre soon were dissolved in the country rock into which they were forced by volcanic action. Of course it was not as simple as this; many different volcanic eruptions took place and great earthquakes subsequently caused ground movement, breaking up the original ore mass and moving parts of it great distances from the main body. However, the principle of the ore bearing solutions flowing into, and being absorbed and diluted by the country rock, just as the red paraffin flowed into the white, holds good. So that as we get variation in colour of the paraffin we get the variation in value of the resultant mass of rock which we now find in situ. The problem of the miner is to get every pound of the rich solution just as it would be to get every cupful of the red paraffin wax, assuming it to have great value. The miner would fail to do this if he merely took out the rich centre section of the ore body, just as he would fail if he only took the bright red paraffin which had not become diluted by the white.

This rather fanciful allegory has considerable importance and is one of the fundamental conditions of mining which is not understood by the tax gatherer; for just as the greater quantity of the red paraffin will be found in dilute solution with the white, so is the vast majority of the original metal bearing deposit in dilute solution in the native rock. Estimates vary, but for every ton of $10 ore in place in the majority of our precious metal mines, there will be many tons of $5 ore and many, many more tons of $4 and $3 ore.

An empirical theory of ore valuations in a simple arithmetical progression has been suggested, and while this does not of course work exactly in any one mine, or cannot be applied to all mines, it approximates conditions in several of our major gold producers. The theory is that for every ton of $10 ore there are two tons of $9 ore, four tons of $8 ore and sixteen tons of $7 ore and so on. Carrying the progression down to $3 we get the following results:

		Value
1	ton at $10	$ 10
2	" " 9	18
4	" " 8	32
8	" " 7	56
16	" " 6	96
32	" " 5	160
64	" " 4	256
128	" " 3	384

It will be seen that an ore body of this kind —always assuming that we take out all the rock to $3, which is approximately the minimum that any mine to-day can take out— will contain 255 tons of ore each containing more than $3 worth of metal and it will have a total value of $912. The average value per ton of such a body will be only $3.58. If we discard all rock containing $5 or less in metal, the value of the remainder will be $5.90 per ton. Thus, as our costs of mining increase from $3 to $5, we find that we lose $640 or 70 per cent of the dollar value of the whole ore body. It will be seen, therefore, how tremendously destructive taxation is which increases the cost of ore milled, and when we see that at Noranda the total tax per ton of ore hoisted has increased from sixty cents in 1932 to $2.29 in 1941, some idea of this tremendous destruction of ore may be gathered.

An ore body which has once been mined and has had the rich centre core removed, can never be worked again, because the low grade remaining in the side walls will not pay for extraction. This is of fundamental importance. The process is known as high-grading the mine and it is as harmful to the people of Canada as is high-grading the mine by individuals, because it definitely steals from the people of the country one of their assets. It is tragic to think that the government of the people tolerates this criminal practice.

Lest anybody think our supplies of nickel are inexhaustible I should like to quote from the report of its president, Mr. R. C. Stanley. This is what he said:

> Deliveries of nickel in all forms derived from our own mine production amounted in 1943 to 265,000,000 pounds, representing an increase of 55,000,000 pounds over 1939. In order to provide this enlarged supply, the tonnage of our ore mined was forced from 7,273,000 tons in 1939 to 12,105,000 tons in 1943.

This means that Canada's largest mining organization has suffered a very considerable decline in the grade of its ore. The recovered content in 1939 was thirty pounds per ton. By 1943 it had dropped to twenty-two pounds per ton. The margin is getting thin. It was necessary to increase the tonnage created by sixty-five per cent to gain a production of nickel only twenty-five per cent greater. The high grade deposits of the Sudbury district are fading. This is the greatest nickel camp in the world and the reason for Canada producing eighty-five per cent of the world's nickel. The world has many low grade nickel ore deposits; they are to be found in numerous countries. If the high grade nickel ores of Canada are ever exhausted, then all our boasted supremacy in nickel fades away.

It is a serious situation for Canada, or could be if cognizance is not taken of it. During the war we have encouraged our nickel mines to produce to the utmost of their ability, and their achievements in that line demand the warmest of praise. But they have paid a heavy cost in the exhaustion of their better ores. It is our good fortune that these companies still have 250,000,000 tons of ore in reserve, or about twenty years normal supply, and though the average grade is lower we can hope that the skill of our nickel miners will put this lower grade to good account. But they will be handicapped, if not badly crippled, unless we ease the burden of taxation.

Some 15,000 or 16,000 men in Canada are engaged in the mining and refining of nickel, and we owe consideration to them, and the 150,000 persons who are supported one way and another by the nickel industry, as well as consideration to Canada's prestige as the world's chief producer of nickel.

I should like to say something about copper. We must think in terms of big tonnage for the future of our copper production. On the Arctic coasts of Canada there are believed to be large masses of low grade copper ore, and it is probably true that elsewhere in Canada other large deposits of low grade copper ore exist. It may well be that we shall be forced to consider the mining of these, and eventually we shall see in this dominion, operations as large as Kennecott's famous Utah Copper Mine where last year 59½ million tons of ore were mined and forty-nine million tons of earth were stripped. Operations of this order, and indeed any large-tonnage proposition, require great sums of capital. It is impossible to attract such huge investment on a small margin of profit, unless the investors know that taxation will not rob them of a chance to get their money back, plus a return commensurate with the risks.

The seriousness of the situation is well recognized by the Wallace committee in a report to this house. I shall quote three paragraphs from that report as follows:

1. Intensified search for and discovery of new sources of supply is indispensable if the Canadian mineral industry is to survive.

2. Ores of metals vary greatly in the percentage of metal contained and in the percentage recovered. The lower the cost of recovery the greater will be the tonnage of ore available for treatment. Taxation charged as a cost against mining reduces the amount of metal that can profitably be recovered from a given mine. The higher the tax, the greater the loss of metal that might otherwise have been recovered.

There is a wide field for extending employment provided new sources of mineral wealth are found and new methods of utilizing those rocks and minerals, which occur in great abundance, are developed.

The essential requirements are intensive stimulation of prospecting, the provision of maps, topographical and geological, the provision of transportation facilities (roads, et cetera) into mining areas, a minimum of restrictive measures so that the prospector may continue to be stimulated by the possibility of a find that will compensate him for years of disappointment.

3. That adjustments be made in respect to taxation that would stimulate prospecting and mine development and mineral recovery.

And finally, I recommend to this house the careful study of clause 20, which contains this significant sentence: "An expanding mining industry will be of particular national importance and should be carefully studied." The whole report of the Wallace committee deserves the most careful attention and, I believe, represents one of the best blueprints for the future that has yet been produced.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) went to great lengths in his statement to this house to compare our taxation with that of Australia. He should have been more thorough, for there are many, many instances where Australian taxation is far more generous than ours; generous let me say from a realistic point of view, because Australia, during a wave of extreme socialistic government, all but destroyed her mining industry, and the present administration has had to enact special encouragement classes of her income tax act in order to save the industry from extinction. I may say that if the present government persists in its policies the mining industry in Canada will also face extinction. I will quote the Australian act. Section 23, in the first line, reads as follows:—

The following income shall be exempt from income tax.

And paragraph (m) reads as follows:

(m) income derived prior to the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, directly and in the first place from primary production, mining or fisheries in the Northern Territory of Australia by a resident of that territory.

There are three clauses dealing with exemption which I think are of great interest. I have already quoted paragraph (m), and now I will quote paragraph (o):

(o) the income derived by a person from the working of a mining property in Australia or in the territory of New Guinea principally for the purpose of obtaining gold, or gold and copper, provided that in this case the value of the output of gold is not less than forty per centum of the total value of the output of the mine.

Paragraph (p) provides that income derived by a bona fide prospector shall be exempt from income tax, and bona fide prospector is defined, and is a very broad definition.

If we applied paragraph (m) to Canada it would mean that all the present development in the Northwest Territories, including the Yellowknife field, would be exempt from taxation. I suggest to the house that if we did this in the immediate post-war years there would be a gold rush, the like of which has not been seen in history.

In connection with the Northwest Territories and the much publicized Yellowknife discoveries, it should be pointed out that this is not a new thing. For many years past, prospectors have been in this country and there have been a number of actually producing mines, one the Conn mine, a subsidiary of Consolidated Smelters, and another the Negus mine, which has actually reached the dividend paying state, having returned its shareholders five cents a share during 1943.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I conclude this paragraph, Mr. Speaker? I should like to go on record as supporting the contention of the Ontario and Quebec governments that the depletion allowance of fifty per cent on the net earnings of all metal mines be allowed and that this be extended to dividends as declared.

Secondly, that taxes paid to municipalities and provincial authorities be allowed as a deduction.

Thirdly, that all exploration expenditures made outside the property of the mine be allowed as a deduction from earnings.

If we went as far as Australia we would exempt from taxation both corporation, income and excess profit taxes on all metal mines. I believe if we did this the treasury of the dominion government and the rate of employment would both benefit. However, certain precautions would have to be taken. We would have to see that every profitable mining operation did its fair share of exploration and prospecting; secondly, we would have to see that once a percentage of capital had been returned to the company, the net earnings or a considerable proportion of them would be paid to the individual shareholders. We must safeguard our country from operators who would build up large surpluses and then take them out of Canada.

I realize that in this life and death struggle any taxation, no matter how unsound, or how discriminatory, will be paid and paid gladly; but when I see the Minister of Finance bringing down clauses which are obviously peace-time clauses, I feel that some statement of policy should be made with regard to the future of the mining industry, upon which more than all others the future of Canada depends.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 26 introduced into this house his sixth wartime budget of world war two. It is a budget of very large proportions calling for an expenditure of almost six billion dollars. This in itself is a huge amount of money for a population of eleven million people to contemplate. It is a budget that arrests our attention when we realize that it is about eleven times our ordinary peace-time expenditure. However, I am sure that the people of this country recognize the importance of an expenditure of this kind and are prepared to shoulder the load and carry the taxation responsibility that goes with the prosecution of an all-out war.

It was, of course, gratifying for the minister to be able to say that approximately one-half of the revenue required for the huge expenditure last year had been raised through the general revenues and that the remainder had been largely borrowed from our own people through the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates, and the minister hopes that the same creditable record will be achieved in the year to come. Here is one place where I think we as members of parliament can lend to the minister and to the government and to the country generally a degree of cooperation, regardless of the political differences that may exist between us. We have called upon the people of this country to come forward and lend their money and to pay taxes. I think we owe to the national war finance committee and to the thousands of volunteers who have acted with them in putting across our various victory loan campaigns a debt of gratitude which we shall be a long time in repaying. I feel that we owe to these workers a deep debt of gratitude and should lend them every assistance possible when the opportunity comes to promote another victory loan.

While taxation is high and while some of the regulations that we have during war time may be irritating, nevertheless they are a small amount of insurance for what Canada has been able to do. We are here a nation that has been at war; yet we have never had a city bombed nor has a foreign soldier set foot upon our soil, so that I think it is small insurance for us to pay when the chief obligations that are required of us are to pay out a little money to meet the taxation requirements of the country.

We have at the same time enjoyed a degree of prosperity which we have never enjoyed before in the history of this dominion, nor has that prosperity ever before been as equitably distributed as it is at the present time. The contribution, therefore, that we are called upon as civiliains to pay in this war in the way of taxation and in the way of putting up with regulations and little inconveniences is small compared with the hardships which the men on the actual fighting fronts have to bear at this time.

While the minister has seen fit to discontinue the refundable portion of the income tax, I must say that I felt right along that this feature of our taxation had much to commend it. It provided a means for creating a savings, a nest-egg for the future; and when it is realized that the refundable portion of the income tax could be offset by the payment of insurance premiums and the payment of principal on farm mortgages and on mortgages on homes, I cannot see that the burden was so very great for the vast majority of people, particularly those who are in a position to make such payments. For those who are not in that position, the refundable savings feature provided a means whereby they could accumulate a sum for the period when the war is over. After all, the majority of the people whom the minister hopes to benefit most in this regard, those in the low income tax brackets, will only secure, I imagine, the advantage of perhaps two or three dollars a week, which may easily be expended for non-essentials, instead of being set aside as a savings for the post-war period.

As was to be expected, the other political groups in this house have offered counter-proposals. In other words, they would do things differently from the way the minister proposes. They believe that their proposals will appeal more strongly to the people at this particular time.

While the minister has done away with the refundable portion of the income tax, our Progressive Conservative friends opposite would raise the income tax exemption to $800 a year for single persons and $1,600 for married people, and at the same time create a fund equal to the contribution that we make to UNRRA as an amount of money available for the post-war period. Our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends would go one better and raise the exemption respectively to $1,000 and to fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars, and also provide $5,000 million for a two-year period after the war. It is easy for them to bring forward such proposals at this time; indeed it is their privilege that they should do so. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance is in a responsible position and must carry into effect anything that he proposes to the house. The opposition groups are able to offer proposals which they do not hope to implement, certainly at the present time; but he is obliged to face up to his proposals now and lay his plans for the whole government programme. These people present their proposals as a different method of doing things. I believe that the objective of all of us is the same. We want to prosecute this war to the end as effectively as possible. The opposition group propose to do so by a different method.

This reminds me of a traveller who was sent out from his head office to a country town. Arriving there in the early hours of the morning, he found that the railway station was a mile or two from the business and hotel section. He looked around and could find neither street-car nor taxicab to carry him to the hotel. Finally he spoke to the station agent, who mentioned that probably the mail carrier would be down and he might get a ride to the city with him later on. At last the mail carrier arrived and the traveller secured a ride with him. He began to complain bitterly of the railway station being two or three miles away from the business section of the town, when it should have been put in the middle of the town, near the hotels, as a convenience to the travelling public. The old gentleman who drove the mails, and who had been in the town for some time, finally said, "Young man, you may be right in what you say, but there are a lot of people around here who think it is much better to have the station down beside the railway track." He had a practical approach to the problem at hand, which is the approach the Minister of Finance is up against at the present time.

May I say to the minister that, while he has affected in a direct way more people than any other minister of this government, he still holds their confidence and admiration. There is no minister who has gone into the people's pockets and collected taxes, made regulations and fixed wages and price ceilings—things of that kind—to the same extent as the Minister of Finance has done; yet he enjoys the admiration of the Canadian people for what he has achieved. Moreover, he has had the satisfaction of receiving commendation from people outside our country who have watched with keen interest the success he has made of the financing of this country during this period of war. More than that, many of the policies which were established by this government during the early stages of the war have been copied in large measure by other countries.

May I here read a little tribute to him which was carried in Saturday Night a few days ago:

Common Sense

Mr. Ilsley's conduct as Minister of Finance has been characterized by a degree of common sense so uncommon as to be astounding. It is pure common sense to abandon the compulsory saving device, which in principle has every argument in its favour except that it works badly. It is pure common sense to extend the tax allowance to illegitimate children and to relatives-in-law. It is pure common sense not to stick on any more taxes at this moment. It is excellent common sense to make the refundable portion of the excess profits tax a valid collateral for borrowing. We still believe that common sense will, some day, when he gets around to it, lead him to distinguish between capital payments and the interest or profit element in annuities. Meanwhile we can assure that the country loves him for his common sense almost as much as for his courage and his honesty.

There are three features of the government's war-time policy which to me have been fundamental from the beginning, and are now, and will be more so in the post-war period. It is unfortunate that they have not been more loudly proclaimed to the people of this country so that they may be better understood. Our price control policy has held prices stable. The result has been that it has maintained in this country a price structure which will be of inestimable value when the war is over. Some time ago I met some friends who had been to the United States, and who told me some of the experiences they had in visiting a home in that country. They pointed out that people over there were loud in their praise of Canadian policies particularly with respect to price control and its enforcement. The lady of the house remarked that since the beginning of the war the cost of running her house had risen from $20 a week to $35 a week and she did not know where the money had gone. Her little boy, eight years old, came in with a haircut which cost $1. That is some indication of what can happen, and some evidence of the advantage which we have under our price control system.

The other matter to which I wish to refer is the policy of borrowing from ourselves. This has had a far-reaching and fundamental effect. It has created a sense of thrift in the accumulation of savings and the paying off of debt. I believe the country will be gratified to know from the statement of the Minister of Finance that our debt, so far as the financing of this war is concerned, is owned to the extent of ninety-five per cent by ourselves.

I come to the income tax and excess profits system. Here, to me, is a great over-all experiment in the application of state socialism. It is applied on the basis of ability to pay, upon a graduated basis whereby those who have shall pay most. Our socialist friends, so far as I have heard or observed their various proposals, have never proposed anything as sweeping and far-reaching of a socialistic nature as our income tax system. It is a great social experiment which is working well and doing a job of equalizing opportunity and incomes. It is a social experiment with far-reaching effect. I often wonder why our hon. friends on the other side of the house cannot once in a while give us some little credit for the steps which have been taken in this particular regard.

There were three features of the budget proposals which I was particularly glad to see. It is a source of satisfaction to me that the foreign exchange control tax and the tariff have been lifted from farm implements. The provision will include all classes of farm implements, from dairy utensils and the smallest type of implements right up to power machinery. My feeling has always been that there was little if any justification for the foreign exchange control tax ever to have been applied to tractors and power equipment of that kind. We do not manufacture tractors in this country, so that I think we were imposing a burden of cost on our farmers which was unnecessary. May I pause, however, to point out one thing which to me does not work out with that degree of equity and fairness which I think matters of this kind should. When the foreign exchange control tax was applied, the implement companies and others naturally added the amount of that tax to their inventory. Some of them even showed it as an added tax. Now it is presumed, and I think they would admit it immediately, that once that tax is removed they will be expected to reduce their prices on imported implements to an extent equal to the amount of the tax. But the point I would call to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) is that the same people had large inventories when this tax was applied and to-day they have little or no equipment in their warehouses, so that to me there was a class of people there who were called upon to pay a tax which they were not justified in paying.

With respect to the application of the income tax on farmers, I am glad to note the improvement that has been suggested. However, I do not think it goes far enough, and I believe our taxation authorities would be well advised to give a good deal more study to the application of the income tax so far as the farm business of the country is concerned. We hear a good deal of complaint and some good-natured gibes at the type of income tax forms which farmers are obliged to fill out. That is not the point. When we have farmers in nine different provinces, from one end of the country to the other, it is recognized that an income tax form must be all-embracing in order to provide for the various types of farming operations that are carried on. My contention has always been and still is that the income tax, so far as our farmers are concerned, should be applied on an average of a five-year basis. At the present time some $60 million is being paid out on participation certificates on wheat which was marketed in the years 1940, 1941 and 1942. If that money becomes taxable in the current year, then I think it is unfair, and I hope the minister will see to it that at least that money can be applied on the income tax year for which it was earned or in which the crop was marketed.

The other matter I should like to urge continued consideration of is that which applies to a farmer who sells out or liquidates his chattels. It seems to me to be grossly unfair, where a man has accumulated a certain amount of live stock and other products over a period of years, that when he is obliged to sell out for one reason or another, that is taken as income. If the minister has evolved regulations which will solve this very important problem I hope he will take an opportunity of making an announcement with regard to it.

Another matter regarding which I wish to make an observation or two is that of the taxation of cooperatives. I am not going to refer to this because I understand it is improper to do so, except to say that I think it is unfortunate and regrettable that this matter has not been settled. We have hundreds of these cooperative organizations small in size serving the people of western Canada, and to have them in a state of uncertainty with regard to their taxation status is most unfortunate. It is something that should be remedied at as early a date as possible.

May I for a moment say a word or two about the post-war period. One would think, listening to the observations of hon. gentlemen in various parts of the house, that nothing had been done by this government or by anyone else looking toward the post-war period. As illustrative of that point of view, I refer again to the one group proposing to spend some $75 or $80 million immediately on the close of the war, and the other, $5 billion over a two-year period. I submit that the whole programme of this government has been designed from the beginning to meet both the war period and the post-war period as well. The wide distribution of victory bonds and war savings certificates will be one of the most important instruments we have in meeting the post-war period. Millions of Canadians will have their own resources to assist them in tiding over from the period of war into the period of peace. There is a backlog of work to be done and supplies to be provided which will, in my judgment, tax the resources of the people of this country for a considerable period. It is the period later than that immediate post-war period that I fear more.

In my approach particularly to the post-war period, may I say that if I am anything at all I hope I am a ruralist. While I appreciate your big cities and what they can contribute to the betterment of mankind, nevertheless I do not think they would last very long or be able to maintain their splendid services, the high educational facilities and other things of that kind, if it were not for the production received from the primary producers and other rural people. Rural Canada needs repairs and needs them badly. It needs new buildings; it needs actually trainloads of paint and of lumber; it needs literally thousands of carpenters. If given an opportunity, I believe it will provide a degree of employment equal to any other branch of industry in this country. Rural Canada in my judgment needs hydro electric power, particularly lighting facilities. Compared with other countries in this regard we are very much behind. I have checked up some figures and I repeat them for the benefit of the house. Hydro electric service is supplied in Sweden to seventy-five per cent of the farms; in Denmark, eighty-five per cent; in Holland, ninety-eight per cent; in France, ninety per cent; in New Zealand, seventy-five per cent; in the United States, forty-two per cent; and in Ontario, which so far as our country is concerned has much the largest amount of hydro, it is only forty per cent, while in Manitoba it is down to two per cent.

The development of hydro and its extension throughout Manitoba will be, I think, one of the large over-all post-war projects in that province. It in turn will provide a great deal of employment both in the establishment of the lines and in the production of equipment that is necessary to go with the extension of a large development of hydro facilities. This will require capital at a low rate of interest. If that capital can be secured for extension purposes at a low rate of interest, those acquiring it can make their capital investment self-liquidating through their earnings from rentals on the Winnipeg river. This to me would be an over-all plan for post-war development of a self-liquidating nature. At the present time meetings are being held all over the province laying out plans, interesting local bodies, municipalities and boards of trade with a view to providing for the best possible utilization and expansion of hydro facilities. Nothing will do more to remove the drudgery and brighten up farm life than will paint and hydro electric power. Hand in hand with a development of that kind I would hope to see in our western provinces a further industrial development, particularly in the processing of agricultural products of a perishable or semi-perishable nature.

I have been through certain parts of this fine province of Ontario and have seen some of the developments that have gone on there with respect to cold storage facilities, quick-freeze plants, and things of that kind. May I say that so far as Manitoba is concerned it is capable of producing practically any type of farm product that is produced in Ontario and in most of the other parts of eastern Canada, with the possible exception of special lines on a commercial scale. Nearly all small fruits and vegetables can be produced in that province. Therefore, anything that we can do toward making them more available for general use is something that I am sure should be undertaken. The farm people in the west are entitled to encouragement along this line and I hope that steps will be taken to that end.

As I said earlier, I believe that it will provide a great deal of employment. Speaking again as a ruralist, I should like to see as a post-war over-all development something in the way of assistance toward the development of community life. It might be the establishment of community halls or recreational centres and things of that kind, whereby people could take advantage of their local talents and develop them into more useful purposes, with a view to taking part on any occasion when they may be called on. A policy of that kind could do much toward developing a community spirit and a unity of purpose, particularly in some of our more or less non-English speaking districts. There we could bring those people together and do much toward developing in them a Canadianism. After all, they have much to contribute to our everyday life, and anything that we can do to encourage them is to our advantage.

I wanted to make a reference to housing. I do not come from an industrial constituency and therefore I have not quite the same appreciation of this matter as members from large cities have; but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, without hesitation, that the need for housing is very great in large areas of rural western Canada. The people who appear to be most in need at the present time are those who live in the smaller towns. Our approved lending institutions have not given them the same attention as they have to larger areas. I hope that the smaller towns will be kept in mind in any programme that may be worked out in the new proposals which are to be introduced.

I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) can be assisted in further expanding and developing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Water conservation and development and reclamation schemes are all part and parcel of a post-war programme. I wonder if people realize just what prairie farm rehabilitation has meant to the production of live stock, so badly needed during this particular war period. There were put down in western Canada some eighteen thousand dugouts to supply water for farmers to produce live stock who in a large measure were previously unable to do so. Therefore I hope that steps will be taken to see that the minister has an opportunity to develop further the prairie farm rehabilitation programme.

I had intended to refer to some of the other matters that the government is undertaking looking toward the post-war period. But as my time has nearly expired I shall refer to them only briefly. Some people would attempt to lead the country to believe that the government has done nothing toward post-war planning. Earlier I made reference to what I thought was part and parcel of the government's programme with respect to the war and the post-war period. The plans made at the beginning had in mind not only the war period, but also the post-war period as well. Since that time the government has instituted several far-reaching inquiries and investigations, and called in the most capable people who could be gathered around it to give advice. I recall that in 1941 a committee of reconstruction was set up under Doctor Cyril James of McGill university to study post-war problems and make recommendations to the government. That committee has submitted a report, and those hon. members who have taken occassion to read it must have recognized that it is a comprehensive report. Later a committee was appointed on economic policy under the chairmanship of the deputy minister of finance. Then a committee of this House of Commons has been studying reconstruction and rehabilitation matters for the past few years. People and officials from all walks of life have appeared before this committee. In fact, reading the evidence and recognizing the witnesses who have appeared one finds it hard to conceive of any branch of the post-war problem that has not been given attention by this committee. It is still carrying on its activities. Then we have the committee on social security which has been carrying on for two years.

I had intended to speak particularly on some of the matters outside Canada and in which Canada is playing a leading part. I refer to international conferences looking toward the post-war period, looking to the time when the war will be over and when—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. WEIR: No, thank you. My time is just about up. When plans can be made for the period of peace, UNRRA, in which Canada plays an important part, is one of those. The conference on food and nutrition, attended by forty different nations is a study of post-war nutritional matters. Then there were certain proposals put forward by the governments of the United States and Great Britain with respect to post-war monetary policy, particularly the establishment of a unified system of exchange. Here again Canada submitted a proposal which met with a very large measure of approval. At the present time, I am informed, this matter is being dealt with at a conference of representatives of forty-seven of the united nations, who are seeking an agreement in regard to the establishment of an international monetary policy for the post-war period.

So that, Mr. Speaker, I submit that plans are well advanced; that the groundwork has been laid for proposals which may be easily whipped into shape in preparation for the time when the war will be over. The meeting of dominion prime ministers in England only a few months ago was another conference which I think might be regarded as one more step to prepare for the post-war period. Therefore we have all this groundwork, both in our own country and abroad, with which we have been actively associated. In addition, every municipality, every city, every town and every hamlet have carried on studies and made plans for the period following the war. So that I believe we can say with some confidence that at least we know where we are going in this connection.

We are indeed a fortunate country. We enjoy a high standard of living, which was never so equitably distributed as at the present time. We have made and will continue to make progress, but in doing so we must help others. Some may fear that as we help others we may adversely affect our own standard of living. To those having this fear I commend the words uttered by President Roosevelt some time ago, when he said that as we help raise the standard of living of other people we help raise our own standard of living as well. When one views the international post-war plans now being developed one cannot help feeling that a realistic approach is being made. Let us hope that nothing will occur to offset the plans already so well advanced in the direction of carrying out the ideals of the Atlantic charter. Looking to this post-war period; approaching it with all the sincerity at my command, to me there is only one man in the public life of Canada possessing the experience, the capacity, the understanding, the contacts and the approach which will be required of the person representing this country at the peace conference when that time arrives. That man is none other than our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Therefore I say that Canada will do well to bear in mind the period following this war, because whatever is done at the peace conference will have a lasting effect upon the world, and upon Canada.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), who has just taken his seat, on his eloquent confession of faith in his party and his government. I am quite sure his belief that the public still have confidence in that party, in the light of what has been taking place during the last two years, must be very reassuring to his colleagues on the other side of the house. I shall not say anything to shake that confidence.

The point of view of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party has already been set forth in this debate by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and other members of this group. By way of general observation I want to say that it is quite evident from the budget that this government still pins its faith upon our present monopoly, capitalist system, and that where the government has entered the field of public ownership it has done so reluctantly and as a war measure. Quite evidently it is the intention of the government to withdraw from this field, once the war is over, just as quickly as conditions permit. When you accept and recognize that position the budget becomes intelligible and is probably as progressive as could be expected, having those objectives in view. This much is certain, that if we are to fall back upon private enterprise to maintain production and keep up our national income, to provide employment and mass purchasing power after the war, we must give this enterprise whatever concessions are necessary to enable it to do that job with adequate profit to capital.

I regret that the budget contains no reference to the broad field of education. I should like to urge upon the members of the cabinet that when the dominion-provincial conference, to which reference is made in the budget, is convened, educationists and education officials be given a place at that conference and that an arrangement be made under which the government may take some steps to deal with the general subject of education in this country.

I should like to confine my remarks to-night to two subjects mentioned in the budget, mining and oil. At page 4183 of Hansard the minister points out:

> The government has very much in mind the need of a comprehensive and many-sided programme to encourage the efficient development of our natural resources and to assure that these industries will make the maximum contribution to the expansion of employment, national income and national wealth after the war.

It is quite evident that private enterprise, as evidenced in the field of mining, and in the oil fields, has failed to meet the needs of the nation in war time. It is quite apparent that, by various measures, the government has had to come to the assistance of those enterprises, by tax relief and other concessions. All are agreed, I think, that some important changes are needed, if those industries are to function in the future.

The minister also indicates that this subject will be reviewed at the coming dominion-provincial conference. In the budget certain concessions are made to the mining interests. Already new companies enjoy a three-year exemption from excess profits tax. Last year's budget made a provision whereby mining companies may write off exploration and prospecting expenses incurred while prospecting anywhere in Canada for base or strategic minerals. This is extended for another year by the present budget.

Undoubtedly the changes in income and excess profits tax will also benefit the mining companies. Then, one-half the expenditures on maintenance and repairs now to be charged back to the income of previous fiscal periods, may also be used to assist the mining companies, since they may include underground development work as part of their maintenance costs. I presume also that the concessions in the budget with respect to research will benefit the mining industry.

Even these concessions do not meet the requests of those interested in mining, and particularly those interested in the purchase and sale of mining stock. They are asking for much more than these concessions indicate. They ask that the depletion allowance be raised from 33½ per cent to 50 per cent of the net earnings of metal and industrial mineral mines. They want the taxes paid annually to provincial and municipal governments to be allowed as a deduction from the earnings of all mining companies, before assessment for dominion income or excess profits tax purposes. They want also that all annual expenditures made by mining companies on outside explorations in any part of Canada, except cost of options or the purchase of property, be allowed as deductions from earnings before assessment for dominion income and/or excess profits tax.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has ably set forth the case for the mining companies, and the claims which have been put forth in various briefs by organizations interested in mining. I think all hon. members recognize the importance of mining in the national economy. We are all anxious that in the post-war period the mining industry, and other natural resources of this country, should be developed in the interests of the people of Canada. Doubtless drastic changes are needed.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

There are, however, other factors which have to be taken into consideration, and which should be considered by the dominion provincial conference, when it sets forth the new conditions under which mining is to be conducted. Let it not be forgotten that it is not the prospector of whom we have heard so much in the house, who usually profits from his discovery of mining claims or minerals. Usually he is the one who profits least from the discoveries he makes. Let us also remember that in many instances those who derive the most profit from the mining industry are those who manipulate the mining stock market, and who make little if any contribution to the actual development of our natural resources.

Again I think we should keep in mind the fact that we have no assurance, when the government has come to the assistance of mining companies, by way of tax concessions and various other means, that when those mining companies reach a profitable stage of development the profits accruing therefrom may not revert to a very few individuals, and the general public profit but very little.

There is another point which should be considered. Even to-day, with all our drastic tax regulations, it is still possible for those who are interested in mining to secure properties from prospectors, organize stock companies, unload the stock on the public and make profit therefrom, while their profits from that field go untaxed, since they are considered as capital increase, and not profit. That is a very broad field which has not yet been touched by our tax collectors. I think it would be well to consider what has happened in respect of one very successful mining company which in its 1943 report has complained of high taxes, shortage of manpower, the high cost of labour and decrease in profits. Let us review its history, briefly.

I refer particularly to the Lake Shore mines. This mine was incorporated in 1914, and began milling operations in 1918. The property is in the Kirkland lake area. In 1933 it obtained control over Kirkland, Hudson bay claims, Minnaker, and Kirkland claims. Its operations have been extremely profitable, as I shall show from figures taken from the Financial Corporation Analysis for October 11, 1943. This company when incorporated was authorized to issue and did issue 2,000,000 shares of stock at a par value of $1 a share. On this $2,000,000 capitalization the company has paid dividends and bonuses totalling $90,420,000 or $45.21 a share of a par value of $1. Since 1918, that is to say, every dollar originally invested has earned $45.21 a share, or an average yearly return of $1.80, or 180 per cent, on the original investment.

Dividends and bonuses reached their peak in the depression years. Dividends reached $6 per share, or 600 per cent on the original investment in 1937, and $5 per share, or 500 per cent in 1938. In the banking and commerce committee we have been giving the bankers a rather rough ride for having paid dividends amounting at one time to sixteen per cent, but in the light of this 600 per cent the bankers are novices compared with these men as financiers.

Mr. WOOD: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Surely.

Mr. WOOD: In view of what the hon. member has just stated, the great profits of one particular mining company, would it not be fair for him to mention some other mines in which there have been great losses, because if the government went into it they would have to absorb those large private enterprises and stand the losses. I would like the hon. member to give us an answer to that.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The point I am making here is that when the government has made tax concessions, when it has come to the assistance of the mines in order to bring them to the stage of development, there is no evidence that the public is going to profit by reason of the government's investment. On the contrary, the likelihood is that the government will bear the expenses of those mines that are unprofitable, while those that are profitable will pass their profits on to a very few individuals.

Even if we base those dividends on the book value rather than on the par value of the stock the payments are still exorbitant. In terms of book value they range from 149 per cent in 1939 to 35 per cent in 1943. The tremendous dividends paid on the stock have raised and maintained its market value at fantastic levels. This stock which sold originally at $1 par value reached a high of $62 in 1936. It was never lower than $16. It was $16 in 1926 and is back again near that price at the present time. Despite the tremendous aggregate of $90,420,000, the capitalization remained unchanged at $2,000,000, and the concern has remained relatively small. Its total assets in 1939 were valued at $8,066,358, and in that year it paid in dividends $8,000,000. In other words, it paid in dividends almost as much as its total assets were valued at. The company has unquestionably exploited the natural resources and has paid out tremendous dividends totalling many times the original investment. Little has been set aside for depreciation. Surpluses above dividends have been valued at considerably more than the total capitalization, and in some years, for instance in 1939, 1940 and 1941, the company paid part of its huge dividends out of its accumulated surplus.

Mining interests are asking the government to raise the ante on depletion exemptions, to exempt depletions up to fifty per cent. Here was a very successful mine which depreciated its own surplus in order to pay out dividends, the depletions being from $1,278,129 in 1939 to $198,682 in 1941. Yet these are the people who come to the government asking that a greater allowance be made for depletion. In other words, instead of the surplus earnings from this company being used to any extent to finance an expansion of operations so as to increase total output, they have been dissipated in the form of large dividends and bonuses to stockholders.

The total value of assets, gross earnings, net income and dividend payments from Lake Shore Mines has been falling steadily since the war began, and taxes have declined correspondingly. The dividend rate, however, has remained substantial. Even the eighty cents per share rate or $1,600,000 in total dividends and bonuses in 1943 represents a return of thirty-five per cent on the book value of the stock as of that year and more than twenty-two per cent of the total assets of the company.

As I have pointed out, in 1939 the dividends totalled $8,000,000, or almost the equivalent of the entire value of the total assets of that year. Despite this phenomenal record of earnings, perhaps because of their dissipation in huge dividends and bonuses, the company reported difficulty in maintaining operations. In its annual report for 1932 it complained that:

> The war has made it necessary to tax the income of mines far beyond the point where they can expand or even long exist.

This statement, in the light of the record of this company, and as made by this company, is simply ridiculous. In 1943 their report points to other difficulties: The labour strike in 1941-42, the growing man-power shortage in wartime, the growing degree of "rockburst" due to greater depth of operations, have all reduced the tonnage of ore processed and thus reduced earnings. But "in the meantime," the report states:

> . . . operations continue to show a good profit, ore reserves developed ahead of mill requirements are adequate, results of new deep levels carry considerable promise, and the company's financial position remains strong, with the present dividend rate of 20 cents quarterly fairly well protected with current earnings.

As regards the tax policy of the future, this company's record, at least on the face of it, would justify maintaining the present excess profits tax and making no allowances for depreciation and expansion. It has earned enough to finance many times more expansion than it has ever undertaken, even in war years. Tax concessions in this case would merely fatten the net income of the concern and enable it to pay even more fantastic dividends. It raises the question as to what extent can we depend upon the profit motive to provide socially useful expansion in our mining area.

Another industry about which the government has become very solicitous, an industry to whose assistance the government has had to come in war time, is the oil industry. In the light of the fact that one company, the Imperial Oil company, controls fifty per cent or more of our supply, and was recognized by the Stevens committee as being the company which fixed the price for other companies, and inasmuch as this company is about seventy per cent owned by Standard Oil, it is well to look into its earnings, as an enterprise to which we have made such concessions in the Northwest Territories, before we begin making too many more government concessions. I have not time to go fully into the history of this company. It is an example of a corporation which has grown tremendously, has financed its own rapidly expanding operations and has built up a large capitalization almost exclusively through ploughing back its surplus profits into its business.

The original number of $100 par shares was doubled in 1915 with a 100 per cent stock dividend, and has been increased sixty-four times since then by three four-to-one splits in the stock. So that for every $100 par share originally held, there now exist 128 shares of no par value whose book value is $5.80 a share and whose present stock value was quoted yesterday at $14.50 a share. In other words, for every $100 invested in the original company there is now $1,856 in stock. The original capital investment of $10 million has grown to about $40 million by other issues of stock. To-day the total assets are given at $181,250,000. In addition to the splits in stock, shareholders were able to get additional purchases of shares at especially favourable prices. The dividends paid on these shares have been very substantial. The par value of the shares was $25 up to 1924. In 1925 they were split four ways, giving them a nominal value of $6.25 each. On this $6.25 nominal par value dividends per share were paid as follows: in 1925, $1, or fourteen per cent; in 1926, $1.25, or twenty per cent; in 1927, $1.50, or twenty-five per cent; the same in 1928. In 1929 the stock was again split four ways, giving a nominal par value of about $1.56 a share. On this basis the shares paid dividends as follows: 1929, 87½ cents, or practically fifty per cent; 1930, $1, or sixty-six per cent; 1931 to 1933, fifty cents, or thirty-three per cent; 1934, 92½ cents, or sixty per cent; 1935 to 1938, $1.25, or eighty per cent; 1939, $1, or sixty-six per cent; 1940, 62½ cents, or forty per cent; 1941 to 1943, fifty cents, or thirty-three per cent. In other words, there was continual splitting and multiplication of stock during the boom days of the twenties, and on this split and multiplied stock, earnings per share remained the same during the nineteen-thirties. Since the outbreak of the war this has been reduced slightly but still is exorbitant in terms of what the stockholder has put into the concern.

Those are the companies which are to-day crying for government assistance, for remission of taxation, companies to whose assistance the government has had to come in order to meet the war needs of the nation. Certainly a situation of that kind provokes the question raised by the minister in his budget speech, that of the need of some radical change being introduced if those industries are to function in the interests of all the people of Canada, instead of functioning, where successful, in the interests of a comparatively small group of shareholders. Hon. members opposite and to our right may disagree with the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in relation to those companies; but disagree as you will, I think we have to face the fact that neither in peace time nor in war has the development of our natural resources, as it has been carried out in the past, met the basic needs of the people of Canada, so that some means whereby that development can be brought into line with the needs of the country must be found by whatever party takes government in Canada.

Mr. A. D. LÉGER (Kent, N.B.): In taking part in this debate I wish first to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the able way in which he delivered the budget. The budget this year is of great magnitude, which I would say was contemplated by all serious thinking Canadians, though those who want to play politics will find faults in it. This would be expected in peace time, but surely not in war time and especially at this crucial moment when our forces, along with those of the allied nations, are in the most desperate struggle the world has ever known.

We are, one would say, at the cross-roads in the battle of freedom and democracy. The Canadian people in general want this government to supply the armed forces with all the best equipment that money can buy. In these modern times science has developed so many instruments of destruction which are very costly, but they must be supplied in order to beat down the forces of evil who are attacking us.

We are winning the war, but more gruesome days are still to come. Evil has never won over righteousness. The supreme power is on our side, and for this reason we shall win, so that the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter may be obtained. The Canadian people have done a great job so far and will keep on doing so until the war is won. Industry has produced beyond our imagination. Our farmers and fishermen have produced more than at any other time in our history, with much less manpower, which means that they have worked harder and longer hours. They have done so and will do so to the end of hostilities. There are certain regulations which had to be passed in order to stop inflation and they do not suit many of us; but it must be realized that they were passed for the general welfare of our people. Canada was asked, along with the Americans, to feed most of the allied nations, and as the war progresses they are being asked to feed the nations that we are liberating.

Canada has a big job to do and will do it, because all the Canadian people understand and know the hardships, the sacrifices, the torture and the humiliation which the European peoples have had to endure in the last four years. One must also take into consideration the destruction which has occurred and which is taking place at present in England, in North Africa, in Russia and all over Europe. We in Canada have until now been very fortunate, so much so that some Canadians—thank God only a small group—do not realize the seriousness of the war and are prepared to criticize the restrictions which had to be passed.

During this session the government has established a reconstruction department whose duty it will be to provide work, to launch public programmes, to develop more natural resources, to turn every war-time plant into a peace-time industry, and to provide certain facilities to our maritime farmers and fishermen, as well as to meet certain needs of the western provinces. The farmers of New Brunswick, especially in my riding of Kent, are in need of warehouses and cold storage facilities so that the farmers may keep and sell their produce in groups rather than individually. The fishermen of Kent county as well as of the maritimes generally need quick-freezing plants at certain points in each county so that their fish will be quickly frozen, and as soon as possible after it is caught. In this way the fish will maintain the good flavour which it has when eaten fresh, and the people of the central provinces will then appreciate our different varieties of fish caught in the salt waters of the maritimes, the flavour of which is so superior compared with that of fresh water fish.

Candidly, I believe that the Minister of Finance should carefully consider these suggestions with the new Minister of Reconstruction and have them become realities after the war. A programme of decentralization of industry should be embarked upon as soon as possible. We should undertake the development of our natural resources in all Canada and not only in the central part of the dominion, and when I say the central part I mean Ontario and Quebec. We have in the maritimes, at Hopewell, New Brunswick, near Moncton, a great hydro possibility through the harnessing of the tidal water at the junction of the Memramcook and the Petitcodiac rivers. Both these rivers meet at one point to flow into the bay of Fundy. It is known that these rivers and the bay of Fundy have a great rise and fall, an average of forty feet twice in twenty-four hours in normal times, and as high as fifty-five feet in the spring at Hopewell.

I am glad to know that both the government of New Brunswick and the dominion are negotiating to have an accurate survey made of these possibilities. If this investigation proves the project feasible, we should embark upon the construction of it as soon as possible after the war, because this development would provide electric power as cheap as any place in Canada, thus inducing manufactures to establish in our province. Doctor Turnbull, a prominent engineer, has made a thorough study of the project and believes it is quite feasible and could produce electricity as cheap, if not cheaper, than any other hydro development in Canada.

We must also see to it that the national revenue is fairly distributed among all classes of the nation—especially the farmers and fishermen of the maritime provinces. Floor and ceiling prices must be established if we want to control the revenue so that it is fairly distributed among all classes. My reason for mentioning this at this time is that we all know that the Department of Finance plays a big role in all these ventures. The people of Canada and the world want these things to become a reality and the government will have to do something. We all know what happened to France with all her different parties; we are on the verge of the same reaction in Canada unless the Canadian people wake up to the fact that a government is the people of the nation, and the money it spends must come from the people in the form of direct or indirect taxes or loans. Let us imagine having some irresponsible or radical government handling Canada's affairs after the war. This would be disastrous for the future progress of Canada. It is a recognized fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is one of the outstanding political economists in the world to-day. Fortunately, the Canadian people are realistic and recognize very well that the future of Canada depends on the present Prime Minister remaining at the helm of the government, so that when the war is finished, he will be at the peace table looking after the interests of Canadians for generations yet to come.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Like the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate I wish at the beginning of my remarks to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) not only on this budget but on all preceding budgets that it has been his responsibility to introduce in this house. I know it is not a pleasant job to increase taxes year after year as the war progresses. Especially would that be disagreeable when he himself has to pay the very same taxes we and all the rest of Canada are asked to pay. This is total war, and that is our method of financing our share of the war. I believe Canada's contribution will go down in history as one of the most remarkable that any country with a small population has ever made in time of war. Surely the responsibilities and duties of the minister should not be made doubly hard by sniping at him from ambush, especially by members of his own party. It is indeed a load too much for any one man to carry.

The people of Canada have confidence in our minister. I do not believe that there is anybody in the government in whom they have more confidence; yet there are those in this house who condemn him for doing what he knows in his own mind is right, although at times it is the hard road for him to follow. Oh, it would have been a great thing if in this last budget taxes could have been substantially reduced. I am sure that nobody would have enjoyed reducing them more than the minister himself; but may I repeat, this is total war and the war is not yet won. The German army is showing signs of disintegration, but we get very little news of the morale of the country. If Germany does collapse this year, as we all reverently hope and pray, we still have Japan to defeat and we still have the immediate post-war period which will require tremendous financing.

I believe that certain inequalities have been eliminated in this budget. I was particularly pleased that the tariff and the excise foreign exchange tax have been eliminated from farm machinery. In spite of what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said this afternoon, there is no doubt that as soon as farm machinery is again available in large quantities farmers will have to renew a great deal of the machinery which is not only worn out but, in many instances, obsolete. During the years of depression many farmers were unable to buy even repair parts. They had to resort to makeshift repairs by the local blacksmith shop or by themselves in order to keep their machinery together. As soon as the war is over, those machines will be renewed, and there will be a great saving to the farmers who buy machinery not only in the vast prairies of our west but also in eastern Canada.

I was also pleased to see the ten per cent compulsory savings clause of the income tax act abolished. By the abolition of this feature of the act those who are wage-earners in the low income tax brackets will benefit the most and, as incomes increase, the saving will be increasingly smaller until the limit of $1,200 is reached. In many instances this compulsory saving was never paid owing to the offset of insurance policies and other methods of saving effected by those who could afford to do so.

Representing as I do a riding which is partly agricultural and partly industrial I heartily commend the minister for the two reductions which have been effected in this budget. I am very keen on having a floor maintained after the war under agricultural prices. Never again do I want to see the farmers of my riding, which is one of Canada's greatest dairying counties, having to accept sixty-five cents a hundredweight for milk. To-day they are receiving roughly $2 a hundredweight, which is a fair return for their labour and capital investment. I believe that by long term agreements with Great Britain and reciprocal agreements with other nations throughout the world, Canadian farm products can be sold at established prices and our surpluses disposed of beyond the shores of this country.

I should like to speak very briefly of small industries which before the war were working on a shoe-string, industries employing from six to twenty men or women. Some of these industries are engaged on war contracts, and consequently are allowed special depreciation, but I would say that by far the greater proportion have carried on as in peace time, or have received subcontracts from the larger war industries. Many of these concerns made such small profits before the war that they lived from hand to mouth. While they had the right to appear before a board of arbitration to decide what should be their normal profit, when the 100 per cent excess profits tax is collected, apart from the twenty per cent which is to be refunded after the war they will be left without reserves, and unless they are given special consideration I am afraid many of these industries will not be able to survive the period of readjustment.

It is my sincere belief that the vast majority of hon. members on all sides of this house are conscientiously endeavouring to improve the conditions of the common people. To be conscientious, however, one must be sincere and, above all, consistent. For that reason I was astounded at the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) as reported at page 4338 of Hansard:

> I can well recall when the compulsory savings plan was adopted. Some may not have understood me when I said it was on this side of the house it was proposed, and it was on that side of the house compulsory savings were adopted. To-day they are disbanded. Why? It would seem that they are needed more now; they are needed more at the present time.

Now I turn to page 4346, where I find the amendment moved by the hon. member, and read paragraph (b):

> that no effective action has been taken to grant a measure of relief to the men and women in the lower income brackets by raising the exemption in income tax for single persons to not less than $800 per annum and for married persons to not less than $1,600 per annum.

I do not think anything could be more inconsistent, more completely contradictory than those two statements. I also believe that our hon. friends opposite must be pretty hard pressed for arguments when the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) should have to devote the greater part of his speech to a criticism of the man-power policy of the government. It is true that our man-power policy is not perfect, but I venture to say that one of the matters most criticized in any democratic countries constituting the united nations is the very point dealt with by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I know you seldom pick up a United States newspaper without reading some article or the report of some speech condemning the United States selective service system, in spite of the fact that the United States has had conscription for overseas service since the outbreak of war. To me it is a revelation that Canada, a country with a small population, should be able to produce so much. It is true that we have a vast store of natural resources, but if our man-power policy had been completely at fault we never would have been able to attain the position Canada occupies to-day, as the fourth largest producer amongst the united nations.

Since coming to this house I have followed as closely as possible the arguments advanced day after day, week after week and month after month by the Social Credit party, but I am still in the dark as to just what their members propose. If they can solve the problem of distribution after the war, I say, more power to them, but certainly I have not heard anything from that corner of the house to lead me to believe they will be able to do so. If they could do away with the old vicious circle which is characterized by the man planting corn to raise pigs to kill pigs to make fertilizer to grow corn, then they would accomplish a great deal, but I doubt if we shall ever see that vicious circle again.

The policies of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation should be clear as crystal, but somehow they are not. To me they are a potpourri of socialism and, if I may use a modern slang expression, double talk. I have found it impossible to get anything but evasive answers to pertinent questions. I have yet to hear the leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), definitely state what is meant by the conscription of capital. By that does he mean the conscription of savings accounts, or life insurance policies or war savings stamps or bonds? How much of it or would all be conscripted? Nothing but evasion has ever been given to that question. In fact, I find that asking members of the C.C.F party for a definite answer is like trying to nail a piece of jelly to the wall: it just does not nail.

On one hand we hear private monopolies condemned, while on the other hand, according to the logic of the C.C.F., they would create the greatest monopoly of all, namely complete government ownership. They decry the capitalistic system, the system under which Canada has built up one of the highest standards of living in the world. I believe that our standard of living is exceeded only by that in the United States, which, incidentally, is also a capitalistic country.

Actually the whole world was in turmoil before the world war. There was greed and suspicion instead of determination and understanding among members of the League of Nations. Here are but a few factors the C.C.F. omit to mention when referring to the depression, one of the world's worst depressions, which occurred in the decade preceding this war.

First of all, we must go back to the stock market crash in 1929. From 1926 to 1929, everyone who could scrape up a few dollars plunged into the stock market, in an attempt to get money without working. Stenographers in offices, filing clerks, yes, even office boys would spend their lunch hours in brokerage offices, watching the prices of various shares as they appeared on the ticker tape. This was one of the most glaring examples of inflation that one could imagine. Certain stocks rose to unheard of heights, even after commodity prices had started to break.

Naturally, deflation set in, and overnight, in October, 1929, millions were wiped out. Certain regulations have since been put into effect which, I believe, will eliminate any such wild orgy as we saw on the stock market between 1926 and 1929.

In the early thirties Russia was completing its first five-year plan, and was beginning its second five-year plan; the grain markets of the world were flooded by Russian grain, particularly Russian wheat. I am not condemning Russia for taking this action. I happened to be in Russia in 1931, and I saw people going without the bare necessities of life in order to sell this grain abroad, so that they could acquire the necessary foreign exchange and foreign gold with which to buy the machinery to start their industrial development. Had they not made that sacrifice, I do not believe the Russian people would have been able to throw back the German hordes as they did at the gates of Moscow, and as they did from the very heart of Stalingrad. It was through that sacrifice that Russia came out on top. Nevertheless, the fact remains that Russia undersold the world's grain markets, and farmers in the Canadian west had to suffer.

Then, let us consider the accumulation of gold in the United States at that time. That gold was sent to pay for war debts owed to that country, and it was promptly buried at Fort Knox, Kentucky. No one realizes mistakes to-day more than does the United States.

One of the problems which must be faced and solved at the monetary conference taking place at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, will be to find methods of using this gold, so as to create credit in those countries that have felt the oppression of the nazis, and those countries which will have to be rebuilt from the ground up, financially and economically, after the war.

[Mr. Fulford.]

We must remember, too, the war of tariffs which began and continued throughout the thirties. Each country thought it could live unto itself. We know that after this war no country can live unto itself; no country can dominate the rest of the world. We must learn to believe each other, to help each other and to develop a league of nations which will really function, a league of nations in which countries will respect and trust one another.

We remember, too, the growth of fascism, which started in Italy. That belief rapidly spread to Japan. We must remember, too, that Japan was the first country to take action in this war, when she marched into Manchuria in 1931. At the same time Japan was flooding the world with cheap goods. All hon. members will remember electric light bulbs made in Japan which burnt out the very first time they were placed in a socket. At the same time Germany undersold the world in heavy machinery and manipulated her foreign exchange in such a way as to get gold to purchase the essentials to manufacture war materials. Germany then took back the Ruhr, and Italy marched into Ethiopia.

All these factors contributed to the world depression—not the capitalistic system. We shall recall, too, the anschluss in Austria, the Munich conference, with the whole world upset. We remember the carving up of Czechoslovakia, with the result that the world was in a maelstrom of uncertainty.

As a final result, war broke out. But war will not always last. Canada can come out on the top, if we hold our heads after the war. We shall come out on top if we retain those sound financial policies set forth by our Minister of Finance, and if we carry along on the road laid by him. We owe it to those who are overseas that the Canada to which they will come back will be on a sound basis financially and economically, not a Canada in which a group of inexperienced experimenters are trying to run the country.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 7, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Weir.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO DELEGATION ON FARM LABOUR SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, who I think is the appropriate minister, although three ministers are involved. I understand that a delegation of farmers met three ministers, as well as the director of national selective service, in Ottawa yesterday and presented a resolution endorsed by thirty-six Ontario county units of the federation of agriculture, which resolution contained constructive proposals for relieving the present acute farm labour situation. Will the Minister of Labour indicate to the house the nature of these proposals, as well as the steps which the government is prepared to take with respect to them?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not the resolution with me, as this matter came on my desk just before I entered the house. We did have a conference with the delegation, and I would say a very successful conference. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has intimated, the delegation met two other ministers as well as myself, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). As my hon. friend is well aware, we have an agreement with every province in Canada respecting the placement of farm labour, not only in the summer months but the whole year round, and these agreements have worked very satisfactorily in every province. But in addition, after hearing the representations of the delegation it was decided that a committee, accompanied by an official of the Department of Labour, would meet the district officers commanding at Toronto, London, Kingston, Petawawa and Borden with a view to speeding up the granting of leave to men who wish to go farming to the fullest possible extent consistent with army needs.

