Mr. KNOWLES: This act contained a provision giving the government power to provide special depreciation for certain Canadian companies in order to conserve the supply of exchange. In the minister's budget speech of June 26 he indicated, at pages 4185 and 4186 of Hansard, that the amendments now being proposed are presented by reason of the fact that the exchange situation has considerably improved. I am rising to obtain some information. I should like to know whether the amendments proposed in the resolutions now before the committee alter the provision under which special depreciation has been granted to companies such as Falconbridge Nickel, International Nickel, a number of oil companies, and so on.

Mr. ABBOTT: The agreements to which my hon. friend refers were entered into under section 8, part III, of the War Exchange Conservation Act, and that section is not to be repealed.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That schedule two to the said act be amended by:

(a) substituting the phrase "synthetic textile fibres or filaments" for each of the phrases "artificial silk", "artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres", and "artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes" wherever they appear in items 524a, 548, ex 553, 558b, 558d, ex 560c, 561, 561a, 562a, ex 564, ex 565, 567a and ex 568;

(b) substituting the phrase "yarns of synthetic textile fibres or filaments" for the phrase "artificial silk yarns" in item 558d.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That any enactment founded on—

(a) Resolution 1 come into force on August 1, 1944; and

(b) Resolution 2 come into force on June 27, 1944.

Resolution agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, and to provide:

1. That the excise tax of twenty-five per cent on furs be extended to cover the fur content of imported articles.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That exemption from sales tax be provided for grain loaders or elevators with a capacity not exceeding forty bushels per minute.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before this or the next resolution passes I should like to ask one or two questions, and again I am seeking information, because we are getting into pretty deep water. Later on we are to deal with changes in the customs tariff, and in the schedule appended to the budget resolutions I see a long list of agricultural machinery and implements on which the tariff is being changed; in fact I believe in all these instances it is being wiped out. Now I note that under the Special War Revenue Act exemption from sales tax is being provided only for the two or three items mentioned in resolutions 2 and 3. I should like to know if there are any other items of farm machinery or farm implements included in the customs tariff schedule on which the sales tax is not being removed, or are these all the sales taxes that now obtain as far as farm machinery is concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand the list is pretty complete now under the Special War Revenue Act. I have the act before me, and the list of agricultural implements appears to be very long. This item, I believe, is not one which ordinarily would be classed, and is not now classed, as an agricultural implement under the tariff items, but it is used for farm purposes and therefore it is felt that it should be included with the already long list of articles specifically mentioned in the Special War Revenue Act as being exempt from sales tax. The deputy minister advises me that there are no other similar items, as far as he knows, which are excluded.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is, the policy of the government now is to remove both the tariff and the sales tax from all farm implements and farm machinery, at least to the extent that they are listed in the customs tariff schedule attached to these resolutions?

Mr. GIBSON: I would say that is the general policy. The sales tax has been off farm machinery right along, and under the legislation we are bringing in this year the customs duties are being removed as well.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the situation in regard to farm tractors? Are they subject to any tax to-day? They are not mentioned in the tariff schedule or in the resolutions under the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Was my hon. friend asking a question about a tariff item?

Mr. QUELCH: Either under the customs tariff or under these resolutions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would ask my hon. friend to defer questions relating to tariff items until we come to the items themselves, which are to be taken by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. QUELCH: When you purchase a tractor to-day you are given to understand that a very considerable portion of the price represents a tax. I am wondering if that tax is to be removed. I see no mention of farm tractors in any of these schedules.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the duty on tractors is being removed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have not tractors been free of duty right along?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: The parliamentary assistant has made the statement that the duty on tractors is being removed. I am asking him if tractors have not been free of duty right along.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not being personally familiar with the matter I am afraid I will have to ask that questions with respect to tariff items be deferred until we consider the customs tariff, when we will have the proper officials here.

Mr. MacNICOL: The parliamentary assistant did make the statement that the duty on tractors was being removed, leaving the inference that up to the present that duty had been in effect.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had in mind the war exchange tax.

Mr. QUELCH: Is there any sales tax on tractors?

Mr. WOOD: I think we should clear up this matter. When tractors are imported for farm use they are free of duty, but when they are brought in for other purposes the duty is collected.

Mr. ABBOTT: When I answered my hon. friend I had in mind the war exchange tax.

Mr. QUELCH: Is there a sales tax on tractors to-day? Certainly the farmers are given to understand that a large proportion of the price represents a tax, and I am wondering what that tax is.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no sales tax on tractors used for farm purposes.

Mr. WRIGHT: The tax on farm tractors at the present time is a ten per cent war exchange tax, which has been on since the war started. I understand that is now being removed.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That exemption from sales tax be provided for baling twine to be used for baling farm produce and for articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture of baling twine.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the tax on certain places of entertainment as imposed by part XVI of the said act be levied on the operator in each case where he fails to collect the tax from the patron or fails to affix the excise stamps as required under the provisions of the said act.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the retail purchase tax as imposed by part XVII of the said act be levied on the vendor in each case where he fails to collect the tax from the purchaser or fails to affix the excise stamps as required under the provisions of the said act.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the existing provision for the taxation of cigars in item i (a) of schedule II to the said act be replaced by a provision imposing an excise tax of three dollars and twenty-five cents on cigars valued at not more than twenty-five dollars per thousand, and six dollars and twenty-five cents on cigars valued at more than twenty-five dollars per thousand but not more than forty dollars per thousand.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That any enactment founded on paragraphs one to six inclusive of these resolutions shall come into force on the twenty-seventh day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-four.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would ask that the customs tariff items be allowed to stand until the minister is here. At the moment he has to be in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was not in the house when the question came up in reference to the income tax on revenue from United States bonds. The government of the United States deducts from the income on those bonds fifteen per cent. Do I have to pay income tax in Canada on that deduction?

Mr. ABBOTT: You would be entitled to take credit against your Canadian tax for the amount you paid or had deducted in the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would I be able to recover the tax I have paid on those deductions for quite a number of years?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid that question falls within the category of a legal opinion which I referred to yesterday.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the point I want to get clear. When the United States deducts fifteen per cent—I have a receipt in my hand —I am able to deduct from my income tax return here the amount deducted in the United States?

Mr. ABBOTT: You are entitled to take credit for taxes paid in the United States provided the rate is not higher than the rate in force in Canada.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

29. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $2,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: This item was quite fully discussed the other day, particularly with respect to larger schemes which might be carried out in western Canada under this act. We all agree that these larger schemes have their place, but I think the act was originally drafted for the purpose of taking care of the smaller schemes—dugouts, regrassing, the forming of community pastures and that type of work. As such it has performed a very useful service in western Canada, and has done a great deal of good. However I should like to see this scheme extended much further than it goes at the present time. It has been maintained to a great extent in what is known as the Palliser triangle in Saskatchewan. That is, as a matter of fact, the old drought area. In northern Saskatchewan we have gone into stock raising on a large scale, and we have found that in many parts of that area, since the land has been cleared and the bush taken off, many of the streams which formerly ran through the whole of the season now run only during about two months in the early part of the season. The matter of obtaining a water supply in some of the northern areas not now included under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has become a serious problem. Many of the municipalities are now making application to come under the act. I suggest serious consideration should be given to those applications, and that perhaps they should be considered before some of the larger schemes are entered into. If many of these municipalities could obtain the proper machinery for the digging of these dugouts, I know they would be very glad to enter into some sort of agreement with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration to do this type of work in those municipalities in the northern part of the province.

I know the minister has received applications from that part of Saskatchewan, and that he has given sympathetic consideration to some of them. However, there are still many others anxious to come in under the act. I bring this to his attention, and ask again that serious consideration be given this matter.

The other matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention is one which was discussed by the hon. member for Acadia. I refer to the division of the water rights in the whole Saskatchewan river area. We in the north-east part of the province are possibly most interested in the power projects which might be developed from that river. If some of the larger schemes of irrigation are entered into in the western part of Saskatchewan and in Alberta they might seriously curtail the amount of water available for power purposes at points farther along the river. I would certainly suggest to the minister that at as early a date as possible an interprovincial conference should be held with respect to this matter, and that possibly a commission should be set up to come to some agreement in respect of the division of the water available. There is no doubt that by the establishment of reserves in the foothills a much more economical use could be made of the water than is being made at the present time. But before too much expense is involved in connection with the surveying and laying out of these larger schemes, it is my view that some agreement should be arrived at between the provinces. Otherwise it is just possible that some of the survey expenses which may be incurred and other necessary work connected with these larger schemes, would be useless, if there is not enough water available.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Before replying to the points raised by the hon. member I should like to emphasize a correction in a report which has gone out from the discussion which took place the other day. I notice that in some of the press I am credited with having advised the committee that farmers should hold back their cattle. I think hon. members who were in the committee will agree that no such suggestion was made in the discussions which took place the other day. I should like to emphasize the fact that we do not want cattle held back. On the contrary we want cattle marketed at this time—all cattle, in fact, that are ready to be marketed, in order to avoid bringing about a great glut on the market later on, in October. We feel that in October the rush of hogs will take up a considerable part of the capacity of the packing plants, and for that reason we would like cattle to be passed through in as large numbers as possible before that time. So that I wish just to emphasize the fact that I had no intention of even suggesting to the committee or the country that the farmers should hold back their cattle.

On the question the hon. member for Melfort has now brought before the committee, may I say that in principle I agree with what he has said, namely, that we should emphasize small projects. I think it is generally agreed that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was brought into being to assist individual farmers as much as possible in areas where they were experiencing difficulty in getting water for live stock or water for small irrigation projects which might provide them with feed and fodder. That was the original intention of the act, and considerable emphasis should be placed upon that feature at all times. We did experience difficulty in getting the money spent on these small projects. The hon. member for Melfort will recall that that was the condition in the early stages of the development of this plan. The first act indicated that the farmer himself should dig the dugout. He was told under the terms of the act and the regulations that if he did so about half the cost—in the first place it was a third, and later it was raised to a half, then later to two-thirds, and then at last reduced to a half again—would be borne by the government. He was told that if he would put up approximately half the cost, the government would pay the other half. That was the way we started.

In the first year it was found that there were very few farmers who dug the dugouts, the chief reason being that they did not have the equipment. It will be recalled that at that time we had drought and poor crops, with resulting poor feed supplies. Even those farmers who could secure equipment from the municipalities did not have horses fed to the condition where they could be utilized for that kind of heavy work. And so the farmers just said, "We are not able to do it."

Then we devised a plan of encouraging municipalities to obtain equipment, either by hiring contractors or by buying equipment themselves and taking out the bottom six or seven feet. They said, "If the farmer takes off the first five feet they would send drag-lines in to take out the other six or seven feet." The money which would otherwise have gone to the farmers was paid to the municipality or to the contractor.

It will be recalled that in 1939 we had an unfortunate experience with that. We had authorized the digging of dugouts by the thousands. The farmer was authorized to go ahead and dig any time he wished to do so. In the early stages there were very few dug, and the result was that we did not get into financial difficulties. But in 1939 when there was a shortage of work for drag-lines and construction equipment, practically every contractor in the country entered into the digging of dugouts. It will be recalled that it took us two years to pay for the dugouts dug in 1939. As a matter of fact, a great many of our opponents said, unkindly, that we did it because there was an election coming on. Of course no one knew in 1939 that there was going to be an election in the winter of 1940. We did not even know it ourselves. Even in this house we did not know it until one day in January. Nevertheless, those who like to produce political arguments said that we simply went out and dug all these dugouts—twice as many as we could pay for—in that year, because there was an election coming on in the winter of 1940. We were not able to dig any dugouts in the summer of 1940 because we had no money with which to dig them. We had to pay for those already dug.

We are coming back into a similar period. For the last three or four years every contractor has been busy working on airfields and other work of that kind and was not able to dig any dugouts. In the meantime the municipalities have been buying equipment or have been getting permits to buy equipment in order to do this work. Some contractors have equipment not now working on new work. The result is that this year there are many people who want to dig dugouts. The municipalities have equipment and the contractors are coming back and are trying to get work digging dugouts. The money was expended by the middle of July this year.

There was just as much money for dugouts as there has been in other years. Under ordinary circumstances we would not have been able to spend any more money than we spent last year or the year before, but my information is that this year the money ceased to exist about the middle of July. I think another $30,000 was provided in order to make it possible to go on until about harvest time. It is not entirely a question of how much money was available. We tried to divide the money up in such a manner as to get it all spent on useful undertakings, but it requires a lot of co-operation and sometimes a lot of advance knowledge as to what equipment is going to be available and so on. This year we could probably have used more money on dugouts than we have if we had known in advance that there was going to be equipment available.

Mr. PERLEY: Are the contractors who formerly did this work going to continue to do it this year? What price per yard is being paid and is it the same as it always was?

Mr. GARDINER: It was estimated that it took about nine cents per yard to move the earth, and we are paying four and a half cents per yard.

Mr. PERLEY: At the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and we have been for three years. For a time we did pay up to six cents but we reduced it because we found that certain of these people who had purchased equipment could dig dugouts for six cents per yard, and in certain cases municipalities which had purchased equipment could dig them for that price. We were a little suspicious that in some cases they were making money digging them, and we put it back to four and a half cents, which has been the price for three years.

Mr. PERLEY: I believe considerable survey work has been done in the Qu'Appelle valley and the tributaries of the Qu'Appelle. The minister will know what I mean by "tributaries." Some stock watering dams were built. Is there anything likely to be carried on following the results of those surveys? Could the minister give us a little information with respect to the surveys and the reports he got?

Mr. GARDINER: The general plan in connection with any of these streams in the west is that we put in engineering parties to make surveys. We have done considerable work on the Frenchman river and in the southeastern part of the province where we are carrying on similar projects. Some of these surveys were originally carried on by the provincial government when irrigation was entirely under the provincial government, and we continued the survey work. Surveys were carried on on the South Saskatchewan river for the purpose of locating projects similar to the one which had been developed at Medicine Hat. There is a privately operated irrigation project just outside of Medicine Hat where the water is pumped up about sixty feet to a plateau which can be irrigated. Corn and alfalfa and other crops are grown there in abundance. With that experience and with the experience gained from other projects we conceived the idea of trying to locate as many as possible of these along the South Saskatchewan river between Medicine Hat and Saskatoon. Survey parties have been out working on this. From these, information can be supplied to farmers along the way as to what can be done.

Such projects can be developed only if power is available. We have all the figures of the cost of operating the project at Medicine Hat. Power is supplied there and there has been a discussion of the possibility of the company that develops power on the Bow river up at Calgary extending its line right on through to Saskatoon. They have asked for the privilege of doing this on a number of occasions. This kind of project is involved in the kind of thing that is now being discussed in Saskatchewan. It is suggested that all power development in Saskatchewan shall be under government control. About fifty per cent of it is now under government control. That would make it necessary for the government rather than the company to continue on through to Saskatoon. The Saskatoon plant is operated by the government. There would have to be power lines before these developments could be carried on along this particular stream.

Similar investigations are being made along the Qu'Appelle. I think survey parties have been out continuously for the last five years and as a result recommendations have been made in connection with the controlling of the waters in the lakes in the Qu'Appelle valley. Dams have been constructed at Buffalo Pound lake and at Long lake as well as at Qu'Appelle lake near the town of Fort Qu'Appelle. These dams control the waters in the Qu'Appelle valley. As is known by all who are familiar with that valley, Buffalo Pound lake is the first of a series in the valley. At times when there is a rush of water the level of this lake is at a certain level. As the season advances and evaporation occurs the water level will drop from three to six feet below the level of the outlet. The water then became just standing water with no stream flowing out of the lake. A dam has been built across the end of the lake which prevents the water from rushing out in the spring. This dam is opened during the summer months to permit a continuous stream of water down the river. That is the object of having the dam there.

A little further along the valley is Long lake. This was probably not a part of the Qu'Appelle river but in a tributary basin. If one flies over the country he will see that at one time there must have been a connection between Long lake and Quill lake. There are alkali flats between those two lakes which indicate that they may have been lakes which have filled in at some time. The water flows into Long lake out of the Qu'Appelle valley in the early spring, and later sometimes flows out by the same runway as it flowed in. During a drought period Long lake may be six feet below the level at which water flows out. No water flowed out for a number of years recently because the level of the lake surface was too low. We have controls now at the end of that lake which we hope will result in our being able to control the level of the water to better advantage when the water in the lake returns to the level at which it once was.

Below that are the Qu'Appelle lakes. At the town of Qu'Appelle, where the old grade ran across the river and where the original bridge was, there is a dam put in. The grade was already there. When the dam was put in, the waters in that lake were kept up from one and a half to two feet, at any rate to a higher level than they were before. It is impossible to keep the waters any higher than the dam provides for because all along that lake we have summer resorts and people with cottages and if the water were higher certain points being utilized as summer resorts would be washed away.

The parties working along these lakes were providing information upon which decisions could be reached as to the levels at which the water should be controlled.

The next lake below Qu'Appelle is Katpewe lake. There has been a dam at the end of that lake for many years and the water is still kept at the same level at which it was prior to this programme being undertaken. But it is suggested by the engineers that the level should be raised. We have doubts about that because of the experience we have had. When I was minister of highways in Saskatchewan we put another foot on top of the dam and then had to take it off because the water was beginning to wash away the lands where the church and cemetery and Indian school buildings are located at Lebret. So that we had to let more of the water out of the lake. We are getting expert information from the engineers which will enable us to avoid difficulties such as we have got into in the past when trying to control the waters of that lake.

At Round lake and at Crooked lake it is much the same thing. There has been a dam constructed there for that purpose.

So far as the other surveys are concerned, they are made on streams running into the Qu'Appelle valley from both sides. Those streams have flowing water in them, under natural conditions, only in the spring of the year. The grade on which the stream flows is steep and the waters have a rapid descent. What the engineers are doing is trying to find all the locations where one could put in a dam and hold the water sufficiently far back to make it useful for different purposes, one of them being stock watering, as has been suggested. A number of small stock watering dams have been put in on different streams. What the engineers are really searching for is locations where one could put a dam across what may be a flat that runs out from one of these streams, and back the water into it in very much the same way as the water backs into Long lake.

Mr. MacNICOL: In other words, make reservoirs.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, instead of having the water come down in the spring months, in a rush that will be over in from two to six week's time, we are attempting to hold the water back and let it down the streams gradually, keeping the water in the lakes at the bottom of the valley up to the proper level and keeping the stream flowing during the summer months instead of its being converted into stagnant pools.

Mr. PERLEY: The idea would be to have more than one dam on each stream.

Mr. GARDINER: Our big difficulty is not as to the number, but finding the proper locations. Because of the rapid descent of the streams, one could put a dam in it anywhere and hold back the water for two or three hundred feet, but we are trying to find a location where we can hold the water back for half a mile or a mile. If that can be done on the stream itself, so much the better. Where we can find locations to put in a dam, say ten feet high, which would put six feet of water in a reservoir along the ravines, we would do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are working on that now?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. These survey parties which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is asking about have been working continuously on that and we have some reports on locations where that can be done. The streams come in from both the north and the south of the river.

Mr. PERLEY: If I may interrupt the minister, three or four years ago there was the idea of using this water for irrigation purposes and encouraging the farmers to produce sugar beets in the valley. Has the minister any information on that?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a possibility, but if you are going to do that it will be necessary to have all your data on how much water you could store back and let down. One of the difficulties in that valley is that many flats that might be useful have been created through the disappearance of the water. There may have been a lake there but the silt has come down and gradually filled up the lake until it is slightly above the high water mark of the stream, and the water disappears from the flat. There is some difficulty about irrigating a flat of that kind unless you can control water higher up the stream. You could not take sufficient water out of some of these lakes at present levels to irrigate any considerable acreage unless you had a further supply of water which you could let down after you had taken off your first supply of water. All that is being studied before any considerable scheme of irrigation can be entered upon. At present our information is that there is about 30,000 acres of land in that valley which could be irrigated if we were assured of a water supply and storage at the proper places.

In addition to irrigation down in the valley, there are many farmers along the tributaries who have possible projects very similar to those I spoke of on the Saskatchewan river, where a man by putting in a pumping outfit could pump water out on to a flat so that he would be assured of a garden, or it might irrigate a hay meadow without pumping. That is possible at places along these streams.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister recall that at Round lake and at Crooked lake a dam was put in raising the level of the water between four and five feet? That resulted in the flooding of the flats on the Indian reserve and destroying their hay meadows. They used to get about 500 or 600 tons of hay off that land just west of the lake, but for the last two or three years they have not been able to get any hay from that land, and that has been a terrible blow to the Indians. I have taken that matter up with the Minister of Mines and Resources, and I have had two delegations from the reserve wait on me within the last six months urging me to continue my representations to the minister that the water be lowered, say three feet, draining certain areas, so that the Indians could produce the quantity of hay which they produced previously. But the Minister of Mines and Resources would not give these representations any consideration at all. I have been over the location and know exactly the situation. Will the Minister of Agriculture take it into consideration? It would not affect the water in the Qu'Appelle river because, as the minister knows, that is a flat country, and the water level in the other lakes would not be affected either. There would be no less water going from the Qu'Appelle lakes into the river. I wish the minister would give this matter his earnest consideration. As I said before, I cannot get any consideration from the other department; and as the minister's department is building the dams and controlling the water, I bring it to his attention now.

Mr. GARDINER: The Indian branch of the Department of Mines and Resources, of course, put in claims on account of that land, and we have paid them $3,330 in damages on account of these lands which were flooded by the putting in of the dam. I can understand that that does not get them the hay.

Mr. PERLEY: They protested against that, as the settlement which the department offered to make them was permanent and for all time. They said that would not reimburse their loss for any more than one or two years. Certainly they will lose the hay for all time, so to speak, and that is one of the reasons they protest against having been forced to accept that settlement. I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources if his department would reconsider it. No, they said, that offer had been made and the Indians had to accept it. It was forced on them, and they accepted it under protest.

Mr. GARDINER: What we actually do is buy the land. In all cases, whether it is individuals or the Department of Indian Affairs or any one else concerned, we set a price for the land and buy it; and of course the land is sometimes flooded and is under water for all time to come and no one can occupy it afterwards; it is occupied by a lake. I am not just sure what the condition is at that point, whether the water is up over the land at all times.

Mr. PERLEY: It is now.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume we bought and paid for it, and it is now part of the project.

Mr. PERLEY: I may say that the water is over it now, and the raising of the dam has forced a good many of the campers to move their cottages back. It is a great injustice to them; it has given them no additional service nor has it made the resort any more convenient or pleasurable.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the minister state how many municipalities have made applications to come under the P.F.R.A. which the government has been unable to accept, and what is the possibility of more of these municipalities being able to come under the scheme?

Mr. GARDINER: The present position is that we have taken in certain river basins which I think everyone will agree are more or less in the drought area. This legislation is based first upon the fact that there is a drought area, and in defining it we have kept as close as possible to what is known as the old Palliser triangle. When we started out to operate under the act first we were not able to define exactly the boundaries of the old Palliser triangle, and we adopted the idea of confining it to river basins. What we have taken is the Assiniboine river basin, the Qu'Appelle river basin, the Souris, the Frenchman, the South Saskatchewan, and the North Saskatchewan until it comes to the point where it joins the South and becomes the Saskatchewan river. We have taken the height of land east and north of these and have made that the boundary as far as Saskatchewan and Manitoba are concerned. On the Alberta side we have followed down between the streams from Lloydminster toward Calgary where we touch the foothills, and then followed the foothills down to the United States boundary. That, roughly speaking, is the boundary line around the area. It starts just north of Winnipeg, comes up west of lake Manitoba, then follows into Saskatchewan, and around the height of land dividing the Assiniboine river from the Saskatchewan river basin including the Crooked, which is a branch of the Saskatchewan, and following the height of land through to a point where a line drawn north joins the Saskatchewan river. We have gone around the northern side of the municipal boundaries wherever we can, rather than taking the south side. Where the height of land runs through the municipality we have invariably taken the northern boundary. At the point where directly south of the junction of the two Saskatchewan rivers it becomes to Saskatchewan river, the boundary runs up to the junction of those rivers and then on the north side follows the height of land between the North Saskatchewan and the Churchill or other rivers north of the North Saskatchewan. That brings us out at the boundary line of Alberta at about where the North Saskatchewan river crosses the boundary line from Alberta into Saskatchewan. Municipalities all along that boundary line have suggested that they would like to be in, but our difficulty in connection with that is that a matter of policy is involved. The bill says, and all the discussions in this house have been related to the fact that, there is a drought area in the Palliser triangle and that because we induced settlers to go into it we ought to do something to assist in rehabilitating them; and that is the reason the act has the name it has.

A recommendation was made by a committee of this house last year that the principle should be applied to all lands and all provinces right across the country. The conflict is as between those two principles. If we are going to continue to apply this act to the Palliser triangle or what is known as the drought area, then of course the problem of water conservation outside of it is the responsibility of the provinces. We at one time under the Saskatchewan government had a well-digging policy; and we also built dams all over Saskatchewan before this policy came in at all. The same thing was done in Alberta and Manitoba. You can find dams all over the drought area which were built by provincial governments before this plan was adopted. You can find wells on road allowances which were dug by the old territorial government before there was a province and that are still operating, and other wells which were dug, within the first years after the provinces were formed, by the provincial governments. In other words, the responsibility for that kind of thing has always been assumed to be a provincial responsibility, and the only place we have departed from that in this house is in connection with what we call the Palliser triangle, the drought area, and we only took that on during the recent drought period, on the assumption that the federal government had induced people to go there, knowing that it was a dry area.

I as minister, and many others in this house, would be in favour of having a policy which extended right across the country, provided we could adopt it without getting into great difficulties with the provinces. But for the time being, with this act as it is, and with the discussions which have taken place in this house in carrying out these projects, we think it is impossible for us to go outside the Palliser triangle or the lands which are as nearly as possible related to the Palliser triangle.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the committee rose I was on the point of asking the minister a question with reference to what the prairie farm rehabilitation board is planning for that area west of the northern portion of the south branch of the Saskatchewan river west from Saskatoon. Last summer I met some engineers in the west who told me that the prairie farm rehabilitation board—to my mind quite rightly; I wish to support their plans in a general way—were planning to build a dam across the south branch of the Saskatchewan river at some point near Saskatchewan Landing. There is a natural depression north from that point, as the minister knows, which would seem to have been put there by Providence for some purpose. The depression is about forty miles long. A dam at Saskatchewan Landing, or perhaps near there, between 130 and 150 feet high, if the base of the river is of such material that a dam could be built that high, would result in that depression some forty miles long filling up with water. I believe that the general level would reach about 1,930 feet above sea level. If that could be done, the engineers really have something worth while. They could then run a canal north from a lake at the end of the depression, the name of which has slipped my mind at the moment; I think it is White Bear lake. The water level of that White Bear extension of the natural coulee would rise to about 1,930 feet above sea level. That would be providential, in my judgment. They propose to run a canal from the end of White Bear lake north for a few miles and then divide it into two main branches, one running northwest in the general direction of Tramping lake for perhaps fifty miles or more. Tramping lake is nothing more than a coulee at the moment. There is water in it at times and it is dry at times. Fortunately the general topography of the ground lends itself to these plans. In other words it slopes, I am told, from the high point of 1,930 feet down towards Tramping lake. If those plans are carried out it would mean that the water would flow by gravity as far as the Tramping lake depression. It would assist all of that area around Rosetown and the communities north. If my memory serves me rightly the other branch of the canal runs off to the right in the general direction of Saskatoon and north of the general direction of Saskatoon towards a place called Kinley. Another branch is planned to turn southeast in the direction of Luck lake, west of Riverhurst. Riverhurst is on the opposite side of the south Saskatchewan river.

As it was explained to me, there were three areas that could be served for irrigation purposes with water from a reservoir built behind a dam in the vicinity of Saskatchewan Landing. The west area would be something over 200,000 acres. That great extent of land could be irrigated. The land that could be irrigated west of Saskatoon would consist of over 600,000 acres. The southeast area down in the direction of but west of Riverhurst would be something less than 100,000 acres. From the information I gathered from the engineers I judged that there would be at least a total of a million acres of land there that could be irrigated if a dam were erected at or near Saskatchewan Landing.

I wish to assure the minister as one hon. member of this house that if such a proposal to irrigate a million acres were put forward I would support it to the best of my ability. It would mean the opening up of many thousands of new farms. It would mean the irrigating of that area by gravity without pumping, as I understand it. I hope I am right in that. It would supply water to an area that richly deserves it. I believe if such a programme were carried out it would result in the doubling of the population of Saskatoon in twenty-five years. Instead of being a city of forty to fifty thousand people it could have ambitions of reaching a hundred thousand.

Other proposals, as the minister knows, have been made for bringing water four hundred miles from the north Saskatchewan river for irrigation purposes. I am opposed to that. I am opposed to any diversion from the north Saskatchewan river, and would do my best to organize opposition to it. But the scheme I have outlined seems to me to be one that Providence has provided for.

I ask the minister if any plans have been prepared to take care of providing water from a dam anywhere in the vicinity of Saskatchewan Landing for the irrigating of the million acres of the low moisture land west of the general line of Saskatoon and north of the general line from Saskatchewan Landing. If there are, they would have my sincere support. If the proposal to build the dam at Saskatchewan Landing—a power dam as well as an irrigation dam, because the large coulee would store all the water that would be required to take care of the irrigation work, and the dam itself would be of such a height that I believe some 75,000 horse-power could be produced there—is proceeded with it will have my support. However, I wish to warn the minister in one particular. As I see it, the primary consideration is the building of the other dam I proposed somewhere near Riverhurst to take care of that area in the general direction of Regina. I am not going to go into that, other than to say this. The engineers in charge of both those proposals should see to it that the dam at Saskatchewan Landing should not be so constructed that it would interfere with the backwater from a dam that could be built near Riverhurst. By river water it would not be more than a hundred miles from Riverhurst to Saskatchewan Landing. I believe that the river level at Riverhurst is about 1,700 feet above sea level. I believe the river level at Saskatchewan Landing is about 1,811 feet above sea level. Therefore if the dam is raised to 1,930 feet the engineers would have to be careful that anything they do at Saskatchewan Landing would not interfere in any way with what must be done at Riverhurst. The first thing to be done is to build a dam somewhere near Riverhurst.

I wish to compliment the department on the grand plans that the P.F.R.A. people have apparently examined into. I can see plainly that if these plans were carried out, as they should be, with the cost divided in proportion, it would be a great thing for the central province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: The engineers of the P.F.R.A. branch are making surveys in the area just referred to by the hon. member for Davenport. The first investigations have to do with the possibility of building a dam somewhere near Saskatchewan Landing. Last year a certain amount of money was spent in drilling test holes during the time the ice was on the river, in order to determine whether or not conditions were suitable for the construction of a dam. That is about as far as we have gone up to the present in the matter of investigations. There is no report from which I can quote as to what are the possibilities. The statement that has been made was a general statement of the situation as it now exists. This summer we hope to spend some money in making surveys from the air and further surveys on the ground in order to ascertain the possibilities of that plan, but at the moment I am not in a position to give any details of what will be accomplished by the plan or what are its possibilities for the future, because as yet we have not received a report from the engineers which would make such a statement possible. I should add that the distance from the proposed site north of Moose Jaw to the site suggested here is something like sixty miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: Am I right in my understanding that the general topography of the land slants to the north?

Mr. GARDINER: I would think so, though I have not an engineer's report upon which to base that statement. I believe water will have to be pumped in order to get it up to the point where it will flow.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pumped out of the river?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I would think so. I believe under the plan sufficient power will be developed from the dam itself to take care of the pumping, and the cost will not be prohibitive. I believe some pumping will have to be done, but I would not want to be too definite on that before we get the final report.

Mr. GERSHAW: This vote is to support prairie farm rehabilitation, the need for which was recognized long years ago. Ten years ago the need became particularly acute, and this act was passed. That need is still great, particularly in the Palliser triangle, which so desperately requires something in the nature of a permanent policy. Year after year it has been demonstrated that there is not sufficient rainfall in that district to permit agriculture to be carried on, so that some permanent policy must be adopted in regard to irrigation. Streams flow eastward from the Rocky mountains and north from the Cypress hills. If the waters of these streams could be made use of it would be a great blessing to the people of this district. The works should be of a permanent nature, so that they may continue to be useful long after we are gone. I am sure the staff in the office at Regina have gathered a great deal of valuable information in connection with this area, and I want to make the plea to the minister that the engineers should concentrate on this primary objective until it is much closer to accomplishment than is the case at present. In addition, some of these works which are partly finished could be completed at very small cost, and I think that should be done just as soon as men and material are available. The longer they are left unfinished the greater will be the suffering. This is really one of our very urgent problems.

Mr. TRIPP: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the minister and the department on what has been done under the P.F.R.A. I know this measure was brought into operation by a previous administration, but it took the present minister to realize the possibilities of this area. He knows the country; he recognizes the needs, and if you travel through that country you will realize that he and his department should be given great credit for the way these projects are being developed under this act.

This morning I was very glad to hear the minister place emphasis upon the small projects which are to be undertaken. It is all very well for some hon. members to get up in this committee and advocate the expenditure of considerable sums of money on large projects, but in my opinion what is needed more than anything else is the further development of the small dugout and the small dam both on the farm and on the stream in the southern part of Saskatchewan. These small projects, I believe, best serve the needs of the greatest number of people. As far as the expenditure of money is concerned it does not cost much to build one dugout, but collectively they are of great benefit to the farmers of that country. Many farmers who formerly had to draw water three or four miles have benefited from the construction of these small dugouts and dams.

I should like also to bring to the attention of the minister a project on the Souris river, with which I am sure he is well acquainted. This project has been surveyed and fully covered by his department, and I believe the commissioner at Regina is quite prepared to go ahead with it when the money is available. It will consist of the construction of two or three small dams, which will provide storage for considerable water over a matter of about forty miles of country. The valley of the Souris river is quite wide, and if the pumping method of irrigation were adopted a great many acres of land could be developed for the production of hay and even fruit. I was speaking to the commissioner with regard to this project, and he feels that fruit crops could be developed in that valley just as they are now being developed at the experimental farm at Morden.

I also want to commend the minister upon the work he has done in establishing community pastures in that area. These pastures have served a very useful purpose and are still doing so. Years ago, when the drought was upon us, we had community pastures where we could send our stock, where water was provided, and they filled a great need. I hope the minister will give consideration to this project along the Souris river. If it is not possible to include it in this year's programme I hope he will be able to include it in the programme for next year.

Mr. BURTON: As has been pointed out by other hon. members, the P.F.R.A., as it is commonly called in the west, was begun primarily as an experiment in the so-called drought area. I want to join other hon. members who have given credit for the work that has been done in this connection.

While some of us may from time to time have offered criticism, in the right places, we are also prepared to give credit where credit is due. I sincerely believe that this so-called experiment in the drought area has proven successful and is beyond the experimental stage. While we were experimenting with that work, the idea was to be made effective in the smaller field. That was the original plan. I was pleased the other day to hear the minister explain how the Moose Jaw water project had been taken care of by a special vote earmarked for that purpose. I think that was handled in the proper way, and I suggest that similar work in the future be undertaken in the same fashion.

While I am prepared to admit that the preliminary work, and even the active administration work and the handling of the larger projects, in all probability can best be done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, I do submit that the larger irrigation projects, those connected with the supplying of water to urban centres such as Moose Jaw and Regina, as has been advocated by the hon. member for Davenport, should be provided for by a special vote, and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should carry out the work. However, the experimental stage of this work, as I suggest, has passed. I believe we have now reached the time when there might be a renaming of the act, and also a rewriting of it so as to widen its scope. The renaming might easily be done by inserting in place of the word "prairie" the word "Canadian", so that we would have a Canadian farm rehabilitation act.

Having gone through the experimental stage in the west, we now have the advantage of knowing what can be done. The time has arrived when we should take in all the farming areas in Canada. We might have three separate zones, one for the maritimes, one for central Canada, and one for the western provinces, all working under an administrative head. The other evening the hon. member for Cumberland suggested that there should be a reclaiming of the marsh lands in the maritime provinces. That work could be taken care of, as well as other necessary work. I had hoped when coming to Ottawa that during the course of the session I would have time to get around to other parts of so-called eastern Canada so as to familiarize myself with the conditions in this section of the country. As hon. members well know, since coming to Ottawa we have been very busy and I have not had the pleasure of visiting the farming areas as I should have liked. However in the little bit I have been able to get around I can see clearly that there is need for rehabilitation in eastern Canada, just as much as in western Canada. Therefore I suggest that we might enlarge this act so that it would be a C.F.R.A. instead of a P.F.R.A. The work is there, and now is the time to make preparations not only for the rewording and rewriting of the act but also to plan so that as soon as the war is over we may begin on a programme calling for an expenditure of at least $100,000,000 in each of a few years following the war. The experience gained by operating under the act in the so-called drought area will be of great benefit to all farming communities in Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON: I should like to add a word to what has been said in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. There are seven community pastures in the constituency of Kindersley, which I have the honour to represent. Those pastures aggregate 174,680 acres of submarginal land which has been reclaimed. Nearly all the pastures have been operating for three or four years, and the greater portion of them have been regrassed with tame grasses of various kinds, chiefly crested wheat grass. Those pastures are supporting and feeding over 3,000 head of cattle and 2,000 horses. There are two more pastures ready for construction when we can get the men to build them. Those pastures are rendering service not only locally to Kindersley constituency, but to the whole of Canada.

With the advantage of registered Shorthorn and Hereford sires in developing those strains of cattle on the pastures, buyers from eastern Canada are in a position to select from one to three or four cars of feeder steers in the fall if they care to come to that community. They can go into these pastures and soon get plenty of splendid cattle. In truth those cattle are fairly well ready for the market when they come off the pastures in the fall. There are some feeders who would consider them pretty well warmed up, and in condition that the old country pepole like. The way the present minister has extended this work under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, in connection with pastures, is most commendable.

I have one further word in connection with water. I support what the hon. member for Davenport has said. We have cooperated on this subject before. I believe I have spoken with respect to it on two other occasions in this chamber. The hon. member was on sound ground in practically everything he said in connection with irrigation along the south Saskatchewan river. I did not agree with him, though, in what he said with respect to the area north to Tramping lake. There is a height of land there which would eliminate it from the area. Most of the country to which the hon. member referred could be covered, more particularly that portion near Saskatoon via Eagle creek. It could be taken care of from there. But Tramping lake would have to be filled from the north, either from the North Saskatchewan river or the Red Deer river. It has been suggested we should not take anything from the North Saskatchewan river. It could be secured from the Red Deer and other sources in the west, utilizing Sullivan lake and Tramping lake to take care of the surplus of water now running away.

Mr. McNIVEN: From the remarks made in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act it would appear that there is unanimity with regard to the merits of the act and its administration by the present minister. With that view everyone in western Canada would agree. Scattered throughout western Canada there are about 19,000 individual dugouts, watering dams and small irrigation projects which have proven a veritable boon to western Canada. It was a real tribute to the minister to hear the hon. member for Humboldt suggest this afternoon that the name of the act should be changed to the Canadian farm rehabilitation act and be administered for the whole of Canada in the same way as it has been administered for western Canada. I am in accord with that suggestion. The matter was considered last year by the reconstruction committee, and in an interim report to the house it was recommended that the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be extended to other parts of Canada so that districts which might be afflicted would be able to receive the benefits of this legislation.

I concur in the plans that are being developed for the irrigation of certain parts of western Canada. In this connection I would commend the efforts and vision of the director, Mr. Spence. In giving evidence before the reconstruction committee he formulated plans for an irrigation project which would provide water for very extensive areas and assure abundant crops.

These amounts are contained in a general vote, but, as has been mentioned by the minister, special votes have been provided for water conservation. This was the case in connection with Saskatoon and later for Moose Jaw and more recently for the town of Humboldt. In this connection the department has undertaken a search for water to supply this town. I commend the minister for this undertaking. Having recently spent three weeks in Humboldt I know something about the quality of the water there. I think I can say there is not a town in western Canada in greater need of a supply of consumable water.

Mention has been made on more than one occasion of the projects to provide Moose Jaw and Regina with permanent water supplies. It is part of the plan that this water should come from the Saskatchewan river and be piped to these areas. This plan is not new; it was first broached in 1913 when a vote of the burgesses of Moose Jaw, Regina, Weyburn and some of the intervening areas, together with the inhabitants of the rural areas concerned, was taken. The proposal was that the city should pay a certain portion of the cost, the provincial government a proportion, while the lands bordering upon the project and which would be benefited therefrom would be taxed. The project was defeated, and until recently there has been little done or said with respect thereto.

I would point out that the minister has partly developed this plan by means of an open ditch and pumping station at Riverhurst in order to make available a supply of water for Moose Jaw. Moose Jaw has an acute water situation, and those of us who live in Regina are in sympathy with the situation in which that city finds itself. We are heartily in accord with any plan that may be formulated for the correction of that situation. When the plan was first broached some three or four years ago our citizen body was glad to lend its support to carrying it out.

Regina is not in exactly the same position. Regina is peculiarly situated in a saucer, and it obtains its water supply from a series of artesian wells. These were first drilled some forty years ago and at the present time there are forty-two wells in operation. Water has never been rationed in Regina and there has never been any shortage for domestic purposes. We have an abundance of water to satisfy any reasonable demands of industrial life. The water consumption in Regina for the first six months of this year was 860,000,000 gallons, an average of slightly under 5,000,000 per day or 80 gallons per person. These figures indicate that there is immediately available a supply of water for all reasonable purposes. Within the last few weeks another well has been brought into production with a flow of 1,000,000 gallons per day, and two other wells are being drilled at the present time. Water is found at a depth of from 150 to 180 feet. In addition to the forty-two wells I have mentioned, certain industries, including two breweries, have artesian wells on their own properties. The General Motors plant have an artesian well, the two packing plants have wells, as has Imperial Oil. It will be apparent that there is available an immediate supply of water.

I want at this juncture to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Davenport for his continued interest in western Canada and in the development of water and irrigation projects in particular. He has had a continued interest in the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw. On several occasions the hon. member has said that he is a retired eastern manufacturer, but unlike other eastern manufacturers the hon. gentleman spends much of his time and considerable of his money in visiting western Canada to ascertain for himself the problems facing that part of the country. I want also to commend him for his industry in eastern Canada. On numerous occasions when addressing eastern audiences the hon. member has emphasized the necessity of the development of western Canada to ensure a prosperous east.

The other evening the hon. member stated that having been engaged in the manufacture of radiators, if he were to establish a plant in Regina the first thing he would ask for would be the water supply. With an inadequate water supply he would be deterred from starting his plant there. I know the extent to which the words of the hon. gentleman are weighed and considered by those in eastern Canada and I hope therefore that eastern manufacturers will not consider that Regina is a continuing victim of the drought and that a shortage of water is a reasonable excuse for their refusal to establish manufacturing plants there.

I should have stated earlier that the city engineers informed me that there had been no appreciable diminution in the supply of water, nor had the water level dropped in the artesian wells in the drought years between 1930-39. I have before me a telegram from the mayor of Regina in which, after expressing his thanks and appreciation to the hon. member for Davenport, and commending the Moose Jaw water project as a post-war undertaking, he says:

> Mr. Farrell, waterworks superintendent, quite interested. States present supply adequate with no suggestion of failure but ultimately water from Riverhurst logical.

My view that eastern manufacturers, in addition to the hon. member for Davenport, have some such thought in their minds is confirmed by certain statements made by the hon. member for Danforth, who, before the reconstruction committee, said that western Canada could not expect industrial development until the water situation in western Canada had been corrected. I am very much afraid that our eastern industrialists are looking for an excuse to keep out of western Canada, rather than to go in there and develop a market. I am constrained to that viewpoint because at the city of Calgary, for example, they have the Bow River and an unlimited supply of excellent water. The same is true of the city of Edmonton, on the north Saskatchewan. The same is true of Battleford in the province of Saskatchewan, where they have the Battle and North Saskatchewan rivers. It is equally true of the city of Saskatoon, where the river flows right through the middle of the city. It is equally true of the city of Prince Albert, where the North Saskatchewan flows right through the city.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is speaking of industrial development on the prairies. I agree with him that that is very desirable, but is it not a fact that electricity can be developed in areas near to coal fields as cheaply by coal as it can be by water, so that there is no reason why the prairies should be denied industrial plants?

Mr. McNIVEN: That opens up a very interesting question and one that has been under consideration in our province for many years. In southern Saskatchewan we have some twenty million tons of lignite coal, with an overburden of from 35 to 150 feet. That coal is mined by the strip method. There is a small power plant located down there now that should be utilized and will be utilized at some time in the very near future to a greater extent than at present for the development of electrical energy. I am not so sure that power can be developed from coal as cheaply as it can be from hydro.

But to continue, the city of Brandon likewise is on the banks of the Assiniboine river, and the city of Winnipeg is located at the confluence of the Red and Assiniboine rivers. Therefore we have a superabundance of water in western Canada, but industry has not located in western Canada to the degree that it should have. As an example there is in the city of Calgary a rolling mill. It was established some years ago, but never turned a wheel. It required a superhuman effort on the part of the hon member for Calgary West to keep that rolling mill from being rolled clean out of the province of Alberta about two years ago. Again, there is a steel and iron works in the town of Selkirk in the province of Manitoba which has not operated to the degree that it should have.

[Mr. McNiven.]