We also telegraphed the ministers of agriculture for Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba with a view to moving an additional 500 experienced farmers from the western prairies to eastern Canada so that they would be able to help harvest the heavy crops in eastern Canada. We had a similar movement last year. The hon. gentleman will understand that the crops this year in the east are heavier than last year.

It has also been decided to recruit 500 students, seventeen years of age or over, who have had farming experience or who come from farm homes in western Canada to give us some assistance with the very heavy crop in this part of the country.

A letter has also gone out to all the industrialists of Ontario urging upon them the desirability of releasing as many experienced farm workers as possible, consistent with maintaining war production, to assist in harvesting the crop.

In addition to that, I might say that we are of course working in very close cooperation with the Department of Agriculture of Ontario, as we did last year. Last year we placed over 100,000 on the farms of Ontario through the instrumentality of that cooperation. I have also sent a direct appeal to the mayors and other municipal officials of all the municipalities in Ontario in an effort to ensure wherever possible the granting of leave to municipal employees in order that we may get over the hump of the haying season and the peak of the farm season in Ontario.

STRIKE AT UNITED SHIPYARDS LIMITED, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to ask the Minister of Labour:

1. Has a strike occurred in the plant of United Shipyards, Limited, at Montreal?

2. If so, what steps are being taken by the federal Department of Labour to settle the dispute?

3. Has the union holding the collective bargaining agreement asked for police protection because of the attitude of a minority of the workers?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I will answer the first and last questions first. A strike has taken place in the United Shipyards in the city of Montreal, engineered by a minority group there. The union in question has asked for protection in order to permit the membership to go to work in an orderly manner. Arrangements have been made that every protection will be given to those union workers in that particular shipyard to see to it that they carry out the terms of their agreement so that the construction of these very necessary ships at this critical time in the nation's history will be proceeded with.

CANADIAN ARMY

CENTRAL MECHANIZATION DEPOT, LONDON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I regret that I have not sent him notice of the question but it is of such a nature that perhaps notice is not required. On June 29 I asked a question with regard to the situation which was alleged in military district No. 1 at London, Ontario. Has any investigation been made since that time and has any irregularity been discovered? Because of the nature of the answer to my question on that day, I ask this supplementary question now. I understand that recently a further investigation has been made and it is alleged that some grave irregularities have been discovered.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I wonder if my hon. friend would remind me of the question to which he refers.

Mr. COLDWELL: The question I asked, as reported at page 4334 of Hansard, was:

1. Will the Minister of National Defence inform the house whether an investigation has been instituted into alleged irregularities at the central mechanization depot in London, Ontario? 2. If such an investigation has taken place, what irregularities, if any, have been discovered? 3. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the possibility of irregularities in other divisions of military district No. 1, and will the minister consider instituting an investigation into the administration of the entire district?

Mr. RALSTON: I remember now. The investigation, I believe, is still proceeding. I have not had any report on it at all but I shall inquire.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 21, consideration in committee of bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act—Mr. Michaud—Mr. McCann in the chair.

On section 1—New heading inserted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When this matter was last before the committee some reference was made to the fact that certain provinces might feel constrained to establish air companies within their confines because of the restrictive nature of the provisions of this bill from the standpoint of air development. The minister indicated that under the aeronautics case the jurisdiction of the federal government was supreme, and inferentially that the provinces could not establish any interurban, intercity or intertown air services. Has the matter been submitted by the minister's department to the Department of Justice with a view to ascertaining whether the provinces have or have not that power? I have looked over the aeronautics case and it would indicate that, within the powers of the several provincial legislatures under section 92, air companies could be started by a province and operated by the province, subject only to the control of the dominion authority in so far as safety regulations, the qualifications of airmen, and so on.

As I read the privy council appeal from the aeronautics case reference 30 Supreme Court Reports, 663, it appears to me that flying within the province itself could be engaged in by provinces. The reason I mention that is that everywhere in the United States to-day there is widespread development to meet the post-war air situation, while little or nothing is being done in this country. On July 6, as reported at page 4551, I asked a question with regard to the purchase of land for airport purposes. I wanted to know whether any land had been purchased in Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg and Malton, and the only purchases that have been made were certain purchases at Edmonton, Vancouver and Regina. If when the war is over we are to assure our returning air men of an opportunity for work and an opportunity to serve, it cannot be done under the present provisions of the present bill. In the United States, in order to assure availability of jobs for as many returned men as possible, the C.A.A. is increasing its airports and believes that by the time the war is over some 6,000 will be established in the smaller cities or towns, provided the air service plans now being developed as a result of competition between private enterprises on interurban service are put into effect.

In 1941 there were only seventy-six airports with runways thirty-five hundred feet long or more; to-day there are eight hundred and sixty-five. In other words, because the air companies in the United States have an opportunity to compete and to set up services between cities and larger urban centres the government of that country is making preparations to expand interurban and other facilities. In Canada the future of air development is uncertain. If the government is to take over the airways of this country it can never hope to meet the needs in the establishment of air fleet systems between cities and towns in what may be called bus line service. Take the city of Winnipeg as an example. That city is on the line for the development of a world service, and yet to-day it has not the air facilities that it must have in anticipation of post-war development. Saskatoon and Prince Albert in northern Saskatchewan are other examples. Prince Albert is the centre of development of air transportation into the north in Saskatchewan, yet there is no suggestion of airways or an airport to meet the potentialities of the post-war period.

If the provinces have the right to enter into interurban airways, my submission is the transportation facilities and needs within those provinces will be met much more readily and much sooner than if the matter remains entirely subject to the authority of the government airways. Only recently in the welcoming the incoming president of the institute of mining and metallurgy, Mr. Drew, speaking at Toronto, is reported in the press to have said:

> Canada is far behind other countries in development of interurban air transport. Taking Ontario as an example, covering an area equal in size to a considerable part of Europe, only five communities are served by regular air transport. They are Toronto, London, Windsor, Ottawa and North Bay.

At a meeting of the aeronautical institute it passed resolutions asking that something be done to give small private enterprises the opportunity to apply now for licences to place smaller towns and cities of this country on the air maps by making provision for the development of air service between them. What consideration has been given to this matter? It would in no way interfere with the rights of the Trans-Canada Air Lines' across-Canada service. It would provide an incentive and an opportunity for small companies to build up air bus lines between cities and towns within the various provinces. It is being done in the United States, and according to the latest records so much interest is being taken in the matter that applications by the thousands are being made to this end and are being decided now by the aeronautical authorities in charge of this administration.

When the board is set up the minister should give the assurance that in so far as interurban or intercity routes are concerned the board will consider applications now for the setting up of companies and the allocation of lines. I do not say that that could be done with all important routes, not by any means. But consideration should be given to a sufficient number so that development will be under way when the men in the air force come back from overseas, and they will find something available for them to do. If that is not done, when they are demobilized they will return to civilian life and will not be able to use the knowledge and technical skill which they have received during war service, and the failure to provide opportunities for them will result in their gradually going into some other line of work in civil life.

I understand that there are applications from Ontario and Quebec before the present board asking for the right to operate private lines on short air routes that by no means could be operated by a central authority. What are the plans in regard to the development of airports? I mentioned only a few of them—Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon and Prince Albert. What is being done now? What are the plans for the immediate future? Has the government given consideration to having the air transport board appointed at once and given the right immediately to consider applications and make decisions? I do not wish to repeat my premise, but if that were done there would be available, in part at least, an opportunity for these returned airmen to be absorbed in an occupation for which they have been highly trained and for which they have every qualification.

Mr. HOWE: The first point raised was as to whether or not the provinces have the right to control civil aeronautics operations within their own boundaries. My reading of the aeronautics decision indicated to me that they had not that right. The domain of the air comes under federal jurisdiction. However, I may say we have had no application from any province to exercise that right. I understand that we are about to receive one. Recently the premier of Ontario made a speaking tour in the north country, during which he promised provincial air transport services to a number of communities in that area. When that application is received, we shall be very glad to consider it. In the meantime we assume that Mr. Drew will be active in building the necessary facilities such as airports, radio ranges and all the aids to navigation that that enterprise involves. Therefore I think that that question can very well wait until Mr. Drew's application is received. I expect to remind him from time to time that he has made the promises, and I will continue to urge that he carry them out.

The next question had to do with the lack of expansion of air facilities. The hon. member mentioned the expansion of a number of aerodromes in the United States during war years. May I point out that the expansion of facilities in Canada is in proportion considerably greater than that of the United States. All aerodromes that have been built in the United States during the war period have been built for war purposes. In the same way every aerodrome in Canada that has been built during the war period has been built for war purposes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that true in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not my reading of it.

Mr. HOWE: Then tell me of one not built for war purposes. Surely my hon. friend must have some examples. He should not expect me to answer vague questions and then, without knowing the facts, challenge my answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister's denial has too often been the highest corroboration of the truth of the statement denied.

Mr. HOWE: Well, when my hon. friend suggests that hundreds have been built he should be able to mention one.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I said there were hundreds.

Mr. HOWE: But my hon. friend cannot mention one. The hon. gentleman implied that there had been a great expansion of civil aviation in the United States during the war years. As a matter of fact there are fewer civilian transport planes flying in the United States to-day than there were at the outbreak of war, just as there are fewer planes on our own purely civilian operations in Canada to-day than there were at the beginning of the war. Aviation authorities in the United States have taken the view that the facilities of the industry should be devoted wholly to war purposes, and Canada has taken the same view. We have built in this country an immense number of planes, I believe more than twelve thousand. All these planes have been military types with one exception, a transport type which has been used almost exclusively for war purposes.

My hon. friend suggests that there is activity in the United States now in connection with the hearing of applications for new routes. That is true; the hearings were opened a few months ago, and if this act is endorsed by parliament it is intended to follow a similar procedure in Canada. That is, applications for routes will be received and considered. That is the purpose in establishing the board provided for under the act now before parliament. Have I covered the ground?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was one question with which the minister did not deal. Has there been any submission to the Department of Justice on the question—

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: This bill was drafted by the Department of Justice. I have not asked for an opinion, because I have had no reason to be interested in an opinion. If an application is received an opinion will be obtained. I may add that the jurisdiction of the United States over aviation within a state was challenged, and the fact was established that it is a matter coming under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But their constitution is different from ours in respect to the allocation of residuary powers.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps. If anyone cares to challenge the ruling given by the privy council in the aeronautics case, we shall be glad to get an opinion from the Department of Justice. In the meantime it is purely an academic matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has stated that if anyone wants to challenge the decision of the government he will be given an opportunity to do so. Is that it?

Mr. HOWE: No, I did not say that. I said if they want to challenge the ruling in the aeronautics case, which was taken to the privy council, and which stated that the air comes under federal jurisdiction—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is exactly the point I wanted the minister to clarify. Now I am going to ask the minister, when he comes to the section dealing with the board itself, to make provision for an appeal to the courts in any question of law or jurisdiction. As the situation now is—and the minister has given the best possible argument that could be advanced for it—when the war is over, or even before, the question will be raised by the province of Ontario as to the right of that province to operate interurban airways within its own boundaries. As the bill is now set up the decision would be made by the air transport board, with no right of appeal to the courts to determine the legality of the decision.

Mr. HOWE: I would ask my hon. friend, as a lawyer, whether anyone cannot take a constitutional issue to the courts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, Mr. Chairman; a constitutional issue can go to the courts only when it is submitted as a reference, as it was in the aeronautics case, or as the result of litigation, and there can be no litigation if a transport board is set up by this parliament and given the absolute power to determine when, where and under what circumstances a licence shall be granted. Their decision is final. On several occasions when I have dealt with this matter I have endeavoured to make the point that parliament must not permit the setting up of a board above the courts, to which the subject may not have recourse. The minister says that if and when an application is received from Colonel Drew on behalf of the province of Ontario the matter will receive consideration, and that if anyone wishes to challenge the judgment in the aeronautics case an opportunity will be given to do so. Provision therefore is not contained in this act. That is why I say it is so necessary that the decisions of this board on matters of law and jurisdiction should be subject to an appeal to the courts by any aggrieved party. Otherwise the minister will be able to say to the province of Ontario when that application is made—for after all no licence can be issued by the board without the approval of the minister—"we refuse to give you a licence," and neither the province of Ontario nor any other province will have the opportunity of testing in the courts their right to operate an airway, because no one can operate a plane unless he possesses a federal licence. No one can act as pilot of a plane unless he has a federal licence. So all the minister would have to do would be to refuse a licence to the province, and there would be no recourse to the courts.

That is why I have been endeavouring on several occasions to make the point that under this act the government is setting up a board not responsible to the people of Canada; not responsible to the courts, however unjust its decisions may be, but responsible only to the minister. I object to placing such power in the hands of any minister.

I ask the minister to say why the right of recourse to the courts is taken away. Under the former transport board, which among other things had to do with air transportation, there was provision for an appeal to the courts. That specific provision was contained in section 52 of the Railway Act, which was made applicable to the Transport Act, in these words:

> 2. An appeal shall lie from the board to the Supreme Court of Canada upon a question of jurisdiction, upon leave therefor being obtained from a judge of the said court. . . .
> 3. An appeal shall also lie from the board to such court upon any question which in the opinion of the board is a question of law, or a question of jurisdiction, or both. . . .

These rights of appeal are taken away in connection with the board now being set up. Similar rights exist in Great Britain and the United States, but here we are setting up a board controlled by one individual, the minister, and not providing any right of recourse to the courts. This becomes of particular importance at the present time, when there is the suggestion that the premier of Ontario is going to endeavour to set up aviation facilities within this province.

Mr. HOWE: That is a promise, not a suggestion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, it is a promise. And the minister says he is going to remind him of the promise. The minister is the man who will determine whether or not the promise can be carried into effect. Does that not show the true picture? All the minister has to do to-day, is to say that the opportunity will be given, if asked for, so that the promise can be carried into effect. All the minister has to do to-day is to allow an amendment to the transport regulations so that reference can be had to the courts if the application is denied. Only in that way, when the board acts unfairly in a matter of jurisdiction, would Ontario or any other province have the right of recourse to the courts. The minister says he will help the premier of Ontario; at the same time I ask him to make it possible for that promise to be carried into effect by making provision for an appeal which does not exist at the present time should the province's application be denied.

Mr. GOLDING: More opportunity for the legal fellows to get work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not hear my hon. friend.

Mr. GOLDING: Just more opportunity for legal fellows to get more work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who?

Mr. GOLDING: Legal fellows—lawyers, like yourself. The hon. member does not understand me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, that is a remark which certainly shows an intelligent view of what is being discussed!

Mr. GOLDING: Just as intelligent as your interpretation of the act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The remark was far removed from what I was discussing.

Mr. GOLDING: Your attitude is quite apparent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think every other member understands what I am endeavouring to say, because I have been outlining a principle of responsible government, and the right of the individual to an appeal from the decision of the boards. If this one is set up, it will go a long way farther than any other board ever set up by this parliament, and will not be responsible even to the governor in council. It is responsible only to the minister. Against that I make my protest. And I am asking the minister whether he will consider giving an opportunity for an appeal, so all individuals, however great or however small they may be, will have equal opportunity and equal access to justice by making provision for appeal to the courts.

Mr. HOWE: If I am asked to rule on legal questions I shall be glad to do so. The hon. member must know that the Aeronautics Act does not preclude the province from obtaining a legal decision as to its right to operate air lines within the province. I can tell him how they can get such a decision, without any trouble at all, namely, by operating an air line without obtaining a licence under this act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The pilot cannot operate as he is subject to cancellation of his licence.

Mr. HOWE: The pilot can operate without any trouble, depending upon his record. A licence can only be taken away for cause. However, this represents the logical way of doing things. That is the way it was done in New York state. An operation was set up there, and the matter was referred to the courts. The same procedure can follow here. I suggest that my hon. friend give legal advice as to why it cannot be done that way.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I have done.

Mr. HOWE: As an engineer I dislike to give a legal opinion to a lawyer, although sometimes I find it is desirable to do so, just to keep the record straight.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You have fifteen lawyers in the cabinet. They should know.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Good ones, too.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is about ten too many.

Mr. HOWE: I may say this, that if the province or anybody else wishes to take the responsibility for establishing an air line, I hardly think any obstacles will be placed in their way. Each application will be judged on its merits. The intention is, as soon as this act passes, to set up a board—just as strong a board as it is possible to appoint, and to proceed vigorously to develop a post-war system of aviation for Canada.

My hon. friend does not say positively that all the services are to be government owned, but he keeps hinting at that. Such is not the case. That is not the intention. I have said many times that the Trans-Canada system is government-owned, and will continue to be government-owned. But it is the purpose to develop subsidiary operations as private operations under this act.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister referred to certain promises having been made by the premier of Ontario, while he was in the north-western part of the province. I take it that the minister himself, knowing the situation so far as air transportation up there is concerned, would be favourable to the kind of undertaking the premier of Ontario suggested should be carried out.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps my hon. friend can just tell me what kind of undertaking it is—something about it. He just said he was going to build air lines.

Mr. GRAYDON: And on that score, perhaps the minister would indicate his approval or disapproval of the suggestion.

Mr. HOWE: The federal government had built a fairly complete system of air services throughout the north country. There is a missing link, required to give service to Fort William and Port Arthur—my own riding. Perhaps if I had been as aggressive as some of my predecessors in office, the link would have been closed. However, I thought it was better to let those links develop naturally. There is a fine airport in the area, and it is the intention, as soon as we can get suitable equipment, to serve Port Arthur and Fort William with a direct air line operating between Winnipeg and Toronto. That has been made abundantly clear. Premier Drew knew all that when he made his speech at Port Arthur. But that is rather beside the discussion here. When we compare the present system of air transportation in northern Ontario with that which served the area in 1935, when my hon. friend's party turned over the reins of office to this government, it will be seen that there has been a vast improvement.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose that is because of a general development throughout the world. I understand that.

Mr. HOWE: There was a great development throughout the world until 1935, too.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not wish to take anything away from my hon. friend in the matter; nevertheless I think he will find that there has been a development in air transportation throughout the world generally.

Mr. ADAMSON: In 1935 Canada led the world in air transport by freight.

Mr. HOWE: How much in northern Ontario?

Mr. ADAMSON: I knew what was going on at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is about northern Ontario I wish to say a word now. I do not like to see this conflict between the minister and the premier of Ontario. I would like to feel that their interests are the same, and that both desire to develop northern Ontario.

I am convinced that the chambers of commerce which met at Fort Frances recently, and who were addressed by the Premier of Ontario, had the same object in mind, the development of that country. I have been asking myself just how the government of Ontario, or for that matter any government of any other province wishing to do the same thing, could develop its hinterland. However I shall confine my remarks to Ontario, and as to how the government of that province can develop the north country. I know the minister himself is very much in favour of such development.

I have tried to arrange for a plane trip to the Belcher islands, and to the Clark islands, up in Hudson bay, to examine the iron deposits there. I have not been able to get that service. The Ontario government might want to develop an air transport line to the Hudson bay coast, and it might also wish to develop air lines to bring back the iron resources to the mills at Sault Ste. Marie. I am sure that the plane industry will develop planes of 500 tons capacity. Just a few days ago we read of a plane carrying 50 tons of freight and something over 50 passengers from Africa to America. I think it is easy to envision 500 ton aeroplanes. If that comes to pass I can see a fleet of 500-ton transport planes carrying ore from Clark island and Belcher islands down to the smelter at Sault Ste. Marie. How can Ontario give encouragement to a private company to start up a transport line of this kind when they are limited by this bill? This ore is needed to operate the smelting plant at Sault Ste. Marie, and later there might be a great smelting plant in the minister's own city. The high grade ore will be brought down from Steep Rock, which is northwest of Fort William, and low grade ore will be required to mix with it. Belcher islands' ore would help.

I am alarmed, perhaps because I do not know enough about it, over just how much this bill is going to prevent private development. I really know little about the legality of these items, but the hon. member for Lake Centre is a celebrated lawyer. I am not one to make jokes about lawyers. I like to keep out of their hands as much as I can, and I like to keep out of the courts. But he does know what he is talking about and apparently he is much alarmed about this bill, which confines the air transport business to a board which is to be clothed with supreme powers but which also is under the control of the minister.

The hon. member suggested that there should be the right of appeal to the courts. What objection can there be to that? I cannot see any. Surely there should be an appeal from the minister to the courts on whether or not a licence should be granted, and I support the hon. member in that regard.

Coming back to where I started, I am very much concerned about whether this measure will encourage the development of northern Ontario, and I am confining myself to that part of the country. The whole north end of the province adjacent to Hudson bay, while not all tundra, does contain a great deal of muskeg. The development of the area, from the plateau on which the Albany river flows, down to the bay cannot be carried on by the building of railroads. What better method of transporting ore could be developed than by air? I appreciate Colonel Drew's desire to develop northern Ontario and I do not think the minister should consider it as being politics. I do not say that he does. I am afraid that there will be objection to the construction of branch air lines in that north country and I am strongly in favour of the Ontario government or any other provincial government being able to construct their own lines.

My hon. friend (Mr. Diefenbaker) comes from Prince Albert—a beautiful and splendid city, a city with a great future. It should develop into one of our greatest airports, because it has everything in the way of topography and territory for the creation of an important air transport centre. It should be the centre of air transport into the country right through to lake Athabaska and east of lake Athabaska. That country is full of lakes and rivers, but it is also full of minerals. I can envision my hon. friend's city of Prince Albert becoming a great centre of aeroplane transport service. Would Saskatchewan be allowed to develop a line?

Mr. HOWE: It has a service now, and has had for years.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not an air transport service.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not 50- and 100-ton planes. There are a few running up the Alaska highway, but that is not in Saskatchewan.

Mr. HOWE: There is no such thing as a 100-ton plane or a 50-ton plane.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know a few planes run north from Prince Albert to Goldfields and Yellowknife, but those are mail planes although they carry a few passengers. I am thinking of the transport planes that carried in machinery to Yellowknife and to the north side of lake Athabaska. I am pretty sure they belonged to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company. I know they had their own planes which took in a lot of freight.

We should all wish to see this country opened up, and an aeroplane service is one means of doing it. I do not like to oppose the minister's suggestion, because he has given it a lot of thought, but I am firmly convinced that this country could be opened up more rapidly and more profitably by having competitive services in air transport. I am not speaking now of Trans-Canada, although in that case I think after the war—the minister is a business man and he will appreciate this—air transport could be carried on better by the great rail transport companies.

I hold no brief for the Canadian Pacific or for the Canadian National. I want them both to succeed, but how can the Canadian Pacific develop a great transport business in the air? So far as I can see, it cannot do it under this bill; yet I think it should be able to do it. The Canadian Pacific has been one of the greatest agencies in the opening up of this country. Both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National have the necessary facilities in the great cities like Montreal. They have the trained personnel, and it seems to me to be unbusinesslike to prevent a great company like the Canadian Pacific from participating in the air transport field. I am sure that after this war aeroplanes will not stop at 500 tons; there is no reason why they should not go up to 1,000 tons capacity.

The Canadian Pacific is the largest transport company—if not the largest it is the second largest—in Canada, and I do not think that company, or the Canadian National, should be prevented from opening up this country by means of air transport, and any others who want to start should not be prevented. I feel satisfied that we are heading in the wrong direction. I cannot add anything more to what I have said. I have expressed my opinion as to what I think about the ability of private industry to open up the country. I have seen and heard enough about private industry to know this. I have heard private industry denounced in this house, but I know that many businesses have been kept going by men who have sat up all night trying to develop and advance their industry.

It would not be possible to have that in a government-operated organization. Men in government-operated plants do not sit up all night. I have been through it and I know. Time without number I have sat up all night week in and week out trying to develop and advance big business. Money cannot pay for that; you must have the heart and will to develop. Men in a government-operated plant will not do it; they never have and I do not expect they ever will. I am not going to say anything against the Canadian National. It has been a fine company and has done a fine job. The same can be said about the T.C.A. Some one took out of something I said that I was not an advocate of the T.C.A. I have not said anything in opposition to the T.C.A. It has been well managed and has done splendid work and will continue to do so. But that does not detract in any way from the strength of my advocacy of private operation, private incentive and private enterprise.

I am supporting the hon. member for Lake Centre in his desire to have an appeal to the courts of the land. They should be best qualified to judge whether a company's application should be accepted or rejected. I endorse Colonel Drew's desire to open up northern Ontario, which he said emphatically at Fort Frances that he would do. Here is the dispatch:

> Fort Frances, June 23 (Special).—If the necessity arises and licences are not granted for air routes so that development can be completed before the end of the war, then the province of Ontario will itself go into the air route business, said Premier Drew Thursday night.

I hope that the minister will not think for a moment that there is anything political in this matter. I can hardly conceive of any board set up by the minister refusing an application for a licence from the government of Ontario or of Quebec or of any other province. These are large and important bodies, and it would be a serious thing in my judgment for any board set up by this house to refuse an application from a province of four million people, or a province like Quebec of three and a half million people, or from any other province no matter what its population might be. But under the bill as it stands the application could be refused, could it not?

Mr. KNOWLES: Except for some of the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport it seems to me that a good deal of the discussion we have had thus far this afternoon has skirted the real issue which has been put before us by the introduction of this bill. We have had discussion about provincial rights and constitutional questions, and we have had cross-fire between the minister and a provincial premier who is not here. But the real issue is this. Are we to carry on with the old idea of private enterprise, with its right to cut its own throat and impoverish the country, or are we so far as air service is concerned, to inject into the whole set-up the principle of planning for the public interest? It seems to me that that is the difference between the powers of the board of transport commissioners and the powers of the air transport board which the minister proposes to establish. On the one hand you have what is really a judicial body. But here you will have rather a body whose purpose is to help the government formulate policy. As I understand it, if this bill becomes law and we go ahead with the government's proposal, the decision will have been made that so far as air service is concerned there is to be planning as a matter of government policy.

The minister a little while ago, in one of his replies to the hon. member for Lake Centre, stressed one point which I think needs to be stressed again and again when he spoke of the cost of developing airports, beams, ranges and all the other facilities that are necessary to flying. My friends to my right are continually singing the praises of private enterprise. Yet we know quite well that we would not have had aviation developed to the point it has reached to-day in this country if it had not been for the huge expenditures of public money on the facilities that are necessary to make flying possible. I insist that if it is going to require the expenditure of public money to provide the basic essentials of flying, the public, having a major interest in the whole set-up, has the right to expect the government to see to it that these services are properly planned.

A great deal is said about our concern for our young men of the air force who will come home well trained and capable of providing flying services all over Canada. I want to put in a word for them in this way. I feel that they should not come home to the kind of cut-throat experiences which this country had to undergo in the early days of flying, when sufficient government expenditure was not made available to make flying practicable and safe. The result was that pilots were rushing in wherever it was possible to make half a living, and eventually competition in those areas forced them all out. We have also had the story of private companies in this country culminating in the merger of a dozen or more companies in Canadian Pacific Air Lines. All of this, as I see it, adds up to the fact that if we do not have the regulation and planning of all our air transport services, our airmen in the Royal Canadian Air Force will come home to a set-up of cut-throat competition which will discourage and greatly disillusion them.

To me the history of the development of our air services in this country indicates definitely that it does require the expenditure of public money and public planning. While, as I said before, I am not satisfied that the government goes far enough, I am with the minister every inch of the way that he does go in this bill. As I said, I felt that the hon. member for Davenport was different from the previous speakers in that he did get down to the real issue, namely, the issue as between private enterprise and public control.

Mr. BENCE: What is the hon. gentleman's idea with respect to the north and south feeder lines? Should they be taken over by the T.C.A. or be operated by private enterprise?

Mr. KNOWLES: I asked the minister with respect to that, and my question was worded in such a way as to suggest that in my opinion the major north and south routes, such as the northwest staging route, the route down the Mackenzie and several other important routes, should even now be taken over by the government and operated under the T.C.A. We are quite prepared to agree to the idea of private companies operating in some of the smaller feeder spheres, and the Minister of Transport provides for that in the bill. It seems to me that any virtue that there is in some initial flying in these areas by privately-owned concerns is not debarred by this bill. What my hon. friends to the right are asking is that private firms have their rights extended not only to go into business as private firms but to multiply and compete with each other and cut each other's throats until public money is lost and a disservice is done to the public interest.

Returning to what I said a moment ago, I congratulate the member for Davenport on bringing us back to the basic issue which is being fought as between the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals. All his followers do not support the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but I wish to register again my support of the stand he is taking. In the course of his remarks to-day and on other occasions, the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has had a good deal to say about the power put into the hands of the minister; it is characterized as dictatorship and all that sort of thing. The suggestion has been made that this power or authority should be in the hands of the governor in council. So far as that distinction is concerned, it is six of one and half a dozen of the other. We have the principle of cabinet solidarity, which is such that if the minister is responsible the government as a whole has to share in that responsibility. On the other hand, if you put the power in the hands of the governor in council, we have had enough experience in watching what the government does during the war to know that the governor in council in any case acts upon the advice of the minister concerned with that particular branch.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the hon. member opposed to the principle I suggest, that there should be right of recourse to the courts against the decisions of any board, whether controlled by the minister or not?

Mr. KNOWLES: The difference between the member for Lake Centre and ourselves is basically over the question whether air services are to be a matter of government policy or whether the government is simply to stand on the sidelines and allow private enterprise to have its own way. I take the position that so far as the legality of the statute is concerned, naturally there should be recourse to the courts; but if the statute stands on legal ground, then it seems to me that the time has come when matters of this sort should be the concern of the people's representatives. What we have here is not, as I see it, dictatorship but rather the extension of the principle of responsible government. What I was trying to say was that as between the minister and the governor in council having the authority it is six of one and half a dozen of the other, and it does not matter to me which it is; but as between the minister having any real say in the matter—the minister or the government, however you put it—and the government merely standing on the side as a judicial body and allowing private enterprise to go ahead and cut its own throat and do a disservice to the country at large, I am in favour of the matter being in the hands of the people.

Under this bill recommendations will be made to the government or to the minister which will involve the expenditure of money. You will have under the provisions of the bill not just a judicial body making decisions as between competing firms but a body making recommendations to the government for the development of airways, and that will involve the expenditure of public money; and once you introduce that element into it you are flying in the face of our whole concept of responsible government if you suggest that the minister or the government should not be responsible for any implementing of the decisions of the board. For that reason I think the bill is right when it puts this measure of authority, if you want to call it that, though I call it responsibility, in the hands of the minister.

I am not surprised that my hon. friends to the right find it difficult to understand this concept. What you have here is an attempt, as far as it goes, to avoid the kind of mistakes this country made when it first launched on the development of our railway systems. In those days the people paid the shot and private corporations netted the profit. In this instance we know from the start that if there is to be a proper and adequate development of this tremendous means of modern transportation, air services, money will have to be provided by the people. It is the people's interests that are paramount, and I take the position, with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, that it should be under the direction and control of the people through their duly elected government.

Mr. BENCE: The hon. member suggested that some of the north and south feeder routes should be allowed to remain in the hands of private enterprise but that the more important ones should be taken over by the T.C.A. Would he suggest that the smaller and less important north and south feeder routes, when they become more important through the development of air contract, be then taken over by the T.C.A. or a government-owned company?

Mr. KNOWLES: If you ask the minister you will get a different answer from mine—

Mr. BENCE: I am asking you.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will answer the question; don't be impatient.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member and the minister are together on this bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the difference between us and some other hon. members in this house. We do not mind agreeing with those whom we are fighting when we find that they take the same position as we do on some issue. So far as this bill is concerned, we agree with the minister and I contend that we have given him the best support he has had in the house. However, to come back to the question. Even flying in the feeder routes in smaller areas, to which the hon. member has referred, will call for public assistance if they are to get anywhere at all, and I have no hesitation in saying that once these lines are developed to the point where they are important in the whole plan of our air services in Canada, they too should come under public direction and control.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And be taken over?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, and socially owned by the people of the country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask another question?

Mr. HOWE: Why not ask the Chair?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order. Any hon. member who wishes to speak will please rise and address the Chair.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member this question. There are a great many expenditures made by the government of Canada on canal systems. Is not that comparable to the expenditures made by this country in connection with air routes? If the hon. member is in favour of taking over these concerns, now that all shipping companies are successful, is he in favour of taking over all the shipping companies in the country?

Mr. KNOWLES: If I may quote some of my Liberal friends who are not in the house, transportation is a natural monopoly and I think that the direction we have to move in over the whole field of transportation, if it is to be rationalized and organized so as best to serve the interests of the people, calls for extending the principle of public ownership.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One further question. The hon. member, then, is in favour of taking over the C.P.R.?

Mr. KNOWLES: Definitely.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre omitted to refer to the question of centralization of power at Ottawa, whereby neither the provincial governments nor an individual in those provinces will be able to go into the flying business unless he obtains a licence from and is controlled by some department at Ottawa. The hon. member centred his argument on the difference between private and public ownership. I came to the House of Commons in 1930, and I view with alarm the centralization of power in Ottawa. Canada is different from all other countries. It is perhaps four thousand miles in extent. It has great areas sparsely settled. There is no country comparable to it, with the exception of the United States. It therefore behooves us to watch with a great deal of care—especially those of us who come from the east and the west—the powers which we think we are losing.

Mr. BENCE: I am a little surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with reference to the north and south feeder routes. If the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes in public ownership of the transportation systems, then it must include the whole system, the Trans-Canada routes and the north and south routes. I do not see how they can blow hot and cold at the same time with regard to this important matter. It is a peculiar attitude to take when you suggest that you allow private enterprise to take over a feeder route, develop it and get it to the point where it is successful and of real service to the nation, and then say that the government is to take it over. Surely you cannot hope to obtain anything from private enterprise in that way.

Mr. KNOWLES: How about the Canadian Pacific Air Lines taking over eleven firms?

Mr. BENCE: So far as that is concerned, the thing that I look for in transportation or anything else is efficiency and economy. I shall refer to that in just a moment. If my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party believe in public ownership, then they must believe in complete public ownership of transportation. I do not see how they can possibly present a case in which only the valuable routes, the routes which are going to produce results in a monetary and other ways, are to be taken over by the government, and the small feeder routes are to be left to the returning airmen, who were referred to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply some time ago as the ones who were to be given the opportunity to rehabilitate themselves in civilian life.

I do not wish to get off on a sideline with the C.C.F. party on an argument of this kind. I rose to ask a question of the minister. As I understand it the reason for this legislation is that the ministry found the Canadian Pacific Air Lines were trying to implement a policy which was contrary to the policy of the government. I think the minister suggested in the house—he certainly suggested it in an interview he gave the other day to someone connected with the magazine Canadian Aviation, in reply to questions put to him—the reason why the railways are being dispossessed of their airlines is that the Canadian Pacific Air Lines would never accept government policy, which was one of non-competition with intercontinental routes. If I am wrong in that, the minister will correct me.

My understanding of the situation is that under the Transport Act the government found itself in a difficult position on at least two occasions because of the fact that they had specified a route for transport by air and that the board of transport commissioners gave licences which would indicate that they were allowing the Canadian Pacific Air Lines to extend their system which would eventually develop into a Trans-Canada system. In fact as I understand it the government had to resort to rather unusual measures and unspecify certain routes in order to overcome that difficulty. In view of the fact that the whole principle is being changed by this bill and the whole matter of policy is to be put into the hands of the minister and the board is to be merely one that will advise him with respect to regulations and licences, why is it now necessary to continue the policy of divorcing the railways from the air lines? The whole authority now rests in the minister's hands. If he believes in government policy being implemented completely, and in there not being an impartial or non-political power in control of this thing, why does he not tell the railways that they may continue on with the airways system but that he has the power and authority to say to them definitely there is no possibility of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines being able to set up a Trans-Canada system?

I believe this matter came to a head at the time of the application of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines for an expansion of their line from North Battleford to Edmonton. It looked like another step in the policy of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, if it was their policy, to extend their lines completely across Canada. Because of the fact that under normal circumstances if that route were specified the board of transport commissioners could give a licence without getting permission from the government to do so, this whole matter came to a head and the statement of policy was made by the minister last March. In view of the authority contained in this bill, and if the minister insists on obtaining the authority, could he tell us whether or not it is necessary for him to insist on divorcing the railways from air lines operations? This is the way I feel about this question. If air lines are to be divorced from the railways, we shall not have an economical system on the north and south routes. If it is split up into small companies, I do not see how it is possible to have economic systems on these north and south routes. The companies will not necessarily be well financed, nor will they necessarily be responsible.

There are many things to be considered in a matter of this kind. There is the question of accidents. The minister referred to that in 1937. When Trans-Canada Air Lines were linked up with the Canadian National Railways he referred to the responsibility that an air company had to its passengers and to the fact that any company carrying air traffic should be completely responsible, particularly if there were any negligence and any loss of life or property. There is no question about the fact that monetary compensation should be made. If this policy is continued, and if the government insists that the railways shall be divorced from the air lines, only one thing can eventually happen. We shall have a complete government monopoly on the across-Canada system and on the north and south feeder routes, because I believe it is impossible to carry on a system of small operating units all the way across the country, each one with separate overhead and with no means of co-ordination of cooperation between the whole.

Mr. HOWE: I think it might be worth while to take a few moments to consider what the bill before the house entails. The bill amends the Aeronautics Act, which in turn was passed in 1918. It was the supreme law governing aviation in Canada until it was amended in 1938.

The claim is made that the minister is setting up a dictatorship. That has been said several times. Let me say that the effect of the amendments are to transfer many of the responsibilities of the minister to a board. Previously under the act those were the sole responsibilities of the minister. The hon. member for Yale administered the Aeronautcs Act for four or five years; he was then the dictator of aviation in this country. I cannot believe that he was very uneasy about the situation, or that the country was very uneasy; nevertheless in those years no plane could be licensed in this country, no route could be flown and no person could be a pilot except under a certificate from the hon. member for Yale. Now we are changing that in what direction? We are setting up a board which on its own initiative will be responsible for licensing and for a number of other functions formerly performed by the minister.

Let us see what the other criticism is.

Mr. GREEN: Before the minister leaves that point, will he say what powers are taken away from him that he had under the Aeronautics Act? As I read that act there is only one change; that is in connection with the licensing of aircraft, and even it is made subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: No; final authority in that regard is with the aeronautics board.

Mr. GREEN: It says, "subject to the approval of the minister."

Mr. HOWE: Let me make my speech; you have made several. In 1938 an attempt was made to do something in this direction; the board of transport commissioners were asked to perform certain functions that previously had been performed by the minister. That bill was brought in by this government and introduced by myself, as Minister of Transport. That provision was inserted in the act with the idea of strengthening the machinery in connection with the allocation of air routes and licensing. It has become obvious that unless the act is again changed, in future there will be only two airway systems in Canada; one, the publicly owned Trans-Canada system—and it will take some vigilance on the part of governments from time to time to maintain that system in its present state—and the other owned by another railway. Applications have been filed by the privately owned railway for every route that has been opened or suggested in Canada; and under the present act, if those routes were proclaimed the transport board might very logically assign them to the privately owned railway. The government has had to consider whether or not that would be a good thing. In other words should this government permit, in war time—and remember that the privately owned railway entered the aviation field and has built up its business in that field during the war years—the air of Canada to be preempted by two railway systems; should we sit idly by and let that happen? That is the decision we have had to make. Rightly or wrongly the government has decided that it is not in the best interests of Canada, not in the public interests, to allow that to happen. Therefore we are doing what has been done in other countries; we are asking surface transportation to divest itself of its interests in air transportation, and we are amending the Aeronautics Act accordingly.

I have stated some of the objections to having the air dominated by two railway systems. I have said that we did not wish to bring to the development of our airways the competitive methods adopted in building our surface transportation. Many hon. members of the house, who are young men, have never seen that competitive system in action. I happen to be one of the older men in the house, and I remember the methods employed when that competition was at its height. If hon. members wish to see how that scramble for franchises was carried on, let them look at the situation that exists to-day. If they wish to see a railroad propaganda machine in action, let them look about to-day. What has happened? Every Conservative paper in Canada has carried the statement that this is a personal matter with Mr. Howe, that his colleagues are not in agreement with him. That was the first statement, and I think it was carried in practically every Conservative paper. I deny it absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So do we.

Mr. HOWE: The government enters the house with a solid front, but I do not think I am betraying any confidence when I say every one of my colleagues is just as firmly convinced of the wisdom of this policy as I am. The next story was that we were building up a great dictatorship, that the minister was drawing under his aegis all authority over aviation. As I have just pointed out, the minister responsible for the administration of the Aeronautics Act has always had complete authority over aviation, as a responsible minister. The purpose of these amendments is to divest him of some of that authority, rather than to add to his authority.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister say that was so after the Transport Act was passed in 1938? Some of the powers were taken away at that time, were they not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. As I say, as the minister responsible I was trying to divest myself of certain powers, and did so. The only reason these changes are being made, as related to the act of 1938, is that the Transport Act has not proved to be the type of legislation that will build up a balanced and reasonable air transport system in Canada. If an act does not work I believe the logical thing for any government to do is change it.

Then this has been represented as a step toward public ownership. Anyone reading the newspaper articles that have been current would be convinced that the government was taking over private operations. Nothing of the kind is contemplated, or has been suggested, or is contained in any statement of government policy with regard to the air. What happened as far as Trans-Canada Air Lines was concerned? Private enterprise was asked to participate in the building of Trans-Canada Air Lines. At that time private enterprise did not care to participate, so that the system was developed as a government enterprise. The franchise was the gift of the people of Canada, and the government of the day decided to develop that franchise for the benefit of the people of Canada. The financial arrangements provided that increased earnings would be returned to the users of the system and to the public at large by way of reductions in the cost of carrying air mail. The system has been established. It had been in operation for only one year before war broke out, and has not been able to develop as rapidly as the requirements of the country have demanded. I think anyone interested in Canada's war effort will agree that the government could not reasonably have pressed the development of Trans-Canada Air Lines in preference to its war effort. However, it is the purpose of this government, as I hope it will be the purpose of succeeding governments, to protect the franchise of Trans-Canada Air Lines as a great public service. Trans-Canada

Air Lines was not an invasion of private rights but the assumption of a public right. It has been developed; to-day it is one of the great air lines of this continent, with a record that cannot be challenged by any of its competitors. The government does not wish to disguise its interest in Trans-Canada, or its desire to protect that system as a non-competitive transcontinental service. Beyond that, there is nothing in the act or in any statement of government policy which indicates that government ownership will be further extended into the airways.

I do not know that anything further is needed to outline the form of the bill, but I have been amazed that a simple measure of this kind, conferring no new powers upon anyone but transferring powers from one board to another, should have met—

Mr. GREEN: It is not just that simple.

Mr. HOWE: —with such a storm of propaganda. As I say, every Conservative newspaper in the country has put out propaganda. I am still more surprised at the reaction within this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the Winnipeg Free Press a Conservative paper?

Mr. HOWE: No. Perhaps there may be one or two added starters. I am simply taking the field. The amazing reaction, however, is in this house. It seems to me that a brand new party label is becoming completely unstuck. In the old days of the propaganda machine, I would have expected to see what I have seen from the group opposite. Here we are, back again.

Mr. GRAYDON: You and the C.C.F.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that while this discussion is going on the "Progressive" part of the label be dropped, and that we just go back to the old days and the old name.

Mr. GREEN: You are the only progressive man?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to the hon. member for Yale as having been czar for four or five years.

Mr. GRAYDON: A dictator.

Mr. STIRLING: I think the minister used the word "czar" also. Might I draw his attention to the fact that certainly I was not czar or dictator for four or five years, because I was minister for only one year. At that time there was so little activity in the air in Canada that I do not remember even one action it was necessary for the dictator to take during those twelve months. It is true that civil aviation was, in those days, a branch which came under the domination of the Department of National Defence. Such questions as the licensing of pilots and routes would come for examination before that department. I cannot, however, remember any action I took which would substantiate the statement that I was in any sense a dictator.

Mr. HOWE: Civil aviation was abolished about 1932, was it not?

Mr. STIRLING: What does the minister mean by "abolished"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The expenditure was reduced very seriously in 1932.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, it was somewhat reduced.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister was just making another political remark.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, just another political remark. I have listened on more than one occasion to the extremely interesting explanation of the minister respecting the way the policy of the government has developed. The position I take is that I prefer that which was the policy of the government to that which is the present policy, as set out in the bill.

Until now the board of transport commissioners was a board to which such matters as licensing might be committed for examination. The board of transport commissioners came into existence for a certain purpose, namely, the purpose of considering matters which could well be taken from the floor of parliament. The board could consider such matters and could give decisions as to their merit. In those circumstances there would be very little likelihood of any intrusion of political views, or any other feelings which might be inimical to fair decisions in certain cases.

The public in general had come to look upon the board of transport commissioners as a very satisfactory board with which to deal. They heard cases, and evidence was submitted. They gave decisions, and the public knew what those decisions were. Now a board is to be set up under the Aeronautics Act—a board which to my mind is not as good as the other one was. The board to be set up is to be under the direction of the minister. It is to make decisions in respect of a variety of matters, and to take action with permission of the minister. Both at the beginning and at the end of the board's work, it is under the domination of the minister.

In this instance the minister is to be the Minister of Transport. I do not care who the individual is; the fact is that it is to be a minister. To my mind it would be much preferable that the minister's actions be curbed to the extent of examination by a board. It has not been satisfactory in the past to have all matters looked after solely by a minister. When the house is not in session, the minister must act with his colleagues, and the action taken is the passing of an order in council. But matters dealt with by orders in council do not readily come to the attention of the public.

It seems to me that when the board is to give advice to the minister, and the minister is to make a final decision, the findings of the board should be brought to the attention of the public as soon as a decision has been reached.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): At the risk of being termed a propagandist I should like to say a word or two in regard to the bill, not from a party standpoint at all, but as a citizen of Canada.

I do not think there can be any disagreement when I say that the measure before the committee has for its purpose the creation of a government monopoly in respect of air transport services. The terms of the measure go that far, and do in fact set up a government monopoly.

I understand this is a general discussion, but that section 1 is before the committee. Perhaps I might draw the attention of hon. members to the wording of section 12(1), which states:

> Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

The words "to any person" have a very broad meaning. Reading that section of the measure alone, one would come to the conclusion that anyone applying could get a licence. However the next subsection says:

> No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft—

This, in effect, prohibits the railway companies from carrying on air transportation services. In my view that is not a good policy. I do not see why the issue of licences to transportation companies should be prohibited. It is my view that our two big railway companies, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, are better equipped and better qualified to give transport services by air than are any other people or companies in Canada. I am not shocked by what the minister has described as two railway companies preempting air services in Canada. I think those two companies could very well be allowed and encouraged to preempt air service in this country, because they can carry it on so much better than any other institutions or organizations of which I know at the present time. The fact is that the Canadian National Railways have successfully operated Trans-Canada Air Lines, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway has successfully operated Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Why not let them carry on? These two companies have made a success of transportation, and this measure would exterminate their air transport activities. I do not see how it can be considered in the public interest to cancel their licences, to prohibit the renewal of licences or to prohibit issuing new licences to them. Such would be the effect of this measure.

The bill provides:

> The board shall review all licences . . . and may cancel or suspend any such licence as it sees fit.

It has a free hand to cancel any licence it wishes, with or without cause. Even that, apparently, is not considered sufficiently extreme, because if those licences are not so cancelled, by the following section they cease to be valid at the termination of the war. In other words, the licences which now exist are exterminated by this measure.

It has been my experience that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways are giving the country a first-class air transport service. I know that the Canadian Pacific Air Lines is giving the west and the north country a splendid service. I cannot understand why the government should wish to discontinue that service when in fact it should be supported and encouraged.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a statement he is reported to have made the other day. I quote from the July 8 issue of the Financial Post, where a question and answer series is carried on with the minister and in which he is reported to have made the following statement:

> I call your attention to the fact that CPA has not been ordered to break up its system. The statement of government policy indicated that air lines will be separate operations from surface transportation, and that the railroads will be asked to divest themselves of control of airlines not later than one year after the ending of the European war. There is nothing to prevent CPA from continuing its present operation under other than railway ownership.

I take it from that that if there is a body or number of individuals in this country with sufficient finances to take over Canadian Pacific Air Lines, C.P.A. will then be allowed to operate over the routes it is covering at the present time. In view of that fact I do not see how the minister can justify his stand that he has removed the objectionable features which arise under competing systems, and which arose when the two railroads were established. We will have the C.P.A. endeavouring to obtain further lines, and we will have the T.C.A. doing the same thing. Consequently I do not see how the minister has achieved the end he has in view by merely divesting the railways of ownership of these lines. It will be a continuing operation by the two air transport systems, and unless he goes farther than he has, in my opinion he is not going to achieve that which he has sought to achieve at this time.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, this bill is of great importance to the people who live on the Pacific coast, because the whole question of service by air from the coast into the Yukon and Alaska appears to be affected. At the present time we have a very efficient service flown by the C.P.A. I believe it is a daily service going up from Vancouver to the Yukon and connecting in northern British Columbia with the line from Edmonton to the Yukon; of course, it is one of the so-called feeder lines.

We want to know and know very clearly what is to be done about that line and other lines of that type. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to be forced to dispose of the line, and presumably the purpose is to have it turned over to some small company. The question is whether or not that small company will be able to give the same service. It is a very good operation at the present time, and the people now served by this line are entitled to the assurance that they will have just as good service under this new policy. The same thing applies to the line down the Mackenzie river and the one up the north shore of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Quebec and Bagotville and so on right along the north shore.

I thought there was some chance that Trans-Canada would take over these lines, but according to the statement made by the minister to-day that apparently is not the intention. He said earlier in the debate that there was no intention of Trans-Canada taking over the Mackenzie river line; presumably there is no intention that Trans-Canada will take over any of these feeder lines. It seems to me that the policy with regard to feeder lines should be clarified and made more definite than it is at the present time. They are really not small operations and they should come in a separate category. There are three categories in our air transport system. First there is Trans-Canada, with which nobody wants to interfere. I think we are all agreed that they are doing a splendid job and that there should be no interference. Then there are the feeder lines, and then there are the small operations, the bush lines. I cannot see that the government policy with regard to the intermediate or feeder lines is at all clear.

The minister has mentioned competition, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has gone much farther. He accused the Progressive Conservative party of being in favour of cut-throat competition. Either he does not know the terms of the present Transport Act or he did not bother to explain them to the committee. The fact is that section 5 of the Transport Act passed in 1938 gives extensive powers to the transport board to prevent cut-throat competition. I do not think any one in this house, either in the party to which I happen to belong or in any other party, wishes to have cut-throat competition. That section gives the transport board wide powers; for example they can only issue a licence where it is shown that the service to be rendered will be complementary rather than competitive. I think the minister will agree that those powers are very extensive.

Then there is some talk about monopoly. I do not think anybody wants a monopoly of feeder lines. If the minister's statement is correct, the C.P.A. can sell out to some other company so long as it is not a transportation company. That would continue any monopoly that exists now. You would have just as great a monopoly under that set-up as there is supposed to be at the present time. I ask the minister to give consideration to granting power to the board to prevent monopolies. That power does not seem to be in the acts at the present time; it could very well be added so that we could get around that particular difficulty.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend was arguing in favour of maintaining a monopoly.

Mr. GREEN: I was not arguing in favour of maintaining a monopoly. Further I think all monopolies should be very strictly controlled. Like some other hon. members who have spoken to-day I cannot see the sense in wiping out an efficient service. There should be some better way of solving our problem than simply to make an efficient service shut up shop. If the C.P.R. have gone too far, then they certainly should be curbed.

Mr. HOWE: There is no service being closed that I know of.

Mr. GREEN: I do not see how the minister can expect the Canadian Pacific to maintain and improve their present air service when they are under sentence of death within a year after the end of the war. That is the only thing one can conclude from the minister's remarks and from the terms of the bill. I ask him to explain just what will happen in the case of the service now being flown from Vancouver into the Yukon and from Edmonton into the Yukon.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this act is to establish a board to formulate plans to the end that no service is going to suspend. When the time comes to divest, it will be possible to obtain equipment and competent pilots, and certainly the problem will be worked out in a logical way. I can assure my hon. friend that the purpose of private enterprise in flying these routes is to make money. When ownership is transferred, it will be done at a price.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister make it clear whether or not it is the intention to have Trans-Canada take over that service?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is not. The policy in regard to T.C.A. has been reiterated time after time. There is no change in that policy.

Mr. GREEN: There would have to be some private company found or organized to take over that route from Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

Mr. HOWE: That will develop in due course.

Mr. GREEN: The minister can give no assurance at the present time how that situation will be met?

Mr. HOWE: I can assure the hon. member that the route will be operated.

Mr. GREEN: That is as far as the minister can go?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: Will the minister explain the latter part of the quotation to which I have referred where he is reported to have said:

> There is nothing to prevent C.P.A. from continuing its present operation under other than railway ownership.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member find anything in the bill that indicates anything different?

Mr. BENCE: No, but the suggestion in the minister's reported statement is that the C.P.A. is to be allowed to continue if it divorces itself of railway ownership, and I want to know whether that is the government's policy.

Mr. HOWE: Let us determine the question when it arises. A board is being established to assist the government in formulating policy.

Mr. BENCE: Then the minister was not stating government policy when he made that statement as reported in the press?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is a lawyer, and I ask him whether I was not giving a correct legal interpretation of the bill as he reads it?

Mr. BENCE: The minister is giving a correct legal interpretation in the sense that he has the right to determine the matter of licences, but his reported statement was that the C.P.A. is to be allowed to continue if it divorces itself of railway ownership.

Mr. HOWE: If such an application is made it will be considered by the board.

Mr. BENCE: The minister will not go as far now as he did when he made that statement?

Mr. HOWE: I said that there was nothing in the bill to that effect, and if my hon. friend wants to challenge that statement, let him produce the evidence.

Mr. BENCE: I have produced the minister's statement as reported in the press. Was that an accurate statement or not? If it was accurate, will the government implement that policy here?

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend find anything in the bill that conflicts with the statement I am reported to have made?

Mr. BENCE: It is not covered in the bill.

Mr. HOWE: Then let us confine ourselves to the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that the minister is doing himself an injustice when he tries to tell my hon. friends to my right that this is an innocuous bill and that there is not very much in it. I do not blame him altogether for his desire to allay their fears so that he can get the bill through.

Mr. GRAYDON: He put you on the spot anyway.

Mr. KNOWLES: No, he did not. He put himself in a bit of a spot.

Mr. GRAYDON: You thought you had a convert to socialism but found you had not.

Mr. KNOWLES: I know he is not a socialist yet. But I want to suggest to the minister that there is something new in this bill and I think he should admit it and boast of it.