No, sir, I am constrained to the viewpoint that it is not water that is the deterrent. It is not a lack of water in the west that compels the centralization of industry in other parts of Canada. We have attempted to establish industry in the west. In my own experience since coming to the city of Regina we have had a soap factory there, a plant for the manufacture of shoes, a tannery, a plant for the manufacture of cigars, a plant for the manufacture of hats, and other establishments of one kind and another. All these plants have folded up and gone out of business. In some cases it was for lack of capital; in other cases it was poor management; but for the most part it was unfair competition from established industry in other parts of Canada that drove them out. Now that must be corrected if we are going to have a better balanced economy in our province. I could give you a great many instances of how it has worked out in western Canada.

While the minister may not think that this is identified with P.F.R.A., I should like to continue for a moment to establish that it is not the shortage of water but some other reasons that deter industry from establishing in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Since the hon. member has raised the point I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I hope we shall not get into a discussion of industry under the P.F.R.A. vote because I am hopeful of getting through some time.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to curtail the discussion but I think the point of order is well taken. The subject is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. McNIVEN: I bow to your judgment, Mr. Chairman, and will make only one other short statement which can be linked up and identified with water and which serves to emphasize the point I want to make.

Some few years ago enterprising farmers north of Regina sunk a well to the depth of 3,300 feet. They got salt water at that depth. In order that their efforts should not be completely abortive, they put in a pumping plant and a drying plant and were ready to put salt on the market. But the day that they were prepared to put salt on the market, the price of salt in the Regina freight area was dropped by $9 per ton. That put that salt project out of business and it has never functioned since.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The C.P.R.

Mr. GARDINER: No, he said it was the price, not the freight rate that dropped.

Mr. McNIVEN: It was not the freight rate but the salt price which dropped in the Regina freight area by $9 per ton. This project was unable to met that competition and has never functioned since.

The hon. member for Davenport suggested a fire hazard existed in our city and that it would be a deterrent to the location of industry there. I believe I have established to his satisfaction that there is a supply of water immediately available to meet any emergency and every contingency; and I would not have him overlook the artificial lake we have almost in the centre of the city which covers some sixty acres and could be used in case of emergency as an auxiliary.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to endorse particularly the latter part of the remarks made by the hon. member for Regina City. I do not intend to enter into any discussion of the matter of industries; I realize that it does not come up strictly under this item. But in addition to the remarks made by the hon. member, I am sorry to have to say that in certain instances the administration or their officials have discouraged the setting up of industries in western Canada. I refer particularly to flax processing; I know definitely that it has been discouraged in Saskatchewan, whereas it has been encouraged in Ontario by officials of the government.

I endorse the suggestions which were made this afternoon with respect to the enlargement of the schemes which the government has been undertaking during the last number of years under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I especially endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for Davenport with respect to irrigation. This matter first arose a few years ago when we found ourselves in a straitened situation through drought. Now that conditions have returned more or less to normal I am afraid that many people will forget what occurred at that time, and it is possible—we hope not—that there will be a recurrence of drought conditions and we shall not be properly prepared to meet them. It seems to me that we should be thinking very seriously now of extending as largely as we can irrigation projects which have been carefully worked out and will produce the greatest results. The minister has often described in this chamber that great Palliser triangle which takes in my constituency and a large part of central Saskatchewan, where one needs a certain amount of moisture, but just a certain amount, to produce the best grains in the world. Unfortunately if you do not get that amount you have a crop failure; if you have too much you do not get quite the results you should have in grade and quality. Because of our scientific researches and our modern knowledge of agricultural produce, excess moisture is not as great a hazard as it used to be. But certainly we should have some protection for the times when the supply of moisture is not sufficient to induce germination and to produce crops in this particular area. Besides, if these vast irrigation schemes were put into effect we would be able to achieve a diversification of agricultural production; in addition to producing very hard wheat we would profit by that diversified economy which, I am sure, all hon. members feel is essential to all parts of Canada.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to make a short contribution from the Ontario standpoint. I am inclined to endorse the standpoint of the hon. member for Humboldt, that P.F.R.A. should be given national application and extended to other parts of the dominion. Even in Ontario we have conditions wherein public assistance might serve a national interest, through the reforestation of certain lands which should never have gone into agricultural production. It seems to me that there is a field for expansion in that direction. At the same time I do not believe that large investments of taxpayers' money should be made in schemes of this kind without the prospect of an ample return for the money expended. I do not know whether I am clear about this scheme—whether at the present time there is a return of any kind. I was led to believe that it was intended that there should be, in course of time. It is true that if you can increase production, the government receives indirectly as a consequence a certain amount of revenue. But in the United States, on schemes such as that by which the reconstruction finance corporation built Boulder dam and many other projects, assessments are made in respect of the services rendered, upon those who benefit by them, and up to the present time the return upon the original capital expenditures has been as much as twenty-five per cent. I do not believe that governments should throw their taxpayers' money around without a prospect of return, and I urge that this principle be kept in mind.

I was out in Saskatchewan in 1937. It was a fairly dry year, and I was much impressed by the necessity of doing something to maintain the families in the drought areas of the west. Any of us who happened to see what conditions were there could only welcome an opportunity of contributing money to the general welfare and well-being of the prairie provinces. But conditions have somewhat changed. Although this year we are asked to vote only two million dollars, I would remind hon. members that there has been a considerable expenditure in the west in these various schemes. I happen to have in my hand a return from the Canadian federal farm loan board, and I find that there is a measure of prosperity even in Saskatchewan, as indicated by the fact that in the year ended March 31 last, of eight million dollars borrowed from the board, two million dollars was paid in the retirement of principal. In other words, in one year of prosperity Saskatchewan farmers have been able to repay one-fourth of their indebtedness to the board. We are very glad that that has taken place, but it seems to me that the time has come when an assessment might be levied on those who derive the benefits from these schemes. In this way capital would be returned and could be reinvested in a kind of revolving fund and the work extended all through the dominion.

I have mentioned this because it seems to me that there is a tendency for us, even in prosperous times, to endeavour to satisfy some desire at the public expense without the prospect of return to the treasury. I hope that when this work is continued, this aspect of the scheme will be given some consideration, so that the money will be returned and made available by way of a revolving fund for expenditures throughout the country.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I shall not attempt to follow all the way through the remarks of the hon. member for Regina city. I was impressed by the able presentation he made. I wish to say a few words to endorse all that he said and more with regard to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act expenditures. No one living in other than the prairies can begin to visualize what those dugouts have meant to the farmers of the west. They have simply transformed large sections of western Canada; and drive where you will to-day you will see splendid herds of cattle from which the owners are reaping good returns, where a few years ago, because of lack of water, they were not able to keep more than two or three cows. During the last few years this has been of particular advantage in supplying food to our allies. I feel sure I am speaking for the general public throughout the west when I say that the Minister of Agriculture, his staff and his engineers, are entitled to a large measure of gratitude and appreciation for the way they have stood by this work. I am speaking of what I have seen, speaking of what I know.

Just a few days ago I received a letter from a progressive farmer in Manitoba who lives in a district where water has never been plentiful. He has made considerable money because of those dugouts, and he expresses the hope that in part of that district there will soon be a hundred more dugouts placed. I understand the great trouble is the lack of machinery.

I am glad that there is no reduction in the estimates this year for that purpose. I do not regard this as an expenditure; it is an investment. It is an investment that yields rich dividends. These dividends are not payable to western Canada alone; in very large measure they seep back to the east. They mean abundance of business. They mean more and more to the workers of eastern Canada. They tend to the upbuilding of Canada as a whole; and I wish to express my appreciation of the fact that again this year that expenditure or investment, as one may wish to call it, is to be continued.

Mr. HENDERSON: May I give a word of information to the hon. member for Brant, which I should have given before. These community pastures are now all self-supporting. In fact the sinking fund will more than rebuild the pastures in twenty years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to join with the hon. members who have preceded me in paying my tribute to the administration of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and to ascertain what is in contemplation by the administration during the coming year, particularly with regard to the matter of the land utilization programme respecting submarginal lands that have been removed from cultivation in recent years.

According to the information that has been published by P.F.R.A. officials, one-quarter of the lands that had been in cultivation in the western provinces are submarginal lands. One of the outstanding pieces of work that has been done by this administration during the past number of years has been the removal from cultivation of a large amount of submarginal lands and the establishment of pastures and the like but there has been a marked trend in recent months, and particularly within the last year, toward a resettlement of some of those areas containing submarginal lands. This has been brought about by the fact that moisture conditions are improved and also that prices to-day make it worth while for a farmer to farm submarginal lands. When the minister makes his statement would he tell us what is being done by the department to assure us that in western Canada we shall not again find ourselves in the position in which we were during the thirties when because of the settlement of submarginal lands great difficulties were experienced by the settlers; and furthermore, social services which otherwise would have been available to them were denied because they lived in those areas.

There is a very good summary of the work of P.F.R.A. in the booklet issued by authority of the Minister of Agriculture. It is a report on the activities of the P.F.R.A. for the eight-year period ending March 31, 1943. This is what the booklet says:

Throughout the agricultural region of the prairie provinces are scattered areas of land, of varying acreage which are unsuitable for crop production. Unsuitability for cultivation arises from one or more of several conditions, such as rough topography, excessive stoniness, alkali, light-textured soil with poor water-holding capacity and an inadequate supply of soil moisture. Individual submarginal areas vary in extent from a few acres to several hundred thousand acres.

An unfortunate phase in the history of the agricultural development of western Canada was the settlement of many areas of submarginal land.

Then it goes on to say:

Such farms have been aptly described as the "slums of the open prairie", where economical crop production is impossible, and where social services, if available, can only be maintained at a loss to the community.

I do not agree with the following statement:

A large percentage of the cost of rural relief and of the losses arising from tax delinquencies which have been experienced on the prairies in recent years, can be charged to the existence of submarginal farming.

I think that statement is subject to the qualification that most of those conditions, or a large part of them, were the result of low prices and low crop yields, mainly due to lack of moisture during the years 1930 to 1939. One hears it often stated that the low price of farm products during those years was due to the fact that the Bennett government was in power. In that connection it is well to read one portion of this booklet which clearly sets forth the official view of the Department of Agriculture, the booklet being issued by the minister. This is what it says:

In the year 1930 agriculture on the Canadian prairies, hitherto reasonably prosperous, entered a period of combined economic depression and severe droughts. The agricultural crisis which resulted has exerted a profound influence on the lives and fortunes of prairie farmers.

Then there is this revealing statement, which answers those who would hold the Bennett administration responsible for low prices during those years:

The depression, inaugurated by the memorable stock market "crash" of 1929, and which was world-wide in scope, bore with particular severity on prairie farmers. There were several reasons for this condition. Prairie agriculture, as a whole, was dependent on the export grain trade for much of its revenue. Contemporary with the depression, however, the export grain trade had encountered obstacles in marketing wheat abroad, due to increased foreign production and to newly erected tariff barriers. Restricted markets in turn resulted in reductions in the price of wheat and other cereals. For the nine-year period from 1930 to 1938 inclusive the average farm price of wheat in the prairie provinces was only 55 cents per bushel, as compared with 92 cents for the preceding nine years.

Mr. RICKARD: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, what has this to do with the item before the Chair?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has to do with prairie farm rehabilitation, and has been incorporated in the book dealing with this subject issued by the minister. During those years the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was set up under the Bennett administration, and has been carried on and extended under the present administration. The hon. member for Brant asked whether or not it pays a return. I join in the suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for Humboldt and supported by the hon. member for Regina City—who also advised us that this scheme had been suggested by the committee on rehabilitation as a post-war measure—that the P.F.R.A. be extended as a dominion measure; and experience has shown that it will pay returns. It has brought results. It has paid returns far beyond the extent of the expenditure made under it, in the new hope and determination it has given the people of western Canada, who never could have carried on in recent years if this scheme had not been inaugurated.

In passing let me say this. We often hear the suggestion advanced that people in eastern Canada do not appreciate the needs and difficulties of the people on the prairies. My answer is that we in western Canada can never adequately show our appreciation of the attitude taken by the people of the east during those dark and difficult days. We may fail to express that appreciation and to pay our tribute of thanks, but the west know that they helped us during our difficult days, and the suggestion advanced this afternoon that the operation of P.F.R.A. be extended to apply to all of the country offers just one way in which we, having passed through the experimental stage under this act, may do our bit to assist in the rehabilitation of other parts of Canada. I believe the minister dealt with this matter last year, and I am sure he believes that something along this line must be developed in eastern Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I also dealt with it this morning, just before lunch.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I heard the hon. gentleman deal with it last year; I was not present this morning at the sitting of the committee of the whole. I am not in agreement with the suggestion that there should be an expenditure of $100,000,000. To-day I am afraid too many hon. members are apt to recommend the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars without considering the fact that such tremendous expenditures will necessitate increases in taxation. I do feel that a step can be taken in the direction of extending its operation to the whole of Canada without spending anything like the amount mentioned. I know something of the conditions that exist in Nova Scotia, in the marsh areas referred to not long ago by the hon. member for Cumberland. I feel that this act should be made applicable to projects in all parts of Canada, and that this could be done without difficulty, and certainly without criticism, so that something in the way of rehabilitation might be accomplished in the marsh areas of the maritimes.

I join in the very generous tribute that was paid by the hon. member for Regina City to the hon. member for Davenport. I believe that western Canada, regardless of party affiliations, owes a debt of gratitude to this hon. gentleman for what he has done in endeavouring to show the people of this country from his first-hand experience and knowledge something of what unity means in building up a nation, each part dependent upon the other, in order to assure the economic welfare of the whole. That has been the crusade in which the hon. member for Davenport has been engaged for a number of years, and the people of western Canada appreciate what he has done. He has also shown the people of the east something that the hon. member for Brant has lost sight of, which is that in restoring prosperity in western Canada, or in the maritimes, or on the far western slopes of the Pacific, prosperity is brought to those portions of Canada that depend upon industry. That has been the purpose of the work of the hon. member for Davenport, and this being the first opportunity I have had to say a word of commendation, I am glad to be able to do so.

I should like to know from the minister what is being done in connection with the submarginal lands. I know of the work that is being carried on by the land utilization branch, but I have noted that in recent months there has been a gradual return of people to these areas because of the fact that in other parts of the province farm land is difficult to secure and prices have increased. They are returning to these areas which history and experience since 1860 have shown have experienced periods of drought that have continued from five to seven or even ten years at a time, they being located within the northern confines of the great American desert.

Mr. GARDINER: During the years this act has been in operation we have taken 1,268,000 acres of land out of cultivation and put it under pasture. When I say "out of cultivation" I do not mean that all the land had been put under the plough. Some of it, of course, had been included in farms, and the proportion of a farm which is under natural grass in submarginal areas is perhaps greater than in the better areas. We have taken over the land previously operated by individuals, in some cases as farms and in other cases as ranches, under lease from the government, and have placed that many acres under pasture. In the beginning we had a very definite opinion in that regard. It will be recalled that this method of dealing with submarginal lands was not contained in the act as it was first drafted but was added in one of the amendments made in 1936 or 1937, shortly after I took over the department. When we began to deal with the matter we asked the provinces, since the lands had been returned to them, to turn over to us any of these lands over which they had control. We asked them to turn over to the federal government, through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and through the Department of Agriculture, any of the lands they desired us to put into pasture. Only one province agreed to do that. Saskatchewan agreed to turn the lands over and place them under the ownership of the federal government, if they were fenced and put into pasture.

The reason we were insisting upon that at the beginning was that we wished to prevent for all time farmers going back on those lands. And so we wanted them to be under the ownership of the federal government. We put fences around them, and we make them available to the people in the community. In obtaining that control and ownership of the lands we agreed to enter into some kind of arrangement with any individuals on the lands to provide for moving them off and putting them on better lands. We preferred to put them on lands outside the pastures, where they could get a better grade of land, and at the same time utilize the pasture in order to assist them in carrying on. But in addition to that we did provide to move them. This has a very important bearing on the item we are going to discuss next, namely that having to do with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Many persons have made representations to me to the effect that we should enlarge the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to take in every individual on an individual basis. The reason we did not do that from the beginning, was that under this act we have provided for financing an individual when moving off submarginal lands. We did not wish, under another act, to finance his staying there. In other words if you have four or five individuals in the middle of a township, where everyone else is getting by under the same weather conditions, it would appear to us that to assist that small group of individuals to remain in the area would mean that we would be assisting people, in many instances, to remain on submarginal lands. And so we suggest that the assistance we ought to give to that type of individual is assistance to him to move away from there and to go on better lands. We applied that principle under this act, and we have moved a great many people out of Saskatchewan, or off some lands in Saskatchewan, to other lands. I can look up the exact figures if they are required.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: About how many?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that will be found in the report the hon. member has in his hand. My memory is that we moved about a thousand families. We are carrying on on that basis in Saskatchewan.

In Alberta we have agreed to enter into an arrangement under which we have control of the lands over a twenty-year period. But up to date the Alberta government has not signed that arrangement. For that reason we have not been able to form what are known as community pastures in that province. In Manitoba, where the situation is not quite the same, there are very few of these areas upon which people are located that could be organized into pastures, and where there is any considerable amount of government-owned land. We have there entered into arrangements under which we have assisted in organizing very much smaller pastures than are found in Saskatchewan. Most of those have been taken over for operation by the municipalities. That is, we have not taken actual ownership of the lands. We have taken some control for a period of time, and, having made capital expenditures, in some cases we have turned the administration back to the municipalities for purposes of operation.

We have different methods in the different places in which we are operating. Our general desire is to get people off the submarginal lands. There is legislation in each of the provinces dealing with submarginal lands. In Saskatchewan, under certain legislation in that province, they designate certain lands as submarginal. We deal with those lands on the basis upon which they have been designated. In other words, it must be a matter of cooperation between the federal and provincial governments, when lands are under the control of the province. But the basic principle underlying our desire is that if we are going to take land and fence it into large pastures, we build fences which will be good for at least twenty years, we put grass on those lands, and also supply breeding stock. We put sires in the pastures so that there will be good stock. We ought to have ownership of those lands to prevent someone from coming back when prices are high and conditions particularly good and starting in on those farms again. We wished to make resettlement permanent.

As to the other suggestion, I doubt very much if the hon. member for Lake Centre can quote me at any time as having said anything different from what he has just read from the report. I have never been one who believed that the depression in Canada was or could have been caused by any government in this country. That is one reason I am not in favour of the C.C.F. policy. I do not think it can be corrected inside this country. I think when we talk about the depression which existed in the thirties as being something which we ourselves could correct, without any consideration being given at all to what happened outside of Canada, we are approaching it from an entirely wrong angle. I still think the way our problem can be solved here is by having conditions both inside and outside Canada under which we are prepared to exchange our products very freely. That of course depends upon our being able to find markets somewhere else for the products we produce here in surplus quantities. When we are not able to do that, as we were not during the time referred to, difficulties arise. I think it is in the report to which reference has been made that one of the causes of our not being able to do that was that restrictions were placed upon the shipments of our products into other countries, as a result of the desire to increase the production of the same products in those countries.

Mr. KUHL: What about the home market?

Mr. GARDINER: My friends over there would like to force 560,000,000 bushels of wheat and 800,000,000 pounds of bacon and ham down the throats of 12,000,000 people, and it just cannot be done. We have to be able to find other people who are prepared to eat some of it. That of course is what we desire to do under those circumstances.

All this, however, is aside from the matter now under discussion. The position is that under rehabilitation we are attempting to get submarginal lands out of cultivation, and making a further attempt to keep them out. We must have a certain amount of cooperation both from provincial governments and from individuals on the lands, if that is to be accomplished. In some cases we require the cooperation of municipal councils. I must say that in a very large degree we have had cooperation from all those sources. Because of that cooperation we have been able to accomplish something in connection with the rehabilitation of that country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the department any scheme for the use of submarginal lands other than the establishment of pastures and reseeding in grasses?

Mr. GARDINER: There are some lands which would be considered submarginal in relation to the growing of wheat, let us say, which would not be submarginal in relation to the growing of other crops. The best illustration of that, one which would be best understood by hon. members in all parts of the house and from all parts of Canada, would be that area in which tobacco is grown to a very considerable extent in southwestern Ontario. There is a section there which at one time would have been classed as submarginal, and to-day it is perhaps the most valuable land in Canada because they are able to grow tobacco on it. There are other lands elsewhere of the same character. I know of a farm in Saskatchewan, a quarter-section, which was homesteaded by a man who went almost bankrupt. I do not know whether he came from Prince Edward Island or one of the other maritimes, but in any case he knew how to grow potatoes. He put in about fifteen or twenty acres of potatoes on this farm, which was located about fifty miles from Regina. Within a very few years he was able not only to get out of bankruptcy but to retire in Regina, and he has lived there ever since. That land would be considered as submarginal if you were going to grow wheat on it, but it could grow another product and make considerable money for the owner.

I realize there is another factor involved in this. If all the land of that type in Saskatchewan were put into potatoes, everyone would go broke trying to grow potatoes. A few individuals can become fairly wealthy producing a product as long as too many do not go into the production. There are many things involved in grading land as submarginal. The location is one—where it is in relation to a city or in relation to some other market. However, generally speaking, submarginal land is that light, sandy land found in many sections of the country, or land that is so polluted with alkali that it is not suitable for the growing of ordinary crops.

Mr. RICKARD: Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to say only a few words. I have been very much interested in the discussion that has taken place to-day. This has been an innings for western Canada. I was glad to hear the praise given to the minister by members of different parties. He surely must be popular in Saskatchewan by now.

He has been very generous to the west, but he has also been generous to the east. I believe he is just as much interested in the east as he is in the west. He tries to do everything he can as Minister of Agriculture for the benefit of Canada as a whole. The hon. member for Lake Centre I believe suggested that perhaps we in the east did not appreciate what is being done for the west. I think we do. I do not think there is any person who gives more support to proposals brought forward for the west than the eastern member. We have sat here and seen millions and millions of dollars provided for the west in one way or another. I think it is all right, but we want to know that the money is being well spent.

We are not trying to deprive the west of anything they should have. I believe these dugouts and irrigation schemes are necessary and no doubt there will be good returns to the country. But, as I said before, we like to know that the money is being well spent. We are paying our share of what is paid out from the dominion treasury for all these things, but if we get results that is all we can ask for. I do not want the impression to go out that we are not in favour of backing the west in everything that is feasible, but I would like to ask western members to support the eastern members in some of the things that we think we should have. They may have an opportunity to do this before the session is over.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two before the item passes. I do hope the minister will listen to my suggestion in reference to a programme of water supply for the western cities. I want to thank the hon. member for Regina City for what he said, as well as the hon. member for Lake Centre; they have both been exceptionally kind. I am sure the minister will give me credit for putting what I have said above politics. I could not possibly bring such an important matter down to the level of politics. When I spoke about the Regina water supply,

I did so from personal knowledge and the minister knows I am right. The Regina Leader-Post of July 13, 1944, contained a report of a statement by Mr. J. W. D. Farrell, superintendent of waterworks, Regina. It reads:

Mr. Farrell pointed out that the present developed water supply for Regina is around 5,500,000 gallons per day. Under present conditions the supply is sufficient to meet consumption needs—

He means by that the present consumption needs of Regina.

—but this may not be so as time goes on. Regina now has a population of 60,000 persons, and its average daily consumption of water is 4,500,000 gallons.

On the basis of a population of 60,000 that works out at 75 gallons per day per capita. They can get by with that under present conditions.

If the city were to grow to 70,000 or possibly 80,000 people—

There is no reason why it should not go to double that number if it gets the programme that I have advocated. I believe the minister is one hundred per cent behind the programme.

—there is no guarantee that the present supply system would be able to look after the increased water demand.

He is quite right. The engineer knows that it would not begin to look after it. With a population of 80,000 people, it would mean that there would be only 70 gallons per day per person.

The superintendent said that when the city developed its three present supply sources—at Mound Springs, Boggy Creek and Mallory Springs—the water "simply oozed out of the ground, it was that plentiful." That condition does not exist to-day. It appears now that the long-time storage in the ground has been somewhat depleted.

Any one who is an engineer and knows anything about water appreciates how water resources will decrease, and the engineer is right.

It was imperative that the water issue be kept alive, Mr. Farrell said—

That is what I have been trying to do, and I hope I have the minister with me. I will support him as strongly as I can in any programme to provide the capacity which he determines is sufficient to furnish ample water for these cities. I will read that sentence again:

It was imperative that the water issue be kept alive, Mr. Farrel said, for there is no telling when Regina may need additional supply sources.

I have no comment to make on what the hon. member for Regina City said. I was an industrialist and I do know something about business. I, and I know there are many others, would like to see industries started in the west. I believe industries should be started there, but as the hon. member for Regina City said, the present supply of water is only eighty gallons per capita per day. That bears out what the city engineer said. But, Mr. Chairman—and more particularly Mr. Minister, because I want to stay with him just as I want him to stay with me—the average per capita consumption in Ottawa is 117 gallons per day. That is fifty per cent more than the present average in Regina. Bring the average water gallonage in Regina and Moose Jaw up to the Ottawa average. Why should not Regina and Moose Jaw have as high an average as Ottawa? I do not want anything that the member for Regina City said—I thank him for what he said about me personally, although that is neither here nor there—to detract the minister's attention from the absolute necessity, according to the figures of the hon. member, of bringing the average in Regina and Moose Jaw up by at least fifty per cent. Bring it up to 117 gallons per capita per day.

I have tried, and I intend to continue trying, to keep this matter on a higher plane than politics. This country has been cursed with politics. Let us get on a higher plane than that. The minister can count upon me as a supporter of any programme for providing an ample water supply for western Canada if he brings in a programme that is big enough to do it. But I shall not be a supporter if he is satisfied that 80 gallons per capita per day is enough for the people of Regina. They can get by with that, but that is not what they should have.

Mr. GARDINER: Just in conclusion on this point, let me say that I was for five years minister in charge of labour and industry in Saskatchewan, and during that period we went into all these matters having to do with the water supply of Regina and other cities and the requirements of industry. We all appreciate, and I do particularly myself, the manner in which the member for Davenport has tried to picture to the eastern part of Canada the possibilities of western Canada. With regard to the programme that is now presented, at the start of the war we were embarking upon a much larger programme than this. Our vote then for this kind of work was fifty per cent higher than it is to-day. We are spending a considerable part of our vote to-day on engineering work with regard to the larger projects, and we have, I would not say complete information, but very full information with regard to all these larger projects. We hope that immediately the money is available when this war comes to an end, very much larger sums will be available for expenditures through the P.F.R.A. or perhaps through one of the new departments or otherwise.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or by special appropriation.

Mr. GARDINER: However the money is expended and by whosover it may be spent, we are gathering the information necessary to lay the foundation for that expenditure. The money expended now is being used to a very considerable extent for that purpose.

When Mr. Spence was here a year ago he outlined before the reconstruction committee a water supply programme that would cost $111,000,000. While we have not detailed information we have very full information to place in the hands of the officials of P.F.R.A., whoever may be there, two years or five years hence, so that they can go right ahead with these projects when the money is available. But I would like to emphasize what was said by the member for Lake Centre. When that figure of $111,000,000 was given before the committee, I immediately sent for Mr. Spence because I saw the headlines in the papers the next morning that it had been suggested that we spend $111,000,000 on irrigation in western Canada, and I know from experience that you can scare people. I also know that you cannot spend $111,000,000 on this kind of work in western Canada in one year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was not his a long term programme?

Mr. GARDINER: It came out in the press as an expenditure of $111,000,000, and I asked Mr. Spence to go back before the committee and enlarge upon his proposals. It is a programme that ought to be spread over a number of years. You simply cannot start out with the idea that you are going to spend all that amount of money in the first or second year after the war. We are gathering information that will cover a programme of at least $100,000,000 of expenditure. But of course how fast we can go will depend entirely upon how many other programmes are being gone on with in Canada at that time and what the labour conditions are. I can assure the member for Davenport that we cannot go faster than I would want to go. I do not imagine that I shall be able to persuade a government, if I happen to be a member of the government at that time, to go as fast as I would want to go. I can assure him there will be no holding back as far as I am concerned. I would like to see the whole job done at the earliest possible day, and I think every western member and every member from eastern Canada who understands the situation feels the same way about it, no matter to which party he belongs. I feel also that when the time comes there will be a membership of this house, no matter who happens to be in control of the government, which will hold that same point of view.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister place on record the number of community pastures in Saskatchewan in 1941, 1942 and 1943, giving the acreage and the number of stock kept in each of these areas? Would he also state his programme for community pastures in 1944?

Mr. GARDINER: I had perhaps better give the total figures for Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There are only four community pastures in Manitoba, and they are small in acreage compared to the others. They do not change the picture very much. The total acreage at the end of 1943 was 1,268,148. That is the entire pasturage acreage from 1937, when the policy was brought in. The total carrying capacity is 41,455 head. We estimate what the carrying capacity of a pasturage is and then cut that down by a certain percentage to allow some leeway for other persons who want to come in and for those who want to increase their herds. The number of cattle carried in 1943 was 38,821: the number of horses 13,104; the number of sheep 12,734. The cost of operation was $108,348.66 and the revenue $111,119.75. The surplus was $12,473.39. That is the accumulated surplus. Some had small deficits and some has surpluses. The accumulated deficit was $9,718.30.

I would say to the member for Brant in connection with what he said about a revolving fund, that here is a case where the amount coming in is just about the same as the amount going out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Were there any pastures which were not being used—in which there were no stock—in 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: Only those, I think, which were still under construction. I notice that all those recorded here—and there is a page of them—have stock in them.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not rise at this time to make a speech. I only want to ask the minister a question, based upon a remark he made a few moments ago when he was describing the relationship between the bygone depression and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; at least what he was trying to establish was that one was in no way responsible for the other. I think I would agree with him on that. The period of depression which we experienced some years ago was a business depression, not one of production. He said that no government could solve that problem, that no government would have an answer to that.

Mr. GARDINER: They might have an answer, but they might not be able to solve it themselves.

Mr. HANSELL: That reasoning does not quite add up in my mind; it may do so in the minister's mind. In making his argument the minister went on to say, at least as I understood him, that there was only one solution, namely, that we had to find foreign markets for our goods. I want to ask him one question, and I do not want him to take half an hour to answer it; it can be answered in a very few minutes if the minister has the answer to it. If the question were asked me I could answer it in thirty seconds.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, you answer it and then I won't need to.

Mr. HANSELL: I want to get the minister's answer, because this is the position. The government is going to bid for power to run this country, perhaps this fall. I fancy that for a good many years hence they will be still bidding for power to run this country. I ask the minister this one question; I asked it of the Prime Minister the other day in another debate, but I did not expect an answer because we were not in committee. Supposing his government finds itself in a position where Canada has produced all that it needs to produce, that goods begin to pile up and men are laid off and an unemployment problem exists; we have the goods, we have unemployment. Supposing the government cannot get these foreign markets, how would the minister solve that problem?

Mr. GARDINER: I will answer that question in as near to thirty seconds as I can. I am bringing down a bill to-morrow which in so far as agricultural products are concerned is intended to deal with the matter for some time to come, in any event.

Mr. PERLEY: I have not been able to follow all the discussions or hear all the questions which have been asked the minister on this item this afternoon, since I have been trying to keep in touch with another committee. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, there is a very interesting situation in that committee this afternoon, and they are now getting down to a little action.

Mr. REID: Are they making progress?

Mr. PERLEY: I understand that the minister in reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre admitted that the low prices prevailing in respect of farm products, more particularly from 1930 to 1935, resulted from a world condition, including the operation of tariffs in other countries. Maybe he is right to a certain extent.

I had something to do with the act when it was first passed. The main purpose was to provide for the development of water projects, by way of dugouts and otherwise, to benefit certain areas, particularly in Saskatchewan, which were in need of water as a result of drought conditions which had continued for year after year. That was the main purpose of the legislation. Since 1936 or 1937 this branch of the department has developed to very great importance and many other projects have been undertaken, with whose utility I certainly agree.

No government can see eight or ten years ahead. Bills pass which within two years, it is seen, can be improved upon and their operations extended. That has taken place in connection with this branch, and in many respects the minister is to be commended for what has been done.

I do not believe, however, it was ever intended that under this branch there should be undertaken some of the larger projects which were spoken of yesterday evening and to-day, namely, to provide water for cities, and matters of this kind. I think such work should be undertaken under another vote and, perhaps, not under the control of this branch.

In looking over this report I find that a number of different projects have been undertaken, upon which the minister has given a good deal of information. The projects of community pastures were being discussed as I came into the chamber. I note that sixty-three were in operation in 1942-43, and the minister has informed us that the number has increased, and has stated the acreage. It is one project which I think is worth while, especially in sections of the province where stock is available within a reasonable distance to be pastured or cared for. In certain sections, including the district which I happen to represent, this provision is not needed, because we have water within reasonable distance for anyone who wants to go into the stock raising business.

I notice that there is a land settlement branch under whose direction settlers are moved from areas where adequate crops cannot be raised, and established in other districts. Perhaps the minister will give us some information with respect to that.

Mr. GARDINER: I dealt with that in reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre. About a thousand families were moved.

Mr. PERLEY: I can look up the information in Hansard; I will not ask the minister to repeat his reply.

One complaint which I should make, although I am not going to be unfair about it, relates to the staff. If one consults the auditor general's report he will find that this branch contains 280 employees, of whom twenty-six receive an annual salary of more than $2,000 each. Twenty-five men in this branch get over $2,000 in salary and some are getting as much as $6,000. Mr. Spence, the man in charge gets that amount. When we consider the number of employees and their salaries as set out in the auditor general's report I think the minister should give us information with respect to the number of employees that are engaged on this work at the present time and whether there are as many there now as the auditor general shows in his report at page A-38. This report shows that there were 281 employees. Is there any increase in that number; if so, would the minister tell us how many more pastures and dugouts will be constructed this year? Is the increase in the number of employees comparable with the increase in the work that is being done?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as the permanent staff is concerned it is reduced to some extent, not so much as a matter of choice but because of existing conditions. As I explained when I was before the committee last, we have quite a number of men engaged on a daily wage basis. It is that figure which changes most from time to time; that is, we have not very many in the winter time, but we have a considerable number in the summer time. If we keep that fact in mind, the staffs, as at March 31, 1944, were as follows: Ottawa, six; Manitoba, thirty-six; Saskatchewan, 238. It will be remembered that the head office is in Regina, and the Swift Current farm does considerable work in connection with it. The staff in Alberta was fifty-one. That makes a grand total of 381. We now come to the technical staff. The total number of graduates is fifty-two; non-graduates, seventy. They would all be either graduate or non-graduate engineers. The clerical staff is forty-one. It will be noted that most of the engineering staff are men who will be out for a considerable part of the time. The unclassified or year-round total number is ninety-three; seasonal, 126. There were employees there on March 31 who would not be on for the full year, 126 of them. When you come to June 30, which would be about our peak in any season, and go over the same list you find the following: Ottawa, six, the same number; Manitoba, seventy-seven; Saskatchewan, 551; Alberta, 117; total, 751. The graduates under technical services total sixty-six; non-graduates, sixty-eight. The non-graduates are slightly lower than they were, two below; clerical staff, forty-seven; year-round staff, 102, and the seasonal staff, 468. That makes a grand total of 751. It will be noted that the greater part of the increase in seasonal employees is 350 in Saskatchewan; but one has to remember that practically all of the pasture work is in Saskatchewan and that extensions are being made this year to two different pastures. There were two new ones under construction and there were two that were being completed in Manitoba. The others were in Saskatchewan; four in Saskatchewan and two in Manitoba.

Mr. PERLEY: Community pastures?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Two of those are extensions to pastures already in existence, and one is a new pasture of the ordinary type. The other one, the Sterling ranch, is a smaller one that we are providing for the purpose of handling the bulls that we use in connection with the breeding of stock in the summer time.

Mr. PERLEY: What was the first one you gave?

Mr. GARDINER: Local improvement district 21, an extension Excel rural municipality 71 is also an extension. The new one that is being built is Hillsborough rural municipality 289. The two in Manitoba are Woodlands and Ellice. The Sterling ranch is a ranch down south of Shaunavon in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister give us the number of dugouts and water projects that have been undertaken and tell us if there is an increase?

Mr. GARDINER: The figure I gave the last time I was before the committee was 1,308 for two years ago, and for last year a little over 1,400.

Mr. PERLEY: That is in the report. Do you expect an increase this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I said last time that as near as I could get to it the same amount of money is being expended with probably $30,000 added. We are trying to find $30,000 out of our other items in order to increase that sum, but we are attempting to construct about the same number, about 1,400 or 1,500.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand that the staff has increased from the figure given here, 281, to the number just given, 700 and some odd?

Mr. GARDINER: Between March and June, and the increase is made up of practically all labourers on the pastures.

Mr. PERLEY: Most of them are the same positions as those recorded in the auditor general's report?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure without going over it carefully. It would depend on the time of the year, if you want to compare the figures.

Mr. PERLEY: Give us the figures for last year.

Mr. GARDINER: The figures that would be comparable would be all of those except the seasonal ones. If you leave out the 126 on the first list and the 468 on the other list you will have the year-round employees in the other for figures, the fifty-two graduates, the seventy non-graduates, the forty-one clerical and the ninety-two year-round staff.

Mr. PERLEY: Really the increase is the difference between 126—

Mr. GARDINER: That makes 255 employees at the first of March. That is a decrease from the 281. Then in the next list we have fifty-six graduates, sixty-eight non-graduates, forty-seven clerical and 102 year-round, making a total of 293. That is slightly above the figures you have there. Our figure would be a little higher this year than it was a year ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask a question based on an application by the town of Lumsden requesting certain expenditures from this vote for repairs of a dike. I do not often bring up individual cases, but this seems to be a proper one having regard to the changes that were made at Craven in connection with the Long lake development. I should like a report from the minister as to what has been done in connection with the request made by that town.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to deal with the exact request that was made, but I know some of the circumstances. This morning I think I mentioned the fact that water flows into Long lake early in the season and fills it up, and some years it flows out again after it has reached a certain level. There have been times when Lumsden has been flooded. We hope to be able to control that situation to a certain extent by keeping water back in Buffalo lake, further west, and letting it come down later on in the year. We have built a dike across the south end of Long lake and in that dike we have placed a cement structure to control the water flowing in and out. Not everyone agrees with what the engineers hope will happen in connection with that work. As a matter of fact we have found obstructions there, probably not the dam but rather the silting up of the ditch which runs from the Qu'Appelle river into Long lake, and which has been there for a long time. The water does not flow in through the old, original, natural creek; it flows through a ditch dug many years ago, and we put in a cement structure to control it. Some people think the engineers did not put the bottom of that structure down low enough, and that as a result it has something to do with obstructing the water getting in. In order to satisfy them, I think it was last spring we opened a certain part of that dike to let in more water, in order to raise the level of the lake much higher than it would otherwise have been. I am not certain as to what has happened since that time, whether they are replacing the dike or widening the opening still further, or just what they are doing. However, the engineers are reporting continuously on the matter and some work is being done, although I am not clear as to just what it is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate the work that has been done on the south side of the lake, and understand generally the plan the engineers are following. What I had in mind particularly was the request of the town of Lumsden.

Mr. GARDINER: Have you the request there, and, if so, would you read it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The matter has been brought up on two or three occasions, and an application was made directly to the Regina district office. The request is that the department bear a share of the cost of repairs to the dike on the south side of the Qu'Appelle river where it passes through Lumsden. When the dike was constructed in 1929 the federal Department of Public Works bore seventy-five per cent of the cost. The dike was constructed of earth, and a section beginning near Lake street and extending a short distance on James street was constructed of planking bolted to piling. It was thought this would last for a considerable length of time; I believe the estimate was twenty years, but as a result of the change in the flow of water consequent upon the development work which took place last year, damage occurred thereto. The result is that the dike became in dangerous condition. The request is that the town should not be held responsible for the repairs to this dike when those repairs are made necessary by the changes which have taken place in the engineering work near Craven, at the south end of Long lake. A considerable amount of work will be required to fix up this dike, and I think it might very well be included as part of the expenditure necessary for the maintenance of a proper level in Long lake.

In that connection let me say that the engineering work which has been done there is very important. The level of the lake is rising, as the minister has stated, and the work has been worth while in the preservation of the levels in that outstanding body of water. I ask that consideration be given the request of the town of Lumsden. That municipality is not pressing for any unfair consideration, and it seems to me their request is a reasonable one.

Mr. GARDINER: All I can say is that I will check into the matter very carefully and take it up with the staff at Regina. I can assure the hon. member that if on investigation it is found that anything we are doing has contributed to the difficulties which are being experienced in Lumsden, in circumstances of that kind we do take care of at least some of the cost.

Mr. BURTON: Has the minister any knowledge of the number of municipalities that have been endeavouring to secure suitable equipment for the construction of dugouts? I know that quite a few have endeavoured to obtain that equipment but, owing to war-time regulations and restrictions, have found it impossible to do so. Now that the Alaska highway has been completed and work has been finished on the airports, one would expect some of this machinery to be available to these municipalities. They would like this machinery both for putting in dugouts for the benefit of their ratepayers and for road construction work.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state the number, but I know that quite a few municipalities have asked us to assist them in getting this equipment. We have referred all these requests to Mr. Bloom, who is in the office of the controller, where I think they have met with sympathetic consideration. This does not mean that they can all get equipment. One of the reasons for the lessening in the number of applications is the fact that our money is running out. Early in the season applications came in from municipalities which wanted to construct dugouts. Contractors who have pretty well completed their other work, of the kind mentioned by the hon. member, have come in and constructed a number, and in addition some municipalities have been able to get equipment. In that way we have used up all the money available for this year, so that there is not the same demand now for additional equipment.

Item agreed to.

30. Prairie Farm Assistance Act, administration, $250,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I want to draw the attention of the minister to the particular case of a township which last year made application for the bonus. I am referring to township 27, range 19, west of the second. The first inspection was made last fall during harvesting operations, while many of the farmers themselves were away and a good deal of the grain, having been combined, was in piles in the fields. Those were the conditions under which the first inspection was made, and I believe at that time the dockage was estimated at about five per cent. Later, when the farmers hauled in their grain, the dockage was found to be about fifteen per cent, and the figures shown in the permit books in regard to dockage were much higher. Then they went through and made another survey; the chief inspector, I believe it was Mr. Scott, was sent out. My information is to the effect that his report showed that production for that township was less than eight bushels per acre. The producers in that area have been doing their very best to get fair play under the existing set-up, but in spite of the fact that the chief inspector's report showed that they came within the bonus area, they have been told that they do not qualify. Is there any way whereby further appeals can be made; what tribunal can they apply to for a further consideration of their plea? The producers have gone about this matter methodically. They have done considerable work themselves by way of making surveys, and they feel they have been discriminated against. What can be done?

Mr. GARDINER: The practice followed is that inspectors go out and make inspections. If there is no question that they are under eight bushels, it is passed. But in cases where there is any question, they all go to the board. This is a board of three members, the chairman of which is Professor MacEwen of Saskatchewan agricultural college. Then there is Mr. Stevenson, who is here at the table with me. The third representative is really named by the Department of Finance, and at the present time is Mr. Holmes of Saskatoon.

Those three men are the board, and all questionable cases are referred to them. They are the board to whom final appeal is made; there is on appeal beyond them. In this particular case, however, as has been said there have been two inspections. One of them was made in the summer months and the other in February. One can understand why it is much more difficult to make a proper inspection in February than it is in the summer, at the time the crop is growing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In some respects, yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, in some respects. The second report made would indicate, if one takes the figures obtained at that time, that it would be slightly under eight bushels. The other figure, which was taken when they thought all the facts were available, showed over eight bushels. This matter has been before the board three times, and each time the board has refused to pass it. There is only one way whereby any recourse can be had. The board has final authority, and the only action that can be taken is to have the matter reconsidered by the board. That is all that can be done.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Were all members of the board present in each of the three reviews?

Mr. GARDINER: The second time only two were present, but I understand they were all present the last time. The two western members considered it the first time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Nothing further can be done; that would be the position?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing more than make an appeal to the board, and I do not imagine, after the board have considered it three times, they would be very anxious to consider it again.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to ask a question with respect to the regulations governing rectangular plots within a township accepted for benefits under this act. I know the government has made the regulation with a view to taking in certain areas in a township, where perhaps the whole township may not get the average crop required to meet the conditions in the regulations. I think that was a good move, but it does complicate matters to some extent.

I shall explain to the minister what I mean. I have in mind a case where all the sections coming down the side of one township are not in a position to receive benefits from the drought bonus. All the other sections in the township, because that particular block went below the average, receive the benefit of the bonus.

The condition which has arisen is this. One man whose property is in a section bordering on the block that gets the benefits had only six and a half bushels to the acre in the last year's crop. However, his neighbour, who is within the block which receives the benefit, had an average crop greater than did this man in question. I can understand the government's policy, with respect to their not being able to deal with every case on its individual merits, but one can hardly explain that to a farmer who finds that his neighbour gets a higher average on his crop.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that a wheat crop?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, a wheat crop. The one man receives the benefits of the bonus, while the other, who has a smaller crop than his neighbour, is ruled out because he does not come within the specified rectangular block. Could the minister change the regulations in some way so that that peculiarity would not exist? I believe that the minister would agree it is unfair, and that the regulations should be changed to meet circumstances of that kind.

Mr. BURTON: Before the minister replies I should like to place on record a similar example. Before doing so, however, I would say that while listening to the minister's explanation I noted that he made the remark, when another item was under discussion, that we were paying money to some people to get them out of submarginal areas, and that consequently it was not deemed advisable to pay them money to remain on submarginal lands. I appreciate that explanation, and it covers the situation very nicely. Yet at the same time it does not cover problems such as described by the hon. member for Macleod, nor does it cover problems such as I shall now draw to the minister's attention. In the past I have noticed a number of similar cases.

In township 37, range 24, in the municipality in which I live, they had a low yield; yet that township cannot be considered submarginal land. Over a period of years they had produced in that township very good crops. This year, with the exception of about two sections in one corner of the township, they had poor crops. In that corner they had one or two fairly heavy showers. The farmers in that corner of the township were not better farmers than those in the remainder, but the showers had helped them out. It was found at a later time that the township was slightly over eight bushels to the acre. The question still remains in the minds of many people in that township as to whether the actual returns from those two sections were as large as had been reported.

Leaving that aside, however, the fact is that the yield in the rest of the township was away below eight bushels to the acre. What these people wanted to do was to have the remainder of the township, less those two sections, blocked over to an area which was already entitled to receive assistance. They were informed, however, that that could not be done. I believe that about one-third of the township west of this area was permitted to block itself with the township lying to the south. That is, they were in range 25. It was township 36 which was entitled to receive the assistance, and the department allowed township 37, range 25, to block a certain area over to 36. But when the people of township 37, range 24, wanted to block their territory over to another township they were told that, under the act, that could not be done.

It is difficult for people to understand why they cannot receive any benefit from this plan, simply because one corner of the township happens to be a few bushels over. They do not understand how this plan is going to help them, and other townships which have been paying into the fund right along. Then, when they see their neighbouring township blocked in with another township receiving assistance, they cannot understand why they are refused that assistance. I wrote to the minister about this case, but both he and I have been on a rather long journey since. I have not received any reply and I was just wondering whether he got my letter.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason why I have not replied is that I have made a test case out of this one and have submitted it to the justice department. They gave me one reply, but I was not satisfied with it and I sent the case back to them. I did not want to reply to the hon. member until I was sure of what I was talking about. We said that if a block of townships or even one township were already under the act and there were at least nine sections which were lying alongside and which were rectangular in shape that could qualify, they could be declared in. That is what happened in connection with this township. It was taken in and we took in nine or more sections of the next township.

The other group of sections the hon. member is speaking about were over in the next range. I am not a lawyer and I certainly am not a constitutional lawyer. According to the act the minister is to make the payments, although they are made according to the method we have been discussing here. However, the act states that the minister has authority to make payments. The only way I can make payments under the wording of the act is to make them to those townships where it is admitted that payments can be made.

I contend that I am only able to make payments in a township such as that even when only part of it is considered as being in, if it is declared a township. I contend also that the other township lying alongside should be able to get in because it is alongside one declared in. If I am right, the act will not need any amendment in order to get the decision desired here. If I am wrong, the act will require some amendment in order to have that decision given. I am not in position now to make a reply, but I hope to be in a short time.

The other question raised by the hon. member for Macleod is one that has been before us ever since the act was first drawn. It would not make any difference whether such a farm was on one of those borderlines, that is between a township and the adjoining nine sections, on the borderline of a township that is in and a township that is completely out. You will find farmers on one side of the road who have yields under eight bushels to the acre, and farmers on the other side whose yields are above eight bushels to the acre. But there is one thing that we should not lose sight of. We are not paying on wheat. This has nothing to do with wheat as such. We simply use wheat as a barometer to find out what the weather is like in a particular district.

A farmer on one side of the road may have wheat that runs twenty bushels to the acre, while a farmer on the other side may be getting only five bushels to the acre. This may be due entirely to the fact that one man's wheat was on spring ploughing, while he had put his coarse grains on summer-fallow, whereas the man across the road put his wheat on summer-fallow. If you are going to determine whether or not both men are in exactly the same position you would have to take a complete record of everything that had been produced on the farms; you would require to have a complete record of the operations of both men in live stock, coarse grains, vegetables, poultry and everything else.

We took the simpler way. We decided to take a township and allow nine sections in on the border, or take away nine sections in order to get away from any zigzagging lines. It is impossible to determine just because one man had six bushels to the acre and another had four, that one should be in and the other should be out. We have to draw a line somewhere, and no matter how you attempted to draw it you would run into difficulty. You could not have lines running angleways across a man's farm; you have to go up one side and down the other. No matter how you drew the line you would always have some farmers outside who had a lower yield of wheat. However, when you got a few miles away that would be corrected by the fact that they all would have more.

Mr. HANSELL: I expect that I shall have to accept the minister's statement. I agree, of course, that it presents quite a problem, but I suggest that if there is a section or a farm, or whatever size the piece of land may be, that borders upon the nine sections or whatever the rectangular may be, it should receive the benefits provided that the yield is below the minimum. I make that suggestion to the minister and hope that he will take it into consideration. It would not be so bad if all those in the township who were receiving benefits averaged less than the man who was not receiving benefits, but in some cases they average more. I ask the minister to consider my suggestion.

Mr. GERSHAW: I find that most people appreciate this legislation; they find it of great help and they want to see it kept going. However, I also find that a lot of bitterness exists for the reasons that have been mentioned. One man with a yield of nine or ten bushels will be getting the bonus and another fellow with a yield of six, five or even four bushels to the acre cannot get the bonus. I realize that this is not an insurance scheme. If it were, it would be under the province and the premium would be much higher.

I should like to suggest to the minister once more the possibility of having each individual investigated. I know it would be an impossible task to have a special man go out to each farmer in the area, but I was wondering if it would not be possible to get the information from the municipal councils. They usually know the yields. Then investigation could be made of those who were reported by the municipal councils. I have found it impossible to answer a man who says, "Why should I not get the bonus when I have a complete crop failure when some other man with a much larger yield is able to get it?" I am wondering if the minister will not consider this suggestion. I am sure he has considered it already.

Mr. QUELCH: Most of the complaints I get are similar to those which have been enumerated by other hon. members. However, there is another group of farmers who are always penalized under this act. I am referring to the farmer with fairly poor land who lives in a township where the majority of the land is good. Even though such a man has a crop failure he can get no benefits because the average yield of the township is above twelve bushels to the acre. He suffers because the majority of the land is good while his is poor.

I remember that when this question was raised some years ago the minister suggested that it might be possible to define the areas on the basis of soil classification. He said at that time that the department was investigating the question whether it would be possible to define areas on the basis of soil classification rather than on the township basis. Would the minister say whether anything has been done in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: The greatest difficulty is that you would have to eliminate all submarginal land if we proceeded on the basis my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not referring to submarginal land but simply to lighter land.

Mr. GARDINER: There are different ideas as to submarginal lands. Somebody would have to make up his mind what was to be eliminated. I think the simplest way to eliminate these lands is by the method we are pursuing, to take a block of land and say that if the majority have good crops in that area and there are people in that district who cannot get the average yield there is something wrong with the land or something wrong with the man who is farming it. There is the additional fact that men farm in different ways. A man with live stock is more anxious to grow coarse grains than wheat, and he may put his wheat on land that is not quite so well prepared. He may put his wheat on his spring ploughing, and he may put his coarse grains, in a year that was dry, on his summerfallow in order to make sure that he will have feed grain. The present method makes allowances for all that. I do not see how you could do it in any other way. I have not been able to satisfy myself that any other method would be better.

Mr. QUELCH: Another thing that is giving the department a headache is this question of deciding whether a father and son shall be considered as farming one or two units. I have one or two of these cases. I have not been able to understand the basis for some of the decisions that have been made. In two cases that seem identical you will have a decision in the one case that the farms are two units, and in the other case they will be regarded as one unit.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the hon. member experienced many of these difficulties within the last two months?

Mr. QUELCH: I have two or three cases running around just now.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason why I asked the question is this, that the board has been changed because our recent chairman became organizer for one of the political parties, not the Liberal party. He has gone and we now have a new chairman. When the new chairman took over, we had a meeting here. I had discovered just before that, that a set of regulations had been drawn up by the old board. They were really interpretations of the regulations and many of them had to do with this father and son question. I took objection to that on the ground that the board were passing regulations that only the governor in council could pass and that the regulations as passed by the governor in council contemplated every case being dealt with separately on its merits. The board was to consider all the facts and then give its decision, and that is the basis on which the new board has been operating. They have reported to me that they are finding it much more satisfactory to take each case separately and deal with it on its merits, go into all the facts and give their decision. All we have in mind is this, that a person must be debarred from trying to make two collections when there ought to be only one. For instance, a man may have 800 acres under cultivation and he may say: If I run this myself I will get one payment up to 200 acres, but if I divide the farm into two farms of 400 acres each, I shall get the bonus twice on the 200 acres. We are trying to eliminate that kind of case. We want to pay the bonus in a bona fide case because our intention is to encourage fathers to turn over their land to their sons when they reach a certain age, rather than have the son working under the father all his lifetime. That is the basis on which we are now proceeding, and I do not think there will be as much difficulty in the future.

Mr. QUELCH: Is there any intention of lowering the age, because boys start farming now at eighteen and in Alberta a young man can vote at nineteen, but here in order to qualify he has to be twenty. I think the age should be lowered to eighteen.

Mr. GARDINER: If they do not live with their parents they can qualify at any age. Twenty is the age when they are living at home.

Mr. QUELCH: It is in those cases that the difficulty arises, when the boy is living with his father. It is hard to decide whether it is two units or one.

Mr. GARDINER: We are considering it continuously, and I am glad to say that my views are similar to those of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HANSELL: I appreciate very much the kindness and the valuable assistance which the superintendent of the P.F.A.A. in Edmonton has given to me in the past few years. There was a time when I criticized the administration rather harshly. That was when the bonuses were first being paid and the organization had not quite found itself. Things were in rather a muddle then. But since they have become organized I find that the department is quite efficient. Naturally I have not been able to get all I wanted, but they have taken an interest in the cases that I have submitted to them, and while I am handing out bouquets I might also say the same for the minister, who has looked into one or two tough cases for me.

I should like to ask a question in regard to the regulation governing payments in the case of a man who operates a farm, part of which is irrigated. The particular case I have in mind is that of a farmer who has fifty acres of irrigated land and another farm some forty or fifty miles away. Because he has fifty acres of irrigated land on one parcel of land, he cannot get any benefits under the act in respect of his farm that is forty or fifty miles away, even though it would qualify. I would not be so persistent if the farmer who has this irrigated property had had a good crop, but one year it was very dry and the weeds did not come up that year. Next year he put in some flax on those fifty acres of irrigated land. The weeds came up and he had a tough time getting a crop of flax at all. He raised only a very small crop. He naturally expected that his other farm was going to help him out. His other farm went below the required average bushels per acre, but because he had this irrigated land he could get no benefits under the act in respect of the other farm. I am sure that the minister will look into this case if I give him the particulars. This cannot be an isolated case; there must be others similar. Could the minister throw some light on a case of that kind?

Mr. GARDINER: I am told by a member of the board who is here that cases of that kind have not come here. I am told that there are a few cases of that kind in Alberta. The wording of the regulation is, "farm lands operated by a farmer who as owner or tenant also operates more than fifty acres of land which is part of an irrigated system." It would depend entirely on the interpretation placed on the land operated by the farmer. If a man has an irrigated farm and another farm one hundred miles away, let us say, it would be rather a stretch of the imagination to say it was the same farm. Even if it is forty miles or twenty miles it is the same thing. I think if they were just a mile apart, if a man lives a mile away and operates both places from the same buildings, it would be difficult to give it any other interpretation than the one which is given here. It has not come to my attention on that basis before. I think I had better get a legal opinion on it, and if they adopt that view I would have to have the regulation amended. It is not in the act; it is in the regulations.

Mr. HANSELL: These farms are about fifty miles apart. I can quite understand that if two farms are about a mile or so apart you could use the same equipment on each farm. But this man cannot do that; he cannot haul his equipment every few days about fifty miles. In one letter I received from the department at Edmonton—without mentioning the name of the case—a paragraph reads this way: Mr. So-and-so——had a tough break with his flax crop. Nevertheless according to (g) of clause 6 of the act we cannot pay him a P.F.A. claim for 1943.

I can quite understand that he cannot have the benefits of the scheme if he is working one farm and another adjacent to it, if he has irrigated land; but a man who does not get very much income from that irrigated land and has a farm which he has to operate separately some considerable distance away should, it seems to me, have the benefits of the act if that distant farm yields only a small average crop.

Mr. GARDINER: Send the case to me.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you; I will.

Item agreed to.

31. To provide for wheat acreage reduction payments; for administration expenses in connection therewith, and for temporary appointments that may be required notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $4,265,000.

Mr. GARDINER: That has gone out, anyway, for this year.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

2a. Rabbits, pure bred, for the improvement of stock, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this item extends to all other breeds of rabbits the same provisions, so far as entry is concerned, as have previously been accorded to the Chinchilla, the Angora and Sable. Is that the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is the effect of the item.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this does not apply to rabbits imported generally, but only for breeding purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Pure-bred rabbits for the improvement of stock.

Item agreed to.

Item 156 agreed to.

158. Methyl alcohol, subject to the provisions of the Excise Act, and regulations, per proof gallon: British preferential tariff, 20 cents; intermediate tariff, 20 cents; general tariff, 20 cents.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these items bottles? Does that apply only to new stock?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no change in the bottle item.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are just put in because they are in the item generally?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Items 188, 206c and 216d agreed to.

219a. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, or for preventing, destroying, repelling, or mitigating fungi, weeds, insects, rodents, or other plant or animal pests, n.o.p.:

(i) When in packages not exceeding three pounds each, gross weight: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(ii) Otherwise: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to 219a. The motion will be that the rates of duties of customs set opposite sub-item (ii) of item 219a as contained in resolution No. 2 of June 26, 1944, be amended to read as follows: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent: general tariff, 15 per cent.

The goods entitled to entry under 219a (ii) as worded prior to June 27, 1944, were admitted at the Canada-United States trade agreement rate of 7½ per cent. The intermediate tariff rate of fifteen per cent is now reduced to 7½ per cent in order to ensure that all the goods coming under item 219a (ii), as widened in scope, will be accorded the same tariff treatment.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

All medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations, compounded of more than one substance, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches, lozenges, filled capsules, tablets, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodymes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences and oils, n.o.p.:

(i) When dry: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 26 per cent.

(ii) Liquid, when containing not more than two and one-half per cent of proof spirit: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

(iii) All others: British preferential tariff, 60 per cent; intermediate tariff, 60 per cent; general tariff, 60 per cent.

Provided that any article in this item containing more than forty per cent of proof spirit shall be rated for duty at, per gallon: British preferential tariff, $3; intermediate tariff, $3; general tariff, $3, and British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Provided also, that drugs, pill-mass and preparations, not including pills or medicinal plasters, recognized by the British or United States pharmacopoeia, the Canadian Formulary or the French Codex as officinal, shall not be held to be covered by this item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the duty on these articles previously under item 220?

Mr. ILSLEY: The same. Item 220 included chemical preparations before. Chemical preparations are now provided for under a separate new item designated as 220a. There is no change in the rates.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is no change in the rates?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is to take chemicals out.

Item agreed to.

Items 220a, 300, 316a and 326b agreed to.

326h. Fresnel type lenses, sections and globes, of glass: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the function of this particular item, and why is thirty per cent placed on the general tariff?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no change in the rates of duty. It is free under the British preference and free under the intermediate. There is a change in the description of the lenses merely to facilitate administration.

Item agreed to.

Item 356b agreed to.

408. Malleable sprocket chain and link belting chain of iron or steel, including roller chain of all kinds for operating on steel sprockets or gears, when imported by manufacturers of agricultural implements for use exclusively in the manufacture of agricultural implements, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MacNICOL: In reference to a lot of the items commencing with 408, I am not going to oppose the proposals, but I should like to ask the minister if any representations have been made by a few dozen or more plants making agricultural implements. Have any or a number of the agricultural implement manufacturers made any representations? Perhaps they have not because the making of the implements free at the moment does not mean very much anyway. They cannot buy them on the other side in any event. I suppose every local manufacturer has his price set to-day and can get almost anything that he wants if he has the implements for sale. After the war, of course, a succeeding government may or may not change this schedule as they see fit. Have any representations been made.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I am safe in saying that no representations whatever have been made by the agricultural implement companies or by the companies manufacturing parts, except in respect of imports needed in the manufacture of parts. Representations have been made with regard to those.

Mr. MacNICOL: Take a company like the Massey-Harris company. At the moment, apart from making agricultural implements, a large part of their plant is engaged in the making of munitions of war—

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: —and various parts of war equipment. I presume every other agricultural implement plant is doing the same thing. If they have not made representations it is evidence that they are not interested at the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have not made any to me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): There are some representations that I should like to make to the committee in regard to agricultural implements, and probably it would facilitate the work of the committee if I made them all at this time. I referred to the removal of the duty on agricultural implements when the budget was being debated in the house. At that time I said that I could not approve it. I have given the matter careful consideration since, and I am still opposed to the removal of the duty on agricultural implements.

I do not think the committee has taken into consideration the great value that this business industry is to Canada. There are a great many men employed in the manufacture of agricultural implements. My fear is that when the war is over, the removal of the duty might have a detrimental effect on the workers in these factories. I realize that the price of farm implements is of considerable importance to the farmers of the country, but sometimes I think it is overemphasied. Some years ago a paper published in western Canada called the Norwest Farmer, after making inquiries, said that a farmer spent only three cents of every dollar on farm implements. Since that time, Mr. Chairman, I have gone over the figures of the 1930 census, and, according to my computation, out of every dollar the Canadian farmer receives he spends 3·3 cents on farm implements. I have a break-down of these amounts, if hon. members of the committee are interested, and I should be glad to place it on Hansard with the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. gentleman the consent of the committee?

Mr. GRAYDON: What is this?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The statement shows the gross average income for 1938-40 from the sale of farm produce in Canada, and it shows the total sales of farm machinery during that period.

Mr. REID: What is your authority?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am coming to that. My figures are based on the 1930 census. From the figures obtained at that time I show what has been spent on other goods bought by the farmer. All the goods are not included, so that I have taken some of the items from the United States census. I believe the table will be of benefit to hon. members of the committee. It is as follows:

THE FARM DOLLAR—CANADA

Gross income average 1938/40 (from sale of farm produce)..	$1,170,000,000	100

Assuming that the average farmer spends $1,000 a year, of which 3·3 per cent is spent on farm implements, it means that he will spend $33.33 annually in this way. But I must remind hon. members that half that amount is spent on tractors, which come into Canada duty free.

Mr. GRAYDON: We do not manufacture any tractors here, as I understand it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That is what I say; all tractors come in duty free. Therefore, of the $33.33 the farmer would spend on farm implements, only half would be spent on implements other than tractors.

Mr. PERLEY: What percentage of his purchases of farm implements are tractors?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Practically fifty per cent. So that he would spend only $16.66 out of his $1,000 on implements other than tractors. If we figure the duty of 7½ per cent on $16.66, it comes to exactly

$1.25. So that the removal of this duty on farm implements will save the farmer who spends $1,000 a year a total of $1.25.

Mr. BURTON: In computing his figures did the hon. gentleman also take into consideration the repair parts bought by the farmer?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Yes; the figures I have placed on Hansard take repair parts into consideration. No one has contested these figures, nor have I seen anything which would suggest that farmers spend more than this amount on farm implements.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse, so far as the farmer is concerned.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. gentleman may be right. I felt that I should bring this point to the attention of the committee and more particularly to the attention of those hon. gentlemen who believe the removal of this duty will be a great thing for the farmers. If I could help the farmers I would certainly do so, but $1.25 out of every $1,000 they spend is not a very magnanimous gift. The figures I have given are the latest I have been able to obtain. If any hon. member has been able to get other figures I am sure the committee would be glad to have them. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the removal of this duty will not give the Canadian farmer any greater ability to compete.

What about the worker? If the removal of this duty results in less employment I am afraid the adverse effect on the worker will be much greater than the beneficial effect on the farmer. Farmers are interested in maintaining a healthy home industry, because employment is dependent upon it and employment means an ever-expanding home market for farm products. I believe the farmer is just as much interested as anyone else in having a large home market for his products.

May I also bring to the attention of the committee the fact that all the goods the farmer produces are not on the free list as far as the tariff goes. After listening to discussions in this house one might come to the conclusion that all manufactured goods are protected by high tariffs while farm products have no tariff protection. Let me remind hon. members that a great many farm products have substantial tariff protection. I will not take the time of the committee to mention the duty in each instance, but there is a substantial duty on live cattle, sheep, hogs, fresh beef, lamb, canned meats, baby chicks, bacon and hams, beef in brine, lard, tallow, eggs in shell, cheese, butter, powdered milk and so on. I am quite confident that if many eggs were brought into this country, or if a great deal of butter came here, the very first people who would rise in their places in this house and demand that something be done would be those representing rural constituencies. So that it is not entirely one-sided; there are tariffs on manufactured goods and tariffs on farm products.

My objection to the removal of this duty at this time, however, is rather to the way in which it is being done. As I said during the budget debate there has been virtual agreement among the united nations, although it has not been put in writing, to reduce tariffs after the war by multilateral agreements. In my opinion at all events it is a mistake to adjust tariffs while the present upset economic conditions prevail throughout the world. It is a mistake to adjust tariffs downward without some compensating advantages from other countries with which we are trading. The best example of that is, I think, to be found in the action taken recently by Canada in connection with cream separators. In the United States they have a tariff against us of 12½ per cent on cream separators selling for more than $50. I am not particularly blaming the government in this connection, because apparently the removal of this duty meets with the aproval of all hon. members, and each must accept his share of the responsibility. If this matter had been handled judiciously by parliament, instead of putting cream separators on the free list we could have arranged a saw-off with the United States, so that if their nationals were to be granted the privilege of shipping cream separators into Canada without the payment of duty, Canadian nationals would have a similar privilege. Under the method which has been adopted, however, we have thrown away our bargaining position in that respect.

Mr. LEADER: What about agricultural implements entering the United States from Canada. What duty is there against them?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am discussing cream separators at the moment, and the duty on cream separators selling at more than $50 is 12½ per cent.

Let me now come to the importation of cream separators from the Scandinavian countries. In 1920 some five and a half per cent of all our imports of cream separators came from the Scandinavian countries, but by 1936 those imports had increased to fifty-eight per cent. The point I am making, is that when duties are removed we should take into consideration labor conditions in the countries from which the goods are likely to flow. In the Scandinavian countries seventy-five per cent of the work is done by female labour at sixteen cents an hour, and twenty-five per cent of it is done by male labour at 31·4 cents an hour, which averages out at 19·50 cents an hour. In Canada the lowest wage is fifty-five cents an hour.

I bring these figures to the attention of the committee so that hon. members will realize how difficult it will be for manufacturers in Canada, paying high wages, to compete with these low-wage countries. Someone may say, "Oh, well, this is not going to have any effect upon the manufacturing of farm implements at the present time." I quite agree with that. In fact, it seems to me that in order to turn out the supplies needed immediately we may have to increase our manufacture of farm implements at this time. But my point is this: What is going to happen when the war is over?

I feel it is unfortunate this action should have been taken now, when the thoughts of all of us are oriented toward making sure that there will be employment for our returning men and for those who have been working in munitions factories. After giving this matter my most careful consideration I cannot help feeling that the removal of duty on farm implements at this time is a step in the wrong direction. If it had to be done, then it should have been brought about by reciprocal agreements with other nations. I am satisfied that before many years have passed it will be found that the removal of the duties has been detrimental to the interests of both the farmers and the workers. For the reasons given, therefore, I cannot support this portion of the resolutions.

Mr. LEADER: I had not intended to speak at this time, but the remarks of my esteemed friend, a gentleman I have grown to like more each year I have sat in the house, have prompted me to add a word or two. The committee will recall that I asked him a question as to the duty on Canadian farm machinery entering the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I did not hear it.

Mr. LEADER: I asked the hon. member as to what was the duty on Canadian-made agricultural implements entering the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I thought the hon. member was referring to cream separators.

Mr. LEADER: No; the hon. member said that he was talking about cream separators at the time. My impression is that agricultural implements have entered the United States from Canada free of duty for many years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Not cream separators.

Mr. LEADER: I am talking about agricultural machinery.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot cut wheat with a cream separator.

Mr. LEADER: I should also like to remind the hon. member, and the Liberal party, to which I am an adherent, if nothing more, that implements free of duty, for farming operations, have formed a part of the Liberal platform ever since 1919. After twenty-five years that promise is being redeemed. And yet the hon. member believes it is a step in the wrong direction.

Well, coming from western Canada, being a farmer and having purchased a considerable amount of machinery for farming—and mostly Canadian machinery at that—I feel that this relief is about due. In my view the duty does mean something to the farmers who have to purchase that machinery. I believe that a monopoly exists in regard to farm machinery, and that removing the duty does not mean anything, so far as prices are concerned, unless some other measure is taken.

I think the hon. member said that it costs about three per cent of the farmer's dollar to maintain machinery, and he challenged anyone in the house to offer figures to controvert that statement. All the hon. member has to do is to look into what the government will lend a veteran who goes to take up land. He will be granted $4,800 to purchase the land, and $1,200 to buy the machinery. The purchase price of the machinery amounts to twenty-five per cent of the total loan. I say from experience that if a man wishes to farm now he will pay approximately fifty per cent for farm machinery and fifty per cent for land. It is a fifty-fifty proposition. To start farming now one would have to lay out as much money for machinery as he would for the land.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I was talking about the annual outlay.

Mr. LEADER: Well, of course you cannot farm unless you get started. I am talking about the farmer who wants to get started on the farm, and who will need as much money to equip the farm as to buy the land.

Mr. KNOWLES: You know something about farming.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I am sure if the hon. member for Brantford City does not know as much about farming as I do, he knows far more about most other things.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Oh, I would not agree with that.

Mr. LEADER: I have always respected him very much, and I honour him very highly. However, I did not wish to go home to my constituency and tell them that I had sat idly by in the House of Commons while Liberal members, members of the Progressive Conservative party, members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party and members of the Social Credit party had stood up and defended the duties on agricultural machinery. I would not feel that I had done my duty. So that I now rise again to protest against the hon. member's statement that this is a step in the wrong direction. I believe that it is in the right direction, and that it is just overdue by twenty-five years.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member for Brantford City mentioned that the duty was being taken off cream separators. I quite agree with what he has said. The removal of this duty is going to make a great difference to workers in Canada after the war is over. The duty being taken off cream separators this year will not save the farmers very much, because there are very few cream separators coming into this country from the United States or any other country. After the war is over I am wondering what the workers in one of the largest cream separator plants in the world—the one in Peterborough—are going to do. They will be out of work. Many of those men and women are buying homes to-day. If they are thrown out of jobs through machinery entering Canada free of duty, machinery which will be coming into Canada from Sweden and from other countries, they will have a just grievance. I hope this measure will be taken off the books next year.

Mr. CHURCH: The policy of the government respecting customs tariff item 409, which is now before us, was set out in the budget speech by the minister. The principle affecting all these agricultural machinery items is the same. The government to-day does not know where it stands. I know that the agricultural implements industry has been contributing a great part to the war effort. I have seen the plants of the Massey-Harris Company in Toronto, which are busy on war work, almost entirely. There are no implements coming into Canada owing to the war, tariff or no tariff.

Whether this item calls for duty, or does not call for it, the fact remains that the policy of the government at the present time in respect of this and following items is simply one of shadow-boxing and mere window-dressing. That is all it is, and with a war on it means nothing. As hon. members know, the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding dealt with this problem, and adopted a policy of imperial preference. That was followed for some years with our best steady customer, Britain.

Someone may ask what was done at the meeting of Prime Ministers which took place in London, England, in May. We understand that matters of imperial trade, and trade of all kinds, and affecting all classes of materials, were dealt with at that conference and the future of imperial preferences was discussed. I might add that when the Drury government was in office in Ontario some of the same proposals were made with respect to agricultural implements. While he was premier, Mr. Drury came to Ottawa. At that time he headed a so-called farmer-labour government. What did they do? They came here and they addressed Mr. King's cabinet. Mr. Robb was Minister of Finance. They advanced the same proposals, through a brief of the Canadian council of agriculture, for free trade in agricultural implements and all along the line. They said that protection was an unmitigated evil, that they wanted to get a spade to dig and root it out. Protection for this industry was the policy of all governments in the early days of this country to 1921. What did the present government do when they came into office in 1921? They did not reduce tariffs all along the line; they did little or nothing to lower tariffs.

Tariff protection has created work and employment. We have a war on now, and this is just some window-dressing instead of doing something for the farmers on the prairies. The best friends the farmers on the prairies have are the people in the east. I believe in the policy of confederation, each for all and all for each. What is for the benefit of one province is for the benefit of them all. There is a war on; we have had the Ogdensburg agreement and others, and the result of war is that there is very little of this type of agricultural implements being shipped across the border into Canada, and our agricultural industries are converted to other war work accordingly.

What is going to happen to these men in this industry after the war, the men who work at the Massey-Harris plant in Toronto, the plant in Brantford and in many other places?

When the war is over what is going to happen to labour because of this policy? Do not overlook the fact that the United States with its population of 130,000,000 had the Hawley-Smoot tariff regarding all of these industries. In the British House of Commons that tariff was called the eighth wonder of the world in high protection. The Republican party may have a majority in congress and their policy as given at Chicago two weeks ago will be to protect their home market all along the line for themselves. Why should not they protect their home market? Why should we not adopt the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding of empire preferences also, as a home-export market? When the war is over, what is to become of the men in this agricultural industry

What has been happening in the other dominions? Mr. Curtin, Mr. Fraser and the other prime ministers have been sounding the same battle cry of empire trade and the empire family first over in London. I believe this matter was discussed in London when our Prime Minister was there. What is to become of the industries like the agricultural industry and hundreds of others? Something should be done about it. Take Russia with its population of 180,000,000 people. Russia is going to look after her own people and her own home markets by high protection. They have already announced a policy along those lines, and Britain has a separate bi-lateral policy with them for twenty years, signed at Moscow.

I was surprised when I looked over the budget to find that the government was all at sea on this empire trade question. The people in the British empire believe in the preference. The British empire has been our best customer and our steady market; it has been the best friend of the prairie provinces. We have been able to sell our products in exchange for goods and services. The imports and exports have created a tremendous amount of work and the farmers of the prairies have been provided with a steady market, not one that is here to-day and gone to-morrow, gone for the cry of internationalism.

The British empire is going into liquidation by default unless we look out and hold to our home market for our family first and any surplus for others. We should take a leaf out of what Russia and the United States are doing in connection with their industries, in safeguarding their own home market. When the war is over, there will always be tariffs. Look at the resolutions which were passed a week ago at Chicago by the Republican party. They are going to go back to the old days when they looked after their own people first, and the same with Russia with her 180,000,000 people, and who can blame them? Great Britain has lost a quarter of a billion pounds in investments overseas. These have been marketed and put up as a pledge for the war, for munitions and food. She has lost all that and she needs the support of a policy like that adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding. They were both Liberals, but they gave Great Britain preference and increased our trade with Britain and that of Britain with Canada.

Is the government going to throw overboard the Ottawa agreements for separate trade agreements? If so, they should announce their policy to Australia and New Zealand. If so, Canada will be sounding the death knell of the British empire unless we have this empire trade and preference. I believe the prime ministers discussed this whole problem in London. The British empire will go by default and into liquidation unless home markets are available as they have been in the past.

Let me refer to this particular item. I remember when Mr. Drury came here and said that protection was an unmitigated evil. I was in the railway committee room when a large deputation representing the Canadian council of agriculture came here. They attacked the system which had been built up in this country and which had done so much for this country and for the empire. They said it was an unmitigated evil and should be wiped out altogether. Thousands of people left Ontario to go to the United States for jobs, many of them returned soldiers from the last war who had fought at the risk of their lives for this country. We are dealing only with this particular industry, but when the next budget comes down it will sound the deathknell of the automobile industry and many other industries.

I am in complete sympathy with the farmer because I know he has had to pay too much for these implements. When I first entered this house I suggested that the minister should have an expert in his department who would set a fair price on these agricultural implements to be paid by the farmers on the prairies.

This question will have to be solved in the next election. When the war is over there will be tens of thousands of our workers out of work. I remember when ward 5 in Toronto, at present represented by the hon. member for Davenport and part of which I represented when I first entered the house, part of it in the northwest, was almost an open field. The streets north of Queen and running west from Bathurst, Markham, Palmerston, Euclid, Manning, Shaw, from Queen to Bloor; all those streets for a mile and a half were built up by houses erected in all these areas for the implement and other industries; also where the late Colonel Dennison, our magistrate, lived.

Under the protectionist policy that part of the city was built up. The workers bought their own homes and they did a great deal for Canada and for the British empire. I believe in protecting the farmer because he has had to suffer a lot in the past. Over ninety per cent of our industry owners were all right; but a small per cent of the manufacturers wanted to claim all the benefits of protection for themselves and give nothing in return to the consumer. After the war our own empire family should come first with Canada. The mother country wants to exchange goods and services along these lines.

Unless we and New Zealand and Australia help the mother country the British empire will go by default. I do hope that the Minister of Finance will declare before parliament closes what the policy of the government is going to be regarding preferences and empire trade all along the line when the war is over. If free trade has its way I believe that not tens of thousands but a million and a half of our population will have to go to the United States to look for work. You saw what happened at the Chicago convention last week, and there is another convention meeting there this week. A resolution was proposed that after the war they go for their own home market. I plead with the government to announce their policy regarding preferences and empire trade. Let the mother country know what you are going to do about them. These preferences should be brought up to date to meet modern conditions. Some of the duties are all right in some respects, but other duties undoubtedly should be protective. The United States and Russia are going to be the most highly protected countries in the world, war or no war. Britain has an agreement with Russia to-day, in which the dominions have no part, covering some of the matters to which I have referred to-night.

Mr. WRIGHT: I had not intended to take part in this debate since I covered the ground pretty fully in speaking in the budget debate, but I could not let pass unchallenged the statement of the hon. member for Brantford City with respect to the cost of farm implements on the average farm. In twenty-five years of farming in western Canada it has cost me approximately $8,000 for farm machinery and repairs, or roughly $400 a year, which is considerably over the $1.65 suggested by the hon. member for Brantford City.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I said 3·3 per cent.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. WRIGHT: That is 3·3 per cent of the average income. It certainly costs more than that in western Canada, and anyone who has farmed in Canada will bear me out in my figures as to the approximate cost of farm machinery on the average farm in the west.

This tariff item would be helpful in reducing farm machinery costs, provided always that the reduction in the tariff is carried through into the price of the machinery. But that has not happened in the west, and nobody knows it better than the present government. In 1935 they reduced the tariff from 25 per cent as it was under the Bennett government to 12½ per cent, and promptly the price of farm machinery went up by 2·4 per cent. That certainly indicated to me, and I think to the people of Canada, that there was a combine in farm machinery as between the manufacturers in the United States and the manufacturers in Canada. Otherwise that reduction in the tariff should have been passed on to the user of farm machinery. I doubt whether this reduction in the tariff is going to mean very much unless the government are prepared to go farther than they have done in the past.

The hon. member for Brantford City said that he was alarmed about the position of labour. I have figures here as to what labour gets out of the total price paid by the farmer for farm machinery. These figures were produced before the committee which inquired into farm machinery prices in 1935 and 1936. On an 8-foot binder which cost the farmer $281 laid down in Regina, labour received $22.62, and that, I believe, included the full cost of factory labour and office staff also.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It did not take in any office staff. I was on that committee.

Mr. WRIGHT: If it did not include the office staff I accept the hon. member's correction. The office staff may have been included in this other item of overhead, but it did include all the costs of factory labour. I would also point out that in the United States in 1939 farm implements were selling at approximately fifteen per cent below the Canadian price on an average, and yet United States factories were paying their labour from fifteen to twenty per cent more than was paid to labour in Canadian factories.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mass production.

Mr. WRIGHT: The Canadian factories should have been working to their full capacity or perhaps they were overbuilt. Perhaps their overhead was out of proportion to the trade which there was in Canada. So that I do not think the hon. member's arguments are very sound, and when he says that he is so much alarmed about labour I am inclined to believe that he is alarmed about other interests than labour.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I hope that the hon. member does not imply that about me too, because I certainly am concerned about labour.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the cap does not fit, do not wear it.

Mr. REID: He is pretty well alone on this side.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): If I am right I do not mind if I am alone or not.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to dumping duties. The tariff is being removed. Does that mean that any group of individuals or any individual in any part of Canada will be able to go to the United States and buy any type of farm implement or implement repairs and bring them into Canada absolutely free of duty of any kind? Suppose you are able to buy farm machinery or repair parts in the United States below the ordinary home consumption price in that country. Will the importer be compelled to pay a dumping duty on those goods when they enter Canada? Will they be valued for customs purposes at the ordinary price in the United States? Will dumping duties be applied?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been some years since I have given any consideration to the state of the law relating to dumping duties, but I think the dumping principle is still in our Customs Act. I think it is still a principle of our tariff laws that if goods are sold at less than the fair market value for home consumption in the country of origin, the dumping duty applies.

Mr. WRIGHT: If that is the case, this tariff reduction may not be of much benefit to the Canadian farmer. I know we have cooperatives operating in western Canada today whose purpose it is to go to the United States and buy machines and repair parts on the cheapest market they can find.

Mr. ILSLEY: At a price less than the fair market value in the United States?

Mr. WRIGHT: They may be able to make a bargain over there with certain firms to buy these repair parts at less than the fair market value as determined by the implement companies in the United States. They might be able to make a bargain, for example, with Montgomery Ward or some other people who are not in the implement business to produce certain repair parts at considerably lower prices than are charged by the implement companies in the United States for those repairs; but if we have to pay the difference between the price which might be obtained by the cooperatives for these repairs and the price at which the implement companies consider a fair domestic price in the United States, this reduction in the tariff may not mean very much to the farmer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me say a word about that. The principle in the Customs Act is that if a foreign exporter quotes to a Canadian importer goods at a price less than the fair home market price of similar goods to a purchaser in that foreign country, the dumping duty applies. That is the principle of the dumping duty; it is to prevent dumping. The hon. gentleman apparently believes that the dumping of agricultural implements should be permitted. Does he believe that the dumping of butter from New Zealand should be permitted? I should like to find out about that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is a sixty-four dollar question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better think it over, anyway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sure this does not present an appropriate opportunity to stage a first-class or full-dress debate on the question of the tariff structure. However, in view of what has been said here to-night, like the hon. member for Portage la Prairie I feel that I should put on record one or two comments.

I could have followed the hon. member for Brantford City, where farm implements are manufactured, had he stayed with his original argument, that it was a little unfair at this time, before the government had implemented its declared policy of exploring the world to improve the trade conditions of this country by entering into reciprocal trade agreements, to single out the farm implement industry in the matter of tariff reduction; that is, until the government in its general trade policy had dealt with a great many other items. But I noticed that to-night he went much farther; and as soon as the matter of cream separators was mentioned, I observed that the hon. member for Peterborough West, where cream separators are manufactured, rose in his place and protested against that particular tariff reduction. In addition, the hon. member for Broadview gave us to-night an argument, such as has been used ever since this question was first debated, against the step which the government is taking. I hope the minister is not at all alarmed by the expressions of opinion on the part of these hon. members, all of whom have opposed this particular item in the budget changes. It was bound to come. As the Minister of Finance stated, as reported in Hansard, at page 4184:

> However, the government desires to give concrete evidence of the direction which it is endeavouring to follow in the formulation of post-war commercial policy.

And on the same page, although not following immediately on that, he points out—

> . . . the need for a bold initiative in the orderly and agreed unshackling of world trade, if the ideals of economic expansion, higher incomes, full employment, adequate nutrition and the progressive abolition of poverty are to become realities.

I implore the minister never to hesitate or to weaken in the policy which he has declared to be the policy of the government in the post-war period, simply because one hon. member after another, when his particular baby is touched in this matter of unshackling trade—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some day you will have a baby to be touched.

Mr. GRAHAM: —thinks it is proper to rise in this chamber and protest against that particular item, which I hope is only one among a great many which will follow the same course, so that the objectives stated by the Minister of Finance may be reached, and the results of the Canada-First policy of 1930-35 will not only be undone, but the lessons we gathered as a result of that policy may be applied. In this way Canadian industry and Canadian agriculture will both prosper to a far greater degree than they can hope to do under any other policy which I have ever heard advocated in this house or outside it.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to answer the question the minister asked me. It was a fairly direct question. I want to point out the difference between the conditions affecting farm machinery and those affecting butter. The price of farm machinery in the United States is set by a monopoly; it is fixed by people who control the price of farm machinery and are able to set it at any level they like. On the other hand butter is sold on the world market and must conform to the world price of butter, and it has always had to do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would, I should think, be all the less reason for putting any duty against New Zealand butter. But there is always a great agitation when any butter starts to come in. I have gone through this in previous years, and I know there is. Hon. members representing farming constituencies are always extremely vocal on that point. I just want to point out that I do not think we ought to get our legislation on an occupational or a class basis. We ought to realize that a principle should be applied all along the line, and I am afraid we do not. I know perfectly well what the attitude of hon. gentlemen would be if a large quantity of New Zealand butter were coming into this country: it would be to shut it out. I do not say we should, mind you. I think we should have a little consistency in our attitude toward these things; and the distinction the hon. member has drawn is a distinction without a difference. If there is a monopoly setting prices in the United States, how is your cooperative going to get a cut-rate price? You must bear in mind that we are talking about a condition which is perfectly non-existent at the present time and will be for a good long time to come. The difficulty is to get implements from the United States; the difficulty is not that of having implements dumped on us.

Mr. WRIGHT: The cooperatives, by the way, are going into the United States and, along with the cooperatives in the United States, are buying a factory there and are going to manufacture their own implements for the cooperatives for distribution in both the United States and Canada; and if they are able to manufacture these implements at a considerably lower price than present manufacturing costs in the United States, then you propose to put on a dumping duty on them so as to bring prices up to United States prices, before they can be brought into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the dumping duty would apply in that case. I understand that if a manufacturer of these implements in the United States sells to a comparable purchaser in the United States at a price as low as the price he quotes to a purchaser in Canada, the article is not being dumped.

Mr. WRIGHT: That puts a different complexion on the whole thing, if that is the case.

Mr. PERLEY: I think all of us are pleased at any benefit which may be derived from a change in the tariff on these items. If it results in a reduction of price to the farmer, hon. members, especially from the west, will gladly support it.

I dealt with this matter pretty carefully and, I think, clearly in speaking on the budget, and put on record figures which I obtained from the bureau of statistics and which the hon. member for Brantford quoted this evening. As he stated in replying to a question I asked him, fifty per cent of the farmers' purchases of farm implements to-day consists of tractors, and they are on the free list. As the hon. member for Brantford City pointed out, when you take the average duty on the balance, it is so low that its effect will be very small indeed.

What I rose to say was that, while this may be a gesture to the farmer himself, I regret that the minister has not taken into consideration another individual who has much to do with the farms of western Canada, in fact, in the last three or four years, more than anyone else; I mean the farmer's wife. I think the minister should have considered putting on the free list a great number of items which may be classified as household equipment on the farms, such as non-electrical refrigerators, vacuum cleaners and sweepers. Stoves might have been put on the list. The farmer's wife has been contending with the old stove. If things were made a little easier for her in that respect she would be tickled to death to get a new stove, an oil stove and so on. If you want to help the farmers, automobiles also might have been considered. Generally household equipment on the farm could have been considered and could have been put on the free list. In that way the one individual in the country who neeeds to be helped would have been helped.

Mr. GARDINER: You ought to join the Liberal party.

Mr. PERLEY: Those things are what I think could have been taken into consideration when the gesture was made by putting agricultural implements on the free list.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid, if we had done that, my hon. friend would have said that we should have gone much farther, and many of his colleagues would have got up and said that we were turning men out of work. I think the safest policy is the policy I laid down in the budget, which is to look forward to arrangements which will have the effect of lowering world tariffs generally and promoting trade between nations. This is one step that we thought we should take for the reasons stated in the budget.

Mr. WOOD: I find myself in a somewhat peculiar position to-night, because, after all, I represent an agricultural implement manufacturing riding. The Cockshutt Plow company happens to be in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

I may say that I cannot show the same concern as my colleague has in regard to what the future may have in store for the workingmen in the city of Brantford. I have been more or less following the stock markets, not that I have very great interest in them other than to see the trend of things, and I have discovered that there has been no reduction in the price of the stock of the agricultural implement companies. In fact in Tuesday's Globe and Mail I found that there has been a considerable increase in the stock of the Cockshutt Plow company on the stock exchange, which indicates that those who wish to put the product of their efforts in the form of money into that stock do not feel the same concern as do some hon. members of the committee. Furthermore, I wish to put myself on record as one of the hon. members supporting this government who believe that the policy of freer trade in all commodities of life is one of the solutions of our problems. We all boast about the things for which we are fighting. When the Atlantic charter was drafted by the great statesmen of the allied countries one of the clauses of that charter referred to the exchange of the natural resources and the goods of one nation with another.