Mr. GRAYDON: If there is nothing new in it, why bring it in?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not altogether proper to refer to other sections than the one before the committee, but sections 9 and 10 give the board which will be set up power, more than that, give instructions to the board, to make investigations and surveys so that the board may be able to advise the minister on matters respecting civil aviation. I feel that what we have in this bill is provision for the government to take the initiative in developing our air services. I recognize that it is quite correct, as the minister said a little while ago, for him to say that this bill does not provide for any extension of the principle of public ownership of air services, but it does provide for the setting up of a board which may survey the whole matter and make its recommendations to the minister in the light of what it considers to be in the best interests of the country. I submit that any impartial board which goes at this objectively will in due course make recommendations to the government that the principle of public ownership be extended so far as air services are concerned, and if this government is not prepared to accept that recommendation, possibly a future government will.

Mr. HOMUTH: You know what the future government will be.

Mr. KNOWLES: I know all about that. We in the last few minutes have been listening to an argument between the hon. member for Saskatoon City and the minister, and the hon. member for Vancouver South got into it as well, with respect to what is going to happen to C.P.A., which indicated that if there is to be the avoidance of monopolistic control of all other air lines than those not now operated by T.C.A., you will not get it merely by divorcing the financial set-up of C.P.A. from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company You have to go the whole way and extend the principle of public ownership to apply to the northwest staging route, the Mackenzie route, and other important air routes.

Mr. HOMUTH: And take over the C.P.R.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is quite right when he says that this bill does not make provision for public ownership of these lines, but it does make provision, I am glad to say and I wish the minister would boast of it too, for setting up a board which may make such a recommendation to the government. What the government may do with the recommendation is, of course, a matter of government policy.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you in favour of taking over the C.P.R.?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, definitely.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is all I wanted to know—nationalize the C.P.R.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just as soon as we possibly can after the next election.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will not have anything to say about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope you are enjoying this cross-fire, Mr. Chairman, as much as I am. My hon. friends to my right get so worked up—

Mr. HOMUTH: Not worked up, just disgusted.

Mr. KNOWLES: All right; they get disgusted, or whatever term they wish to use, whenever an extension of the principle of public ownership is suggested. But when I asked the hon. member for Saskatoon City a simple question about the C.P.R. taking over ten or eleven firms, that is quite a different story. He said that he would answer that later, but he has not done so. That is why you have the cut-throat competition to which I referred, and about which the hon. member for Vancouver South endeavoured to check me. You start with a number of small lines competing with each other, engaging in cut-throat competition under private enterprise, until a large firm with all kinds of capital steps in and gobbles them all up.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no cut-throat competition on the railways.

Mr. KNOWLES: The difference between being taken over by a private monopoly and being taken over by the government should be looked at from the point of view of the interests concerned, and the first interest to be served is to make sure that the taxpayers' money is being wisely spent. Secondly, you must see that there is the fullest possible development of air services on a rational basis, and, thirdly, there must be protection of the rights and wages and living standards of the employees.

Mr. GRAYDON: And fourthly, avoid throwing the whole thing into politics.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is plenty of room around here for taking it out of politics.

Mr. HOMUTH: Talk about protecting wages. They cut their own indemnities in Saskatchewan.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend seems quite disturbed over the decision of the C.C.F. government to cut their own salaries.

Mr. HOMUTH: They did not think they were worth any more.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are closer to the people.

We feel that the three main interests I have suggested are much better served under public direction and control than under private enterprise and monopoly, and we hope things will move in that direction. I hope I have not embarrassed the minister and thus prolonged the passage of the bill, but I do not think our hon. friends to the right should be told that there is nothing in it. There ought to be more in it, but it does contain some things that we welcome and that he ought to be proud of.

Mr. GILLIS: Was a franchise granted within the last four months for the operation of a side-line air line between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia and points in the United States.

Mr. HOWE: We have had no such application.

Mr. GRAYDON: Certain things that have happened may have been amusing to the minister, as he implies, but it is also amusing to see the difficulties which have so soon arisen in this new-found alliance between the minister and my socialist friends to the left. Such new alliances do not often last long, but I had expected that these hon. gentlemen would be able to get along at least while the consideration of the bill was in progress. From the minister's explanation, one of two things has happened. Either my hon. friends have not read or have not understood the bill very well, or unconsciously they are, so to speak, getting into bed with the C.P.R. That is a fair assumption, because the minister now makes the statement to the Financial Post, which has been read by the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) and which I myself have read, although I have not a copy of it with me now. It indicates clearly that the bill does permit the same company, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, to operate exactly as they are operating now, provided that the board which is now set up, and the appeal to the minister, which is complementary to it, permit them to carry out that particular policy. May I point out to my hon. friends to the left that there is nothing in the bill that, as far as I can see after the minister's explanation, taken in conjunction with the statement in the Financial Post, in any way dissolves the present set-up, except that it makes it more awkward in the handling of traffic, because what will happen is this. In all probability, unless some teeth are put into the act, those who are now operating Canadian Pacific Air Lines, in order to go on the same as before, need only declare that they are divorced from the other transportation system to which they are at present attached. If that is the case, where is the much vaunted policy of the minister respecting the giving of little franchises to those who come back from overseas? That was one of the things the minister used with great effect; at least he felt that it had great effect at the beginning of his introduction of the bill. As it turns out now, there is nothing in that regard but some innocuous reference to a board which has been set up. The minister himself now finds it necessary to indicate that there may be no change at all in the set-up. That being so, I contend that either this bill means something or it does not.

Mr. HOWE: What is the Conservative policy? We have had it stated from many angles. You are the only exponent of the little man's interests that I have heard over there.

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot hear what you are saying. I am trying to make a speech and you are trying to interrupt. If you want to make a speech afterwards—you will anyway—I am certainly not going to extend an invitation to you now. As far as the minister's present suggestion goes, as contained in the Financial Post, it is a deceptive sort of arrangement. In my opinion it will lead to something worse than the situation which the minister is trying to avoid in the first place, because you will then have the company operating in exactly the same way as before, although under another name. The effect will be exactly the same. We are entitled to something better than that. My hon. friends to the left are always talking about what government ownership will do. Apparently they are not satisfied with government regulation, such as is envisaged under the transport board. That does not seem to suit their purposes. But if the government cannot regulate satisfactorily—and apparently, according to my hon. friends to the left, they cannot—then I pose this question to them: Can the government always operate successfully if they cannot successfully regulate? These questions of public ownership versus private ownership—

Mr. KNOWLES: Your party has admitted that the T.C.A. operate pretty well.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will come to that in a moment and put on the record the exact position as I see it with respect to public ownership and private enterprise. My hon. friends to the left from time to time parade the great bogey man of monopoly. I say to them that I am as much opposed to monopoly as they ever were or will be.

Mr. HOMUTH: They are not opposed to it; they are in favour of it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will come to that, too, in a moment. If hon. gentlemen to my left, who are murmuring, will content themselves for the moment I will come to that point. I do not want the chairman to name any of them. I am not nearly so much concerned about the size of an enterprise as I am about the kind of service which it is giving society and whether it is playing ball with the state, the ratepayers and the public generally. That is the test, and it is not fair to draw red herrings across the parliamentary trail and, worse than that, to do the same thing on the hustings where the people are not given an opportunity from time to time to discuss these matters. I do not like the idea of people taking a pail of black paint and a brush and daubing everything where there is more than one man in a business. That is not good enough, and I will say to my hon. friends, when they talk about public ownership and put up the best case they can for the state owning things, that I came from a farm, and many other hon. gentlemen in this house came from farms, and in my opinion if ever there was a good example of what private enterprise can do, an example of what rugged individualism in this country can accompish, then I take off my hat to the farmers of the nation. My hon. friends to the left are suffering through a confusion of policy with relation to state ownership of farms, and I will say to them that it is our belief that so long as the success of the farmers of Canada is what it is, so long as they set such a good example, then there is still argument for private ownership and individual initiative in this land. May I say to my hon. friends that in so far as monopolies are concerned we have had suggestions from them from time to time to substitute one monopoly for another. That is all we have ever been offered.

Mr. HOMUTH: A bigger one than ever.

Mr. GRAYDON: A monopoly which may reasonably be greater and more dangerous than those which at present exist. Let us be fair about this. Let us judge these things with calmness and with an analytical mind without the confusion of politics thrown into it. So far as the air lines are concerned, if we are to criticize every air line in Canada and call them monopolies unless they are operated by one man, then I do not think we shall be able to build up a very good air-line system in this country in the future.

My hon. friends in the C.C.F. talk about the Trans-Canada Air Lines and total government ownership. Let me point out to him that his own party's leader in this house is espousing a doctrine which he himself is not espousing in the statement he makes. My hon. friends to the left ask for a complete nationalization of the air lines of Canada, so that there shall not be cut-throat competition or monopolies, as they say. That would, of course, result in a giant monopoly. At the same time their leader was very careful—I can realize how careful he had to be—when he was discussing the question of the taking over of the Canadian Pacific railway system. In effect this is what he said: Yes, we are going to nationalize it; but no, we are not going to put it into one giant monopoly; we are going to operate the two national railways in competition with each other. If that were done you would have the alleged cut-throat competition which the group to my left attempt to show will result in the operations of the air lines of Canada. May I suggest to them that they cannot have their cake and eat it.

Mr. GILLIS: It would be more efficient.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to my hon. friend that when he speaks of the question of efficiency—

Mr. GILLIS: It would not ruin the nation.

Mr. GRAYDON: If my hon. friend wants to make a speech he is quite at liberty to do so. I hope that he will give me the same opportunity of interrupting when he is speaking. Our job in this country is not to deal with generalities as my hon. friends to the left are doing, but to face realities so far as air transportation is concerned, and to see to it that no matter what may be done, the best possible service shall be given to those sections of our country which badly need them. Our great hinterland and the northwest of Canada particularly are going to need the very best service that this nation can give them. I think we as a parliament ought to be very careful not to try to do as the government is attempting, and draw a red herring across the trail and suggest things in such a way that even our socialist friends to the left have been deceived. They have been deceived by the policy of the government to the point where they thought it was a socialist policy. They were deceived to such an extent that they allied themselves with the minister and the minister has now denied any such suggestion of socialistic tendencies. That is the curious position; that is the confused position in which the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which everybody seems to know so much more about than I, the leader of a party in this house, may also be up against in time. They may find that they are taken over by a giant octopus in this country, or they may not.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is a case of an adoption where the child did not want to be adopted.

Mr. GRAYDON: In closing, I should like to point out to the minister that the question of provincial jurisdiction in the air also comes up.

Mr. HOWE: Who raised the question, and why? Has that question ever been raised under this bill?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister to keep quiet for a while?

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that we discuss the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to be impolite to the minister, but I should like to pursue this matter for a minute, because I think it is important. When I finish I think the minister will recognize that. As I understand it, the board to be set up is subject to an appeal to the minister. It will have the power to determine jurisdiction in so far as the provinces and the dominion are concerned, and in so far as the setting up of air services are concerned.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Essex East is going to come forward with one of his long legal opinions, for which theoretically I have great respect, but practically I am afraid sometimes they are not always right. May I say to the minister that in so far as the board is concerned we are going to be faced with this problem. The minister says that you can always get an appeal to the courts. The suggestion he makes is that you should first of all spend the money to set up the airports and buy the machines and get your pilots. You can then start to operate, but you then find yourself faced with a lawsuit. That is the way and the time when he says that you can have your rights determined. I suggest that that is not the proper way to proceed. On the question of jurisdiction and law I suggest that the point made by the hon. member for Lake Centre is a tenable one and one which I think the minister ought to consider carefully. I am hopeful that this board will protect the rights of the provinces. I hope that it will give effect to the decision of the aeronautics case.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask my hon. friend a question? As a lawyer he is well posted on these matters. Would he explain how the aeronautics decision was obtained? It was obtained under the terms of the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. HOWE: Absolutely the same act.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is asking for legal advice. It is a strange position—

Mr. HOWE: I know; I was wondering if my hon. friend knew.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister is going to make another speech I have no objection.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend was expounding the law. I thought he knew the case.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am trying to make a speech. I have just about finished. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, evidently wants to make a speech, too.

Mr. GILLIS: I never expected you would make a speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: The voice of experience is always very effective in that connection.

May I conclude by saying to the minister that in so far as the aeronautics decision is concerned, my understanding of it is that it did not take the whole jurisdiction with respect to air travel out of the jurisdiction of the provinces and give it to the dominion except in certain sections. That may be a matter of opinion, but in any event I wish to leave it with the minister and his officials so that they may go into the legal aspects of it. I wish to say to the minister that in so far as this board goes, there should be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on the two points which the hon. member for Lake Centre suggested previously in the debate.

Mr. GILLIS: As a rule the leader of the Tory party is inclined to be cool and collected. His outburst this afternoon would lead me to believe that he has a very bad case. It is the technique of a lawyer who understands his business—

Mr. MARTIN: Some lawyers.

Mr. GILLIS: Most of the lawyers in this house, too.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are lawyers and lawyers.

Mr. GILLIS: It is the technique of lawyers to make a lot of noise when they have a bad case. The display of the leader of the Tory party this afternoon convinces me that he has either a very bad case or that the heat is affecting him. His outburst was anything but his usual capable performance. I think it was also an indication that the minister was right when he said that, regardless of tags, the Tory machine is still the same old buggy with a new coat of paint. Occasionally they forget themselves and lapse back to a lot of old policies they never got away from.

I am going to be as brief and as explicit as I can in this connection. Many times this session I have heard protests from every side of the house because the powers of parliament were being usurped by boards and people outside this house, and to a large extent I think that criticism is justified. What I like about this measure is that in it the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is bringing back one of the prerogatives that should remain within the confines of this chamber. He is setting up a board that has the right to organize the air industry, which is of such potential value to the people of this country and which must be closely supervised because of its hazards to the travelling public. The minister has considerable authority under this bill, and he is answerable to this house for any action he may take through the medium of this board. That is where such responsibility belongs, and I am glad to see that the minister has sufficient courage to take this step. What did it add up to in the past? A board sat behind the scenes, never reporting to parliament, and franchises across the country were sold to their friends on the basis of patronage. That was the sum and substance of it. That is what is worrying so many people to-day. I have on my desk right now a letter stating that Tory manipulation is going on in Nova Scotia with respect to a short line in that province.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no; nothing like that.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what is worrying my hon. friends. It has been a pretty good business in the past, but now it is coming back into this chamber, where it belongs. We are beginning to drag out from behind the scenes a very good business that has been handled on the basis of patronage and in favour of monopolies. The people of Canada elect members of this house to do the business of the country, and this is where the responsibility should be.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, they make terrible mistakes sometimes.

Mr. GILLIS: The people should rectify any such mistakes by sending responsible men to this House of Commons.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. HOMUTH: They will in the next election.

Mr. GILLIS: That is their prerogative. While this bill cannot be construed in any way as setting up a system of government ownership, management or operation in connection with the airways, nevertheless it is a step toward accepting responsibility and guarding that industry in the future. If that step had been taken fifty years ago in this country with respect to the fuel industry, for example, it would not be in its present condition, under private monopoly, responsible to no one. The oil industry of the North American continent has directed the destinies of the fuel industry of this country to such an extent that it has become a national disgrace. The technical research and development carried on by the big oil interests have interfered with the development of our fuel industry. If there had been a board responsible for managing and handling that industry, responsible to the people of Canada, this situation would not have developed. I wish the leader of the opposition would read some of the stuff being put out by the United States government to-day in pamphlet form as a result of their investigations into monopoly control on the continent of North America, which shows that practically every organization in this country that amounts to anything is being manipulated from the countries that we are fighting. They still have control, and will continue to have control in the aftermath of the war.

I am not going to continue along that line. In my opinion this is one step taken by the government in an endeavour to guard and protect an industry that is in its infancy against such developments as we have seen in connection with textiles, fuel, power and every other branch of industry in this country, which have brought us to the point where our whole economy is controlled by a very few people. That is why I favour this bill. I have no illusions as to the minister being a socialist; but I do say he is an engineer; he is practical; he wants to see things done. I believe he is working in the interests of this country, and I further believe that if he were unshackled he would do a much better job. He may not be a socialist in theory; he may not preach that doctrine; but, after all, socialism is merely a matter of getting things done instead of talking about them. That is what the minister is trying to do in this bill. Parliament is accepting the responsibility of organizing a potentially great industry, with the supreme power vested in the minister who is responsible to the House of Commons for his actions. That is as it should be.

I had no intention of saying anything during this discussion, but I thought the leader of the opposition was so wild and irrelevant in his remarks that I had to rise and say something. This is exactly as I see it. When the heat is over; when the hon. gentleman has time to sit back and calmly consider this matter in the confines of his own office, I think he will decide that he was all wrong and will write the minister a letter of apology.

Mr. McIVOR: I must say I was well pleased when the minister shook Trans-Canada Air Lines free of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I hope he will keep it that way. As far as the minister being responsible is concerned, if I represented a small company or an individual pilot it would cost me less to appeal to the minister than to appeal to a court. I believe the minister would be familiar with all sides of the question and would be just as square, as level and as just as any judge in the land.

Mr. ADAMSON: To hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South flirting with the minister reminds me of the picture I have seen of a monument maker chasing a hearse. This bill, I think, illustrates the truth of the saying that all power corrupts but absolute power corrupts absolutely. The minister spoke of the old days and of the competition between the railways, particularly, as I gathered it, with regard to the competition for franchises. That was a long time ago. Perhaps he remembers the days when the Santa Fe and the Union Pacific competed so bitterly for the traffic between New Orleans and Los Angeles At one time they reduced the fare between those two cities to $1, the cut-throat competition was so bad. These things have not been done, however, for many decades. The regulation of the railways, certainly since before the last war, has shown a marked degree of success. The minister has always said that he would divorce the air services from land services because this was done in the United States, and that that was their policy. That may be so, but he has yet to explain to my satisfaction or, I suggest, to the satisfaction of the committee, why this policy of the divorcing of air lines from the railway companies has been adopted.

Air transportation and land transportation are both classified as transportation. Already the railways have contingent services such as telegraphs and hotels. They also have those much abused officers, their commercial agents, who are trying to look for new business. Apparently it is a very wrong thing in this day for anyone to look for new business, in this new business, in this new social set-up about which everyone seems to be so pleased. New business is to some persons one of the sins of the devil. Still, to those of us who perhaps are old-fashioned, new business is something to be fought for.

I believe the railways have done more to build up this country than any other single unit. The minister does not say why the railways have been divorced, but states merely that it has been the policy in the United States that a common surface carrier may not be in the air transport business. In my view this has to have much more explanation before it can receive general acceptance. Is the fact that something is done in the United States, and that it may work satisfactorily in that country, any reason why we should automatically adopt their plan of doing business?

One other point arises in connection with cooperation between air services and the railways. Many journeys in Canada will have to be joint journeys, part air and part rail. If the railways and the air lines work as a unit, schedules will be organized so that connections can easily be made. This is a feature worthy of consideration, because at the present time in some instances a whole day is lost because trains and air lines do not make connections.

There has been much discussion about Canada's position in connection with air transport in 1935. In that year I happened to be doing considerable flying in the bush, and it was my impression that Canada led the world in tonnage carried, and was one of the world's leaders in passengers carried and miles flown. Well, I looked up the figures and, once and for all, I should like to place them on the record. I am quoting from "Keesings Contemporary Archives," which show that in 1935 the United States had 454 civil aircraft, while Canada had 336. Surely that is a creditable showing, when one considers the difference in size of our populations. The figures for passengers carried are as follows:

	Passengers carried
United States	860,000
Canada	177,000
Mexico	60,000

The other Latin-American countries are listed proportionately.

Then, the figures for freight carried in 1935 are as follows:

	Tons of freight carried
Canada	11,803
United States	2,460

In other words, we carried nearly five times the tonnage of freight in that year as was carried in the United States. Surely that is not a bad record for a country the government of which was accused of having let air transport die. These figures should be remembered.

Mr. ROWE: What year was that?

Mr. ADAMSON: It was 1935, the last year of the Bennett government.

Let us compare those figures with the figures for Europe. The numbers of civil aircraft in European countries were as follows:

	No. of civil aircraft
France	221
Great Britain	168
Germany	150
Italy	72
The Netherlands	51

Other countries had proportionately less.

Then, these are the figures showing the number of passengers carried:

	No. of passengers carried
Germany	209,875
Great Britain	200,000
Russia	95,000
The Netherlands	64,000
France	56,000
Italy	53,000
Belgium	24,000

Compare these figures with Canada's 177,000 in that year, and again our showing is creditable.

Let us now look at the tonnages of freight carried in European countries. These are the figures for 1935:

	Tons of freight carried
U.S.S.R.	9,055
Germany	3,803
Great Britain	1,898
France	1,300
Italy	1,019

It will be seen that Canada's 11,800 is even greater than that carried by the U.S.S.R. These figures, I believe, give a true picture of Canada's aviation position in that year. We led the world in air freight carried.

Then, to complete the record, let us look into the number of passengers carried on the continents of Asia, Australasia and Africa. These are the figures for 1935:

	Number of passengers carried
Asia	83,385
Australasia	50,804
Africa	22,922

When we compare any of those figures with Canada's 177,000 for the same year we find that Canada carried more than the total passengers carried on those three continents. That is not bad, I should say, for a country whose aircraft industry at that time was based on private enterprise. It was not bad in that year.

I have put these figures on the record as I want to protest against this bill. I want to protest on behalf of the people who built up Canadian aviation. I refer particularly to the bush pilots, to the men in those small companies and to the individual pioneers who, frequently operating on a shoe-string, provided service for the growing mining industry in that area.

Mr. HOWE: To what small company does my hon. friend refer? Will he name one?

Mr. ADAMSON: General Airways, Patricia Airways, and there was one company with a franchise for a line between Rouyn and Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: Who owns them now?

Mr. ADAMSON: They are not in existence.

Mr. HOWE: They are not operating?

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not think so. I was up there the other day and there was no flying at all out of Rouyn. There used to be a line between Timmins and Noranda. You could fly more or less all over the north country.

Mr. HOWE: Those lines were given up for war reasons.

Mr. ADAMSON: They were really given up before the war, because I was up there just at the beginning of the war. It was partly because of what I mentioned last night, the destruction of prospecting. Most of these air lines were serving the prospectors, the diamond drilling crews and the small mines. The first time I went into Siscoe the only way I could go was by air.

These companies made it possible for us to establish a world lead in the carriage of air freight. My objection to this bill is that it proscribes the operation of small companies like these. Under the regulations they would have to have definite routes. These companies did not have definite routes. In 1933, 1934 and 1935 there was a great deal of activity in the Chibougamou district in northwest Quebec. Several lines, at least General Airways, flew regular services from Noranda or Rouyn to Chibougamou and they would stop to service diamond drilling crews operating in that district. Unfortunately the district did not live up to expectations. A great deal of money was spent but not a single producing mine was developed. That illustrates the hazards of the mining business. General Airways ran a definite route and they sold a ticket, a printed contract. Naturally, when that area failed there was no reason to run aircraft into the district and the line was discontinued.

Under this legislation we would say that General Airways should have a monopoly into the Chibougamou district. However, Prospectors Airways, which was a mining and prospecting corporation, at one time was interested in the Chibougamou field. I did not fly with them, but I understand that they had a plane which serviced their operations in the district which was also serviced by General Airways. In my opinion there was no harm in that because both companies were endeavouring to develop the country. If you were interested in getting into the country you had the option of travelling on one or the other line. Prospectors Airways did not have a regular service but occasionally, I understand, they would take a passenger in.

This bill in its precise and limiting clauses is going to put a damper on the development of such lines as I have mentioned.

An hon. MEMBER: In what way?

Mr. ADAMSON: Because each line will have a prescribed route; each line will have its individual destination point. In the development of the north country, which is what I am interested in, you cannot prescribe and limit the activities of aircraft or the men who fly them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON: Before six o'clock I was discussing briefly the operations of the small operators in Canada who are known as the bush pilots or bush fliers. I had dealt with a number of the smaller operations, particularly those from the mining centre of Rouyn and Noranda.

I should now like to discuss an operation on the Pacific coast which has been taken over by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I refer to the operation which was known as the Ginger Coote Air Services. They flew from Vancouver to Victoria but chiefly from Vancouver to Port Alberni and to the Zeballos mining district. I think this operation had a world record for time saved by air. In the ordinary course of events, if you wanted to go to the Zeballos mining field you took a boat, and it took you between five and six days to go from Vancouver around the end of Vancouver island, calling at a great number of ports on the way and lying over at night at some of them, but you could fly there by the Ginger Coote Air Services in two hours. You could get in there and back in a day quite easily. That was a saving, it has been estimated, particularly if the weather was at all bad, of twelve days, which I think is a record of time saved in travelling by air. It shows the vital part which these pioneer air services have played in the development of Canada. Ginger Coote has been taken over by the C.P.A. I think Ginger Coote could not make it go, although I am not sure, and the reason he could not was none other than that the Zeballos mining camp did not develop into a major camp. In the beginning this operator was prepared to go in there and take a chance on the development of this new field. This bill in its clauses will, I feel, militate against the small operators. Ginger Coote operated two Waco float planes. He took a chance on the Zeballo field developing into a major camp. The camp was all right for a few years and it may open again and probably will, but I understand that it is now completely closed down.

The reason why Canadian Pacific Air Lines took that service over was to provide an essential service. To-day they operate from Patricia Bay to Vancouver. I flew there just the other day myself. They are operating an essential service. If one wanted to charter a plane from them or from some other big corporation or to be flown north of the Zeballos field, I do not think you would be able to do so even if there was no war, because the big operators would allow no deviation from the regular routes of their aircraft.

Several other air services small in nature have more or less gone by the board. One of them was Patricia Airways. It flew into the Albany river territory in northern Ontario, the Patricia mine, the Pickle Crow mine and various other districts. Here again, if these fields did not develop into a major field, the small operator would find it difficult to continue. None of these operators was subsidized, as I remember. They just took a chance. They were the true pioneers, the ones to whom we have to be thankful for the leading position we occupied in world aviation in those critical years of the middle thirties. Most of these operators operated on a shoe-string. Their planes were not new. They were planes like the single-engined Stinson or the Fairchild or the Waco or even the De Havilland Moth. They operated on floats in the summer and skis in winter. They had a very interesting effect on the Canadian aircraft field, because out of this development came the only original Canadian aircraft, the Noorduyn Norseman. This aircraft was developed specifically to undertake the job of bush flying and it was extremely successful. In fact the Noorduyn Norseman is to-day, I understand, being used with very little alteration by all the united nations as a short haul float plane for freight and passengers. I understand that it has proved more successful than any other design. That was one of the advantages we had by developing the small operator and the bush flyer.

Let me say a word about the safety of these operators. We are very proud of the fact that Trans-Canada Air Lines has a unique record for safety, but what an extremely enviable record these old bush flyers had in their day. As far as I know, in all the operations from Noranda—and there would be as many as fifteen and sometimes twenty planes in and out that airport or little wharf every day—there was only one fatal accident, and on the Pacific coast there was, I believe, only one fatal accident which occurred near Fort Alberni on the forbidden plateau. When we think of the tremendous volume of freight and the tremendous development that was carried out by those men, with their record of safety, surely it is our first duty to see to it that whatever legislation we may pass or whatever legislation we may bring down in this house, the future of the small operator, the man who has one or two planes, the man who is perhaps operating a specialty service, who is operating where the big operators cannot go, is made secure; because he is the man, and that is the operation, that has built Canadian aviation. It was not the great transcontinental lines that made Canadian aviation, but the small operator operating with one or two planes, in the certain knowledge that if he had a crash he probably could not afford to buy another one. These were the men who developed aviation and these are the men we seem to have forgotten. We have got into our heads a grandiose idea about transcontinental and transatlantic aviation. This is all very important in its way, but we must remember that Canada is still a pioneer country and that if we are to develop, as I hope we shall, it is to the pioneer operator that we still have to look. While it is all very well to consider the transcontinental service and to have pictures of pretty stewardesses tripping about and soothing the brow of the tired businessman—

Mr. HOMUTH: Or cabinet minister.

Mr. ADAMSON: —we must remember that it is the hobnail-booted prospector and engineer who is going to fill the needs of industry and make the payroll that will meet the requirements of the future. These are things we are apt to forget. We get delusions of grandeur, and that is one of the reasons why I object to the restrictive clauses in this bill. When clause 12 comes up I hope to have something more to say on it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have been following all the legislation brought down by the minister, and I thought it might be wise, in view of the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre, this afternoon with reference to recourse to the law, and also having regard to the remarks made by the minister to-day, to remind the committee of something that is very interesting, but something that this government has forgotten. The 15th of June was a date which meant a great deal to the British people, for on that date 729 years ago the barons of England gathered at Runnymede outside Windsor to meet King John. It was on that day that absolute power of the state, held through the person of the king, was compelled to yield to the rule of law and the rights of man. This was set down in the great charter, magna charta. It is still a symbol of freedom, so highly appraised and carefully cherished, that the document itself was sent to Washington for safe-keeping during the blitz. The rule of law!

All that my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre asks is that the rule of law shall be observed; access to the law in order to redress grievances must be made as easy as possible. How far we are getting away from that easy access to the law in the legislation we have had put before us this session! So far as I can see, the minister wants to make appeals to the courts as difficult as he can. This afternoon he said: Let anyone who wants a licence to operate start an airways company; if he can get it let him start one. How ridiculous that is. Who in the world is going to go to the expense of starting an airways company with all the expenditures attached thereto, the purchase of aeroplanes, equipment and all that sort of thing, with all the uncertainty of law that is inseparable from the venture? The request of the hon. member for Lake Centre is very reasonable.

What is the position of my hon. friends to the left, the socialist party? They say: "Go ahead, you young fellows, when you get back. Get busy and start out in the aeroplane business and work it all up, and the moment you begin to make a profit out of it we will take it over. We will confiscate it." That is what they say.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Canadian Pacific did nothing of the kind. My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about when he says that. The C.P.R., as a matter of fact, took over some of these companies and have some of these fellows working with them on shares, and the hon. member knows that. Are there to be no vested interests in this country? Is the man in the corner grocery store to be secure in his job when he gets busy and builds up a business that is worth while? Who is going to venture in this great Canada of ours with the opportunities we have, in face of that sort of thing? Who is going to develop the country if, after he has got something started that begins to be profitable, our national socialist friends to the left take it all away from him? Who is going to venture? Who is going to develop without the security of magna charta? Too much power is being vested in this government. Access to the courts is getting more difficult all the time. To-day the minister said: Let them start in business, with all the expenses attached to it, and then see if they can get a licence to do it. I wish to point out that our democracy was founded on the danger of absolute power. This is not government of the people, for the people, by the people. There is danger of absolute power. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the taste of power in war time has gone to the heads of this government. They have to get back to peace-time legislation and function as a government ought to function. The people have been satisfied to be regimented and all that kind of thing in war time, but we shall never get any place in this country unless we have individual effort and enterprise. I say that history has repeated itself. It was ever thus in war time, and how! I ask the minister to reconsider his decision and in this legislation make access to the courts easier and remember magna charta.

Mr. HAZEN: This afternoon the minister said he was amazed that this bill had met with such a storm of propaganda. I was amazed that he should have described the criticism of this bill as a storm of propaganda. I think his remarks contain certain innuendoes and implications that should not be allowed to go unchallenged.

I do not think the minister would charge the Winnipeg Free Press with indulging in a storm of propaganda, but, sir, that newspaper has been very critical of some of the provisions of this bill. I have before me a copy of an editorial that appeared in that paper on April 11 last, after the minister had set forth the policy of the government in this house. I do not propose to read all the editorial, but in it I find this statement:

> One feature of Mr. Howe's speech, however, requires far more explanation than it has yet got. That is the determination on the government's part to divorce air and rail transportation. Why? What good purpose is being served? All that we have from Mr. Howe is the flat statement that he believes it wise. But that is not good enough.

This is not Conservative propaganda or Conservative criticism; it is an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press. The editorial goes on to say:

> Many reasons can be put forward for maintaining air and rail connections. The services in certain respects are complementary, and it is obvious that important economies in operation can be obtained by a sharing of certain costs. On this point there must be definite suspension of judgment until the case for separation is more clearly defined.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association is a large and important organization in this country. Its members are citizens of Canada who have played an important part in the industrial development of the dominion and who have done an important job during this war. After this bill was before the committee last, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association presented a submission, a copy of which I presume the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is acting as Minister of Transport, has received. I have this submission before me. I am tempted to read it all, but I shall not do so. Here is one paragraph that I shall read to the committee:

> The long experience gained through the administration of existing legislation pertaining to transportation regulation has proven that the administrative board to deal adequately and fairly with various statutory conditions must be clothed with adequate powers and staffed with experienced and expert personnel. Only in this way can all concerned be assured of fair and independent action on matters dealt with by such board. The conditions of Bill 133 fall far short from meeting this important test.

I do not think either the Winnipeg Free Press or the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, of which perhaps the minister was at one time a member—

Mr. HOWE: Do not accuse me of that.

Mr. HAZEN: Does the minister deny it.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps he still is a member.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think it can be described as indulging in a storm of propaganda when it criticizes the provisions of this bill.

When this bill was introduced in the house earlier this session the Minister of Munitions and Supply said that in general it followed the provisions of the Aeronautical Act of the United States and the functions of the civil aeronautics authority. But there are wide differences between the United States act and the bill before us. The only apparent parallels are minor details. The differences between the United States act and this bill are wide both in particular and in fact.

The civil aeronautics board of the United States consists of five members. The act provides that not more than three of them shall be of the same political party. It functions independently of the secretary of commerce. It reports directly—

Mr. HOWE: Where did that information come from?

Mr. HAZEN: —to the president and to congress. This bill provides that the report shall be made to the Minister of Transport. The United States act does not do that.

Mr. HOWE: Each reports to the government.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the United States act the report is made directly to the president and to congress. The bill before us provides for but three members. There are no legal restrictions as to political affiliations, and the board is directly under the authority of the minister, whom it advises and whose directions it executes.

There is perhaps only one respect in which the United States act and this bill are similar. Under our bill and under the United States act a surface carrier cannot engage in air transport, but I believe that the minister was inadequately informed when he stated in this house that he knew of no other country where the control of aviation was in the hands of surface carriers. The most striking example to contradict that statement is to be found in Great Britain, where the internal air services are operated by railway companies and where steamship companies already are making plans, apparently with the informal encouragement of the government, to operate external services to other countries after the war. For some reason we have adopted the policy of the United States rather than that of Great Britain. I fail to understand under what principle you can enact legislation providing that a corporation must confine its activities to one phase or aspect of its business.

A fundamental difference between the United States act and the bill we have before us is to be found in the principle of a monopoly, publicly owned or otherwise, against that of competition where feasible. We have created an instrument for our air policy in Trans-Canada Air Lines, and have given it wide, exclusive rights. I do not object to that. If the government of this country want to establish a sole air line from the Atlantic to the Pacific they have a perfect right to do so, having entered the field first. But, the civil aeronautics act of the United States explicitly requires that no exclusive right shall be granted for the use of any civil airway, and that no certificate shall confer any proprietary or executive rights in the use of any air space, civil airway, airport or air navigation facilities. Our bill would prevent competition in the Canadian air. The United States act permits competition in the Unted States "to the extent necessary to assure the sound development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States." If you refer to the sections of the United States act which I have mentioned you will see that our bill does not follow the provisions of the United States act except in minor details.

We have objected to the great powers given the minister under this bill. We have objected to the power to make regulations. We have objected to the fact that the minister, who makes decisions in the first place, should sit as a court of appeal on his own decisions. The minister has resented our criticism. This afternoon he said that a brand new party name was becoming completely unstuck, and that the word "Progressive" should be dropped. As I have said before, Mr. Chairman, under our system of democratic government it is the duty of members of this house to make the laws, while it is the duty of independent judges to interpret and enforce those laws. If it is unprogressive to insist on that principle being observed, then this party is unprogressive. If it is progressive to insist that we have a dictatorship set up in this country, then this party is unprogressive.

I have a great many suspicions and fears when I read in a bill that a minister, or the governor in council, has the right to make regulations. If these regulations are of a purely administrative nature there may not be much objection, but the difficulty and danger arise from the fact that in too many cases these regulations are really laws which impose penalties. I remember that two or three years ago, I think perhaps it was in 1940 or 1941, the Minister of Fisheries with the approval of the governor in council made a regulation. It appeared very simple; it was known as special regulation No. 9, and provided that there should be no net fishing in the non-tidal waters of the Saint John river without a permit from the minister. No permits were granted, and the result was that this order in council took away the riparian rights people had in the non-tidal waters of the Saint John river. They lost their property without receiving any compensation therefor. That wrong has never been redressed, but one of these days that will have to be done. So that I think I am justified in being suspicious of the provisions of these acts which allow the governor in council to pass regulations, about which the members of this house have no say and which have the force of law. It is our duty in this house to make the laws; they should not be made by regulation or order in council except in war time.

We have objected to the provision of this bill which allows the minister to sit as a court of appeal after he has given a decision in the first place. I think it was the hon. member for Cape Breton South who, in speaking on the bill this afternoon, said that this measure was bringing back prerogatives which should remain with the house. It is doing nothing of the kind; it is taking away prerogatives that should remain in this house. It is taking away the rights of hon. members to make the laws of the country. That is one of the reasons for which their constituents elected them. There is a principle of natural justice involved, one which may not be found in any book of law, to the effect that no man should be judge in his own cause. But here, under this measure, we have the minister first deciding whether or not a man should have a licence. The minister has to pass on that first; then if the man feels he has not been fairly treated, or if he has some grievance, he has the right of appeal. To whom does he appeal? Why, he appeals to the minister, the man who makes the decision in the first instance. I say that violates a principle of natural justice and it is not a position which hon. members should be asked to accept in any bill.

Under this measure tremendous powers are given to the minister. In November of last year the board of trade of Halifax and the board of trade of Saint John made a joint application to have an air line established between those two cities. There was great need for a service of that kind, because there is a good deal of business carried on between those two points. Many members of our armed forces are stationed at one or other of the cities, and at times they have occasion to move quickly between those two points. Although a joint application was made by those two boards of trade, it was refused. The refusal was made, despite the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway company was prepared to institute a service immediately—a good service, with proper machines.

I have heard some criticism of the Canadian Pacific, but may I say right here that that railway has rendered great service to the port of Saint John. It has been largely through the efforts of the Canadian Pacific that we have a port there at the present time, and were it not for that railway I do not know where Saint John would be to-day. We are deeply indebted to that great corporation.

I put a question on the order paper in connection with this matter. It is to be found at page 781 of Hansard, and is in these words:

> Is it the intention of the government to establish an air service between Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, and if so, when will the service commence to operate?

The answer I received was as follows:

> Trans-Canada Air Lines has been authorized by order in council P.C. 6256 of August 6, 1943, made pursuant to the "Trans-Canada contract" authorized under the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to establish a service between Blissville, New Brunswick, and Halifax, which will be placed in operation immediately upon the completion of a radio range now under construction at an intermediate aerodrome on the route between Saint John and Halifax.

I understand that service is to be established at an early day, although I do not know just when. I have not seen the announcement.

Mr. HOWE: July 1, 1944.

Mr. HAZEN: Well, then, it was established on July 1 of this year. I wish to add, however, that in my opinion that service is going to be absolutely inadequate and unsatisfactory. Hon. members may not know where Blissville is, but for their information may I say it is situated in the county of Sunbury, about forty-four miles from Saint John. Forty-four miles is not a great distance, when one visualizes a modern, first-class paved road. But a great part of the road to Blissville is only a secondary road. Not only is it a country road, but it is one on which there are sharp curves anad steep hills. I doubt if a road of that kind can be kept open in the winter. I should think—and I may be exaggerating a little when I say this—that possibly it would take almost as long to go from Blissville to Saint John by motorcar as to go from Halifax to Saint John by air. The situation, so far as Saint John is concerned, is absolutely out of the question. Time will prove whether I am right or wrong, but my suggestion is that a better and more convenient location should be established, because aircraft landing at Blissville are much farther from Saint John than they should be. I was going to say that it would be a two-hour drive from the airport to the city; when I say that I may be exaggerating a little. But the fact is that it is a long distance away. I am satisfied that the situation will prove most unsatisfactory and inadequate.

Mr. HOWE: With reference to the service at Blissville, might I point out that, unfortunately, it is not possible to land large aircraft unless a standard landing field is available. The longest runway of the aerodrome at Saint John is about 2,000 feet, ending in a rock pile. It is not possible to land modern transport aircraft in that aerodrome. In order to give Saint John aeroplane service, it was necessary to use the nearest suitable field, and that happened to be at Blissville. Blissville is on the main line of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and is situated about halfway between Saint John and Fredericton. Until a suitable field can be provided at Saint John, that field will be used. The new service will be the means of bringing the mails to Saint John several hours more quickly than could be arranged by the recent air mail route.

My hon. friend says that it will take as long to go to the airport from Saint John as to go from Blissville to Halifax. Perhaps that is true. It takes as long to drive from the centre of Montreal to Montreal airport as it takes to go from Montreal airport to Ottawa. Despite that fact, there is a great deal of traffic by air between Montreal and Ottawa. Both the Toronto and Montreal airports are well located, when compared with airports of other large cities. I might add that the distance from Toronto to Malton is about twenty-two miles; yet there is heavy travel from Malton airport.

I am not suggesting that the final word has been said respecting an airport for Saint John. Plans are now under way to develop an airport which will be more suitable so far as its distance from the city is concerned. But, as I said earlier, it is impossible to divert labour from war work or other essential work, to undertake a purely peace-time project. We believe the service now being offered at Saint John, through Blissville, is a considerable advance over the air mail service which has been enjoyed in the past. We regard it as a step toward a still more adequate service in the future.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the minister say whether there is any locational difficulty in connection with developing Toronto airport as a major airport, if the runways were built long enough?

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. HOWE: Toronto airport?

Mr. ADAMSON: Toronto island airport.

Mr. HOWE: That is in the middle of a nest of very high buildings. Within half a mile there are high buildings like the Royal York hotel, as well as two grain elevators. If my hon. friend thinks a pilot would enjoy going in there on a rainy evening with twenty or thirty passengers back of him, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. ADAMSON: Even if the runways were enlarged?

Mr. HOWE: Even if the runways were two miles long I do not think any pilot would undertake to make a blind landing at Toronto island. If an airport is not suitable for bad weather, it is not suitable at all, because passengers must know in advance the airport that will be their point of arrival or departure.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have seen T.C.A. planes fly from there.

Mr. HOWE: I have flown into and out of it many times, but always in good weather.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house believe that there is a very important principle at stake, and we have endeavoured to place our viewpoint before the minister on this and previous occasions. This bill, amongst other things, provides for the setting up of a board. While the minister in his interview with Canadian Aviation magazine has stated that the board will exercise judicial functions, as the bill is at present it will simply be a stooge or pawn in the hands of the minister.

The application of this legislation will be mainly confined to the after the war period. If the principle enunciated by the minister is followed out, the granting of licences will be held back until after the war in order to assure an opportunity being given to our men returning from overseas to secure some of these licences. If this bill goes through in its present form we feel that it will stifle and strangle the expansion of air development in this country. It will place everyone who desires to expand in the way of air development subject, not to the regulations or orders of a judicial body, but to the approval of the minister in everything that is done. Over and over again the minister has repeated by way of explanation that this board is similar to the civil aeronautics authority in the United States. The hon. member for St. John-Albert has shown that one similarity is that the civil aeronautics authority in the United States has the power to make regulations and control, but that board has the power to exercise judicial functions also and to make decisions as between individuals, untrammeled and unfettered by the executive.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is quite wrong. Licences for air lines are not issued by the aeronautics board; they are issued by the President of the United States, who is the executive in that country, just as the cabinet in Canada is the executive in this country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is true enough, but the determination is made by the board.

Mr. HOWE: It is a recommendation by the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The recommendation is accepted; it is in no case refused. That is the difference between these boards in one particular. Surely, with the coming of peace we in this parliament have the right to assure once more the return to democratic principles and not permit the power of any official to be uncontrolled. We must assure that opportunity is given to aggrieved individuals to have recourse to the courts in order to secure justice. Under this board as it is to be set up under this bill there is not an individual or a company who, having been unfairly treated, will have any recourse whatsoever.

I mentioned a while ago the desire of the province of Ontario to establish air lines, and the minister said that the matter could be determined by the board, but official determination will rest with the minister. I asked him the simple question whether or not he would agree in principle, whether or not he would say it is right and proper that any provinces—not only the province of Ontario—should be permitted to operate air lines within their boundaries, but he neglected to give his ideas thereon. He has been very free with his ideas as to certain principles that will guide this board and the minister, but when it comes to a question such as the one I asked there is grave uncertainty in the answer given thereto.

If this board is set up as outlined in the bill, equality under the law will be denied. There was equality under the law between 1938 and the present time, subject, of course, to the exigencies of war as set out in the order in council that was passed in 1940 or 1941. All we are asking for is that all shall have an equal opportunity. We have no interest in the matter of monopolies. The minister says that this bill is similar to the act in the United States, but in this bill there is no such provision that would deny monopoly as exists in the act of the United States. Under that act when an application is made for a certificate, publication is made of the application. Public notice is given thereof and any interested person may file a protest.

What is even more important, that act provides that no transfer of service will be allowed unless approved by the board as being consistent with public interest. Finally there can be no merger of air carriers except when approved by the authority. I find it difficult to follow the minister in his peregrinations since he made his first declaration of policy. When he first declared his policy he said that the railway and shipping companies shall not operate airways, that both T.C.A. and C.P.A. would have to divorce themselves from the railway companies to which they belonged. He said that that was imperative, and indicated that that was one reason for this legislation. As time went on, he changed his viewpoint considerably for in an interview with Canadian Aviation, he said:

> I call your attention to the fact that C.P.A. has not been ordered to break up its system. The statement of government policy indicated that air lines will be separate operations from surface transportation.

And a little later on:

> There is nothing to prevent C.P.A. from continuing its present operations under other than railway ownership.

As the bill is brought down there is no such imperative provision as at first enunciated by the minister. The provision is that no licence shall be issued to any such company or person unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued. That is a long way along the road from the declaration which was made when the minister first announced his policy.

All that I want done is to assure that there shall be fairness in the distribution of these air licences. All I want to be assured of is that there shall be no discrimination against any person, that all shall be equally and fairly treated, and that no arbitrary power shall remain in the minister. This bill is not to take effect in the main until after the war. It may not be the present minister who will then be in charge. But the principle is there, Mr. Chairman, the principle that if we pass this bill as it is now, we shall be setting up a body having all the appearances of power, but denied the exercise of that power excepting subject to the minister. Under the former act that covered rail transportation, ocean transportation and air transportation, provision was made for appeal.

Mr. HOWE: An appeal on what?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says, "an appeal on what?" An appeal on questions of jurisdiction or on questions of law.

Mr. HOWE: Appeal on questions of law to the courts, and appeal on questions of jurisdiction to the cabinet.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister had better read the Railway Act and bring himself up to date. I have a copy of the act here.

I am going to ask the minister, will he accept an amendment providing that an appeal shall lie from the board to the Supreme Court of Canada upon a question of law or upon a question of jurisdiction, or both, upon leave therefor having been obtained from a judge of the said court upon application made within one month after the making of the order, decision, rule or regulation sought to be appealed from? There is nothing unreasonable in that. It will preserve as a principle that the subject shall not be subject to the dictatorial decisions of any person and be denied the right of recourse to the courts. That provision has been in the law for years. Is there any reason why it should be removed now? Has any circumstance occurred within the past four years indicating that the transport board has not efficiently discharged its responsibility in accordance with law?

There was a suggestion here to-day from the hon. member for Cape Breton South that franchises had been granted for airways since 1938 on improper considerations. That was the import of the statement made by the hon. member, and I am going to ask the minister if there was any foundation for that statement, for it leaves a suggestion against the board of transport commissioners that, if unjustified, should be removed by the minister.

We on this side of the house believe that we ought not to confer authority by legislation upon any individual or any board the power, not only to make decisions that affect the future welfare of this country, but to interpret the decisions that they make without assuring the right to the individual aggrieved recourse to the courts.

During the period of the war we have accepted the principle that authoritarian decisions might be made by persons which deny the right of recourse and the right of review by the courts of this land. I cannot see why we should carry this principle into the days of peace ahead. Why should we by legislation in this parliament confirm for the future that which members on all sides of this house have condemned as dangerous even in war time? We in this parliament have a great responsibility and I make this appeal to the minister in all seriousness. We have seen very recently how the rights and privileges of parliament can be infringed upon when freedom of speech in parliament has been punished and penalized outside parliament. For the first time since 1764 parliament has permitted a member of parliament to be punished for the exercise of the undoubted right of members of parliament to the exercise of freedom of speech without complaint. All these things, unless we object to them, are leading along a road that tend to make parliament merely a debating society.

For the minister to accept the right of appeal that I suggest and that other hon. members here have suggested will in no way interfere with the principle of the bill or with the enunciation of the policies to be followed by the government, but it will ensure fairness and justice to the individual. I never was more serious in any matter that has come before this parliament. I have objected to orders in council multiplying at a rate never before equalled in any parliament anywhere—in this country to-day eight times as many as have been passed in Great Britain since the war. We have accepted their intended use for the period of war in the interests of victory, in the interests of survival. But I submit that now, when we believe that the day of peace approaches, we should make it a point to put a stop to the continuation of the trend.

The suggested amendment does not interfere with the principle of the bill. If it is accepted the government may go ahead and carry out whatever its policy may be, as carry it out it will. But there will be assured to everyone an opportunity to equality before the law and the denial of the right of any group to determine rights in the absence of the individual, without regard to jurisdiction and without regard to law.

There is one other matter and I am through. When our men come back from overseas, after their training in aviation, we must assure that there will be available to at least a considerable percentage of them an opportunity to secure employment in this country. Only recently the administrator of civil aeronautics, Mr. Charles Stanton, speaking at Washington, stated his belief with regard to American aviation in the future. He said:

> Aviation must be brought to every sizable community that has need of it. . . . We are now on the threshold of a great and intensive development requiring expansion along every line, and in speaking of expansion, I do not mean adding a few more schedules from point to point, or just a few hundred miles of new routes each year. In speaking of expansion, I mean hundreds of new schedules, and thousands of miles of new routes, carrying millions of new passengers, and great quantities of air express, and practically all of the first-class mail.

We in Canada are not ready for this expansion. The Aeronautical Institute of Canada has given a great deal of study to this matter, and I should like to have a statement from the minister regarding the representations it has made concerning the question of development of airfields at this time, to make ready for extended air facilities after the war. In the submission that was made it was pointed out:

> In our war effort we are creating two gigantic reservoirs of education. In the factories we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars training aircraft mechanics in the construction and servicing of aircraft. In the air force we are spending millions for the training of riggers, fitters, administrative and air personnel. We wish to use these reservoirs of education for the benefit of the nation at large.

There are in Canada 580 cities, towns and villages with a population in excess of 1,000 and only thirty-two of these places to-day have airmail passenger service. After the war is over, having regard to present developments, seventy-five more will be in that position, but there will be 470 of these towns and cities in Canada with no suitable airport or aviation facilities. We are concerned with rehabilitation under this measure—the rehabilitation of the men who return after service in the air force. For the expenditure at the present time of $20,000,000, airfields in these towns and cities, sufficient for post-war interurban aviation, could be developed, and the result would be that, when the war is over, if we had 400 or more airports ready we would be able to assure many hundreds of these returning airmen of an opportunity to go into business for themselves and to operate trunk services and interurban services between these cities and towns.

I often think of the difficulties that we shall have when peace comes. There are some 200,000 men in the air force, and at the very best, according to the highest estimates to-day, not more than 25,000, including groundcrew, will secure employment under the air scheme as formulated for the future. For the expenditure of $20 million, which is less than it now costs to train 800 airmen, we would set up in this country the foundation for a great and extensive Canadian air service which would assure, according to the estimates that I have received, about 60,000 men returning from overseas of an opportunity to carry on the work for which they have been trained and educated, and in addition to that the demands for aeroplanes would result in the improvement of the aeroplane industry and would assure at least that portion of those to-day engaged in aeroplane production being carried on the payroll after the war.

I consider this to be the attitude of all members in this house toward this bill. We may disagree in the details, but our purpose is to ensure that in the foundation we now lay for aviation after the war we shall see to it that provision is made for maximum employment of the men who return, while at the same time we contribute to the welfare of the dominion. It is in that spirit that I have spoken, and I am asking the minister once more to advise the committee whether he can see his way clear to accept the amendment, or to introduce an amendment himself, in order to provide for equality in the administration of this vast undertaking—equality for all who apply, including the men who will be returning from overseas.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has proposed a most innocuous amendment. He proposes making provision in the bill for an appeal, in matters of law and jurisdiction, to the Supreme Court of Canada, to be granted on application to a judge of that court. That has been in the Transport Act, which is a very bulky document, since the act was drawn, and it has been acted upon very infrequently, if at all. I have no objection whatever to putting it in this bill, although what the question of jurisdiction or law has to do with this measure, which covers three pages of printed matter, I cannot imagine. The mountain has laboured and has brought forth a mouse, but if it is at all valuable we will put it in the bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The mouse has remained in the statute books for the last thirty years.

Mr. HOWE: But not in this act.

My hon. friend went on to say that the government was doing nothing about building airports for post-war aviation. Perhaps I could give a few figures on that. For all civilian airports up to the beginning of the war, the federal government has spent $16,240,550.83. That is for the building of aerodromes and radio facilities, and that figure includes $3,707,310.52 in grants to assist municipalities. Since the war began, the government has invested in airfields and radio facilities the sum of $141,184,827.40. That does not include buildings but is simply for aerodromes and radio facilities. That amount has been expended on improving sixty-four aerodromes and bringing them up to the standard required for modern aviation, and in building 147 new aerodromes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many of these are used for war purposes?

Mr. HOWE: Practically all of them. There is no aerodrome in the country that has not been used at one time or another for war purposes. Practically all of them are used to-day for war purposes. My hon. friend suggests, on the authority of the aeronautical institute, that another $20 million for aerodromes would solve the whole problem of providing work for all the flyers overseas. That is the implication.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not say that.

Mr. HOWE: As I understood my hon. friend, twenty million dollars will provide 200 more aerodromes. That is a very reasonable price for aerodromes in this day and generation. Well, my experience is that the average aerodrome costs between $2 and $3 million. Perhaps we shall not place too much reliance on the figures put out by the Aeronautics Institute of Canada. It is not a representative body of Canadian aviation in any sense of the word. I do not know that I need to say anything further. Now that we have accepted this Conservative amendment in a spirit of cooperation, I hope that we shall get cooperation and perhaps get on with this bill.