I may say I am somewhat shocked at the attitude of the opposition. The hon. member for Broadview got up upon a high and lofty plane and tried to take under his wing the guidance and protection of the great British empire. I am not at all concerned about the British empire. The past record of the British empire shows that they have been well able to take care of themselves. There have been many people who prophesied the downfall of the British empire; but the fact of the matter is that that empire has been always twenty years ahead of most of the other countries of the world. They have been well able to take care of themselves; and I still have confidence that it will not be necessary, particularly for Canada, to give any great preference to the products of Great Britain to enable it to maintain its existence. However, I feel that there are other things that should be considered. Personally I believe that the workingmen and the people that I have the honour to represent in the city of Brantford will be in a much better position under this particular policy than they will be under a restricted trade policy. We have had examples of high protection many a time. You have to look at the past and the path over which we have come to decide what the future may have in store for us if we follow certain policies.

What has been the result? I have before me the agricultural income of this country from 1926 to the present time. From 1926 to 1930 inclusive the average farm income in those five years was $970,000,000. Then we had the blasting policy of our hon. friends across the way, who put on high tariffs and claimed that they were going to solve our problem. The result of that policy was that in the five years during which they had the privilege of administering the affairs of this country the average agricultural income dropped down to $440,000,000, or less than one-half of what it was in the previous five years.

Mr. TUSTIN: There was not a world depression then.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member says that there was a depression when my hon. friends opposite were in power. I will answer the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox in this way. Canada was still in this same old world as were the rest of the countries. In 1930 Canada stood in fifth place as a world trading nation. After five years of my hon. friend's policy we receded to seventh place as a trading nation in competition with all the rest of the world. There must have been something in that policy which made it impossible for the Canadian farmer to sell the product of his labours and relieve this market of goods. There must have been something in that policy which was responsible for depressing the prices in this country when the total agricultural income was less than one-half what it was in the previous five years. Now, then, to prove it to the hon. member—

Mr. TUSTIN: There were high tariffs in other countries which shut out our goods.

Mr. WOOD: It cannot be mere coincidence that in 1935 the total agricultural income again was $511,000,000 for that one particular year. However, I think it is only fair to take the average. In the period from 1935 to 1940 we had two very bad years, 1937 and 1938. In those years we had practically a famine in the three prairie provinces so far as agricultural production was concerned. But let us include those years in the five-year period. In that five-year period we had a total agricultural production of $675,000,000. In spite of the fact we had two of the worst years in the history of this country so far as production is concerned; yet we had an increase of fifty per cent in returns to agriculture. Furthermore, for the benefit of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, our trade in relation to other countries of the world had gone up until we were again the fifth trading nation of the world at that particular time. At the present time we stand third Of course, part of that is due to the war, because some of the nations of the world are not in a position to compete with us. To-day Canada is filling that great place among the trading nations of the world. She is the greatest trading nation of the world for her population.

That brings me to this argument. Canada has proven in war time that her industry can compete with any other industry in any other country; and if it can be done in war time, why cannot it be done in peace time? Our productive possibilities have increased. We have three thousand more factories in Canada to-day than we had when the war broke out. Besides that, we have numerous other factories that have expanded their productive capacity. I do not see any reason why that productive capacity harnessed up cannot put Canada in a position to compete with the commerce of the world. I believe that it can be done, because if you remove those barriers—and many of those barriers militate against the manufacturer—the manufacturer will be able to participate in the benefits of a freer trade policy, and he will be able to produce cheaper.

I notice that under this particular item there are certain articles of iron and steel, rods and bars that are allowed to come in duty free. They go into the manufacture of agricultural implements. I might say that I do not take too seriously what the hon. member for Melfort said. He said, I think, that only $22 of labour entered into the manufacture of a binder.

Mr. WRIGHT: Those figures were given to a committee of this house by the implement companies themselves.

Mr. WOOD: I thought the hon. member said $22.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, $22.62; that is the factory's labour cost.

Mr. WOOD: But a great deal of the material going into a binder is already processed when it comes to the factory, and that labour must be taken into consideration. Again, the agricultural implement companies go to a great deal of expense in connection with servicing, and there are other ways in which labour enters into the final cost. I do not think the figure mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort gives the proper relationship of the cost of labour to the price of the binder. I take the view that if Canada is to prosper in future, steps must be taken to keep the cost of production as low as possible. If there is one thing that will create unemployment it is an increase in the cost of production, and that cost of production will be affected by the matter of wages. The best assurance labour can have as to its prosperity is a prosperous customer, and if the farmer is prosperous there is no doubt that the farm implement firms will be able to sell their products.

It has been argued that the benefit to the farmer as a result of the removal of this 7½ per cent duty will be small. I have seen editorials in my local paper, as well as in the Globe and Mail, in which attempts were made to analyse the benefits that would go to the farmer, and I am shocked at their methods of arriving at a conclusion. As for my colleague the hon. member for Brantford City, while his legal ability may be great I am afraid his mathematics are bad. Let me tell the committee how I view this matter. Let us say that I purchase in the United States an agricultural implement costing $100. I have to pay $11 for United States currency, which brings the cost to $111. The duty on that implement is 7½ per cent, which is figured not on $100 but on $111, which means an actual duty of $8.32. Up to the present there has been a war exchange tax of ten per cent, also assessed on the $111, which meant another $11.10. So that when you include the cost of exchange, the duty and the war exchange tax, that $100 implement will cost me $130.42, without any freight charges at all. It is true that we have no control over the $11 for exchange, but the removal of this duty will mean a benefit to the farmer of practically twenty per cent, consisting of $8.32 duty and $11.10 war exchange tax. I cannot see it in any other way. I obtained these figures from the department, and I believe this to be the correct picture. I am ready to admit that tractors have always come in free, and the only advantage we get there will be the removal of the ten per cent war exchange tax, which will be a considerable saving.

Mr. GLADSTONE: What was the amount stated by the hon. member for Melfort as the cost of labour in connection with a binder?

Mr. WOOD: It was $22.62.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I suppose the average wage of a man working in a factory would not be less than $6 a day, which would mean that only three or four man-days would go into the manufacture of a binder. The idea is simply preposterous.

Mr. WRIGHT: I only gave the figures of the companies, as they were presented to a select committee of this house in 1935.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If that represents your reasoning in all things, it is very inaccurate.

Mr. WOOD: I thank the hon. member for Wellington South for drawing that point to the attention of the committee. Early in my remarks I endeavoured to direct attention to this rather ridiculous approach to this question.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member was in the house, I believe, at the time when the committee on the cost of agricultural implements was sitting. Did he question the figures of the companies at that time? I do not know whether the hon. member for Wellington South, who has just questioned my figures, was a member of the house at that time, but if he was he should have gone into those figures when they were placed on record by the implement companies themselves.

Mr. WOOD: That is quite beside the point; I am not able to recall all the things I did ten years ago.

Mr. GLADSTONE: But at least you know a man could not make a binder in three or four days.

Mr. WOOD: Yes, my common sense would tell me that. As I pointed out, that argument only gives part of the picture. That is characteristic of the group to which the hon. member for Melfort belongs. They generally say just enough to get people to believe what they want them to believe, without giving all the facts and facing realities. Of course they are just running true to form again. I will admit that it is good politics, because we cannot spend all our time in denying things. Most people know their arguments are ridiculous, but I have come to the conclusion that we have trusted the public too much and have allowed them to listen to the wild doctrines and statements of hon. members in the far corner for too long without giving the correct picture, because many people are coming to believe them. We thought most of our people were too intelligent to believe some of the ridiculous things hon. gentlemen in the far corner have been saying, but unfortunately, while engaged in the war effort, the people have not time to do their thinking properly, so that hon. gentlemen are having considerable success with their phoney arguments and policies.

I was going on to say that the discussion in regard to tractors has brought out the point that these machines are not manufactured in Canada, and I am sure the public will want to know why. At one time tractors were manufactured in the city of Brantford, but their design was rather cumbersome and did not meet with the approval of the buying public. As a result the company could not remain in business. To-day a tractor produces far more power than it requires for its own operation. The first tractors built in this country were so cumbersome that they required most of their power for their own operation, and had no reserve left. To-day tractors are so perfected that on level ground, by putting one's hand on a tractor one can push it along a level road. That is one type of progress that has been made.

I believe it was the hon. member for Broadview who drew attention to the fact that we would have to make our purchases from Great Britain and that to maintain herself she needed our business. Well, I have discovered that Great Britain drives a pretty hard bargain, when it comes to buying agricultural products. I am prepared to say that after this war is over we shall have to compete with Denmark in the British market, so far as our pork products and many other products are concerned. If we are going to compete satisfactorily, then the only answer the farmer has is that of reducing his costs of production. We cannot maintain high production costs, when those costs are far in excess of those in other countries, thereby placing the selling prices of our products beyond the reach of nations that are buying. This is all very well in war time, when there is very little competition, and when there is a ready market for everything. But some day we must face our Danish competitors on the bacon and cheese markets. The solution of our problem in Canada will be reached only by keeping down our production costs.

In the statement I made the other day in connection with sessional indemnities, I overlooked one point. May I say now that I take the view, and take it sincerely, that if Canada is to find a market for the products of her labour it will be necessary that we revise our thinking, and that we keep costs of production down so that those in other countries may be able to buy our produce.

The answer to higher wages and higher production costs will be met in unemployment; there can be no other answer. I say this because I feel it is important that the country should know where we stand, and where I stand particularly on this matter. The mere fact of lowering salaries or lowering wages does not necessarily mean that anyone is going to be deprived of what he needs. But if by lowering production costs we can increase the purchasing power of wages, we at the same time are operating far more efficiently than if we have a continuous increase in prices, salaries and wages, and a resulting final increase in production costs.

To-day organized labour are demanding their rights. They have associated themselves, politically; and I warn labour definitely that if they continue this policy of accepting class legislation, they are heading for nothing short of disaster. Their experience will be paid for in unemployment.

There is only one way in which we can have prosperity, and that is by going abreast. If there is to be a national state, then the farmer has to have his place in the economic life of that state. He has carried the burden of other people too long, and he has now reached the point where he feels that he is entitled to some of those fine things, some of those good things in life. He feels that he has the same right to those things as the people who live in the more favoured industrial centres.

The great solution of our problems will be found in lowering production costs, so that when the farmer has to compete on the open markets of the world with the products of other countries he can compete and sell his surplus. In that way there will be a continuous market for his products. This is a long story, but I feel it my duty to state my position, and I want the people in my constituency to know where I stand on these matters.

The solution of our problems to-day rests in world trade. Canada to-day stands the greatest trading nation, according to her population of any country in the world. I believe that following a wise policy and with proper leadership along the road we have travelled in the last few years when Canada has become such a great nation, we shall maintain that position. By doing the wise thing I believe we can maintain the favourable position we enjoy to-day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is there to-day any embargo in the United States against the export of farm machinery, other than tractors?

Mr. ILSLEY: Other than tractors?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not know there was an embargo on the export of tractors, even.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I say "other than tractors". I know there is no embargo upon them. So far as farm machinery is concerned, with the exception of tractors, is there any embargo?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not quite sure of my facts, but I think they make a limited allocation to us of what machinery they have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the value of farm machinery, exclusive of tractors, imported into Canada between 1939 and 1943?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is asking for a statement of imports into Canada?

Mr. HENDERSON: While the minister is looking up that information I should like to say a word. May I express commendation of the minister upon the budget presented, and upon his policy of withdrawing the duty against agricultural implements. He has done some splendid things, but I believe this has been his most Liberal act, and certainly it has been the most Liberal since I have served my constituency as a member.

I came to this country thirty-six years ago, and I can well remember Sir Wilfrid Laurier sending his Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, to the United States to negotiate a reciprocal agreement. I remember reading history to the effect that that was not the only budget of its kind Mr. Fielding had brought down. He had given Great Britain a preference before that time, a procedure which I approve. I remember that the agreement with the United States was put on the statute books of that country, and became an election issue in Canada, defeating the government. In my opinion, as a man operating a farm in western Canada, that policy was fair not only for western Canada but for the whole of it.

As a result of a policy which was followed, lands and factories depreciated in value to a considerable extent. We have now reached the point where we are able to get back on our feet again, and to enjoy some real Liberalism. Since we have reached this point, may I express my commendation and my appreciation to the minister.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle referred to the elimination of duty on farm machinery as a gesture to farmers. I say to him it is more than a gesture; it is something real for the farmers of Canada. Not only that, but it renders a service to all Canada. I would rather put it as the minister has put it, namely, that it is a gesture to the rest of the world. If after the war we do not have something like an Atlantic charter, to provide an equitable exchange of commodities the world over, then we have not yet won the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure I have all the information the hon. member for Lake Centre wanted, but I have a statement of Canada's imports of agricultural implements and machinery during 1942 and 1943. The total imports in 1942 were $23,696,661. This included traction engines, gasoline, $9,041,960, and parts of gasoline tractors, $7,563,214. The remainder of the item making up the total of $23,696,661 consisted of a large number of implements and parts. It would take some time to read the whole list. In 1943 the total value of imports was $20,424,286, which included traction engines, gasoline, $7,271,678, and parts of gasoline tractors, $8,041,974. These figures show that by far the larger part of imports were tractors and parts. The principal remaining item is harvester combines and parts. The value of the imports in 1942 was $2,460,700, and in 1943, $1,737,110. That was by far the largest item, but there were other items such as cultivators, the import value in 1942 being $241,631, and in 1943, $145,026.

The situation is that we are getting some agricultural implements and parts from the United States, such as we can arrange for by allocation. The amount available is limited. The situation that prevailed in 1943 is substantially the same as has prevailed in 1944, although the allocations may be a bit higher.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the total amount of customs duties collected on farm machinery in each of those years?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount of the customs duties and the war exchange tax for the present year if unremoved would amount to $2,350,000 on the imports. That could be divided roughly into proportions of fifteen to twenty. That is to say, the duty is 7½ per cent on nearly all of these items, if not on all, and the war exchange tax is ten per cent. A rough way of finding out would be to take 15/35ths of the amount.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the importations in 1942 and 1943 approximately equal the export quotas fixed by the United States? What representations, if any, have been made by the government of Canada to the United States government to increase these quotas?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not that complete information. We have an efficient organization in Washington which is in contact continuously with the combined boards and United States government agencies that have to do with the fixing of these quotas. We try to get as much as we can.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That still does not answer the question I asked. Did the exports by the United States to Canada approximately equal the quotas fixed by the United States government or by the joint production board?

Mr. ILSLEY: They were short of the quotas on some items, but they are making them up this year.

Mr. TUCKER: I understand that an order was passed by the wartime prices and trade board to the effect that ceiling prices on farm implements and repair parts would be reduced by the amount by which costs would be affected by the removal of the tariff and the war exchange tax. This was to come into effect on June 26, but later there was another provision that it would not come into effect until later on because of inventories on hand. Can the minister say whether that is true, and, if so, what check is made to see that the implement companies do not charge the amount of the tax even though they imported subsequently to the removal? Also, if it does not come into effect at once, will companies which collect the tariff and the war exchange tax on machinery which they imported before the tax was put on be asked to refund that? In other words, if they are to be permitted not to lose the tax on inventories on hand, they should be required to refund the tax which they have collected on inventories which they had on hand before the tax was put on. I just wondered what the situation is in that regard and what is to be done about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) asked a question yesterday which I promised to answer to-morrow. I have the information and I will answer the question now. In regard to complete equipment imported after June 26 of this year the lawful price must be reduced to the full extent of the exchange tax and/or duties removed by the budget. This means that prices of floor stocks of complete equipment are not reduced by law, although undoubtedly the ordinary process of competition will have an influence. Arrangements have been made to tag specially every piece of complete equipment imported prior to June 26. Inventory of complete equipment is not in any event very large since these machines have been on a hand-to-mouth basis for some considerable time after the wartime prices and trade board's rationing procedure.

That is the situation with regard to complete equipment imported after June 26. To summarize, it would appear to me that the situation is that on what they had already imported before June 26 they may include the war exchange tax and duty and charge that in their price, but on what they import after June 26 they cannot. There is to be a separation of the goods.

The hon. gentleman said that at the time the war exchange tax went on, the amount was added to the price of the goods that had already been imported. Is that correct?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes. I know of a case where the article, a tractor, was imported before the war exchange tax went on, and when they sold the tractor they added the war exchange tax to the selling price. Complaint was made about it, and they showed it exactly as the war exchange tax, although they had never paid the tax to the government. The officials of the national revenue department said that they could sell the tractor at any price they wanted at that time. Therefore it would appear that at that time they were able to add the tax to the price of the article. Now, when their inventories are even lower, they are protected against the tax being taken off the price. I suggest that the rule be made to apply both ways, and that where it can be shown that any company charged the tax when it did not actually pay it, the revenue officials of the government should see to it that the tax is refunded to the people who actually paid it.

Mr. ILSLEY: That sounds very fair to me and I made inquiries to-day to find out if that had been the case. Apparently it was not generally the case when the war exchange tax was imposed in 1940. It may have been done in some individual instances. I do not know whether it would be possible to isolate those instances. It was forbidden by the law. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 41 of the statutes of 1939, which became the law on August 7, 1940, he will find this provision:

> No person shall take advantage of the tax imposed by this section to increase the price of goods by an amount greater than is justified by any increase in cost properly arising from such tax or to maintain prices at levels higher than are so justified and, where the wartime prices and trade board reports to the governor in council that, in its opinion, any person has so taken advantage, the governor in council may, upon the recommendation of the said board, for such period of time as he may determine, impose upon all or any of the goods produced, sold or dealt in by such person an excise tax at a rate not to exceed ten per cent of the selling price of such goods, remove or reduce customs duties applicable thereto, fix the prices thereof and take or authorize the said board to take such other measures under the wartime prices and trade board regulations as the said board may recommend.

As I read that, there may be two interpretations. I have not given much thought to the interpretation, but as I read it an importer who had on hand goods on August 7, 1940, and who added to the prices of the stock that he had on hand the amount of the war exchange tax as a part of the price which he had not paid, would be taking advantage of the tax to increase the price of the goods by an amount greater than justified by any increase in price properly arising from such tax. But it is susceptible of another interpretation. It might apply to persons who paid only ten per cent duty and tried to raise the price by fifteen per cent. That may be the meaning, but whatever its meaning

I am informed by the former chairman of the wartime prices and trade board that he can remember no complaints to him about it, and certainly there was no recommendation by the prices board to the governor in council to exercise the punitive powers authorized by the section. I am still talking about complete equipment, complete tractors, for example.

Here is a memorandum I have from the wartime prices and trade board:

We are informed that there was a wide variation in what was done by the industry. Furthermore, the percentage added varied as between individual parts, with the result that the additions made were larger in some cases than in others, but on the whole the overall addition was somewhat lower than was justified. It should be particularly noted that there was a time lag of about two months before the industry adjusted any prices.

I gather that that refers to goods imported on which the war exchange tax was paid. I now come to the treatment of parts. The memorandum says:

That in regard to "parts" brought in either before or after June 26—the lawful price must be reduced after September 30. It will be noted that this provision includes floor stocks so that on October 1 the lawful maximum price of all parts must be reduced.

The reasons for this procedure are as follows:

This is the first time that following a removal of taxes or duties the government has required a reduction in established prices. Heretofore the reduction took place under force of competition. Under the board order it should be noted that we are dealing with legal maximum prices. There is nothing to prevent the operation of the ordinary forces of competition.

I should say at this stage that perhaps the ordinary forces of competition are not working now. If we rely on government action only, we must take action that is practicable.

The next reason is as follows:

It seemed manifestly unfair to force importers and dealers to take a loss on taxes and duties already paid. True, in pre-price ceiling days they might have had the risk of loss, but that is quite different to compelling the loss. When war exchange tax went on in 1940, importers and dealers were not prevented from increasing prices, but section 6 of the War Exchange Conservation Act provided for a penalty tax if undue advantage were taken.

I might interject that I think they were prevented from increasing prices on what they had already imported. The memorandum goes on:

So far as we know, this tax was never imposed so that we must assume that no undue advantage was taken.

The hon. gentleman says that in individual cases undue advantage was taken. It goes on:

In fact, we are informed that there was a wide variation in what was done by the industry. Furthermore, the percentage added varied as between individual parts, with the result that the additions made were larger in some cases than in others, but on the whole the overall addition was somewhat lower than was justified. It should be particularly noted that there was a time lag of about two months before the industry adjusted any prices.

I read that passage before. The memorandum goes on:

There are at least 75,000 to 80,000 parts involved on which new prices have to be worked out. It is a physical impossibility to revise the various price lists in less than the time allowed. It would have been impossible to segregate the parts received after June 26 or to tag all the items so that a two-price system could be established to differentiate those in inventory before and after that date. Moreover, such a two-price system was considered highly inadequate in any event and the decision to reduce the price of all parts on a specific date not only gives the board some chance to police its regulations but also eliminates confusion for the consumer. Under any two-price system enforcement seemed impossible and unscrupulous dealers would take advantage of the situation. As part of the arrangement the industry agrees to absorb any loss on all floor stocks after the specific date.

If in fact we had attempted to compel the industry to reduce prices they could quite properly have asked us to name the specific reduction on each item which would have required an examination of each of the 80,000 items for each company to establish what actual additions took place for the exchange tax in 1940 and duties in earlier years. Any effort to meet the situation by a general order as we attempted to in order No. 419, later cancelled, left us with such a lack of definiteness that enforcement seemed impossible. Moreover, we could scarcely have refused to entertain requests for the payment of subsidies in accordance with general policy.

The stock of parts on hand at June 26 was considered to be much heavier than the quantities which can be imported before September 30 in view of quota allocations. Therefore, it seemed to the benefit of the farmers to get all stocks of parts reduced by September 30 than to continue with the higher price during the entire liquidation period—perhaps years—of the pre-June 26 inventory.

The September 30 date should give small dealers a reasonable opportunity to dispose of inventory. There are over ten thousand of such dealers most of whom simply could not absorb the reduction and subsidies would have had to be paid.

Obviously any farmer is put in the position by our order that by simply withholding his purchases of parts until October 1, he can ensure lower prices.

That is, if he can do so. And the information I have is that most repair work takes place after harvest.

Those are the reasons given for the action taken. The board was confronted with quite a problem with regard to these parts. The old rule about putting on duties and taking off duties was that when you put on duties the person in this country who was stocked up with the article on which the duties were increased got the benefit, and when the duties were taken off the person who was stocked up suffered a loss. Competition made him suffer a loss. Well now, the forces of competition are free to work here, if they will work, and if they have to be supplemented by government order, which we are doing, the government order apparently cannot take effect at once because there is this huge number of items, 80,000 items, the price of every one of which has to be examined and an order made in respect of it. I do not know whether the situation is very satisfactory; it seems to have been the best the board could do with it.

Mr. TUCKER: I wish to say in that regard that I have received a very bitter complaint about the wartime prices and trade board putting out order No. 419, which some implement agencies communicated to their customers and then heard over the radio of its cancellation, leaving them so that they do not know where they are at. The representations I have had complain that the wartime prices and trade board should have realized what they apparently found out later and not have put out an order they could not enforce, thereby causing a lot of loss and confusion. I really think they should have taken more care in this matter than they actually did, and so have avoided this confusion.

Mr. BURTON: In view of the fact that the minister has answered this evening the question I asked this morning, I wish to give him an explanation of the reason why I asked him. I noticed in the press yesterday that September 30 has been set as the date for new prices on repair parts. I wanted to be sure of that before I registered any complaint. Now that we have the assurance from the minister that that is the date which has been set, I wish to make this complaint in the most emphatic way possible. The minister says that the farmer can withhold his purchasing until after September 30, but I tell him and any other hon. members who may be inclined to think that way that it is absolutely impossible for the farmer to wait to buy his repair parts, now that he is getting ready to take off his harvest.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said, if he could.

Mr. BURTON: Well, that is the position. We have been getting along with our old implements, such as they are, and year after year we have been forced to put more and more repairs on our machinery to be able to carry on. This year, with the harvest which is in sight in most parts of western Canada, it is going to take all we can put into our machinery to hold it together to take off the crop, and the fact that September 30 is set as the date when the reduction of prices takes effect means that farmers will not benefit from it in any way, because practically all our repairs will have been taken care of by that time. The quantity of repair parts purchased after September 30 will be very small compared with the amount which will be purchased from now up to that time. As the hon. member for Rosthern remarked, one can see that when this war exchange tax went on there was a certain amount of confusion among dealers. They did not know whether they should or should not take it, and I can quite realize that there were some who took it in good faith at the time. They were more or less left up in the air, and it has been difficult for them to carry on their business. It is not the average implement dealer out in the country from whom the farmers are getting a raw deal. These men are trying to do the best they can for the farmers in supplying machinery and repairs and trying to service the machines they sell to them; and they are constantly in hot water, especially in these times, because the restrictions and the impossibility, in many instances, of getting the repairs as they are needed. The farmer is now placed in a position where he has to wait until another year goes by before he can benefit by the so-called concession. In that connection—

Mr. ILSLEY: May I just interrupt?

Mr. BURTON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the importer wishes to pass on this benefit upon anything he imports now, there is nothing to stop him. Ordinarily we would not have any wartime prices and trade board. When we took a duty or a tax off that is all we did, and the price would come right down. If it works that way this year, well and good. We are not saying that they cannot reduce the price before September 30; we are only saying that we cannot get around to examining and administering this whole thing; it is so complicated, that when we exercise compulsion, the compulsion sets in on September 30. If these fellows who, the hon. gentleman, says are such good fellows, wish to pass this on to the farmer we are not stopping them.

Mr. BURTON: No but I wish to inform the minister that, as I said before, it is not the dealer from whom we are getting the raw deals.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who is it?

Mr. BURTON: In most instances these men are being rooked just as much as the farmers by those who set the price on farm machinery in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who?

Mr. BURTON: That is where the difficulty lies. The committee and the minister should remember that it is not the dealer who sets the price on the implements to the customer.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the case of these imported parts, who is it? I am taking it that the hon. gentleman is talking about imported equipment and parts Who is it that is rooking the farmer? He has used that expression.

Mr. BURTON: The machinery combine is the one that is rooking the farmer and also rooking the implement dealer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us follow that down. The hon. member says that it is the machinery combine. This relates to equipment and parts imported from the United States. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the seller in the United States is rooking the Canadian farmer? Is that what he means? If he does not mean that he must mean the importer or the dealer. Does he mean the importer? Is there competition between importers? Is there such a thing now? If there is the price will come down immediately; if there is not we have to get it down by force as fast as we can.

Mr. HATFIELD: The price is set to the dealer by the machinery companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are talking about imported machinery.

Mr. HATFIELD: Imported machinery.

Mr. BURTON: The minister must surely realize that the importers in this case are the machine companies themselves. They are the ones that set the price to their agents at which they have to sell these machines. The machine companies themselves are the importers and they set the price on these machines. They set the price on the repair parts, and the agent has to watch his step very carefully if he is to get a fair existence out of the commission that he is allowed in many cases. There is where the trouble lies. The local agents by no means whatever set the price on the implements that the farmer buys. If there is any deviation from the price that the local agent charges it has to come out of the little commission that he receives for selling the machine.

I had not intended to take part in a debate on this item, but at the same time apparently this item is the one on which we have been having a general discussion on the reduction in duty on farm machinery. I was surprised that the hon. member who started this discussion took the stand he did on this particular item. As has been mentioned before, this particular item with which we are dealing is giving the benefit of a tariff reduction to the manufacturers of farm machinery in this country. Therefore it is not what might be called a hand-out to the farmer. It is going right back to the manufacturing concerns that he is concerned about, and to the people who are working in those factories.

I had thought that if I were going to say anything on this item the proper thing for me to do at this time would be to make use of the opportunity to express my appreciation to the minister and to the government for the reductions they have made on customs duty on farm machinery. I think they should be assured that we appreciate the action they have taken in that regard; but the one thing that we are concerned about is this. Some of us who were too young to vote at the time well remember the reciprocity campaign of 1911. I was too young to vote at that time, but I took an active interest in the campaign. We thought the world was going to tumble down on our heads when we did not get reciprocity. We still remember what took place in other parts of Canada at the time which prevented us from getting reciprocity. We also remember that later on, in 1919, a low tariff policy was written into the platform of the Liberal party, and that we had to wait all these twenty-five years to get it. Even though we did have to wait twenty-five years; even though our hairs are grey; even though our whiskers are also slightly of the same colour after waiting all these years, we still appreciate the little hand-out we are getting at the present time. When I say "hand-out" I say it advisedly, because while I appreciate and I am certain that the farmers appreciate that it finally has been done, yet at the same time it seems strange to us that we had to wait until the time when the flow of farm machinery was at its lowest ebb. A very small sum is concerned. When the minister read the figures of the amount of importations of farm machinery to-night in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I was surprised that the figures were so low. They are so low that they do not cut much ice one way or the other. The sale of farm machinery in our own country has been low because it has been practically impossible for us to get machines during these years; nevertheless I repeat we are pleased that it has come. What we are concerned about is the fact that although it has come, we farmers have to wait a whole year before we can actually get the benefit of it.

Before taking my seat I should like to say this. When the minister was discussing this matter the hon. member for Melfort asked him a question. The minister made some reference to the dumping duty on butter and compared it with the dumping duty on machinery. I wish to tell him that I am prepared to have our butter placed on the same basis as machinery if the government is prepared to put manufacturers of machinery and importers of machinery on the same basis as producers of butter have been in years gone by. In that time we had to take whatever we could get. We did not have a combine price or an agreed upon price. I am not referring to the present time when a price has been set on butter. I am talking about ordinary times when supply and demand function, when we farmers were not given the opportunity to say what was a fair price for butter in this country. At that time you could not by any stretch of the imagination say that it would be fair to allow butter to be dumped into this country from any other country away below the cost of production. On the other hand there is a combine in the implement industry. They set the price not only in Canada but in the United States. At the time that they are setting the price for their machinery is it right and proper to allow them to use our butter, as one might say, to grease it up a little bit? I think it is a very unfair comparison.

Let us have a voice in the setting of a fair price on the products that we produce on the farms, and then we shall be prepared to talk on equal terms with the others. But when others are allowed to set their prices and then we have to take what is handed to us, it is very unfair. If you say to the manufacturers and importers of farm machinery and other equipment that we need that you have to take the helter-skelter price which is offered for your machinery from time to time, then I say that we shall also be prepared to do the same with butter. When that time comes you can bring it in from any country. But if they are to be allowed to set their price and constantly work it up, then I say that we also must have protection for our butter and other things that we produce. A short time ago I think the minister acknowledged that at the present time this competition does not work, and I agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said I did not know; I thought perhaps that was the case.

Mr. BURTON: I took it that the minister acknowledged the possibility that the competition might not work.

Mr. ILSLEY: Simply owing to the fact that during this time the demand is so much greater than the supply; that is all.

Mr. BURTON: That is what I mean, that under these abnormal conditions competition does not work. But what happened only a few years ago when there was a reduction in duties on farm machinery? We did not have these abnormal conditions then, but instead of competition working to bring down prices, they went up. So that again I say that this combine in the farm machinery industry has both the implement dealers and the farmers by the throat.

Mr. TUCKER: I would ask the minister to give further consideration to the representation he received from the wartime prices and trade board by way of justification for setting September 30 as the date when this change will go into effect. Since the minister read that explanation I have been thinking about the matter, and I suggest that he give careful personal consideration to that point, because it seems to me that three months is more than should be required to bring this change into operation. It is simply giving the implement companies more consideration than I believe they require to comply with the law. It means that for three months they can import and sell these repair parts and make as an additional profit the difference between the ceiling price and the cost less the war exchange tax. They will make that extra profit on all these goods they import during the next three months. It stands to reason there will be heavy importations during that period, and this means that we shall permit these machinery companies to evade the price ceiling law for that period of time. I submit that they should be brought under that law at the most within one month after this change comes into effect. Apparently the wartime prices and trade board originally considered that they could be brought under the law at once, because the order provided that it should come into force on June 26, 1944. I take it that representations have been made by the machinery companies requesting this additional period of three months, and I expect that the wartime prices and trade board has listened to those representations. However, I submit that this is a matter of high policy and that the government should not let the wartime prices and trade board decide such an important matter, which for a whole year will deprive the farmers of the benefits resulting from the removal of this war exchange tax. I urge the minister to give his personal attention to this matter, so that the farmers may have the benefit of this change during the present harvesting season.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will certainly do that. I do not know what it will be possible to do; I got together such information as I could about this situation to-day. Certainly I will bring the hon. gentleman's submission to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board and urge that they go into the matter again. I do not want a position to develop under which importers of machinery will be able to bring it in without paying the war exchange tax and then turn around and add that tax to the price at which they sell it to the farmer. At least if they do that I want it to balance; I do not want them to make money on that transaction. The whole purpose was that this reduction should be passed on, and I so announced in the budget speech. The wartime prices and trade board were directed to work out the matter, and they went at it and tried to work it out by order No. 419. For some reason or another they found that order to be impracticable, as they say, and it was repealed. What I said during the budget speech, at page 4184 of Hansard, was as follows:

> The wartime prices and trade board will however amend its order setting ceiling prices on imported farm implements and repair parts in such a way as to give effect to any decreases in the laid-down cost to importers which will result from the action taken.

That was the undertaking.

Mr. HATFIELD: They have done just the opposite.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that they have. At any rate they contend that they have not.

Mr. HATFIELD: For the information of the minister I may say that repairs imported last week free of duty had the amount of duty added to them when they were purchased by the farmer.

Mr. BENCE: If I understand the situation correctly, the duty is to be removed now; yet as far as the ceiling price is concerned it is not to be reduced until September 30. Surely a substantial amount of repair parts could be brought in during the interval. If that is the fact, who will get the benefit of the reduction? Certainly the farmer will not get it, because the implement companies, like other companies in this country, are trying to boost their ceiling prices now. They are not going to take this dispensation that has been given them by the administration and pass it on to the farmers; they will keep it themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: The contention is that after September 30 in the normal course of events they will have a large stock still on hand which they will have to sell without the war exchange tax being added, although the war exchange tax was paid on the parts imported prior to June 26. I should like to check on that.

Mr. HATFIELD: I do not think that is the case. These United States companies have branches in Canada, and Massey-Harris has branches in both Canada and the United States. A farmer told me that he had his dealer go across the border only last week and bring him back some repair parts. His dealer took up the matter with the head office in Toronto, and was told that he would have to add the duty. This local dealer brought them across the border from Houlton, Maine, to Woodstock, New Brunswick, free of duty, but his head office told him that he would have to add the duty the same as before, so that the price to the farmer included the amount of the duty which had not been paid.

Mr. WRIGHT: I would suggest that the minister give serious consideration to the representations which have been made in this connection. I know that in 1940, when the war exchange tax was imposed upon all goods coming into Canada, there was a fairly heavy inventory of farm repair parts both at the head offices of the companies and on the shelves of the dealers throughout the country, and these inventories have been greatly reduced since that time. If you order any repairs for farm machinery to-day, almost invariably they have to come from the head office; you are unable to get them from your local dealer. So that I believe the minister should check the inventories of 1940 and compare them with the inventories of to-day before accepting the representations made by the machinery companies. I am quite sure that the competition of which he speaks, which under ordinary circumstances might bring down the price, will not operate to-day when there is plenty of money in the country and the implement companies can get the additional ten per cent for repair parts which are badly needed. Repair parts are so scarce that people are prepared to pay almost anything in order to get them. They will pay that extra ten per cent without question if they have to, but I do not see why they should have to. I think the minister is quite right in saying that the benefit which will accrue from the ten per cent reduction should be passed on to the farmers immediately.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not believe we can check the 1940 inventories; I am afraid that is physically impossible. The statement I want to check is this:

> Therefore it seemed to the benefit of the farmer to get all stocks of parts reduced on September 30, than to continue with the higher price during the entire liquidation period—perhaps years—of the pre-June 26 inventory.

That is the reason given for justifying the action taken. That is the statement I wish to check.

Mr. FAIR: Is it possible to set that date ahead thirty days, and make it August 30, instead of September 30?

Mr. ILSLEY: It might be; I shall look into the matter.

Mr. FAIR: If it could be put ahead to July, it would be so much the better. If it is possible to make it July 30 instead of September 30 it would be a great help to the farmers.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. WARD: The hon. member for Rosthern did a much better job of presenting the case in connection with farm implement parts than I could do. I believe he did impress the minister. It is at least anomalous if the wartime prices and trade board can defeat the will of parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has no reason at all for making that statement. The normal thing is not to have any order at all, when an import duty is taken off. There was no wartime prices and trade board before the war. That board is trying to come in to reinforce what would take place naturally and normally. The point that has been raised is that they have not done it effectively enough. But that is not thwarting the will of parliament.

Mr. WARD: The Minister has eloquently endorsed what I was about to say, that parliament has placed in the budget and passed a schedule which provides us with free agricultural implements from outside our boundaries, but that apparently the regulations are not very effective so far as parts are concerned. That is perhaps a condition because of ceiling prices. I would hope that that could be remedied. In my view the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Battle River is a reasonable one, to set the date of coming into effect 30 or 60 days ahead. The government should go into the matter immediately. I think the minister will do the best he can to see that it is made effective at a much earlier date.

I am, Mr. Speaker, going to deal briefly with only one or two matters. I could not help taking note of what the hon. member for Melfort had to say in regard to labour costs on a binder, as disclosed by the special committee which sat in 1936 and 1937. If he will examine the overall figures produced by the auditor he will find that the labour cost of producing a binder in 1937 was eighty-three per cent of the overall cost of the binder. I had that figure corroborated only a few days ago, when I happened to travel from Winnipeg to Ottawa with the auditor who did the work for the committee at that time. He corroborated the figure of eighty-three per cent. I know the figures the hon. member for Melfort will quote, because I have them. My brief on this matter is upstairs, but if the hon. member will analyse the entire overall figures given he will find that it was eighty-three per cent. I would suggest that before my hon. friend goes any farther he might check more closely. If he does so, he will find that my figure is correct.

In order that we may soften the fears of the hon. member for Brantford City that the implement manufacturers in his constituency may be put out of business, I should like to tell a story. This is a true story, one which happened in Toronto within the last six months. A manufacturer in that city who along with his regular business has a contract with the wartime prices and trade board was visited by one of the engineers. Apparently this manufacturer sold his goods within a certain freight zone, one which extended, I believe, about 350 or 400 miles. He said to the engineer, "Do you think I can sell my goods in the city of Quebec?" The engineer said, "Why do you wish to go as far as Quebec?" The engineer had in his pocket a set of callipers, placing one point on Toronto, where it appeared on the map, and drew a circle with a radius of 350 miles around that city. That circle took in about 35,000,000 people in the United States. The engineer said, "Did it ever occur to you that you might explore the possibilities of that market over there?" The manufacturer replied with the question, "Do you think I could sell my goods in the United States.?" "Well," said the engineer, "I would try." "What would you advise me to do," said the manufacturer. "I would advise you to get your No. 1 salesman to go along with you, and go prepared to stay for two or three months and see what happens." That engineer was back in Toronto three months later, when the manufacturer, upon meeting him, said, "Well, I did what you told me. I made my trip to the United States, and I have returned. I could have sold more goods in six weeks over there than I sold in Canada in the past three years."

Does that sound much like the suggestion that Canadian manufacturers would be put out of business by tariff reductions? I do not think so. I do not think the hon. member for Brantford City is fair with his manufacturing friends in Brantford. There never was one vestige of evidence given in this house, during the twenty years I have been here, to prove that Canadian manufacturers could not always and at all times and in every respect compete with the United States. I think we can do a better job, because I think our Canadian people are more ingenious and we have better and cheaper power in Canada and a greater store of natural resources, and of those things required to produce manufactured goods.

My suggestion to the government would be that in the very near future it should move to destroy all trade restrictions between this country and the United States, or any other part of the world. If we hope to give full employment after the war, the only basis upon which we can proceed is that of complete free trade throughout the world. As there has been in connection with the distribution of munitions of war, there must continue to be an exchange between one country and another, without tariff restriction. That is the thing that will put our people to work. I hope the time is not far distant when we may see that happy day in Canada.

I have only one more word, and that is in reference to the effect this tariff reduction will have upon the Canadian agricultural economy. In 1937 I made an extensive trip into the United States, covering many thousands of miles, and I did so for the purpose of drawing a comparison between costs in the United States and Canada of machinery used by farmers. What did I find? I travelled as far as Missouri, passing through seven or eight states, and talking with farmers all along the way. I discussed implement prices not only with farmers but with small dealers in the villages and towns, as I drove along. At that time I found that there was an average difference of about eighteen per cent between the cost of machines in Canada and in the United States. It will be recalled that at that time there was a fifteen per cent duty on farm machinery. There was almost an exact parallel in price levels between Canada and the United States when the 15 per cent duty and excise was added.

What does this mean? It proves beyond doubt that there is an international combine; there can be no doubt about that. I do not think anybody would argue that there is not to-day a water-tight international combine in respect of implement manufacturing. It is all-embracing. It embraces the whole continent, and we must get that point clear. I believe, however, that with this tariff reduction we now have we shall enjoy the whole benefit of the reduction, because I found in the United States that the price of farm machinery there, was, as I say, eighteen per cent below the price in Canada, which would just take care of the fifteeen per cent duty at that time, and a few incidental costs such as freight. I am surprised at the attempt by some members of the opposition to belittle the possibilities in this reduction. I think it holds great possibilities for us, even though there is an international combine. It may materially affect the growth of our cooperatives because I believe this reduction will prove of great value to them. A factory has recently been purchased by the cooperative societies of the United States in which the Canadian wholesale implement cooperative people are interested. If we as farmers can show that we know how to help ourselves we shall be able to prove to what extent this international combine is bleeding the farmers on the north American continent. The United States farmer is being bled along with the Canadian farmer. The United States farmer is suffering with us, in fact I am not so sure that he is not suffering more because his wage costs are higher, his taxes are higher, and many of the things he has to buy are higher. I feel that our Canadian manufacturers will still be able to manufacture in free competition with the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT: There has been considerable argument in connection with certain figures which I quoted, and in fairness to myself I am going to ask permission to place on Hansard the figures that were presented to the select committee of the house by the implement dealers. It is not a long list, but I think in fairness it should be placed on the record.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It can be done only with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. WARD: What is the statement?

Mr. WRIGHT: It is a statement of costs, as presented to the select committee which dealt with prices of agricultural implements. It shows the cost of an 8-foot binder from 1913 down to 1936.

Mr. WARD: I object to these figures being placed on Hansard. If any are to be placed on, they should all be placed on and they are quite bulky. This is just one sheet selected from the over-all costs which I pointed out were eighty-three per cent. This was borne out by the auditor himself. If you are going to put on just one sheet selected from the pile, you will have to put them all on.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has not unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT: It means that I shall have to read these figures, and it will take a considerable time to do so. The hon. member for Dauphin will have to bear the opprobrium with respect to this matter.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member was a member of the committee when it was presented.

Mr. WRIGHT: This is a schedule of manufacturing costs of an 8-foot binder from 1913 down to 1936. In 1913 the materials cost $45.56; labour, $11.97; overhead, $17.96; experimental work, 34 cents.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if the hon. member will not grant unanimous consent to having this placed on the record?

Mr. WARD: The point is that this is only a small part of the actual labour cost of producing a binder. I recall the particular sheet from which the hon. member for Melfort is reading. It covers only the bare cost, it does not include the cost of producing the iron in the rolling mills, producing the timber and all the items that go into a binder.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, it does.

Mr. WARD: That is merely the assembly cost of a binder, and that was made quite clear by the hon. member for Swift Current.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The situation is that the hon. member is going to read the figures, and I should be glad if the committee would agree to let him put them on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. WRIGHT: The statement is as follows:

The above figures are taken from the report of the select committee of the Saskatchewan legislature of 1939, appointed to investigate the cost of farm machinery. Grain prices are taken as cash daily close, at Winnipeg.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the report of the special committee on farm implement prices at page 1233, which is just after page 1230 on which this table appears, I find the following:

It should be noted that only direct labour in the factories is included in labour costs and that these do not include labour in the foundries which manufacture grey and malleable castings. This item of labour cost with foundry material and foundry burden is included in the heading "material".

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Dauphin happened to mention my name. I am quite familiar with the report the hon. member for Melfort spoke about; my memory is quite clear on that point. Before I left to attend the banking and commerce committee he had already mentioned the cost of labour as being a small percentage of the total cost of a binder as referred to in the report of the committee. The hon. member for Dauphin is quite right. It is quite obvious to any one who studies the cost structure of a binder that at least seventy-five to eighty per cent of the cost is made up of labour. This labour is expended in getting out the lumber and processing it, in manufacturing the steel and iron in the smelter, on the railroads in taking the raw material to the implement factories where the various parts are processed into the completed implement. The hon. member for Dauphin is right; at least seventy-five to eighty per cent of the cost of a binder is made up of labour.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think I made it perfectly clear when I put the first figure on the record that it was the factory cost I was quoting. I was not quoting the total labour cost, and that is perfectly clear from my first statement. The hon. member for Dauphin and the hon. member for Wellington South questioned my figures, but I made it perfectly clear that I was simply stating the factory costs. The hon. member for Wellington South did not say that I was misquoting the figures, but he certainly left that impression and therefore I asked to have the table placed on the record.

Mr. McNEVIN: As a member of the committee I fully agree with the statement of the hon. member for Dauphin and the hon. member for Swift Current.

There is one point that has not been mentioned. Fifty per cent of the material entering into the manufacture of a binder in Canada is made up of fabricated pieces which are brought in ready to assemble. As I understand, the hon. member who has just spoken referred to the labour cost in manufacturing a binder. It created a wrong impression, whether he intended to do so or not, I do not suggest that the hon. member set out to misrepresent the situation, but he certainly left a wrong impression.

Mr. WARD: What is to be gained by placing these figures on the record? They tell only one-quarter of the story, so that they tell nothing at all. I cannot understand why the hon. member insists on having them placed on Hansard.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask a question with regard to the importation of farm implements from the United States. The information I have is that Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited have been granted a certain United States quota of farm machinery to be imported into Canada, but I understand that the restrictions of the wartime prices and trade board prohibited this cooperative from importing these goods because they had not been importing them prior to 1940. Have these restrictions been removed?

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as I know they have not. I do not know whether they are prohibited entry. It seems to me that I remember some correspondence about that cooperative. The wartime prices and trade board does not treat cooperatives differently from other businesses in Canada. They are allotted a quota based on their previous business.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This cooperative did not have any imports prior to 1940. The minister has told us that there were difficulties in getting farm implements into Canada. This company was granted a quota to take farm implements from a firm in the United States, but the restrictions of the wartime prices and trade board prohibited the cooperative from getting these implements across into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member right when he says that the United States has granted this firm a quota?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are no restrictions so far as the United States is concerned. The United States will permit the company selling these goods in the United States to export them, but the restrictions of the wartime prices and trade board prohibit their entry into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has to be an equitable distribution. The thing cannot be done in a haphazard way, first come first served, or some people would be put out of business entirely. Persons in business are treated on exactly the same basis, according to the same rules. My recollection is that a great many importers do not like that, but want favoured treatment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The United States firm is manufacturing these implements and is ready to sell them to the cooperative, and if the restrictions were removed this farm machinery could be imported into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the facts of the case are.

Mr. RICKARD: As a farmer I want to congratulate the minister and the government upon taking off the 7½ per cent duty on farm implements as well as the ten per cent war tax. I think it is something that will be beneficial to the farmer. We were importing in 1940 about $30,000,000 of farm implements, and 7½ per cent, plus the ten per cent war exchange tax, amounts to a considerable sum. This year and in the years to come there is no doubt that the farmers will be buying many more implements than they have been in the past. Farmers have had to use implements that are out of date and practically not fit to do the work.

Mr. REID: That is why they have money.

Mr. RICKARD: Perhaps that is one reason. At the same time, if they can buy implements they are certainly going to buy them, and the more they buy the greater will be the production.

I was particularly interested in the remarks made by members of the official opposition with respect to this reduction. The hon. member for Broadview, the hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle were opposing the removal of the duty on farm implements. As long as I have been in this house, I have heard from the official opposition—

Mr. PERLEY: Pardon me, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle did not oppose this reduction. I pointed out the benefits that might be derived from it. I did not oppose it at all.

Mr. RICKARD: I accept the hon. member's statement. But he said that the benefit was very little. We have heard so long from the official opposition that something should be done for the farmer, and now when something is being done for the farmer they oppose it. Were they speaking as individual voices, or were they speaking as the voice of the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why not talk about the member for Brantford City?

Mr. RICKARD: The leader of the Progressive Conservative party is going about telling the people of Canada that we must have freer trade. If the members of the official opposition who have spoken on this item tonight are representing their leader, we must take it that Mr. Bracken is not a free trader but a high protectionist.

Item agreed to.

Items 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409h, 409i, 409j and 409k agreed to.

Customs tariff—409n. Portable engines with boilers, in combination, for farm purposes: horse powers; complete parts of all the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not see small stationary gasoline engines in this list. Are they to come in duty free for farm purposes?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: They ought to be included in the free list.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not agricultural implements.

Mr. WRIGHT: They are certainly used as much as any agricultural implement. They are used for running the fanning mill, for pumping water, for pressure tanks, for milking machines and for many other purposes on the farm. I see that small gasoline engines to be attached to electric lighting equipment are allowed to come in free, but apparently the small stationary gasoline engine which is so commonly used on the farm is not on the free list. It is a very important agricultural implement. It is used extensively on the farm, and certainly it should be on the free list for agricultural purposes. I am not arguing for its free entry for other purposes, but it certainly should enter free when used for agricultural purposes because it is an important implement of production.

Mr. FAIR: It is one of the greatest labour savers on the farm, saving the labour of men and of women too. It is hooked up to several implements on the farm, and I should like to see it included in the free list.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have never been included in the schedules of agricultural implements. The rate of 7½ per cent applied to practically all agricultural implements. The tariffs on engines is an entirely different matter. I would not want to touch this tariff on engines without an exhaustive investigation. You cannot make changes just as simply as that. That is somewhat like the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who wanted us to put on the free list a great range of household machinery. I made it clear in my budget speech that this is not a far-reaching tariff revision at all. I made it clear that we were taking one class of items, the kind of things always regarded as agricultural implements and machinery, which have always included cream separators, but have never included gasoline engines. It would be out of the question to put them on the free list for farmers alone, because there are so many other people who would be entitled to similar treatment.

Mr. PERLEY: I object to the sarcastic way in which the minister has referred to me two or three times to-night and on other occasions. I have been sincere in every suggestion I have made. On this point I wish to say that this stationary gas engine has been handled by all implement dealers in western Canada for a great number of years. I myself was connected with an implement firm twenty years ago; we handled these engines and sold several of them. They were part of our agricultural implement trade. While I was home at Easter I tried to buy one of these engines to put over a well to pump water. The windmill had blown down, and instead of building a new windmill, which we could not get free of duty and could not obtain material for, I bought a new engine and had to pay a very high duty on it. So that I think this is a very important matter. I agree with hon. members to the left that the minister should consider putting this on the free list, because it certainly will help the farmers more than almost anything else one can think of.

Mr. FAIR: If the minister after a thorough investigation objects to putting all stationary engines on the free list, I suggest that he make this concession in respect of engines up to three horsepower, because it is the one to three horse-power type of engine which is generally in use on small farms.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister does bring in gasoline engines for agricultural tractors. He makes a distinction there. I cannot just follow his reasoning in refusing to allow us to bring in small stationary engines used for agricultural purposes, while one can bring in tractors used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Tractors have always been on the free list; these other engines have never been. There are quite a number of small, competent, efficient industries in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific manufacturing gasoline engines; and it would be, as I say, entirely unjust to pick out a class used by farmers alone and make those free, because there are other importers who would be equally entitled to consideration, and I should not like to do a piece of tariff-tinkering like that at this time, without much further investigation than it has been possible to give. That comes within the general range of our tariff policy, which is to try to arrange a reciprocal basis and get world tariffs down. These engines have never been included with agricultural implements. They bear a different rate from that on agricultural implements. It would be impossible in justice to segregate one class of these engines in that way, and I cannot entertain the suggestion.

Mr. TUSTIN: Just before the item carries, in the very next item, 409o, "Equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz.: engine", is the first item that is mentioned; and that would be practically the same thing that these hon. members are talking about, would it not?

Mr. FAIR: The fact that this has never been included in the free list before is no excuse for not including it, because to-day we have people dying who never died before. I think the minister might change his mind with regard to these small gas engines, because certainly they are one of the most necessary farm implements we have at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: This item 409o has always been included in the group known as agricultural machinery and implements. It is true that the rate from the United States has been ten per cent instead of 7½ per cent, but it has always been included in that group and it is limited to farms. It is equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes.

Mr. KNOWLES: What kind of engines are referred to in 409n? Steam engines?

Mr. ILSLEY: They would be steam engines, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: But there too, they are segregated: "for farm purposes."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. WRIGHT: I might point out with reference to 409d, these semi-stationary engines, if they are attached to a combine, are allowed in free.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are part of the combine then, are they not?

Mr. WRIGHT: They are a separate engine which sits on the frame of the combine and drives the combine. They are a stationary gasoline engine; they can take them off and use them for other purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: But they are part of the combine.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the difficulty we over here are experiencing is to understand the minister's objecting to segregate gasoline engines for farm purposes when there is this segregation for farm purposes with respect to two or three other items.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been done for a long time.

Mr. KNOWLES: People are doing things now which they have not done for a long time.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think the C.C.F. are never done.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot open up that gasoline engine item without much more investigation than has been possible so far.

Mr. FAIR: I suggest that the minister sleep on it and give us a little better encouragement to-morrow—give us free gasoline engines.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will not be to-morrow, I can assure my hon. friend.

Mr. BRYCE: There are many of these gasoline engines used in connection with dairying in western Canada. Every dairy farm has one of these gasoline engines, and they will wear them out quicker than any other piece of equipment. Every farmer needs them to-day for cooling milk, for putting water through the cooler. If you want to benefit the farmer by reducing tariffs, bear in mind that this is one article which we have to replace oftener than anything else which we must have.

Mr. WRIGHT: I respectfully suggest that the minister let this item stand until he has given the matter a little more consideration, and he will perhaps change his mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot change my mind on this item of gasoline engines. I have given it much consideration; and the situation is such that I will not, I must say firmly, carve out an additional item on gasoline engines for farm use or for any particular use. Hon. gentlemen are trying to drive me a little too far on this. We have taken the usual list of agricultural implements and have put them on the free list, and I have given the reasons for doing that. Naturally we could spend a long time here in saying that it would be nice to have this free and nice to have that free, and do it here in the house, without reference to the many ramifications which such an action would have. But I certainly cannot take the responsibility of doing so.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the reason for not putting gasoline engines on the free list?

Mr. PERLEY: Half the farmers in western Canada have one.

Mr. WRIGHT: Do not wait another twenty-five years.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRAYDON—FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

On the order of motions:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to rise to a question of privilege. It relates to certain strong protests which have been made recently in parliament, as well as outside, with respect to the right of freedom of speech in the parliament of Canada. I have delayed bringing up this matter in the House of Commons in the expectation that the government leader in the other place, or the member around whom the issue revolved, would introduce the matter on a question of privilege in the other chamber when it reconvened on Tuesday last after having been in adjournment almost continuously since the incident occurred. In view of the fact that the question has not been raised in the other place, however, I am bringing it now before this house since it concerns the rights of members of both branches of parliament. In my opinion the inalienable right of freedom of speech which must be enjoyed by every member of parliament, whether in the other place, the House of Commons or any other deliberative assembly in Canada, should be zealously safeguarded and vigorously defended.

Without making further comment with respect to the matter I am going to ask the Prime Minister, who is not in his place at the moment, in view of the fact that the situation affects both houses of parliament, if he will call into conference with him the leader of the government in the senate so that the matter may be fully reviewed and such steps taken in both houses simultaneously as may be felt necessary to ensure that freedom of speech shall be maintained and preserved.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend has indicated, the Prime Minister is unavoidably absent this morning. I will have what my hon friend has said brought to his attention.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a suggestion only.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am rather at a loss to understand why this statement should be made as a question of privilege. After hearing the statement made by the leader of the opposition, I would think that it might properly come up by way of a motion in the house, rather than as a matter of privilege on the routine proceedings. I am just making that suggestion now, so that both the government and the leader of the opposition may consider it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was hoping that what Your Honour has suggested would be the next step to be taken by the Prime Minister.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

PROVISION OF LIFE INSURANCE FOR VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide life insurance on the life of veterans of the present war, payable to beneficiaries, as defined in the said measure, and upon the conditions thereby provided, or by regulations prescribed.

Moneys received by way of premium to form part of the consolidated revenue fund and payments under the contracts of insurance to be paid out of the said fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: We shall not wait until they are dead to look after the disabled.

Mr. CHURCH: We should have had this four years ago, when the minister opposed it in this house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF ACT—FURTHER PROVISIONS AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act and to provide for the extension of the operation of the said act to certain persons in the public service not presently included therein and to make such further provisions respecting contributions, allowances and benefits as may be deemed necessary for the said purpose and for the better operation or administration of the said act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Speaker.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBLE STOPPAGE OF WORK AT HALIFAX SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what action has been taken by the government to prevent a stoppage of work at the Halifax shipyards owing to a dispute between the industrial workers union there and the Halifax shipyards, and the failure of the company to carry out the recommendations of the conciliation board.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I returned to the city only a short time ago, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend did not give notice of this question. I shall be glad to look into it and give him a reply on Monday.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO REPORTED EVICTIONS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the Prime Minister said he would bring to the attention of the proper minister the question of evictions in Toronto. I would ask if the cabinet has discussed this matter, and what the results of those discussions have been. Also I should like to know when they are going to get started in Toronto in an effort to have wartime houses erected. The situation is desperate, and the summer is rapidly going.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the wartime prices and trade board, or someone on its behalf, has been in touch with the authorities of the city of Toronto and is discussing the matter with them. Those discussions are now going on. That is all I can say about it at this time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask this further question: I should like to learn from the Minister of Munitions and Supply whether any wartime houses are to be built, and if so how soon they are to be started.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): It is my understanding that a certain number of houses, somewhere between one hundred and two hundred, are now under construction, to be completed as rapidly as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: Following what has already been asked in connection with housing, and while I know the Minister of Finance is extremely busy and working under heavy pressure, may I point out to him that we would like to have the new housing legislation brought before parliament as soon as he can find it convenient, with his other duties, to do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I realize the urgency of the measure. We hope to have it ready to lay before the government early next week.

MOBILIZATION ACT

PRESS REPORT WITH REGARD TO DIRECTIVES TO CERTAIN BOARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, bearing upon a press report which quotes a statement made by the registrar of division F, Quebec city, in regard to the enforcement of the mobilization regulations. Summarized, the statement is as follows: that anyone who "willingly and voluntarily", to use the words of the statement——violated the mobilization regulations, the registrar is always ready to study their requests attentively, and spare them trouble if they admit their error.

Furthermore, is that administration—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may lay the foundation for his question, but must not go further than that.

Mr. POULIOT: Smile, smile, smile.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is no smiling matter. It is very difficult to ask a question without epitomizing what has been said. Is it a fact that the minister has given a direction that persons employed in industry or business, even if their work is not essential to the war effort, may be granted postponement? Furthermore, have confidential letters recently been sent out by the minister, or have confidential directives been given to certain mobilization boards, giving those boards the right to depart from the terms of any of the regulations which have been passed?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am well aware of the fact that there is an election going on in one of the provinces at the present time. But let me say to my hon. friend that there is no distinction made in any part of this country as to the application of mobilization regulations. Nor has any secret directive been sent out to any province—even to my hon. friend's province.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes, there was—to the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why is there a difference in interpretation between this government and the government of the province of Quebec? That is what we would like to know.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Get more Tory candidates in Quebec.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, there will be no Liberal candidates after the election is over; don't worry about that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not very often speak in this way, but the fact is that these questions are being asked for purely political reasons and no other.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order—

Mr. HOWE: Order. Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the question is closed. Orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: We cannot be accused of politics; we have no candidates down there. You will not have any, either, after it is over.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Save the deposits you lost in Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGE TO FARMERS UNDER REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he informed by letter or otherwise the premier of Quebec that the farmers were protected under the regulations?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can answer the hon. member for Temiscouata only as I answered the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). There is no difference whatsoever in any province in Canada. The same protection to the agriculture industry is being given to every province in Canada, irrespective of whether it is east or west.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not deny that. But the minister has not answered my question. He may have written the same letter to different premiers. But did he not write to the premier of Quebec stating that farmers were protected under the regulations?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say this, that the protection given to agriculture in this dominion is probably better than in any other country of the united nations.

Mr. GRAYDON: That does not answer it.

Mr. POULIOT: That is not an answer to the question. I asked the minister if he had written that to the premier of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a nigger in the woodpile somewhere.

MOTOR LAUNCHES

USE AS PLEASURE CRAFT—COMPLIANCE WITH SAFETY REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of some urgency which will require the attention of two ministers of the crown. I have received a letter from the clerk and treasurer of an important village and summer resort near Lindsay. My attention is called to these lines in the letter:

We have a 30-foot launch here which runs pleasure trips for guests—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. CHURCH: Well, I gave a copy of the letter to both ministers. It states:

We have a 30-foot launch here which runs pleasure trips for guests . . . carrying 25 to 27 passengers who do not recognize the danger. It is really dangerous and everyone experienced on these waters lives in dread of a bad accident due to overloading.

It has no certificate, and if this is continued there will be an accident some week-end. In the letter my attention is drawn to the fact that this launch carries twenty-seven people from the city I represent. The Minister of Transport has power to stop the sale of gasoline to yachts and other pleasure craft carrying passengers when they have not the certicate or safety aids required by the minister. Surely some action has to be taken. I have sent the complaint to both ministers. I would like to hear from the minister this morning. If the answer is brought down as a return they may all be returned home over a week-end—in their coffins.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have not received the letter, copy of which is said to have been addressed to me. However when I receive it I shall be glad to consult with my colleague the Minister of Transport, and determine if any action is necessary.

WHEAT

FLOOR PRICE FOR ONTARIO WHEAT, 1944-45 CROP

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to make a brief statement of considerable urgency, so far as Ontario wheat farmers are concerned.

I wish to announce that the government has decided to provide a floor price for Ontario wheat during the 1944-45 crop year. The Canadian wheat board has been empowered to purchase in terminal market positions No. 1 grades of Ontario winter wheat at $1.25 per bushel, basis Montreal.

It is the hope of the government that Ontario winter wheat will be purchased by mills at the ceiling price during the present crop year, and that it will not be necessary for the board to purchase wheat in volume in order to guarantee a minimum price of $1.25 per bushel for No. 1 grades, Montreal basis. However, should prices weaken, or should supplies of Ontario wheat offered for sale during the crop year exceed requirements of eastern mills, the board will exercise the special powers granted to it for the present crop year and will maintain minimum prices on the basis of $1.25 per bushel for No. 1 grades, basis Montreal.

In so far as the board becomes a purchaser of Ontario winter wheat in 1944-45 it will do so in respect to standard grades of wheat in store in terminal elevators and will do so as a market stabilization measure. Any loss resulting from board operations in this respect will be a charge upon the treasury.

I wish to point out that this stabilization measure will be operated in the place of an initial advance to producers with participation certificates hitherto provided under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. With the ceiling at $1.26, it is the considered opinion of the government that Ontario winter wheat producers will realize more from the support of the terminal market prices of their wheat than under the system of producer deliveries to the board which was formerly in effect.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Customs tariff—410s. Amalgam safes; automatic ore samplers; automatic feeders; retorts; mercury pumps; non-metallic heating elements; pyrometers; bullion furnaces; amalgam cleaners; and integral parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in mining or metallurgical operations: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the tariff is a most important question. Before the establishment of the foreign exchange control board, the wartime prices and trade board, and various controls in the Department of Munitions and Supply, the tariff was the only obstacle to trade. For a long time all governments imposed the tariff for revenue, but now it is entirely different. Canadian imports have been affected by the tariff changes made by the Bennett government. Our import trade is much less proportionately than it was before. What surprises me is that the same men who acted as advisers to the late Bennett government in tariff matters were kept on by this government after they came into power.

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with item 410s, covering amalgam safes, automatic ore samplers, et cetera. The discussion should be confined to the item before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: We must come down to fundamentals.

The CHAIRMAN: We have had fundamentals for a long time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the hon. gentleman from the west to—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would like to know when item 409o was passed?

Mr. POULIOT: It was not passed.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 409o was passed. I was in the chamber last night when it was passed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The records do not show that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was passed.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard. I know there is some argument as to whether Hansard is a proper record, but it indicates that 409n was agreed to and that is the last entry in Hansard for yesterday. That will be found at page 5179. There is no mention of item 409o.

Mr. GOLDING: I happened to be in the chair when the item was passed at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have it marked as passed.

Mr. GOLDING: It was definitely passed.

Mr. POULIOT: I took my pen and marked a line after "n" and before "o". The discussion was on "n" and not on "o". Two or three times the chairman asked if the item was adopted or not, and finally the committee rose and the item carried but "o" was not called.

Mr. GOLDING: Just before we closed I asked if the item was carried and it was carried.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That was item 409n.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 409o. Hansard is not the record of the House of Commons. We have it here properly recorded and properly signed, "Item 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409h, 409i, 409j, 409k, 409n and 409o."

Mr. POULIOT: You know very well that as a rule all the items are signed in advance.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not reading the items from the resolution; I am reading the scroll.

Mr. STIRLING: May I draw attention to the fact that according to Hansard 409o was not even called.

Mr. GOLDING: The hon. member is right. 409o was not called; we called 409n, but that was definitely carried.

Mr. STIRLING: 409o could not have been carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I move that we revert to 409o.

The CHAIRMAN: Provided that the committee agree; but I must ask the committee to keep the discussion within the ambit of the item before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: With the consent of the committee we will take up 409o and see what can be done about it. This item includes storage batteries, and it is most interesting. I should like to go back to 1935 when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister and show the committee what the duty on storage batteries was at that time. I am interested in this because in many country places where no power is available the farmers rely upon storage batteries for a great many things and they are a little handicapped in their purchases. I will tell the committee what handicaps the rural class of this country.

In 1935 there was a distinction between electric and galvanic batteries, the ordinary storage battery. A change is now being made in the designation of the item. Previously the tariff was most complicated. For electric and galvanic batteries the British preferential tariff was 15 per cent; the most favoured nation, 25 per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent and general, 27½ per cent. Listen to this description of "battery" that is given. The term used was not general, it was specific and it made the thing most complicated. Listen to this:

Batteries, storage electric, composed of plates measuring not less than 11 inches by 14 inches and not less than three-quarters of an inch in thickness, and complete parts thereof: free; 25; 25; 27½.

The rates given are for the British preferential, most favoured nation, intermediate and general. I wonder if that description was put there to protect the manufacturers of storage batteries. All other electric and galvanic batteries were 15, 25, 25 and 27½. There was a distinction made between the two kinds of batteries. That was the tariff that existed in 1935 and it continued until 1940, but now it is being changed. We now have storage batteries under item 409o, which reads:

Equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz: engine, gas tank, generator, storage battery, and switchboard or panel; and complete parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The most favoured nation tariff has disappeared. The explanatory note does not mention what the tariff is now, but according to the information I have it is free, 25, 25 and 27½. The description here is most vague. All the items are put together and it is most difficult to find out what we want in the tariff. We have to refer to a book that is published outside of our government, the "Canadian Almanac" which lists all the tariff items alphabetically. I suppose the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue maintain their own alphabetical indexes, but the members of parliament are not provided with a copy, and when they want information about the tariff they have to go to the excellent compilation made by the "Canadian Almanac". That means, strangely enough, that if we want information on the tariff we have to rely on publications outside of the government unless we wish to go through a whole lot of work. That is one point.

What will be the effect of this reduction on imports? Before the war it was easy for anyone to send $100 or $500 to the United States, or to England or anywhere else, to obtain storage batteries. It is not possible to do that now except with the authorization of the foreign exchange control board. I am all for a reduction in the tariff on this item, but because of the autocracy of the foreign exchange control board it is impossible for the farmers to get any batteries from the United States. They cannot take advantage of this tariff reduction to secure what they need. I remember that a long time ago a committee of this house sat and considered the duties on agricultural implements and brought in a report recommending a decrease in duties, but nothing was done about that unitl now; and now, when it is done, it is to no purpose. That is my complaint. So long as the farmers are handicapped in getting what they need, by the regulations of the foreign exchange control board, it is impossible for them to take advantage of this reduction in the tariff. The same thing applies to exports. It is impossible to export because of the export restrictions. What is the use of the export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce? They cannot do anything. They are under the control of the controllers of the Department of Munitions and Supply and under the wartime prices and trade board. That is the position, and it means that traders are tied up.

Some storage batteries are manufactured in Canada, but it is essential that our farmers have access to an open market in the United States to buy their batteries there because they are not well served by the firms in Toronto, who always serve wholesalers before serving the small dealers in country places. I had to bother the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance a number of times over numerous and justified complaints with respect to the radio service in Témiscouata county. We have a very good service there under an excellent man, but it is impossible for him to get the materials he requires from the manufacturer or from the wholesaler. That is another reason why the matter should be considered in connection with this tariff item which we are now considering. The perfect radio service of Témiscouata should have the opportunity to order as many storage batteries as they need to supply the farmers of my district without going to the manufacturers in Toronto, who do not give them the service to which they are entitled. It is as clear as crystal. The tariff item itself is good, and I do not oppose it. Once more I say that I am opposing the restrictions imposed by the Department of Finance through the foreign exchange control board, which make these tariff provisions perfectly useless.

I have the highest regard for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who I believe is a great collaborator with the Minister of Finance, but the Minister of Finance should not have all this power in his hands through the various organizations which are under his control. How is it that the British preferential tariff has been left for so long at fifteen per cent on electric and galvanic batteries? It was impossible to secure batteries from the United Kingdom and yet this government is the one that is preaching patriotism. They say their heart is with Great Britain, but when it comes down to brass tacks there has been a fifteen per cent tariff for so long on British goods. I have done some research but I did not have the time to examine the whole record between 1940 and 1944. I realize, however, that it was only after a long time that the tariff was changed.

I might give the names of some of the Toronto firms which are most unsatisfactory, and one gentleman who knows all about it is precisely the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, with whom I have dealt regarding these matters. It is impossible to get any satisfaction from these Toronto firms. When one of my constituents sent a Toronto firm an accepted cheque it was returned and the firm did not fill the order. The parliamentary assistant then got in touch with the firm in Toronto, through one of the controllers, and notified them that in all fairness they should serve my constituents in a better way. But what did they get? They got what they wanted drop by drop, only a very small quantity at a time. During all that time the farmers were suffering on account of the stupidity of these people. I am against manufacturers having the power to control the exports of any other manufacturer, or to control the imports of any other manufacturer. So long as the various organizations under the department of finance are not submitted to the control of parliament, we shall get nowhere.

There is another thing I want to say. I am greatly concerned about the way in which tariffs are made. I go back to April 6, 1936, when I made this motion in the house. I quote from Hansard of April 6, 1936, page 1815:

> Mr. Pouliot moved for a copy of the last draft of the Canadian American agreement as it was on October 23, 1935.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am not aware that there is a draft of any Canada-United States agreement dated October 23, 1935. If there is, I think it would be a privileged document and as such could not properly be brought down.
> Mr. Bennett: It has been distinctly stated that there was no such draft.
> Mr. Pouliot: Then nothing was done by the previous administration in that connection.
> Motion dropped.

My point was not so much that the Bennett government, through Mr. Herridge's negotiations with the United States government, had done nothing, but rather that this government took office on October 21, 1935, and the Canada-United States trade agreement was entered into at Washington three weeks after, on November 15. What wizards! Is it possible for any man on earth to make a treaty in three weeks when nothing has been done before? There was no agreement as to any item of the tariff at the time. Now, sir, they are precisely the people who boss the whole show, and it is impossible to criticize them and they are above all of us.

My conclusion is this. The controllers, the wartime prices and trade board, the foreign exchange control board—if these are to subsist any longer, to the detriment of the Canadian people, they should be told definitely by the Minister of Finance that the needs of the Canadian people should be looked after, and merely because a man lives in the country he should not be deprived of the advantages which a man who lives in the city has. Every Canadian citizen has the right to the same facilities and the same comfort, but until now, through the stupidity and greed of the manufacturers of batteries in the cities of Toronto and Montreal, the Canadian farmer has been deprived of storage batteries. Many a time when he asked for a battery he could not get it because it was easier to fill larger orders.

It is a simple matter for the minister to avoid a lot of useless correspondence by giving formal orders, in the first place, to the wartime prices and trade board, and in the second place to the foreign exchange control board, to impose no restriction on the import of such goods. He should also notify the Canadian manufacturers that if they do not serve the country people as they deserve to be served, the foreign exchange control board will allow the Canadian merchants who sell batteries in rural districts to buy all they need from the United States, and give them the right to send money to the United States to buy those batteries.

It is not my desire to handicap the Canadian manufacturer; on the other hand, if the Canadian manufacturer is not serving the Canadian people it is the duty of the government to redress that wrong; and the government must be obeyed, too. It is very easy for them to do that.

Besides that, the Minister of Munitions and Supply should not miss an opportunity to tell the chief of controls—successor to one who was connected for a long time with Barclay's bank and is now one of the numerous heads of the Tory party, namely Harry Borden—that he should do nothing to give privileges to the big dealers in the cities at the expense of the smaller dealers in rural communities. It is easy to do that. If the respective controllers—Donald Gordon, of the wartime prices and trade board, or L. Rasminsky, of the exchange control board, and the rest—do not obey the minister, out they go; the minister can fire them at any time, because, I assume, they are there "during pleasure"

I use the words "during pleasure" because that is the term which is used most of the time in connection with appointments, but it should be interpreted as meaning "during good service". So long as the storage battery man is dealt with in that manner, to serve the few instead of the many, the system cannot work at all, and these organizations should be condemned severely and bitterly. I am sure that all hon. members who represent rural communities agree with me in this matter. I hope they will say so to the minister, and that there will be a change in the near future.

I have been most patient, and to show my good will and my earnestness I will send the whole file with regard to electric storage batteries to the Minister of Finance. I am sorry he does not read French, but most of the letters are written in English and he can learn what the trouble with these people is. The kind of thing I have mentioned will be found, I am sure, in all rural communities from coast to coast.

It is time to recognize the farmer, to give him the same rights as the man who lives in cities. I have nothing to hide in my files; they are an open book; and the minister will see that an injustice has been done to the country people, and has been repeated. I do not ask him to read all the contents of the file; he can hand it to one of his secretaries to report to him on the matter; but I should like him to inform himself of the facts and then act promptly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, with regard to imports from United States of such articles as batteries, the foreign exchange board never denies to importers the funds—

Mr. POULIOT: It is regarding export; nobody can send money except with the authorization of the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the furnishing of money to pay for imports from the United States is never denied. I do not know as a matter of fact whether there has even to be an application for it; it goes on as a matter of course.

With regard to the wartime prices and trade board, the hon. gentleman suggested that that board or the Department of Munitions and Supply were in some way restricting quotas. Now so far as imports are concerned the whole object of the wartime prices and trade board is to secure as generous quotas as possible from the United States, and they have administrative machinery set up for that purpose. They never cut down quotas for protective purposes; they seek to enlarge quotas so as to ensure adequate civilian supply. They are the agency of the government charged with the responsibility for civilian supply.

With regard to adequate domestic supply, that depends upon wartime necessity. If materials and labour are required for war purposes it may be necessary to restrict the amount of materials at least that can go into the production of civilian equipment and civilian supply. That is a matter primarily under the jurisdiction of the war industries control board in the Department of Munitions and Supply; but so far as the agencies in my department are concerned they seek continually to get as large or as nearly adequate amounts for civilian supply as is possible under the circumstances. It is part of the wartime prices and trade board's fight for stabilization of the price level to see that shortages and scarcities do not develop. They have two duties, one in respect of supply and the second in respect of prices and the control of prices, dependent upon their provision of an adequate civilian supply. The hon. gentleman can depend upon it that so far as the agencies in my department are concerned, they will do the best they can to see that civilians are adequately supplied.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the minister one thing, to have the file read by someone whom he relies upon in the first place, and then have it summarized as concisely as possible, so that it may not take too much time to go through it, and then send me a copy of it and I will send it to the minister of munitions.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is quite a lot of trouble, but I will do it.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to direct to the minister a question arising out of certain questions I asked last night at page 5167, with reference to the fixing of quotas by the joint production board, particularly with regard to quotas for export by the United States of farm implements. The minister stated last evening that the amount of exports last year was below the quota—

Mr. ILSLEY: In some lines.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In some lines. I do not know whether the minister actually said that last evening, but he said it was lower in any event, and that this year, in so far as shortage was concerned, there would be an increase accordingly. I would like to know in what lines there was a shortage so that we may be able to understand the degree to which the demand will be filled this year. Will the minister also advise the committee what is being done to allocate necessary metals and materials to farm implement manufacturers in Canada in order to ensure a satisfactory supply of repairs? That is a matter which I think requires very serious consideration. Last year on numerous occasions I heard complaints from farmers that they were unable to secure necessary repairs. Many of them had patriotically disposed of any old machinery they had, having donated it in many cases to the salvage committees, to ensure availability of scrap iron. The result was that they did not have repairs which they ought to have had. Many of them found it almost impossible to carry on. I have before me a copy of Business Week, dealing with what has been done in the United States. In October last, as the minister knows, a very substantial increase in the amount of metal and materials necessary for the production of farm implements was made available to manufacturers of farm implements in that country. The figures are immaterial, but it is indicated in this article that while in 1942 there was a very considerable backlog of available farm machinery still in the storages of the country, by the fall of 1943 that backlog had disappeared and it was found necessary in the United States to increase the allotment in order to assure production. A very serious responsibility rests on the government particularly at this time of the year to make sure well in advance of harvesting operations that repairs will be made available. If they cannot be produced in Canada, what attitude will the government take towards endeavouring to secure them in the United States? The production there of farm implements has gone away up in recent months, and in the nature of things there must be a supply on hand that could be made available to the farmers of Canada, and when it is realized that under the joint production board a joint effort of Canada and the United States is taking place, help should be forthcoming if asked for. Regardless of the extent to which Providence this year is favouring the farmer with the most hopeful harvest in many years, the farmer depends on a supply of repairs to make possible the harvesting of that potential crop. I should like to hear the minister frankly tell the country as a whole what the position is in this regard and what may be expected and hoped for.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would have to get a great deal of information from the wartime prices and trade board before I could answer that question. As I have said, they do the best they can to get civilian supplies. They have done so for years and have been working on this question of agricultural implements trying to see that an adequate supply of implements and parts should be made available to the farmers of Canada. But just what the amounts are and what steps they have taken, just what the prospects are, I cannot tell at the present time without a full report from the wartime prices and trade board. The hon. gentleman can depend upon it that the importance of the situation is fully realized.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I received from the Minister of Trade and Commerce on April 17 last a reply giving the sales of farm machinery and equipment in Canada during the years from 1938 to 1943, and it indicates how serious the farm implement supply situation was in 1943. Whereas in 1941 the amount of farm machinery and equipment sold to farmers in Canada was over $52 million, in 1943, in spite of the fact that there was a greater demand then by reason of increased production, the amount of farm machinery sales had fallen by almost $24 million. I welcome the minister's undertaking that this matter will receive consideration and his assurance that it is being considered, but I again point out that it is a serious situation which will have to be met and I feel sure it could be met by securing the cooperation of members of the joint production board. To-day many farmers feel that the difficulty will be solved in view of these tariff changes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I made it clear that such would not be the case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right, but I impress upon the minister again the necessity of having the wartime prices and trade board face up to this matter, and also having the administrator in charge of farm machinery give it his immediate attention. Last May six types of farm machinery and equipment were removed from the ration list. There should be additional removals at this time, if only for a matter of a few months.

Mr. McNIVEN: The hon. member for Lake Centre has brought to the attention of the minister a very important question, namely that of repair parts for farm equipment. I am quite sure the minister is seized of the importance of the matter; and inasmuch as there is a quota on the importation of repair parts from other countries, and at the same time difficulty in having them made in Canada, I am wondering whether some of the war plants that are not now operating to capacity could be utilized for this purpose. For example, in the city of Regina there is a government owned plant with approximately $3,500,000 worth of up-to-date modern machinery. A year and a half ago this plant employed 1,500 persons. To-day that number has been reduced to 500, and a considerable portion of that very modern equipment is idle. If a shortage of these parts does exist, and it is not possible to obtain them from the usual sources, would the minister bring to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the wartime prices and trade board the possibility of having them manufactured in plants such as I have described?

Mr. WRIGHT: I think the matter raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre is very timely. I know there is a real shortage of repair parts for engines and the suggestion of the hon. member for Regina City might very well be given consideration by the government. It is something rather new to have a suggestion from that source which would put the government into the business of manufacturing agricultural implements, but we are always pleased to hear such suggestions.

Again I wish to raise the question which was under discussion when the committee rose last night; that is, the tariff on stationary gasoline engines. Under item 409o stationary gasoline engines, if attached to an electrical plant, may be brought in free. Under item 409f grain loaders or elevators with a capacity not exceeding forty bushels per minute are now considered to be agricultural implements and may come in duty free, but these implements just cannot work without a gasoline engine attached to them. They are machines for loading grain out of granaries into trucks, or out of trucks into cars or bins, and they must have a gasoline engine attached in order to operate. Twenty-five years ago, when the Liberals first suggested that the tariff be removed from agricultural implements, a stationary gasoline engine may not have been an agricultural implement, but I can assure you that it is to-day. Stationary gasoline engines are used on at least the great majority of farms in Canada, for a variety of purposes. When the minister says he cannot segregate the machines which might be used for agricultural purposes and those used for other purposes, that is not a sound argument, because they are able to segregate other implements, such as tractors. A tractor, which is a gasoline engine on wheels, is allowed in free of duty for agicultural purposes, but must pay duty when brought in for commercial purposes. I believe the minister should give some further consideration to this question. It is really an important item in connection with present-day agricultural operations.

Mr. FAIR: Before the house rose last night the minister suggested that he would give further consideration to changing the date of September 30, and setting it ahead two months. I wonder what effect a good night's sleep has had on that proposal.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not work it out very far in my sleep, but I took the matter up this morning with the wartime prices and trade board and they are giving consideration to it, as I promised they would. I cannot give the committee anything further.

Item agreed to.

Items 431c, 431d and 438j agreed to.

442. Articles which enter into the cost of manufacture of the goods enumerated in tariff items 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409j, 409k, 409o and 439c, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture in their own factories of the goods enumerated in the aforesaid tariff items, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

Provided that goods which are entitled to free entry or to a lower rate of duty than is mentioned in this item shall not be entered at the rates specified in this item: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is to be an amendment to this item consequential upon the placing of agricultural implements upon the free list. The amendment is:

That schedule "A" to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 2 of June 26, 1944, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 442 and 442a, the enumerations and rates of customs duties attached thereto and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

442. Articles and materials which enter into the cost of manufacture of the goods enumerated in tariff items 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409j, 409k, 409o and 439c, when imported for use in the manufacture of the goods enumerated in the aforesaid tariff items, or in the manufacture of parts therefor, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The effect of this is that those importing materials for the manufacture of articles which are made free by these budget changes, may bring in such materials free of duty.

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly.

Mr. HATFIELD: I point out to the minister that some of these articles are not manufactured in Canada. Item 409e covers spraying and dusting machines and fruit and vegetable grading machines. Are they manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is so, the item does not do any harm. I do not know whether they are manufactured here or not. It is possible that something may be included in the list which is not manufactured in Canada; if so, no parts could be imported free for use in their manufacture.

Mr. HATFIELD: In that case the complete machines should be allowed in free of duty.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are.

Mr. HATFIELD: You are not allowing the engines for vegetable grading machines to enter free of duty under this item, are you?

Mr. ILSLEY: Did the hon. gentleman say grading machines?

Mr. HATFIELD: Fruit and vegetable grading and washing and wiping machines. These machines are not manufactured in Canada, and the complete machine is not being allowed in free of duty.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this machine operated by an engine?

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes, by a gasoline or an electric motor. The motors are almost impossible to secure, because they are not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a matter of administration. It is very difficult to draw the line between machines of which the engines are integral parts and those in which they are not. However I do not see what bearing that fact has upon the item now before the committee. If the motor is regarded as separate from the grading machine, then the motor is not covered by item 409e, and the amendment would not admit free of duty the materials and articles entering into the manufacture of the motor if it were made in Canada. But if as a matter of administration the motor is not considered as part of the machine, namely the fruit and vegetable grading, grading, washing and wiping machine, then it is regarded as being covered by item 409e, and the amendment now being proposed covers the material entering into it.

Mr. HATFIELD: 409e covers that machine.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not say the motor is included in every case; it is simply a matter of administration. But if it is not regarded as being included in the item, then the amendment does not affect it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the amount of customs duties collected on the articles entering into the manufacture of farm implements during the years 1941, 1942 and 1943, under this particular heading? These are component parts.

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1942 the imports of castings for agricultural implements were valued at $284,283, and in 1943 at $231,610. In 1942 the imports of other articles for agricultural implements were valued at $2,334,251, and in 1943 at $2,370,658.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And that is subject to 7½ per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: The duty was 5 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item 443b agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to move at this point.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

That the following item, enumeration and rates of duty be added to the list of items included in resolution No. 2, of June 26, 1944, as for insertion in schedule "A" to the customs tariff:

"475d—printing plates, n.o.p., whether for printing or lithographing, and transfers taken from same, and positive and negative films, for use exclusively in the production of books which are included in the curriculum of any university, college or school in Canada, for use as text books or as works of reference, not to include dictionaries: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free."

This is to cheapen somewhat the cost of school books.

Item agreed to.

Items 476b, 476c and 477 agreed to.

Customs tariff—482. Ear-telephone sets and similar appliances, including batteries therefor, and complete parts, for use by deaf persons, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the value of imports of ear-telephone sets and similar appliances, and batteries, last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The imports of parts and batteries for hearing aid devices would probably amount to less than $10,000 in value annually. Imports under tariff item 482 of hearing aid devices amounted to almost $348,000 in 1942 and $469,000 in 1943.

Mr. KNOWLES: A word of appreciation might be expressed at this time for the action the government has taken in connection with hearing aids. Hon. members know that particularly strong representations have been made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Many of us have contacts with people requiring these aids, and we know that previously there has been a good deal of exploitation in connection with them. This will relieve that condition, in part, but I hope the government will also pay heed to the urgings of the hon. member for Kootenay West that the national research council look further into the possibility of producing these aids as cheaply as possible for people who need them.

Item agreed to.

Items 524a, 537, 537a, and 537d agreed to.

Customs tariff—538a. Articles which enter into the cost of the manufacture of binder twine, or twine for harvest binders, and twine for baling farm produce, when imported for such use exclusively by manufacturers who manufacture such twine only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister give information as to the articles entering into the cost of manufacturing binder twine or twine for harvest binders, as shown by the imports in each of the years 1942 and 1943?

Mr. ILSLEY: The information I have is for baling twine, which I suppose would be the same as for binder twine. Baling twine is made from sisal. It is similar to binder twine, and made in the same machine. It is heavier than binder twine, and measures about 225 feet to the pound. It is used in connection with baling hay. About 25,000 pounds of sisal was converted into baling twine this year. This sisal fibre cost about $90,000. Other articles entering into the cost of baling twine are chiefly paper bags and insect repellants. The cost of these materials would not exceed $10,000 in value. A few years ago a new machine was placed on the United States market for baling hay in the windrow. Some of these machines are now being used in Canada. The bales weigh from 40 to 65 pounds and the baler is hauled by a tractor and can be operated by one man. That is interesting information in relation to what the hon. gentleman asked for.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is going the second mile.

Items 540, 542, 542a, 548 and 551 agreed to.

Customs tariff—555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor synthetic textile fibres or filaments, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, but not containing silk nor synthetic textile fibres or filaments, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent; and per pound, intermediate tariff, 32½ cents; general tariff, 35 cents.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that all these changes with respect to fabrics, clothing and clothing materials are simply changes in the wording; as yet there has been no reduction of the duties so far as these different items are concerned? The government has not gone that far yet?

Items 556b, 557, 557a, 557b, 558b, 558d, 558f, 560a, 560c, 561, 561a, 562a, 564, 567a, 616c, 617, 617c, 618, 619a, 654, 688, 691, 692b and 825 agreed to.

Resolutions 3 and 4 agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

73. Fish culture, $198,730.

Mr. NEILL: With the consent of the committee I should like to have leave to revert back to item 71 as I want to bring up a couple of cases. This is not neglect on my part; I could not bring them up before because the minister had promised to have certain investigations made. They have been completed and I would appreciate having the consent of the committee to bring them up now.

The CHAIRMAN: With unanimous consent.

Mr. NEILL: Item 71 covers the building of fishways and clearing of rivers, and I have two items about which I wish to speak briefly. I can put them both on the record at the same time and the minister can answer them together. The first one refers to a fish ladder on the Puntledge river a few miles from the town of Courtenay in British Columbia. This river leads into Comox lake where for many years there was a good run of valuable salmon. This run has practically ceased. The committee will not be interested in the whole history of this matter. It is an unsavoury one so far as certain government officials are concerned. I have a huge file on it, larger than the ordinary volumes of the debates of the house. Unless the minister is prepared to challenge my statements there will be no need to go into it in detail. It did not occur during his time so that he is not responsible in any way.

The case goes back to 1913 when a colliery company wanted to obtain power and put in a dam on the Puntledge river. Sometimes it takes a long time for the government to take action or for the people to stir up the government, but it was finally discovered that this dam was ruining the run of salmon into that lake. Along about 1917 the public agitated about it and continued to do so until I came into the house in 1921. In 1922 the government ordered the company to put in a fish ladder at that point, that being the law. For some reason which I need not go into, the company was allowed to put in the wrong type of fish ladder and it was washed out before long. The government compelled the company to put in another. The same type of fish ladder was put in at the same place and it was washed out again. That happened once, twice, three times. It finally dawned on the officials that perhaps there was something wrong in the procedure. In order to make things quite comfortable and amicable all around they ordered a new type of ladder to be put in, but it was put in the wrong place. It had the additional disadvantage that even though the ladder was there the fish could not use it. The fish could at least get up the former ladders when they were there. But on this occasion, in order to make a gesture of doing something, they put in a different type of ladder which was of no value even for the comparatively short time it was there before it too was washed out. The last washout occurred in December, 1937.