Mr. ROWE: I do not wish to hold up the bill, but I do not agree with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and I am impressed with the excellent remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I think this bill strikes at the very root of one of the vital necessities for post-war employment, post-war development and progress in general. It strikes at the very heart of individual enterprise, freedom of vocation and all those old principles that the great party which now forms the government once stood for. In fact, I can well recall when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was criticized for defending the laissez-faire-ism that has characterized Liberalism in Canada for the last quarter of a century and up until quite recently.

Since we appear to be approaching the end of this gigantic struggle overseas, I can see no one line of activity in this dominion that offers newer and fresher opportunity for the recently developed skill and ingenuity of so many thousands of our boys who are to-day fighting overseas. It has often been said that, despite all the terrors and difficulties of war, we can make more progress in the five awful years of war than we sometimes can in fifty years of peace. It is unfortunate that we cannot speed up progress in time of peace. Like the mother of invention, necessity speeds it in war time. We have observed that in the two great wars of the last quarter of the century untold progress has been made. Whether it has been made from necessity, or from the marshalling of forces and the genius, skill and mentalities of all our people, it is not for me to say.

We find that this bill offers a curtailment. Indeed, it may well be accepted by many of our people as an indication of the trend of the times, a trend that may well be feared. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has well said, in time of war we accept certain regimentation; we are ready to endure certain restrictions. We are ready to accept and are, indeed, enduring licences to operate, licences to do business. We find that this bill passes the powers and prerogatives of the government on to the minister himself. I can think of no activity for which our young men would be more eager than civil aviation because of their experience in this war. I can think of no vocation that they would be more eager to enter into than the wide and great possibilities of air transportation in this dominion. From day to day we read in magazines what the helicopter will do and how it will be a subsidiary of the great Trans-Canada Air Lines. We can visualize the possibilities of the manufacture of those important modern airships, their servicing, the personnel to run them, and where it will fill in a great gap to encourage the consumption of manufactured goods to make up for the great destruction that is now taking the products of our toil.

The minister has said that he does not propose to allow the vigorous competition that we had in transportation systems of this country to continue. Since when, Mr. Chairman, has competition ceased to be the life of trade?

Mr. HOWE: Where do you find anything in this bill that stops competition?

Mr. ROWE: It is the prerogative of the minister to stop it or start it. This strange bill gives the minister power to grant licences. This bill gives him power to tell those who have a licence whether they can or cannot operate. The board of transport commissioners cannot do that; it is the minister. The minister has power to determine whether or not they can engage in business. If that does not prevent those who would like to go into this promising field of industrial activity from doing so, then I do not know what kind of bill could be passed that could frighten initiative any more. I consider that the minister could have improved this bill a great deal. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, I should like to see the minister reconsider some of these clauses. I should like him to reconsider the clause that says an appeal can be made only to the minister. It seems almost unnecessary to make provision for an appeal to the only person who can grant a licence. I realize that in the post-war period and in the period between war and peace the greatest caution must be exercised. I agree that we must have a board of commissioners. We must have a licence and a charter to operate a service, but it seems strange that only those who are prohibited in advance are those who are the most experienced in this operation.

We are told that the Trans-Canada Air Lines shall be given licences for any further routes that they may need in order to carry out their present agreements. If this is in keeping with the policy of enterprise and free individual initiative that my hon. friends have always proclaimed as their policy, I do not think any party or any government in this country has ever had a mandate from our people to change so fundamentally the principles of control over enterprise. It is true that we may have it in time of war, but we are here planning for peace time. I believe in the same old competition that was the lifeblood of trade all down through the years, rivalry, struggle and competition, whether it is with reference to the people in transportation or with reference to manufactured goods or to whatever it may be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Especially in the thirties.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend always harps back. I am not much concerned with those who live amid the antiquities of the past and dream of the old socialism that has come down through the years since Karl Marx. Evidently my hon. friend has no conception of what constitutes the lifeblood of industry in this country. I might refer my hon. friend to a period even farther back, during the last war, when the same line of thought which he and his party propound in this house seemed to capture the imagination of the Britishers, and they nationalized the coal mines. What happened? Under public ownership production dropped from 258 tons per man per year to 176 tons per man per year. They became alarmed when production steadily decreased under this government monopoly, as it might be called, and later on returned the coal mines to private industry, to those who had experience in operating them, and production went back up to 358 tons per year per man. But that experiment cost the government of Britain over $200,000,000.

I realize it may be said that this is not entirely a matter of public ownership, but at least it is a step in that direction. I do not know whether this step is being taken in view of the coming election. I know there are grumblings in the mulberry bushes these days, and much concern as to what might happen.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you in the bushes?

Mr. ROWE: No, but my hon. friend will be in the bushes after the next election. I am surprised that my old laissez-faire champions, who used to say, "We stand for free enterprise, for equal opportunities for all," are now, on the eve of an election, terrified by the signs of the times, entering into a shotgun marriage with those who would destroy industry and bring in public ownership all along the line. Under this bill the minister will be free to do whatever he pleases. Someone said this afternoon that the Minister of Munitions and Supply had been a capable engineer. That is very true, and I do not say this because he is not in the chamber at the moment; but before he became a member of this government he engineered some of the finest buildings in this country. He did so under individual enterprise and initiative, and built great monuments to his technique and skill. I am, however, surprised to find a bill like this coming from such a skilful engineer. The minister alone can issue licences, but the board which is to be set up can cancel them without his approval. The minister can indicate the companies that will get all the licences they wish, and he can indicate in advance the companies that will not get licences. He can say, "Those of you who have had experience in operating air lines must stay out of this," with the exception of one line. I hope this skilful engineer is not engineering a socialistic gesture toward my socialist friends to the left, because this bill offers very little encouragement or assurance to the maintenance of individual enterprise. Is this to be the encouragement offered to those who propose to develop the great resources of this country in order to provide employment for our people following this war? Is this to be the new doctrine, the new type of policy that is to encourage them? Are we to have a continuation of the present bureaucratic control? Are we to have a continuation of the restraint of trade, the regimentation, the licensing and so on? My hon. friend says that it is not a restraint of trade. Well, you might just as well restrain trade if you are going to restrain initiative.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Restraint of trade has always been the gospel of you and your party.

Mr. ROWE: Well, my hon. friend restrained some of it, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was your grand cure.

Mr. ROWE: I can well remember how trade was restrained during the regime of hon. members opposite. My hon. friends always like to go back to the thirties, but I am trying to point out what may happen in the fifties. As an hon. member behind me says, hon. gentlemen opposite are like infants crying in the night, crying with a small voice in the face of the coming election. Hon. members opposite are very good at pointing to the thirties, no matter what issue is under discussion. Let me take my hon. friends back a little farther, if they want to talk about the past. Go back to the years from 1921 to 1929, before some hon. gentlemen opposite were in this house. Why did the number of people leaving this country exceed the natural increase? Why did so many people from Canada settle in the United States during those years? Why should there be more people from the province of Quebec living in the New England states than are living in Quebec to-day? Why were hon. gentlemen opposite dusting off their old free trade doctrine? Why were they saying of other policies, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is saying to-night, "Because it is a Tory doctrine we shall have nothing to do with it." Why did they tinker with the tariff between elections, as they are starting to tinker with it again? Why should our artisans, our mechanics, the graduates of our universities, go to the United States, where they have remained until this day?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. This has nothing to do with civil aviation.

Mr. ROWE: I am only answering the questions that are put to me. If it is in order for hon. gentlemen opposite to utter gibes in relation to what happened ten years ago, surely I am in order when I remind them of what happened in the ten years before that. The great depression they are talking about did not follow immediately after the last war; it followed immediately after the regime of the Liberal government, from 1921 to 1929, when every elevator in the country was full of unsold grain, and when millions of people left this country looking for jobs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Civil aviation!

Mr. ROWE: It would take some aviation to find the men and women who left this country because you denied them opportunities at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What did you do in 1932?

Mr. ROWE: In 1932 we were cleaning up the mess you left in 1929, and I have no apologies to offer in that connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You ruined aviation for ten years.

Mr. ROWE: Throughout the world there were thirty million people idle in 1932, and what happened in other countries from that year until 1940? The people, who, were starving and on relief according to the hon. gentleman opposite, enjoyed a higher standard of living than many of those employed in other countries, as we pointed out. Following the war this country will offer great opportunities, in aviation and in industrial development generally, if only we keep our feet on the ground and bear in mind our great traditions, not alone those of this party but also those of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us give some hope to the man who is looking to the future; let us hold out some encouragement, some reward for individual endeavour, to the boy who is looking upward rather than down at the ground. Do not tell him in advance that because he knows how to handle an aeroplane he is not going to get a licence. Do not tell him in advance that while the minister can give him a licence, the board can cancel it. Do not tell him that you are not going to give him a licence for fear he may compete with someone else. After going through the conflict; after having grasped the opportunity to do his duty for his country; after having taken his chance and accepted the risk, he will come back here full of fire, of faith and of fight. He will realize that competition and healthy rivalry, yes, that the struggle involved in giving service to our people, are the very lifeblood of this country.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is where I came in.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says that is the right thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I said "This is where I came in."

Mr. ROWE: Yes; well, I will say that is where my hon. friend will go out. The people of this country, neither old nor young, will ever stand for that one big monopoly. If my hon. friend thinks some of our monopolies are too big now, what about the one big one he would bring about? Who is going to run it? It would seem that we are going to nationalize everything. Who will be the operator?

An hon. MEMBER: There will be no profit.

Mr. ROWE: We shall not need elections.

An hon. MEMBER: And what about the sheriff?

Mr. ROWE: Someone refers to the sheriff. Well, the sheriff may come in. He may come in before my hon. friends take over; and he will certainly come in in a national way after my friends have taken over.

I do not wish to speak at length, except to say that the principle of free enterprise, the old principle whereby a man hopes for a reasonable reward in return for his own efforts, is the thing that will bring this country back. We cannot pull ourselves up by our shoelaces. We cannot legislate ourselves out of competition. Why, you might as well legislate yourself out of circulation.

Hon. members in this chamber know about the development in the automobile industry. I do not expect that either they or I will see the time when the aeroplane will be as generally recognized as a way of travel as the automobile has been. But we do know that in the next few years many of our young men, who are now in the services, and who may have dreams, will try to fulfil those dreams. I have heard them say that they want to club together, to build up a few thousand dollars so that they can establish a company to give service into the north country.

As the hon. member for York South said this afternoon—

An hon. MEMBER: York West. You are getting all mixed up.

Mr. ROWE: And you have been mixed up most of the time since you have been here, and you have not been here long.

I can well recall being at Red Lake in 1936, and I recall the pride of those aeroplane operators, who risked their lives every day. The hon. member for Fort William would know some of them well. We know that since that time some have lost their lives. They were the men who risked their lives in those little, old wobbly planes. True, they were not very safe to ride in, but some of us risked riding in them. They twisted and squirmed, but they got to Red Lake. And those boys, with a sense of pride, referred to their trips to Red Lake. It made their chests swell with pride when they said, "There is more freight comes in here every day by air than is coming into any airport in the United States of America."

That is what has happened in that north country. And then my hon. friends to my left would say, "No; we will determine it by this parliament. We will get a group of politicians in the house to say whether or not we can go to certain points and find gold, or find ore that has mineral value in that great north country."

Again, as the hon. member for York West said, perhaps there were some who lost their money when they were taken in by air. But that was not the fault of the aeroplane; it was the fault of what they saw when they got there, or through their lack of good judgment.

But in the northern parts of Quebec, in the great Yellowknife district, and in the Northwest Territories—in all these areas where there are no railways, development would not have been as rapid, had it not been for the risks these men have taken, and the aeroplane service that has been provided.

Therefore I say I am opposed to the principle embodied in this bill, a bill bristling with domination by the minister, bristling with a continuation of regimentation which is so distasteful in a time of war, and certainly should never be perpetuated in peace time. I say this in all kindliness to the minister. Someone said to me that if there was to be a dictator it might as well be the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and I was inclined to agree with that, because, as I have said, he was a good engineer in some respects. And, if we have to be engineered. probably we might as well be engineered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply as by anyone else.

The people do not want this kind of bill. I do not believe they have ever voted for a bill of this kind. I do not believe they have ever been told before an election that we were going to put this great new enterprise into some new form of strait-jacket, and that we must leave to the minister the decision as to who shall or who shall not have air routes.

I must say, however, that I think the minister could and should amend this bill. He could amend it so that the board would function as does the board of transport commissioners. He could sit on a commission of that kind, and would not only add dignity, but give assistance. I think the minister should say that he will give a free chance to those who can give the assurance that they have the necessary funds and the necessary aircraft to carry passengers safely. If a group of young men ask for a permit, whether they favour the government or do not favour it; if they return from overseas and show by their skill and ingenuity, and what they have behind them, that they want to establish a route into some district, and want to develop the country and take the risk, then I say that there should be some rule under which there would be equality of opportunity for those men, in this great and promising enterprise of the future. Probably we in parliament might not have as great an imagination as those young men will have.

I do not believe the enterprise should be strangled to the point where we can say who can or who cannot enter into this type of development. Surely we can regulate matters so that, once they get into the air, they will not run into each other. Surely, if we can regulate at all, we can do that. I agree that we should not grant licences to people to carry our men, women and children in aircraft which would not stand up to any reasonable mechanical tests.

We shall not be short of men to operate aircraft. There will be thousands of them, even after taking account of those grand pilots who have been lost. We shall have thousands of men after this war who will be dreaming of taking their places in work of this kind. They will read this bill and say, "What does this mean? Does it mean that we cannot organize a company? Does it mean that we cannot get a licence? Does it mean that licences can be cancelled, at will? Does it mean that the Trans-Canada Air Lines can get anything they like to complete their service and monopolize the business? Does it mean that the Canadian National Railways, because they are experienced in transportation, and because they know something about air travel, should be eliminated? Does it mean that Canadian Pacific Air Lines must be eliminated?"

Mr. GARDINER: What do you think it means?

Mr. ROWE: I should like to hear what the Minister of Agriculture thinks it means? I would say that it means as much to free enterprise in the future as the Saskatchewan elections meant to the future possibilities of your party.

An hon. MEMBER: And yours.

Mr. GARDINER: Ours will still be living after yours is gone.

Mr. ROWE: I can say this, anyway, that we at least did not lose anything in Saskatchewan. However, it will be observed that ministers on the government benches are trying to divert the issue from the one before the Chair. I shall not detain the committee, but I say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, in conclusion, that I have spoken in all sincerity, and I have meant just what I have said.

Mr. GARDINER: What have you said?

Mr. ROWE: Well, the Minister of Agriculture cannot read the newspaper and listen to me at the same time. I say in all sincerity that this does smack of socialism. I have no apology to make for free enterprise. I know something about what has made this country what it is. I know what a day's work is. I know what it is to start from scratch. I have seen some of our best men start from scratch, as one might term it. I can see all these delightful young men and women, the finest generation that has ever been born in this dominion. Even though the best of them may be killed overseas, the rest will be better than we have ever been. I am thinking of their future, and I know they will want some room for their imagination, some room for their enterprise. They will not want to be strangled and strait-jacketed. They will not want it left to one man to define their course, to be master of their future interests instead of themselves.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions before the section carries. The first has to do with the position of United States air lines that may try to obtain permission to fly routes in Canada. As I read the bill, there is no restriction on any air line, whether it is Canadian or not, obtaining a licence, but of course all other transportation companies are prohibited from getting a licence. I wish to know if there is anything to prevent a United States company from applying for a licence to fly between two points in Canada. Personally I think it would be a great mistake if it could be done, but there are rumours that some United States air companies would like to do that and are laying their plans accordingly. I suggest that the minister should clear up that situation.

The next question has to do with the route from Canada to Australia and New Zealand. The prime ministers of those countries were here within the last few weeks, and I have no doubt there have been some developments with regard to air routes across the Pacific. The minister should tell us what he can of those developments. My understanding is that most of the flying in Australia is done by a shipping company. I was told that a few weeks ago by a leading civil servant from Australia and I ask the minister to correct me if I am wrong. I questioned this official very closely on that point and I do not think there is any doubt about it. There may be Canadian shipping companies on either coast that could set up and operate air routes in connection with their steamship lines.

Representations have been made about this bill which I think should be brought to the attention of the minister and the committee. I have here a bulletin dated May 30, 1944, issued by the air industries and transport association of Canada. It deals with various questions having to do with aviation. As the minister knows, the association is made up of all the air companies in Canada, including Trans-Canada Air Lines. The president this year is Mr. Noorduyn. The air transport companies which are members of the association are Trans-Canada Air Lines, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, Laurentian Air Services Limited, M. and C. Aviation Company Limited and Northern Airways Limited. The associate members are British Overseas Airways Corporation and United Air Lines Transport Corporation. There are also listed as members about one hundred companies having to do with the air industry or air transportation. These include companies building aeroplanes, parts and so on. I have not counted them, but there must be at least one hundred. I should like to quote from page four of the bulletin as follows:

Indications are that this new central authority is to be built up around the existing civil aviation division of the Department of Transport of which division the Minister of Munitions and Supply is the head.

True, this action will centralize all regulatory powers relating to air transport but from information available this board will be only an advisory body with final authority vested in the minister.

Those seven last words are underlined.

It will certainly not be the "central, free and independent authority" which the directors had in mind when they framed their resolution at the last annual meeting.

Apparently at the last annual meeting of this association a resolution was passed requesting that there be set up a central, free and independent authority. The bulletin goes on:

There is no change in the situation whereby the officials most concerned with the granting of licences are the deputy minister of transport and the director of air services, while the superintendent of air and land mail services is doubtless vitally concerned with the granting of air mail contracts. These gentlemen are all directors of the government owned air line, consequently it is little wonder that operators view this divided responsibility as being incompatible with a sense of impartial and disinterested treatment, particularly should there be a clashing of government and private interests.

This "central, free and independent government authority for civil aviation" should be established on the lines of the board of transport commissioners, which is an independent regulatory body whose rulings are binding and conclusive. Appeals from the rulings of the authority can be only to the supreme court on points of law and on points of fact to the governor in council.

Such independence alone can engender in the minds of operators the feeling that applications for air transport licences, prompted by present and future public convenience and necessity, will be considered equitably and on their merits.

That is a representation which merits the most careful consideration by the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend believe it is good government to delegate governmental responsibility to independent boards?

Mr. GREEN: I have taken the stand from the start that this board should be a judicial board of the same type as the board of transport commissioners. On that the minister and I appear to disagree. I think he is wrong and I have no doubt he thinks I am wrong. I propose to read also a copy of a telegram from the Vancouver board of trade to the Prime Minister, dated June 28, 1944. I think the Vancouver board of trade has over two thousand members. It is strictly non-political; members of all political parties belong to it. The president last year or the year before was one of the leading Liberals in British Columbia, a former member of the provincial house. The telegram reads:

Regarding bill one thirty three an act to amend the Aeronautics Act. We endorse principle of an air transport board but respectfully suggest section seven be amended to read five members instead of three for reason that Pacific coast should be recognized on board by one representative. Sections nine and ten and twelve should provide for appeal from board to governor in council instead of minister. Further we recommend that section twelve be amended by placing full responsibility in board for issue of licences. We further recommend that appeal in subsection ten of section twelve should be from board to governor general in council. Cannot stress too strongly principle that control of powers outlined in bill should be in hands governor general in council rather than minister.

On the coast we are particularly concerned about having an independant board to rule on these questions. I have also a copy of a letter, which I do not propose to read, from the Montreal board of trade to the Prime Minister.

Mr. HOWE: It has been this way for fifty years. When the railroad propaganda machine rolls, every board of trade and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association snaps into line.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is going too far in that statement. I do not know anything about the Montreal board of trade, but I do not think he is right about that body. This letter is signed by the President, Henry G. Birks, one of the most responsible and finest of Canadian citizens. I do not think either he or his council can be charged with speaking for any interest. They wrote to the Prime Minister on July 4 setting out in great detail and, in my opinion, logically, suggestions with regard to this bill, and if the minister has not seen that letter I would suggest that he go over it very carefully.

So far as the Vancouver board of trade is concerned, I strongly resent the statement of the minister. He said that all boards of trade—and that covers men in every city and town of Canada and some of the most responsible men in every city and town—always speak for the railways or for some interest, or words to that effect.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister for his own sake should make clear that he spoke out of turn when he said that, because he is absolutely wrong and it is maligning a group of men who are among the finest citizens of this country. They have done wonderful work on behalf of Canada and are doing it every day of the week.

So much for those representations. I have no doubt that there have been many other representations made by responsible bodies across Canada, and I suggest to the minister that this bill should be given further consideration. The minister and I both came into the house together, having been elected in 1935. As someone has said, the minister is a great engineer, and I think he has made a great success of many of the things that he has undertaken here, but I have noticed that several times this house has been asked to rush through some bill for the minister giving him the widest possible authority, giving him, in fact, a blank cheque, which is what this very bill does; then in a year or two the minister finds that it was a mistake, that everything is wrong and he comes back with another bill which we have to rush through for him. That is exactly what happened with the Transport Act; much the same thing happened with the provision for agreed charges; it was forced through the house. Such procedure is not good enough. Nobody is perfect, not even on this side of the house. The minister makes mistakes too, and in this bill I think he has made several mistakes. I suggest in all earnestness that he give the bill further consideration in view of the suggestions and representations which have been made respecting it. It might still be possible to introduce a bill this session which would meet with the approval of all sides of the house. I would ask the minister to answer the two questions I have asked.

Mr. HOWE: I have explained to the committee several times the procedure with regard to applications from citizens of other countries. If an air line in the United States wishes to operate between points in Canada or between a point in the United States and some point in Canada, it must first go to the civil aeronautics board of its own country and file an application for the route with its own board.

Mr. GREEN: Even if it were flying between two Canadian points?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. We do not deal with the nationals of other countries. That is by international agreement. If any United States air line wishes to fly in Canada, it must first go to its own aeronautics board and obtain a certificate of necessity and approval of the route.

Mr. GREEN: What right would any United States board have to issue approval of a route between two points in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Simply the right we have conferred upon them to designate the nationals of their country who have sound reasons for flying over a route in Canada.

Mr. JAQUES: Who is "we"?

Mr. HOWE: What kind of question is that?

Mr. JAQUES: You said "we" have conferred upon them. I am wondering who is "we".

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian government, the people of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: The people of Canada do not do it. It must be some governmental authority.

Mr. HOWE: I have explained the procedure four or five times, but perhaps the hon. member does not follow the proceedings very closely. The international agreement to which I refer has been tabled, and my hon. friend could clear up the point by having the Clerk produce the agreement for him.

Mr. GREEN: Does not that regulation apply only for a route from a United States point to a Canadian point?

Mr. HOWE: No. I can assure my hon. friend that we do not accept applications from other nationals. That is covered by international agreement.

Mr. GREEN: Is there anything to prevent a United States company from setting up a subsidiary in Canada which would apply for a licence and be permitted to operate in that way?

Mr HOWE: If they are permitted to incorporate a Canadian company, and the company has Canadian personnel and Canadian pilots, I presume they could do it. But the directors must be Canadian citizens, and seventy-five per cent of the stock must be owned in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: What act is that provision in?

Mr. HOWE: It is under the regulations of the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. GREEN: Should that not be in this bill?

Mr. HOWE: It is not desirable to print all the regulations in the act. The provision is just as effective if it is in a regulation. Under the act regulations can be drawn, and regulations are sometimes amended by international agreement.

Mr. GREEN: Should not the stock be owned 100 per cent instead of only seventy-five per cent in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: It happens to be seventy-five per cent. It is reciprocal. If my hon. friend is interested in the wording of the regulation, it reads as follows:

> No aircraft shall be registered in Canada unless (a) it is a civil aircraft owned by a British subject or subjects or by a company or corporation created or incorporated under and subject to the laws of any part of His Majesty's dominions, of which the president and two-thirds or more of the directors and other managing officers thereof are British subjects and in which at least seventy-five per centum of the voting interest is owned or controlled by British subjects, or unless (b) it is a civil aircraft owned by His Majesty in the right of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada or of any other of His Majesty's dominions.

Mr. GREEN: Is that point not very apt to come up after the war when the Americans are trying to expand their flying?

Mr. HOWE: The international agreement between Canada and the United States can be amended only by mutual consent, and it is not likely to be seriously amended. The approach from a United States corporation must be through the civil aeronautics board of the United States to the state department of the United States, then to the Department of External Affairs of Canada, and then the application would be in a position to be considered by the proper authorities in Canada, which in future will be the air transport board —if I ever succeed in passing this amendment.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister answer my other question about Australia?

Mr. HOWE: The airway service that operates all externally, so far as I know, is the Quantus Airways which are owned jointly, I believe, by certain interests in Australia and by Overseas Airways. Quantus Airways is not, so far as I know, associated with any shipping company. In any event it is purely an air company, of which Overseas Airways, which is the chosen instrument of the Briitsh government, owns forty-nine per cent of the stock.

Mr. GREEN: There is no restriction in Australia against any transportation company engaging in the aircraft business.

Mr. HOWE: That may be so, but, so far as I know, no shipping company or railway company in Australia operates aircraft.

Some hon. member opposite mentioned the fact that there are internal air lines in Britain in which the railways have an interest. I think it is only an interest; whether a majority or minority interest I do not know. Furthermore, it is an association of railways rather than any one railway that has the investment. I am thinking of Scottish aviation. Civil aviation in England is not as extensive as it is in the maritime provinces; it is a very small operation. All aviation outside the British empire is operated by the chosen instrument of the government, which has no railway or shipping interest.

Mr. ADAMSON: One more question with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company divesting themselves of any interest in air lines. Take an operation such as Consolidated Smelting. They would very likely want to establish an air line to service their outlying property, let us say, up in the Yellowknife district, to service their mine. Consolidated Smelting and Refining, I understand, is certainly affiliated with, if not controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Would they be allowed under the regulations to operate an airway or not, irrespective of the fact that they happened to be primarily a mining operation? I foresee in the future a great number of operators who will be primarily engaged in one line, but who will wish to operate an air line on the side for their own and possibly for the public service as well.

Mr. HOWE: Any mining or other company can operate a service for the carrying of their own goods. There is no difficulty about that under the act, and there never has been; nor is there any difficulty under this bill. If, however, they wish to be common carriers and to accept carriage for hire they come under this bill. The question whether Consolidated Smelting and Refining is a railway operation could be looked into and a decision made when the question was raised. The provision is not a definite prohibition. It is a prohibition restricted in the public interest, and if it is in the public interest for Consolidated Smelters to operate an air line I have no doubt the permit will be issued.

There is nothing in the bill to make it impossible for the board so to recommend or for the minister so to act.

Mr. ADAMSON: I foresee the possibility of their operating a line for their own service and a community growing up, as there is now in the Yellowknife district, and the Consolidated company being asked to provide a service for the benefit of the remote community up there, so that they would become common carriers as well as a company carrier. That has happened in the past, and it is the sort of thing I foresee in the future.

Mr. HOWE: If the transport board should recommend such an operation in the public interest, there is nothing in the bill to make it impossible.

Mr. GREEN: They would have to get the permission of the governor in council.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—"Minister" defined.

Mr. GREEN: Why is this special provision made in this section:

> In this part, unless the context otherwise requires, "minister" means the Minister of Transport or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate, except that in any matter relating to defence, "minister" means the Minister of National Defence for Air.

The Minister of Transport is not even here to-day and has not had anything whatever to do with this bill since it has been before the house. Why is that?

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend want me to go over again the explanation I have made at least twelve times? If he is putting on a filibuster, let him say so.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know why that provision is put in exactly in that way, "or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate"? How long is it intended that this measure shall be administered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply rather than by the Minister of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: As long as the governor in council so decides.

Mr. GREEN: If that is the plan, why does it not so appear in the bill? Why does the bill not name the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and let the governor in council designate somebody else when the time comes? Why is the section worded in the way it is?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Mr. GREEN: No; I want an answer.

Mr. HOWE: This act for many years was administered by the Minister of National Defence. For reasons connected with the war it is now administered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It is a temporary situation which I have explained to the committee many times, and I do not intend to explain it again to-night, much as I should like to cooperate with my hon. friend and not delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: The minister must not think—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GREEN: I am rising to a point of order. The minister has no right to leave that inference, that I am not sincere in the questions I ask on this bill. I have meant everything I have said. I do not intend to delay the bill and he has no right to make such a statement. He flies off the handle nearly every time he is crossed in the house; he rarely fails to do so, but he has no right to make a statement of that type.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is well aware that it is a matter of the transfer of duties. There is a statute of this parliament which permits the Prime Minister to transfer the duties of any minister to any other minister. Under that act he has a perfect right to allocate the administration of this act to any minister of his government, and this bill simply acknowledges that fact.

Mr. GREEN: Then why does it contain the words I have quoted?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question he must rise in his place.

Mr. GREEN: Well, I will rise. I want to know why these words are inserted in the section, "or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate". If there is power to do it under the other act to which the minister has referred, why are these words inserted here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the phraseology used in all the bills that have been passed in the last two weeks. It is purely a matter of legal draftsmanship.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that the Minister of Munitions and Supply shall administer this bill until the end of the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Possibly that might be one implication of it.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking the Minister of Munitions and Supply whether that is the intention.

Mr. HOWE: Government policy will be made known in due course.

Mr. GREEN: I doubt it. It has not always been.

Mr. KNOWLES: I trust it is not necessary for me to dissociate myself from the suggestion that any attempt is being made to delay the passage of the bill. After all, it has been referred to by my hon. friends as having socialist possibilities, and I should like to see it get through. However, I would ask a question with reference to the last two lines of this clause. I agree that the wording there is desirable, "except that in any matter relating to defence, 'minister' means the Minister of National Defence for Air." There is a question in my mind arising out of something that was implanted there when the Minister of National Defence for Air made a statement several months ago. On the basis of what he said I put some questions on the order paper and they were answered on June 1, of this year, at page 3418 of Hansard. I asked about the operation by the Royal Canadian Air Force of air transport service for its own use or for any other purposes. There is a considerable amount of information given at the page I have indicated that I need not bother to read to the committee. My last question was as follows:

> Is it intended to continue the operation of such a service, in whole or in part, after the war?

The answer given by the Department of National Defence for Air to the question was:

> No present intention.

Does the minister know whether government policy is sufficiently straightened out on this point that there will not be any confusion as between whatever department operates this bill and the Department of National Defence for Air so far as civilian air transport services are concerned?

Mr. HOWE: There is no possibility of confusion. The Aeronautics Act which this bill is amending is a complete act in itself. This is an amendment to an exsting act. There are certain clauses in the Aeronautics Act which refer to responsibilities of the Department of National Defence: first, to cooperate with the officers of that department on all questions relating to the air defence of Canada; second, to cooperate with air staffs and authorities or other governments or countries for all purposes pertaining to air services. These are matters that come within the scope of the Department of National Defence, and in these matters the Minister of National Defence is naturally the minister under this act.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it will be only with respect to those matters?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Repeal.

Mr. GREEN: Are the sections and subsections that are repealed reenacted in full in the bill?

Mr. HOWE: They are reenacted in part III of this amendment.

Mr. GREEN: Have they been changed at all?

Mr. HOWE: There are some small changes, yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

Section 6—part II—new section 6 agreed to.

On section 6—part II—new section 7—Air transport board.

Mr. BOUCHER: We should consider the implications of this section before it carries. In effect this section sets up a board of three members with extensive powers, subject, of course, to the minister. This board will hold office during good behaviour for ten years, the first three members being appointed for periods of ten, nine and eight years. I think it is wise to give a considerable degree of permanency to the members of this board, but we are living in peculiar times. The boys who are and will be interested in civil aviation are now overseas. I should like to point out to the minister that this board should not be appointed for so long a time as this bill contemplates. We are going through a transition period. Our best skilled personnel, from the point of view of both transportation and management are now overseas. They are engaged in work that will qualify them better than any other individuals for this particular work. Events are taking place to-day which may change the whole aspect of civil transportation within the next few years. Because of that I think the minister should reconsider the length of time during which this first board will hold office. I realize that there may be difficulty in getting the right type of men to act. I agree that they should be given time to grow into their jobs and that there should be considerable permanency in their appointments. But because of the abnormal conditions through which we are passing, and because air transportation is in its infancy and the men best skilled to do this work are serving overseas acquiring the knowledge that will fit them to do this work, we should leave the door open so that the personnel of this board may be composed of men who are otherwise engaged at the present time. I believe that we should not postpone it for ten, nine and eight years. Ten years is a long time in the life of an airman and the war veterans who will come back and who may have an opportunity to take these responsible jobs. We should keep every possible channel open for the men who have served in the air force during this war, men who have had experience in air transportation matters and in managerial positions. When they come back they should be given an opportunity of obtaining the very best jobs there are in civil transportation. I would urge the minister to cut down the period of ten, nine and eight years to at least five, four and three years in order to give those men that opportunity. I would go so far as to say three, two and one year, but that would be only a guess as to the length of the war. I am giving that as an illustration to exhort the minister not to appoint this board for as long a time as this bill contemplates. Might I have an opinion on this matter?

Mr. HOWE: Very careful consideration has been given to the problem. The term is the same as the term of the members of the board of transport commissioners. The purpose of the board is to build up a jurisprudence, and to obtain the assistance of experienced men in developing an air transport policy for Canada. It is the view of the government that this board should have permanency in order that it may be a permanent guide to an air transport policy for Canada. I can assure my hon. friend that men overseas with suitable experience will be fully considered, in fact are being fully considered for appointment to this board. The work requires a vast background of experience, and a highly developed technical training in order to give the type of service that we wish. These are not political jobs, not jobs to hand out because you like a person. They are jobs that require intensive training, and I can assure my hon. friend that in the making of the appointments the qualifications of those overseas will be very carefully examined.

[Mr. Boucher.]

Mr. BOUCHER: May I point out to the minister that I can see the reason for having the very best personnel possible free from political preference. I would not impugn a thing like that to a board of this kind. I trust it would not get down to that. The experience of the type of man we should like to have on this board has been expanding daily within the last month, and will go on during the war in the Pacific which may follow. If we appoint men with the experience of to-day, we shall be excluding men whose knowledge and experience are improving from day to day. If we appoint this board for ten, nine and eight years, it will exclude those young men who are to-day gaining experience from holding these jobs during the efficient period of their young lives. Our personnel may entirely change within the next two, three or four years, and we may find ourselves in a position where we are at least duty bound or morally bound, having appointed men to the board for ten, nine and eight years, to keep them there, although we may have others more fit and worthy and more capable of holding the appointments. We shall not be able to hold out to our boys who are acquiring experience to-day over the battlefields any hope of reaching this office. I think it is a mistake to make these appointments for such long periods of time at the very beginning. I appreciate the fact that once the board is established, once we change over to civil aviation instead of military aviation, the situation will be different, and then perhaps ten years will not be too long a term. I think, however, we should leave the door open for new appointments, after the board is first set up.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have not taken any part at all in this discussion, although there are many features I should like to have cleared up. I agree with the hon. member for Carleton that the initial appointments are for too long. It seems to me that eight, nine and ten years is too long to appoint these men, from the very first. I believe that it is always a good thing for a body of this kind to have new blood from time to time, or at least that those appointed in the first instance, having proved their worth and shown that they possessed the confidence of the country, might be reappointed. I feel very strongly that the members of this board should not be appointed for these long periods. I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, that the initial appointments should be for three, four and five years, or even three, seven and ten years, so that new appointments or reappointments may be made in due course. I believe that would strengthen the board and give it more confidence in its work. On its merits I believe that is a good suggestion.

Mr. HOWE: In order to stop the argument and get on with our work, I am willing to accept the last suggestion and make it four, seven and ten years.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should like to say a further word on that point. My principal thought was that we should leave the door open for the appointment of deserving and efficient men returning from the war. As we consider civil aviation in the future, whether or not it be as extensive as we may hope, it seems to me that we might even leave the way open to increasing the membership of the board in order that those who have done such valiant work in the field of military aviation may be able to hold the highest office we are able to give them here at home in the field of civil aviation, and so that we may be able to take advantage of the great experience that will be available when the war is over. That might be done later on; I offer it as a suggestion. I feel that in perhaps two years time men may return to Canada with greater experience than that possessed by those already appointed to the board, and we should be able to take advantage of that experience without having to come to parliament to amend the act.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I appreciate the willingness of the minister to accept my suggestion, but I would suggest that the first appointment be for a shorter term, say—

Mr. HOWE: I accepted my hon. friend's first proposal; now is this to start all over again? If you are going to change your position I may have to change mine.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if the minister will advise the Chair what change he is accepting.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, Mr. Chairman; I shall have the amendment written out.

Mr. GREEN: Before the amendment is moved I should like to know on what basis the members of the board are to be appointed. Is there to be any attempt to have representation from the different areas of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: Earlier in the evening I read a telegram from the Vancouver board of trade asking that one representative be appointed from the Pacific area. If that should be done, I presume there would have to be one from the prairies, one from Ontario, one from Quebec and one from the maritimes.

Mr. HOWE: That would mean a larger board.

Mr. GREEN: After all, the problems in the various parts of Canada are quite different. I know on the Pacific coast we feel that we do not always get the proper treatment from a board on which there is not a representative who understands our situation, and I have no doubt the same thing applies to the maritimes. I believe the board of transport commissioners is set up on the basis I have suggested, with representation from the different parts of Canada, so that I would ask if it would not be possible to have some similar arrangement made in regard to this board.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that the board is only advisory, and I should think the government would have representation from British Columbia. It is certain that will be the case if this government is returned, although if my hon. friends should happen to be the government I think it would be very doubtful. In any event the final decision is made by the government, which is in a position to see that no sectional injustice is committed.

Mr. GREEN: The minister himself is responsible for the fact that we are in this position, because one minute he says it is an advisory board and the next minute he says it is a judicial board. Apparently it is really an advisory board.

Mr. HOWE: It is an advisory board in executive matters and a judicial board in matters of law. Surely the law does not change very much as between the west and the east.

Mr. GREEN: Well, even on an advisory board there should be representatives from different parts of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is thinking now of an advisory council, is he not?

Mr. GREEN: No. These three men should not all be from Ottawa, for instance. It would be absolutely wrong to set up the board on that basis. It should be composed of men who understand the problems of the different parts of Canada. Is it not the intention to make some attempt to get men from different parts of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: We are going to get men of very broad experience and wide knowledge of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: There is another point in regard to the sittings of the board. Is this board to hold sittings in different parts of Canada, or is it to be in Ottawa all the time?

The board of transport commissioners sits in the various provinces, and that is very beneficial; it makes it so much easier for us to present our cases; for municipalities and other bodies to make their representations. Is this board to do anything like that; or is it to be merely an advisory board sitting here in Ottawa?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if the minister will advise the chair now as to what is to be the amendment?

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move that new section 7, subsection (2), be amended by striking out the words "ten, nine and eight" in line 24 and substituting therefor the words "ten, seven and four."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. HAZEN: All you have to do is replace the words "nine and eight"; you do not need to strike out the word "ten" and put the same word back in.

Mr. BOUCHER: I appreciate the minister's willingness to accept our suggestion, but I do not think the change is quite good enough yet. After all is said and done, this will mean only one new appointment. I should think it would be much better to say five, four and three years, because it may be three years before this board becomes really efficient.

Mr. HOWE: I accepted the proposal from the Progressive Conservative party, the only definite proposal given. I suggest that you might hold a caucus over there and see what you really want.

Mr. BOUCHER: It was not the only definite proposal made, if I may disagree with the minister, because I mentioned five, four and three before the hon. member for Cumberland spoke. Let us be fair about it.

Mr. HOWE: I accepted the more mature udgment.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister accepted the ast proposal made, because I had made two before the hon. member for Cumberland made the third. We might as well be fair and square about this, and not talk about a caucus.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with the suggestion of the hon. member for Cumberland?

Mr. BOUCHER: My suggestion and my argument were to the effect that the period should be reduced considerably for the first term, in order to let the soldier who has been doing his part, have an opportunity to serve.

[Mr. Green.]

He may be incapacitated to some extent, but might make an admirable appointee to the position. I appreciate that the reduction made in the amendment is a start. But let us give it due consideration, and not pass it hurriedly by accepting a suggestion quickly. Let us go all the way so that the soldier may do his part in a practical way.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not answer my question with respect to sittings of the board.

Mr. HOWE: Surely we must give the board jurisdiction to set up its programme. I am not a member of the board, nor do I ever expect to be. But I would expect that it would attend the ordinary functions as followed by boards of this kind, and would hold hearings in various parts of Canada. We find that section 9 states:

> Subject to the directions of the minister, the board shall from time to time make investigations and surveys relating to the operation and development of commercial air services in Canada and relating to such other matters in connection with civil aviation as the minister may direct.

Mr. GREEN: The intention is that there shall be sittings?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to say a word with respect to subsection 7 of section 7. The marginal note reads: "Independence of members of the board." I do not think the section is worded so that it makes for complete independence of board members. It states:

> No member of the board shall either directly or indirectly engage in manufacturing or selling aircraft or in the transport of goods or passengers by aircraft for hire or reward—

I find no fault with that wording. Then it continues:

> —and no member of the board shall be a shareholder, member, director or partner of any company, association or firm engaged in manufacturing or selling aircraft or in the transport of goods or passengers by aircraft for hire or reward.

I do not object to that either, so far as it goes; but it seems to me there should be some additional wording inserted in that subsection. I say it should state that no member of the board shall either directly or indirectly sell any goods or hire any property or render any service to the board for reward. As the section now reads, a member of the board could sell material to that board, or he could hire out articles or property to it.

Or, if he were an engineer or a lawyer, he might render services and send in a bill. I do not think that should be permitted, and in my view the section should be amended by covering the point I have raised.

Mr. HOWE: It would be just as reasonable to suggest that no member of the board of transport commissioners should sell materials to the railways. I do not think there is any such provision in the Transport Act.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know what it says.

Mr. HOWE: This is a full-time, long-term job in the public service. I would say that the regulations in respect of the public service would apply to these men. It would be drastic to cover every improper act, and to specify it in this measure.

Mr. HAZEN: Then why put in anything? Why say that no member of the board shall either indirectly or directly engage in manufacturing or selling aircraft? Why not leave that out?

Mr. HOWE: That has been borrowed from the other act.

Mr. HAZEN: If they are to be absolutely independent, as they should be, then I say they should be prohibited from carrying on any business dealings of any kind; and the section does not so provide.

Mr. HOWE: These men are full-time employees of the government. They are not supposed to have any other business. I think, if we were to write in this measure everything a man could not properly do when serving His Majesty on a full-time job, we would have a most voluminous piece of legislation. What a man can or cannot do is well understood.

Mr. HAZEN: Only a few words would be required to make the necessary correction. Why write in anything?

Mr. HOWE: It was very carefully drafted by the Department of Justice, and I think it is all right.

Mr. HAZEN: Then, why put in anything?

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister surely appreciates that this section is passed as a means of preventing a man from bringing in some other financial interest, to mix with his judicial and executive capacity as a member of the board. An integral part of such a position would be that he shall not sell or hire or take advantage of his position. What has been said has not been directed toward his qualifications.

I think the hon. member has struck the nail on the head. The section beats around the bush. The very substance of the matter is to prevent a person from using his previous employment for personal advantage, to the detriment of the board of which he may be a member. This section should be worded to cover a condition of that kind. I think there is a very strong reason why the motive of the section should be made more clear. There should be a prohibition against the commercial use of a man's earlier obligations and entanglements. The minister would be wise to take this matter into consideration and have the section amended in a proper way, instead of circling around it.

Mr. HAZEN: As I see it, we might use the words, "No member of the board shall sell any goods, or hire out any property, or render any service to the board for reward; and no member of the board shall be a shareholder, member, director or partner of any company, association or firm selling any goods or hiring out any property or giving any service to the board for reward."

Mr. HOWE: The board is not in business; it buys nothing and sells nothing. It is advisory to the minister. It seems perfectly nonsensical that such a provision should be inserted, when the only thing a member could sell would probably be pencils and stationery—and even those come from the king's printer. We should not be absurd about this.

Mr. GREEN: What salaries are to be paid to members of the board?

Mr. HOWE: The measure says they will be fixed by order in council.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give any idea of the salaries?

Mr. HOWE: That has not been considered.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has not answered my question with regard to an air route from Canada to Australia and New Zealand. Can he give us any further information on that?

Mr. HOWE: It is being considered.

Mr. GREEN: There is no further announcement to be made.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6—part II—new section 8 agreed to.

On section 6—part II—new section 9—Investigation and surveys.

Mr. GREEN: I should imagine that in connection with investigation and surveys assistance by way of technical help and engineers would be required. Can the minister say what plans he has in mind in that connection?

Mr. HOWE: The air services branch of the Department of Transport has highly trained technicians who could assist the board, and doubtless the board will be able to obtain any technical assistance it needs from within the department.

Mr. GREEN: Is the board not to have technical assistance of its own?

Mr. HOWE: If necessary, but it is not believed it will be necessary. The board is more a planning board. If technical work is to be done, the resources of the department will be at hand.

Mr. GREEN: It is not intended to have experts working directly under the board?

Mr. HOWE: It is possible, but not probable.

Section agreed to.

Section 6—part II—new section 10 agreed to.

On section 6—part II—new section 11—Regulations.

Mr. HOWE: I am suggesting that this section be amended by inserting the following as paragraph (i) after paragraph (h):

Prescribe maximum hours and other working conditions for pilots and co-pilots employed by any air carrier.

The remaining paragraphs will be relettered (j), (k) and (l).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. KNOWLES: The amendment seems to be one that will be particularly welcome. There does not seem to be much chance of this bill being completed to-night, and I wonder if the minister would allow this to stand as a notice so that it may be dealt with the next time the bill is in committee.

Mr. HOWE: I was hopeful that the bill would pass, because unfortunately I must be away on business next week. It is a simple amendment I am proposing, which permits the board to make specific regulations to deal with working hours for pilots and co-pilots.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am with the minister in his desire to get this bill through, but there might be employees other than pilots and co-pilots to be considered. What about groundcrews and other employees?

Mr. HOWE: Those are subject to the Department of Labour. Piloting is more a profession than a craft, although there is a pilots' association.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a question of safety.

Mr. HOWE: There are security matters to be considered. The other employees of an air company would ordinarily have a union agreement. In fact such employees have union agreements with the management already.

Mr. GREEN: This section brings up many different points. Even if it were carried before eleven o'clock there is no possible chance that section 12 would be carried to-night. I suggest that the section be left over in order that we may consider this change in section 11.

Mr. KNOWLES: While this amendment is being considered, I should like to call the minister's attention to another matter. This section sets out the specific types of regulations which the board may make. In looking through the Railway Act, I find that sections 316 to 347 set out the specific powers of the board of transport commissioners to prohibit discriminatory practices so far as rates and other matters are concerned. The sections in the Railway Act are quite specific. A company cannot give undue preference or discriminate against customers, nor can it do anything that is prejudicial. There is a great list of things that the railway companies must not do in the way of discriminatory practices. The question of the control of free transportation is referred to in the act. In fact, it is here that I find that members of parliament are accorded passes on the railways. I am not stressing the point, but it may be that some of us may hope to get the odd trip on the T.C.A. I am asking the minister if it would not be desirable to grant some power to this board so that it may prevent discriminatory or unfair practices on the part of the air lines.

Mr. HOWE: It is the intention that a provision of that type will be included in the regulations. The purpose of the amendment to the act is to permit the aeronautics board to build up its own jurisprudence, just as the board of transport commissioners has built up jurisprudence over the years. In 1938 we attempted to apply the regulations that had been built up for the railroads to transport by air, and we arrived at some absurd situations. I could mention several that were quite proper under railroad operation, but which did not apply to air. Purposely we have not attempted to tie the hands of the board, but rather we have intended to give the board the power to make provisions applicable to the air.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think I sense what the minister is saying, but I would call his attention to the fact that the Railway Act contains specific provisions.

Mr. HOWE: We could write in the regulation about passes, but that does not apply to transport by air. You simply cannot carry free passengers by air.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could you not have a short clause which would give the board power to make regulations of that kind, or is there a clause hidden in the bill which I have not seen?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will notice that paragraph (k) provides that the board may make regulations providing for the effective carrying out of the provisions of this part. That is an omnibus clause that allows the board to pass anything it likes.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 10, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SIXTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What was the total amount subscribed to the sixth victory loan?
2. What was the total amount subscribed by each province?
3. What was the total number of subscribers, and what was the amount subscribed by those on the special names' list?
4. What was the total number and total amount subscribed by others?
5. What was the total cost of handling and servicing the loan, (a) commissions; (b) other payments to individuals for services rendered; (c) printing; (d) newspaper and periodical advertising; (e) radio advertising, and (f) other expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. $1,407,576,650.

2.

Prince Edward Island	$ 3,394,700
Nova Scotia	40,401,900
New Brunswick	30,624,050
Quebec	403,935,450
Ontario	647,376,550
Manitoba	73,748,550
Saskatchewan	37,977,600
Alberta	46,651,500
British Columbia	107,475,550
Newfoundland	2,607,250
Overseas	13,383,550
Total	$1,407,576,650

The above figures are based upon point of origin of applications.

3. Total number of subscriptions, 3,077,123. Total amount subscribed by those on the special names' list, $763,885,950.

4. Total amount subscribed by general canvass and payroll savings canvass, $643,690,700.

5. The total cost of the sixth victory loan will not be known until all amounts have been received. As at May 31, 1944, expenses charged to sixth victory loan aggregate $3,829,927.82, divided as follows:— (a) commissions, $286,-090.75; (b) salaries and living and travelling expenses, $873,754.14; (c) printing and stationery, $39,190.60; (d) publicity and advertising excluding radio advertising, $501,565.86; (e) radio advertising, $15,975.70; (f) other expenses, $2,113,350.77. Total, $3,829,927.82.

GOLD RESERVES

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Are any gold reserves held by the chartered banks of Canada as backing for their currency?
2. Are any gold reserves held by the Bank of Canada as backing for its currency?
3. Have the gold reserves been transferred to the foreign exchange control board? If so, when?
4. Is this gold held at the present time by the foreign exchange control board?
5. If gold reserves are held by the foreign exchange control board, what connection with or control does the Bank of Canada have over it?
6. If gold reserves are held by the foreign exchange control board, what connection with or control does the federal government have over it?
7. Who is the actual owner of this gold?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.
2. No.
3. Yes, May 1, 1940.
4. Section 10(1) of the Exchange Fund Act, chapter 60 of the statutes of Canada, 1935, provides—

"No person employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Bank of Canada shall communciate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto under the provisions of this act or by direction of the minister, any information with respect to the operation of the said special account, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement with respect to the said account."

5. The Bank of Canada was appointed technical adviser to the foreign exchange control board under the foreign exchange control order.

and by agreement with the board is authorized to act as agent or banker for the board and to deal in foreign exchange and otherwise assist or act on behalf of the board. (Section 4(1) of the foreign exchange control order). The governor of the Bank of Canada is chairman of the foreign exchange control board.

6. The foreign exchange control board is a government agency operating under the supervision of the Minister of Finance, subject to the provisions of section 5 of the Exchange Fund Act, and unless otherwise ordered by the Minister of Finance in writing, all moneys in the special account referred to in section 4 of the said act, and investments of such moneys, shall be at the disposal of the board and may be used or dealt with by the board as the board may deem necessary, or as the Minister of Finance may direct, for the purposes of the Exchange Fund Act or the foreign exchange control order, including the payment of any expenses or losses of the board and the acquisition or disposition of foreign exchange, and all receipts or profits of the board shall be placed in the said special account. (Section 5(2) of the foreign exchange control order).

7. The government of Canada.

MOBILIZATION ACT—DISCHARGES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men following enrolment under the National Resources Mobilization Act were discharged in each of the months of April, May and June, 1944?

2. Of these, how many were discharged, (a) on physical grounds, and (b) for compassionate reasons?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. April—according to documents received at the records office up to July 5, 1944—1,125; May—according to documents received at the records office up to July 5, 1944—1,003; June—estimated—1,000.

2. April—of the 1,125 men discharged, 712 were discharged medically unfit and 24 on compassionate grounds; May—of the 1,003 men discharged, 651 were discharged medically unfit and 17 on compassionate grounds; June—of the estimated number of 1,000 men discharged, it is estimated that 650 were discharged medically unfit and 15 on compassionate grounds.

Note: Figures for the month of June have been estimated to allow for the proportion of documents pertaining to that month still outstanding at July 5, 1944.

The figures given above relate to all men enrolled under the National Resources Mobilization Act since the act came into operation; but do not include discharges of men enrolled who subsequently enlisted for general service in the army.

SUBSIDIES TO BEDDING INDUSTRY

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What percentage of claims for subsidy payments made upon the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, by the bedding industry, have been investigated by said corporation?

2. With reference to the investigated claims referred to in question 1, what is the total amount of money claimed or paid to date, and what is the total amount of money recovered by the corporation on account of such subsidies?

3. From how many firms in the bedding industry have recoveries been made by the corporation on a compulsory basis?

4. Has the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation laid charges against any bedding manufacturers, or is the laying of any such charges contemplated? If so, in how many cases?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Of the total claims paid or withdrawn approximately 97 per cent have been investigated.

2. Total investigated claims to June 21, 1944, $1,031,452.39.

Claims disallowed or reclaimed	$301,278.45
Claims voluntarily refunded..	131,664.54
Claims withdrawn prior to payment	285,309.50
	$718,252.49

3. Claims have been disallowed or payments made have been reclaimed wholly or in part by the corporation in the case of 45 firms. Such adjustments were required for various reasons. For example, it may have been found, no investigation, that accounting or arithmetical errors were made in reckoning subsidy; or that the costing principles used by the applicant were not approved by the corporation; or that the goods in question were used in the manufacture of goods for export or for sale to the Department of Munitions and Supply; or that there were infractions of the maximum prices regulations in connection with the goods on which subsidy was claimed; or that degradation of quality of finished goods has occurred, with the result that current costs were not properly comparable with basic costs used in calculating subsidy.

4. The corporation has not laid charges against any bedding manufacturers. The laying of such charges is contemplated in two cases.

WARTIME OILS LIMITED

Mr. MacNICOL:

1. How much money has been spent by Wartime Oils Ltd. in exploring for oil?
2. How much was so spent in Turner valley?
3. How much was spent elsewhere?
4. Where were funds spent other than in Turner valley?
5. Does government policy prohibit activity in the province of Saskatchewan by Wartime Oils?
6. How many wells have been drilled by Wartime Oils Ltd. in each location, (a) producers, and (b) non-producers, and what is the productive capacity of each producing well?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Wartime Oils Limited is not engaged in exploring or drilling for oil. It is a company formed for the purpose of financing the drilling of wells in the marginal area of Turner valley. Each applicant for financing is required to submit two sites which are grouped together and the production from either or both of these wells is made available for repayment to Wartime Oils Limited for any sums advanced to the applicant for drilling. As of June 30, the sum of $2,615,325.12 had been so advanced.

2. $2,615,325.12.

3. Nil.

4. See answer to question 3.

5. Yes. See also answers to questions 1 and 2.

6. As of June 30, twelve wells have been completed, with the following results:

Completed Wells

		Allowable production	Remarks
Anglo No. 10	Producing	75 barrels	Producing about 30 barrels.
Anglo No. 12	Producing	100 barrels	Producing about 100 barrels.
Calmont 1A	Producing	300 barrels	Producing about 225 barrels.
Chinook No. 1	Producing	75 barrels	Producing about 60 barrels.
Lion-Sunray No. 3	Producing	80 barrels	Producing about 60 barrels.

POWELL RIVER, B.C., DOCK AND WHARF FACILITIES

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Did the government of Canada enter into an agreement with the Powell River Company of Powell River, B.C., in the year 1910, providing for the right of access by the general public to the docks or wharves situated at Powell River?

2. Is there a government wharf at Powell River at the terminus of the government road?

3. Has the government been in negotiation with the Powell River Company for the disposal of the government wharf to the said Powell River Company?

4. Has a new agreement been made or an understanding arrived at by which the agreement of 1910 is to be abrogated and the public use of the wharf previously owned by the government to be cancelled?

5. Has the government received any representations from any organizations or persons in Powell River protesting against the cancellation of the old agreement?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The government wharf has been sold to the Powell River Company, Limited, for $50,000 as a result of a long series of negotiations, wherein the company have shown that they have a post-war expansion programme, which incorporates the material enlargement of their industrial establishment at Powell River in the amount of $13,000,000. To carry out this post-war programme, the area on which the government wharf is located will be required as a site for the various buildings and facilities included in the above development. Certain parts of this development are to be undertaken immediately and work has already started on the necessary dredging in the vicinity of the wharf.

4. Yes, subject to the condition that the company shall give proper accommodation at its own wharf to the present traffic at Powell River, until suitable wharfage facilities have been provided by the department at Westview.

5. No.

ALASKA HIGHWAY—REPORT AS TO DESTRUCTION OR ABANDONMENT OF STORES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government any knowledge of the destruction or abandonment of stores, such as blankets, furnaces, office furniture or other items, in the Alaska highway area?

2. Has the government received any offers in connection with any such stores from the government of the United States, or any agency thereof?

[Mr. Michaud.]

3. If any such offers were received, what were the terms and conditions thereof?

4. If the government has not received any such reports, would it undertake to make an investigation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. No.

3. See reply to 2.

4. Since notice of the question was given, enquiries have been made through the special commissioner for defence projects in northwest Canada (Major-General W. W. Foster). The special commissioner has informed the government that investigations do not reveal that usable stores and equipment are being destroyed or abandoned as reported.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—HARRY MAYEROVITCH

Mr. DORION:

1. Is Mr. Harry Mayerovitch in the employ of the national film board?

2. If so, (a) since when; (b) what is his occupation; (c) what is his remuneration; (d) what were his former occupations; (e) what is his racial origin; (f) is he a British subject by naturalization or by birth?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. Yes.

2.(a) Since April 12, 1943. (b) Art Director, Graphics division. (c) $350 a month. (d) Practised his profession of architecture and painting. (e) and (f) Canadian born of Jewish descent.

*INDIANS—MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. DORION:

Following the interview given by the Honourable the Minister of Mines and Resources to a delegation of Indians at Ottawa on June 7, 1944, has a decision been arrived at by the government concerning the call to military service of young Indians and taxation on the income of Indians?

Mr. CRERAR: No decision has yet been reached. The matter is still under consideration by the government.

SHERBROOKE INTERNMENT CAMP—LIEUT.-COLONEL GRAHAM

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Has Lieutenant-Colonel Graham, now in command of the Sherbrooke internment camp, ever been on service at Barriefield?

2. If so, between what dates?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LABOUR CONDITIONS—WAGE RATES, ETC., NAVAL SHIPBUILDING YARDS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What are the basic hourly wage rates, bonuses, overtime and living allowances being paid for the different classes of trades at the following naval shipbuilding yards in Nova Scotia: John LeBlanc, Weymouth, N.S.; Clare Shipbuilding Company, Meteghan, N.S.; Brookfield Construction Company, Mahone Bay, N.S.?

2. From what dates have these rates been in effect?

3. Have the labour organizations or representatives of the workmen at any of these shipyards been negotiating for a schedule of rates and, if so, from what date?

4. Are there any delays in decision and, if so, when is it expected it will be made?

Mr. MITCHELL: Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PERSONNEL IN OTTAWA AND ABROAD

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What is the total number of, (a) men, and (b) women employed by the Department of External Affairs in each of Canada's representations abroad?

2. With reference to the totals given in answer to question 1, (a) how many were born in Canada; (b) how many were born in other countries; (c) what countries, and how many in each; (d) how many received all of their education in Canada; (e) how many received part or all of their education in other countries; (f) what countries; and how many in each; (g) how many are able to use the Spanish language?

3. What is the total number of, (a) men, and (b) women employed by the Department of External Affairs, at Ottawa?

4. With reference to the totals given in answer to question 3, (a) how many were born in Canada; (b) how many were born in other countries; (c) what countries, and how many in each; (d) how many received all of their education in Canada; (e) how many received part or all of their education in other countries; (f) what countries; and how many in each; (g) how many are able to use the Spanish language?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—J. E. FRASER

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Does Mr. J. E. Fraser of Sherbrooke, N.S., hold a position as commanding officer or other position with the reserve army or military organization at St. Mary's municipality?

2. If so, what has been his remuneration and expenses to date?

3. Is he employed as mail carrier between Sherbrooke and Sheet Harbour or other points?

4. If so, how long has he been so employed, when does his contract terminate and what is he paid per year?

CANADIAN ARMY—RESERVE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What is the total number of personnel in each rank senior to that of corporal, now in the reserve army, who are of military age?

2. Of the numbers indicated in the answer to question 1, how many joined the reserve army, (a) prior to September 1, 1939; (b) between September 1, 1939 and September 1, 1940; (c) since September 1, 1940?

QUEBEC INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION SURVEY COMMITTEE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. On what date was the industrial mobilization survey committee for the district of Quebec created?

2. With the exception of Peter Bartleman, who are the members of said committee, and what is the technical experience of each?

3. Upon whose recommendation, by whom, and on what date was each one of the present members of such survey committee appointed?

4. What are the age and military record of each member of such committee?

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Does Mr. Peter Bartleman represent the Department of Munitions and Supply on the industrial mobilization survey committee for the district of Quebec? If so, where and when was he born?

2. If not born in Canada, when did he arrive in this country?

3. What is his military record?

4. What was his experience in industry, and in what capacity, at the time of his appointment to such committee?

5. On what date was he appointed to such committee?

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Are there any members of industrial mobilization survey committees outside the military district of Quebec?

2. If so, in what districts, who are the members thereof and their duties, and on what date was each one appointed?

FRANCE

AGREEMENT WITH FRENCH COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL LIBERATION—VISIT OF GENERAL DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Reports indicate that a draft agreement between the United Kingdom and the French Committee of National Liberation relating to the administration of liberated areas of France is now under consideration, and that in view of the joint nature of the operations such an agreement will require the adherence of the United States to become effective. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the Canadian government is being kept fully advised in the matter, and if Canada will be a party to the agreement? Will this matter be one of the subjects of the conversation between the Prime Minister and General Charles de Gaulle on his visit to Ottawa?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend I would say that the government has been kept informed of the conversations that have taken place with respect to the matter to which he has just referred; but it is not expected that Canada will necessarily become a party to any projected agreement.

As hon. members are aware, General de Gaulle will be here to-morrow. I expect to have an opportunity to discuss with him many matters of mutual interest and concern to France and Canada. The subject to which my hon. friend has referred may be one of the questions to be taken up at that time.

While I am speaking of General de Gaulle I may mention that the general is expected to arrive in the city by plane in the morning. Arrangements have been made for a welcome to be extended to him on parliament hill at a quarter after twelve. Seats will be provided for members of parliament in front of the peace tower where General de Gaulle will speak. The General will be the guest of His Excellency the Governor General and Princess Alice at Government house during his stay in the city. The government will give a dinner in honour of General de Gaulle in the evening and on the following day he will be leaving early in the morning for brief visits to Montreal and Quebec. That is the extent of the programme for General de Gaulle's visit to Canada that I am able to give at the moment.

CANADIAN FORCES

QUEBEC ELECTION—INQUIRY AS TO DISFRANCHISING OF PERSONNEL OUTSIDE THE PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Have any of the three defence ministers, on behalf of the armed forces from the province of Quebec, made protests or representations against the decision of the premier and the government of the province of Quebec which appears to disfranchise at the forthcoming provincial election those in the armed forces overseas or stationed elsewhere than in that province?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Speaking for myself, I have not made any representation.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I have not seen the statement in question; therefore I cannot give any answer to my hon. friend at the moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to urge upon the ministers the necessity of their doing something on behalf of the men who are in the navy, the army and the air force. I ask this question because the three ministers are the spokesmen of the men in the services, and it does appear as though no one but a sailor, soldier or airman who happens to be in the province of Quebec when the election takes place will have the opportunity of exercising his franchise. So far as I know this is the first provincial election in which this situation has arisen.

DISTURBANCES AT PETAWAWA CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Has any investigation been made as to reports of recent disturbances at Petawawa camp, and if so, will the Minister of National Defence inform the house as to the cause and nature of the disturbances and the steps which are being taken to ensure that there will be no recurrence?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I have had telephone inquiries made, and the information which I have with regard to one training centre—there are two—is that at this centre, presided over by Colonel Johnston, the only disturbance in recent days took place two weeks ago in the neighbourhood of the canteen, when two general servicemen got into an altercation with regard to a speech which has had a good deal of publicity in the newspapers. The soldiers were separated before a fight actually took place. The officer commanding the training centre also says positively this is the only disturbance that he knows of in this camp or in his training centre for a considerable time past.

The other training centre is A-2. I have not the name of the commanding officer. An incident occurred there about two months ago in which there was a rumour that there was a fight between a N.R.M.A. soldier and a general serviceman. Inquiry was made and it was found out that altercation did start in the canteen, but it was immediately stopped and there was no further disturbance. There were only two men involved in each case.

Inquiry from the chief of police of Pembroke shows that there has been no fighting by soldiers in the town of Pembroke for the last three months. The troops have been well-behaved. Brigadier Thackeray, who is in command of Petawawa camp, states that there was no necessity to use a fire hose, as reported in the newspapers, to quell a disturbance because there have been no disturbances.

ACCIDENT AT MOUNT ST. BRUNO RANGES ON JULY 6

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Oppostion): Will the Minister of National Defence give the house such information as he has with respect to the serious military accident which took place at the Mount St. Bruno ranges on July 6, when the premature explosion of a bomb inside a mortar in the course of a training session is reported to have claimed the lives of some nine soldiers and sent many others to the hospital in a serious condition?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am afraid I have not any information at my disposal at the moment which has not appeared in the press. As a matter of fact a court of inquiry convened on Saturday and was still sitting when I last heard of it. When I received my hon. friend's question before coming into the chamber I asked that a telephone call be put through to military district No. 4. I have not had a reply as yet. I would assume that the court of inquiry is still sitting. I am sorry to say I think the fatal casualties were one more than my hon. friend mentioned. I think there were ten fatal casualties altogether.

R. C. A. F.—LABRADOR AIR BASE—BOMBER CRASH ON JULY 6

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Assistant of the Minister of National Defence for Air. I have sent the minister's office notice of this question and it may not have come to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. If not, he may take this as a notice. Following up a Canadian Press dispatch which was carried in the newspapers of Saturday, I should be glad if the Minister of National Defence for Air would give the house such information as he can with respect to the accident which is alleged to have occurred on Friday, July 6, when eleven men were reported to have been killed in a twin-engined reconnaissance bomber which crashed while taking off from a Labrador air base.

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air): A court of inquiry has been established and is investigating this accident. Information will be given as soon as possible.

MERCHANT NAVY

INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY TO PERSONNEL OF CIGARETTES AND OTHER COMFORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have received a complaint from the Cheerio War Service club, which services many men and women in the armed forces with cigarettes and other comforts, stating that merchant seamen do not appear to be entitled to the standard package of three hundred cigarettes on the same basis as those in the armed services. Will the Minister of Transport or the Postmaster General inform the house whether or not this is correct, and, if so, why these seamen, whose duties are among the most hazardous of all, are not placed upon the same basis as the armed forces so far as cigarettes are concerned?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Merchant seamen would be entitled to the same privileges that are being extended to members of the armed forces if it were physically possible to send them cigarettes without disclosing the destination of the ships on which the seamen are serving. However, cigarettes and tobacco are made available to seamen on the ships on which they serve at very much reduced rates.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely the objection in regard to disclosing the destination of a ship would apply in the same way to the navy, but there does not seem to be any difficulty so far as men in the navy are concerned.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is possible that the management of the naval and merchant ships is not the same, and for that reason the service cannot be extended to the seamen.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister would give the matter further consideration?

Mr. MICHAUD: It has been given consideration already, but we will consider the matter further to see if the service can be made available to merchant seamen.

MOBILIZATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, for which apparently he is prepared, in connection with the speech reported to have been delivered yesterday by Premier Godbout of the province of Quebec. Reference was made to certain orders or regulations that have not yet been brought before this parliament, and the speech as a whole refers to the fact that any farmers' sons now in the service, or those who have not complied with military service regulations, or even those who may be considered deserters from the army, will be given exemption from military service if they obtain certificates from their mayors and agronomists. Later on he is reported to have said:

If there is in the province one farmer's son, an employee on the farm, who did not comply with—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. Under paragraph 298 of Beauchesne, third edition, this is entirely out of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot very well ask the question unless I place before the minister the statement on which it is based.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I read the authority for my interruption:

Questions asked orally on the orders of the day being called must not be prefaced by the reading of letters, telegrams, newspaper extracts or preambles of any kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no doubt as to the rule. If the hon. member wishes to address his question without giving the direct quotation, he might very well paraphrase the article.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question I wish to ask, then, is based upon a statement purporting to have been made by Premier Godbout, which is most revealing and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —destructive of unity. It refers to orders and regulations that have not been brought before this parliament under which men who are farmers' sons of one province, whether deserters or otherwise, are to be exempted. My questions are these. Were any such orders or regulations passed that have not been laid before parliament; was Premier Godbout given any confidential information along this line which would permit him to make that statement; and is it a fact that in the province of Quebec farmers in the home defence army are to be discharged?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I noticed in the newspaper this morning the report to which my hon. friend refers. I have not read the official text of the speech by the premier of Quebec, which I understand was given in French, but I can say without equivocation that there is no arrangement in any part of Canada for dealing with men under the mobilization regulations except in accordance with the terms of the regulations laid before this House of Commons or otherwise made known to the public.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): If I may ask the minister a supplementary question, from the reported speech of the premier of the province of Quebec it would seem that this matter is dealt with in that province differently from the way it is dealt with in other parts of the dominion. Will the minister indicate whether the statement in the press is in accordance with the regulations?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is asking what he calls a supplementary question, which is not permitted under the rules. He is also making a statement in regard to a question which has been answered by the minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: The government has not attempted to answer this question at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think perhaps my hon. friend's question should be answered, and the answer is no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether he authorized the premier of Quebec to mention all the subjects which are referred to in the press report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may tell my hon. friend that I have not read the premier's speech. My time is too much taken up with international affairs for me to be worrying over provincial matters at the present time. But if my hon. friend is uneasy as to what I may have been saying to Premier Godbout I may tell him that I have had no conversation with the premier of Quebec authorizing him on any matter about the provincial election.

Mr. GRAYDON: Apparently he has had some conversation with the right hon. gentleman, from what he says.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he has not.

ARCTIC AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE BETWEEN UNITED STATES, RUSSIA AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): According to a press dispatch from Edmonton under date of July 8, Vice-President Henry Wallace of the United States gave an interview in that city in which he advocated an international conference between Russia, United States and Canada concerning arctic affairs, and he emphasized the urgency of having such a meeting. Could either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Mines and Resources tell us whether Canada has taken any steps to bring about such a meeting, and if not, will Canada do so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The suggestion deserves consideration, but up to the present time consideration has not been given any conference between Russia, Canada and the United States. In due course such steps will be taken as may seem advisable.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING AND MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to remind hon. members that some days ago, when we decided to sit Wednesday afternoons, there was an expression of view which seemed to be pretty general that we might sit Wednesday evenings as well. If the house is agreeable I would move that we sit Wednesday evenings from now on, beginning on Wednesday of the present week. I should like to throw out the further suggestion that beginning on Monday of next week the house might sit mornings. I think matters have progressed far enough to permit morning sittings to begin a week from to-day; and unless there is a real desire to have the proceedings of parliament continue on into the autumn it will be necessary for us to take some step of this nature very soon.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, July 6, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time of the house this afternoon in discussing the financial provisions of the budget which were so convincingly set out by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with the clarity and forcefulness which are characteristic of every presentation he makes to this house. Neither am I going to discuss the financial clauses of the amendment provided by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I want to get down to the clause in the amendment which deals with man-power. What I want to do, first, is to tell the house what purposes the N.R.M.A.

personnel in this country are serving; secondly, what I can about the situation with regard to reinforcements, and, thirdly, our reasons for recruiting.

In the first place I want to say this, that there is no formation or organization in Canada known as the home defence army. What is referred to are men in the Canadian Army to-day who have been called up for service in Canada. Those men are not in any one formation or organization. They are scattered throughout the ranks of the Canadian Army in Canada, and in practically every branch of that army.

There seems to be an idea that the seventy odd thousand men referred to in the amendment are hived somewhere, or that they are sitting around doing nothing. That is quite untrue, as I think I shall show. The N.R.M.A. personnel, that is the personnel called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, consists at the present time of something like 73,000. There were 144,000 of them enrolled altogether; in other words, 70,000 of them have gone active or been discharged. Most of those could not measure up to the army medical standards for overseas, and they have been released for civilian work.

I should like hon. members for a moment or two to look into just what these individuals are doing. Here is a break-down with respect to those 73,000 men. About 35,000 of them are on operational duties. About 13,000 of them are on non-operational duties. About 14,000 of them are in training centres. About 4,000 are in depots—wings which have to do with appraisal and placement and rehabilitation. Over 7,000 are on leave, or are on assigned duty, doing civilian work. That makes up the 73,000.

There are only three of those classes to which one has to pay much attention so far as describing their duties is concerned. First there are those engaged in operational duties, numbering, as I said, about 35,000. Then come those engaged in non-operational duties, to the number of 13,000, and the 14,000 in training centres. The men in depots, it will be understood, are there for purposes of replacement and reappraisement as to their suitability for jobs, and are posted as jobs come up.

Mr. GRAYDON: In connection with the 14,000 in training centres, I take it that those men are undergoing training now. Am I correct in that?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, that is correct. Then, the 7,000 on leave or on assigned duty require no explanation. I wish hon. members to bear in mind that figure when the discussion comes up from time to time as to what the army is doing in respect of supplying man-power for civilian purposes.

I shall not have time this afternoon to deal with every aspect of the matter I should like to deal with, but I should like just to underline here the fact that something like 7,000 of these N.R.M.A. men are to-day on leave doing civilian jobs—and about 4,000 of general service personnel in addition.

The operational units are scattered from Prince Rupert to Jamaica. They are on the Pacific coast in about a dozen positions, and on the Atlantic coast in about 15 different locations. They are in Newfoundland, in Labrador, at Nassau, Bermuda and Jamaica. In addition to that, a body of these operational troops are doing anti-sabotage duty in the interior of this country. They are engaged also in coast artillery work, signals, anti-aircraft, searchlights, engineers, infantry—they are in almost every branch of the army which provides supply, equipment and other services for operational troops.

There are in addition some in special training at the present time for certain types of operation in which they might be required. That number is included in this 35,000, and would equal about two brigade groups or a little more than that. These operational troops I have mentioned are in locations extending from Prince Rupert to Jamaica. So far as the Pacific and Atlantic coasts particularly were concerned, these operational troops were disposed after consultation with our friends in the United States in connection with the joint defence plan. Hon. members will recall that back in 1942, after Pearl Harbor, insistent demands were made for more troops. At that time the sixth, seventh and eighth divisions were authorized, and immediately all these men were called up. Kiska came in August of 1943. Immediately after Kiska the army disbanded two of those divisions, namely the seventh and eighth. There was a good deal of furore at the time; people thought we were going out of the war. What we thought we were doing was something which was extremely desirable and proper—that is, to release men, if we could, to civilian life. N.R.M.A. men physically unfit for overseas service who were not required for service in Canada were discharged. Other N.R.M.A. men not fit for overseas service were posted to replace and release for overseas service general service men who were physically fit for that service. The N.R.M.A. men physically fit for overseas service and who were released by the disbandment were trained as potential reinforcements for overseas service. That was in August, 1943.

Somebody asks: Well, what about this matter of defence, anyway? I wish to say this frankly, that since the invasion of a few weeks ago the situation has changed considerably. We had maintained a very limited number of these operational troops on the two coasts—limited, I mean, in the sense that there were a large number of posts they had to look after, and therefore the numbers in any one location were comparatively small. In Labrador and Newfoundland they formed local reserves, and were on aerodrome defence and anti-aircraft defence. We had to employ these troops according to the needs of defence as determined by what we call the probable scales of attack which were laid down by the staffs of the United States and Canada. Those scales of attack mean this, that those who know about these matters, staffs who are familiar with the strategic situation, appraise the possibilities and come to the conclusion as to what likely form of enemy attack might be practicable, what form of attack might be expected, and what the nature and extent of that attack might be. They consider also where such attack might possibly come. Troops are then disposed and posted, having those possible scales of enemy attack in view. Hon. members will understand that. On the two coastlines of Canada the troops have been located in bodies of appropriate size at strategic points. I recall that less than a year ago—about the year's end—there was an alarm —in fact one on the Atlantic coast and one on the Pacific coast. I can well imagine what would have been the criticism levelled at the Department of National Defence had there not been some troops to stand to at that time. Nevertheless the situation, as I say, has changed. At the present time there is under discussion the question of the necessity for operational troops at certain points with a view to a further reduction.

Now, with regard to anti-sabotage. There is a considerable body of troops being used in connection with a particular installation in Canada, and those troops are now disposed in the guarding of that particular development. So much for the 35,000 N.R.M.A. men in operational troops—and that is about half of the 73,000 men to whom reference has been made so often and who have been referred to in the amendment.

I now come to non-operational troops, numbering, as I have said, some 13,000. These are troops on training centre staffs, training school staffs, training organization staffs, and personnel employed as administrative personnel, firemen, general duty personnel, clerks, drivers, mechanics and cooks. These men are engaged in service of the establishments of the Canadian Army in Canada, and those establishments, in turn, form the base for equipment and reinforcement for our Canadian Army overseas.

These men are employed with the R.C. E.M.E., which is the corps of electrical and mechanical engineers which has, among other things, to do with the maintenance of vehicles. Perhaps when I tell the house that something like 20,000 to 30,000 vehicles have to be maintained and serviced, hon. members will realize why it takes a considerable number of men to do this work. These men are employed at the establishments in Canada which not only services the equipment produced in Canadian factories for Canada but also provides for the crating and the preparing for shipment of all equipment which goes to the united nations from our productive industries. The house might be interested in knowing that in this particular establishment there are over 150 carloads inward and 150 carloads outward practically every day. These N.R.M.A.. men are employed in large numbers there.

Ordnance handles everything for the army except food and medical stores, and these men are employed at ordnance depots and establishments at headquarters and across the country in large numbers. N.R.M.A. personnel work at the London central mechanization depot and they work at certain special experimental establishments.

In the army service corps N.R.M.A. personnel are employed as drivers, general duty men, supply depot personnel, butchers, bakers and cooks. They are employed also in hospitals and other medical units as well as in headquarters and servicing units where they work in the pay corps, postal corps, corps of military staff clerks and as general duty personnel.

All these men are part of the personnel used to service the army both in Canada and overseas. The big bulk of N.R.M.A. men among the non-operational personnel are for servicing duties, for which general service personnel would otherwise be required. I should also say that the N.R.M.A. personnel help to make up the army service corps detachments which service the navy and air force. They are employed also in woodcutting detachments and in port companies.

Next come the 14,000 N.R.M.A. in the training stream, at training centres, schools and other establishments. These men when trained are used to replace and release general service personnel; to replace N.R.M.A. personnel not medically fit for overseas and they are also a potential pool for reinforcements for overseas if the need should arise.

I have already spoken of the 4,000 odd N.R.M.A. men in the depots to which they are allocated or where they are reassigned to jobs for which they may be fitted.

I have also spoken of the 7,000 on leave or on assigned duties. This would cover men on compassionate leave, compassionate farm leave, industrial leave, lumbering leave, forestry leave, coal mining leave, spring leave and other leave.

That is the home defence army so-called. It is made up of personnel who are serving, as I said, not only from one side of this continent to the other but from the Pacific ocean down into the Caribbean. Except those who are on leave or in depots, all these men are on posts or in training. Quite a few of them are enlisting for general service and in due time will go overseas if they are of a suitable age and category and are fit. So that we have these men, equal in numbers to two brigade groups, who are in the training centres and who if the emergency should arise and the necessary action were taken could be made available promptly to be sent as reinforcements. That would be subject, of course, to the fact that the men in the training centres would have to complete their training.

You say to me, "What will happen if this home defence army in Canada is reduced, if the operational troops in Canada are reduced?" My policy will be to discharge, first, those who are unfit for overseas service to the extent that they can be spared. There will probably not be many who can be spared. They will be used to release for training N.R.M.A. men who are fit for service overseas. Our policy will be to use men fit for overseas service to make up a smaller number of operational units. These units would be composed of men fit for overseas service to the greatest extent possible. Fit men who are made available because of the reduced establishment in operational units in Canada would also go into training units in order that they might be trained for whatever service might be necessary. N.R.M.A. men unfit for overseas would also be used to replace general service men in order to release them for overseas.

I suggest that the statement which I have given regarding the activities of the N.R.M.A. personnel rather destroys the foundation for the regret which was registered by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. We have to have men in Canada, not only to perform defence duties and for internal security, but to provide the service necessary for training and equipping the men in our overseas army. We can no more disband these troops wholesale than can the navy or the air force disband the establishments which they have in Canada and which are necessary to the valiant service being rendered by our sailors and airmen on every battle front. There are large numbers in all three services, even of those who have volunteered but who will not be able to gratify their ambition to go overseas because they are necessary in Canada. I repeat that we shall if possible reduce considerably the number of operational troops, but those who are fit and can be released from operational duties will be put in training to be ready for any emergency.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe talked about disbanding these N.R.M.A. men and sending them back to the farm and industry. May I say to him that I have no idea of disbanding or discharging physically fit men from the Canadian army, either N.R.M.A. men or general service personnel, while our men overseas are engaged in the greatest conflict of all time, and so long as these men or some of them may be needed as reinforcements. Their training and fitness for service must be kept up.

I do not want the house to think that if the whole 73,000 of the N.R.M.A. personnel were sent to England instead of being kept in Canada, that would end the call-up or end recruiting. I am determined to provide for every emergency if I can, and until someone who knows can guarantee to me that it is not necessary any longer, I will keep on recruiting and calling up men in order to have a backlog over here of trained and fit men if an emergency should come.

I want to make this further point in connection with the demand that is always made on the army for men for civilian work. I do not think the people of Canada or the members of this house realize how many men the army has discharged to civilian work. During the last six months we have discharged nearly 5,000 a month, or a total of 30,000 men, of whom about 7,000 were N.R.M.A. personnel. These men have gone back into the civilian man-power pool. While not physically fit for the army they can be utilized in large measure for civilian work. I want to say that the army is not holding on to any men it can spare who are not medically fit for service overseas.

There is another service which the army performs, and I think my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will agree with me in this. By the call-up the army is providing an opportunity to check the man-power of this country and to divert and direct them into suitable channels. The army rejects nearly fifty per cent of the men who present themselves for enlistment or for enrolment under the N.R.M.A., and so far as the N.R.M.A. personnel are concerned those men are rechecked by the national selective service officers who may direct them to suitable employment. This means that the army call-up has brought out thousands of men and made them available for more useful and essential work.

So much for the N.R.M.A. personnel. The statement I have just made is not one that is made for the first time. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe could have looked up the record in Hansard for the early days of the session and he would have found that I had made almost the same elaboration of the duties being performed by these men. But he just elects in his amendment to assume that these men are doing nothing and that they may be at any moment moved out of the Canadian army organization in Canada and either sent back to the farming industry or moved overseas. I submit that that picture is far from being a true one.

With regard to the matter of reinforcements, an attempt has been made to regard the call for recruits in this country as evidence of an immediate need of reinforcements. The talk had been as if the recruiting activities were because of that need. But I would point out—and it seems to me that it does not take much imagination to realize it without having it specifically pointed out—that recruiting is not for the purpose of providing immediate reinforcements. Recruiting would be no good to provide immediate reinforcements. Men have to be trained for reinforcement purposes for at least six months; and recruiting is for the purpose of replenishing and keeping up our flow of reinforcements six months from now. What we are doing from day to day is to get these men in and train them.

Now, with regard to the matter of reinforcements, I have spoken of this many times, but I am afraid I have not yet made it plain; apparently there is an idea that the only way we can replace casualties is by dispatching men direct from Canada. That is not so. On the contrary, we have overseas a large reinforcement pool, and that pool is calculated on a scale to provide reinforcements for a certain number of months of intense operations. As I have told the house repeatedly, the size of that pool is based on requirements which are calculated from experience and from the best forecast which can be made of casualties. The pool was formed so that we would have reinforcements ready without being dependent on immediate dispatches from Canada. That pool enabled us to make good in a matter of days the losses suffered in the opening phases of the invasion. Already I have reports of the satisfaction of the commanders in the field, both in Italy and in France, with the efficient way in which reinforcements have been handled.

This is the position of the pool. My officers advise me that our reinforcement situation overseas at the end of June on an over-all basis was better than called for in our plans. That is on an over-all basis. But as I have said before, it is very difficult always to match supply with requirements in every trade and in every arm, in view of the inevitable variation in requirements. Any one of these trades or arms may receive a sudden demand when the others may remain for the time being almost untouched. The pattern of war changes constantly; and the responsible officers are continually comparing actual conditions with those forecast and are taking prompt action, by retraining and reallocation, to adjust for any situation which may be out of line with previous estimates. My advice is that subject to those adjustments between arms and trades the pool overseas was at the end of June at an adequate level for its purpose, and that is after allowing for casualties up to that date.

It must be understood that the reinforcement pool will not remain always at the same strength. It goes down and up, like a city reservoir which is drawn on heavily when a fire occurs and which rises gradually during normal times. There will no doubt be times ahead when the pool will be lowered very considerably, as casualties occur. It will be gradually raised later by monthly dispatches. I add this, that we are not counting in that pool those in hospital, no matter how soon they may be available—I do not mean only the wounded, but those temporarily or otherwise sick, so long as they are in hospital—or those attending courses in the United Kingdom. All those we class for the time being as non-effectives.

What are we going to do for the men to send over monthly—these monthly dispatches I have spoken of? The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said, "Where are these men to come from if not from this immobilized force, Canada's home army?" Well, I will try to tell him. We anticipate that from the general service men we actually have in hand at the present time we shall be able for some months to come to dispatch month by month the quotas of reinforcements we have planned for. I do not want to be over-optimistic, but I would say that we have in hand at the present time sufficient general service men to complete our quotas right up to the calendar year end.

Where do we get these men to dispatch? I am not talking about men enlisting, I am talking about men we actually have in hand. Well, we have general service personnel in training centres all over Canada, and we have general service men in operational and non-operational units who are being made available as reinforcements by orderly withdrawal and replacement and, in some cases, retraining. I said in February that we had about sixty thousand of these. The number now stands at probably fifty thousand or better. Then, as I said in February, we have in addition about fifty thousand of these N.R.M.A. personnel of whom I spoke a little while ago, who would be of suitable age and category to be drawn on for overseas service if the necessity should arise and appropriate action were taken under N.R.M.A. As I have indicated, those in the brigade groups who are fit could be sent quickly, and how many of the others could be sent would depend on the comparative need. Of course we must go short in Canada if the need is over there.

I have already stressed that the army in Canada has the task of servicing, equipping and reinforcing of the army overseas. That is the situation. But we cannot stop there. The war is not over. As I have said repeatedly, Hitler and Tojo are not licked. There will be big battles yet, and Canada will be in the thick of them. That brings me to this matter of activity about recruiting. People may ask, "Why all this activity? Why do we not stand on what we have?" The answer is that we want to protect the position six months from now, and I am not content to rely on protecting that position by using draftees if we can reinforce our army with volunteers. Our recruiting activities are for the purpose of keeping up enlistments from now on so as to be able to maintain the stream of reinforcements from month to month. We want to get, if we can, an average of 4,000 a month or better from those not now in the army, and that figure may have to be reviewed, depending on the developments of the present operations.

From January to May inclusive the average number volunteering for general service was just about 3,800 general service men a month. Included in that average is about 600 N.R.M.A. personnel who enlisted for general service.

For June, according to the daily returns we have, the number volunteering will be over 6,000, and that includes between 2,500 and 3,000 N.R.M.A. personnel who have enlisted for general service. I pause to ask if that is not a better way to utilize these N.R.M.A. men for reinforcements. I know from reports I have received that enlisting gives them a new outlook, new self-respect, a determination that comes from having made a great decision. And all that is bound to make them better soldiers.

Some of these former N.R.M.A. men would have to be retrained in another arm of the service, but many of them are ready now for overseas service. But the civilians who are enlisting—who are just coming into the army for the first time—all have to be trained, and that takes six months at least if they are to get all the training we should like. That means that a man enlisting to-day from civilian life and put into training would not, in all probability, come out at the other end of the training stream and be ready to go overseas at the earliest before the 1st of January, 1945. So that the short answer to the question "Why are we recruiting?" is that we are recruiting so that the flow of reinforcements six months from now will keep right on.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister whether there has been any reduction in the length of training given to general service personnel in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: None that I know of.

Mr. GREEN: Is it intended that there shall be a reduction?

Mr. RALSTON: Not that I know of.

As I told the house in February, if current recruiting did not keep up, our quotas for dispatch overseas in the closing months of this year and in the first months of the new year would be down, and that would mean that if casualties occurred on the scale we calculated for, the pool overseas would be lowering instead of filling up. In that connection the house will be glad to know that from the very beginning of the campaign in the Mediterranean, all through Sicily and Italy, and in the Normandy invasion, the casualties, while substantial, have thus far been considerably below those for which we estimated. We devoutly hope that may continue, but we certainly must not bank on it. And so, I say, we are keeping right on now getting men to enlist for overseas service, and from what I have said you will see that there are two sources from which these enlistments can come—the N.R.M.A. men now in the army, and men enlisting from civilian life. We are placing before both these groups the needs overseas and asking them to join the army of volunteer soldiers which has distinguished itself in every operation in which it has taken part.

As I speak I am reminded that to-day is the anniversary of the invasion of Sicily. I am sure it is a red letter day in the history of the Canadian Army—a day on which Canadians will look back with pride and thankfulness as they recall the exploits of that landing at Pachino and of the thirty-nine days following it, during which Sicily was liberated.

There they made their place in the renowned Eighth Army. The reputation for soldiering which they won in Sicily was carried forward by the 1st Division and the Army Tank Brigade as abreast the British formation they spearheaded the landing on the toe of Italy at Reggio Calabria. Steadily and irresistibly they fought their way northward. Later they were joined by an Armoured Division, with which they formed the 1st Canadian Corps. The battles of Ortona and the Liri valley, the breaching of the Gustav and Adolf Hitler lines, were a few of the outstanding achievements which have written their names in shining letters on the pages of Canadian history.

For a long while the Canadian army was not in active operation. Young men went into the navy and the air force, many of them because they thought they could get into action sooner. The army to-day challenges any man who wants action and who wishes to help to finish the war and finish it quickly.

I have spoken of the sources of enlistments. These are the sources from which our overseas army is reinforced—the pool which is now overseas; the pool of general service men in Canada; the N.R.M.A. men now in the army who are enlisting because they see their duty; and young men in civilian life who cannot pick up a newspaper or listen to the radio without realizing that the call is to them. In addition, there are the drafted N.R.M.A. men who are potential overseas reinforcements if the need for sending them should arise and the necessary action is taken. About them and others who may be called up, I have made my position clear more than once in the house. That position is this—I am for keeping our army overseas 100 per cent volunteers if we can do it; but if we cannot maintain the army overseas with volunteers and it is necessary to send N.R.M.A. men, there can be no alternative for me but to recommend action under the act, and I shall do so. I simply want to point out that nearly two and a half years ago, when this same question was up in the house, I said:

> I have faith in the success of the voluntary method if we all do our part. With the background and traditions which this country possesses, and which it would be folly to ignore, I prefer the voluntary method if it works, and I shall do all I can to make it work.

That was in February, 1942. I think I can say that I have faithfully tried to raise and administer the Canadian army under the voluntary system. Since that time when I spoke, 198,000 men have enlisted voluntarily in the army. That is an average of over 6,600 per month since February, 1942. The total voluntary enlistment in the three services in Canada since the time I spoke was 378,000 men. Those figures would seem to show that my faith in the voluntary system was justified then. I intend to try to see that it does not fail in this last long strong pull.

May I say a word about what I believe is the advantage of recruiting rather than conscripting. I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it would be much easier for my officers and myself if we could just by a stroke of the pen draft men for overseas service instead of adjusting, retraining and reorganizing to utilize the general service men, and campaigning for recruits to keep the flow up. But I do not think there is a man in Canada who knows anything about these things who does not in his heart of hearts believe that where we have an army overseas which is 100 per cent volunteers it will be a better army if we can keep it that way. The men who are there have volunteered from a sense of duty. Is there not bound to be cleavage between them and those who, they feel, are wanting in the spirit of service which has carried them through tough times and enabled them to accomplish the impossible? Comradeship in war means everything and there are some members of the house who know that: the dependence of one man on the other, the confidence and friendship which grow up between men who have made the same great decision and who fight each for the other. Men in that position have a sure knowledge that the man on the right or the left will not let the show down. That is esprit de corps, and it is one of the most vital things in battle. The operations of this war have been in fast, hard-hitting movement. Men in small groups scattered over a wide territory have had to be on their own. Canadian resourcefulness and initiative, born of a sense of duty, have made fighting men, with confidence in each other as members of a team, able to hold on and drive forward to overcome obstacles and rout the enemy in situations where nothing but loyalty to the cause could have succeeded. I think it almost goes without saying that any soldier on a dangerous task would prefer to have as comrades those who, like himself, had volunteered to serve.

I know that other countries have drafted armies. That is true of the United States, of Britain and of New Zealand, and I know the magnificent way they have fought. But their system of draft was in force practically from the very beginning. The men in the forces are all on an equal level there, and the draft was simply to decide who should go first and who would be best suited to go. In the early days in some of those countries a man could volunteer, but no stigma attached to a man because he was drafted; it simply indicated to the man that it was his turn. For better or for worse, that was not our system; it was agreed by both major parties in 1940 that it would not be. It is not the system in Australia. In Australia men who are called up can only be sent as far north as the equator, and Australia's contribution to the war has many times, and rightly so, been held up in this house as one that we should emulate. It is not the system in South Africa, where the only power to call men up for compulsory service is for service within the union itself. And South Africa has as her Prime Minister Field Marshal Smuts, whose war-mindedness has been worthily applauded throughout the commonwealth.

And so to sum up, Mr. Speaker. My job is to maintain our army overseas. My job is to do all I can to see that Canada backs to the limit her men who are overseas. If the sending of these N.R.M.A. men is necessary to maintain the army overseas at the present time, then I shall be for sending them. If it is necessary for that purpose at any time in the future, I shall be for sending them. But so long as volunteers enlist for that purpose, does anyone doubt that we would serve those soldiers overseas better by sending them volunteers like themselves instead of draftees?

And now if I may I wish just for a minute to step into the sphere of my colleague the Minister of Finance. I have referred to this before, but there is an analogy that people sometimes miss, and I am speaking now particularly with regard to the help which citizens can give in connection with recruiting as compared with the help they give in connection with war loans. My colleague the Minister of Finance has to raise huge amounts of money every year to pay for war activities. Only about half of it is raised by compulsion, that is, by taxes. The government, under the very act, the National Resources Mobilization Act, which authorizes the sending of men by compulsion, has the power to force citizens to give their money and their property for the prosecution of the war. Why not take it all by compulsion? But my colleague with the full approval of the Canadian people does not take it that easy way. On the contrary, he puts a vast amount of time, energy and money into recruiting campaigns for dollars—to persuade and urge the people of Canada to contribute their money by buying victory bonds. More than that, through the national war finance committee, he asks and receives the patriotic support of thousands of citizens to make those campaigns successful. The campaigns are strenuous. Competition is stimulated between communities, plants and organizations. Badges, emblems and shields are prepared to recognize those who respond and to spur on those who do not. I commend that to some critics who suggested we should not give the general serviceman a G.S. badge to wear. Honeyed words do not always produce results. Sometimes people have to have their duty pointed out to them pretty forcibly. Great people, famous people and popular people are brought in to help to influence citizens to subscribe. When it is all over, we Canadians are proud, and rightly so, that success has been achieved by many methods in bringing home to people their duty and their privilege.

Is it so very different regarding furnishing the needs of war for men instead of dollars? We use compulsion to get men for service in Canada. We have the power to use compulsion for service overseas. But we have not done it. We have taken the harder way deliberately, and so far it has been successful. We have voluntarily enlisted in the armed services altogether something like, I think, 850,000 men and women. If it is righteous and patriotic and laudable to support our men overseas by asking our neighbours to contribute money by buying bonds instead of having it taken by force, is it not just as patriotic and laudable when it comes to supporting those same men by influencing the young men of Canada to go as reinforcements rather than regarding it as none of our business and saying, let the government force them to go? The great advantage, Mr. Speaker, in getting the voluntary cooperation of citizens in raising money or in raising men is that it puts people's hearts into the war. Therefore I believe that my officers and I, and Canadians generally, can best do our duty to our army in the field by working just as hard and loyally and ceaselessly to recruit men as we do to recruit dollars.

Right here I want to express the hearty thanks, not only of myself and of the government and of the department, but of the people of Canada and the troops overseas, to the officers and staffs at headquarters and in the commands and districts, and to citizens' committees and individual citizens all over this country, for their hard, loyal and unflagging work to provide volunteer reinforcements for our volunteer army overseas. The task is not an easy one. There are two classes in this country who do make it difficult. One class consists of those who are insistent on conscription whether we can get volunteers or not. Consciously or unconsciously, they discourage volunteer recruiting by constantly keeping up the agitation, criticizing and disparaging the efforts of those who are loyally giving their best efforts to persuade and urge young men of Canada to enlist. The other class is a group that is against overseas service and who protest against conscription but do nothing to avoid it by encouraging our men to volunteer. In connection with the groups I have mentioned I hope most sincerely that the attitude may change. Perhaps nothing that I have said may change it, but I would hope it might because I do think that there is a sound basis of common sense, patriotism and efficiency in having and maintaining our army a volunteer army at this time.

But there is another group, and that is the group of people who do not speak in public and who do not write in the newspapers. They are people who think and work faithfully and quietly. They know that Canada has done and is doing a grand job in the war. I say "Canada" deliberately, for it is the Canadian people who have given of time, effort and money, and more than all, the dearest possessions of young men and young women from their homes. They do not see the point of raising this explosive issue at this crucial time in a war like this. They can wait to express their views on the government's conduct of the war when the time comes. They are not of the class which says Canada has done too much. They may think that conscription may perhaps be fairer in theory, but they know that the will to serve is better in practice. They are not so much interested in methods as in results. For them the winning of the war comes first. That group of quiet, thinking citizens of this country has given its support to the war all through those years. I ask them, and I wish to ask all true Canadians, no matter of what race or sect, or what province or party, to show the pride which I know they have in the magnificent achievements of our men in Italy, Sicily and Normandy by helping us to continue to send them the very best we have.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask the minister a question? Has not the Australian government this year abrogated the limiting clause on the Australian militia?

Mr. RALSTON: Not that I know of.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Following the very inspiring address we have just heard I intend to make any remarks of mine very brief. Since this budget discussion has been prolonged there are only a few points to which I desire to refer. First of all I want to join with many other hon. members in extending my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the able budget speech that he delivered to this house. I have come to regard the minister as the mystery man of Canada. It is true that he does not resort to the pulling of rabbits from the hat, but he extracts from the pockets and the persons of the Canadian people bank dollars and cheques with a deftness of approach that prompts them to invite him to come again, and come again he will. It is true that the people do a certain amount of complaining regarding the paying of taxes, but I venture to say that not in all Canada is there a man who to any greater extent, if as great, commands the respect, the esteem and confidence of the Canadian people as does the Minister of Finance.

I do not intend to take up the time of the house in a discussion of monetary theories. We have heard a great deal of them, but any reading I have done along that line has forced me to the conclusion that in the realm of finance, as in any other realm, we cannot get something for nothing. Any nation or any individual who has proceeded along that line has in the end met with disappointment and generally near disaster.

I have before me three statements which I shall not take the time to quote. They come presumably from authoritative sources and refer to the national debt of Canada. Strangely enough, they all differ as regards the amount, but they are unanimous in pointing us to the conclusion that our debt has reached—and is going still farther—staggering and appalling figures. One statement gives the gross unmatured funded debt as $10,689,000,000 on March 31, 1944. Other amounts would have to be added as well. It does not give me a great deal of comfort to be told that this debt is owing in Canada. It is debt just the same, no matter where it is owing. Nor is it any comfort to know that only sixty per cent of the wage earners of Canada are contributing to the investment in that debt, so that the debt itself is not payable to the people of Canada but only to a portion of the people.

I am not referring to these matters in any spirit of criticism, and I do not want to be so understood. I am referring to them for the reason that I believe the time has come when every man, woman and child in Canada should support the finance minister of to-day or of to-morrow in his efforts to curtail unnecessary expenditure wherever possible. In the past the people of Canada have not complained about the debt. They are not going to complain in the future as long as they feel that their money is not wasted. We have had no alternative. All down through the years since the beginning of the war it was a choice between debt and bondage, and I think most of us prefer debt. I do not believe any man could have handled the situation more admirably than it has been handled by the Minister of Finance. The people of Canada have noted with approval that whereas the average rate of interest paid on our debt in 1919 was over five per cent and in 1939 was 3·52 per cent, the minister has succeeded in reducing that rate to 2·57 per cent in 1943, just about half the rate we were paying twenty-four years ago.

In this connection I was interested a few days ago to read the statement of operating expenditures of the foreign exchange control board for 1943 as compared with 1942. Expenditures last year were 20 per cent lower than in 1942 and 35 per cent lower than in 1941. Economies in printing and paper, through a reduction in the size and number of forms required and in other ways, are reflected in a decrease of 35 per cent in the expenditure for this purpose as compared with 1942. This is the spirit, I submit, that should animate all departments of government and all the people of Canada at this time, in order to avoid any unnecessary expenditure; because no school of economists can persuade me that a nation, any more than an individual, can continue indefinitely building up a gigantic debt without some day having to pay the penalty. If any other theory were accepted, this nation, together with other nations that have tried the experiment, would be doomed to financial disaster.

Recently a writer on this topic put it tersely when he pointed out that our Canadian debt has been well managed, that we can borrow with safety all the money needed to win the war and convert our economy to peace. Our position is sound because we have recognized that debt is a burden and has a limit beyond which we cannot safely go. Our sound position could quickly disappear and the nation could be ruined if we swallowed the easy doctrine that debt costs nothing and need never be repaid, that all public expenditure is economically sound and pays for itself. During the period of rehabilitation, reconstruction and demobilization there will be thousands of legitimate calls for heavy expenditures which must be met. My point is that in justice to those who sent us here we must keep our faces set against unnecessary expenditures for which demands will be made. I am one of those who believe the whole taxation fabric of our country will require revision at the close of the war. It has not been founded on any scientific principle but, like Topsy, has just grown because of the exigencies of war. For that, no one is to blame. Among other corrections I would suggest is that a taxpayer be granted the right of appeal from the decision of departmental officials, appeal to an ordinary court of law instead of being confined to the exchequer court, as I believe it is to-day. Such a right of appeal exists in both England and in the United States, and I think should exist in Canada.

I should like also to congratulate the minister upon his stubborn and thus far fairly successful fight against inflation. I believe only now the general public is beginning to realize what that fight has meant to the economic set-up of this nation and the welfare of the individual. Only now is word beginning to drift in from other countries where inflation has been allowed to run riot. A few days ago a letter was received from a young Manitoban, written from the Chinese capital, in which he cites some of the prices prevailing in that country. I should like to quote just a few. A bar of ordinary toilet soap costs $2.75. American lead pencils bring $6 each. A pen nib costs 30 cents; a fountain pen costs $900. Bread costs $1.50 a loaf. Pork is $3 a pound. A haircut costs $3 and a ten cent tin of shoe polish costs $2. The price of shoes starts at $75 a pair and runs as high as $250. In addition, my young friend from Manitoba says, if you are so fortunate as to be able to buy a new car it will cost you just $150,000, and then you pay $17.45 a gallon for gasoline with which to run it. A good second hand car sells for $43,000.

I should like to quote a few of the prices prevailing in Greece at the present time, as a result of inflation. I believe these figures have been taken from reports of the International Red Cross, so that they may be regarded as correct. A loaf of bread costs $22.50—as compared with $1.50 a loaf in China. In Greece a pound of steak costs $24, a dozen eggs $27, a pound of sugar $22.50, five pounds of potatoes $14.25, a pair of shoes $400 and a suit of clothes $1,500. Thus it is in Greece; yet in Canada to-day we have those who are murmuring because to a certain extent they are restrained as a result of the ceiling placed upon prices by the finance department. I find one very general criticism of the minister throughout the country, and I believe it only fair to mention it here. That criticism is that when he was enacting these other ceilings, which are generally appreciated, he did not at the same time impose a ceiling upon the cheapest of all commodities, the everlasting talk to which we have to listen in this chamber.

I should like to refer briefly to the elimination of duties on all farm implements, a step which is warmly welcomed by the farmers of Canada. These implements include cream separators and parts thereof, milking machines and attachments, cultivators, harrows, seed drills, horse rakes and scufflers, manure spreaders, weeders, ploughs, soil packers, mowing machines, harvesters, combines, hay-loaders, potato planters and diggers, fodder cutters, and a host of other farm implements. On all of this a duty of from 7½ to 25 per cent had formerly been paid. With the tremendous demand for replacement machinery as soon as such is available after the war, this is a concession of gigantic value in the matter of dollars and cents, to farmers all across Canada.

I wish to make this further observation. In the billions upon billions upon billions of collections and expenditures since Canada entered the war, there has not been one hint or suggestion of anything in the nature of scandal. True, once or twice there were feeble flickers, but those flickers have died natural deaths, because it was found that at the root there was no food upon which they could feed. That is one of the considerations which has put the reputation of the Minister of Finance on an enviable pedestal where it will remain in the memory of Canadians down through the years to come.

One other matter, and this is directed to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who was a veteran of the last great war, and who has worked zealously in looking after the interests of the men returning from this war. I am not speaking in any parochial spirit when I refer to one definite case I have in mind; I know it is typical of a number of more or less remote cases across Canada.

Shortly after the war broke out a young man in one of our western cities wanted to enlist in the air force. At first he was not accepted. I do not remember all the particulars, but I do remember writing a very strong recommendation for that man, as regards his character and his ability to play the man. Later he was accepted and was soon sent overseas. This was the same man who dropped the first bomb on the German warship Scharnhorst as she lay at anchor. His valour was extolled in newspapers across Canada, including the two Ottawa papers. Later, while out on a flight, through some accident his aircraft caught fire. He managed to make a landing in the outskirts of a little village in England. The villagers rushed to the scene of the wreckage. I believe there were seven young men with him, all of whom were burned to a crisp. When this young chap was pulled out it was found he was still alive. He was rushed to a hospital, remained there four months, and was finally discharged. He was a new man in this respect, that through continuous grafting operations he found himself clothed with a new suit of skin. On his discharge from the hospital he was elevated to the rank of squadron leader. After spending some time on the ground, he set forth again on his air operations. This time he made the supreme sacrifice. His wife and little boy are in England, receiving of course the customary pension. With this I agree. At home, however, lives a widowed mother, whose circumstances I have known for years. She is a semi-invalid, lame and unable to work. There are two or three others in the family, but to my knowledge not one of them is in a position to give her any support. A young girl fifteen years of age lives at home. This widow is receiving $30 a month. Not long ago it would have been only $15, but under the revised regulation she received $30. I have no criticism of this, so far as it goes; but I do point out that a widowed and invalid mother, who gave her favourite son, and gave him willingly, to fight in freedom's cause, cannot possibly pay the rent, pay doctor bills, and support herself and her daughter on $30 a month.

I am prepared to say further that the people of Canada do not want her to have to support that girl and herself on that small amount. The regulations provide that amount, and nothing more. I find no fault with the regulations, so far as they go; but I do urge upon the department, with all the force at my command, that in order to meet these remote cases which from time to time will crop up in all parts of the country, and which cannot be included under the prevailing regulation, some special enactment be made and possibly a special board appointed to review thoroughly cases of this kind, and with power to make awards according to the established needs of the applicants. Such a board should consist of independent reasonable men, residents of Ottawa, who could be called together once or twice a month.

I can understand that in some instances $30 a month would be a proper amount for widows. In many cases, however, such as the one to which I have just referred, those involved are placed in a position of penury, and to this I am sure the people of Canada would take objection. That is my suggestion, and I trust that it may be acted upon. I have very strong feelings in regard to the case I have cited, because I have known the circumstances for many years.

For the last two years I have resided in Ottawa South. I leave this building at eleven o'clock, night after night, month after month, and I ride on a Bank street car. Almost every night I see in that car perhaps a dozen or two dozen soldiers and airmen. Time and again I have noted the gentlemanly bearing of these men, and I have wished on many occasions that their parents could be with me in that car to see for themselves the manly conduct of their sons in uniform—their sons who are fighting in freedom's cause. I put this on record as a tribute, and perhaps also as a comfort to the mothers and fathers across Canada who suffer heartache and suspense in these days. Could they see their boys here in Ottawa, and in other cities I have visited, they would not feel any great uneasiness about them. I take this opportuntiy to pay a sincere tribute to the fine character of the enlisted boys of Canada.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, this budget has already been widely discussed, and some very divergent points of view have been expressed. By far the greater part of the criticism thus far has been respecting the financial undertakings of the government. To many members the budget appears to be somewhat of an abstract document, dealing as it does with such tremendous sums of money—sums beyond the comprehension of most ordinary people. Some of the speeches made by hon. members, such as the one made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), are obviously intended to impress the house with the members' knowledge of fiscal policies and so on. However, to me the budget still remains a human document. I feel that it is not such an abstract thing as some people might imagine it to be.