I charged the officials with the responsibility for doing that. By this time I may say that the colliery company, very naturally to my mind, took the position that they had put in the ladder which they did not want to do, that it was of no advantage to them but that that was the law; they had put it in three times and if the government had no more sense than to keep on putting it in in the wrong place and putting in the wrong type, that was up to the government and they would not be responsible any further. I think that was an entirely proper stand for them to take. I maintained at that time, and I have since, that the responsibility was the government's, first, to do it; second, to put in a type that would be practical and, third, to put it in in a place and in a manner where it would stay.

Of course officials of the government will never take the blame for anything if they have done anything wrong. They will go through hell and high water rather than admit that they have made a mistake. They would not take any blame and they offered various excuses to justify the action they had taken. First of all they said that it was working all right, that the fish were getting up. I said it was not, and I brought evidence to show that it was not. After the usual official delay they went to the expense of putting in a net above the fish ladder in order to demonstrate that the fish were getting up; they intended to catch the fish and demonstrate that I was wrong. They did not catch anything, they did not even catch a sucker, or at all events not the sucker they thought they were going to catch.

The next argument was: Yes, that was so, but it was impossible to put in a ladder in that peculiar position to get the fish over the dam, which was eleven feet high at the most. But we have evidence before us of salmon having been taken up the Columbia river at Bonneville falls, a height of sixty feet, without any of these desperate troubles that afflicted them here.

When that was dissipated they got a new idea. The next idea was that it could not be put where common sense would suggest at the end of the dam because that would require blasting and would involve the safety of the dam. That was a childish argument. I have blasted a stump within six feet of the windows of my house without damaging the glass. It requires judicious care, of course. We finally got a couple of first-class engineers and they said that the ladder should be put, not in the middle of the dam where it would be under such pressure that it would not work—and when it did work it was speedily washed out—but at the end of it, and that would need some blasting. That was the advice of two very competent engineers.

The next argument was this. They were determined that the ladder would not be put in and they would not admit that they had made a mistake. That is a trait of human character, I suppose, but it can be pushed to an extent in the official mind. The next argument was that the fish did not go up there anyway, and never had, so what was the use of putting in a ladder? But they put in the first one in 1922. They put in altogether four ladders, and they were all washed out, and now they said there was no need for a ladder at all because the fish had never been up there. I mention that just to illustrate the mental attitude with which I had to contend. The records of the department—I leave it to the minister, although it is not his responsibility—are full of recommendations from the government side by various officials. One man who had a long and established career in such matters said that it was the finest place for spawning fish that he had seen in British Columbia. Yet their argument was that the fish had never gone up there, and therefore there was no need for a ladder.

You can imagine that all these things took time. All these excuses had to be combated. Finally, just about the time that I was hoping for some action, the war broke out and it was put up to me as a patriotic gesture, and as common sense too, that this was not a pressing war emergency and it had better not be gone on with for the present. I accepted that view and did not put on any more pressure. That is how it stands now. But now, if we can credit the morning newspapers, we are getting close to the end of the war. We can now look forward, and it is highly undesirable that we should let this matter stand any longer, for of course the run of the fish is getting smaller and smaller, if indeed it exists at all. Looking to the future I think it would be desirable if the government would give its consent now to putting a sum in the supplementary estimates to meet the expenditure for this work. It would not require a very large sum, five or six thousand dollars, not much more than that. I am shortly leaving politics entirely, but I have been pressing this matter through the years and I would like to see it brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

The other matter that I wish to bring up has to do with this same vote, in connection with the clearing of creeks and rivers. This is a different situation. The government in times past spent over five thousand dollars to allow the salmon to get up the Rosewall creek. Their object, and their sole object in making this expenditure, is to see that the salmon do get up, and they do not care what the consequences are to anyone else who happens to be affected. That is not a reasonable method. They spent five thousand dollars, and most of it was spent in an attack, so to speak, on a big log jam which had come down and settled in a place where there were high banks on each side, and consequently it did not make a lot of difference to anybody except the salmon whether the logs piled up there or not. I forget whether they cut the jam or blasted it. I think they cut a hole or tunnel through this log jam, through which the salmon got up temporarily, at any rate, until other things happened. Cutting the jam had what we call consequential results. Cutting off a piece of the log jam allowed the next freshet to swing the jam around and carry it down a few hundred yards, where the logs all jammed again on a bar, a flat place where there were no high banks as before. The logs jammed on this bar in a low flat place and stayed there, and subsequent logs coming down kept on piling up. The consequence was that the water spread out over this flat land in the neighbourhood and ruined the land. As we all know, delta land is the very best land you can get for farming, and it does not have to be cleared. Settlers had taken up land on both sides of this flat, but the log jam, being stuck there, piled up more and more in the course of the years and in time it got so bad that the creek sometimes disappears into the gravel and comes out lower down, but that is under exceptional circumstances. The result was that water and silt spread over this flat land; the farm land is being ruined, and the usefulness of the river as a salmon spawning ground is also gone. The salmon would get up with the big freshet and lie on the flat ground, and when the freshet went out they were stranded and the young salmon would lie in little holes; they stayed there until the creek dried up, and the fish perished. So that the run of salmon is entirely ruined.

These settlers went to the department which had caused the damage, because it is the department's responsibility. If any department does something with one object in view, and it causes a loss to somebody else, that is the department's responsibility. That has been admitted time and again, although reluctantly, by the department. But they took an attitude in this case that reminds me of Judas Iscariot. After he had taken the step of which he later repented—at any rate he had the merit of having repented, and these officials have not—he went to the priests and gave them back the money, or he wanted to. He said: I have shed innocent blood and I want to return the money. But the priests said: No; what is that to us? See thou to it. That is the attitude taken by the officials. They said to these struggling settlers whose land had been ruined: What is that to us? See thou to it. That attitude is against common law and against common sense and that sense of fairness which should animate any department in such matters.

Mr. McIVOR: That is well quoted and well applied.

Mr. NEILL: Then they say, "Well; all these other things have happened, it is not worth our spending any more money anyhow." They put forth the same specious arguments which I have alluded to in the other matter. First of all they said they never did spend any money. I have a letter to that effect. But it is well known that they spent five thousand dollars, or near that. Then they said it did not do any harm anyhow; this log jam would have done the same thing in any case. No, it would not, because it was jammed between high banks where nothing would have happened, or if it had happened it would have been higher up the creek where it did not matter. But by their action, cutting a hole through or a piece off the edge of the jam, it allowed the whole thing to float down, and it jammed on this flat river basin with the results I have indicated.

Then they tell us that the erosion had nothing to do with them, they were not responsible for erosion, the creek cutting down the bank; and they said it was up to the province or, if it was not up to the province, it was up to the individual, who must suffer from being affected by that disability. But in this particular case it was not an act of Providence or of nature; it was the act of the officials of the fisheries department carrying out their duties in attempting to let the salmon up. The log jam when it stranded diverted the current and caused the erosion. It was this which made the trouble, and therefore the settlers, I maintain, have the right to come to the department to do something about it.

The next argument was that it would cost so much money; it would cost ten thousand dollars, and ten thousand dollars was a lot of money to spend on what some people may think is a two-penny-ha'penny creek. But it will not cost ten thousand dollars. I am going to read a letter from one of the persons concerned who would undertake to remedy the condition for eight hundred or a thousand dollars, and make a good job of it, and would be satisfied to release the government from all claims. I intend to read some letters which explain what damage has been done. Some of the land belongs to a widow woman. She has had five or six acres of her land ruined, worth three or four hundred dollars an acre of any man's money. Land has been either washed away or rendered utterly useless, and I contend that these people are entitled to redress.

I do not want the government to take advantage of the technicalities of the law and say, like the priests of old, "What is that to us?" It is everything to these people; and the government is supposed to exhibit an example of fair play. I would not be a bit afraid, if I or this man had the money, to take this matter into the exchequer court, for I have a pretty good idea of what that court would do, but the man has not any money to spend on an action in the exchequer court, and of course the officials take the view that they can afford to bluff this thing through.

In substantiation of some of the statements which I have made, I am going to read extracts from letters. I have enough here to go on reading for a couple of hours, because this condition has existed for a long time, but I intend to read only a few extracts in confirmation of the statements I have made. If the minister would spend a sum not exceeding $750 probably the man and other parties associated with him would be glad to accept it in settlement. I quote from a letter of a friend of mine who lives nearby and is cognizant of the situation:

> Considerable amount of property has been washed away. This is caused by a huge log jam which has accumulated causing the creek to spread all over the place and cause considerable amount of damage. The gravel below the log jam is piled higher than the banks. This log jam has completely blocked the creek. There is no creek bed; the water seeps away through the gravel. In the spring as the mouth of this creek dried up small pools of water were left full of fish. Thousands of them were trapped and eaten by cranes, crows, gulls, etc. Salmon go up this creek to spawn. As a spawning bed for salmon I feel that the fisheries department should remove this obstruction known as the huge log jam in Rosewall creek.

Here is a letter from one of the parties concerned; his name is Curran:

> I am taking this opportunity to write you again to ask you if you will try and do something at Ottawa to have the mouth of Rosewall cleaned out. If you recollect I took this matter up with you several years ago and you visited my place and saw the condition of this river for yourself. The truth of the matter is all the damage done in Rosewall creek has been caused by the fishery department itself.
> In 1935 the fishery department cut a channel to allow the fish to get past a large jam about a mile and a half upstream from the mouth of the river. The first flood after the channel was cut swung this jam down intact to the mouth of the river where it lodged, backing up the sand and gravel and other log jams which came down there by filling up the river bed and forcing the water to run all over my fields and the land adjoining us.

Here is another letter from him. He says that the officials have been to look at his place —the continued efforts I made brought them to this easily accessible place. It was all part of a "stall". The fisheries department is fuller of "stalls" than a livery stable. He says that the officials have been to his place, and adds:

> I would suggest if possible that you check these reports. I believe their estimates run between three and four thousand dollars to put this creek back to its natural state, and that is probably the reason why the fishery department is sidetracking the issue, on account of the high cost. However, if it is at all possible to get an appropriation of between eight hundred to one thousand dollars I will guarantee to put the creek back to its natural state and make a good job of it and will pay the balance out of my own pocket.

Notice what he asks: he wants it put back to where it was to begin with, its natural state. The fact that it has been a complete failure from the point of view of the salmon getting up is nothing to him, naturally. What he thinks about is that the land for which he paid a high price cannot now be used.

Here is another letter, from the widow, Mrs. Berray. She is addressing my friend:

> Fred Curran, Art Smith, and myself went up to the highway bridge on Rosewall creek and came all the way down the creek and we counted 85 dead salmon down as far as the big log jam. Below that there are thousands that never got past the log jam. When there is a freshet there are holes washed out, from the river overflowing and the salmon get in there and when the rain stops, the creek goes down so fast it leaves them stranded and they die before spawning. I think it is safe to say 80 per cent of the fish does not get up past the log jam. They spawn in the mouth of the creek in tidal water and of course when the freshet is on that spawn surely must wash to sea.

Mr. Tait and McDonald were here on November 11, 1943. They came at five p.m. and said they would be back the following week. We have been home all the time and have seen nothing of them. As far as Mr. Tait saying there is a comparatively new channel scoured out by freshets in the last two years, well the water has to go somewhere and it goes through the woods for a quarter of a mile but there is no clear channel for it to go. The bulk of it is going through Fred Curran's property and I get my share of damage too. It sure has cut a lot of my property away. I dread the spring freshet, when the snow comes down. Last spring the young salmon hatch was washed into my field and the gulls ate them up. Those that lived in the deeper holes, were eaten up by mink, coons and cranes. I was up the creek in August of this last year and there were all kinds of young fish trapped in holes that had gone dry later, and they surely did not survive. You see the Rosewall creek bed is so much higher with gravel piled up by freshets that the water goes under ground for about half a mile. It is an awful mess. Something needs to be done about it. You see the big log jam has no channel cut around and the banks are high there. A fire was in that jam and it let the logs down into the creek bed, the few fish that got by must have got by during the freshet as I was up there before the freshet and there were no fish above the log jam.

That is, most of the fish were destroyed. Here is another letter from the same woman, Mrs. Berray. I have only a few more letters with which I will detain the committee. This is addressed to me:

I am writing you regarding the Rosewall river log jams which have been causing it to flood my land and has done untold damage to my hay field. . . . I have ploughed and seeded all of my cleared land this spring as I have 18 head of cattle and two horses to feed this winter. Unless something is done during the dry season, I am in danger of losing more land and silt and gravel covering up the new seeding. There is already five or six acres of land ruined, some of it gutted out and gravel washed out and covering the rest. There is a big log jam just opposite my field which diverts the water during a freshet, over my field.

Where it jammed, the water is diverted, and where the current used to go peaceably onward it is now diverted across these people's property.

The two fishery officers, Mr. McDonald and Mr. Tait, were here on behalf of the Fisheries department and found that this log jam I mention was causing much damage to my property. On their recommendation that something would be done this summer I went ahead with my ploughing and my seeding. My brother, Mr. Kinkade, wrote you regarding this matter last winter.

[Mr. Neill.]

This woman states that it was "on their recommendation". Of course, it is only her say-so, but according to her statement it was on their recommendation that something should be done during the summer that she went ahead with her ploughing and seeding.

These are only poor people, but let us hear what the officials have to say. Here is a part of the report made by Mr. Tait, the supervisor of fisheries. I will not read the whole of it, but only what I regard as pertinent to the discussion:

The flow is being carried in two channels emptying into tidal water. These channels have been scoured out during the past year or so, but it is not certain that the main channel will continue to develop in that direction. If it does, there is imminent danger that subsequent freshets will further divert the flow across the adjacent cultivated land on the property belonging to Mr. F. J. Curran. This cultivated land is immediately adjacent to, and slightly lower than the new stream bed. This threat, which is real, is naturally causing Mr. Curran much concern.

That is the official's view of the situation. Further on he says:

Mr. Curran now suggests that the original river mouth be restored by scraping out the silt and gravel over most of the length of the silted up area. He states that he would be prepared to complete the job at a cost of $1,000 by utilizing a bulldozer which is available at a logging project nearby.

In looking into the question of flooding and erosion of land owned by Mrs. Mary Berray, I found the main cause to be definitely the overflowing of the well defined banks of Rosewall creek immediately above the bank-wide log jam, about half a mile upstream. This is the jam which was opened by the department in 1940, just sufficiently to permit the passage of salmon. During heavy freshets, the water has evidently been backed up and raised sufficiently to flood over a well defined bank which is from six to ten feet above the stream bed and part of the flow has been directed at a right angle, across a timbered flat, on to Mrs. Berray's cultivated land. Complete removal of this jam would eradicate that difficulty.

In other words, they have admitted that it was through their action that the damage was caused, and this gentleman now admits that the complete removal of the jam would eradicate the difficulty. He continues:

The situation is not good from a fisheries standpoint but it has improved to some extent. If we are to deal with this one local problem entirely from a narrow fisheries angle—

That is, regardless of consequences.

—it would be as well to let nature take its course. The stream will eventually scour into a new well defined outlet to the sea, but in doing so the greater part of the cleared farmland at its mouth will most likely be washed away, or be ruined by erosion and scouring.

Now that is not an ex parte statement at all; it is not my statement but an official's statement. Different reports have been submitted to the minister upon which he is relying, and I have just read from an official statement. Here is another, signed J. McHugh, the resident engineer employed by the fisheries department for many years, a man of outstanding ability in his line, and one whose professional reputation would prevent him from making statements which he did not believe to be accurate. Mr. McHugh says:

> There is no obstruction to the ascent of salmon at the mouth of Rosewall creek but there is quite an extensive jam from 80 to 100 feet long occupying the entire bed of the stream about one-quarter mile upstream, and it would appear an effort should be made to clear a channel around this jam on the south bank.

He goes on to say that even for temporary clearance they should spend $100 in that particular year, which was 1940. In this connection he says that the sum of $100—> —will be required for this temporary clearance which will take care of the salmon run this season. Additional work will in all probability be necessary from year to year on this stream.

That $100 was not spent, and in fact they have done nothing since then except talk. That is the situation. While it is unfortunate that public money should have been spent, I do not blame them in that case. They did what I perhaps would have done if it had been left to me to try to remove the log jam; but instead of tinkering with it I would have seen to it that the whole jam was blasted or burned out. It would all have gone. As it is, what was done was simply a case of being penny-wise, pound-foolish. We are all apt to make mistakes, and it is unfortunate that the ratepayers should have to pay because the government makes a mistake. But are these settlers to be ruined because the department takes this attitude· "What is that to us? See thou to it."

The government, in fairness and decency to these people ought to see to it that, whether or not the present provision will allow the salmon to go up, these people should not suffer in consequence. They are responsible for what has taken place already and they should compensate the settlers or accept the offer that has been made them which I submit has been quite reasonable; because where the government speaks of $4,000 this man says he is willing to do a complete job for $800 or $900. Perhaps a compromise might be decided upon and $750 accepted. The principle that is supposed to animate the ordinary man in dealing with his fellow men should actuate the government in this matter. These people should not be squeezed simply because the government has the whip hand. They can say, "It is just too bad that the best part of the land belonging to these people, the delta land, which is very valuable in that neighbourhood, should be ruined; but what is that to us?" These people, I would point out to the minister, cannot afford to go to the exchequer court, so that if the government does not compensate them they are simply out of luck. So far as the minister's personal record is concerned, he is entirely in the clear, because the responsibility is not his. This is something that happened before his time. Nevertheless I submit these considerations to him and I hope that he will carefully weigh them. I wish to thank the committee for giving me the opportunity to bring the matter to the minister's attention.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): So far as this ladder to which my hon. friend has referred is concerned, it is true that three ladders were built at different times but the work did not give the results which our engineers hoped it would. Recently however, at the request of the member for Comox-Alberni and of others as well, I sent the chief engineer to the district and he made an extensive and complete inquiry into the matter and returned on July 18 with a temporary report. He is advising the building of a fish pass on the side of the dam which will cost about $10,000, and we are accepting the suggestion.

Mr. NEILL: You are going to build the pass in the rock.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. We are going to incur an expenditure of $10,000 in an effort to rehabilitate the fish run to the Comox watershed.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. BERTRAND: As to Rosewall creek, some of the letters which my hon. friend has read would not be very good if produced in court in any claim of this kind against the government because this creek runs through the mountains. Part of this territory has been deprived of timber and the water runs off very fast, carrying a good deal of gravel and silt down the river. It carries a certain number of logs and at times we have to clear the logs. Up to the present, unfortunately, the engineers have reported to the department that the damage to the land is not due to the fact that we cleared logs from the river. It has resulted from the fact that freshets bring down silt and gravel which has accumulated in one place so that to-day the water has to go under the gravel for a distance of about a mile. At all events the report of my engineers is not a complete report. All we could do would be to contribute a reasonable amount for the rehabilitation of the creek as far as the fisheries are concerned. We would be abusing our right if we should pay for any damage resulting from the gravel that has been brought down by the freshets. I am quite sure if the hon. member went to the provincial government, under whose jurisdiction this matter comes, he would be able to get something, not for the rehabilitation of the creek in regard to the run of fish but in regard to seeing that in future these freshets do not deposit so much gravel on the borders of this creek.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with keen interest to the remarks of the minister with respect to these two subjects, namely the Puntledge river fish ladder, and the condition at Rosewall creek.

I wish to thank the minister most sincerely for the attitude he has taken with respect to the Puntledge river fish ladder. I was particularly glad to hear him say that the ladder would be cut out of rock at the end of the dam, instead of being stuck up against the dam itself, where it would be just an invitation to be washed out. Cutting it in its proper place, out of the rock at the end, will ensure its permanence, and there will be no more trouble about it going out again. In gratitude for the minister's action I would use my best endeavours to see that it is locally known as the Bertrand fish ladder, and that it be made a permanent tribute to the manner in which he has dealt with the matter, using businesslike and common-sense judgment, and thereby ending a twenty-five-year dispute, through taking action which will lead to the permanent benefit of the fishing industry—an important one in that part of the country. Not only will it benefit the commercial industry, but, as I stated previously, it will add to the sport fishing; because this ladder will also be of advantage to those who indulge in sport fishing.

To come to the other matter of Rosewall creek, I must say that the minister's attitude in this connection is less favourable. No doubt he takes the attitude presented to him by his officials, that the whole trouble is the result of erosion by nature, and so on. But if I did not do it sufficiently before, I should like to emphasize now that is not so. True, the initial trouble began with an act of nature. Logs jammed, and debris caught in a narrow passage and formed what is known as a log jam. But the point I wish to emphasize to the minister is that it was a jam which was contained, as one might say, between two steep walls. There was a wall of earth or rock on both sides, to quite a considerable height. Consequently that jammed with logs. It did not do any harm, except that it prevented fish from getting through, and in time would have done damage upstream. But it would not do any harm down below where later the ground was flooded. It was partly cutting that jam out that made all the trouble.

The first government officials—and probably I would have done the same thing—did the work in the easiest way. They cut a narrow channel through the logs jammed. Whether they did it in the middle or at the side does not matter. But the result was that while they let the fish up, the logs jammed in such a position that the next freshet which came down turned it around and floated it, not in a narrow passage, not in a gully, but on to a wide flat, where there was nothing to restrain it on either side. It grounded on a gravel bar and stayed there. The gravel silted up behind it, with logs and debris and sand and gravel, and it was that that caused the trouble. I wish to start from that premise, and make it clear that that was the original source of the trouble. Had it been left alone, the flooding of these people's grounds would not have happened, because whatever further damming up might have occurred would have been on the upper side of the log jam.

Now the minister says that I should approach the provincial government and see if they would not undertake to remove this gravel. There are three good reasons against that. The first is that the province is not responsible. The second is that the provincial government knows it is not responsible, and the third is that I have already tried to do that and failed. I have tried, as I say, to get them to take action, but they know the law just as well as I do.

It is not the responsibility of the province. The province will take no responsibility, even for erosion. If a river comes down, eats into a bank, and part of a man's farm falls into the river, they will not take the responsibility. That is the law. But if the action of the river threatens to endanger a road or a bridge, the province will then take the necessary steps. There is of course what the lawyers would call the common law which prevails, that if you take a certain action you are responsible for any damage arising from that action. The province very clearly states that as the dominion caused the trouble by taking away a piece of this log jam, instead of taking it all, it is up to the dominion government to take the necessary remedial steps.

If the minister would use his influence with the Minister of Justice to relieve me of responsibility I would feel willing to go into it, after my enforced retirement from the house, and take this man's case up to the exchequer court. But the law of champerty interferes with that.

I can just visualize what will happen. There are thirty-six acres involved. The thirty-six acres are not gone yet, but six acres are gone. The obvious result would be thirty-six acres at $300 an acre—$10,800, or about $11,000, for good will. Would it not be better for the dominion, even from a mercenary viewpoint, let alone the interests of justice and fair play to pay this man, if he is willing to take $750? He will put it into a condition that will satisfy him, and relieve the government of any responsibility further in the matter. Would it not be better to do that than to drag along the weary course of an exchequer court action, and probably get soaked for $10,000 or $11,000? —because the evidence is conclusive. I will not say it is damning, but it is final and conclusive, as disclosed by the information I have here. Even the government's own officials have admitted that they have done this, and they have admitted that the results are so-and-so. And these are admissions made by officials of his opponent, so to speak.

Scripture says, Agree with thine adversary quickly while he is in the way lest he turn and rend thee? Would it not be better to give these people this meagre portion of their rights, or remove the trouble, than that the department should get stuck with litigation and perhaps have a $10,000 verdict rendered? I do not appeal to the minister in that form, because I think he is a man who would rise superior to doing things in the cheapest way. That might appeal to some of his officials. I appeal rather to the minister's sense of fair play, which I have seen exercised in several instances since he has held office in his department.

The government is morally—I think legally, but we will drop that—the government is morally responsible for the damage. It is a continuing damage which will go on and on until the whole of this flat land disappears. I submit it will be only fair and just either to do the work themselves, or to accept the offer this man makes. I cannot do more than I have done to appeal to the minister along these lines. I do hope he will take that sort of view I would expect fom a man who has shown his ability and fair-mindedness in the office he has occupied.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I believe I said everything I have to say before the hon. member spoke. As I told my hon. friend a few minutes ago, the chief engineer is just back from the west after making a study of this question as well as other matters. I have not seen him as yet. He had to go down east, he went out west, he came back here and now he is away for a few days. I will see him and get a verbal report, and if there is anything we can do legally or equitably it will be done.

Mr. REID: When the fisheries estimates were last before the committee the discussion centred more upon the fisheries in the maritimes than upon those on the Pacific coast, but this afternoon we are dealing with the Pacific coast fisheries. As the minister knows, but as perhaps many hon. members are not aware, fishing conditions on the Pacific coast are quite different to those in the maritimes. I have one or two matters I should like to bring up, although I do not know whether they come under this item 73 dealing with fish culture.

I refer first of all to the depleted condition of the cod fishing grounds on the Pacific coast. I have before me an article which appeared in the Commercial Fisherman's Weekly and which perhaps explains the matter much better than I could do it. This article reports an interview with Clarence L. Musclow, a cod fisherman of fifteen years' standing. I quote:

"The fishery in the lower gulf is all but ruined," Musclow, in Vancouver last week preparing for his sixteenth cod fishing season, stated. "Even on the grounds which have not been fished by the regular cod fishermen, stocks are killed off. Places which in earlier days were good for 2-3,000 pounds of cod, now yield nothing. Excellent fishing locations adjacent to the international boundary produce only one-half of the quantity taken formerly.

"Even the outside grounds, as off the Vancouver island west coast, are depleted," Musclow continued. "At Swiftsure, fishermen were once knee-deep in lingcod and moved off to get rid of them. The same story is heard closer inshore."

Fishing practices in the past are largely blamed by Musclow for the present condition whilst at the same time he deplores the lack of scientific facts concerning the cod fishery and the slowness of current investigations.

He goes on at considerable length, but I shall not take up the time of the committee to read the entire article. I believe the statements which he makes should be considered seriously by the minister and his departmental officials. The following article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun may interest hon. members. I shall read only a part, as follows:

Years before the war, the cod fishermen supposedly operated on three cents per pound. The Japs virtually controlled the cod fishing industry, and 90 per cent of their membership lived on rice, fish, seaweed and Jap sauce, and assiduously sent their money back to their homeland to help build the military and naval equipment that raided Pearl Harbor, Singapore, et cetera.

When these proteges of the three cents per pound fishing operatives were liquidated from the industry a few years ago and the Canadian fishermen finally inherited their own fishing grounds, they found the local codfish grounds 75 to 90 per cent depleted. Whereas the Jap could go out and catch from 500 to 1,500 pounds of cod in a day, the cod fisherman is lucky now to average 100 to 150 pounds per day.

I can vouch for those statements, because I remember when many years ago I first went to live on the gulf islands between Victoria and Vancouver anyone could go into any of the bays and get sufficient cod for the needs of his entire family. It was not long before the Japanese started fishing in those bays, and within three years there was not a cod fish left. They fished day and night until the cod fisheries were entirely ruined. The complaint is being brought up to date by this article which appeared under the name of Musclow. Because of this article and other representations which have been made to me I bring the matter to the attention of the minister and ask him to have a complete investigation made into the depletion of the cod fisheries on the Pacific coast.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): For the last several years the fisheries research board has been making an extensive study of the lingcod question and they are still proceeding with their investigations. Just recently the regulations were changed in connection with the lingcod. First, we stipulated a minimum size. Second, we prohibited the use of trawl nets in certain areas where the lingcod seems to be scarce. Third, we are stopping the issue of licences for sunken nets to catch dogfish because while they catch dogfish they also catch quite a lot of lingcod. The cod is one of the most edible fishes we have on the west coast and we hope to be able to reestablish these fisheries as they were before depletion.

Mr. NEILL: On September 11, 1942, the government passed an order in council providing that finnan haddie will mean a combination of smoked haddock, smoked cod, smoked hake and smoked pollock. This was to amend the regulations dealing with canned fish. It reminds me of the man who advertised, I think it was in Paris, that he had for sale a combination of horse and rabbit. When he was asked what that indicated, whether it was fifty per cent horse and fifty per cent rabbit he said, "Yes, it is made up of one horse and one rabbit." Smoked finnan haddie has been known throughout the world for as far back as we can remember, and it has a certain reputation of its own. I am speaking only of the canned product, not what is sold in the salted form. That is another story by itself, which I will not go into. I wrote to the government protesting about this matter. I would not have brought this up now because I got my answer and I did not see what more could be done about it. However, since then the trade discovered that my protest was absolutely justified.

My protest was that it was not reasonable or fair, either to the consumer, to the fisherman or to the in-between man, to say that smoked finnan haddie meant something different from what the name implied. The government was saying that it could be smoked cod, smoked hake and smoked pollock. As a rule those fish are inferior to the well known finnan haddie. I asked the government about it and the answer I got was along these lines, that the Meat and Canned Foods Act governs the labelling of canned fish and requires that a true and correct description of the contents of the cans be shown on the labels. It goes on to say:

> In view of representations that the pack of canned "finnan haddies" could be considerably increased to meet the existing demand if permission were granted to include smoked haddock, smoked cod, smoked hake and smoked pollock in the canned product known as "finnan haddies", approval was secured for the definition referred to in order in council P.C. 8167.

So that when the housewife goes to buy what she thinks is finnan haddie and used to have confidence that she was getting smoked haddie, she may be getting smoked pollock, or ninety per cent, or eighty per cent, or thirty per cent smoked pollock, or a combination of smoked pollock, smoked cod, smoked hake and these other fish. Smoked pollock is an inferior fish. I forsaw the result and it has come to pass. The general public thought that they were being fooled. They would go to the store and buy what they thought was smoked finnan haddie and find when they opened the can that it was eighty per cent hake or pollock, and they would not go back and buy any more. Naturally it has hurt the popular demand, because once people are deceived they will not buy again. Pork and beans is a well-known product, but if you put out tins marked "pork and beans" and they contained beef and carrots, where would the demand for pork and beans be? There are people who like pork and beans, but when they buy what they think is pork and beans and find that the can contains other things than pork and beans, the demand drops off.

That is what has happened with finnan haddie. The demand for it by those who like to eat finnan haddie has dropped off. Some people call this combination which they bought, thinking it was finnan haddie, "cat food." It is an insult to the Scotch origin of finnan haddie to suggest that anything connected with finnan haddie is cat food. The result will be that after the war the demand for canned finnan haddie will drop off.

I cannot understand why a government which says that the Meat and Canned Foods Act requires that a true and correct description of the contents of the cans be shown on the labels allows this to be done. Is the description on the can a true and correct description? No, it is not. When you buy canned finnan haddie nowadays you are buying a sort of grab bag proposition. You may get what you think you are getting, and you may not. You may be getting some inferior fish, less or more of it, as the case may be. I suggest that the minister should look into this and see if it is not too late to put the thing back in its original form. If people want to buy smoked pollock, by all means let them do it, but do not allow smoked pollock to be called something else. Do not let people call a horse a rabbit when it is not.

I was so hopeless of getting any action when I first took this up that I dropped the matter, but I have heard through business channels the demand for so-called finnan haddie is dropping. I wish the minister would give the committee the assurance that he would look into this matter. He does not need to take my word; let him go to those who are engaged in the business. The housewife thinks she is getting canned finnan haddie, and when she finds that it is not finnan haddie at all but smoked pollock or smoked hake or a combination of these other fishes, she feeds it to the cat. The cat may also get fussy after a while and it too may object.

Mr. REID: The minister may remember that a great many fishing vessels were taken out of the fishing industry in British Columbia by the military authorities, army, navy or air. Complaint has been made about the depletion of the fishing fleet in many districts. How many boats have been returned to the industry in the last year or two, and how many new ones have been built?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There have been about fifty boats returned, some of them very recently.

As to haddie, chicken haddie is a trade name which is used to represent flaked fish. I may say that we are allowing what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni calls cat food to be called chicken haddie at the request of the trade. I understand that they are pleased with their new product and that it is selling very well. If we ever learned that it was hurting the trade, we would repeal the order, but the information we have up to now is in favour of keeping this product on the market.

Mr. NEILL: I was afraid that the minister would take that up wrongly. I was not talking about chicken haddie at all. Chicken haddie, as the minister says, is a trade name. I wrote to the minister some time ago and I see that I said in my letter:

> Chicken haddie means canned haddock or cod or hake or cusk, or any combination of the above.

Chicken haddie is an entirely different product. I was not talking about chicken haddie at all to-day. Chicken haddie is a trade name, just like chicken halibut is. Chicken halibut means halibut, not of an inferior grade, but below a certain size. Inasmuch as it is a trade name, you cannot take any exception to it. If a firm adopts a trade name you know what you are buying, and you get the thing described on the can. But this is a different order in council passed at a different time. It says:

> Not chicken haddies.
> "Finnan haddies" means a combination of smoked haddock, smoked cod, smoked hake and smoked pollock.

The contents are not the same at all because chicken haddie means a combination of haddock, cod and hake, or cusk. I do not know just what cusk is. I was not quarrelling over chicken haddie at all because that is a trade name and you know exactly what you are buying. But when you buy what is supposed to be canned finnan haddie you are getting something that is not finnan haddie. It is a deception of the public and ultimately will be ruinous to the trade because people will discover that they are being deceived and will not buy it again. It is unloading something on the purchaser which is not what it pretends to be. It may be all pollock, or haddock, or hake, or a combination of them. There is no guarantee as to what percentage of finnan haddie you will get, and it will ruin the trade eventually for canned finnan haddie.

Item agreed to.

75. Fisheries Research Board of Canada, $280,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I want to compliment the minister on his administration of the fisheries on the Pacific coast. I should like to ask to what extent the salmon fisheries in the Skeena and around the Queen Charlotte islands have been reestablished. I know that the department did some research there last year. What have been the results?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The increase this year, as hon. members may see, is $42,000. The break-up of this amount is as follows: $25,000 for the Skeena river sockeye salmon investigation. The research board is making an investigation in the Skeena river and tributaries, and the biologists with the party are now at these waters studying the reason why there is such a depletion of sockeye. We hope to be able to restore the sockeye catch to what it was previously. I am told by the scientists that the reduction may be due partly to the great number of rainbow trout in the lakes. Last summer a party went to Babine lake to examine the situation and caught a number of rainbow trout. They ran up to fifteen pounds apiece, and quite a number of small salmon, running up to fifty, were found in the stomachs of every one of them. As the numbers of these trout have increased greatly in recent years it may be necessary to have some of them removed, but the report has not yet reached my department. The fisheries research board is studying very seriously the question, and we hope to be able to restore the sockeye fisheries of the Skeena river.

We are spending $10,000 on the prairie provinces fisheries investigation. An investigation is going on concerning the tullibee and the whitefish. We have in mind the establishment of a biological station for the prairie provinces. A chief biologist has been appointed; his name is Doctor Doan; and two parties are at these waters to-day studying the question.

There are a certain number of problems which are very difficult to handle, but we hope very much to be able to give great assistance to the fishermen in regard to these valuable fisheries. I would not like to say too much on this matter because it might not be good for the trade.

We are to spend $3,000 more on the investigation of the Irish Moss gel and carry on additional scallop, crab and lobster investigation; and $2,000 on the development of new inspection methods and fish plant sanitation; and $2,000 to provide for annual increases.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Can the minister state whether any investigation is being made concerning the pink salmon?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am informed that, though no investigation is going on now, for ten years there has been an investigation concerning the pink salmon. We have had reports following these investigations but we have been unable to find any easy way whereby the supply of fish can be restored when it is depleted. It is a big job, not similar to an agricultural problem. Sometimes it takes years of research before it is possible to find the reason why fish are taking to some other areas.

Mr. REID: I should like to add my word to that of the hon. member for Skeena regarding the need for further investigations as to pink salmon. I was wondering whether the fisheries research board has ever come to a final conclusion regarding any of their investigations. A large sum of money is voted by parliament every year, but very little interest is taken in the house in what is being done by them. I know that there has been some investigation with regard to the pink salmon. The fact of the matter is that the runs of pink salmon are growing less and are getting to a low level alarming to the fishermen. The fisheries research board has made investigation in regard to this one variety, but have they come to any final conclusion or made any definite recommendations? I should also like to know whether they have come to any conclusion on any of the investigations which they have made on other varieties of salmon or fish.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The trouble is that the pink salmon is a run that occurs every other year in the Queen Charlotte islands. One year they are plentiful, the next year they are not. We have gathered a certain amount of data which is valuable, but we have not been able as yet to restore the odd year deficiency, and we cannot say that a definite conclusion has been arrived at, because we do not know and we have found as yet no reasons why they do not come in the odd years.

Mr. REID: Have they made any investigation about the dogfish carcasses? It has got to a point on the Pacific coast that hundreds of tons of dogfish are being dumped without anything being done with the carcasses. They take the livers out of dogfish for vitamins. Somewhere around three hundred boats, mostly from the United States, are fishing off the west coast of Vancouver Island, and so great has the menace become by the dumping of hundreds of tons of dogfish carcasses on the beaches that the fisheries are being ruined. Have the fisheries research board or the department looked into this matter? It has alarmed the fishermen out there. One writer says:

At a time when federal authorities have asked every Canadian citizen to do his utmost to conserve all fats and oils; when the nation's increased meat and poultry supply programme has been endangered through mineral and protein supplement shortage, the loss of millions of pounds of fish meal by throwing overboard dogfish carcasses from which the livers only have been taken, is inexcusable.

Canadian fishermen and reduction plant men are incensed over the great loss. They reckon that in 1943 almost thirty-six million pounds of dogfish went to sea bottom or were dumped on the beaches. It is true that this fish is not eaten by human beings in this country, but surely some value can be found for it, and I have been wondering whether any investigation has been made by the fisheries research board as to the real value of the dogfish.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to say a word on that. I can recall, and no doubt the hon. member for New Westminster can too, when dogfish were the most unpopular things in God's world; anything that could be done to get rid of them was welcomed, because they are horribly destructive of nets, they go through the salmon nets and they will eat salmon too. But suddenly it was discovered during the war that their livers had a value for their oil content, and as the hon. member says there has been a large development of that trade. I am afraid the condition of which he complains is one of those things which cannot be helped. He talks of the carcasses being dumped on the beaches. I would imagine that that would be due, not to their being dumped there but to their having come ashore there, because a man goes out fishing in a comparatively small boat, and when he catches a dogfish he cuts the liver out of it and puts it in a tin and throws the carcass over then and there, and probably it would be eaten by other dogfish, because they are cannibals. But the carcasses which the hon. member says are found on the beaches presumably float there. The fishermen's boats hold only two or three tons each, and to take two or three tons of dogfish to the beach and cut them open there would be a waste of time and space. What they do is cut the liver out then and there when the dogfish is caught. It has been suggested that instead of doing so they should be compelled to take every carcass home. The result would be that the amount of dogfish one man could catch in a day would probably be limited to a ton and a half to two tons, and he would have to go quite a long way to a reduction plant which would take the carcasses, and all the fisherman would get would be three or four dollars a ton. In the old days when times were bad they used to catch them—I know the Japs did—and sell them to the reduction plants in the winter time. But it was very arduous work and they got only a small wage. They were glad to abandon that work because it proved more profitable to take out the livers, the flesh not being worth anything.

It can be readily understood, of course, that fish that feed on dead bodies would not be palatable, so that flesh would have no market value except for fish meal. Nowadays we have developed a system of catching pilchards, which come in great numbers and which can be more readily, and I might add, more agreeably caught, since it does not involve the same hardships. They are taken to the reduction plants. So that the demand for dogfish would be small indeed and it would not pay to catch them, and the regulation would be most prohibitive if they were compelled to take the carcasses in because the only place where they could be sold would be at reduction plants scattered far and wide, so that they might have to go a hundred miles and more to get to a plant. It would not pay them. It would kill the industry. The liver contents are badly needed, but nothing can be done in the meantime. I think there would be a greater gain from the money obtained from the liver as against the loss of the body, which is of no edible value.

Mr. REID: There is another aspect of the matter I overlooked. On the one hand you have five or six million pounds of fish meat, and on the other you have five or six million pounds of dead fish which, the fishermen say, destroys the fishing ground. It is said on good authority that within two hours of the dogfish carcasses being dumped into a bay, the live dogfish and the cod leave the bay entirely. That is something for the fisheries research board to look into. They might ascertain whether the dumping of dogfish into a bay does result in driving out from the fishing beds the other dogfish and codfish.

Mr. BRYCE: I congratulate the ministry of fisheries on its intention to set up a research station in Manitoba. This will greatly benefit the northern lakes of that province. The minister knows quite well the difficulties we have had there, catching fish and sending them to the United States boundary only to find that the fish were not acceptable there, so that they became a dead loss. I am quite sure that the establishment of this research station will overcome that difficulty and will get to the bottom of the grievance that exists in the northern lakes. I think the minister knows what I am referring to, and I do not wish to give it more publicity than is necessary. I would point out to him an ideal situation for this research station. At the mouth of the Red river there is the town of Selkirk, which is an ideal station, because we have cheap electric power, a great deal of water and accommodation for employees that are likely to be engaged there, and it is adjacent to the capital of Manitoba. There is good service by bus and there is a good pavement. There are quite a few fish-packing concerns there which could work in with a research station.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. member like Winnipeg goldeye?

Mr. BRYCE: If the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech I am quite prepared to sit down. I am not in a hurry; I can wait until later.

Mr. MARTIN: I was asking the hon. member facetiously if he liked Winnipeg goldeye.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sorry; I apologize to the hon. gentleman. Lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba are the largest lakes out there and are quite close to Selkirk. There are also facilities for working on samples in a laboratory there. I hope that the minister will remember Selkirk when he is establishing that station.

Mr. FULFORD: There is a persistent rumour that Atlantic salmon are being planted in the tributary waters of lake Ontario and in the upper regions of the St. Lawrence. Is that simply a rumour or is there truth in it?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): First, in reply to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), I may say that we have not decided yet where the biological station will be, but we are looking into all these matters and the station will certainly be placed advantageously as recommended. I understand that it is important that the processors, the fishermen and the fish should be able to meet at the same place for the purposes of the biological station.

As regards the question asked by the hon. member for Leeds, the department has nothing to do with the planting of salmon in lake Ontario. I know that one of the provinces, I am not sure whether Ontario or Quebec, has had articles in the newspapers to the effect that they would try to plant Atlantic salmon along the St. Lawrence. Years ago salmon were plentiful in most of the rivers tributary to the St. Lawrence up to Lachine rapids, but to-day they have disappeared. I know it is being done, but not by my department.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the department any publications on research that has been done into fish diseases in the northern lakes and the great lakes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have a private report from Doctor Miller which is quite interesting. It is a scientific report, but we do not intend to publish it. It deals with fish diseases. If the hon. member wishes to see it I shall be pleased to show it to him.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they continuing this work and trying to remedy the situation?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. They are continuing the work and we are sure to make some progress, if not improving the situation at least in regulating the trade so that the commodity will be acceptable to importing countries.

Mr. MacNICOL: I support what the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) has said. I presume he is referring, when he mentions the northern lakes, to lake Athabasca and Great Slave lake. I brought up this question a few years ago—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps it was before the minister's time. I had just been up there and learned about that skin disease, and the minister at that time assured me that it would be cleared up promptly. Has it been cleared up?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I remember that last year the hon. gentleman drew my attention and that of the committee to Great Slave lake and lake Athabaska. We have a party at work there now, a biologist and three or four men, who went out two or three months ago and are in the field now. I do not think anything can be done commercially at least during this year, or until the end of the war, but at least we have a biologist there studying the question.

Item agreed to.

77. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission under treaty between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser river system, $42,000.

Mr. REID: There is one matter I should like to place before the minister, which is dealt with in a resolution passed at a meeting held in Victoria this year. Perhaps I cannot do better than read the resolution itself:

At its meeting held in the city of Tacoma, Washington, in April, 1944, the Pacific Northwest Trade Association requested the governments of Canada and the United States to give immediate attention to the adequate protection of the Pacific coast fisheries of the two nations. These nations have spent many millions of dollars, have imposed many restrictions on their fishermen and fishing vessels, and have created two international commissions to preserve and develop these coastal fisheries, yet much of this expenditure will have been wasted and much of the effort lost unless these fisheries are protected for an adequate distance off-shore against the encroachments of Japanese or nationals of other countries than the United States or Canada.

Now, therefore, be it resolved: That this association now meeting at Victoria, British Columbia, this June 27, 1944, again calls the matter to the attention of the two governments, again points out the necessity for prompt and effective action being taken, and urges that the consideration of this important Pacific coast problem shall not be confused with the divergent problems of the Atlantic, or any other region, but be dealt with as a separate and distinct problem which can and should be considered upon its own merits, and at once.

Mr. NEILL: Who is asking that?

Mr. REID: The Pacific northwest trade association.

The Fraser river basin is one of the most valuable fishery spawning regions in the world, and is frequented by all varieties of Pacific coast salmon as well as by other species of fish, yet in the creation of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, by treaty between Canada and the United States, the powers of that commission were confined to dealing with sockeye salmon alone.