In looking through the minister's speech as recorded in Hansard it seems to be a living document expressing the life and the lifeblood of the nation. It is a word picture of our people, of their problems from day to day. It expresses in no uncertain terms both the heights and the depths of their achievements and their possibilities. It expresses also their assets and liabilities, their dreams and failures, their hopes and defeats. The highlights of the budget of course are seen in the vast volume of production that has rolled from our mines, our forests, our farms, our shops and mills, wherever the labour of our men and women has been applied to the natural resources of this great country. That results naturally in the height of the national income which has been achieved.

I felt it was a good thing that the government had not considered only the financial war effort. As our allied armies have pressed forward the government undoubtedly has thought of much longer term problems and has presented them in this budget. It dealt with such things as getting rid of restrictions imposed by the War Exchange Conservation Act, and there was also the repeal of customs duties and the war exchange tax on agricultural implements. All of these endeavour in some degree to better the conditions of our people. With regard to the changes made in connection with agricultural implements I shall have more to say a little later.

It is evident also that the government has given much thought to the two great groups within Canada, business and labour, on this question of taxation. I have no doubt that the outstanding problem presented to the government on behalf of business was the lack of sufficient liquid funds for the conversion of industry to peace-time production. I am perfectly certain in my own mind that their problem is not as great as it was represented to be. The government has been more than generous in what it has done to recognize their problem and to make allowance for it.

There have been widespread protests from the labour movements in the past which make it clear that the taxation policy of this government has not been satisfactory and has not been endorsed by our labour groups. The tax policy, together with the enforcement of the wage ceiling, has undoubtedly acted as a brake upon production. That is not just my statement; it is a statement made by responsible leaders of the trade union movement. To remedy this condition the budget provides for the elimination of the savings portion of the income tax. Personally I believe that this problem could have been tackled in another way, in a way which would have proved more satisfactory to the labour forces. The workers have always been a little afraid for this refundable portion of the tax and I think something should have been done to allay their fears. It would have been better if the workers could have continued to have a certain portion of their taxes put aside and refunded to them in order that they would have a certain amount in post-war days. But no bond or certificate was given to the workers to represent this refundable portion of their tax. I believe if the government had issued a certificate or a small ticket each time a refundable portion of tax was paid the worker would have known quite clearly that the money would be returned. This would have had a much more satisfactory effect. Only this last year we have issued $10,200,000 worth of war certificates, which is an indication that the workers are anxious to save whenever it is possible for them to do so. By having a certificate they feel quite sure that their savings will be returned to them.

Another method of handling this problem would have been to remove the tax on overtime pay. This matter has been brought up time after time by the trade unions, and I believe they are justified in saying that the tax on overtime pay has been a bar to and has prevented overtime production which otherwise would have been made. A tax on overtime pay is no incentive to extra production.

As I said before, in my opinion the budget amendments with regard to the refundable portion of the income tax and the taxes on agricultural implements are good, but I am wondering just how they will affect my own people. I am inclined to think that the benefits that will accrue to the farming people of North Battleford will not be nearly as great as we thought they might be at first. I find that in 1939 the farming people of Saskatchewan purchased roughly $10,000,000 worth of farm machinery. If we divide that by the twenty-one constituencies in the province we find that each constituency purchased some $482,000 worth. This is not a very close estimate, but it gives a general idea. I believe my constituency would fall below that average, because the great majority of the farms in North Battleford are small farms. When you consider what was spent in 1939 you realize that even with the lowering of the tariff the people in my part of Saskatchewan are not going to benefit greatly in their purchases of farm machinery. Some of them may save a little money on the purchase of machinery, but in my opinion it is quite possible that the money thus saved will have to be used for the payment of income tax. They will be little better off after all. I think it would have been preferable if the government had retained the compulsory savings portion of the tax but had removed the tax completely from the lower brackets. That would have given greater aid to my people.

As I say, to me this budget is a living document because it gives a picture of the inequalities which exist within this country. I do not think anyone will deny that the farm people are receiving a little better income. Our farmers acknowledge themselves that things are a little better. But the undeniable fact remains that as a group our farmers do not yet receive their fair share of the national income. This fact has been stated many times, but it should be reiterated just as long as these inequalities exist. It is your duty, Mr. Speaker, and it is my duty and the duty of all members of this house, to try to eliminate those inequalities and to see that this group of people, who have contributed so much to the cause of the united nations and to Canada generally, receive a just and fair return.

In my opinion what is needed by way of policy is something which will increase the income of the farming people. That would be the greatest spur to production. It would be an assurance of increased health and well-being on the part of the people, and would increase their willingness to share with the rest of the nation the burdens of this war. I do not see how any hon. member can argue that a man should be expected to pay income tax if he is not able to provide adequately for the bodily requirements of himself and his family, and I submit that the present lowest bracket of the income tax does not allow for those decencies of living which this nation should assure its people for their health and well-being. If the minister argues that by the elimination of the refundable portion of the tax inflation will not be increased, it seems to me the same argument applies to the elimination of the tax on the lowest income brackets. In my opinion the lifting of the lowest brackets would have provided more assistance to our people than the elimination of the refundable portion of the tax. Together with higher price guarantees to our farm people, floors underneath farm prices, the definite guarantees of foreign markets, it would have gone far to correct the inequalities of income which still exist among farmers by contrast with those engaged in other industries.

In looking over the ministers' speech of June 26 I notice that he especially recommended that a commission be set up to inquire into certain matters having to do with fiscal policy. He mentioned particularly the tax on annuities and the matter of succession duties. I wish the minister had gone much farther. In my opinion the reference is not nearly broad enough. We have a tremendous task before us in facing the problems of the transition from war to peace in a changed world. The recommendation to set up a commission is an excellent one, but such a commission should not narrow its activities to such things as the taxation of annuities and succession duties; it should make a complete and comprehensive survey and receive submissions from all the various groups with regard to their ability to contribute to the national income. Such a commission could study with great advantage —and the inquiry should begin immediately— the whole range of taxation with a view to revising the tax structure to meet the needs of a changing economy. I personally believe that the tax on personal incomes will and should remain the backbone of any taxation system, but we have to see to it that it is graded far more equitably than at present in accordance with ability to pay.

I have made these few remarks this afternoon with the purpose of looking to the future. On several occasions I have listened to speeches made by members of the C.C.F.; I have in mind particularly a speech made the other evening by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). He spoke of the depression; he enlarged on the difficulties which occurred through the thirties; to be quite honest, to me it was a speech ad infinitum, ad nauseam. After all, the hon. member for Yorkton was engaged as a teacher during the depression period; he at least was sure of a living. I could easily occupy not one but many forty-minute periods by talking in this chamber, with far greater knowledge than the hon. member for Yorkton, about the years of the depression, because I know of these things from personal experience and the experiences of my neighbours. But to what end does anyone to-day get up to speak about the suffering in Canada through the thirties? Why should I add to the story? Already volumes have been written and spoken on the subject. What good can it do to turn our faces to the past? We are living in the year 1944. It seems to me that those who harp upon the difficulties of that bygone period can only destroy the belief of Canadians in their own ability to go forward. We have emerged from the trials of past years, and now the problems of war are with us; but our faces must be turned towards the future, and any criticisms of the budget or of any government measure should be with a recognition of what that measure can contribute to the future of Canada. In this crucial period of the world's history through which we are passing, those leaders of the C.C.F. who within this house have been contending that unless we have socialism here after the war we must necessarily revert to those terrible times of depression, exhibit an utter inability to understand the changing pattern of the world in which we live.

I am sorry to say these things, but I have to be honest about it; it is far better for me to make these remarks here, where you, Mr. Speaker, and all the world can hear them, than to make assertions at the hustings, as some C.C.F. speakers have done in my part of the country, where it is impossible for anyone to reply. I like to make statements in a place where they can be discussed. I hope I shall never be guilty of so misleading the people of Canada, or show such immaturity of political thinking; such an utter lack of a scientific approach to the dynamics of social change, as to assert that the only alternative for Canada is socialism or depression. I cannot help saying that such an attitude shows, to my way of thinking, an absolutely infantile analysis of the future which is possible for the Canadian people. To say that these are the only alternatives is to base one's thinking on something which is wishful and utopian; it has no reality, no basis; there is nothing concrete about it. I want definitely to dissociate myself from any who have spoken in such a way.

I have a belief, Mr. Speaker, in the future of Canada and Canada's people. I believe in the ability of Canadians to plan to go forward, to create their own future, as they are quite capable of acting unitedly in this crisis. Statistics show that we are not the nation we were in the hungry thirties. Is there to-day any hon. member, to whatever political party he belongs, who is not proud of the fact that in the year 1944 Canada, with a population but little over eleven millions, stands first in the production of nickel, of newsprint, of asbestos, of platinum, of radium; second in wood pulp and in gold; third in aluminum, in copper, in zinc, in cobalt, and in silver; fourth in wheat and in lead? Do these figures not indicate the vast possibilities which lie within the range of the development of Canada, especially since we know that the Prime Minister has declared himself in favour of supporting the policy of the united nations and is pledged to preserve peace in the world, to lower tariff barriers, to establish trade relationships, to give the people of Canada the opportunity of maintaining and even increasing the great volume of production which the war has made possible? Certainly no defeatist talk on my part shall destroy the faith of the people of Canada or the boys overseas in themselves and in their ability to go forward.

I do not want to paint a picture of the necessity of chaos, because I do not believe in the necessity of chaos. I believe that those who are painting a picture of nothing but depression are indulging in wishful thinking because they believe that by painting chaos some party advantage may be gained. The problems of the future are above party; they are the concern of all men and women who call themselves Canadians. For my own part I cannot think of anything finer to do than to work, to plan and to fight for sane and sensible and workable measures to bring security and a greater amount of happiness to all, since that is the immediate and the most practical thing that is needed to make Canada a great nation.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): In rising to speak in this debate, may I begin by expressing my pleasure, as well as that, I am sure, of all members in all parts of the house, at the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who has carried a very great load during the period of the war, has been restored to his usual good health.

I intend this afternoon in the main to deal with the various matters that were raised by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) respecting man-power and generally with regard to selective service. With much of what the minister had to say in regard to the great war effort of this nation, in production and in the utilization of available man-power, I am in accord, as are members in all parts of the house. I join with him in the praise which he has given to the Canadian forces overseas for the wonderful advances they have made during the period of one year to which he refers. One year ago to-day these men in Sicily began an advance which has been spectacular in its success and a matter of great pride to the Canadian people and of great influence in determining the final outcome of the war.

But as I listened to the Minister of National Defence to-day, I had the impression that he felt he was not advancing the best possible arguments to support the government's man-power policy; for gone was the fire, the enthusiasm, the cogency and the power of description which so often characterized him in the past in reporting with regard to the man-power of the nation. He referred to the success of the voluntary effort during the past year or fifteen months. If I understood him rightly, he said that there were sufficient reinforcements to carry the Canadian people to the end of the present year. While he was speaking of the sufficiency of reinforcements, I found it difficult to understand the speeches that had been made by Brigadier Mess and the activities that are taking place all over the dominion with a view to securing the volunteering of those who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. In my opinion the minister's statement to-day as to the sufficiency of reinforcements is a denial and a repudiation of the activities of General Pearkes, of Brigadier Mess and of Major Jarvis, the district recruiting officer for military district No. 10. The attitude of the minister and of those who serve under him seems to be almost Janus-faced. The minister says, in effect, that Canada is not faced with a serious situation with regard to reinforcements, and is securing the necessary men. But the minister's responsible officers, by their activity, yes, by their very words, declare that what the minister says is not in accordance with the facts. The minister says that there are sufficient reinforcements, but his officials, by their appeals, and by their actions, give an answer directly to the opposite effect.

The minister to-day says that as far as the home defence army is concerned it is doing a very useful work in this country. If I took the proper figures, there are 73,000 in the home defence army, of whom 50,000 are available as a pool for overseas service, of whom 35,000 are engaged in operational work, 13,000 in depots, 13,000 in non-operational work—

Mr. RALSTON: 4,000 in depots.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I beg the minister's pardon; yes, 4,000. There are 7,000 on leave or doing assigned work.

An hon. MEMBER: There are fourteen thousand in training centres.

Mr. GARDINER: Not 13,000 in depots.

Mr. RALSTON: Non-operation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Non-operational is what I said. The minister says, in effect, that these men are doing good work, that they are performing useful duties, that if they were not there it would be difficult to have the work done; yet at the same time, while he says that, his officers throughout the dominion are trying to get these men who are doing that useful work to enlist for overseas service. If that campaign were successful, if from 80 per cent to 100 per cent of those in the N.R.M.A. army actually volunteered, I should like to know how the work would then be done which these men are doing; that is, if we carried the minister's argument to its logical conclusion.

I do not like the attitude of the minister in castigating those who believe that the policy of the government is not the proper one for this country. We in the opposition have set out our views in the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) in these words:

> (f) that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent.

The minister did not deny the cost; he did not deny that it was costing the people of this country that large amount of money, but he endeavoured to answer us by placing those who raised the standard of a greater war effort on the part of this country in the same category as those who refused to serve and those who refuse to support the war effort. That is the position in which he put us, and that I resent on behalf of those associated with me.

The minister said that the only class worthy of commendation is that which does not speak and write to the newspapers. They are the ones who do not want this explosive issue raised at this time. Well, I ask the minister to go to the legislature of Quebec and see what happened there on April 26. At that time the legislature of that province passed a resolution saying, in effect, to the government of Canada that they shall not bring into effect national service in this country. Why? I ask him to speak to them when he endeavours to castigate us on this matter. I ask him that and I give him the opportunity to reply at this time, as I do the other ministers.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not have to ask you for the opportunity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I beg your pardon.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You do, during his speech.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So far as the government is concerned it stands on its policy of conscription for service in Canada. Over and over again I have pointed out in this house the inequality of call-up and the inequality of service that has been ordained by this government. Does the minister accept the manner of call-up in this country? Do the members of the ministry agree that it is fair, just and reasonable that in my own military district with a tremendous record of enlistment, about three times as many are being called up under the N.R.M.A. as in other military districts with a voluntary record of one-half and less that of my province? Do the government approve that? They allow it to go on; they permit it to continue. Answers to questions are given from time to time in this house that prove that there is no equality of service ordained by the government in this dominion in its policy of call-up. I am not speaking at the moment of voluntary enlistment inequalities. I do not speak of that because no one is required to volunteer; but where it is the policy of the government and the law of the land that there shall be conscription for service in Canada, then I say that this government has no right to castigate us on this side of the house for causing disunity in this dominion; because by its own action it is doing that very thing. It is lighting fires that will separate this dominion for generations yet to come, because all too often political expediency rather than fairness and equality and the necessities of the times have dictated the application of the call-up in various parts of Canada.

Let me give the house the last return that I have received which indicates discrimination and unfairness that can only result in disunity. I have in my hand a return, sessional paper No. 1421, dated May 25, 1944. I ask the Minister of National Defence if he approves what is contained in this paper? Does he accept the principle that there is to be one degree and one standard of service in one part of Canada under the law and a different one in another part? This is the question I asked:

> How many married men over twenty-five years of age have been called up for military service under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, (a) since the act came into force; (b) since the first day of January, 1944, by (i) military districts and by (ii) mobilization districts?

The return brought down states as follows:

> This information cannot be supplied by military districts. By mobilization divisions the information is as follows.

That information shows that married men called up in Canada, conscripted under the National Resources Mobilization Act, numbered 17,666. Here is the record of the call-up:

Mobilization district—

A, London, Ontario	1,151
B, Toronto, Ontario	5,367
C, Kingston, Ontario	1,626
D, Port Arthur, Ontario	372
E, Montreal, Quebec	1,973
F, Quebec, Quebec	106
G, Halifax, Nova Scotia	787
H, Saint John, N.B.	957
I, Charlottetown, P.E.I.	213
J, Winnipeg, Manitoba	366
K, Vancouver, B.C.	2,407
M, Regina, Saskatchewan	1,101
N, Edmonton, Alberta	1,250

Is there any fairness in that call-up as far as the military districts are concerned? Kingston, which is military district C, has fifteen times as many called up as district F, which is Quebec, and the populations are about the same. The minister castigates us for causing disunity in this country; yet he permits such a condition of affairs to exist.

I pass from there, Mr. Speaker, to the matter of the total enlistment and enrolment record, and it tells its own story. The last issue of "Canada at War," June, 1944, shows the male population from eighteen to forty-five as well as the total record of the military districts to be as follows:

	Per cent
Toronto	45·0
Halifax	44·1
Victoria	44·1
Saint John	42·1
Winnipeg	41·9
Kingston	40·2
Calgary	39·8
London	39·1
Regina	37·2
Montreal	24·4
Quebec City	18·7

The percentages include not only the call-up but the voluntary record as well. My submission, based on the returns made and the information given from month to month, is that the reason there is a feeling of resentment in this nation and a degree of ill-feeling is that this government has seen fit to substitute political expediency in the call-up in place of the principle of equality of service. Then we are castigated; we are pictured as people who cause disunity in this nation. I repeat what I have said before, that this government, in time of war, has done more to bring about disunity in this country by its failure to insist upon equality under the law than has been done at any other time in the history of this nation.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might just say a word, because I know my hon. friend wants to be fair—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend talks of political expediency in reference to the application of the national mobilization regulations, let me say without equivocation that there is not a tittle of truth in it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right. I place before the house the answers to the questions that have been asked as given by the various ministers. I judge on the basis of what these answers disclose, and they disclose inequality of sacrifice. If that is not based upon political expediency then I ask—and I give the minister an opportunity to answer now—upon what basis he or any other minister of this government justifies the fact that in my province, with its magnificent record of enlistments, two or three times as many men are being called up as in other military districts with the lowest voluntary records. I ask the minister to answer that once and for all, and give him an opportunity now. The answer is silence, and no other answer is possible.

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is not silence. I think I am as good a Canadian as my hon. friend—

Mr. CASSELMAN: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is trying to prove that I am not. As I said when my estimates were before the house, my hon. friend is an able criminal lawyer. He gets these figures to prove a point, and I am not objecting to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are the figures correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say to my hon. friend very frankly that there is no different treatment as between sections of this country. My hon. friend takes good care to protect his own part of the country, with which I am not as well acquainted as he is. He takes very good care to do that, but I want to tell him that there has been absolutely no different treatment in any part of this country. There may be differences arising from the fact that a certain district is largely urban or rural; there may be differences because there are more single men in one section of the country than in others. My hon. friend was very careful to quote the number of married men from one of these returns. The hon. gentleman fails to state that some of these districts take in parts of other provinces. He has a satanic smile on his face at the moment, as he tries to play politics.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know the minister did not mean to use that word, and I should like him to withdraw it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister was looking in a mirror, and we might let it go at that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Speaker, I am asking for a withdrawal of that remark.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend is hurt I withdraw it; but I liked his smile.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The answer the minister gives is the only answer that can be given by those who realize that they are wrong; that is, abuse. The returns stand unanswered. The records are here and they reveal the situation. The minister says that it is difficult to know whether or not the same number of men are available in the various districts. I ask him to compare the records as they appear in "Canada at War" for February, 1944. They show that the number of available men in the Kingston military district, No. 3—

Mr. MITCHELL: Military district No. 3 takes in part of Quebec.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, four counties.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I must have touched a sore point to bring on all these interruptions.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend has challenged us on two or three occasions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDINER: A moment ago my hon. friend challenged us and said that he would grant us the floor. If he does not want to do so, that is all right; but military district No. 3 includes part of the province of Quebec.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is quite right. At least I have been able to bring the ministers in on this; they are here, and are actually answering. According to the figures, in February, 1944, there were 187,000 men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five in military district No. 3, while in military district No. 5 there were 214,000 men between these ages. In other words, there were more in military district No. 5 than in military district No. 3, which accentuates the point of unfairness I am endeavouring to make, that almost sixteen times as many men in district No. 3 were called up as were called up in district No. 5.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are dealing with married men.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Those figures speak for themselves; they tell their own story. There they stand, embalmed in the records of this country, and they support the contention of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition that there is not equality of call or anything approaching equality of sacrifice in this country to-day, owing to the failure of the government to endeavour to bring about that equality. All the records show that the conclusion of inequality to which I have come is entirely in accordance with the facts. The minister has stated to those who are in the home defence army that they are performing a very fine and necessary service. That being so, I ask him why and under whose authority Major Jarvis, district recruiting officer of military district No. 10, sent out the famous letter of June 20, 1944, in which he said in part:

> If when you report you elect to be enrolled in the home defence army rather than volunteer for the active army you will be subject to all the discipline and routine of army life, but will be rendering no service to your country in this hour of crisis.

That was the attitude taken by Brigadier Mess in the two remarkable radio addresses which he delivered. Were those men speaking with the authority of the government? Does the government have one attitude in the House of Commons for the country at large and a different one to be displayed by officers of the Department of National Defence when they endeavour to obtain recruits for the active army?

I should like to make one more point; it has not been dealt with as yet, and it does indicate that as between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Labour there is a very great void. Having regard to the shortage of man-power—according to Mr. MacNamara and the minister 150,000 men will be required this year, in addition to some women—I feel that we should endeavour to mobilize the man-power pool of Canadians in the United States. No one knows how many there are or how many have gone over in recent months, although I remember that only a few weeks ago the Minister of Labour, in an endeavour to explain the "lost legion", expressed the view that a considerable number might have gone to the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: Many Americans have joined the Canadian Army, and have come over here.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have statistics which show the pool in the United States. On June 2, 1944, I received sessional paper No. 206G from the Department of Labour. I had asked:

> How many male citizens resident in the United States between the ages of eighteen and thirty-eight, who had not declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States, are estimated to have been or to be subject to service in the Canadian armed forces, (a) as of January, 1943, (b) as of this date.

They did not know; that is what the answer indicates, because the answer given was:

> As of December 31, 1942, there were 7,938 men in the United States armed forces who, upon enlistment, declared themselves to be Canadian citizens.

Then, further on:

> From January 1, 1943, up to February 29, 1944, there were an additional 5,485 men in the United States armed forces who, upon enlistment, declared themselves to be Canadian citizens.

What does all this add up to? It shows that there have enlisted in the United States some 13,400 men. That is no answer at all with respect to the question, and the inference is that the Department of Labour did not know there were any more.

I had asked the same question—and this is one thing to which the minister has always objected; for he says that members should not ask a question more than once, because they are apt to get different answers.

Mr. MITCHELL: I never said anything of the sort. What I did say was that my hon. friend changed his dates. He shifts his dates.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We will just see whether the date was changed. In return No. 124, brought down on January 27, 1943—

Mr. MITCHELL: Sure, sure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —the answer was given by the Department of National Defence that there were then in the United States estimated to be 91,800 male Canadian citizens between the ages of eighteen and thirty-eight, who had not declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States. There were 91,800 on January 27, 1943, when I asked the question; and when I asked this year how many there were as of the same date the Department of Labour was not able to give an answer, although pointing out that some 13,000 had enlisted.

In all seriousness, if we do not take into consideration the number who have wandered across the international boundary line in the last year, there are still in the United States men available for service either in the United States or in the Canadian Army to the number of approximately 78,000, men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-eight.

I suggest that, having regard to our present situation, with the man-power situation as it is, serious attention should be given now to their mobilization, and that something should be done toward ascertaining how many have gone to the United States during the last year, with a view to bringing them back to this dominion.

So far as the man-power situation is concerned, I think one can sum it up in the words of the Minister of Finance, where he said:

> As long as this war goes on, as long as Canadian lives are at stake, we here must not let down in any phase of our war effort. The burden of our responsibility is heavy indeed—but given the will to succeed, we have the strength to carry it.

We shall not have that will if we have not leadership which sets aside political expediency and ensures equality of service in this country. All we have had in the last year, so far as selective service is concerned, has been a series of attempts by regulation by the Minister of Labour to meet the situation. But he has not been given a free hand. It has been a bits and pieces programme. The man-power policy fails to direct itself to the serious matter of mobilization of all the man-power of this country, and it cannot be made solvent by monthly or even weekly infusions of new regulations. We are getting new regulations every day. The papers are full of them. But when it comes to facing the issue which must be faced, to pass the requisite regulations or orders in council, the government does not act.

As members of parliament we have a tremendous responsibility. We must face the challenge, and assure our people that both after and during the war mutual faith among all classes of our people can and must be substituted in place of suspicion which, too often, characterizes our people in the different provinces. Conditions which cause separation between provinces must be guarded against, and it is my submission that the establishment of equality of privilege with equality of responsibility is an assured way whereby unity can be brought to this nation.

Then, too, all of us must face the challenge that we can assure security with freedom, for unless we reverence freedom and maintain freedom the prospect following the war will be a fearful one. I believe it will be agreed by all that we must not compromise our basic way of life. We must resolutely refuse to sacrifice our freedom in return for a promise of economic security, for history has shown that economic security, without freedom, is meaningless and dangerous to the continuance of our democratic way of life. We in the house have a right and duty to face any infringement or invasion of our rights and freedoms, for if we lose our freedom in the House of Commons, if we lose our inalienable rights as members of parliament, then freedom in this nation will be destroyed.

I do not intend to do anything which would transgress the ruling made by you, sir, the other night, by a discussion of the merits or demerits of a speech delivered in another place by Senator Bouchard. But I do say, Mr. Speaker, that when freedom is interfered with in parliament, members of parliament, regardless of political belief, must resist any invasion of their prerogative rights and privileges. Never since 1764 in Great Britain has there been any invasion of the rights of a member of parliament to speak as he feels, to utter words that he believes must be uttered and to carry into effect the noble words of Burke, placed on Hansard in this debate by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Yet the Prime Minister, who so often in the past has spoken of the necessity of upholding the privileges of parliament, has remained silent at the most serious infringement of and challenge to parliame tary freedom that has taken place anywhere within this empire in a hundred and eighty years. Parliament cannot remain silent.

I have before me the report of the United Kingdom committee on the Sandys case in 1939. Sandys, a son-in-law of Winston Churchill, was alleged to have contravened the provisions of the official secrets act. He was to be called before a military board to give evidence, and a committee of parliament was set up to determine the extent of parliamentary privilege. The report of that committee concludes with these words:

"Parliament without parliamentary liberty," says Pym, "are but a fair and plausible way into bondage. Freedom of debate being once foreclosed the essence of the liberty of parliament is withal dissolved."

I have looked over the records of history disclosing the fight that has taken place over the years waged by members of parliament to assure the maintenance of their right to express themselves as they would without punishment outside parliament. Those liberties and rights go back a long way. The first example was in the reign of Henry VIII when one Strode was prosecuted for having introduced a bill in the House of Commons. He was fined and imprisoned, but thereupon an act was passed declaring that he was within his rights and could not be punished for exercising his parliamentary rights. Then was established the freedom of a member of parliament to speak without danger of punishment.

Then in 1629, during the days of Hampden, Pym and Eliot, Eliot was prosecuted, and again the right was established that what is spoken in parliament can be judged only in parliament and nowhere else. The principle was redeclared that what is spoken in parliament cannot be dealt with outside parliament. Then, of course, there are the provisions of the Bill of Rights which are declaratory in part of parliamentary privilege. The outstanding and final declaration occurred in 1764 when the king dismissed a general from his position as groom of the bedchamber because he had dared as a member of parliament to speak and vote as he wished. I quote from Anson where it is stated:

The practice was very shortly afterwards discontinued; in fact Burke claims credit to the Rockingham ministry of the following year for having "abolished the dangerous and unconstitutional practice of removing military officers for their votes in parliament."

When a man speaking in parliament is punished outside parliament—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given a good deal of latitude to the hon. member who is, I would say, in an oblique way dealing with a question which was dealt with in the other house. The hon. member is protesting against action taken outside parliament because of a speech made in parliament. He has referred to the Sandys case, which is the most recent one, but the hon. member will recall that he was a member of the House of Commons in England and he had spoken in the House of Commons. The hon. member is now dealing with a matter which is not within the House of Commons, but which arose in the other chamber. I objected to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) making reference before to this matter, and I think the hon. member is trespassing very much upon the territory which the hon. member for Parkdale was trespassing upon.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not intend to trespass in any way. I was not dealing with the speech; I was dealing with the question of the principle involved in punishment outside of parliament for words spoken by a member in parliament. I have never transgressed Your Honour's rulings in this house in any way, nor have I endeavoured to trespass in any way.

As to the budget I have not dealt with the financial details because I shall deal with them when we are in committee. Suffice it to say that we of His Majesty's opposition are one with the members on the side of the government, that whatever expenditure must be made shall be made to the end that victory shall be attained and to the end that the freedom for which we fight shall be maintained. I suggest that a great responsibility rests upon us to assure not only that freedom shall be maintained but that where there are infringements of that freedom, they shall be condemned.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in this debate we should not be considering Henry VIII and Senator Bouchard, we should be considering the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), paragraph (f) of which reads:

(f) that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, at a time when the need for men for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent.

That is the part of the Progressive Conservative amendment which has been discussed this afternoon. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) appeared to be more illogical than ever. He said he supports the amendment; he spoke against it and apparently he will vote for it. I cannot understand him. If he made a speech of that kind in Saskatchewan, his own province, then I am not surprised that not only has his party been wiped out but all remembrance of it has been wiped out in the last provincial election.

Who has power of attorney to speak for the Progressive Conservative party? Did the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, a former privy councillor in the Bennett cabinet, have power of attorney to speak on behalf of the forty odd members of that group? Or, on the other hand, is it the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) or the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who is the legitimate loudspeaker for the party? They are all entirely different.

On the one hand we have the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who is a farmer, saying that we have a reserve army which is of no use, which costs much money, $150 million a year, and which should be sent back to the farm. The three other hon. gentlemen take entirely opposite views. The hon. member for Vancouver South, who is a personal friend of mine, and the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is a personal friend of mine, have had certain military experience, but as far as the hon. member for York-Sunbury is concerned, he and I are on an equal footing. Neither one of us has had practical military experience and therefore my word is just as good as his.

Then there is another one who comes from behind; there is the former Mr. Justice McTague who replaced Mr. McArthur as national chairman of the so-called Progressive Conservative party . He made a statement and then changed it. Who is the spokesman? Is it Mr. Bracken? Is it the former Judge McTague? Is it one of the three hon. gentlemen I have just mentioned? Is it the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe? This is the most nebulous performance we have witnessed since the beginning of the session.

There is something in what is said by the Conservative spokesman for the jingoes, imperialists and the other crowd, on the one hand, and what is said for the farmer, on the other. The farmer is told that they have come to his rescue with the amendment to the budget, in which it is said that the men from the reserve army should be used on the farms. This is the old story of double words —one kind of speech for one kind of people and an entirely different kind of speech for the other kind of people. If the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe was serious why did he not support us when we were moving amendments for the defence of the farmers, showing the importance of the farmers on the land? But the members of the Progressive Conservative party voted against us as one man. If the Progressive Conservatives are sincere in saying that they are the friends of the farmer, let them explain their treatment of Mr. McArthur, a prominent farmer of Huntingdon county, who was hailed as the coming national Conservative chairman but was afterwards replaced by that smart Aleck, Judge McTague, who is thus described in the Toronto Telegram of June 29:

> Dressed in natty striped grey flannels, with tan and white shoes and white socks, the party's national chairman displayed an engaging willingness to answer every question put to him.

Here is the man who said that the reserve army should go to the front; but afterwards he backed up; that was not exactly what he meant; he meant something different. Let them tune their violins. Let us know what is the policy of the Conservative party. I know very well that the Conservative party is dead and has been buried for a long time. They do not call themselves Tories, these remnants of the party; they call themselves Progressive Conservatives. I have some personal friends among them; on the human side of their personalities they are very fine fellows, but when it comes to announcing a political programme they are all mixed up. Where is their leader? Do they agree with him? What is his policy? We do not know what his policy is. He is fishing in troubled waters. They meet each day in caucus; why do they not take advantage of it to tune their violins and come into the house with a united front? They go to the right; they go to the left; they look to the right and they jump to the left. That has been the Tory policy since the beginning of this session, in fact since the beginning of the war. We have heard from Saskatchewan and British Columbia members, coming from a part of the country which is defended by young boys from Quebec, saying that Quebec is not doing her share. I am sure that the good English-speaking people of Saskatchewan, even those of foreign extraction, will be just as much scandalized as I was this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Lake Centre make the speech he did. In Saskatchewan they did not agree with him; they defeated the candidate and provincial leader of his party. My hon. friend is younger than I am; I have made more fights than he has, and I tell him that if he has recourse to such tactics his future is doomed. I advise him honestly and as a friend to use other tactics if he wants to emerge in due course.

For the province of Quebec we have figures given in decimals. Does my hon. friend believe in decimals? Does he believe in the statistics which are supplied by any department? I do not. According to the figures supplied by the bureaucracy Quebec is the goat. Quebec is always the goat. My hon. friend does not know that the figures supplied to members of parliament are prepared by men who do not know how to do the work, whom I had to tell years ago how to do certain work. The hon. member for Vancouver South who was on the civil service committee must remember very well that I had to tell those "experts" how to do certain work, which was badly done. When the chairman of the civil service commission came before us I asked him plainly, "Mr. Bland, is this chart made out as it should be?" He did not answer me. I said, "This item at the right-hand corner, should it not be at the left-hand corner?" He said, "Yes." And so on and so on. Then I called Putman, one of the important members of the civil service commission—I do not know if he is there now—and I had to tell him what to do. I said, "I want this information to-morrow morning." "Oh," he said, "we cannot do it by to-morrow morning." "Then I should like it by to-morrow afternoon." "Oh, sir, please, it is so much work we cannot do it by to-morrow afternoon." "Then I want it done the day after to-morrow by ten o'clock." "Oh, sir, you do not know what it means. It is a tremendous amount of work." Finally I said, "Then I want it by two o'clock the day after to-morrow. Will you have it, or not?" And then he telephoned me and asked me if it was well done. I had to teach him what to do and how to do it. Without definite instructions from men who know how this work should be done, what guarantee has the hon. gentleman that these figures are correct? What I know and what most hon. members from Quebec know very well is that their counties have been drained, that there are no more men of military age left in our counties. Look at the list of unemployment insurance offices and the selective service offices. No men are applying for positions; no men are available except a few day labourers. On the other hand there are long lists of farmers and men concerned with essential industries who are asking for labour and cannot secure it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: At six o'clock I had made a reference to the different statements of the national Progressive Conservative chairman McTague on two occasions—on the occasion of his nomination at Guelph and in an interview which was given to the press when he came here to Ottawa. I do not know the reason why he has been selected as national chairman. In my humble view, as in the view of many others, that man has been greatly overrated. He is just a man who has been boosted for some reason or another and he is far from being one who is serious enough to be the national chairman of a great party. I remember the time when the Conservative party was in existence. At that time there was a good man as chairman of the party, a man like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), but now that is finished.

There are some observations which I wish to make. I have here a poster which was shown in the windows of large business offices in several cities in Canada and which reads:

> Canada's aid to the united nations. The value of eggs, cheese, wheat, flour, canned fish and bacon exported by Canada to members of the united nations in 1943 amounted to:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Eggs | $ 14,700,000 |
> | Cheese | 26,800,000 |
> | Wheat | 234,400,000 |
> | Flour | 66,300,000 |
> | Canned fish | 18,400,000 |
> | Bacon | 116,200,000 |
> Shipments of wheat to the people of enemy occupied Greece as a gift of the Canadian people up to November, 1943, totalled 7,930,030 bushels. Canada has also instituted its own mutual aid plan under which Canadian equipment, material and foodstuffs to the value of $1 billion are being made available to the united nations on the basis of strategic need.

It is impossible, sir, to contend that eggs, cheese, wheat, flour, canned fish and bacon come out of spontaneous generation.

Mr. CHURCH: It looks like an illuminated address.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend the member for Broadview has always a picturesque expression to describe things. Now, sir, we have made a fight for the farmers, certainly not because we are against the war effort. There is a handful of members who have done it, and at the time when the jingoes were tightening the regulations concerning the farmers we made a fight for them in the first instance in connection with the regulations which mentioned agriculture as a seasonal occupation. We succeeded in having that important industry described also as an essential occupation; when the training was extended from one month to four months we succeeded in having an extension of from four to six months for the farmer, and when the army regulations were changed so that the training was extended from four months to the duration, we succeeded also in having the postponement for farmers extended until further notice. Well, that was something, and the work that was done here by a handful of members who were not afraid to speak their minds helped the constituents of hon. members who are asking so strongly to send men overseas. When I addressed a fine group of men in western Ontario not long ago I said that the farmers of Middlesex county were gaining from the fight waged in parliament by just a handful of French-speaking members, and that is true of the farmers of the whole country. The farmers of Lake Centre and those in the vicinity of Vancouver, the farmers of York-Sunbury, the farmers in the vicinity of Toronto, the farmers of Quebec, the farmers all over the land have been helped by the constant efforts of members of parliament who were not afraid to ask for the exemption of farmers from any military training.

I remember at times we were howled down and called friends of Hitler just because we were thinking of real human values and of the essentiality of these occupations in war time. Opinions are free undoubtedly, but free opinions when they are contradictory cannot all be right, and we were facing all sorts of difficulties, but we were never downhearted and we took the same stand all the time, whether it was the plebiscite or the mobilization bill. On all occasions we waged the fight for the farmers; and those like the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who is sponsoring the amendment which is now before the Chair, were always fighting against us as one man. But they did something for the farmer. They said that he should have better prices. That reminds me of something that happened when Mr. Bennett was in power. I said to the chairman one day that I had been passing through his county. It was at the time when unemployment was being discussed so much and I said I had stopped at a certain place to telephone and there was a young lady there. I asked her if she had brothers and she said she had two. I said, "What are they doing?" She said, "One is a qualified carpenter, and he has gone fishing for smelts." I said, "What is the other one doing?" She replied, "He is a mason." I said, "What is he doing now" She replied, "He is hunting ducks." That simply showed that these men who had trades could not find any work. Then, answering certain objections, I said to him, "To whom will you preach patriotism when all the Canadians are dead of hunger?" And do you know, sir, what happened? The day after, two pages of Hansard were gone; that does not show in Hansard. Instructions were given so that it would not appear in Hansard.

Well, now, I put the same question: Who will farm this country if all the farmers are gone? I have no objection to helping a young man who is willing to go overseas go there, to have all obstacles removed for him if it is his desire. I respect his freedom of choice; but on the other hand if there is a farmer who is essential on the farm he has to be fought for not only with regard to the revenue of farm production but with regard to his stay on the land. Sometimes we are told that we are unpatriotic, that we are bad Canadians just because we speak that way in the house, just because we say in the house what every member in whose consituency there are farmers would say to them when he speaks publicly in his constituency.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that with regard to some matters the minister said "yes" and his officials gave an answer directly opposite. I shall apply to these men, to Major General Pearkes, to Brigadier Mess and to all those ejusdem farinae what the minister has just said with regard to imperialists and jingoes. "There are two classes in this country who make it difficult: first"—and this applies to Pearkes, Mess and the others—"those who are insistent on conscription whether we can get volunteers or not. Consciously or unconsciously, they discourage volunteer recruiting by constantly keeping up the agitation, criticizing and disparaging the efforts of those who are loyally giving their best efforts to persuade and urge young men of Canada to enlist." This applies to those men, and if Major General Pearkes deserves special consideration as a V.C., I suggest that he should exchange places with my friend Filip Konowal, V.C., and come down and clean the spittoons in the House of Commons and give the command in British Columbia to Filip Konowal, V.C. I think that would be the real thing. I have been fighting alone for Filip Konowal; I want recognition for him.

Mr. RALSTON: Shame.

Mr. POULIOT: Put Filip Konowal elsewhere. We are told sometimes that some officers are not bilingual when the men speak only one other language. That is not fair. An officer must understand the language of his men. There is no reason why a man should have an interpreter to speak to at least one of his officers. There is one thing that any hon. gentleman who has been in the army knows very well, namely, that as soon as a man gets into the army, whether he has volunteered or not, he thinks of home; he wants to go home on his first leave. He wants his leave. There have been times when leaves have been refused men because they did not volunteer.

I have here a few notes of what is being done in the line of persuasion to induce men to volunteer by making appeals to their reason. You will be surprised, sir. It is something shameful. In the first place they have one forty-eight hour leave in two months. Formerly I think they had one forty-eight hour and one thirty-six hour leave per month. In the second place sleeping-out passes of the N.R.M.A. men are cancelled. Third, permament leave until midnight is cancelled, which means that the soldiers cannot go to the movies, theatre concerts, et cetera. They cannot go to those concerts outside the camp, since they have to leave the hall around nine-thirty. Fourth, names are called in the huts at ten o'clock to prevent N.R.M.A. men from going to free movies given at the camp four times weekly. If a soldier is five minutes late he goes to the clink. Volunteers are sent to the clink only if absent for more than twenty-one days or if drunk. But if a man is called a zombie or a dead-living man is five minutes late he is sent to the clink. Fifth, access to playgrounds is forbidden to them. They have no right to play tennis, baseball, or anything. Sixth, they are forbidden to go to the beer canteen even though they are thirsty. I find that awful. Seventh, they are put in separate huts. They eat in the same kitchens but at separate tables to humiliate them. They are exposed to jeers and sneers from those who have volunteered and who say that they are cowards, do not have the guts to volunteer. Eighth, they are forbidden to attend dances, games of bridge or any other social activity for the recreation of the soldier. Ninth, free time and leisure time for others and week-ends are employed in dirty work. Sundays—that July 2—N.R.M.A. men were working with pick and shovel part of the afternoon at Barriefield, eighty miles from Ottawa.

I have a few notes here which were taken in May at the camp at Lauzon. The men had nothing to do. They were kept like prisoners in cells just because they did not volunteer, although the minister explained this afternoon that these men are doing excellent work, but they have no recreation. They are like friars who have made the three vows, and have no distraction. It is not surprising that they dislike the army and that some of them are deserters. I understand it very well. Why are there facilities for entertaining all soldiers? It is precisely to make them just as happy as possible in the army. But all that is cancelled because these men do not sign for overseas. They act in conformity with the law which is in force at the present time, and they are punished for that; they are humiliated and we are still told that there is no conscription. There is conscription, of course; there is conscription by the back door, and it has been condemned by the Globe and Mail. They were perfectly right in condemning it. The trouble is that we are far away from realities. We must know what is meant by conscription. If we mean by conscription, and it is the spirit as well as the letter of the law, that a man or a woman should be at the place where he or she can serve best in the war effort nobody will object to that. But the trouble is that some people understand by conscription only the sending of men overseas, paying no attention to the usefulness of the farmers, the railwaymen or the men in the munitions factories and all the men who are essential to the war effort. That is the difficulty. When a member of parliament, or a journalist or anyone else says that it is wrong, that we cannot go very far with an unbalanced, one-sided war effort, that we need a balanced war effort, then immediately that person is told he is a bad Canadian and does not appreciate what should be done during this war.

I am perhaps the one member who has said the most to try to encourage the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and to give him a superiority complex. I still maintain, sir, that the man who must carry the burden of the man-power problem during the war is not the Minister of Defence (Mr. Ralston); it is the Minister of Labour. He should not have the position of a hyphen between the Department of National Defence and industry. He should be the judge, the man who will decide the usefulness of every man.

No complaint whatever should be favourably received unless it is proved to his satisfaction that the men asked for by the army are really needed. I cannot understand hon. gentlemen opposite, who always agree with any commitment that may be made with regard to the size of the army. They never blame the Minister of National Defence for the size of the Canadian army, which is larger than during the last war. It is out of proportion, because we are making more munitions than we did during the last war, and we are feeding more countries than we did then. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not take those facts into consideration; they are ready to destroy this country probably just for an electoral argument. They should do better than that. They cannot go on in that way, putting politics into the question of man-power and all these other matters. It would be unbelievable. Then I should like to say that many soldiers are given punishment that is out of proportion to the offence, and when the sentence is served the men are found unfit, although they have been kept in the clink for a long time. Some men have been imprisoned for two years or more, during which time they were no good to the army or to the country. When any complaints are made, the commanding officer is supreme.

In closing, sir, I should like to define my own Liberalism by quoting a telegram which I sent to the secretary of the Liberal youth convention at Winnipeg on May 29:

Admirable and fortunate youths who sincerely believe in the Liberal creed and who have not yet lost the gift of speech, I salute you from our national capital, where my parliamentary duties are preventing me from attending your convention.

Be sure that you will remain young so long as your heart remains young. Never forget that anyone is disqualified for public service the very day he becomes vain and selfish. Always forget yourself to think of and for your fellow countrymen.

We have every reason to be proud of the pioneers and builders of Liberalism who gladly suffered poverty and humiliation while fighting the family compact. They promoted democracy and established a responsible government. Make their doctrine your own.

You will gain prestige in keeping your personality true to itself. Do not let anyone extinguish in your heart the sacred flame of enthusiasm. Take your inspiration from the immortal speeches of the great Liberal leaders of the past and compare your notes with what is said to-day.

In these materialistic times when countless opportunists worship the golden calf, do not rely on hearsay for your appreciation of current events. Weigh what is said and what is done. Remember that freedom of speech is the very essence of Liberalism. Never be afraid to make your own judgment and to defend your own views until one proves to the satisfaction of your mind that you are not right.

Do not judge anyone by what he is, but by what he accomplishes. To quote the great Laurier, be adamant with the haughty, but do not fail to be kind, generous and helpful to the sick and the needy, in order that the Liberal party never ceases to be the people's party. Public respect will be your reward.

Liberalism shall never die. Liberalism shall never be a meaningless word. If it ever became a smoke-screen for lobbyists, profiteers and theatrical producers, would it not be an outrage to the glorious past of the Liberal party?

A large number of well gifted and promising young men are in the Canadian forces. Those who will survive this terrible war and yourselves will have the duty to join together in a patriotic and common effort to establish "the new order" which everybody speaks of and which nobody knows.

The task of reshaping the destiny of our beloved country, Canada, is formidable. It is yours. Do not be downhearted. You may succeed and you will do so, but only if you are imbued with Christian charity and with a true Canadian spirit, and if you are guided by the sound principles of true Liberalism.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the subject that is now before the house; I refer to the consideration of this year's budget, which was presented to parliament by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 26. Like other hon. members who have spoken, there are certain points concerning which I should like to congratulate the minister. I agree with him in the basic considerations which he singled out as those that had to be faced in formulating this year's budget proposals. There were four, as indicated at page 4174 of Hansard: first, meeting the cash requirements; second, encouraging production; third, relieving cases of special hardship in the matter of income taxation; fourth, facing up to the need of a plan for the post-war period. I feel, too, that I want to congratulate the minister upon the clarity with which he states his position as far as the post-war period is concerned. I do not agree with the position he takes, but I could wish that other hon. members would follow his example and discuss objectively and straightforwardly the basic issues before us as we look into the post-war period, instead of indulging in diatribes and criticisms of one kind or another against the principles of democratic control of industry and public ownership. Both in this debate and in the debate that took place a short time ago on the second reading of the Bank Act the minister made his position quite clear. He also made it clear that in his mind there is an issue as between private enterprise and the public ownership and control which this party proposes, and that this is the issue which will have to be settled in the immediate post-war period.

In a few minutes I shall come back to what the minister had to say along that line. Before doing so, I wish to say something about the financial proposals which the minister has presented on the basis of his first three considerations. First of all, I should like to speak about the suggestion that the compulsory savings portion of the personal income tax be discontinued. The minister pointed out in his speech that this action will mean a loss of revenue to the government in the amount of about $110,000,000 a year. In other words the minister has told the house and the country that in the light of the protests which have been made and the grievances that need to be adjusted it is possible to make adjustments in the budget for this year to the tune of $110,000,000. Accordingly, when we in this corner of the house make certain suggestions we are not asking for money which is not there. We are merely proposing alternative ways of making adjustments with that $110,000,000. Basically our contention is that if there is that amount of money with which adjustments can be made, the full benefit of it should go to those who need it most, namely to those in the lower income brackets. That is the reason why, even though we welcome in the name of the people who will get some relief this proposal of the minister, we have contended that alternative measures would have been better. We feel that the whole amount of that $110,000,000 should have been given by way of relief to those in the lower income brackets.

When different speakers supporting the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party, and hon. members from other parts of the house, have suggested that the income tax exemption level should be raised, the reply of the minister has been that if that were done it would result in huge savings of income tax for those in the higher brackets. This was said, too, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). I would point out that when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke he said that if an adjustment such as we are proposing were to be made, there would have to be an adjustment of the rates in the higher brackets, so that what was feared would not happen. In other words, there is no real argument on the point; it is just a matter of arithmetic, or a matter of adjusting the rates. We contend that if there is this amount of money with which adjustments can be made, the full benefit of it should go to those in the lower income tax brackets.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does that include the hon. member?

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I refer to a lower bracket than the one in which we happen to come. Our problem is one of a special type, as the hon. minister knows.

As a matter of fact a small portion of that $110,000,000—perhaps seven, eight or ten millions—might have been used to give a further increase in old age pensions. I mention that as being in line with what I have already said, that if there is this amount of money with which to make adjustments, certainly no portion of that benefit should go to those in the upper brackets who do not need it, but who will get a measure of relief under the government's plan. The whole of it should go to those who need it.

There are a number of details I should like to call to the attention of the Minister of Finance or, in some cases, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson). Their work, so far as income tax matters are concerned, is pretty much allied. I hold in my hand a copy of a notice sent to an income tax payer at a Toronto address. I need not give his name, but I have the actual document in my hand. It is dated June 6, 1944, and is identified as form T-218. This notice advised the taxpayer in question that his 1941 income tax had finally been assessed, and that it had been found that when he made out his income tax return for 1941 it was one cent short. So that, according to this statement, he now owes for 1941 the amount of one cent. But the form goes on to show that, in addition to the one cent, he owes interest. I hope members of the banking and commerce committee are not listening to this, because it may put ideas in their heads. It states that he owes interest on one cent amounting to $3.33, or a total debt of $3.34.

Mr. MITCHELL: On one cent?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, on one cent, in two years. That one cent was due in 1942, and is now to be paid in 1944. But he must pay $3.33 interest which, according to my calculations, amounts to 16,650 per cent per annum.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Something wrong somewhere.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should imagine that is usury.

Mr. KNOWLES: The letter goes on to say that if this request is disregarded and the money is not paid within fifteen days of receipt of notice, legal action will be taken for recovery, in court, or the taxpayer's income may be intercepted at its source by statutory powers. The notice is signed by W. S. Fisher, chief solicitor. The comment has been made that there is something wrong—and there certainly is.

Mr. GRAYDON: I guess that fellow has gone C.C.F., anyway.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, if he has not, he should.

Mr. KNOWLES: Incidentally, this taxpayer tells me that he was puzzled as to how he should make out his return in 1942, for the year 1941. He went to the office of the income tax people in Toronto, and had them help him make it out. The one cent mistake was their mistake, in the first place.

There is another matter I would call to the attention of these two ministers. This arose out of an unfortunate experience which was drawn to my attention a few months ago. A taxpayer in Winnipeg received notice that he still owed $10 on his taxes for 1942. He was satisfied that he had paid the tax in full, and had his receipts. When he took the receipts to the Winnipeg office he was confronted with the blunt statement that his receipt in one instance did not conform to the records in the office, and he was told that he must have tampered with that receipt. The man was so incensed that he came to see me immediately, and I in turn took up the matter with the income tax authorities in Ottawa. May I say at this point that the income tax authorities here took care of the matter to my entire satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the taxpayer. In due course he was given a definite apology for some of the things that had been said to him.

But the point I call to the attention of the department is that that mistake could not have happened if a very simple change were made in the form of the receipt that is issued. What I say holds true to-day with respect to the receipts for such income tax payments as some of us are still making. The receipts have room only for the insertion of the amount in figures. There is no room for inserting the amount in words, by way of confirmation. If that very simple change were made, a change which it seems to me ought to be made in connection with income tax receipts, incidents such as the one I have described could not occur.

Another matter to which I would refer has already been mentioned in the debate by at least two hon. members. I refer to the request of parents of student nurses for income tax exemption on their account. This matter has been drawn to the attention of the authorities on a number of occasions. During the earlier part of the year I was in correspondence with both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. In fact, in the house on May 19, during the discussion of another matter which had some bearing on the point, I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether something was being done, and his reply as it appears at page 3087 of Hansard for May 19, was:

> The matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance and I know he is giving it consideration at the present time.

Well, that was not a commitment on the part of the Minister of Finance, but I must say that after that statement I was disappointed when this grievance was not taken care of under the third of the minister's basic considerations.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A different minister said it, though.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the matter had been referred to the Minster of Finance. As a matter of fact I had correspondence from him in which he made a similar statement.

Another point under the third consideration outlined by the minister has to do with sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters. As hon. members may know—for most of us have a good deal of contact with these gentlemen, as we travel around the country—they are treated differently, in one income tax matter, from railway engineers, firemen, brakemen and train conductors. These latter men to whom I have referred are allowed certain exemptions for their expenses while away from home. That allowance is denied to sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters. I shall not take the time to give the technical basis for the discrimination, but it seems to me that something should be done to bring the situation into line as between these two groups. Here again I was in correspondnece with the two ministers to whom I have referred, and on May 30 the Minister of Finance wrote me in reply to one of my letters about a case of this kind and said:

> I shall be glad to see that your representations are given careful consideration in the pre-budgetary discussions which are now taking place.
> Yours very truly,
> J. L. Ilsley.

That was not a commitment, but the very fact that the matter was to be given consideration made me feel that there was some hope. Again I was disappointed that the minister did not include a correction of that grievance when the budget was brought down.

Still another situation to which I should like to refer is the discrimination as between various pension plans when it comes to exemption from total income in the filing of income tax returns. This has been brought to my attention in particular by employees of the two railways, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. There are some plans the payments into which are exempted from total income before income tax is paid, while there are other pension plans where that allowance is not granted. I appreciate the minister's statement on this whole matter and I have given it close study. I notice it is his intention to set up a commission to study this subject, but in the meantime these employees feel that there is a marked discrimination against them which I feel the minister might have taken care of this year. My time will not permit me to argue the case in detail, but I hope that even yet the minister will reconsider a number of matters like this, before the budget resolutions are finally passed.

There is still another grievance under clause 3 of the minister's basic considerations. On several occasions I have raised in the house the matter of income tax deductions from the men who went to Kiska. After some considerable time the Minister of National Revenue made an announcement in which he concurred with my request. That announcement was most welcome, but there was such a long delay in making it that these men had already had taken away from them taxes which should not have been deducted. In the meantime some of these men have gone overseas, and deductions which were made in January, February and March of this year and which should not have been made, and which the government is now admitting will go back to them, are still being withheld. It looks to these men, if they live, as though they will not get these rebates until some time in 1946. I have taken this matter up several times with the department, but I urge that this matter could be expedited to an extent of which there has not yet been sufficient evidence.

I should like to turn for a moment to some of the comments I was making earlier when I congratulated the minister upon his clarity in stating his position so far as the post-war period was concerned. He has made it clear in this and other debates that he feels that the basis upon which to found post-war Canada is that of a return to the power and authority of private enterprise, private industry and private business. As a matter of fact, business itself is complaining that it is not getting everything it wants out of this budget, but at least the green light is there, the hint, the indication that if business will stick with the Liberal party it will get the full consideration it wants when the post-war period comes. The minister is unlike many other hon. members in that he faces up to the issue that has to be settled as between the return to the power and authority of private enterprise and the forward march to democratic public control of the economic life of the country in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: What does my hon. friend mean by "democratic control"?

[Mr. Knowles]

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it the Minister of Labour who is asking that question? I believe my hon. friend knew the answer before I did.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am asking my hon. friend for the answer.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to say to my hon. friend and to the house that I think it is pathetic, if not tragic, the kind of discussion that goes on in this house with respect to this basic issue. Members on all sides rise in their places and try to apply epithets to this party which are incorrect. They endeavour to point out that if the C.C.F. comes to power there will be regimentation, bureaucracy, loss of initiative, loss of democratic control and all that. That kind of argument is an insult to the Canadian people. The Canadian people are thinking more and more along these lines. Many hon. members do not seem to realize that there is an old adage which says that if you want to make an enemy, the quickest way to do it is to tell a friend that he is wrong. That is what some hon. members are doing to the Canadian people when they castigate the whole concept of democratic public control of the economic life of this country, in which I am glad to note the Minister of Labour is becoming interested once more.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us have an explanation of democratic control.

Mr. GILLIS: Give the hon. member a little time when his time expires and he will give you a lecture.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have already suggested that the people of Canada are interested in the issue in which the Minister of Labour and I are interested. That interest is borne out by the results of recent elections. It might have a salutary effect to remind the members of this house how the people of Canada have been casting their votes during the past few years. We have to my right the Progressive Conservative group which is four times as large as the C.C.F. representation. There is the Liberal group with its seventy per cent of the seats, but I suggest that that composition does not reflect the thinking of the Canadian people at the present time. I have here a table which I have worked out after consulting the "Canadian Parliamentary Guide" for 1944. It shows the composition of the various legislatures in this country. This table is as follows:

	Liberals	Progressive Conservatives	C.C.F.	Social Credit	Others	Vacancies	Totals	Date of last provincial election
British Columbia....	20	11	16	..	1	..	48	October 11, 1941.
Alberta.....	1	..	1	36	18	1	57	March 21, 1940.
Saskatchewan.....	5	..	47	..	..	..	52	June 15, 1944.
Manitoba.....	24	15	5	3	7	1	55	April 22, 1941.
Ontario.....	15	38	34	..	3	..	90	August 4, 1943.
Quebec.....	59	..	..	..	19	8	86	October 23, 1939.
New Brunswick....	24	19	..	..	..	5	48	November 20, 1939.
Nova Scotia.....	23	4	3	..	..	..	30	October 28, 1941.
Prince Edward Island	20	10	..	..	..	..	30	September 15, 1943.
Totals.....	191	97	106	39	48	15	496

Hon. members can look at that table; it will be, perhaps, more understandable in printed form than as I read it. But the significance of it is this, that although our hon. friends to our immediate right, the Progressive Conservatives, hold nearly four times as many seats in this house as we do, elected four and one-half years ago, in all nine legislatures in Canada they hold only ninety-seven seats, whereas we hold 106. In this house the Liberals still have a huge majority of seventy per cent, elected in 1940. In the nine legislatures of Canada their seats represent only forty per cent of the total. However, the figures I have given thus far are for all nine legislatures, three of which were elected prior to the last dominion election. The six which have held elections since that time are British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The totals for these six provinces, which can be taken out of the table I have already placed on Hansard, are: Liberals, 107; Progressive Conservative, 78; C.C.F., 105. I need not mention the representatives of other parties; they are very few. It will be noted that the Progressive Conservatives run a poor third; the C.C.F. and Liberals, neck and neck. But those six elections include three which were held in 1941. In 1942 there were no provincial elections. There have been three in 1943 and in 1944 thus far, and I suggest that these three still further underline the trend of thinking in this country. Where were they? They were in Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan. The people of these three widely scattered provinces returned—note these figures—forty Liberals, forty-eight Progressive Conservatives and eighty-one C.C.F. members of legislative assemblies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What percentage of the vote of Ontario did you get?

Mr. KNOWLES: These figures speak for themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What percentage of the vote did you get in Ontario?

Mr. GILLIS: We got thirty-four members there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How large a vote?

Mr. GILLIS: Thirty-four members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may be permitted to interrupt, my hon. friend is using the argument of representation by popular vote against the argument of number of members; I was asking him how large a percentage of the popular vote did his party get in Ontario.

Mr. COLDWELL: Fifty-four per cent in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the last retreat of my hon. friend.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is the last election.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry I have not the figures to give the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It destroys your whole argument.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no, it does not. I do not wonder that the minister tries to give an answer, but the figures are conclusive.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am asking how large a popular vote the C.C.F. got in Ontario.

Mr. COLDWELL: What did you get last time for your 178 seats?

Mr. KNOWLES: In 1942, 1943 and 1944 there have been held in this country twenty-six by-elections, both federal and provincial. I am leaving nothing out; it includes the by-elections which elected the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National War Services and the Minister of Justice to this house.

Mr. MITCHELL: We were elected.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. I am trying to point out that we are not omitting my hon. friend, who has found a new interest in democratic public control.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like my hon. friend to explain "democratic public control."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: Here are the results of these twenty-six by-elections over the whole country: Liberal victories, nine; C.C.F. nine; Progressive Conservative, one; Independent, one; Labour Progressive, one; Bloc Populaire, one; Social Credit, one; Manitoba Coalition, three.

But perhaps hon. members from the east might be particularly interested in the way we do it out west. An hon. member from New Brunswick says he is not interested, but I will tell him anyway. Of these twenty-six by-elections, twelve were held in the four western provinces; three were federal and nine provincial. The C.C.F. won all three of the federal, but I will group them together. Of the twelve by-elections in the west the C.C.F. won eight; Manitoba Coalition, three; Social Credit, one; Liberal, nil; Progressive Conservative, nil.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Was I not elected at a by-election in 1941?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. If you want to go back to 1940 or 1935 you will establish a different trend.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is a change.

Mr. KNOWLES: What I am trying to show here is the present trend. I gave figures first of all showing the nine legislatures, going right back to 1939, but to get the trend I have come down to these more recent periods, and the figures I have just given are for the years 1942, 1943 and 1944 thus far.

Mr. GARDINER: What is important is the future trend.

Mr. GILLIS: It is pretty nearly time you fellows got started.

Mr. COLDWELL: This indicates the future trend.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends may have some more jolts coming to them in future months. It is because of the kind of discussions which take place in this house so frequently that I felt that these figures should be presented to hon. members, that they should realize that when they castigate us, when they run down the ideas for which we stand, they are flying in the face of the thinking of the people whom many of them still represent—"misrepresent," my leader says—because they were elected at the time of the last general election. I would hope that even yet, pending the day when there will be a new parliament which will reflect better the thinking of the Canadian people at the present time, hon. members will face up to the issues which will confront us in the post-war period, for it is obvious that that is the wish of the Canadian people.

This all arose out of my congratulating the Minister of Finance upon facing up to that issue and upon stating clearly the case as he sees it, even though I disagree with him on the stand he takes.

Mr. GARDINER: The stand you say he takes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I see that my time has just about expired. I should like to refer briefly to another matter.

When the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) rose to speak this afternoon I thought he might deal with the matter about which he questioned the Minister of National Defence a week or two ago; I refer to the destruction in Brandon of material formerly used by the army at the A-4 centre which was closed there a short while ago. The hon. member a couple of weeks ago asked a question on the orders of the day about this. I have received considerable correspondence concerning it. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Brandon had asked the question I have refrained from raising the matter, thinking he would pursue it, and I thought he would certainly do so to-day. Apparently he has accepted the minister's answer, which he made, I believe, on Friday, to the effect that these things—enamel ware, porcelain ware and so on—were destroyed for medical reasons. One of the correspondents I have had in connection with this matter from the city of Brandon is a medical doctor. He of course, as might be expected, ridicules the idea that these things could not have been sterilized, and I may say that the people of Brandon, according to the information I have, and the people of Winnipeg, 130 miles away, are quite indignant over this destruction of goods which could have been used—kinds of goods which are not available for civilian purchase in Manitoba at the present time. I have in my hand a copy of the Winnipeg Tribune of July 7 which contains photographs of some of these goods, showing that the axe has been put right through them to destroy them and make sure that they could not be used.

I have not the time to go into this matter in greater detail, but the answer given by the Minister of National Defence does not satisfy the local people in Brandon or the people of Manitoba generally, and I think the whole question of the disposal of army and canteen goods calls for further investigation at this stage, so that if there has been anything amiss in this incident the situation will not be repeated. I am perplexed to understand it in the light of the action which this parliament took in setting up the War Assets Corporation. I wonder why it is that these goods were not declared surplus and turned over to that corporation for sale or disposal in some orderly way. It has been called to my attention that some of these articles such as coal scuttles, garbage cans, et cetera, which missed the axe when they were thrown on the dump in Brandon, have been retrieved by Brandon citizens and are now being used. The people are glad to get them and sterilize them and make use of them, because such articles are not available on the market there at the present time. I hope the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Munitions and Supply will look into this matter further, so that if there has been anything amiss it can be corrected before there is a recurrence of it.

The vote will shortly be taken, I understand. We of this group were prepared to have the debate concluded on June 29—

Mr. MATTHEWS: Will the hon. member furnish the house with the name of the medical doctor who gave him this information? Who and what is he?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am very glad to do so. He is Doctor D. L. Johnson, who is the M.L.A. for Brandon. I suppose my hon. friend—a friend, by the way, of many years—is wanting me to point out that he is a C.C.F. M.L.A. In the light of the figures I gave a few minutes ago I suggest that the case is strengthened by that fact. This gentleman is one of the by-election victors to whom I referred.

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that when the vote is taken on the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservatives we shall find ourselves, admittedly, in a bit of a quandary. There is much in it that is inconsistent and much in it that does not mean a great deal. Nevertheless there are in it some things with which we agree. We are therefore going to give it our qualified support and will vote for it. We regret, however, that an amendment quite as ambiguous as this should be before the house at such a time when what the people want is really something definite. I would remind Your Honour that the amendment moved by the leader of this group, which has already been turned down by the house, was such an amendment, a definite proposal as to what the house ought to do to provide for a better Canada in the post-war period.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): If I followed the example of most hon. members who have spoken I would put a table on Hansard and read the rest of my speech—blank, blank, blank, blank, blank, Fraser Valley.

An hon. MEMBER: What is this one now?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say to the house, through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not going to be a speech like most of those that have been made in this budget debate, a speech which someone reads that has been written by someone else. I have no notes; I have nothing written, and any time I have to have my speech written by somebody else it will not be made in this house. I am sorry to say that does not go for at least eighty-five per cent of the members, and I do not need to look very far afield when I say that, or in any particular corner of the house. I cannot understand how any member of this house, being a returned soldier, can refrain from taking part in this debate. I am sorry that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is not in the house, because what I have to say is concerned primarily with his department. Possibly there might be an election, and after hearing all the delightful figures from Winnipeg I wish to put myself on record now before that election.

Mr. Speaker, in the few years that I have been in Ottawa I have been treated with great courtesy by yourself, by the Clerk, and by every official of the House of Commons and every senior official of the civil service with whom I have come in contact, and on this occasion I wish to express my appreciation of all these courtesies that have been shown me. And let me say that I have no hope of getting a judgeship.

The reason why I am speaking now is that, as I understand, it is desired to have the vote taken to-night. I certainly would not have spoken to-night if I had thought that the vote would be taken to-morrow; I would have preferred to wait until then. However, let me say that I have listened throughout this debate in connection with the budget to everything except the budget. Everything but the budget has been discussed, and I have heard now something that I had not expected to hear discussed even by my hon. friends from Winnipeg—the groom of the bedchamber. The reason why I am not going to vote against the government on this occasion is this. Frankly, I had expected that I would vote against the government on the budget because I did not see how I could do otherwise as a returned soldier. The Progressive Conservatives would have received my support if their amendment had been framed in different language. I would have been voting with them, but I cannot vote with them as the amendment stands. I entirely disagree with the government on their man-power policy and am not afraid to say so, but I must say at the same time that every party in this house made the same mistake in 1940. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation did not want to take any part in the war at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The C.C.F. would take no part in the war at all. They would not send any men overseas to fight. Well, would they wait until the enemy had come over here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): September 7, 1939.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The Liberal party, however, made a mistake—and I am a supporter of the Liberal party. The National Conservative party of that day, whose name has been changed about eleven times since then, would also not take any action. The fact of the matter is that none of us was prepared to face the public and say that we would put conscription into force from the drop of the hat, although we represented the people of Canada.

Mr. JAQUES: We did.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not flatter you by calling your party a party.

Mr. JAQUES: We fought the election on it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was speaking of the main parties. However, I am glad to know that your party took that stand.

Mr. JAQUES: You might admit it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have listened to you people making your speeches about $25 a month several times and I want you to listen to my speech about $25 an hour. None of the parties had courage to face the public and say that it would put conscription into force at the very outset, as the United States and Great Britain did. We all made a mistake, and I include myself. But surely we should have the courage now to admit our mistake. There is one thing I cannot understand in public life and it is this. We speak of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, but what do they do? If the government adopts any of their better ideas they immediately begin to cry because those ideas have been adopted, but that is what the opposition is for. The greatest mistake that any man in public life can make is, in my opinion, not to be willing to admit that he has been in error. We who are in public life in Canada, I repeat, all made a mistake in 1940 when we failed to adopt the right attitude in this matter. But to-day it is a different story. I said in 1940, speaking as an old soldier, that in my opinion one volunteer was worth any ten conscripts. I attempt to keep up to date even with my hon. friend and his programme. I keep up to date. I can change my opinion in that regard. I say now that any one man of the 29th battalion is worth forty conscripts. I am now going four times better than before. We have this army here. A short time ago I was not prepared to adopt the attitude that I am adopting here. I really believe that at least the three ministers of national defence of the government think exactly the same as I do, but they are not in a position to speak out as freely. I believe that we should immediately put into effect the order in council, except for one reason. I believe it would cause more disunity in Canada than the forty thousand men are worth.

I am very much riled when I read in the newspapers and when I get first-hand information, that has not yet been contradicted by any member of the government, that soldiers of the Canadian army have been insulted in Valleyfield and in other parts of the province of Quebec and that the civilian authorities take no steps to stop these insults. I was told the other day by a woman serving in the armed forces from one province that when they are granted their furloughs they will not go home because they fear and hesitate to go to their own districts, knowing that insults will be thrown at them for wearing the uniform. There is no use in trying to deny these facts. They are here and cannot be denied. When I say that, I know what I am talking about. Farmers' sons in British Columbia do not get the consideration that is given to farmers' sons in Quebec. I do not ask for that consideration for the farmers' sons in my riding, and I come from a farm riding. I am very proud of the fact that I come from a farm riding. We are proud of the fact that our sons are over there fighting to defend not Canada but the whole free world. We ask for no special consideration.

I do not like to say anything about the good province that I have defended every time

I have gone home, but I for one am tired of hearing this talk about unity, if unity is to be only one-sided. There are nine provinces in Canada. If we are to have unity we must have unity of the whole nine provinces, not one province against the eight. We cannot afford under any consideration to do anything that would bring on disunity now; but I want that one province to remember this, a day of reckoning will come unless a different attitude is adopted in their responsibility as a part of Canada, and they will regret it far more than the rest of Canada.

There is one thing that I heartily disagree with the Department of National Defence on, and again I am sorry the minister is not at the moment in his place but he knows my stand on it. To-day the minister told us the one great thing that we want to keep in the wonderful army is unity and esprit de corps, exactly as we had in the last war. He told us that he wanted to keep the army up to strength. I agree with him 100 per cent. He told us that in his opinion, from a voluntary point of view—and he is not only speaking as Minister of National Defence but as a soldier with a distinguished record in the last war—a volunteer far outshone any conscript. That can be checked in Hansard to-morrow. I agree with him 100 per cent. Where I do disagree with him and his department most emphatically is that in Petawawa to-day volunteers have to take orders from conscript non-commissioned officers. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough in this day and age. That will not go down before the boys. Figures were quoted to-day by the minister, but I happen to know that volunteers in Petawawa and other camps have to take orders from a draftee who will not or cannot see his way clear to do his duty for his country. That is one point that rankles most with me, and I think this government would be well advised, if they wish to have any standing whatsoever with the men who are serving overseas, to rectify this at once, and to see to it that no volunteers are asked to take orders from a draftee who will not volunteer to serve his country wherever his services are needed.

Mr. Speaker, it is usually customary to praise the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsey) on his budget speech, but as far as I can see, everything but the budget has been discussed to-day; therefore, I prefer to praise the two ministers that I think should be given most credit in connection with the budget. I have disagreed with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on many occasions and perhaps will do so on many more; but I wish to tell him that in my opinion, as a representative of a rural riding—and I would say this in my riding before Liberal, Conservative or C.C.F. members—no other man in this House of Commons has the knowledge of agriculture that he has. I shall not always agree with him, but I wish to praise him for his part in this budget. I shall not tell the house how long I have been connected with politics, because I might be giving away my age, but ever since I have been connected with it, or ever since I remember my father speaking of it, what we were fighting for was the removal of the duty from farm implements. What happened in this budget? The present Minister of Agriculture by his steadfast fighting secured this action on our behalf.

There is another minister to whom I wish to give a word of praise, and possibly I am sticking my neck out in a political sense in British Columbia by saying this, but I do not care. I am a charter member of the Canadian Legion, and I wish to tell hon. members here that any member of the Canadian Legion is allowed to speak for the soldiers not only of the last war, but of this war. I happen to belong to a few organizations. A person can belong to an organization by right of might or by right of wealth or by some other right, but there is only one organization in Canada to which one can belong by only one right, his right of service for his king and country, namely, the Canadian Legion. Make no mistake about that. I may be criticized by some of the branches in my province in what I am about to say of the minister to whom I shall refer in a moment. He has taken a lot of criticism. He has even taken some from the city of Toronto about a hospital, but I am very proud of the fact that each and every party in this house have given nothing but praise to the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for his efforts on behalf of the soldiers. I do not always agree with the legislation he has brought down, neither do the legion. But I wish to assure the legion, through you, Mr. Speaker, that if they knew the Minister of Pensions and National Health as I know him they would know that, while we have not got all that we endeavoured to get, we would not have got half of what we have secured had it not been for the sympathetic efforts of the minister.

I wish to make a suggestion to the government. I hope there is to be a vote, although it has been intimated to me since I began to speak that there will not be one to-night. That being so, I may take my forty minutes. I should like to say a little about some of the problems of agriculture. I wish the Minister of Finance were in his place at present, because I could give him some advice that I trust he will take. If he took it he would have a far more successful operating board in one of those temporary buildings—thank goodness they call them "temporary". Let us hope they will be temporary. In saying that I do not wish to be critical of the board. They have done wonderful work. The only suggestion I wish to make to the Minister of Finance with respect to his part in the budget is that he adopt the principle they have adopted in the United States with respect to their board corresponding to our wartime prices and trade board. In the United States their board meets with all the farm organizations and the cooperatives, not after they fix the price of strawberries—and while the Minister of Finance is not listening, I think the Minister of Agriculture is—but before they fix the price of strawberries and vegetables. The board meets with the farmers and others and gets their ideas on what they should be paid, what they think the farmers can produce for. What does our board do? They do not even meet when they fix the prices. They do not meet at all, and when they send their officials out to Brtiish Columbia they ignore them afterwards. The sad part so far as the berry growers in British Columbia are concerned is unfortunately the Minister of Agriculture was out in Saskatchewan on a forlorn mission at the time the berries were picked. I am sorry that because of the freight rates problem, or because of the heat it is not possible to send British Columbia berries here. It would be a revelation to hon. members if I could give them a real meal of British Columbia strawberries; they would remember it for a long time. I want, however, to pay tribute to one hon. member. The other day I happened to be up in the "bucket of blood", where I remarked that I had not eaten a good piece of meat since coming back to eastern Canada. One of my good C.C.F. friends, who was going back to his farm a day or two later, brought me a really good roast of beef, and I want to say that you could not get finer beef anywhere in Canada, with the exception of the province of British Columbia.

I see the Minister of National Defence is back in the house, and I want to offer a criticism. In doing so I am speaking most emphatically for the old soldiers I know. I know I am speaking for many soldiers serving overseas at the present time. I think I am speaking for the Canadian Legion. I know definitely I am speaking for the battalion of which I am very proud, the 29th, which was mentioned by the minister to-day when speaking of esprit de corps. In no less than three letters received to-day from overseas and letters from two army camps in Canada I am told that I speak for soldiers on active service both here and abroad when I say both the old soldiers and the soldiers engaged in the present war strongly resent what neither the Minister of National Defence nor any other minister can defend; that is, the fact that a non-commissioned officer of the draftee army, who does not wear the G.S., can give orders to a private who does wear it. No government, no party and no individual can defend that as far as I am concerned.

I have another suggestion to offer the minister. According to this week's issue of Time the government of the United States is giving its soldiers another raise in pay. Speaking from memory I believe it is to be $10 a month for the highest grades in the infantry, and it is estimated that seventy-five per cent of the infantry will come within that category. I want to recommend to the minister that he immediately increase the pay of members of the active army serving in theatres of war by fifty cents a day, to be given either as a deferred payment in the form of war savings certificates or in the form of a life insurance policy. Do not let the sound money men talk you out of it; pay no attention to the Bank of Canada. I am sure the people of Canada will be behind you. You cannot buy patriotism, but you can reward gallant service. You will have the support of all the people, no matter what their political party. The people of Canada will never begrudge an extra fifty cents a day to our fighting men. You cannot pay for the sacrifice a man makes when he loses his life, but you can give him some reward in this way. I want to urge this upon the minister for his consideration, and I do not believe it could be classed as a bribe to anyone. It is our duty to differentiate in some way between those who are offering their lives and those who are staying at home.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, speaking in the house last session on the subject of man-power I said that I agreed with those who had declared that in a free society the obligations and privileges of military training should be shared generally under a fair and just system of selective compulsory service without geographical restriction. I am convinced now, as I was then, that this is the correct policy. I read afterwards that I was as a voice calling in the wilderness, and perhaps it might have seemed that way because, if I remember aright, I received very little support from hon. members sitting in this house in opposition to the government. The exception, as was mentioned a few moments ago, was the New Democracy party which, ever since the outbreak of war, has urged that there should be compulsory selective service without geographical restriction. As for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the only group in this house which opposed as a group the passing of what was then known as bill No. 80, the National Resources Mobilization Act, introduced by the government to remove the restrictions with respect to service overseas, and which party, as my hon. friend has just said, was opposed to the sending of any expeditionary force to the aid of the motherland after the outbreak of war in 1939, that party stands indicted to-day by its failure to meet the challenge and perform its duty when called upon at that time. I propose to place on record the words of the leader of the C.C.F. party speaking in this house at the war session of 1939, as they are found at page 55 of Hansard of that year:

> In view of these considerations, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that Canada's policy should be based first on the fundamental national interests of the Canadian people, as well as on their interest in the outcome of war. Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

I repeat, "or the sending of any expeditionary force." What hope have we, therefore, from a party which in time of peril would interpret Canada's interests in the most narrow and restricted sense; a party which, at the very moment British, Canadian and United States troops were struggling to maintain a foothold on the Normandy beaches, in conference assembled, presided over by a leader of the party and having as its guest the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), would pass the following resolution:

> Whereas the C.C.F. is a socialist party, and whereas the official policy of the British labour party of coalition with the Conservative party compromised the working class struggle against capitalism in Great Britain, therefore be it resolved that the Quebec C.C.F. declares strong disapproval of the continuation of its policy of collaboration with the capitalistic government of Great Britain.

Instead of condemning, let us give credit to the labour party in Great Britain which, in the empire's darkest hour, was willing to postpone for the time being its hopes for the future in order to retain the objectives already won. To-day I find some support from the official opposition, but it is a timid support tucked in at the very end of a long resolution moved in amendment to the budget, and only conceived after forty-seven days of almost continuous debate on the war appropriation measure. Surely some time during the weeks that debate lasted the official opposition could have made a motion in plain, clear, unequivocal terms instead of leaving it to the budget debate and the financial critic who, after spending ninety-five per cent of his time in discussing fiscal matters, dealt with the man-power question only incidentally. I submit, further, that the amendment is not a definite resolution that the government enforce the powers contained in chapter 13 of the 1940 statutes, being the general mobilization resources act, as amended by chapter 29 of the 1942 statutes, commonly known as bill No. 80. Let me read the amendment moved by the official opposition:

> That the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources, as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home-defence army, at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, at a time when the need for army reinforcements, for farming and for industry is so urgent.

What that means perhaps the mover alone could tell. But if one reads the clause and couples with it the statement made by the hon. member, wherein he urges that we turn these men back to farms, factories and forests until needed, it must mean the disbandment of these highly-trained men. With this sentiment I disagree, with all the force at my command; and I am in full accord with the remarks of the Minister of National Defence this afternoon and those of the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who, speaking in this house last week in the debate, said that he would oppose with all his strength the demobilization of these fully-trained forces.

I noticed in Hansard that when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) was speaking the other evening, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) interrupted him, and said that he was being misinterpreted. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was interpreting the remark in a manner similar to what I have done, saying that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe had said that the men should be sent back to the farms, the factories and the forests. That hon. member said he was being misinterpreted. Therefore, in order that there may be no mistake, and to keep the record clear, let me quote exactly what was said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, and let the house be the judge. His remarks are found at page 4341 of Hansard for June 29, as follows:

> For the honour of Canada I urge upon the government that they now remove the political halo that surrounds this most ridiculous camouflage and to turn these able-bodied men back to the farms, the factories and the forest where they can produce for victory until they are marshalled for the more vital service for which they were conscripted.

The minister, speaking today, was too kind when he said that they were to be sent back to the farms, the forests, the factories or for service overseas. No; according to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, they are to be sent back to the farms, the forests and the factories.

And for how long?—"Until they are marshalled for the more vital service." Can anyone imagine anything more fantastic than to demobilize these men, to use the words of the hon. member, "until they are marshalled for the more vital service?" It is true that we have heard from the hustings from a reported leader of the party that the Progressive Conservatives were going to lay down the gauntlet and call for an immediate order in council. This, however, came from the outside, from a gentleman who has no responsibility to parliament, and not from the elected leader in this house. I ask this chamber: Is it significant that we have had no direct endorsement of the statements made by Mr. McTague and Mr. Bracken? Is it significant that the elected leader in this chamber has remained silent in the matter, up to this time?

I submit that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is right when he states that such statements of policy should be made by the leader in this house, where the statements may be analysed, and not made from positions of ambush. I am not prepared to say, as did Mr. McTague, that the province of Quebec would vote otherwise than it did if now given an opportunity. At the same time I have faith enough in the loyalty of French Canada, when the need is properly shown and when it realizes that all the seventy-odd thousands of men now mobilized and fully trained are being treated in the same manner. Then, with few exceptions, the whole subject will be looked upon in its proper light, and these men will go out and do battle with their fellow men, and come back proud that the step was taken and that they were privileged to form a part of the Canadian Army in the restoration and liberation of a free France, and the conquest of a German tyrant.

I listened carefully to the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) this afternoon. I know how proud he is, as are we all, of the volunteer forces; we know the sincerity of purpose of the minister. Those of us who have had the privilege of volunteering for service to our country, wherever called, remember the thrill of pride when first we donned the uniform. At the same time, as I have said in this house before: Is it a fair system? Is it a just system? Is it fair that one family should offer its all, and another family not give anything?

Nor do I think—and I say this in all kindness—it is fair for the minister to use as an illustration in support of the citizen committees for recruiting, the use of these same bodies by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in connection with his victory loan. To me there is a vast difference between urging my neighbour or friend to invest his money in a gilt-edged victory bond, and in urging him to have his son enlist for active service. I still urge the government to enforce the statute by order in council, especially having in mind that the reserve forces are now well-trained and capable of being utilized, if necessary, as an active home defence force. At the same time, I do not propose to allow an amendment such as that moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe to becloud the real issue in the debate, namely the support or otherwise of the fiscal policy of the government, as enunciated by the Minister of Finance. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment as framed by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, and I shall support the Minister of Finance in his motion to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) upon his eloquent effort this evening. I think he has excelled himself.

I should like also to say a word in regard to the statement by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) this afternoon. It was a very important one, and most timely. It has cleared up a good deal of misunderstanding in my mind, and I am sure in the minds of people throughout the country.

I do not intend to say much regarding the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) except to say that he has again lived up to his reputation, in the statement he made when presenting the financial condition of the country.

I would not have spoken in the debate had it not been that, upon my return to Ottawa the other day, and reading some of the speeches which had been made, I thought I saw where some answers were due the house and country. In this connection I shall begin with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), who, I am sorry, is not in his place at the moment, although I see him behind the curtain.

Mr. PERLEY: Oh, I am right here; don't you worry.

Mr. WARD: I am glad the hon. member is now in his place. There is a saying the effect that figures do not lie, but that some people do some very queer figuring. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle spent considerable time in depreciating the effect which would follow from the reduction in the tariff on farm machinery. I have listened to him and other hon. members for several sessions urge the removal of those same tariffs on farm machinery. I have recommended the same thing—and, just in passing, lest I forget, may I give to members of the government and particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a great deal of credit for this particular provision in the budget.

However, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle went to great lengths—in fact almost three columns in Hansard—in an attempt to prove the ineffectiveness of the reduction, and just how little they meant, after all. How he got the figures, I do not know, because I spent half an hour this afternoon doing some figuring, and I could not follow his reasoning. He refers to the reduction as being not more than 3⅜ per cent.

Then he speaks of putting it in terms of farm language. I am sure that no ordinary farmer could understand the reasoning contained in those three columns of Hansard when the hon. member tried to prove the ineffectiveness of this reduction.

However, reducing it to real farm language, to terms which a farmer can understand, may I say that last year I bought a binder. I will leave out of he picture the war exchange tax because that is a war measure, so that we will leave it out of our calculation. If the 7½ per cent reduction on farm machinery had been in effect a year ago I would have saved $22.50 on the $345 I paid for the binder. I have a combine on order right now and, if I get it, this reduction will mean a saving of $135. I think any farmer will understand those figures, and that is the only practical way to approach and explain the matter.

Then the hon. member went on to try to calculate it in terms of percentage on the dollar and he said it amounted to only three and a half per cent. That is all we are getting on our bonds and most other investments now.

I wish to take issue with his reference to $1.25 a bushel for wheat as a ceiling. I know he knows that is not right, and he knew he was wrong when he made that statement. It is not a ceiling; it is simply a floor. I heard him arguing in the agriculture committee the other day with Mr. McIvor, chairman of the wheat board, and insisting it was a ceiling not a floor. It is true there is a ceiling on barley and oats, but those are the only two farm products on which there are ceilings. I support most heartily the ceiling on coarse grains.

Mr. PERLEY: Who moved that in committee last year?

Mr. WARD: It was not moved in committee at all; it has been a part of government policy for several years.

Mr. PERLEY: I moved it in committee and the motion was defeated. The hon. member voted against it. Then about two weeks later it was brought in by order in council.

Mr. WARD: I take issue with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. PERLEY: Look up the record.

Mr. WARD: It has been part of government policy for some considerable time. As an example of the actual value of the ceiling on coarse grains to the farmer, I except Saskatchewan where water is scarce and where one may find it rather difficult to raise live stock. I keep about 100 pigs on feed most of the time. I do what the average farmer may not do—maintain actual costs of feeding and general overhead. The grain is weighed in and the pigs are weighed out. In 1943 my barley brought me $1.42 a bushel when fed to hogs.

Perhaps the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) will remember a statement he made last year to the effect that it took him 270 days to put 300 pounds on a steer. We do it in just half that time. However, be that as it may, I must pass along because I have a lot of ground to cover.

To return again to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, he is reported on page 4565 of Hansard, where he refers to the floor prices under farm products, as saying:

> When we get it I hope it will contain a price that is at least parity. I do not know whether hon. members know what parity means, the word has been used so often.

I doubt if the hon. member himself knows what parity prices really are.

Mr. PERLEY: You do not know anyway.

Mr. WARD: At the present moment we have parity prices—I am sure when the legislation comes down shortly it will not be less than the prices we are enjoying at the present time—which are about nine per cent above parity for the 1924-29 period. I have under my hand a request by the Canadian federation of agriculture where they ask for parity prices based on the 1924-29 price level.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think that statement is correct; the Canadian federation of agriculture deny it; it is not correct.

Mr. WARD: My hon. friend is not well informed. If he will look up the record of the Calgary meeting of the Canadian federation of agriculture a little over a year ago he will see where they asked for a parity price based upon the 1924-29 period.

Mr. FAIR: I have in my file a letter from the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture denying that statement.

Mr. GARDINER: I have another one in my file answering yours.

Mr. PERLEY: I suggest that both hon. members stick to the facts.

Mr. WARD: In pursuing the question of floor prices I should like to say that perhaps the Canadian farmer to-day is enjoying, even before this legislation comes down—we are told it will guarantee floor prices over a period of four years—something which no other group of farmers in the world are enjoying, namely, a substantial floor price which gives the farmer a substantial profit on everything he produces. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle went on to say:

> Instead of putting on the ceiling and stopping the price of wheat to prevent inflation, as it was said, had the law of supply and demand been allowed to prevail we would have had $2 wheat.

The hon. member may be right; we might have had $2 wheat, but we would also have had something else, something like we had during the last war.

Mr. GARDINER: How could you when wheat is selling for only $1.71 in the United States?

Mr. PERLEY: May I answer the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Dauphin has the floor.

Mr. PERLEY: Apparently he can answer the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member invites a question from another hon. member he may answer it, but he has the floor.

Mr. WARD: Suppose we had the inflation as is invited by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle; suppose wheat went to $2, which the Minister of Agriculture says could not happen because wheat is selling for $1.71 in the United States and therefore a price above that would be simply fantastic? I have before me a statement of prices which I have kept since the last war. Those were inflationary days when wheat was $2.25 a bushel.

On July 20, 1918, binder twine sold for $29.50 per 100 pounds; in 1919 it sold for $33 per 100 pounds; to-day it sells for $11 per 100 pounds. On July 20, 1918, coal oil sold for 35 cents a gallon; one year later it was 39 cents a gallon; to-day it sells for 28 cents a gallon. On October 1, 1918, 14-inch soft centre ploughshares sold for $14 a pair; one year later they sold for $16; to-day they are $6. On October 1, 1918, 30 by 3½-inch tires sold for $26 each; one year later 30 by 4½-inch tires sold for $52 each; to-day they sell for $9. On October 3, 1918, a car battery cost $45—I bought two of them—to-day they cost $14. On October 15, 1918, sugar sold for $28 per hundredweight; to-day it sell for $8. On October 17, 1918, gas by the barrel sold for 55 cents per gallon; to-day it sells for 32 cents. In October, 1918, a tweed suit cost $84; to-day it costs $32.

If we had what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is advocating we would be paying prices similar to those prevailing in 1918. I sent over to the statistical branch about a month ago for a statement as to the value of the farmer's dollar to-day as compared with 1919. It is 33 cents higher to-day. The farmer's dollar is worth 33 cents more to-day than it was in 1919. Speaking in the house a year ago, I said I thought the government deserved a great deal of credit, that it took a lot of courage to impose price control in this country. Of course it has been unpopular, but when the war is over, the people will reap the reward in a stability and continuity of conditions such as we did not enjoy following the last war.

There is one other item to which I should refer. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle, dealing with the cost of carrying the 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops, said that according to his calculations it was 12⅛ cents a bushel, which was paid to the elevators. Well, I worked it out, and the best I can get out of it is 7⅛ cents a bushel. I know that 6½ cents was paid to me as a farmer for having carried my grain at home for only a few months, as compared with the three long years that this grain was carried in the elevators. I am no friend of the elevator people or the bankers or the brokers, but I would point out that this cost covered a great many services.

The hon. member concluded his statement by saying—

Mr. PERLEY: Will the hon. member permit a remark?

Mr. WARD: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: I figured out all the costs—storage, interest charges, commissions, brokerage and everything. These amount to 12⅛ cents. It was not the storage alone.

Mr. WARD: So did I, and I made it 7¾ cents. The hon. member concluded by saying that the firms owning these elevators were paid $85 million to handle half the grain, or about 700,000,000 bushels. But that $85 million covered all the charges, including about $7 million paid to the farmers on home storage.

Mr. PERLEY: I said that.

Mr. WARD: No; you said nothing of the sort. You tried to leave a totally erroneous impression.

Mr. PERLEY: You did not read all the speech.

Mr. WARD: I come now to some remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In his speech of June 29, as reported in Hansard, at page 4347, he said:

> Finance must be secondary to other considerations in the winning of the war. I wish I could say the same of the government's settled policy in regard to the after-war years, and that whatever should prove to be physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible.

That is exactly what the government are doing now. The hon. member went on as though he expected the government to have appropriated $5,000 million this session, while the war is still going on, in order to prepare for the post-war period. I think the government are doing a wonderful job, and I am not flattering them when I say that. When I read the soldiers' rehabilitation bill as brought down by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) I felt that he had done a marvellous job in benefiting by the experience of all the mistakes in the scheme which was enacted after the last war.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar went on, after talking about the application of a socialist policy:

> I fear, however, and the present budget increases my fears, that the government is anxious to hurry back to the restrictive practices of orthodox finance and orthodox industry.

May I pause here to say that the socialism advocated by his party is the oldest kind of orthodoxy, the oldest system in the world, and that anybody who has taken time to read history knows that in every place and at every time it has been tried it has ended in disaster, bloodshed and ruin for the working people, and could have no other effect.

Some of us have at times entered the realm of prophecy. I recall that in the early part of the 1930 campaign Mr. Bennett—for whom I have great respect as a man of honesty and integrity—told the people of Canada that we were importing too much. In the midst of the campaign he made the specific statement that we were over-importing by at least half a billion dollars. From that day on during my campaign I made the prediction, "If Mr. Bennett is returned to power, and does what he says he is going to do, before his term of office is up you will see in Canada at least one million unemployed; your wheat which was then selling for one dollar, will sell for twenty-five cents a bushel; your steers, now selling at $60, will sell for $10; your bacon hogs will sell for $2.50 a hundred." I made that prediction in July, 1930. Of course it did not impress very many people. A man came to me after a meeting and said, "Do you expect us to be impressed by that prediction?" I said, "No. I don't, but when it comes true will you come and see me?" Just two years and five months later that man came to my office and with a tremor in his voice said, "My God, it has all come true."

I am making another prediction now. I predict that if you elect a socialist government to this House of Commons you will have not a million unemployed; the number will vastly exceed a million. You will see the worst times this country has ever known. A million people will seek an exodus from this country to the United States, and in the first year the government is in power at least one thousand million Canadian dollars will try to find its way to the United States. We shall experience the worst days this country has ever known if my hon. friends of the C.C.F. group are elected and carry into effect what they say they intend to do, as contained in the C.C.F. "Handbook for Speakers". I see that it is published in the city of Saskatoon. This is what they say; it runs in a sort of monologue:

> Q. "Is the final objective of this group to socialize industry in its entirety?"
> A. "The wording of the objective is 'Social Ownership of all resources—

Including the farms, of course.

> —and the machinery of wealth production'."

The greatest machine of wealth production in this country is agriculture.

> "This, therefore, includes all industry."

I am not saying this. This is what the book says.

> "We recognize the rights of the individual to own personal property which he can use for his comfort and well-being. Personal property is inclusive of home, clothing, furniture, etc."

Not farms. I want to say to my hon. friend, and it has been said in this house before—

Mr. KNOWLES: Who printed that book?

Mr. WARD: I do not know. It is the C.C.F. speakers' handbook.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Scott of Montreal, C.C.F. Secretary.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who is the publisher?

Mr. BRYCE: The Liberal party.

Mr. WARD: It is, of course, the "Saskatchewan Farmer-Labour C.C.F. Group Handbook for Speakers, compiled from reports of conferences held in Saskatoon and Regina, January 7 and February 11 respectively, 1933."

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Compiled by whom?

Mr. REID: You are not denying it, are you?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: We are asking who published it.

Mr. WARD: The C.C.F.

Mr. BRYCE: The hon. member can say where it came from.

Mr. GARDINER: The Farmer-Labour group published it.

Mr. BRYCE: It was published by the Liberal party.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a Farmer-Labour production. When you got ashamed of it we published it.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: A Liberal trick.

Mr. REID: Are the C.C.F. denying it?

Mr. WARD: I see my hon. friends are embarrassed.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are not embarrassed at all. We are trying to find out who published it.

Mr. WARD: May I quote, for the enlightenment of my hon. friends who appear to be embarrassed a bit, certain passages from the introduction to this book:

"This handbook is a digest of the minutes of the two conferences of the farmer-labour C.C.F. group, first held in Saskatoon, January 7, 1933, and the second at Regina, February 11, 1933."

"We have eliminated, as far as possible, any duplication in the questions relating to our policy, and have done the same with the answers, keeping as nearly as possible the wording in both cases. A chart outlining the economic programme, accompanied by a detailed series of explanatory notes, has been prepared by head office, and will be found inserted at the centre of this handbook."

It is here in the form of a map and has also been incorporated in the handbook and will be found on page 21. Here it is on page 21.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is what won the Saskatchewan election for us.

Mr. GARDINER: Five years from now we shall be publishing all your books as souvenirs.

Mr. WARD: I quote:

Q. "What would occur in the case of the farmer-labour group having the largest group in the house, and the government in power resigning? In that event, the method of the organization would be this: Being the largest group in the house, and the government resigning, it is likely that this group would be called upon to form a government. This would be done. The programme would then be brought in by the new government in its entirety."

Not partly, but in its entirety. This is not what the former member for Weyburn has done. He is now the premier of Saskatchewan, and the morning after the election in Saskatchewan he was asked by the press what changes he would make and he said in effect, "We will make no changes; there will be no changes." What an eloquent compliment to the Patterson government which had just been defeated! He said, "We will make no changes." Of course there will be no changes. I make the prediction now that there will be no changes whatsover in the policy or in the philosophy that has prevailed in Saskatchewan—none whatever. Further in the statement, I read:

How do you define a cooperative commonwealth federation?

That is the question. The answer is:

A cooperative commonwealth is an organization of society in which the principal means of production, distribution and exchange shall be socially or cooperatively owned by the people.

Socially owned by the people.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Who else would you want to own them?

Mr. WARD: I do not object at all, so long as my hon. friends admit it and say that this is their handiwork and that they will stand by it.

Mr. BRYCE: Published by the Liberal party.

Mr. REID: Do you deny it? No matter who publishes it, that is their pamphlet.

Mr. WARD: The member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

Before I make any proposal I wish to take exception to the reference made by the minister to taxation in other countries. Even supposing his comparisons happen to be fair, would the fact that another country overtaxes its poor justify Canada in following a similar course?

The minister was speaking of New Zealand in this case.

The minister stated that the New Zealand rates bear more heavily on low income brackets than do the rates in force in Canada, but what he did not say is that the New Zealand rates included the five per cent social security levy.

The Minister of Finance then said:

I did say that. . . . I said that it included national security and social security taxes.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar then said:

I read the speech very carefully, and it must have escaped me.

There are many things that escape the hon. member. He goes on:

I say that the criticism that is often made of other countries does not take everything into account.

I would say, however, that if ever there was a case of the pot calling the stove black it was this case, because the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is a past master at misrepresentation, at half-truths, at twisting and turning things to suit his own purpose. Then he cuts loose:

So I say that when we come to appraise what is happening in another country, let us be fair about it, and say what the people of that country are getting for the taxes they pay.

I would say to my hon. friends who smile about it that they have one stock-in-trade, and that is to engender fear in the minds of the people, to blacken their country, to blacken their own people, to blacken our Canadian institutions and public men. That is their chief stock-in-trade. I warn them that if they are ever charged with responsibility, the grave responsibility that falls upon a government called upon to administer this very difficult country of ours, spread four thousand miles east and west and only two or three hundred miles wide, with five or six different principalities, all with separate and different economics and climatic conditions—if they ever come to govern this country they will be sorry that they were not more responsible in the things they said in the days of opposition. I warn them of that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thanks for the publicity.

Mr. WARD: I come now to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), and I pick him out for the reason that he pretends to speak at least for agriculture in his group. I will not take up the time of the house in reading much from his speech, but with reference to free agricultural implements, and again trying to belittle what has been accomplished, he says:

The freer exchange and export of goods has its place but, as I listen to the government members and read certain papers in this country, it seems to me that in placing responsibility for a prosperous Canada on export trade alone they are on very narrow ground indeed.

In reply I will call to witness some excellent organizations. First I will call as a witness the Canadian Legion in their admirable pamphlet on the question of rehabilitation of Canada's fighting men. This is what they say of trade:

This war has demonstrated that we have been able to keep our people employed and, within the limit of the basic supplies available, fed and clothed during a period of stress. We have, moreover, supplied our allies with the products of our own soil and resources. This provision, both for ourselves and others must, in view of the destruction and conditions throughout the rest of the world, continue for some considerable time.

They are willing to help our allies less fortunate than ourselves.

It may be that . . . through the brain and brawn of our workers, we have been able to do all this and yet maintain adequate living conditions in this country. Provided jobs are furnished the same condition can hold good in the post-war period while world trade is in process of rebuilding.

Note that, world trade.

Markets for all our products. Measures must be taken to explore and cultivate both domestic and foreign markets for our products. In foreign trade our aim should be to deal with countries that can supply things we require in our economy to satisfy our basic needs, and which we cannot or do not produce ourselves, or which we cannot or do not produce economically.

There is a good deal of excellent material in this book and they are solidly behind international trade.

Let me call yet another witness, an equally important body, the Canadian federation of agriculture. My hon. friend pretends to be speaking for agriculture. This is what they say in a pamphlet entitled "Principles of Post-War Reconstruction for Agriculture," published recently:

Though the farm problem is a domestic one in many respects, it is profoundly affected by, and to some extent dependent upon, international policies and action. More than ever before the effective solution of the problems of Canadian agriculture will hinge upon the planning of relations and upon the measure of agreement and cooperation which can be worked out between food exporting and food importing countries. Moreover, not merely policies having to do with food and agriculture enter into this but as well international policies governing trade generally, the payment of debts, the control and stabilization of currencies, and maintenance of peace.

Then they go on to say:

If we imagine we can return to the economic anarchy of the old days—

That is exactly what will happen. Anarchy is the right word if we ever attempt to socialize the industries of this young and growing country.

—then certainly we shall bring not only discredit but disaster upon ourselves and it will be well merited. None of us can now escape from revolutionary changes even if we would.

Then farther down they say:

In our opinion it is of little use to talk of reconstruction and rehabilitation plans for agriculture unless we assume the establishment of a fiscal policy and an international trade policy which will work in terms of the world of to-morrow.

They conclude by saying:

The united nations conference on food and agriculture held at Hot Springs, Virginia, in May of this year declared its belief: "that the goal of freedom from want of food suitable and adequate for the health and strength of all people can be achieved;" that the almost unlimited possibilities of an expanding world economy—

That does not sound like our C.C.F. friends talking about controlling economy—

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: You would not understand our policies.

Mr. WARD: Living within ourselves. Get the hon. member for York South a funnel to talk through.

—should be organized and coordinated on a world scale; and that all nations, individually and collectively, should set about to achieve this broad objective.

That is, international trade.

Further, it recommended the establishment of a permanent international organization to promote and facilitate international cooperation dealing with problems of food and agriculture.

I do not need to call in any more witness in that regard with the exception of one of the greatest statesmen on the north American continent, a member of the United States government who used these words within the last month. You will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, for referring to this since it is part of a broadcast I made a few weeks ago. Part of the material which I am about to quote is contained in the remarks of Mr. Sumner Welles, a great United States statesman and economist. This is what he said:

After the last war our high tariff policy reached out to virtually every corner of the earth and brought poverty and despair to innumerable communities. But the effects on American importers, and on American industries dependent upon imports, were likewise immediate. Many foreign countries, which had not recovered from the shock of our tariff increases in 1921 and 1922 and were tottering on the brink of economic and financial collapse were literally pushed into the abyss by our tariff action of 1930. Throughout the world this withering blast of trade destruction brought disaster and despair to countless millions of people.

That comes from a man who has been a member of the United States government for a long time. I shall continue with the quotation of a page or two, Mr. Speaker, of my broadcast, because it is one on which I spent a lot of time and gathered a lot of figures:

The question is frequently asked, if we can do it in war time why cannot we do it in peace time, meaning of course the employment of all our people. We can if the world will continue on a free trade basis as it is to-day. Of the almost five billion of international trade we did in 1943, a large percentage of it was on a free trade basis. The United States last year purchased from us 263 million bushels of grain, 244 millions of which entered their country with the same freedom as though there had been no international boundary.

There was no tariff on the 244 millions of bushels of grain.

This is true also of the vast supply of raw materials and munitions of war that flow to and from Canada to, not only the United States but to all the other nations with whom and for whom we are fighting.

The United States has to date this year purchased from us over 200 million bushels of Canadian grain, all of which will flow freely to their country without tariff or any other trade restrictions. Compare this condition with those of the early thirties when in many countries of Europe, especially those now under totalitarian governments tariffs ranged from one to two hundred per cent.

In pre-Hitler days prior to 1930 Germany's annual imports of grain—

And I verified those figures recently.

—was rarely less than 100 million bushels. It consisted principally of barley, rye and oats. A very large part of which was purchased from Canada.

Italy's annual purchases of Canadian wheat in pre-Mussolini days averaged about 60,000,000 bushels. Spain too, before the revolution purchased annually about 35,000,000 bushels of wheat, most of it coming from Canada. France, also, was a fairly heavy buyer of Canadian hard spring wheat until in 1929 she placed a tariff of $1.19 per bushel against imports of foreign wheat. In all, this vast trade of over 200,000,000 bushels plus millions in other forms of trade vanished as mist before the morning sun, under the impact of high tariffs. Yes, even Canada and the United States in 1930 were caught in the psychological meshes of a world gone mad on the theory of high tariffs and self-sufficiency —we too, followed suit with tariffs ranging from forty per cent to eighty per cent.

We all remember that.

By the early thirties the world had reached the logical conclusion to their insane policies of trade exclusion, a condition where every country in the world was trying to sell its goods but no country was buying. Can you visualize the loss to our trade and economy of over 200,000,000 bushels of grain sales annually—

Plus hundreds of millions of other trade.

In order that we may get an absolutely clear perspective of just what did happen during these awful early nineteen thirty years—world trade declined between 1928 and 193_ from $9,640,000,000 to $2,234,000,000 or twenty-six per cent only of what it was five years previously when the world was on a more sane, more reasonable trading basis.

As an example of the effect on our Canadian trade of extremely high import duties not only in Europe but on this continent as well, in 1928 our external trade amounted to $2,586,106,275; by 1933 just five years later our total external trade had shrunk to $936,698,100 or thirty-two per cent only of what it was five years previously. . . . To those who may still doubt the direct and inevitable relationship of high tariffs and unemployment—

I recommend this to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party.

—may I remind you that at no time in the world's history were tariffs anywhere nearly so high or did so many other obstructions exist in trade as between 1929 and the outbreak of war. Nor were there ever before in the world's history nearly so many unemployed.

Compare those days and conditions with the freer trade policies we are enjoying to-day with the resultant comfort, satisfaction and pleasure of our people, a market for everything we can produce, a job at good wages for every one who wants to work—our farmers selling their products at satisfactory prices with everybody living in a moderate state of luxury.

I said a moment ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the hon. member permit a question? This is the third time I have heard him speak in this parliament, and on each time he took about thirty-five minutes of his forty minutes quoting from Hansard or some pamphlet. My question is: Will he tell us when he is going to make a speech of his own.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You joined the C.C.F. the other day.

Mr. H. A. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I have no great desire to speak at this hour of the evening and this stage of the budget debate. However, this is one of the few times when one may discuss a wide variety of subjects without being called to order, so that I feel reasonably safe in making a few remarks to-night.

On June 26 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) presented the sixth war-time budget, calling for the expenditure of a stupendous amount of money, approximately six billion dollars. To me, as I think to anyone, that is a great deal of money to be raised by eleven and a half million people. Approximately forty years ago we raised for all purposes from $40,000,000 to $45,000,000, and that was considered a great deal of money. Each year our expenditures have increased, so that by 1938 or 1939 they reached from $500,000,000 to $550,000,000. At that time we thought we had reached our limit in taxation and ability to raise money; but now, in the year 1944, we are budgeting for eleven times that amount. The net debt also has increased to four and a half times what it was in 1939. We might as well be realistic and agree that we cannot long continue to increase the debt at that rate. The interest charges alone, if taken at a moderate rate, would mean an expenditure of more money than we raised for all purposes in 1938 or 1939. I do not know a great deal about this subject, but I do know that we cannot continue indefinitely to increase the public debt and tax the people to carry it. When the Bank Act comes up for revision I intend to have something further to say on this point.

One thing, however, is gratifying at this time; that is, the fact that half the amount required is to be raised by direct taxation in one form or another, while the other half will be raised by borrowing. Ninety-five per cent of the debt we have contracted during this war has been borrowed from our own people. On the outbreak of war the government, no doubt profiting from the experiences of the last war, adopted the policy that no person or firm in Canada should get rich or make undue profits because of conditions brought about by the war. So that a basic period of the four years prior to the outbreak of war was fixed as a normal period, and profits in excess of those during that period were taxed at the rate of 100 per cent, with twenty per cent to be refunded after the conclusion of hostilities in order that industries might establish themselves during the post-war period. Then two years ago the government adopted the policy of compulsory saving in connection with the income tax on individuals. That seemed to me a good piece of legislation, because it meant that many of our people were accumulating some savings which they would not have acquired in the form of life insurance, mortgages or anything like that. These compulsory savings have amounted to from $100,000,000 to $120,000,000 each year. For some reason some workers apparently felt that they would not get back this money. I do not know why they should think so, for no government in any democracy would attempt to retain that money, if only for reasons of political expediency. In any event this potent check on inflation, which we dread so much, has been removed, and now we must rely on voluntary savings.