For the information of hon. members may I say that five varieties of salmon frequent the waters of British Columbia, and of these varieties only one, namely, sockeye, is under the jurisdiction of this international commission. In this resolution this association asks that all varieties come under its control for investigation, research, protection and rehabilitation.

Now therefore, be it resolved: That the governments of the two nations be urged to amend the treaty referred to so that the commission created thereby shall be authorized to deal with all varieties of salmon, and any other valuable commercial fish which are found in the Fraser river basin.

Too often in the past hydro electric, irrigation and other construction projects have been planned without consideration having been given to their effect on important fishery resources, although in many instances, it would have been possible that had such considerations been given the one might have been developed without harm to the other, and although, in some instances at least, it was doubtful whether the project was of greater economic value to the public at large than the fishery.

Now, therefore, be it resolved: That before any hydro electric, irrigation or other construction project be authorized which may seriously affect any substantial fishery, either recreational or commercial, a careful survey should be made by some disinterested public agency to determine the actual and relative values of such project, and such fishery and that every endeavour be made not to sacrifice the one for the other, or, in any way, to prejudice the general public interest.

Be it further resolved: That before any hydro electric, irrigation or other construction project which affects an existing fishery be authorized, it should also be mandatory that the provincial or the state or other government having jurisdiction over such projects notify its respective fishery department of such prospective projects in order that adequate investigation of any fishery involved may be made before there is any commitment, direct or indirect, or authorization of such projects.

May I interrupt for a moment to say that we expect that hydro-electric development on the Fraser river to take place in the future. The whole British Coumbia watershed has been surveyed and mapped out with that purpose in mind. The fisheries commission do not take the stand that there shall not be any hydro electric development. They do say, however, that before any such hydro development is proceeded with or any dams constructed, consideration should be given to the possible effect of such development on the fisheries. Mention has been made from time to time of the fishways which have been built in the great dams on the Columbia river, some of them costing as much as seven or eight million dollars. Hon. members may be interested to know that although these fishways are presumably successful, the fact is that the Columbia river fisheries are going down year by year, and I believe independent observers would say that in time the construction of these dams across that river may mean the destruction of those fisheries.

Mr. POTTIER: Do the fish keep going up the fishways?

Mr. REID: Yes, they do, but the young fry have to be brought down again, and that has not been entirely successful. The fish can go up above the dams and spawn, but the young fry coming down again have met with difficulties. So that year after year those fisheries have been going down, and competent observers say that if some further steps are not taken the fisheries of the Columbia river may be completely destroyed. That is the reason for the warning coming from this association, that when hydro-electric development on the Fraser river or its tributaries is under consideration, care be taken to see that the same thing does not happen there. We are not taking the stand that there shall not be any hydro-electric development, because we realize that as the population of the province increases there will have to be some development along these lines.

Mr. O'NEILL: I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for New Westminster, who apparently has approached this question pretty much from the sole point of view of the fishermen, who say nothing must be done that will destroy the salmon fisheries. But there are other people in the province of British Columbia who are just as anxious to see that we do not make the whole interior of the province and all the tributaries of the Fraser river a spawning ground for salmon. For many years the people of Kamloops have looked forward to the day when power would be developed on the Adams river, which is one of the tributaries of the Thompson, which in turn is one of the tributaries of the Fraser, and so undoubtedly will be considered one of those streams upon which hydro-electric power must not be developed if such development would by any chance interfere with the salmon fisheries. While I am in sympathy with the demand of the fishermen that their fishing grounds should not be destroyed, on the other hand it does seem to me, to use a railway phrase, that we have been asleep at the switch in this country. We have permitted our great neighbours to the south to erect barriers on their rivers in order to develop power, and practically to destroy the salmon fisheries of the Columbia river; and now, to make sure these salmon fisheries are maintained as much as possible, you are going to make the interior of British Columbia a spawning ground for salmon for the benefit of the fishermen of the Fraser river and also the fishermen of the United States. It does seem to me that the farmers, and those now living in the interior of British Columbia, who have waited for years and years for power developments, are now to be denied the benefits of that electrical power on their farms because it may interfere with the salmon fisheries.

There are a lot of things to be taken into consideration besides fisheries. If provision can be made under which these tributaries may still be used as spawning grounds for salmon, without interfering with hydro-electric development, then I would be quite prepared to discuss the question. But if it must be discussed from the point of view that it shall not interfere with salmon fisheries, then I am not prepared to discuss it at all. If it can be considered from the other point of view of developing power on these rivers without unduly restricting the salmon spawning grounds, all well and good. But I suggest to the Minister of Fisheries that when this question is being discussed the rights of other people, besides salmon fishermen, must be given some consideration.

Mr. REID: I do not know if the hon. member for Kamloops heard clearly the remarks I made. I was careful to point out that the Pacific salmon fisheries commission realized fully that there had to be hydro-electric power development. If the hon. member was paying any attention to the resolution I read he would know that very point was emphasized by me. I am not altogether surprised by the hon. member's remarks, because only a week or so ago a debate took place in his city in regard to an old dam which was constructed long years ago by a logging company. That dam is at the entrance to a lake known as Adams lake. It has been in disrepair for I do not know how many years. For the past twenty years it has not been used by the logging company. When it was built and operated by the logging company there was a fishway through it, into Adams lake—which, by the way is a lake with at least eighty miles of spawning grounds available. No great difficulty was experienced in those years by the fish. The logging company, however, has now been carrying out its operations by truck. Over the course of years the dam has fallen into disrepair, and for many years salmon coming to spawn there have been unable to get past. So that the fisheries commission in its investigations, after looking over the matter, sought the removal of this dam. They were not seeking the removal of hydro-electric development. Rather they were asking for the removal of a dam which had not been used for twenty years and which was a menace to the salmon going to the lake. Those are the facts of the case.

As I said, there must be development of hydro-electric power in British Columbia, and there must also be development of our fisheries. The two must go hand in hand. My warning to the government and the country is that from a fisheries point of view we cannot sit idly by and see the power companies erect dams irrespective of whether they kill the fish or not, as happened across the line.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, we have heard the view of power versus salmon ably presented by the two hon. members who have just spoken. There is a great deal of truth in both arguments. With reference to the situation in respect to dams, of which the hon. member for New Westminster spoke—a dam which has been a menace to fish for twenty years, and for which no one would admit responsibility—might I say that that could easily have been settled. As a matter of fact we had the same condition in my district. There was no possibility of its being used for power purposes, and it was a menace to salmon coming up. Therefore I gave a good friend of mine five sticks of stumping powder—and that was the end of that; and it saved a lot of trouble.

If I heard the hon. member for New Westminster correctly, he read a resolution passed by a body with which he is connected stating that these things should be investigated. There is no doubt that they will have to be investigated, having in mind the greatest good to the greatest number. It will be found that in some rivers it will be necessary, and perhaps advisable, to let the fish go and to proceed with the power development. In other cases it might be the other way round—that the power development would not be substantial, and that it would be more valuable as a fishing area. For instance it would be inconceivable to abandon the Fraser or Columbia rivers entirely as sources of fish, because they are perhaps two of the greatest fisheries rivers in the world. It ultimately boils down to this, that the choice must be made as to which it may be advisable to drop. Perhaps it might be wise to keep the power development in certain rivers, or perhaps the tributaries of those rivers, and leave the fish in other rivers—that is, in other cases it would be the other way round.

I wish now to speak about another point to which the hon. member for New Westminster referred, and to which reference was made by the association for which he speaks. While I did not hear him clearly, I did gather he was pointing out that there was some danger of attacks being made upon our fisheries, not in the rivers themselves within our territories, but outside the rivers.

Mr. REID: Outside the three-mile limit?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, outside the three-mile limit. While the condition has not been the same since the war, there was a pronounced and clear case a few years ago. Fish have peculiar habits. There is not one fish for every square yard or for every ten square yards in the ocean. Fish travel in well-defined movements. Aircraft, looking down, can spot these movements just as they can spot submarines. The conclusion is that they can be seen hundreds of miles off shore. The particular case I have in mind was in connection with the development at Bristol bay, where the Americans get large quantities of fish. It is up in the Alaska area, and the Americans take enormous supplies of fish out of there. Well, it was discovered that our oriental friends, the Japanese, with their usual astuteness, had cleaned out the greater part of their own area—because a Jap's idea of fishing is to take the last fish and the last fin out of an area, whether it is his own or anybody else's. So they go and beg, borrow or steal somebody else's fish. He had depleted his own fisheries and he was then engaged in depleting the fisheries he had leased from the Russians, and saw the possibilities in the excellent waters of Bristol bay.

It is generally recognized—I do not know as to whether there is any international law on the point—that the territorial waters or rights of a nation shall extend three miles beyond its coastline. And I believe it is further recognized that that distance shall be computed from the headlands—that is, one would not compute it from a deep bay, but rather from headland to headland. The Japanese, probably keeping within the law, came up there and ran a big mother ship for canning salmon. Then they spread a net—I have heard it was 200 miles long; I do not know if that is correct. However it is said they ran an enormous length of net, sufficient to run practically across the mouth of these Alaskan waters. They kept far enough out so that they could not be interfered with under territorial waters regulations, and yet sufficiently close to get the benefit of the fish going into those waters.

If they could do it there, then it would be only a short time before they would do it lower down and cut off our supply going to the Fraser river. The United States made a protest in a friendly way, as one friendly nation to another, stating that the Japanese were not playing the game—even though perhaps they were keeping within their actual rights. After all, these were American fish spawned there, taken care of, and protected. The Americans would not let their white fishermen take these fish, except at certain times, in order to protect them. And it was just a little bit too strong to see the Japanese come along and clean up the whole output. The Japanese replied with their usual courtesy and said that they were sorry but the Americans were mistaken; they were not trying to take salmon, they were simply prospecting for crabs. They had taken out this large ship, equipped it with canning appliances, and all they were doing was prospecting for crabs. They were so sorry that the Americans, their good friends, would even suspect that they were capable of doing anything that might be considered an unfriendly act, the Americans whom they loved so much and continued to love until the last minute before Pearl Harbor.

The Americans were not fooled, and they replied in like manner. They said they accepted the statement and the assurances of the Japanese, they were quite sure they were sincere when they said they were only prospecting for crabs, but unfortunately or fortunately they sent an aeroplane up. It came down low enough to the mother ship that they were able to see the names on the cases of salmon that were being packed and it therefore looked as though the Japanese government had been mistaken in saying that they were prospecting only for crabs. The Japanese government then reiterated their assurances of devotion to the United States and so on; they said the Americans must have been mistaken and anyhow they had given orders it was not to be done again.

Of course it was continued. This was just about a year before the war. The United States fishermen got a little tired of using diplomacy and they decided to help themselves. They sent down to Seattle for a couple of hundred rifles and they said that when they got those back they would settle the situation by more drastic and practical means. Then the war broke out and that was the end of the matter for the time being.

As the hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out, we should negotiate an agreement with the United States similar to the one in connection with the Columbia river salmon. It could cover not only the sockeye but other varieties of fish. I urge the government to consider seriously this aspect of the matter. There is no doubt that the Japs were legally within their rights. It was suggested about that time that a ship was coming out from Norway for the same purpose. The United States government made friendly representation and the thing was stalled off for the time being. But the question will have to be faced sooner or later. Some people will say that it can be done by having a gentleman's agreement or by some other means to extend the territorial waters of Canada beyond the three-mile limit to what is known as the continental shelf. But there are objections to this method because the continental shelf varies. At some places it is quite close to Canada, and at other places it is a considerable distance away. I do not think the problem can be met in that way. It seems to me that the solution is in having an agreement with the United States along the lines of the one in connection with salmon. As soon as the war is ended the Japanese will again be in a position to do this, or it may be the Norwegians or someone else. They will come here and take advantage of the millions of dollars we vote year after year protecting the birth and early life of the salmon. Are we going to sit down and watch them take these fish by putting down nets beyond the territorial limits?

I do hope the minister will take note of this. This thing needs investigation and it needs foresight. We are on terms of good friendship with the United States at the moment and now is the time to make an agreement of that kind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To what extent does this item number 77 duplicate the $1,000,000 item in connection with the fisheries commission?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This item is only for the maintenance of the commission, whereas the other item is a capital expenditure for the building of a fish pass at Hell's Gate and to provide means of overcoming other obstacles.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are fortunate in having three members from British Columbia who know as much about fishing as any other members in this house. I am not one of them, but Hell's Gate happens to be in my riding. The hon. member for New Westminster, the hon. memebr for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Skeena have a thorough knowledge of the fishing industry. I want to say a word about the hon. member for New Westminster. I think he knows more than the other two hon. members because he comes from a riding which is next to mine. As Hell's Gate is in my riding I am much interested in this matter. I want to pay my tribute to the hon. member for New Westminster, and when I do that I think I speak for the fishermen of British Columbia, certainly for those in my riding. The work carried on by this commission, of which he is a member, has done considerable for the fishing industry of British Columbia.

A short time ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred to the benefits accruing to the country from the fishing industry. If my memory serves me rightly, the value of the fisheries in British Columbia alone in 1941 amounted to $21,000,000. The benefits from that production accrue to the whole dominion.

This commission has done excellent work. I think the principal reason for that is that the two leading technical men in the commission come from my riding. The deputy minister of fisheries does not exactly come from my riding but he showed excellent judgment in marrying a lady from my riding. His chief assistant does come from my riding.

I do not think I have any more to say on this matter except that I hope there will be no question at all about passing the $1,000,000 vote. This is a small matter when we consider the value of this industry. If I am not mistaken in my figures, on the basis of the prices received last year and the run of 1913, the value of this production in British Columbia alone would be $40,000,000. Surely we can afford to pass this vote.

Item agreed to.

78. Grant to the united maritime fishermen's association, $3,000.

Mr. POTTIER: On June 30 when the minister's estimates were before the committee he referred to the brief presented by the united maritime fishermen's association, and in referring to it he said, as reported on page 4416 of Hansard:

The brief presented to us by the united fishermen says that they do not want the unrestricted use of trawlers, meaning that they do not want the trawlers to fish anywhere. We are going to see, through the system of granting a licence, that the trawlers fish far away from the shore.

I think the minister has misinterpreted the brief presented by the united maritime fishermen's association. Their brief reads:

Clearly then the unrestricted use of trawlers is inimical to the interest of the inshore fishermen, and on behalf of its members this association must continue its opposition to them.

The unrestricted use to which they refer there is not only the unrestricted use of the fishing grounds but unrestricted use in so far as the number of beam trawlers is concerned. It is important that we be seized of that difference. The reason why the united maritime fishermen are opposed to the beam trawler is that it affects a large number of fishermen, and an increase in the number of beam trawlers tends to put fishermen out of business and centralize the industry in two or three places in Nova Scotia, Halifax and Lunenburg for example. I hope that the minister will not continue with that interpretation.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It means both.

Mr. POTTIER: If the minister understands that, there is no need for me to pursue the matter further. I agree with the united maritime fishermen; I am opposed to the trawler. I have said a great deal about it before, and I shall not repeat. I have not changed my mind.

Item agreed to.

79. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942, $120,000.

Mr. REID: As the minister and perhaps the members of the committee know, a treaty regarding pelagic sealing was made in 1911 between four countries. In 1941 the treaties were terminated. We are receiving considerable value each year from the United States, and at no expense to us, because under the treaty we prevent our fishermen from interfering with the seals on their way north to the Pribilof islands. Our share last year was twenty per cent of the seals caught, which gave Canada 23,400 skins. These when processed are worth $50 apiece. The processing costs from $12 to $15 apiece, so that Canada got roughly $800,000 as her share. I have a suggestion to make to the minister. I think that he should consider sending a man or men up to the Pribilof islands from Canada for a few days each year, if for nothing else than to show that we are interested in what is being done by the United States in regard to the killing and taking of seals from the Pribilof islands. We have had considerable benefit from the treaty, but I do not think we have had a representative go to the Pribilof islands to keep an eye on what is being done there. Perhaps the minister would give that suggestion his serious consideration.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As the hon. member for New Westminster has said, this is a very valuable asset for Canada. Here is an example of how the fur seal population is being restored through international cooperation. We have a treaty with the United States which has just been renewed. We have no representative in the Pribilof islands. We do not doubt at all the honesty of the United States authorities. They number the barrels containing the skins and we have the privilege of indicating by number which barrels we will take. For instance we may say that we will take barrel No. 3, barrel No. 5, barrel No. 13, and so on, so that we have an equal chance of getting representative skins.

Mr. REID: What I had in mind was not so much to check up on the United States authorities, because after all they are acting in good faith and we must assume that they are. But when the treaty was first signed, four countries were a party to it, United States, Canada, Russia and Japan. We do not know what countries may want to enter into a treaty of this kind after the war. My suggestion is that we should send a representative up there to show our interest in the matter and to gather information so that we shall be better able to discuss the matter when the time comes for renewing the treaty.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that under the original treaty the Russians gave us fifteen per cent, United States fifteen per cent, and the Japanese fifteen per cent of the catch.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There were a number of islands and the proportion varied with each island. On Pribilof island the proportions were as follows: Canada, 15 per cent; United States, 70 per cent; Russia, 0; Japan, 15 per cent. On Commander island: Canada, 15 per cent; United States, 0; Russia, 70 per cent; Japan, 15 per cent. On Robben island, Canada, 10 per cent; United States, 10 per cent; Russia, 10 per cent; Japan, 70 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: Japan repudiated the treaty a year or two ago, did she not?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: What is the deal now?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The agreement is that the proportion that Japan was taking is divided between Canada and the United States. Japan has abrogated the treaty, but of course they are free to catch seals passing around their own territory.

Item agreed to.

80. To provide for payment of a bounty for the destruction of harbour seals, $15,000.

Mr. NEILL: How much do we pay now for each individual hair seal shot, and how much was paid out of this vote last year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We pay $2.50 per nose. The nose is the proof which the fisherman supplies. Last year we paid out $6,245.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that the amount paid per seal is not enough. That is illustrated by the fact that you have so much money left out of last years' vote. If you paid out only $6,000 odd, it shows that the fishermen are not much interested. A hair seal when shot immediately sinks, so even if the fisherman shoots one his chance of recovering it is small. You may shoot half a dozen and recover only one. These hair seals can do great damage to a fisherman's nets, and a fisherman with a long line of nets out cannot afford to leave his fishing when he is perhaps getting a good run of fish to shoot a hair seal for $2.50. The greatest destruction of the seals in years gone by was through the government patrol boats on the Pacific, which supervise the enforcement of the law. At certain seasons of the year the boats would go to the breeding grounds and shoot or club the seals and much greater destruction was done in that way than by casual shooting by individual fishermen. You can hardly expect a fisherman to drop his fishing when he is having a nice run of fish to go after one seal. That we are not paying enough is indicated by the fact that only $6,000 was paid out of the vote last year. I suggest that the amount paid per seal should be raised to $5 and that as soon as the war is over aggressive steps should be taken to renew the destruction done by these patrol boats. During the war these patrol boats have been taken over for other purposes or have been continuing their activities in a very limited fashion. They have not been able to do the destruction on the breeding grounds which they did before. I hope the government will provide the money. It is not very much; in fact it is not enough. The bounty should be increased in order to encourage people to go after these hair seals; also they should try to strengthen the service of fisheries patrol boats so that their activities will be renewed when the war is over. We pay to catch wild animals in British Columbia, such as the cougar and the wolf, a much larger bounty than that. With the aid of a good dog a man can get a cougar comparatively easily, yet the bounty is something like ten or twelve dollars. Two and a half dollars is not enough, when a man can go out and catch dogfish and take out their livers and get far more money that way.

Mr. REID: I should like to join my representations with those of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and also to commend the minister for the steps he has taken so far to help out in the Fraser river. For some unknown reason, during the past two years, the seals have grown to enormous numbers. I myself last year counted on one bar at least a thousand seals, and the closest you can get is about half a mile It may be possible to go to the rookeries and kill these seals, but in the Fraser river you cannot get nearer than half a mile to them; one shot from a gun, and instantly they are in the water. The minister has been good enough to interest himself in an endeavour to get rid of them to some extent in the Fraser river. Their numbers have grown so much that fishermen are refusing to put their nets in the water. At a meeting I attended during the Easter recess, fishermen said that of every ten salmon in a net, seven would be destroyed before the net could be picked up, due to the seals running along and biting them, and the net would be destroyed as well. I ask the minister seriously to consider the increasing of the bounty so as to encourage the fishermen to go after them to a greater extent because, as pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, when a fisherman takes a shot at them and hits a seal, the seal sinks, unless the man is close enough to get it before it goes down too deep, and thereby many fishermen are discouraged from attempting to get these hair seals. They are in the Fraser river by the thousands. I do not know why they stay there. One suggestion is that it is because of the gunnery practice of naval and air forces outside the gulf. I think the minister should redouble his efforts if he can, and consider increasing the bounty as suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for New Westminster talks about numbers of seals as great as one thousand on a sand bar. I had no idea that things were as bad as that. The suggestion was made that they should be mined on these beaches where they go to sun themselves. Has anything been done along that line, and with what results?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Last year we made an extensive study of this problem, and we took some members of the Department of National Defence for Air to view these sand bars and tell us if it would be practicable to install mines there or endeavour to bomb them when they congregated there; but it was too difficult We were told that the weight of these seals is not enough to explode bombs, and that to use them under the circumstances would be very dangerous. Then we got officers of the Department of National Defence for Air to practise shooting at these seals on certain days of the week when the fishermen were not there, and we believe that they have destroyed a certain number; but there were some protests from the neighbours. We are still studying the question. We do not know exactly upon what lines success will lie, but the board is still giving attention to the subject.

Item agreed to.

82. To provide for the replacement of the Gaspe peninsula fisheries experimental station, $35,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Gaspé is not in the chamber at the moment. I believe the member from that district is a soldier and he may be on military duty. I want to say a word in respect to his problem, since he and a delegation recently appeared from Gaspé before the reconstruction committee. I am glad to see that the minister has an estimate to do something to increase Gaspé fisheries. As far as I can see, Gaspé is one of the forgotten areas in Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Fisheries administration is under the provincial authorities.

Mr. MacNICOL: I see you are providing for a vote of $35,000.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I can explain to the hon. member what it is for.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is to provide for the replacement of the Gaspé peninsula fisheries experimental station. All I want to say is that I am in accord with this vote, because it is beneficial to Gaspé and will be beneficial to the country. Gaspé was perhaps the first part of Canada which was touched by explorers; I believe Jacques Cartier landed there in 1534; and to me it is more or less neglected country, but it is very beautiful, and whatever the minister can do to help the Gaspé people he should do. I would not have got up to say anything on this item had the hon. member for Gaspé been here to say it himself.

Item agreed to.

83. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission to overcome obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon at Hell's Gate Canyon, and for investigation and overcoming obstructions to such salmon at other points on the Fraser river watershed, $1,000,000.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This sum is for the construction of two passes at Hell's Gate. I just want to say that I hope these passes will be finished by the month of April next, and if we can restore the sockeye run on the Fraser River by the building of these two passes it will be a great thing for the fishermen of British Columbia. Just to give an example, I might say that if in 1941 the catch had been as good as the catch of 1913, the year before the landslide, at the prices of salmon in 1941, instead a return of about $8 million it would have given a return of $40 million. We hope to be able to restore this run on this basis.

I do not want to let this item pass without paying a tribute to the members of the Pacific salmon fisheries commission. They have been working for six years, and I want to mention especially my hon. friend the hon. member for New Westminster, who was chairman last year; Mr. Edward W. Allen, barrister of Seattle, who is chairman this year; Mr. B. M. Brennan, Doctor Thompson, Mr. Milo Bell, and others who have worked very hard and given a great deal of their time and gone out of their way for the successful planning of these passes, which investigations now show have certainly been needed for the past thirty years.

Mr. REID: On behalf of the members of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission I wish to thank the minister for introducing this vote of $1 million, which will be matched by $1 million from the United States. This will take care of the two fish passes at Hell's Gate canyon and thirty-seven obstructions on the Fraser river estuary. I wish to thank the minister for the vote on behalf of the commission of which I am a member.

Item agreed to.

84. To provide for the extension of educational work in cooperative producing and selling among fishermen, $50,000.

Mr. BURTON: Will the minister indicate how and where this work is being carried on, and the possibility of its being extended to other parts of Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This item of $50,000 is the same as the item that appeared in the supplementaries last year. We are asking for $10,000 more in order to help in some other fields. This is probably the best-spent money in this department, because the work done at St. Francis Xavier, Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere and the university of British Columbia is of immense value. We hope to spend ten thousand more this year, but that will come under the supplementaries.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

258. Departmental administration, $191,595.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this item there is a matter which I should like to discuss with the minister for a few moments. I have already taken it up with him by correspondence, but unless something has been done about it recently, the request I have in mind has not yet been met. I am speaking on behalf of the women who do the char work in some of the public buildings that are under the Department of Public Works. My knowledge relates particularly to the federal building in the city of Winnipeg and other buildings there that come under the direction of this department. The women who do this work feel that they should be entitled to some of the privileges that go with service extending over many years and that the privileges accorded the men doing similar work should be accorded to them. There are two of these privileges in particular about which I wish to speak—holidays with pay and a certain amount of sick leave without loss of pay. Shortly after the matter was brought to my attention last fall I wrote to the minister on October 6, 1943, setting out the situation and asking that he give it his consideration. Anticipating that there might be some argument over the status of these women, whether they were part-time, temporary employees or permanent employees, I made reference in writing the minister to the notice of employment that was given to one of these women in Winnipeg, whom I happen to know, which notice I hold in my hand at the present time. It is on the departmental letterhead.

Department of Public Works, Canada
Chief Architects' Branch
Maintenance Office—Dominion Public Buildings
In replying please quote file No. 1177-48.

The letter is dated June 16, 1941, and is addressed to a lady in Winnipeg doing this kind of work. The letter says in part:

This is to advise you that the hon. the Minister of Public Works has been pleased to appoint you, during pleasure, as a charwoman on the above,—

"The above" refers to P.W.D. Staff, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

—at a remuneration of $660 per annum, for which you will be required to work a minimum of 7 hours per day, your appointment to date from the day on which you commence your duties.

The letter goes on to tell the lady whom she is to get in touch with and sets out certain other particulars in connection with her employment. The point I wish to emphasize is that the appointment was made on the basis of a certain amount per annum; she was not hired at a prevailing hourly rate. It was at an annual salary, if you wish to call it that, of $660. I pointed out when I wrote to the minister on October 6 that further evidence of the annual basis on which these women are employed is found in the fact that if they lose time owing to illness their pay cheques are docked and the amount they are docked varies according to the number of days in the month in which they are absent. In other words, if they lose a day in February they lose more money from their cheque than if they lose a day in December, which I suggest is evidence of the fact that they are paid on an annual basis and not on a daily or an hourly rate. I happen to know that some of these women have been employed with the Department of Public Works doing char work in the public buildings in Winnipeg for as long as ten or fifteen years, so that they can hardly be referred to as temporary employees. The duties of these women have been set out in a memorandum which reads:

Charwoman. Definition of class: Under supervision, to perform routine cleaning work in a government building as assigned.

Examples: sweeping and scrubbing floors; washing windows and woodwork; dusting and cleaning furniture; emptying wastebaskets and spittoons.

Qualifications . . .

Mr. REID: Are they under the civil service?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a part of the problem.

Mr. REID: I am wondering why charwomen should have to go through the civil service.

Mr. KNOWLES: To continue, note the requirements these women must meet:

Qualifications: preferably primary school education; knowledge of simple cleaning work and implements; ability to read and write; willingness to work; good physical condition.
Compensation: Prevailing rates shall apply.

I suppose that is probably where the confusion comes in. You have a memorandum on the one hand that says the compensation shall be the prevailing rates, and on the other hand when these women are engaged they are given the kind of notice to which I have already referred which states that they are engaged at a remuneration established on an annual basis. I have before me as well a memorandum setting out the specifications of the work of a cleaner and helper. In this instance the reference is to the men who do work similar to that done by the women. I could read it, but I need hardly take the time. There are a few duties included in the work assigned to men which are not included in the work assigned to women, but the definition of the class is strikingly similar. It reads:

Under supervision, to perform routine cleaning and janitor work as assigned and in some cases to perform or assist in general household or domestic work.

Perhaps I should read the qualifications in this case as well:

Ability to read and write and preferably primary school education; knowledge of simple cleaning work and implements; willingness to work; good physical condition.

Compensation, annual: $1,020, $1,080, $1,140.

Note: For part-time work the compensation shall be in the same proportion to the above rates as the number of hours worked to standard working hours.

I want to emphasize the fact that there is a striking similarity between the definition of the class under which the men work and the class under which the women work; there are also striking similarities in their duties and qualifications, but the women are treated as though they were temporary, part-time employees whereas the men are treated as permanent employees. Apparently on the basis of that distinction the women are denied holidays with pay and sick leave without loss of pay. Nevertheless, anticipating that argument, as I have already pointed out, I drew to the attention of the minister when I first wrote him the nature of the document these women receive when they are engaged.

The minister replied to my letter under date of October 26, 1943, and said in part:

The situation is as follows. The char staff work only part of the day. They are paid the prevailing hourly rate in the district. The work must be considered as extra; is not hard; and is much in demand in all parts of the country.

That would seem to place a premium on it, I might interject.

In any part-time prevailing rate work there is a general rule, followed by both industry and government, that holidays and sick leave are not applicable, and this rule has been followed in the particular case you have reference to in Winnipeg.

We do not consider, particularly under circumstances of to-day, that any change should be undertaken.

Yours sincerely,
Alphonse Fournier.

Inasmuch as I had gone to the trouble to emphasize the nature of the document which these women receive when they are employed, I felt that I had to reply to the minister's letter and I did so on November 16, calling attention again to the kind of notice these women receive, at least the women in Winnipeg, appointing them on an annual basis. I want to emphasize that there are many women in that city who have been doing this work for a good many years. There is nothing part-time or temporary about it. They have a set number of hours which they work every working day the year round, and as yet they have not been granted these two concessions.

In reply to my letter of November 16 the minister wrote me under date of November 23. This letter was somewhat shorter but slightly more welcome. He said:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

I have yours of the 16th instant concerning the matter of holidays and sick leave with pay for charwomen working in public buildings throughout Canada.

Your representations have been carefully noted and will be given every consideration.

Yours sincerely,
Alphonse Fournier.

After some months, not having learned of any progress in the matter, I wrote the minister again, restating the case, but to my regret nothing was done. On February 25, 1944, the minister wrote me in part as follows:

The order in council you referred to—

I had referred to an order in council that had been mentioned in the daily newspapers.

—does not cover holiday leave for the char staff. It applies only to full time and seasonal prevailing rate employees. As the charwomen are part time only they do not come under the terms of this order in council. This follows the practice employed in the industrial and the commercial world where holiday and sick leave are not granted to part time employees.

For your information, however, I may say that this whole question, together with others, is being reviewed by this department with a view to adopting some additional regulations covering sick leave in keeping with the kind of service performed by the different employees.

That also was signed by the Minister of Public Works. It may be that these women who do char work are employed on a different basis in different parts of Canada. That is my reason for bringing up this question to-day, in order that we may discuss it fully. It may be that the minister can point to some instances where they are employed on a temporary basis, but on a number of occasions I have consulted the women who do this work in Winnipeg; I have known some of them for a good many years, and I know that as far as their work is concerned it is of a permanent nature. I repeat, some of them have been employed there for as long as fifteen years. Their hours are set; the document I read referred to seven hours a day. Their remuneration is fixed on a yearly basis, and is divided into twelve equal amounts for the twelve months of the year. If these women lose any time because of illness they lose their pay, according to the number of days in the month in which that time is lost. It seems to me that if there are any little technical difficulties that have to be overcome the minister or the government ought to take steps to get around those difficulties in the interests of fair play as far as these women are concerned. Quite frankly, I have had the feeling that advantage was being taken of these women because of the nature of their work. They are rendering a real and very important service. Most of these women are working because of particular need. It is by no means easy work. It is hard on their health. It takes them out at evening hours, which is by no means a desirable time to be working, and I think this parliament would want these women to be given every possible consideration. In my opinion their request that they be granted annual holidays of two weeks with pay, after they have worked a certain number of years, and a certain amount of sick leave without loss of pay is a most reasonable request, and I hope the Minister of Public Works and the government will find some way by which this can be done without further delay.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member has certainly fairly stated the case of these women in Winnipeg. Under the public works department we have quite a number of charwomen working in different cities throughout the country where there are public buildings. These women work from two to three hours a day up to seven hours a day, as in Winnipeg. In Ottawa there is a very large number of women working every day from six o'clock in the morning until eight-thirty, which is two and a half hours. They are part-time employees, although they also are paid on a yearly basis. In other places they work four or five hours a day, while in Winnipeg there are thirty-five women working seven hours a day. I do not know if there are many cities in the country where we have women working that many hours. Representations were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and we found that according to the labour regulations in Winnipeg holidays were given to these people if they worked forty-four hours a week.

In this instance they worked forty-two hours. I have submitted this special case to treasury board. They have asked questions with respect to the labour regulations in Winnipeg. A few days ago I secured copies of those regulations and I am sending the results of my inquiries to treasury board. I feel most sympathetic in this matter because it is a kind of borderline case. Had they worked two more hours a week they would have got the holidays as a matter of course. As the hon. member has said, this is a technicality, and I believe some redress should be made. I am expecting treasury board to deal with the matter in the near future, and I may tell the hon. member that I have made recommendations to the effect that they get these holidays, as they are had in other trades.

I do not know if the same conditions would apply elsewhere in Canada. I believe this is a special case. There may be some isolated cases elsewhere, but they do not generally work the forty-four hours a week which would entitle them to holidays. In this instance, however, hon. members may be assured that I will do my utmost to secure redress.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am grateful to the minister for the statement he has just made, and I apprecate the sympathy he has expressed, and his willingness to do everything he can to cope with any technicality which may stand in the way. What he has said makes one feel that it was worth while to make the representations I did, and not to take the first "no" as a final answer.

I hold in my hand a letter sent to these women in Winnipeg by an official of one of the civil service organizations. This official had been in touch with the minister on a recent date, and the letter indicates that the minister was showing sympathy for the situation. I am glad to learn of the recommendation he has made, and I certainly hope our friends of the treasury board will reveal themselves in this instance as having some humanity in their hearts.

There is one other point I should like to make in connection with the work these women are doing in Winnipeg.

Mr. MacNICOL: Women everywhere; not only Winnipeg.

Mr. KNOWLES: I welcome my hon. friend's interjection. What he is saying is absolutely correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are too poorly paid and not taken care of, as the hon. member pointed out.

Mr. KNOWLES: My reason for confining my remarks to the women in Winnipeg is that I know the situation there very well. It is a good idea in this chamber—and I believe the hon. member has emphasized it—to talk of things we know about.

So far as their cleaning work is concerned, I understand these women are supposed to clean so many thousand square feet a night; I am not sure as to the measures used. The regulation, however, is laid down in Ottawa. I am informed that the superintendent on the job in Winnipeg or, in fact, in any other city, has no authority to vary that regulation. This produces considerable difficulty and unfairness in connection with the work these women do.

In one instance a thousand square feet of floor space may require five or ten times as much work as a thousand square feet somewhere else. If one happens to get an open stretch of plain, ordinary floor, that would be a totally different story from having to clean the same amount of floor space on which there are desks, cabinets and other office furniture. For example, I am told one of the members in the cabinet has an office in a public building in Winnipeg. Naturally, because of his duties here in Ottawa, he does not go to Winnipeg very often. The result is that the woman who has his office in her allotment of floor space has a break, so far as that office is concerned, because it is not used much and does not require much cleaning.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that be an Ontario cabinet minister?

Mr. KNOWLES: No; but now that I have referred to the minister, perhaps I should mention that it is my hon. friend from Manitoba, the Minister of Mines and Resources.

In taking this matter up with their superintendent, and pointing to him the inequality of the work they are called upon to do, I am told the women have been advised that nothing could be done, because the regulation had been issued from head office to the effect that each woman must clean so many thousand square feet. It seems to me that difficulty might easily be taken care of if a little more authority and responsibility were given the superintendent on the job. Would the minister give consideration to that point?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not often hear complaints about working conditions of people working for my department. I do not believe we treat them harshly. We have set down certain regulations with respect to the work they are to do in working hours. Really, however, in the two years I have been in the department I have not heard that they were given too much work. In Ottawa we have about 1,700 charwomen, and I have never heard that they complain they have been given too much space to cover. They may be given a thousand square feet to cover in two or three hours; I do not know what the time is. But they do not wash those floors every day. Sometimes they just come in and see that everything is in order, and kept clean.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, I think they do their work all right.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes; they are all good working people who are employed. We would not keep them if they were not. And I would not want to hear any exaggeration as to their conditions of work.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the minister has missed my point. I am not complaining on their behalf as to the total amount of work the entire group has to do. I am complaining about the inequality in the amount of work allocated to the women, owing to the fact that the superintendent on the job has no authority to divide it up on a basis of actual volume, depending upon the conditions of the floor space cleaned.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We will tell our superintendents to be just as fair as possible in dividing the work among the women.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Public Works which would tend toward efficiency, at least in Fort William. My suggestion would be that women cleaners receive the same pay as men. We have difficulty out there in keeping women on their jobs; they have been resigning. Men cleaners are placed under the jurisdiction of the civil service. Anyone who knows anything about the way women fix things up, and clean them, will know that they are much better cleaners than men ever were. At least they should receive the same pay as the men. If they work overtime these women should be paid double time or time and a half, just the same as the men. I think the suggestion is most admirable and it would make for harmony and happiness among these women who are cleaners.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to say a word with respect to the employees of the Department of Public Works and I join in a general way with the hon. member for Fort William. I had thought that by now this government would have put into operation the policy which has been enunciated so many times in this house, that of equal pay to men and women for equal work.

Mr MacNICOL: You announced it yourself.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, but perhaps my powers of conversion have not been as powerful as they would have been had I been allied with the hon. member for Fort William who supports the government. However, I did not rise to discuss that matter at this time. I wanted to refer to the uniform coats which have been furnished to the elevator operators in the parliament buildings and other public buildings in Ottawa. To me they are scandalous, and I think the Minister of Public Works will be the first to agree with me in that. I am ashamed to belong to a parliament that will provide that type of coat to men who are meeting the public from time to time. They should be provided with good serviceable uniforms for their work. Something should be done to prevent a recurrence of this kind of thing because it does not leave a very good impression upon the public, to say nothing upon the men who have to work in them.

I am sorry His Honour the Speaker is not at the moment in the chamber, but perhaps what I am about to say will serve as a notice to him of a question that I intend to ask when his estimates are before the committee. My remarks have to do with the protective staff of this building. I realize that the minister has nothing to do with these employees, but perhaps I may refer to them briefly. The protective staff of this building have had to go around in winter uniforms during the hot weather, and that is a national disgrace and a scandal. These men have to meet the public and work when they are uncomfortable, and the whole situation is one which should be remedied.

With respect to the employees of the minister's department, I hope he will rise in his place and say that a great mistake has been made, that it was not done with his authority or approval. I should like to see the responsibility and blame attached to some one. Some one must be to blame for a condition like that. To some people this may seem to be a small point to raise, but it only illustrates inefficiency in the department which must be rooted out. It should be rooted out by those whose job it is to root out such things; that is the opposition. I should like to see these men dressed in decent uniforms so that those who see them will know that the government are interested in their employees.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If the leader of the opposition had not used such violent words as "scandalous" and so forth I would have been 100 per cent of his opinion. The first time I walked into the House of Commons and saw those coats on the elevator men I was shocked. I inquired where they had found the coats, and the answer given to me was that when they had come to try to get the cloth for these coats, this was the best the purchaser could find because of the shortages. I am not an expert in these matters, but I fully agree that I would not force any man to wear a coat like that Mr. GRAYDON: Where did they get these coats?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They probably asked for tenders as we always do when we want to clothe our employees. They had to use the cloth placed at the disposal of the public, and this was the best they could find. I would not blame my officials to the point of saying that they had done something scandalous, but I did tell them that in the future they should try to find something more suitable and more presentable for public servants who are meeting the public in the capital city. I really hope next year when my estimates are up that these men will be better clothed.

Mr. GRAYDON: I expect that the minister will be on the other side inquiring of someone in our group with respect to that. May I suggest that one reason for the situation is that plans were not laid far enough ahead to obtain coats for the men. I think the minister had better start laying his plans now in order to get some decent summer outfits, even if this matter may be under the supervision of another minister next year.

Mr. CARDIFF: I do not think these men have been supplied with complete suits; it is only with coats. I think that is one of the complaints they have been making, that they are not furnished with a complete uniform.

Mr. KNOWLES: Further to the question I asked, the minister was good enough to state that he had made a recommendation to the treasury board. I appreciate the willingness of the minister to make that statement, but could he tell us how long it is since the recommendation was made and whether there has been any reply?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I think I sent the first recommendation to treasury board about two weeks ago. On Monday or Tuesday I received a reply asking for details about the working conditions in Winnipeg and the hours worked, and I believe I sent a second recommendation to the treasury board yesterday.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reply the minister received was not a declination; it was simply asking for further information?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It was not a refusal; it was a request for further information.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is following it through to the best of his ability?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is fine.

260. Ottawa—maintenance and operation of dominion public buildings and grounds, including rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $2,919,480.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure whether the minister answered the question I propounded on a previous occasion with respect to the heating system of the east block being changed from coal to oil.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I believe I gave an answer before. If I recall rightly, we received orders from the oil controller to change the system because of the oil situation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand that the east block is not heated by the central heating plant that heats the west block and this building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This was only a temporary arrangement for the summer. The east block is heated from the central heating plant during the fall and winter.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the winter time the east block is heated from the central heating plant?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Chief architect's branch—

261. Maintenance and operation of dominion public buildings and grounds, other than at Ottawa, including rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $3,782,758.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this apply to the grounds around the buildings in Ottawa?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): To all the buildings in the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the grounds around all the public buildings throughout the country in as unsatisfactory a condition as the grounds around these buildings? All through the previous years we have had nice flower beds around the grounds. Where are they now?

Mr. STIRLING: There is a war on.

Mr. MacNICOL: The few dollars it would take to put in flower beds in the grounds around the main buildings is a small matter in comparison with some of the vast sums of money that are more or less recklessly spent, and I have seen much of that. There is no excuse for not having flower beds.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We should not mix up two things. The grounds around the public buildings at Ottawa are under the jurisdiction of the federal district commission. One of the reasons given to me is that there has been a curtailment of expenditure owing to the difficulty of finding labour. The same question was brought up last year and that was the information I received.

Mr. MacNICOL: The information I have received is that unless the men who are working on the grounds around these buildings dig down in their own pockets to buy plants and seeds to beautify the landscape, the flowers and plants are not forthcoming.

Mr. REID: For the information of the hon. member, may I say that the special committee dealing with the city of Ottawa had this matter before them. I support the contention which the hon. member has made; I am with him. It was pointed out in the committee that the matter would be taken under advisement.

Mr. RICKARD: It has been found impossible to get awnings for the windows of the public buildings in my riding. The sun shines in and it is very hot in many of these buildings. Would the minister look into this matter and see if anything can be done?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am ready to look into the matter and see if we can get awnings, but I would remind the committee that since 1940 we have been cutting down, decreasing the estimates of my department, to bare necessities. I am getting only what is needed for maintenance.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I remind the minister of an inquiry which I made about a month ago, and which has not yet produced the results I had hoped for. There has been a lot of complaint by members of the draughts circulating in this chamber. The matter has been brought up before, but apparently nothing has been done and complaints still come in to me from the members of our group. I should like to know if the minister really means to do anything about it. It is much more serious than appears on the surface, particularly for the members sitting in the second and third rows, where they feel a tremendous draught at times. I think every member of the house has had that experience. While we should not perhaps think of our own comfort before anyone else's, the chamber should be made reasonably comfortable if we are going to sit here such a large part of the year, as now seems to be the case.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Following the inquiry from the leader of the opposition some time ago, the chief architect's branch did make a survey of the chamber, but the building is so high that, although they have closed everything off that they could close, there are still draughts for which they have not found a remedy. I shall try to make the chamber as comfortable as we can possibly make it.

Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $120,000.

Ottawa—hydrogenation laboratory for the Department of Mines and Resources, $250,000.

Ottawa—postal terminal—addition (revote), $75,000.

Ottawa—West block—renewal of heating system, $30,000.

Ottawa—central heating plant for Department of Mines and Resources on Booth street (revote $95,000), $145,000.

Toronto postal station "A"—painting, $25,000.

Total, $645,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to say a word about the item pertaining to the proposed hydrogenation laboratory and to support the item. First may I ask whether the amount pertains only to the building or as well to the equipment?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is for the land that is to be purchased and for the building.

[Mr. Rickard.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The land and the building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was informed before that the building itself would cost up to $200,000. I suppose part of this amount would be for increased salaries, which are richly deserved.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is only for the building and the site. It does not include the equipment that will go into the building.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the building under construction now?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. We are now dealing for a site on Booth street.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister right in that? Is not the building to be on the same property where the experimental laboratories on Booth street are located?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is in the block opposite on Booth street.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not adjacent to the present building? There is a small hydrogenation plant there.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. The site which we expect to acquire for the building in a day or two is on the other side of Booth street.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there another vote pertaining to the equipment?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes; that will be in the supplementaries.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the vote be under this department?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I think my hon. friend is familiar with the procedure. A request comes from the Minister of Mines and Resources giving the reasons why we should put up a building for a hydrogenation plant, and the Department of Mines and Resources provides an item in their estimates for the equipment and machinery required. We have not started the construction of the building because we shall receive the plans of the machinery there is to install in the building. That is why we have not yet started the construction of the building. As soon as we receive their plans as to machinery we shall prepare our plans for the building.