Undoubtedly there are inequalities under the income tax regulations. The people in the lower brackets feel that it is very hard for them to pay their tax. However, it has been worked out largely on the basis that those who are able to pay should pay, and the total amount collected by the Department of National Revenue last year amounted to $1,635,000,000, or approximately three times the amount we raised from all sources in 1939. The income tax, from corporations as well as individuals, brought in a total of $1,151,755,000; the excess profits tax amounted to $468,717,000 and the succession duties to $15,191,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, some people claim that a great deal of money has been made during the war, but in any event a great deal has been collected in income tax.

I should like to say just a word or two in connection with ceiling prices, rationing and stabilization. These were new experiments in Canada; we had nothing to go by except the limited experience of the last war, but we have had fairly good results although there has been a great deal of controversy. In 1941 the cost of wages and goods rose to such an extent that the government imposed ceiling prices, and fixed as the maximum the highest price paid during the basic period from September 13 to October 11 of that year, at the same time making provision for any increase in the cost of living which might occur subsequently. Of course many injustices were created under a regulation of that kind. Some farm commodities had not increased in price and were still selling below the cost of production. Some workers had their salaries increased just prior to the order coming into operation, while others had not, so that there were inequalities not only in connection with prices of farm commodities but also in connection with wages of workers. Many felt, and I quite agreed with them, that there should have been some revision of prices and wages, in order to put them on a stable and equal basis before the order was put into effect. However, I have not spoken to anyone in Canada who does not believe that the establishment of ceiling prices and the rationing of goods was the proper thing to do at this time. It is invariably true, at the same time, that people believe the particular commodity in which they are interested should not have a price ceiling, or should have received further consideration.

We must remember that conditions have been quite different during this war from what they were during the last war. The sources of many of our vital supplies have been in the hands of the enemy; I have in mind such commodities as sugar, rubber, petroleum and tin. If these essential goods and services had not been rationed; if price ceilings had not been fixed, there would have been more racketeering and profiteering in Canada than one could imagine. Hardship and privation would have been inflicted upon those least able to bear it. Undoubtedly some mistakes have been made, both in administration and in legislation. However, Canada's system of price control has brought better results than the system in any other country in the world, and it has been copied by many other nations, including the United States.

I should now like to say a word about our farm problems, because if I am qualified to speak on any subject at all it is the matter of rural conditions. In my opinion one of the principal causes of the great depression was the fact that while one-third of the people resided on farms, they received less than one-tenth of the national income with which to purchase goods. In fact, from 1926 to 1940 the income of the farmers or agriculturists amounted to only about one-tenth of the national income. There are around 730,000 farm operatives or farm units in Canada. Offhand I would say that probably 700,000 would be a fair estimate; and there are more farmers east of the great lakes than there are west of them.

In 1943 Ontario and the rest of eastern Canada had one of the poorest crops in history. Thousands of Ontario farmers throughout all parts of that province threshed no coarse grains at all. The only grain they had was wheat; and fall wheat was a comparatively poor crop. We had no Prairie Farm Assistance Act to help us in Ontario, because crop failures and poor crops are almost unknown. But the government did pay a subsidy of $4.50 a ton on the shipment of coarse grains to eastern Canada, and also a small subsidy, to which Ontario added another small subsidy, for grain shipped in early. This was certainly appreciated by Ontario farmers.

But over one-half of the farms in Ontario are mortgaged for more than seventy-five per cent of their value. I say that we should assist the farmers with their mortgages, by giving them a lower rate of interest. It is true that the government has established an industrial development bank to provide funds for industries opening up operations, and industries which will be enlarging after the war. This bank is set up under the supervision of the Bank of Canada, and it would have several branches across the country. Undoubtedly it is set up with the idea of taking risks and chances which would not be taken by ordinary loan organizations or chartered banks. The government is taking a chance on that, with the rate of interest at five per cent.

Then the Farm Improvement Loans Act was passed, which sets aside a sum of approximately $250,000,000 to be lent to farmers who wish to improve their farms, or to put in modern equipment and machinery, or anything to develop their farms or homes. That money is available at around five per cent, as well. This cannot be considered good security, because the government has agreed to accept ten per cent of the loss which would be made. That being so, I say that the farm loan board have a much better risk than is found either in the security offered by the Industrial Development Bank Act or the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The farm loan board was established in 1929, and to date has lent something over $50,000,000 on first and second mortgages. Outstanding on March 31 of last year was the amount of $32,603,000 on first mortgages at five per cent and $1,312,000 on second mortgages at six per cent. Some of the amount has been paid off, but outstanding at the moment there is approximately on loan to farms the amount of $34,000,000. The interest on that loan to farming communities should be reduced to four per cent, because they certainly are a better risk than the risk that is being taken under either the Industrial Development Bank Act or the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Let me say, further, that Ontario this year has the best crop it has had in years, although labour in that province is very hard to get. With the supply of labour it would be almost impossible to harvest the crops at the present time. I know some representatives of the federation of agriculture were in Ottawa last week making representations, and I would urge the government, through the Department of Labour and the Department of National Defence, to release from training camps enough men, who have had farming experience, that some assistance could be given to harvest the crops in the next two months.

Ontario wheat is now ready for harvest. In a normal year we produce about 20,000,000 or 22,000,000 bushels of wheat. There would not be more than 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 bushels taken out for milling purposes. In 1942 the ceiling price was set at $1.26, Montreal, for Ontario wheat. There was no floor price. That nets the Ontario producer around $1.10 a bushel. In 1937 wheat sold in Ontario at the lowest price on record, and went as low as forty-five cents a bushel. At that time the Wheat Board Act was enlarged so as to take in Ontario wheat. Then in 1938 a great deal of wheat that was threshed in Ontario was delivered to the wheat board, at the elevator. There was no elevator space to store the wheat, and most of it had to be sold. But early in 1939 the price of wheat rose above the initial payment, going up close to one dollar. The home market gave it that increase in price, and the price continued to rise until early in 1942, when the government set a ceiling price for Ontario wheat. Beyond that it could not go.

May I for the moment compare what has happened in Ontario with what has happened in connection with western crops? The wheat board took the western crops of 1939, 1940 and 1941 at seventy cents a bushel. That was the initial payment. Let me say that was above the market price at that time, because the markets of the world were open for wheat. I believe considerable money was lost at that time at the seventy-cent rate.

In 1942 the price was raised to ninety cents a bushel, plus participation certificates. This happened in both cases. Wheat was rising on the Winnipeg exchange, and early in 1943 the market closed out at $1.23¼ a bushel, or approximately that, and the Government took over all the wheat in store at that time. At the same time a price was set for the 1943 crop at $1.25 a bushel, plus participation certificates. It is true that wheat was taken in in 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941 at seventy cents a bushel. In 1942 it was taken at ninety cents.

There were also many other payments made to western farmers at that time. In 1939 the Prairie Farm Assistance Act came into force, and from that date until 1943 there was paid out to the three western provinces a total of $38,809,522. In 1941 prairie income payments were made, and there was spread pro rata, I imagine, among the farmers, the sum of $18,898,270. Then the wheat acreage reduction bonus became effective, and payments from 1941 to 1943 amounted to approximately $82,000,000. Wheat was taken over at $1.23 a bushel, and there had been paid seventy cents a bushel for some, and ninety cents for the rest, on participation certificates. The value of these participation certificates amounted to about $60,000,000.

Then, along with that they were paid in that period about $18,000,000, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Therefore, to have this clear, let me say that for the years 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942 they received the floor price on wheat, plus participation certificates. Those participation certificates, along with all these other bonuses and subsidies, amount to a total of $217,707,792. So that they got a good deal more than seventy cents or ninety cents a bushel for their wheat. I have never figured it all out, but if one takes seventy cents a bushel for 1939, 1940, 1941, plus ninety cents for 1942, and adds to that the $217,707,792, he will see that they got a good price for their wheat in western Canada. Ontario wheat was all sold in 1943 at the ceiling price because they could not get any more. The 1943 western wheat is still being held. A floor price of $1.25 a bushel is being paid, plus participation certificates. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) has told us that between 260,000,000 and 270,000,000 bushels of wheat of 1943 have been shipped to the United States. The return from the 1943 crop will be $1.25 a bushel, plus the participation certificates which should run from ten to fifteen cents a bushel more. The result is that the western farmer is getting more for his wheat than the Ontario farmer is able to get for his at the present time.

The western farmer also has a floor under and a ceiling price over his oats and barley, plus a bonus of ten cents on oats and fifteen cents on barley. I believe there is a floor of $2.75 on flax. In Ontario we have no floor under corn, although we have tried to get it for some time. I am not sure that the price for soy beans has been set yet, but I do not believe there is a floor.

Mr. GARDINER: There is an actual price on soy beans.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I have not heard it announced, although I have been asking for it for a long time.

Mr. GARDINER: Not for this year; for last year.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent). It is the 1944 crop I am speaking of. They say that the Saskatchewan election was lost because of federal policy. When I was younger I believed in Santa Clause. As I got older I became disillusioned, but I am again reaching the place where I believe there is still a Santa Claus. If the Minister of Agriculture is not a Santa Claus to the western farmer then I do not believe they have ever seen one. He has gone down all their chimneys and I do not think they were big enough. They had to enlarge them so that he could go down again.

I think the price of Ontario wheat is too low. It should be raised to a ceiling price of $1.50 a bushel. I do not object to the western farmer getting a good price for his wheat and other crops, but I think the federation of agriculture is doing something to try to place agriculture on a higher plane. We must get agriculture in the position where it will get its fair share of the national income. The east and west should get together to support the federation of agriculture. I do not care whether you call it a farm bloc or something else, but the fact remains that these people are interested in agriculture being placed on a sound economic basis so that it can get its fair share of the national income.

[Mr. H. A. MacKenzie.]

If we are going to retain the young people on the farm; if we are going to retain people in the rural districts, we must take some of the drudgery out of farm life; we must make farm life more livable. Many times in this house I have heard it told of how farmers years ago had to sleep on straw ticks or on corn husks. I have done all those things. I have lived in a shack without modern conveniences. That did not do me any harm, but I do not think we should expect our young people to do it to-day. As a matter of fact they will not do it. There are thousands of young people who have gone to the factories in Detroit and Windsor and Sarnia because living conditions and income were not right at home.

One thing that should be emphasized is the increased need for hydro power and electricity. An hon. member from Manitoba the other night gave percentages of farms with hydro power. I believe he claimed that in Ontario forty per cent of the farms had electricity, but the last report I had showed only thirty-one per cent. However, I believe a lot of hydro power has been put in during the last year.

I saw a press dispatch the other day to the effect that daylight saving was working out very well and would be retained after the war, and I believe it stated that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) had said that the demand for hydro power would increase if we went back to standard time. I am not so sure about that, because most industries are working twenty-four hours a day and the lights are turned on when daylight ceases. I would not for the world want to deprive workers in factories of a long afternoon, but I do not see why they cannot start to work an hour earlier and leave the clock alone. I think the time will come when they will do that. You cannot save daylight; it just cannot be done. There was only one man who could ever save daylight, and that was Joshua when he made the sun stand still. We have no Joshuas in modern life to-day.

I just leave these few thoughts with you and I hope that we can organize in order to get rural life back into its proper place.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, were I to declare that the members of the Social Credit group have made a conscientious attempt to cooperate in shortening this debate I doubt if any would disagree. However, cooperation does not apply just to one group. For my part I have remained out of the house at least during parts of recent days so that I would not be aggravated into speaking. Unfortunately I came in to-night. I have heard one speech which in itself could be responsible for my participating at this time. I regret very much that I happen to be the one who appears to be carrying the debate over to another day.

I wish to say a number of things with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). It is regrettable that some people have such poor memories and do not take the time to go back and read the records once in a while. If they did that they would probably secure a proper understanding of the position which this and other groups took at the beginning of the present war. Before dealing further with this matter, I should like to make a brief reference to the budget itself.

I think it is proper to say that the budget was more or less bereft of surprises. I know a great many people expected that there would be certain changes, the purpose of which would be to alleviate the burden of taxation probably to a great extent. As far as I am concerned I was not a bit surprised because I knew that if taxation had been lowered materially then borrowing, which is nothing but a deferred system of taxation, would have had to be increased. That is the penalty you pay when the method of financing the war is based on a policy of debt and taxation.

I know that many of those who believed there would be substantial reduction in taxation overlooked the fact that the cost of the war has not been lessened. We are going to be extremely fortunate if taxation remains where it is for the duration of the war, if our financial costs are not considerably greater than those we have encountered up to the present time.

More than that, as I said during a previous speech, I am not going to be astonished if taxation is not reduced after the war is over, because it has been said time and time again in this house that we have, alongside the very heavy taxation, built up municipal, provincial and federal debts of approximately $16,000 million. I sometimes wonder what the minister meant when during the early months of the war he indicated that we would pay for the war as it is being fought. In the destruction of material things and of human life we have paid a pretty costly price. When we take into consideration Prime Minister Churchill's assertion that the price is "blood, sweat and tears", it does make one feel badly to think that when the war is over we are going to start paying for it in a dollar and cent fashion. To confirm that statement all one has to do is recognize the extent of the national debt and its growth during the prosecution of the war. Another regrettable feature is that, of those boys who are fighting overseas, apart from those who will never come back, the numbers who return maimed and the many, we hope, who will come back uninjured will themselves have to play a major part in financing the dollar cost of the war which they won—all, I assert, because the government persist in pursuing strictly orthodox methods of financing and are determined not to endeavour to alleviate at least the debt aspect of our war cost by utilizing national credit.

Another serious situation which has developed as a consequence of our present method of financing is that, in order to carry on, we have had to centralize more and more all activities. More than that, due at least in part to our method of financing, we have had to adopt more and more regimentation, much more than would have been necessary if we had adopted a democratic system of financing, at least in part.

Of course the method of financing has played no small part in the further restriction of certain liberties. I am not one who asserts that you can fight a war while continuing to live as usual. I am not one who would say that the government should not and must not and need not take unto itself certain authorities which in peace time we would deny it. I do not wish to be charged with suggesting that we should pursue life in the normal fashion. But as a result of the need of the government to centralize further, to regiment further, to restrict liberties further, there has developed among a cross-section of our people a respect for the principle of totalitarianism. Probably I should make that clear. Unfortunately there are some who think that the success in connection with the war effort has been due largely to the fact that we have regimented, that we have deprived the people of liberties and so forth, and they have as I say developed some sort of strange love of this principle of regimentation. I find that largely true among a cross-section of people who have the tendency to encourage leadership rather than apply personal initiative. Our method of financing has been largely responsible for the growth of certain of these conditions.

I desire to make some remarks in reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but since it is almost eleven o'clock I would prefer to do so upon an occasion when he is likely to be present.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 11 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF BEAUCE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Edouard Lacroix, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Beauce. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Fifth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Picard.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to substitute for the motion that is on the order paper the following:

That on and after Wednesday, July 12, until the end of the session, the house shall not be adjourned on Wednesday at six o'clock, notwithstanding anything in standing order No. 6.

I may say that the motion as it appears on the order paper would preclude us from carrying on the understanding we had about Wednesday afternoons and the motion as it is now put will continue the same procedure on Wednesday afternoons as we have been following; that is to say, that members of the war committee would be free to attend meetings of that committee on Wednesday and not be expected to be in the house.

Mr. CHURCH: Why pick on the 12th of July?

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the situation which has now arisen with respect to the change in sitting hours, I would ask the Prime Minister if the government would not permit some slight modification of the previous arrangement in regard to Wednesdays, so that the orders of the day may be called. If that were done, with the understanding that as usual there will be no divisions that day, perhaps that would be satisfactory as far as we are concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That means we would have questions and so on?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. Why not? That is what you started out to do.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe hon. members have found it a little more expeditious to proceed at once on Wednesdays with the business; to have one day when the house is not liable to be held up by questions or motions. I would say to my hon. friends that it would be embarrassing to members of the government if they were not in the house in the event of certain motions being moved on Wednesday afternoons. It will be necessary for the members of the war committee to continue to meet on Wednesday afternoons as they have met in the past.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure there is no desire to embarrass the government or the war committee of the cabinet; I want the Prime Minister to understand that at the very outset of any remarks I have to make. The arrangement entered into early in the session, on the Prime Minister's own initiative, under which the house did not sit on Wednesday, did not work out as he had anticipated. So far as I am concerned, and I think so far as most of the private members of this house are concerned it was a day wasted. The Prime Minister then permitted the business to be dealt with on Wednesday afternoons, and that has continued up to the present time. Now, near the end of the session, he brings in a very proper motion that the order of business on Wednesday shall be the same as on other days. That is the motion on the order paper, but for some reason, which he suggests as being interference with the cabinet or the war committee, he wants to take away from private members on Wednesdays one of the few privileges remaining to them. I do protest against that limitation, and others I could mention. This notice of motion on the order paper is the proper notice that should be given if we are to carry on the business of the house in a proper way. Evidently the government have had a change of heart and a change of mind, but I do not believe they are justified in attempting to take away from private members at this late stage of the session, one of their few remaining privileges. I protest against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been no change of heart or of mind on the part of the government. As a matter of fact if I had not intervened yesterday, at the time I spoke of the house sitting Wednesday evenings, I believe the motion would have been put at that time and what I am now suggesting would have been adopted. I asked that a motion be placed upon the order paper providing that the house would resume its sittings on Wednesday evenings. I did not see the motion until I was coming into the house. I then sent for the Clerk, and pointed out to him that the motion appearing on the order paper would make it necessary for members of the war committee to be in the house Wednesday afternoons; that I felt it imperative that we should have Wednesday afternoons for the meetings of the war committee; I asked the Clerk to give me a substitute motion which would permit the proceedings on Wednesday afternoons being carried on as they have been since hon. gentlemen opposite were kind enough to make what they said was a constructive suggestion, that by omitting questions on the orders of the day we would save a great deal of time. I thanked my hon. friends for the suggestion at the time; I should like to continue to thank them for making it possible to have the house carry on as they originally suggested. It is in every way preferable that we should save time which, as hon. members know, is liable to be taken up with questions and unexpected matters which otherwise would come up on Wednesday afternoon. If hon. members are desirous of having the business of the house drag on; if that is their real wish, for my part I do not mind if I stay here until the month of December. I am prepared to remain in this house and follow its proceedings to the end, but I do think everyone is anxious to expedite business, and that has been the sole motive in presenting these motions.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask that a definite understanding be arrived at in regard to divisions on Wednesdays?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are to be none.

Mr. STIRLING: There are to be no divisions? Are we to understand that this will also cover votes in committee? A couple of Wednesdays ago an incident arose which made me wonder whether that general understanding was supposed to cover votes in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My understanding was that any contentious question would be postponed, that we would not have a division that day. It had better be the definite understanding in regard to both divisions and votes in committee. It is just a matter of dropping the particular item for the time being, and taking it up at a subsequent time.

Mr. STIRLING: But that does not cover the matter of committees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. in regard to both.

Mr. GRAYDON: During the debate on the aeronautics bill or the transport bill a couple of weeks ago, if my memory serves me correctly, the question of an appeal from the ruling of the Chair came up, and in my temporary absence from the house the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said he was quite sure I would support his contention that there could not be a division in the house while this arrangement was in effect, which of course placed us in an awkward position. I think there should be some clarification in that regard, because it might bring about an embarrassing situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we might understand that if hon. members object to any matters being discussed further at that stage, that matter might be dropped for the time being and something else taken up.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL CHARLES DE GAULLE

ADDRESS TO BE INCLUDED AS APPENDIX TO OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address which General Charles de Gaulle delivered on parliament hill this day, 11th July, 1944, and the other addresses delivered on that occasion be included as an appendix to the official reports of the debates for the fifth session of the nineteenth parliament of Canada.

He said: This motion is in terms similar to the one passed by this house at the time President Roosevelt addressed us.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of address of General de Gaulle, with speeches of welcome, see page 4748.)

MOBILIZATION ACT

FURTHER REFERENCE TO REPORT OF STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Labour, having to do with a Canadian Press report dated yesterday which states that Premier Godbout reiterated the statement made by him on Sunday that farmers or farmers' sons and farm hands can secure their release from the army no matter what may be their military situation if their services are needed on the farm, provided that they have certificates from the parish priest, the mayor and the agronomist. The question is this: Is it a fact that such a policy or programme as that outlined by the premier of Quebec is now in effect, under which men are being discharged from the army when they make application, supported by the three certificates mentioned; and, if so, when was that policy brought into operation?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): So far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, that is not the policy.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is this correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not correct.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Godbout must be talking through his hat.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Don't fight the election here.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, July 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks last night I indicated my intention to make reference to certain observations made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I do that, not because that hon. member happens to be involved, but because of the necessity for stating more clearly certain things which altogether too frequently are represented in an entirely improper light.

I refer to page 4684 of Hansard, where the hon. member said:

> I entirely disagree with the government on their man-power policy and am not afraid to say so, but I must say at the same time that every party in the house made the same mistake in 1940.

So far as the Social Credit party is concerned, that statement is not correct. I shall endeavour to show the house in a moment or two, as we have shown before, what our stand was at that time. Again the hon. member said, as reported on the same page:

> The fact of the matter is that none of us was prepared to face the public and say that we would put conscription into force from the drop of the hat, although we represented the people of Canada.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Again, so far as the Social Credit party is concerned, that statement is not correct. Third, and finally, he said:

> None of the parties had courage to face the public and say that it would put conscription into force at the very outset, as the United States and Great Britain did.

The Social Credit party is the one party which did have the courage, and to that extent the hon. member's statement is not correct.

Let me go back to 1936, when members of the Social Credit party first entered the House of Commons. I have referred to this statement before. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), house leader of this party, referring to the general prospects and the existing dangers of that day, said:

> The increase of armaments that is in prospect is a most disappointing development to all who want to see the reign of law established in international affairs and an end put to war. But where the responsibility lies is quite clear. No matter how peace-loving a nation may be it has to consider the conditions which exist in the world to-day and act accordingly. Britain has been exceedingly anxious to avoid adding to their armament burdens but in its present situation has no alternative. Nor can Canada be content with merely expressing the desire for peace.

The hon. member for Lethbridge went on at that time and indicated that this group would support such steps on Canada's part as would render her powerful enough in all respects to plan an effective part in any world crisis with which the League of Nations might be called upon to deal.

Then, he made other statements. I could take Hansard from 1936, right up to the present time, and prove conclusively to the house that the Social Credit party not only took the correct stand at the beginning, but is the only party in the house which has been consistent in the stand it has taken.

I wish to refer to statements made in the house by the then member for Medicine Hat, Mr. Mitchell, who, incidentally, is now a major in Canada's active army. Referring to those of our group on September 11, 1939, he said:

> The new democracy group has laid down the principle in Canada and in this house that when Canada is at war the whole of Canada is at war. You cannot conscript men and have industry and finance volunteer. You cannot conscript finance and industry and have men volunteer. This is a sound principle; it is an elementary principle of good business which it would seem imperative for this parliament to accept. If we choose not to do so now, circumstances will eventually compel us to do so. I sound this solemn note of warning to the government, that we cannot afford not to begin right. The experience of the last war, if it taught us anything, taught us that. Why is it that we refuse to learn? Must we in this crisis repeat the initial blunders and wastage of resources and man-power that took place in the last war? If we must, then let us decide to do it frankly and openly; let us not pretend that we are not doing it. But if we would learn from the experience of the last war, then let us face the matter frankly and clearly now, and admit that the answer lies in national service—not national service of men alone, of finance alone or of industry alone; anything less than national service of all three together as Canadians would be a supreme demonstration of inefficiency.

And then, the next few lines:

The government have declared against universal conscription; the Conservative opposition have officially declared themselves as against universal conscription; the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have declared against universal conscription. This means that these parties are allied on a principle which means suicide for Canada.

Dealing with the word "conscription" I wish to read just one paragraph from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Lethbridge in the same debate. He was referring to conscription, as it applied to manpower, and said:

Let us look at what the word means to-day. Consult your dictionary and you will find all it means is forceful enrolment of men or money that they might be available for use at the discretion of the government. It does not necessarily mean that every man conscripted will don khaki, or that he will appear in the battle lines of the world. It does mean that he shall be available to be placed where, in the opinion of those in charge, he might best serve his country. Who hesitates to be placed in that position? I do not.

It should not be necessary for me to quote further from the official record. We resent very much the attempt on the part of some people, at different times, to ally this group with them in the attitude which they adopted toward this whole question, not only before the outbreak of war, but actually after the outbreak.

More than that, I think there is one other purpose served. Sometimes we find spokesmen for certain groups, who to-day justifiably feel very much ashamed of the stand they took over the years, endeavouring to say, since they have changed their stand: "This is what we have always stood for." I say with considerable emphasis that we are the only ones who can claim to have been consistent from the start.

Mr. POULIOT: What does the hon. member say about my own stand?

Mr. SHAW: I am speaking of our group, as a group. True, there are some individuals who may have taken a consistent stand. My references have been made to groups.

There is another matter to which I find it necessary to make reference this afternoon. It does not always please me to have to make these references, but sometimes we have no choice. I refer to certain statements made by the leader of the C.C.F. party during a recent press interview. The hon. member, referring to the Social Credit party—and I think he was making special reference to the government of Alberta—said, according to the headlines, which are more or less confirmed by the text, if he was reported correctly—"Social Credit on Way Out—Coldwell". I take no exception to that, because I say we are on our way out—to demonstrate that we are capable of rocking their candidates back on their heels as they have never been rocked before.

One amazing thing in connection with the interview was that there seemed to be a certain amount of ill feeling on the part of the leader of that group in that we had not sought his advice before calling an election in Alberta. He seemed to indicate that there was a degree of indecent haste. Let me point out to him that wherever by-elections have not been held in Canada he has taken a prominent part in actually seeking redress in the courts, or has encouraged others to do so. Moreover, where certain provincial governments have extended their normal lifetime, he has been most vociferous in his contention that this procedure was undemocratic. The Social Credit government in the province of Alberta will have completed four years and four months in office by the time of the election. We are giving the people an opportunity to express their views. We feel that it is inopportune and improper to impugn motives in connection with the holding of an election. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in Alberta for a period of months before the four years were completed endeavoured to convince the people there that we were afraid of an election, that we were afraid to go out and seek a mandate from the people. Then almost immediately after our announcement of an election he cried to high heaven that there was trickery somewhere, that there was indecent haste.

I do not like to do this, but I must reply to the further charge that we have carried on against what he called the democratic policies of the C.C.F. In this house, in the province of Alberta and across Canada we have endeavoured to point out to the people the dangers which exist. We are very much opposed to a rigidly regimented economy, and we are not at all backward about making those facts known. We base our fears upon the statements of certain persons whom we regard as being authorities. I have made an analysis of the publication "Social Planning for Canada" put out under the auspices of the League for Social Reconstruction, which I believe is regarded as the Canadian socialist organization.

I should like to draw attention to the authors of this publication. They include Eugene Forsey, J. King Gordon, Doctor Leonard Marsh, J. F. Parkington, F. R. Scott, Graham Spry and Frank H. Underhill. I should like to quote from page 227 of that publication, where it says:

> If we want planning, then "we", that is, the generality of Canadians, have to delegate the task of formulating and administering a plan to some particular group or groups of men. These men will have great power over the lives and fortunes of their fellow citizens.

That is the type of thing we are opposed to. There is altogether too much governmental meddling in the affairs of our people. Then I quote from page 493 of the same publication:

> Every time we set up a new permanent independent commission to carry on some function of government, we deny in practice the naive theory of democracy in which we still profess to believe—that all power lies with the "peepul" to be exercised by their elected representatives.

We as social crediters certainly do not subscribe to that. Then I quote from page 225:

> Wide powers placed in the hands of a central planning board undoubtedly involve the possibility of interference with personal initiative and freedom.

We are very much opposed to any such proposition as that. We do not wish to have a greater amount of interference with the personal initiative and freedom of our people. Then I go to page 494, where it states:

> The proposals for economic reconstruction which have been set forth in this book will certainly, if they are adopted, strengthen both of the tendencies which have just been discussed—the growth of the power of the executive at the expense of the power of the legislature, and the extension of the practice of government by independent experts.

Here is another one to which we take the most violent exception. This outlines the philosophy of life which some are trying to bring about in this country. I quote from page 225:

> National planning is also important as a very real step towards the realization of that international control.

I quote these to give the house a complete picture of the things to which we are opposed, no matter by whom they are advocated. I turn to page 498 where it states:

> And if a socialist government coming into office in a period of emergency seeks power to proceed by order in council without day to day reference to the house, it will only be doing what has been already done in both England and Canada by those bulwarks of constitutional traditions, Conservative or "National" governments.

There is a clear-cut indication that these people are prepared to adopt a policy of government by order in council as a permanent feature of our Canadian life. I should like to quote from another publication, "Democracy Needs Socialism." I could hardly believe this one, which reads:

> The introduction of inventions could be controlled if great displacement of labour is apt to result.

That one just about stunned me, because it is a clear-cut indication that if the introduction of inventions affects in any way the putting to work of all our people, those inventions will be controlled. I do not know whether the leader of the C.C.F. party subscribes to what is contained in that book, but I do know that many of those writers are associated with his movement. I see F. R. Scott and Eugene Forsey listed, and what is remarkable, in view of our social security proposal, is that I see also the name of Doctor Leonard Marsh.

I should like to refer to another paragraph in "Social Planning for Canada" which indicates that those who are responsible for writing the book are fully in accord with the present financial system. I quote from pages 286 and 287 as follows:

> Anxious to provide the victims of depression with a scapegoat, the monetary cranks—

Referring to us, I suppose.

> —have nominated the banks for the position. by means of oversimplification or fallacious analysis of the nature of our economic system, they assert that the cause of our difficulties lies in the contraction of credit, or in the debt-creating system, or in the "gold racket" or whatnot—with all of which it is easy to identify the banker.

While the men responsible for the writing of this book may be willing to adopt a change in the ownership of the bank, they assert that they do not propose to make any fundamental change in the system of banking.

We have said as social crediters that socialism is anti-Christian. I know that is a strong statement, but I know also that all I need to do is to quote from the official publications of the socialists in order to show their views in that regard. A declaration was made at the 1912 convention of the American socialist party—I have never heard any repudiation of this—that the ethics of socialism and religion are directly opposed to each other. I should like to quote from "The Ethics of Socialism," by Belfort Bax, as follows:

The association of Christianism with any form of socialism is a mystery. No good socialist can be a Christian.

Then I desire to quote Liebnecht, who happens to be a German socialist, and who says:

It is our duty as socialists to root out the faith in God with all our might. Nor is any one worthy of the name who does not consecrate himself to the spread of atheism.

Then I should like to quote Professor Karl Pearson, an English socialist, as follows:

Can a greater gulf be imagined than really exists between the current Christianity and the socialistic code?

Then in "Science of Political Economy" Henry George says this:

Modern socialism is without religion and its tendency is atheistic.

I could go on to quote a number of others, but I think what I have quoted demonstrates the fundamental reason why we have opposed socialism, why our organization in all parts of Canada has opposed socialism. If the publication "Social Planning for Canada" means anything, then as a party who oppose centralization, who oppose regimentation, who oppose greater government interference with the lives of our people, we could not do otherwise than to oppose, with all the vehemence at our command, socialism or any form of totalitarianism. So that when the leader of the C.C.F. states that we are carrying on a radio and press campaign against fundamental democratic policies of the C.C.F., he has to do a bit of explaining, because our campaign has been against those very things which I have read as typical of certain of the leading socialists in Canada. If he wishes to ally himself with what is said in "Social Planning for Canada", then of course we shall have to admit that we have been carrying on a press and radio campaign against the C.C.F. I do not like to make any further reference to this matter, and I shall not do so. It is not very often that we find it desirable to take a course of action such as I have taken to-day, but at the same time we certainly are not prepared to sit down and gobble up all that some people are prepared to hand to us on whatever type of platter they may desire to use for the purpose.

As to the amendment to the budget, we find it unnecessary to take exception to the first five paragraphs of the Progressive Conservative amendment. We find that the intent of those five paragraphs is deserving of our support. The next paragraph, paragraph (f) is susceptible of a number of interpretations. However, we feel that the value of the amendment outweighs its weaker and less desirable features, and we are therefore prepared, Mr. Speaker, to support the amendment.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, hon. members have made a very general review of the budget at this session, but one can hardly overlook the fact that the budget contains no suggestion of ways and means of providing for a broad comprehensive programme of employment in the post-war days. After all is said and done, it is employment that the ordinary man wants, whether he be war veteran or civilian. It is true that there is provision for vocational and technical training and for some special education. But the average wage-earner wants a scale of wages which will permit him to provide for his family the comforts of a modern home and the educational facilities enjoyed by his more favoured neighbour. He wants his children to be brought up to have the same advantages as the children of his neighbour.

Perhaps the most generous source of wealth and of employment lies in the development of the products of the forest, of the sea, of the soil and of the mines. But the mines differ from all these other sources of wealth and of employment. When the forests are denuded of their products, nature replenishes them, and so it is with the sea. When the soil gets run down, its fertility can be restored by fertilizer. But the wealth that is taken from the mines is taken for good. It can never be replaced. There is no such thing as reproduction of minerals.

I judge that every one of the ministers has received from the Canadian Mining Institute, and from every mining association across Canada, and from the various communities in which mines are located, briefs and appeals for a revision of mining legislation and of mining taxation, for the very reason that there is so much risk in the investment of funds in mining companies. There is no telling whether you are ever going to get your money back from a mine. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) the other day presented to the house in detail his technical reasons as a mining engineer, and other reasons gained from his experience, as to why there should be a revision of mining taxation if mining development throughout Canada is to continue. He spoke as a mining engineer. I want to endorse his proposals speaking from the experience of half a century in the mining districts of West Kootenay. I speak from personal observations.

Early in 1900, as the British Columbia Gazetteer states there were 2,500 registered mining companies in British Columbia. We will admit that some of the mining properties may have turned out to be wild-cats. That is to be expected. But in all the rest there were several mining prospects which were developed and brought into production and which continued as shipping mines. The life of a mine has been variously estimated running up to a maximum of twenty years. You keep pouring in your money, and it is true that you take out the ores and the values of the mine, but eventually the ore is exhausted and the mine closes. In any one of these localities in which a prospect is found which later develops into a shipping mine, what do you find? You find that immediately a little community crops up, with stores and businesses; then come churches and a newspaper, and you have a general settlement which creates business for the community, taxation for the government, the purchasing of supplies and mining machinery from all portions of the dominion of Canada.

I will cite for you the silver, lead, and zinc sections of West Kootenay, known so well as the Silvery Slocan. In twenty-five years they produced $50,000,000 worth of metals. There were a score of mines operated. A group of businesses sprang up; machinery and supplies were being bought from all over Canada, and taxes were being paid both to provincial and to dominion governments. To-day there are very few of those mines in existence. Half a dozen of the mines find it necessary to ship their zinc to the United States because there is no market for it in Canada. I have seen the Great Northern, built from the United States, competing with our Canadian Pacific Railway in building branch lines to get out the ore from the mines. I have later seen these lines abandoned, and the rails torn up, and no more business in those communities.

Or taking the adjoining district of Yale. The Granby company went in there in 1900 and developed mines at Phoenix. In a very short time a prosperous community was organized there, with two branch lines of railway running into that area. That prosperity lasted until 1919. They were taking out 4,000 tons of ore daily. Then in 1919 the ore petered out, the mine was abandoned, and later fire came along and destroyed the whole settlement; then the smelter at Grand Forks was dismantled.

The company also went into the area on the northwest coast where they developed a modern community in the town of Anyox. There they had a smelter, modern homes for their workmen, and there also they were taking out 4,000 tons of ore daily. That was in 1914. That went on until in 1935, when the ore petered out and they had to abandon the mine. They abandoned the huge power plant which they had constructed; they dismantled their smelter, and the machinery was scattered to the four corners of the earth. There you have an instance of another twenty years since which a mining property ceased to be a revenue producer.

I can take you over to Texada, where a smelter was built in the early days. True, it had a small capacity, and it only lasted long enough to take care of the ore for two adjacent mines. There was also a smelter at Ladysmith; that, too, was abandoned in a short time.

Coming back to the Boundary district, we had the British Columbia Copper company, which had a capacity of 2,000 tons daily, and treated the ores in that district. You may judge that the industry was a thriving one inasmuch as it built up a community in that and the adjoining district of some six thousand people, all of whom were earning their living from the mines and smelter; but it passed into history in 1917, and the population to-day is about half.

We come over now to the West Kootenay district. A smelter was built near the international border at Northport. Then the British America Corporation invested the sum of seven million dollars in properties in the Rossland camp and for the purpose of shipping their ore to the Northport smelter, but it was not very long before that ore petered out and that smelter was abandoned.

Take the Hall smelter at Nelson. That continued in operation until 1907, when the ore remaining there was no longer suitable to carry on the smelter.

You can go over to East Kootenay at Marysville. There was a large smelter and a mine, and they were abandoned simply because research had not made it possible to treat those ores.

Now we come to my own city of Rossland. It opened in 1895, and by 1900 its population had risen from 300 to 6,000, as evidenced in the British Columbia Gazetteer. There were churches, an opera house, three vaudeville theatres, two daily papers, and forty-two saloons, and the bars were open twenty-four hours a day seven days a week. It was a most prosperous community. A railroad line was built fourteen miles to move out the ore. A railroad was built from Rossland down to Trail to carry the ore to another smelter which Mr. Heinze, of Butte, Montana, built and which afterwards passed into the hands of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company. The Rossland mines, and there were many of them, took out something like $80 millions in the course of their operations. In 1920, about twenty-five years from the time they were opened, the mines were permitted to be watered and closed; the machinery was taken out and the rails torn up, after having serviced several miles of underground tunnellings and workings. To-day Rossland is a residence community. The fact that the Trail smelter remains is a tribute to research and wide prospecting. That is what is necessary to give new life to the mining industry of British Columbia.

I have mentioned these things in order to emphasize my endorsement and to permit the government to understand why there is this request for the revision of mining taxation, along the lines of a greater depreciation allowance and for the allowance of taxes paid to municipalities and provinces. I ask the minister and the government, for the sake of the employment which the mining business will bring to the post-war order, to give serious thought to this matter of mining taxation.

Now I want to express to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the gratitude of the blind people of Canada for having included in his budget what is known as a guide allowance for the blind, that is to say, an allowance to take the blind to and from their places of employment. Blind people are just as anxious to be independent as are those who can see. The minister's move is a very creditable one, and we thank him for it. But I repeat my plea to the minister and to the government to give further consideration to the matter of pensions for the blind. To-day a blind married man is permitted to earn and receive $865, including pension. Do you think that any labour organization would countenance for one moment the employment in any industry of a married man on earnings, including pension, of $865 a year? Surely the blind man has just as much pride in his family life, as the sighted man, and I ask the government to give thought to that matter.

Then consider the position of the blind boy. At the age of twenty-one he should have some encouragement. He has a future. I wonder whether the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Finance, or any member of what is known as the hard-hearted treasury board, if he had a blind son at the age of twenty-one, would not give him all his affection and every possible help through life. All that the Canadian National Institute for the Blind is asking is that the blind lad be given a pension at the age of twenty-one in order that he may equip himself to earn something in the future.

I want to express an acknowledgment to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for having put through an order in council which is practically the first step in the rehabilitation of blind soldiers. Six years ago I appealed to the government to permit blind civilians, also blinded war veterans, to take concession stands in public buildings. They were permitted to have such stands in business blocks, but for some reason the government did not see their way clear to permit such stands to be located in public buildings. The minister has now put through an order in council which provides that the Canadian National Institute for the Blind shall find employment for and reestablish blind veterans by the construction of concession stands in public buildings across Canada. This is going to give employment to every blind man who comes from overseas. Do not think for one moment that these concession stands are nothing more than an ordinary counter with something on it for sale. Not so. The institute does not do business that way. These concession stands are built to standards; they must conform to the architectural surroundings and to the general construction of the corridor of the building. If the wainscoting is in marble, then that stand must be in marble; correspondingly if it be oak or any other material. That stand is stocked with newspapers, magazines, tobacco and all such articles by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. The blind attendant receives every dollar of profits that passes over the counter, except three per cent which is deducted for depreciation.

The house can readily understand these men coming home from overseas without their sight and without much encouragement for the future. But when they are given to understand that there is a living made possible by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, they will certainly have a brighter outlook on life. And speaking of the men from overseas, not only of this war but of the last war, there is not a member of this house who served overseas, or who for years after the war had anything to do with applications for pensions, who does not know that the greatest difficulty lay in proving that the disability for which a returned man applied for a pension was due to war service. What was the reason for that? The reason was that these men had been overseas for several years; they were anxious to get back home. They were brought to this country and when they were demobilized the medical board examined them, or was supposed to examine them. In every case the man was so keen to get home that he said: "I am all right." And he was discharged as A-1. What was the result in after years? The exposure, shell shock and gas that the men had experienced did its work, and the men became physically disabled. When they applied for pension the medical sheet was referred to and they were told that they were discharged as A-1 and that the disability for which pension was asked was due to post-war services.

I have seen a disabled veteran stand before the tribunal, supported by the soldiers' advocate and by his own attending physician. He was unable to stand alone. Naturally one would be justified in assuming that that was due to exposure or shell shock or some overseas service, but he was told that he was discharged as physically fit, in category I, and could get no pension. But I shall tell you what the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company did in the case of that veteran. They put him in a wheel chair at the gate. They let him sit there and take messages from those who chose to enter, but he received no pension or assistance from the government. Therefore I think the greatest service that the relatives of friends of a man overseas can do for him, or that the government can do for him, is to advise any boy overseas to be sure that there is a most detailed record of every incident in connection with his services; any time he was in the hospital or wounded or had any disability whatsoever should show on his record so that when he is demobilized and receives his medical chart he has some grounds on which to make a future application for pension if he needs it.

I wish to return to the Minister of Finance for just a moment. In July of last year I brought to the attention of the government the fact that so many deaf and hard of hearing people were penalized because the high price of a hearing aid was beyond their financial reach. Those hearing aids sold for $150 to $200. I asked the government to have the Research Council of Canada go into this matter to determine what was a fair price at which those instruments could be manufactured. Well, they did not do that. What happened was this. It rested with a manufacturer in the United States to call in his research council. He told them to produce a hearing aid which would be within the reach of the general public, and I am glad to say that while those hearing aids at $40 were being distributed to veterans and paid for by the Department of Pensions and National Health, it was only last week that the same company opened its office in Windsor, Ontario, so that the deaf and hard of hearing people in Canada could secure that device at the same price in Canadian funds at which it is sold in the United States, namely, $40. The war exchange tax and the sales tax are paid and it is delivered to the buyer's home.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I be permitted to interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? He referred to the fact that a suggestion was made that this be investigated by the national research council. That was done completely and thoroughly. I shall be glad to send my hon. friend a copy of the report.

Mr. ESLING: I thank the minister for his explanation. I wish to make one more request of the minister. There are to-day thirty manufacturers of hearing aids in the United States. Twelve of those have received the approval of the United States medical council. If those people are going to seek a Canadian market with a low-priced instrument, I ask the government and the minister to see that no instrument is sold in Canada unless it has the approval of the national research council. That is very important.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As far as our jurisdiction in the department goes, that will certainly be done, because we must have their approval.

Mr. ESLING: Your instrument has had that approval?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ESLING: But I am speaking about instruments that may be brought into this market.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The same procedure will be observed in every case.

Mr. ESLING: While I am on this subject I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he will not just interest himself in this, and give thought to the fact that there are so many deaf and hard of hearing people who cannot carry on any vocation whatsoever unless they have a hearing aid. I wish to ask him if he will not provide for an allowance or a deduction in income tax for hearing aids and for the cost of maintaining the batteries, just as allowances for maintenance are made in the department of pensions. He might choose one of two things. If he makes that allowance, it permits people to earn their living. Deaf people and blind people can earn just as good a living, if they have the opportunity, as sighted people, but they must have help. The minister will have to choose between making that allowance or losing income tax from such people when they are helped into gainful occupations.

I cannot see whether the Prime Minister is in his seat, but I wish to refer to the fact that I think it was last March I asked the Minister of Labour if the Japanese would be removed from the interior of British Columbia when hostilities ceased. He said that that was a matter in which it would be necessary for the government to determine as a future policy. I know that it is a matter in which one cannot jump to conclusions too readily, for the reason that there are international complications; but the Minister of National Defence during the absence of the Prime Minister at the conference in the old country stated that during this session the Prime Minister would make a statement as to the policy in connection with the Japanese. Well, the war has been going on for five years. This is a serious question, and I am just wondering whether we can keep these Japanese interned after hostilities end. If we cannot; if we must simply lift the bars and let them out, they are going to invade the business districts of Kootenay and the adjoining constituency of Yale. It may be said they can be sent to other provinces, but after the war there will be nothing to keep them there. They will come back to British Columbia and congregate wherever they please. I believe the government would receive popular approval if it took steps to deport these people. I do not mean that those born in Canada should be deported; that would be contrary to our constitution, which must be respected. I do not mean that those who have been naturalized should be deported, unless it can be shown that they were naturalized for improper motives; and most of them were naturalized for the sole purpose of getting a fishing licence. I do say that the nationals of Japan, for whom this country has no responsibility, who owe allegiance to the emperor of Japan, should be deported, and that they should be encouraged to take with them such others as may be willing to go.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I know it is the desire that this debate be terminated, and I do not wish to prolong it. I have been in Ottawa since about the middle of January, and it is now well on to the middle of July. Those of us who come from the outlying portions of Canada, particularly coming from Nova Scotia, want to be back home for part of the summer months. There are many matters having to do with the maritime provinces that should be discussed, but I am going to deal with only one or two this afternoon.

I want to bring to the attention of the house and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) one matter of very great importance, which I do not believe has received the attention it deserves. I refer to the unfair taxation on electrical energy in Canada. I cannot understand why a system of taxation should be continued under which the central provinces are largely exempted, great public utilities are exempted, but smaller plants, all financed by private enterprise, are subjected to very heavy taxation. A short time ago Premier Godbout delivered an address in which he explained his action in taking over the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company, taking credit to himself for saving the people of Quebec very large amounts of money in federal taxation on the generation of electrical energy in Quebec. Any system of taxation on electrical service should have some basis of fairness to the companies producing the electricity, to the municipalities, the industries and the householders consuming it. Such is not the case in Canada to-day. Taxation should be adjusted so that the production of electrical energy may be encouraged, in order that rural electrification may be carried out as extensively as possible, to make electricity available to farmers and others in outlying districts. Why should electrical energy generated at great natural water power sites, financed by public money borrowed at low rates of interest, be free of taxation, while smaller plants, privately owned, are forced to pay heavy taxes? There is nothing fair or just in that.

I want to quote from the address by Mr. Godbout, as reported in the Montreal newspapers of June 29:

> For household service the customer in a great city like Montreal paid $1.80 for power kilowatt hours, while the consumer in Toronto only paid $1.31. In St. Johns, Quebec, the cost was $2.10, while at Kitchener it was scarcely $1.24. . . .
> For industrial and commercial services the difference was even more marked. Electrical consumption, which would have cost $97 in Toronto, a centre served by the Ontario hydro, would have cost $420 in Montreal and $510 in St. Johns. . . .
> Well, the hydro has put an end to the ridiculous regime I have described. It has already reduced the rates by $2,210,000 a year in the district of Montreal alone, and three other hydro electric companies have followed in reducing their rates by more than a million dollars. The hydro has been able to do this because it is relieved of the federal tax of six millions a year. . . .
> This has been accomplished because hydro Quebec was not created to benefit the provincial treasury, but to service the customers at cheap rates and permit us to complete as soon as possible the urgently needed rural electrification. The service as such has not changed. . . .

In Nova Scotia part of our electrical energy is generated by publicly-owned plants, and part by private industry. Some communities pay heavy federal taxation on their electricity, while others escape such taxes. The people of Nova Scotia pay more than $1,000,000 a year because of this inequitable basis of taxation. I should like to read an extract from an article which appeared in the Halifax Herald as late as June 30, in connection with some publicity having to do with inquiries into the rates on electrical service. Due to war conditions there has been increased production and consumption of electrical energy, which automatically reduces rates:

> Nova Scotia's position in the utility field is peculiar. Many of the plants are publicly owned and are exempt from federal and provincial taxation. On the other hand the biggest are in private hands and subject to levies by Ottawa, which amount to a sum in excess of a million dollars a year. The remainder is the municipal and provincial taxation paid by these same companies.

I have made inquiries in my own constituency of Cumberland, where practically all the electrical energy is generated by private industry. About forty years ago a company established in that county the first electrical generating plant in the world at the mouth of a coal mine, utilizing refuse coal. This plant has been relocated, enlarged and modernized, so that it can compete as to cost with all but the largest of the hydro generating plants. To-day, however, enterprise is penalized and householders and industries depending upon this plant have to pay fifty per cent extra to provide for taxes. I wired the manager of that company, as follows:

> Please wire me amount federal and provincial taxes during last year paid by your company, also estimate total amount such taxes paid in Cumberland. What percentage could rates be reduced if all such taxes were exempted?

This is the reply, dated July 3:

> Provincial and federal taxes total $106,800; equal 21 per cent gross revenue. Municipal taxes in addition $19,900, equal 3·9 per cent. These do not include 8 per cent federal sales tax on lighting. Edison Company, Springhill, tax probably $12,000.

There is another privately operated light and power company generating electricity and serving the eastern portion of my constituency and the northern portion of the county of Colchester. All the companies in Cumberland, and a large number of those in Nova Scotia, are called upon to pay heavy federal and provincial taxes, while the electrical generating plants in central Canada escape.

There is no justification whatsoever for the continuance of a tax, when it is not levied equitably on the people in all sections of the country. There is no justification at all for imposing heavy taxation upon private enterprise established in pioneer days, and because of economies and efficiency in operation is now producing electrical energy so as to compete with government plants. Still these companies are taxed, and their charges are from 33⅓ to 50 per cent higher than they would be if government taxes were not imposed.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister, the house and country, and request that in view of the fact that the taxes on electrical energy are not now levied throughout Canada on an equitable basis, and are unfair and unjust to many communities, these conditions should not be allowed to continue. A special amendment should be made to the budget resolutions in order that all federal taxation and, following that, all provincial taxation, be taken off the generation and distribution of electricity, so that people in all parts of Canada will be treated alike, and so that there may be a wider use of electrical energy in connection with rural electrification, and the establishment and operation of small industries.

I hope the minister and the government will accept my recommendation. Certainly in fairness to people throughout Canada no taxation should be tolerated when it is levied on the present basis, whereby the premier of a province can make an appeal to his electors on the ground that he has been able to take over a big utility and, because he is no longer compelled to pay any tax to the federal government, he is in a position to relieve the people of that province to the amount of $6,000,000, while smaller industries elsewhere are compelled to continue payment of these taxes. I make this appeal to the minister to see that this taxation is cancelled, so that all parts of Canada may be treated alike.

There are many other matters to which I should like to refer. I would speak particularly about conditions in the coal mines of Nova Scotia. A serious statement was made only a few days ago by the minister of mines of Nova Scotia, Hon. Mr. Currie, when he gave warning to the people of that province and the people of Canada, that if the cost of producing coal in Nova Scotia continues at its present level we will have seen the end of the coal-mining industry in eastern Canada. I hope that production can be increased and costs reduced.

I believe the discontent among miners and absenteeism can be traced largely to what they consider to be unfairness in taxation. I believe there is a general feeling among miners that taxation is excessive and unfair. If the proposals made in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) are acted upon, it will have a very beneficial effect upon the morale of the people working in the mines, shipbuilding and war industries. They would no longer be subject to taxation on overtime. The taxation on single persons would begin at $800, and on married persons, at $1,600.

It is very important that this change be made, and that we assist in this way in building up the morale of workers in all parts of Canada. I feel that the amendment would have a very beneficial effect on the coal mining industry in my province, and I shall heartily support it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might at this time have only two or three minutes. I have no desire to make a speech, but there are one or two things I should like to bring to the attention of the house.

In order that the Progressive Conservatives' position on the man-power problem shall be made incapable of the kind of misrepresentation attached to it by government supporters during the current debate and certain hostile sections of the press, I now reassert and reaffirm our policy relative to this vital issue.

It is clearly and unmistakably declared in the Winnipeg platform which reads as follows:

5. Recognizing that the world struggle in which Canada is engaged requires a total war effort, we believe in compulsory national selective service, and that all those selected to serve in the armed forces should be available for service wherever required. We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance, as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about so far as human means can achieve it, an equality in sacrifice.

It has been reaffirmed by our national leader on such important occasions as the meetings at Massey hall, Toronto, a year ago and subsequently in the city of Quebec and elsewhere. It has been redeclared over and over in the House of Commons during this session and previous ones.

The statement of the director of national selective service that Canada was headed into the most acute labour shortage the country has ever faced, coupled with the urgent appeals for reinforcements made by the director of recruiting, at a time when our troops overseas were fighting to gain a bridgehead in Normandy, were followed by a speech by the national chairman of our party at Guelph, Ontario, on June 19 last.

At the same meeting the national leader of our party made this statement at the close of the national chairman's address, and this is what Mr. Bracken said:

One point in particular in Mr. McTague's remarks I wish to support and endorse. He pointed out that since the war we have had many statements from the Department of National Defence as to the urgency of reinforcements, and he added, "Surely national honour demands that without an hour's delay the necessary order in council should be passed making these reinforcements available." In this time of national emergency, surely there will be no Canadians who will find it in their hearts to deny that appeal. Certainly it carries the endorsement of this party, and I would like to think of the great majority of people in all parties as well.

The Winnipeg platform was further followed by the financial critic of our party in this debate, as well as by those on our side who have spoken. It is incorporated in the amendment now before the house, which was moved and will be unanimously supported by our party. In other words, the policy adopted at Winnipeg is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party; and in accord with it I now call upon the government to pass immediately the order in council making the home defence army available for service anywhere and demand that the mobilization call-up be applied equally to the end that equality of service shall be achieved in all parts of Canada.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at this late date in the debate I do not intend to delay the house very long, but I think I should say a few words. So far as the constituency which I represent, Yukon, is concerned, the effect of the budget will not be very great. There will be a slight reduction in taxation of those in the lower income brackets. Before the war the income of the people of the Yukon was derived almost entirely from the mining of gold and silver. As I have stated before in this house, the recent high taxation, probably necessary because of the war, has made it very difficult for Yukoners to carry on. This high taxation added to the high cost of living makes it doubly hard for them.