Mr. MacNICOL: So that this vote does not apply in any way to equipment which is to go into the building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I support the vote because I am going to support the programme.

Mr. KNOWLES: To make the record complete, would the minister relate the heating system of the west block to the central heating system here? A while ago he answered questions about the heating system in the east block.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I understand that the heating system of the west block was put in there seventy-seven years ago, and it will have to be taken out. It is worn out and will have to be replaced.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister stating that the west block is not heated from the central plant?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I understand that the coils and radiators and so forth are used up, and that the piping will have to be renewed.

Mr. MacNICOL: But the hot water that heats the building comes into the building from the main that is attached to the main which comes from the central heating plant to heat all these buildings?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Right.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There is always a flag on this building.

Mr. CARDIFF: Not always.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Well, not at night.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is flown from daylight to dark.

Mr. CARDIFF: If we spend so much money on flags they should be flown.

Halifax, Camp Hill hospital	$ 6,800

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Every enlisted man's job is kept open for him to fill the moment he comes back. There is no replacement of a permanent nature. When a man comes back he comes to the department and takes over his position, with the benefits which have accrued during his service.

279. Ontario and Quebec, $282,215.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have had some correspondence and interviews with the minister with respect to the dredging of the mouth of the harbour for fishing purposes at Port Credit; and I bring it to the attention of the minister again in the hope that his previous decision, perhaps reached rather hastily, might conceivably be reviewed in the interests of better fishing at that particular part of lake Ontario.

Chief engineer's branch—
Dredging
280. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $57,095.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan is it proposed to do dredging?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This amount is required to carry out dredging in the three provinces by departmental plant, day labour or by contract, and to provide for the repair and maintenance of this plant during the fiscal year 1944-45. This is a regular annual appropriation, and the expenditures chargeable to this are mainly for works which can be more economically performed by the departmental plant, and any larger works are required to be done by contract where no departmental plant is available and for which there is no special appropriation, as well as small items of hand dredging.

The expenditure of $57,095 is broken up as follows: permanent staff, $3,000; temporary assistance, $3,420; wages, $16,118; total salaries, $22,538; cost of living bonus, $4,500; maintenance and operation, $28,057; contract and day labour works, inspection and contingencies, $2,000; forming the amount of $57,095.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why does it include Saskatchewan? Where is there any dredging there?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We are dredging at Selkirk marine railway—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is in Manitoba.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): —marine railway, $1,416.96; Red river mouth, $10,450.04—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is also Manitoba.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): —St. Andrew's lock and dam, Selkirk, $1,637.74; Selkirk slough, $1,201.02; Hnausa, $4,694.86; Winnipeg, Gimli, $1,382.98.

Mr. GRAYDON: That has a familiar ring.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the last one?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Gimli, Manitoba. I am giving the list.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am aware of all those places.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Brown and Rutherford. Winnipeg, $3,821.40. That is a total of $12,738. That is for dredge No. 205. The first item is for dredge Red River. Now taking dredge Winnipegosis, at Dauphin, we are spending $10,930.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nothing at Churchill?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; that is transport.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has mentioned nothing for Saskatchewan and nothing for Alberta, so that apparently the item does not apply to either; but there is some dredging to be done in Alberta. I had a letter some days ago in regard to this matter. Ships sail north from Waterways on the Clearwater river and the Athabaska river, and they often have difficulty getting in to the dock at Waterways. I know that from personal observation. Nothing is being done there.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The only explanation is that at the time of the preparation of these estimates in December last we had no reports as to the necessity of dredging in Saskatchewan, but I am informed that in the last two months we have had requests, and we find it necessary to do some dredging in the Athabaska river at Waterways and in the Clearwater river.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The amount to do this work will come out of our war appropriation, unless we have a supplementary.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any request from the Manitoba authorities in reference to improving the channel into Berens river?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. This is the first time we have heard of that project.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suggest that the minister interest himself in improving the facilities for entering Berens river harbour on the east side of lake Winnipeg and the exit from that harbour. It is one of the finest trips in the world from the city of Winnipeg down the Red river, down lake Winnipeg, down to the mouth of the Saskatchewan and on down to Rossmore on the Nelson. But getting in and out of Berens river is quite a problem, and the captains that take boats in and bring them out deserve a great deal of credit. I would ask the minister to direct his engineers to study this problem of improving that channel so as to improve the shipping facilities on lake Winnipeg. There are a good many little docks there that could be greatly improved.

As regards Saskatchewan, seeing that the province has been mentioned, I would ask the minister to follow in the footsteps of one of his predecessors, the late Doctor Pugsley, who got his engineers to examine the possibilities of navigation on the North Saskatchewan river. He will find in the files of his department reports submitted by a former engineer, Voligny, and a study of these reports may give him a vision of what can be done in improving that river so that the navigation of former years can again be had. It would be a great tourist route. I will not go farther than that at the moment, because later on I am going to present the minister with a sound programme for improving the Saskatchewan river so that ships can sail from Winnipeg right up to the fine city of Edmonton carrying freight in the summer and particularly tourist traffic. There would be no finer tourist route in the world, and I could recommend very highly a round trip voyage from Winnipeg to Edmonton and back. Will the minister undertake to look into Voligny's report on navigation possibilities there?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We will.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems odd that the appropriation for this kind of work should be the same each year. Does that mean that this kind of dredging is identical year in and year out?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have dredges that make the rounds in the appropriate season to keep the channels open, and we have found in the past that this was the amount required for work of this kind. It is not always done at the same place, but we have our engineers making surveys to see where work will be needed during the coming season, and generally the plans are laid before us, so that we know how many cubic feet we have to dredge and what the cost will be. But, as I have said. I am limited in my estimates for public works.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the two items where increases are indicated, 279 and 281, does that mean that the cost of work being done has gone up or that the department has undertaken new work?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In certain instances the cost of labour and the cost of coal may have gone up.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could the minister give the particulars of the annual cost, and the number of vessels of all descriptions that go through the locks on the Rideau canal at the rear of these buildings? That might be of interest to some hon. members.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is under the Department of Transport; it does not come under this vote.

287. Snagboats, $49,745.

Mr. MacNICOL: A year or two ago I asked the minister if he had a programme for removing the snags from the Athabaska river.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): After the hon. gentleman made his representations in the house I made inquiries and found that we had no complaints of any obstacles there at the time, and I did not know exactly where the work suggested was required. We were ready to do the work, but no one made any complaints.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would suggest that the minister write the Hudson's Bay company either at Waterways or at Edmonton, because the captains of the ships told me that frequently the bottoms of the barges that go down the river are torn off by the snags. On my own journey down the river I saw many snags; that is, butts of trees. I am sure that if the minister will communicate with the Hudson's Bay company he will get the information.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We will do that.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—
Maintenance and operation of roads and bridges.
290. New Westminster bridge, $49,635.

Mr. REID: The committee probably is not aware of the actual situation in connection with this bridge, for it is one of the bridges that return revenue to the dominion government. It was built by the provincial government some forty-three years ago as a passenger, vehicle and railway bridge. A few years ago the provincial government decided to construct a new bridge, and since it was to be over a navigable stream they had to come to the dominion government for permission. Since the new bridge was to be just a few feet from the old bridge the question arose as to whether the old bridge would be a hindrance to navigation in the event that the new bridge was built. Following the controversy, the provincial government handed over this railway bridge to the dominion without cost. Three railways operate over the bridge, and pay tolls. My understanding of the matter is that the surplus accruing from the operation of the bridge each year was to be placed in a fund, and that if within ten years the dominion government did not take steps to put in a lift span to replace the centre span of the bridge, thereby removing the menace to navigation, the funds accruing over the ten-year period would revert to the provincial government. Time is getting along, and I should like to see some steps taken to remove this centre span and replace it with a lift span, thereby removing the menace to navigation and complying with the understanding or agreement entered into between the provincial and federal governments. Can the minister tell us the position of the fund now, and whether any steps have been taken to carry out the agreement?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We took over this bridge, I believe, on October 4, 1939. The agreement has ten years to run, and under it we are required to keep account of the revenues and expenses in connection with the operation of the bridge. Every year we make a report to the provincial government. We have ten years in which to decide whether we are going to instal this lift span. If we decide against doing so we are to return to the province the difference between the revenue and the expenses. We have five more years to go, and as yet we have not come to a decision in connection with this lift span.

Mr. REID: Will the minister take steps shortly to have an investigation made into the matter? Some doubt was expressed at the time as to whether this centre span should be removed. Can the minister tell the committee the amount of money now in the fund?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have not the details as to the amount of money we have in that trust fund. We will investigate the possibility of constructing this lift span, but our work is limited by the number of people we have out on the coast.

Maintenance and operation of roads and bridges
291. Generally, $24,025.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since this is a sort of omnibus item the minister might give us the general details, because "generally" takes in a lot of territory.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They are all small amounts to provide for repairs, renewals, painting and so on. The list is as follows:

Calumet-Bryson bridge, Quebec	$ 150
Chapeau bridge, Quebec	100

Telegraph branch—
301.* Telephone Service at Ottawa, $100,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this amount refer only to the Department of Public Works?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; it applies to all the departments.

Mr. GRAYDON: From time to time one hears criticism in respect of telephone service. I am not saying that I have heard criticism particularly respecting the Department of Public Works, but there is a feeling that there is some laxity so far as expenditures in wartime departments and departments generally in Ottawa are concerned, and in connection with long-distance calls in particular. Last year I raised the question of telephone tolls and charges, and I desire to do so again.

Would the minister give a break-down of the $100,000? I fancy this amount does not take in some of the items to which I have referred, namely war items. Those items would no doubt come under the war appropriation estimates.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This item covers all installations of telephones in all departments, except for war purposes in war departments. We may divide the amount into three main headings: (a) telephone services, which include rentals of telephone instruments and mileage; (b) private branch exchange equipment, including automatic switching devices, switch board sections and so on, and (c) salaries of private exchange operators.

Under contract, I believe with the Bell Telephone company, we pay the following monthly rates: residence telephone, $3.38; private branch exchange, $2.22; direct office, $4.84.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that a considerable reduction from the regular rates?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I understand it is quite a reduction, because the regular rates to ordinary private parties would be about $5. The break-down is as follows:

	Number of installations	Expenditure
Residence telephones..	61	$ 2,473 40
Direct office	29	1,683 00
Private branch	1,971	52,458 20
Private branch exchange equipment...	....	27,154 71
Private branch exchange operators...	....	13,200 00
House of Commons sessional service....	....	2,800 00
Contingencies	....	230 69

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What was the amount in 1938, before the war?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am informed by my officials that it was practically the same.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—
Telegraph and telephone services, operation and maintenance

305. Telegraph and telephone services, operation and maintenance: British Columbia, Northern and Yukon districts, $135,000.

Mr. STIRLING: How much of this is for Yukon, and how much for northern British Columbia?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The whole amount of $135,000 is to provide for working expenses of the British Columbia, Northern and Yukon telegraph and telephone lines during the fiscal year. We have a staff of fifty-seven people, and we are paying total salaries of $100,323, with a cost-of-living bonus of $13,000, repairs amounting to $5,000, and supplies and sundries to $16,677.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this not the telephone system which has been picked up and collected over the years, and kept in existence by the dominion government—built in some cases by telephone companies, and acquired? This is what is left of a much larger system, portions of which were sold off from year to year to telephone companies. Is that not so?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes; the hon. member is right. But we are now the owners of the whole system there. We have our own operators, and the whole system is under our control.

Mr. STIRLING: It is treated as one system. It is not a case of having isolated pieces of telephone line here and there; it is treated as one system.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes; it is one system, under the same superintendent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As I understand it, the leader of the opposition was complaining about the excessive use of the long distance telephone. My objection is that the Department of Public Works is doing the direct opposite so far as British Columbia is concerned. I may not be in order in discussing this matter under this item, but the fact is that if the chief engineer in British Columbia wants to discuss the making of a $100 award or something like that, he gets "hail columbia" from the department if he uses even airmail stamps. I am not exaggerating. I think the matter of curtailing the use of long distance telephone or the air mail is overdone in British Columbia. I admire the urge for economy on the part of the leader of the opposition, but I do not think it should be enforced so far as the west is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: It may be that I did not make myself clear or perhaps my hon. friend was not in the chamber just as I made my statement. I qualified my remarks by saying that I had heard no complaints of the excessive use of the long distance telephone by the Department of Public Works. What I was complaining about was the general overhead of telephones in the war departments. The criticism in this connection has been quite heavy. I raised this matter last year but the minister indicated that it was a matter for the civil estimates. I have no criticism to make of the Department of Public Works in that regard. I rather fancy the hon. member for Fraser Valley is correct in what he says and I would be glad to join with him. I think such a matter ought to be straightened out.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have had no complaint that our officials were not permitted to make long distance telephone calls when necessary. They have instructions to use the telephone when it is urgent, and head office does use the long distance telephone for this purpose. On the other hand, we do not want this to be a free-for-all and have calls made on any occasion when the matter can be dealt with by mail or otherwise.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not a lawyer, but if I can get the protection of the court for my clients I would be glad to give the circumstances to the minister which substantiate what I have just said.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If the hon. member will give me the circumstances I shall have them investigated.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall be glad to give them on that understanding.

Mr. GRAYDON: You never need any protection.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is the officials.

306. British Columbia—Vancouver island district, $114,500.

Mr. BRYCE: May I revert to item 297, harbours and rivers generally?

Mr. FOURNIER: I have no objection.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the condition of the breakwater at Gimli. I have taken this matter up before with the minister, and he assured me that the engineer was up there last year looking it over. The level of lake Winnipeg is higher this year than it was last year. There is an old folks' home kept up by voluntary contributions of the Icelandic community and these high waters are destroying its foundation. I am not suggesting that any new work should be done, but I would like to have some piles put in there to check the inroads of this high water. This would be a patch-up job until better times come along. I am continually receiving letters from the people in the old folks home at Gimli saying that the foundation is being destroyed. I would like the minister to have the Winnipeg engineer go up there to see if some piles cannot be put in to remedy this trouble.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This matter could not be dealt with under item 297, because that is to cover small repairs under $1,000. I have not the file here, but the hon. member wrote me about this Gimli project and the report I received indicates that it would cost a large sum to undertake that work at the present time. If I recall, I answered that we would consider this as a post-war project. The second project was to patch up the breakwater, to put piles in, but this also entailed a large amount of money. If only a small amount were involved I would make a study of it, but I am in the hands of parliament. I am not asking for the large amounts in my civil estimates, because it is the policy of the government to pospone these works during the war. At all events I will look into the matter.

Mr. BRYCE: There are fifty-five old ladies and gentlemen in that home and it will be a serious thing if their building is damaged. A few piles would check the damage until such time as a real job can be done.

General—
312. National Gallery of Canada, $65,630.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise at this time, not to discuss the matter of the national gallery of Canada but to bring to the attention of the minister another matter which has gained considerable impetus and thought throughout Canada during the last while. At numerous teachers' conventions, educational organizational meetings and wherever people who are interested in literary and cultural pursuits have gathered together, resolutions have been passed and expressions of opinion offered in connection with the establishment of a Canadian national library.

I wish in a word or two to add my support to those expressions of thought. I have no desire to press the point at the moment. After all, we are in a war. Despite how encouraging the news may seem to appear at times, in all these things we must always keep our eye on the ball to the very last. What I am really advocating is that at the appropriate time—and there is always a right time and place for everything—there should be established a national library of Canada. I think it would be an indication that we have not in a new country forgotten the educational and cultural and literary side of life in our concern for things strictly material. I am quite sure that the government and those who are kindly disposed to a suggestion of this kind would find a cordial response in the country generally. There is a widespread desire among the people for better facilities, better equipment and better opportunities to gain knowledge of the various subjects on which a library would be able to afford information. Undoubtedly our parliamentary library fills a great need; and when I speak of our library I think I voice the opinion of all in the house when I say that not only is it a great library in itself, but the services which are rendered by those in charge, including the parliamentary librarian, often make us wond how they are able to accomplish the miracles of producing so promptly information that is urgently required.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was going on to say that the parliamentary library fills a great need for those of us in parliamentary circles and for those who are identified with parliamentary life. It is a reference library, of course, and has its limitations by virtue of certain necessities. I hope that when the appropriate time comes the minister's department, or whatever department may have this matter under its jurisdiction, will be able to proceed with plans which we should formulate now to have in Canada a national library which will be a credit and a tribute to a great nation. In Canada I think we are sometimes apt to be too modest about our achievements and in our outlook for the future, but I am hopeful that in the days which lie ahead, now that we are progressing so rapidly in material developments, we shall not put aside all thought of educational and cultural attainments and those other things which mean so much to a people if they are going to be a well balanced part of our civilization.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rose at the same time as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to speak in part on the very same subject on which he has made his very appropriate observations. I think, too, that one might recall, in his absence, that some strong representations on this subject have been made by the hon. member for Essex East, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. I mention him at this time along with the leader of the opposition and my own remarks to underline the fact that this is by no means a partisan issue, but rather something in which a great deal of interest is taken by many sections of the Canadian public. I earnestly hope that the day is not far distant when it will be possible to set up in Canada a national library, and I hope that it will be set up in such a way as to serve as many of our people as possible from coast to coast.

I think it would be in order if the minister would make some comment at the same time as to the work of the national gallery. Under the auspices of the gallery, even under war conditions and with war-time restrictions, some worth-while projects have been carried on, and perhaps the minister would make some reference to them. At the same time I wonder if he would also say a word about the national museum, which I believe also comes under this item.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; it does not come under this item.

Mr. KNOWLES: This item on page 38 of the estimates, with which we are now dealing, refers one for a break-down of the vote to page 177, and in that break-down I find mentioned a senior museum asssitant, other museum assistants, and a museum helper. It was because of those items in the break-down that I thought the museum was included in this item. At any rate it perhaps will be no more out of order to make reference to the national museum than to a national library, and the minister might speak on that subject when he rises in a moment or two.

I think we all share the views expressed by the leader of the opposition that in these days, when we have found what we can do in the way of raising huge sums of money for the things that have to be done in the time of war, we should not forget to raise similarly large sums of money for the good things of life and for the cultural development of this country.

This is still one other activity I should like to mention which might be included along with this kind of work. It is strange that this item should come under the Department of Public Works, but that of course is no reflection on the minister; it is just a comment on the administrative set-up. Along with the national gallery, the national museum and the national library I would suggest that there is room in this country for the development of handicrafts. The suggestion has been made in some quarters that if a lead is to be given in this kind of work, it might come under this same division of the minister's department.

I should be glad if the minister would make some comment on the status of these things and at the same time state whether the government have any plans for enlarging the work of the national gallery and the national museum, and for setting up a national library, and instituting work in handicrafts.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister also give some information with regard to the purchase of pictures? I see that $15,000 of this sum is allocated to purchase the works of Canadian artists. From time to time the opportunity arises to become possessed of a work of considerable value, which would be a great addition to the national gallery, an opportunity which in the past has been considered one that should not be lost. I wonder how the money is made available for such purposes.

Another thing I would ask the minister to go into is the extent to which the loan exhibitions have been made use of across Canada and where they have been shown.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In years gone by, the estimate for the national gallery was about double what it is this year. In 1928-29 the expenditure was $134,988.79. At the outset of the war the vote was cut down to $44,246.82. The estimate for 1942-43 was $43,082.44. This year it is increased to around $65,630. The increase comes about by the addition of two employees and the funds for the cost of living bonus. Since the beginning of the war a scheme was devised by the national gallery, and with the approval of the Minister of National Defence nearly ten thousand reproductions of the work of leading Canadian artists have been supplied to the Canadian forces at home and overseas for the decoration of recreation rooms and other quarters. At the request of the British war office two thousand prints have been distributed to the British forces. Two hundred prints have been sent to Canadian prisoners of war in Germany. The same prints have been supplied to United States units in Canada and Newfoundland, and are being furnished through the Department of External Affairs to all Canadian legations and government offices abroad.

We have held war-time exhibitions in Ottawa and elsewhere in Canada. The national gallery as a war service has made special efforts to hold exhibitions having relation to the war and the part of Canada and the united nations in it, beginning with the great "Britain at War" exhibition in 1941. The series has been continued with marked success, and has included Australian, Polish, Russian, Mexican, Czech, Chinese and United States collections, which have been shown first in Ottawa and subsequently circulated through Canada. A number of exhibitions of Canadian art have been held abroad and others are in process of formation or projected. The national gallery has placed its facilities at the service of the army and the Royal Canadian Air Force for the purpose of developing art exhibitions within the services. These exhibitions, which the military authorities regard as of the highest importance, involve a substantial amount of extra work on the part of the national gallery. The gallery also cooperates with the Y.M.C.A. in circulating art exhibitions to all camps in Canada.

As to educational work, the gallery has made special efforts to sustain public morale by increasing educational work in Ottawa and elsewhere in the dominion. Loan exhibitions have been improved and extended, and the musical programmes on Sunday afternoons have been made a regular feature of the gallery programme with good results.

As to the sale of reproductions by the national gallery, these sales increased to 14,886 in 1942-43 and to 26,000 for the first eight months of 1943-44, and probably reached a total of 30,000 before its conclusion.

I have an item here, "plans for future developments." A grant of $24,000 from the Carnegie corporation has been made available to the national gallery for the purpose of encouraging art interest throughout Canada, provided that the national gallery itself is able to make a fair contribution in this direction. Plans are now being made so that constructive action can be taken immediately peace is established.

There are two schools of thought. Many want us to increase this amount to a very high level, and I believe that in the next budget something will be done with that in view. As to the present time, the government is directing its efforts toward the conduct of the war, and it has not yet decided to increase our civil estimates in this direction. But I personally believe, with the leader of the opposition, that as a post-war project a national library would be a great memorial in a country of our size and population. I am not speaking for the government; I am giving only my personal opinion on this matter, but I think it would be one of the most useful ways in which we could spend the people's money so that they would have a return by being given the privilege and the opportunity of developing their knowledge and their culture. I would be prepared to second a proposition of this kind by the leader of the opposition if ever it came up for discussion.

Mr. McIVOR: I am not going to oppose a post-war effort for a national library, but to me there is something far more important than that. This war is being fought by all Canada. A national library placed in the city of Toronto or Montreal or Ottawa or Halifax or Vancouver or—

Mr. GRAYDON: Fort William.

Mr. McIVOR: —Fort William, would help only one city. I think we should have a recreational centre in every community, with a reading room, with all the athletic endeavours of the community centred in that place. If you had that you could make it a memorial to our boys, and the government could very well give a donation. I am giving notice to the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Public Works that we shall count on the government of Canada for a donation of that kind, because they took our rink, and now it is one of the finest armouries in Canada, but we have no hockey rink. One of the outstanding agencies for the obliteration of juvenile crime is a recreational centre with a good reading room, with good, clean, Christian supervisors. It would far outshine any national gallery which could be put up in any centre in Canada.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Just to complete the record and be fair to the national gallery I should like to add this statement. In 1942 the director was made chairman of the Canadian war artists committee, established under the authority of the defence council to develop a record of Canada's part in the war, using Canadian artists. Fifteen of the foremost Canadian artists have been selected and commissioned—six in the army, six in the Royal Canadian Air Force and three in the navy. Some are in England, Africa, Italy and elsewhere as well as in Canada. The organization of their work, the supply of materials, the care of the paintings produced and the arrangement of exhibitions is largely the responsibility of the national gallery. An exhibition of Canadian war art will shortly be opened in the national gallery at London. As many qualified civilian artists as possible have been employed in Canada outside the defence council scheme under the direction of the national gallery. These artists have been assigned to work on the Pacific coast, the Alaska highway, the east coast, on the Atlantic convoys, and elsewhere to record important phases of Canada's war effort. In most cases the artists have contributed their time except for payments to cover expenses.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister indicate where the museum comes in the estimates?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): These probably are the ones which take care of the paintings we have in the gallery. If the hon. member has reference to the museum, that does not come under my department at all. I believe it comes under—

Mr. STIRLING: Mines and resources.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is an excellent idea to have these artists commissioned and securing for Canada some wonderful portraits and pictures of war scenes during the war. Has any thought been given to the method of housing these when they return? A suitable building will be necessary, and I suggest it might be well to think about that now. I remember that after the last war a great many important pictures were sent to Canada, and I am not sure that there is yet a suitable place provided in which to display them.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I understand we are giving thought to a project of that kind; but it is considered as a post-war project. We are not contemplating the immediate erection of a building in the midst of a war.

Mr. BRUCE: I should not think that would be done now, but it will take some time to get ready for the post-war reconstruction period.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I support what my leader has said in connection with the national library. I would refer the committee to resolution which was passed in the other place not long ago with reference to a uniform school history book for Canada. In conjunction with a national library for Canada we could teach history on a basis that would be acceptable to all the provinces, and in that way we would do a great deal for the unity of the country.

General—

313. Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $25,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is preference being given to disabled veterans in every elevator operated under the control of this department? I would suggest particularly that those which are automatic should certainly be so treated and that an absolute preference should be given to disabled veterans. I do not know whether that is the rule now.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): These elevator operators are civil servants, and they come under the scope of the civil service act and receive preference under that act over all other applicants. There is a special section in the act giving them that preference.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not particularly concerned about civil servants; my concern is with the veterans. If I were allowed to do so I could tell the minister what I would do with the civil service commission. Certainly I do not think they should have any say in the matter. I understand that all government buildings come under the Department of Public Works, and I contend, therefore, that the minister's department should have control of this matter and that the disabled veterans should have an absolute preference in all elevators.

There is another point I would touch upon. There is an excellent engineering staff in our province. I have never heard any complaints about their work, and the only fault I have to find is that they are not paid enough. They should be getting more money than is being paid them; they should be better off in comparison with the work that others do, because they have a greater responsibility. I do not think the department is paying either British Columbia or Yukon the salaries that should be paid considering the responsibilities that are placed on engineers and senior officials in that part of the country.

Another complaint I have is that sufficient authority is not given to the departmental representative in that province. If I as a member of parliament suggested that certain wharves were falling to pieces and endangering the lives of the people in my riding, action would have to be referred to Ottawa and, I presume, to that other place, and then forwarded to Geneva; the report would come back here and eventually the government would give the engineer authority to spend a few dollars. There are district engineers in British Columbia and other provinces, and surely they are competent to administer the expenditure of a small sum of money on their own when they are supervising the expenditure of many millions of public money in the construction of projects of one kind and another. In small matters they should have authority, without reference to Ottawa, to make a reasonable expenditure. I do not suggest for a moment that they should have authority to spend $100,000 or so. I do not know what the amount is that they can spend now on their own, and I would be glad if the minister would inform me as to that. Up to what amount can the engineer spend without reference to the department? Whatever it is, I am sure it is not enough. If the minister has sufficient confidence in his district engineer to allow him to supervise the expenditure of millions, then I suggest that the engineer should be allowed to act on his own in the expenditure of a few thousands. The matter has always to be referred back to the department, and if any expenditure is improperly made it will not be sanctioned. The privilege I have suggested should be given the engineer. May I ask exactly what his privilege is in this connection?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And I have given my opinion.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I respect the hon. gentleman's opinion, but I do not know that what he suggests is justified right now. He tells us that resident engineers and architects spend millions. That is more than the minister has at his disposal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do not put words into my mouth. I say that they supervise large expenditures and the department O.-K.'s them.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Not in these years, because the total estimates of my department are thirteen millions.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How many millions did you say?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Thirteen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is quite a few millions.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): But that is spread over the dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and we have resident engineers in each district so that they do not supervise large expenditures. The hon. member would not want us to give authority to employees to spend large amounts without sanction from Ottawa. That would not be a good policy. The minister himself, with all his technical advisers, cannot spend very large sums. They have to be submitted to council after approval by parliament.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not asking for large sums. I could give specific cases where the department did not authorize the engineer to make only a nominal expenditure of a few hundred dollars, and the consequence was that it cost the people of Canada several thousand dollars. I do not say that the engineer should be allowed to spend large sums, but take an expenditure of $500. I do not know what the limit is, but that is not a large amount of money for public works. The trouble is that the department does not realize that there is such a place as the west, such a province as British Columbia. That province is three thousand miles away and we have a very long coast. After all, there are only two coastlines in Canada, one in the maritimes, that other forgotten part of Canada, and the other in British Columbia, and there are hundreds of wharves to be attended to. I contend that the engineer should have authority to spend a reasonable amount. No one expects him to be given authority to spend thousands of dollars, but certainly he should be allowed to spend a reasonable amount. The Minister of Finance and the wartime prices and trade board would agree that, in order to keep down inflation, it would be better to spend a reasonable amount instead of having to spend enormous sums afterwards. The department cannot deny that, simply because its engineer had not been given the authority to make a reasonable expenditure when equipment was available to do the work, but was obliged instead to refer the matter back to Ottawa, it cost thousands of dollars later on to bring in that equipment.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not want to start an argument on the best way in which to spend public moneys, but I do think we could give authority to individuals to spend money without authorization after due consideration of what they want to do with that money. I should not like to say that we would give a blank cheque to an architect or an engineer to spend $1,000 or $2,000 or $5,000 without first having the approval of the governor in council. I am convinced that our system is certainly the best way of protecting public money.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Can the district engineer in British Columbia spend any amount without referring it to the department?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In urgent cases up to $200.

Mr. MacNICOL: Last year I asked the minister if repairs would be made to docks at the Pas in northern Manitoba, and as the member for that district is not present I should like to ask a question.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I cannot recall that the question was put, but perhaps my memory fails me. At any rate, this item is to cover unforeseen construction of miscellaneous works which cannot be taken from the general votes and which otherwise have not been provided for, the amount to be expended on any work not to exceed $3 thousand. This amount of $25,000 is generally expended in small sums of perhaps one hundred, two hundred or three hundred dollars, to cover unforeseen contingencies, small repairs and emergencies.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have any repairs been made to the docks at the Pas?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No, I do not recall that we have made any repairs there. I can give the hon. member a list of the works which were authorized under this item last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am only concerned with that one.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There was no work done at the Pas last year under this item.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few years ago the government spent a large sum of money on the construction of docks at the Pas, but during the last few years those docks have become badly dislocated and dangerous. I should think the resident engineer there ought to be ordered to send in a report as to what can be done. It is beyond my comprehension why any department would allow a situation to remain such as exists at the Pas. The least we can do is to put the docks in a safe condition. If children are drowned or fall through the broken boards and get hurt at these docks the government will be responsible.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I cannot recall having received any request for repairs there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; I brought up the matter myself.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I will have the officials and the engineers investigate and make a report.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who is in charge of maintenance and repairs for the docks on lake Winnipeg?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is our engineer in Winnipeg.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to know why the pioneers in the riding of the hon. member for Selkirk should be compelled to endure the present conditions in connection with those docks. I was down the west side of the lake last summer, and the ship came alongside one dock in particular. I have forgotten the name of it; I took a picture at the time, and a moment ago I went upstairs to look for the picture, but in my hurry to get back to the chamber I did not find it. I have forgotten the name of this small place where the dock was, a very nice little place, but apparently on some previous trip the log dock had been knocked helter-skelter, so that the ship I was on had great difficulty in coming alongside a crib that had been constructed. The passengers had to hop from one crib to another, across narrow planks. The departmental engineer at Winnipeg, or wherever he is located, certainly should go up and down the lake every year to see that the docks are kept in proper shape.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am told that the engineer is actually touring that part of the country now, and later on I shall receive a report from him. As a general policy I would have no objection to sending my engineers to every riding to look over the public works and see what repairs they require, but I am doubtful if I would be able to get an estimate through the house for four or five million dollars to do the work. I do not think at this time the house would be prepared to approve the expenditure that would be required to repair all these wharves, docks and public buildings. Hundreds of requests have come in during the last few years, and we have had to resist them as far as possible. I should be only too pleased to have the money with which to have all this work done, but I do not believe I should request an increase in my estimates this session.

Mr. BRYCE: For the information of the hon. member for Davenport I can say that the island to which he is referring is Matheson island, where the dock was in very bad shape. The local residents went to a woodlot there, belonging to one of the large companies, and took some piles for the purpose of repairing it. For their labours they were fined $5 for each stick they took in order to keep that dock in place. I have been up through those islands and have seen those docks since my hon. friend was there, and they are badly in need of patching.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know how the amount voted under this item will be expended, but not having been in the house this afternoon—I had to attend the banking and commerce committee—I should like to take this opportunity of calling the minister's attention to the condition of the breakwater and wharf at Chance Harbour, Saint John county, New Brunswick. I brought this matter to the attention of the Department of Public Works before the present minister occupied his position. The last time I was in that vicinity I found that nothing had been done. The amount required to make the repairs would not be very large, but the longer the work is delayed the more these repairs will cost, and I believe this is work that should be done. I noted that last year some very necessary repairs were made to the wharf at Lorneville, in the county of Saint John, but nothing has been done at Chance Harbour. I hope the minister will look into that situation and endeavour to have that wharf and breakwater repaired.

Then I should like to ask if last year the total amount of $30,000 under this item was expended; whether any portion of that amount was spent in the province of New Brunswick and, if so, where and how much?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The estimate last year amounted to $30,000 and the expenditure authorized was $29,928.37. Of that total, $824.48 was spent at Wilson's Beach, New Brunswick. That was the only amount spent in New Brunswick under this item last year.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the minister be good enough to look into the matter at Chance Harbour?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I certainly will; I will have the engineer make a report on it.

Mr. McGARRY: I do not rise to compliment the minister on his generosity in spending money on public works in my constituency, but I wish to congratulate him upon the promptness with which he responds to any appeal I make in regard to necessary repairs to public wharves and so on in my district. We have heard the suggestion that district engineers should have the right to spend money promiscuously. I do not think that would be a good thing. I find that the practice in connection with public works in my constituency is this. I bring the matter to the attention of the minister, who promptly asks his district engineer to look over the work and recommend what in his opinion is required in the way of repairs. As hon. members know, under war-time conditions, civil construction is pretty well off the map. I must say that I have every confidence in our district engineers, and I believe the minister and the department have the same confidence. I say that because it has been my experience that after the district engineers make an investigation, their recommendation to the department is in most cases carried out. That is the way the work is done in my constituency, and it has worked out very satisfactorily. I must also congratulate the minister upon his promptness in bringing these matters to the attention of our district engineers who, after all, are the men best qualified to make recommendations.

I believe the minister is inclined to be ultra-generous, but it so happens that in war time we have to put up with minor repairs. However, after the war is over I pity the minister, and his district engineers as well.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: As the minister probably knows, the city of Edmonton is divided by the Saskatchewan river, which passes through it. We have some bridges which have been built partly from federal help. There is one of them, however, which needs to be repaired and changed considerably. The low-level bridge is very narrow. It is used by one of the railways, and also by the street cars of the city. It is old and, while I do not think it is dangerous yet, it is approaching that point.

I have spoken to the minister about building a new bridge at that point in Edmonton, and I thought perhaps it might be wise to remind him again of that suggestion I do not believe it should be undertaken right away, but as a post-war project I should like to put in a claim for a new low-level bridge in Edmonton.

Mr. POTTIER: The minister said a moment ago that he hesitated to bring before parliament any request for the expenditure of money on breakwaters and public works. I believe the time has come when there must be a change in the present policy of maintaining wharves and breakwaters. It is reaching the point where the money expended is no longer maintaining those wharves and breakwaters; they are breaking away, and going to pieces. The emergency repairs are not extensive enough to maintain the structures. In the very near future I believe the government is going to have to ask parliament for more money; otherwise these public wharves and breakwaters will go out of existence, and they will be no longer available for the public service they are supposed to render. I urge upon the minister that in connection with next year's estimates some thought be given to this point.

Item agreed to.

General—

317. War risk insurance—subject to allocation by the treasury board, $215,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister give an explanation of this item? I notice that last year the amount was $270,000.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This amount of $215,000 is to provide for the payment of war risk insurance on property under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works. These properties are evaluated at approximately $199,067,189, and are insurable for ninety per cent of their value, or $179,160,470. The premium is at the rate of twelve cents per $100, thereby making a total of $214,993, or approximately $215,000 in round figures.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have they had losses?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. The hon. member will recall when this law was put on the statute books.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this risk carried by the dominion government?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes, it is; but I would have to read over the Act to Provide for Insurance of Property Against War Risks and the Payment of Compensation for War Damage, assented to on August 1, 1942. I do not recall the specific sections in that act, but I know that government properties come under that scheme of insurance. The premium is paid into a fund, and I cannot recall what is to take place with regard to that fund after the war. However, it is not only government property that is insured under this act; private property is included as well.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is a premium paid to the dominion government, is it not, for insurance by the dominion government?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is no outside agency which insures it?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the object of paying a premium of $215,000 to the dominion government for this?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not know if this is the proper time to discuss the statute passed in 1942. There was a lengthy discussion at that time. It was understood that we would come under that act and insure the property. Since the Department of Public Works is the custodian of most government properties in the country, we have them insured at twelve cents per $100, and pay the premiums yearly.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Was this insurance placed through any agent?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is a government insurance; we do not have agencies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that it is government insurance; what I cannot understand is why. It belongs to the government, and it would seem that the government is just taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. Is that not correct? I should like to know how this insurance was placed.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The hon. member is dealing only with the government feature of the act. It will be remembered, however, that the act was passed so as to apply not only to government property, but to other property as well. A good many have come under this act, and are paying premiums.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is not only government property, then? I understand it is property leased by the government as well.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is the amount of the premium for properties owned by the federal government. I could read the minute of the meeting, if you wish.

Mr. BOUCHER: Does the minister say that the act requires that the government insure this building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Here is the section under which we operate, section 3 of the War Risk Insurance Act:

(1) The minister may, on behalf of His Majesty, enter into a contract of insurance with any person to insure against the risk of war damage, any property in which such person has an insurable interest.

(2) The minister may, subject to the provisions of this act or any regulation, determine the terms and conditions upon which he will enter into any contract of insurance, including therein, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing,

(a) the rate or rates of premium;

(b) the amount or amounts of the indemnity which may be payable under the contract;

(c) the maximum amount payable in respect of any insured property or part thereof irrespective of the sum insured;

(d) the terms of co-insurance, if any.

(3) The minister may, in his absolute discretion, refuse to enter into a contract of insurance with any person.

We come under that by a minute of treasury board dated September 30, 1942, reading:

The board had under consideration a submission from the Honourable the Minister of Finance reporting:

1. That under the War Risk Insurance Act, 1942, being chapter 35 of the statutes of Canada 1942, the Minister of Finance is required and empowered to institute a national scheme of war risk insurance to protect buildings, machinery, fixtures or other structures, erected or placed upon, in, over or affixed to land, and all movable corporeal property in Canada against war damage;

2. That pursuant to the said act, the national scheme of war risk insurance has been established with the cooperation and assistance on a non-profit basis of the fire insurance companies and their agents in Canada;

3. That policies are now being sold to property holders in Canada insuring them against the risk of war damage as from twelve o'clock noon E.D.S.T. of September 15, 1942. The rates and terms of coverage are to be as determined by the Minister of Finance;

4. That every effort will be made to secure as wide a coverage in Canada as possible so as to spread the risk and enable the coverage to be sold at the lowest possible uniform rates of premium;

5. That in order to secure such wide coverage, provision is made in section 31 of the said act for agreements between the government of Canada and the government of any province to insure the property of His Majesty in the right of such province;

6. That the same considerations make it feasible for the dominion government to insure all property of His Majesty in the right of Canada under the national scheme of war risk insurance;

7. That the adoption of the policy of insuring all government property against war risk would constitute a sound budgetary procedure against a possible destruction of large and valuable public assets.

The board accordingly recommended that we insure these properties.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is any of that risk carried by the fire insurance companies?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): All we know is that we are insured under the act which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. I did not study the act before coming into the chamber and I am trying to recall what took place in 1942. I believe it was understood at that time that the government of Canada would insure its own buildings under that scheme, as it was open to the provinces and the public at large to do.

Mr. BOUCHER: As I read the act there is no requirement that the dominion government shall insure against war risk, but there is permission that they may. The government have seen fit to reduce this premium from $270,000 to $215,000. Air raid precautions have been reduced, and I think the argument which caused the government to reduce this vote from $270,000 to $215,000 should cause them to discontinue it altogether. So far as I can see there is no obligation whatsoever to insure against war risk; so why pay $215,000 to carry war risk insurance, either by placing it through an agent or some other company?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): To whom is the $215,000 paid?

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am under the impression it is paid to the Department of Finance out of our estimates. The Minister of Finance administers the war risk insurance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Your department pays $215,000 to the Minister of Finance? You give him a cheque for it?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes. I suppose after the war, if there is no damage, this fund will be distributed in some way or be put into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That really does not answer my question. I should like to know to whom the money is paid.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): To the Minister of Finance.

Mr. KINLEY: I think the War Risk Insurance Act which was passed some years ago by this parliament is a splendid piece of legislation. There was an element in it that proved advantageous to the general public, especially the people on the Atlantic coast. Each property home owned was given $4,000 insurance without premium. Unless you had a pool into which the industries of Canada and the public generally came, you would have a position which would not be sound from an economic point of view.

Since the government passed this legislation it seems to me that they should be the first to come into the scheme and protect their property. There is a provision in the act whereby premiums will be returned in a large measure if there is no loss by enemy action. We are thankful to know that we have passed through the crisis so far without much loss, and there will probably be an amount of premiums returned to those who paid them into the fund. I think this scheme was very helpful to the Canadian people.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The hon. member for St. Paul's wanted to know where the money went. Section 21 of the act reads:

There shall be a special account in the consolidated revenue fund called "the war damage insurance special account" herein called the special account, to which the minister shall from time to time credit all moneys received under the provisions of this act.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

88. Departmental administration, $165,975.

Mr. REID: There is one suggestion I should like to make to the Minister of Justice, and I do not know whether representations in this connection have been made to him by the city officials of New Westminster. They have asked that an investigation be made into the change which was made in the criminal code, I believe last year. Under that amendment reckless driving was made a criminal offence. Formerly a section of the motor vehicle act dealt with driving to the common danger and cases of this kind were disposed of under that section. When reckless driving was made an offence under the criminal code the motor vehicle act was superseded. Since then, innumerable motorists have been convicted of reckless driving and have been penalized, but the experience of the appeals appears to show that none of those decisions would have stood up had it been carried farther.

The section of the code in question is to all intents and purposes inoperative because, no matter how recklessly a car may be driven, it is impossible to establish criminal intent. According to the authorities the effect of the wording seems to be that unless there is excessive speed, which is an offence under both the motor vehicle act and the dominion law, a motorist may be as reckless as he pleases without penalty. A case came to the fore in May of this year where a police constable was injured and a charge of reckless driving was laid. This charge had to be withdrawn because it could not be proved. Previously there was a section in the motor vehicles act of British Columbia which made that an offence. The information given me is that no case will stand up on appeal. Has the minister had any representations on this subject and will he have his officials look into this aspect of the criminal code?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): No representations in that regard have been made to the department since I became Minister of Justice. I do not think I should undertake to investigate a matter which is primarily of provincial jurisdiction unless invited to do so by the authorities of the province. If there are provisions in the criminal code which, instead of being helpful, appear to be embarrassing in any section of Canada, I would expect the attorney general of the province concerned to bring it to our attention. I do not think it would be appreciated by the attorneys general of the provinces if I were to undertake to investigate the ordinary administration of justice in their provinces without invitation from them.

Mr. HAZEN: I would ask the minister if he has had an investigation made into the alleged failure of a certain Toronto firm to have certain tins of methyl alcohol labelled poison which were being shipped from the port of Saint John. If so, would he tell us what the results of the investigation were? In explanation of my question I might say that a coroner's jury which investigated the death of one of the persons who were so unfortunate as to drink some of this alcohol made a recommendation to the effect that in view of the fact that thirteen deaths occurred as a result of drinking this methyl alcohol the attorney general's department should be invited to make further investigation of an apparent violation of the Excise Act by the shippers, and the recommendation went on to name the shippers. Has this matter been brought to the minister's attention?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This matter has not been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BRUCE: I would ask the minister if he has yet had a report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with the correctness of the reported statement by Jacques Sauriol.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not yet had a report. I got a preliminary report of the interview which the police had with the lawyer who generally acts as counsel, but so far they have not supplied him with what he would consider satisfactory evidence. They are still proceeding with their investigation.

Item agreed to.

96. Payments of gratuities to the widows or to any dependent children of judges who die while in office, $15,000.

Mr. BENCE: Just ahead of this item it says:

Other courts—
Judges' salaries and travelling allowances.

But I do not see any item here under which I might ask a question with respect to judges.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Judges' salaries and travelling allowances are not required to be voted. That is statutory. The statutes provide what are the salaries and what are the travelling allowances, and this is the estimated amount according to the provisions of the statutes in that regard.

Mr. BENCE: I wanted to ask some questions about judges' salaries and travelling allowances, and I thought there would be an item under which I could ask them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no item to be voted because the salaries are fixed by statute and are a charge on the consolidated revenue fund. It is the same with respect to travelling allowances. But if there is a matter of information that I can supply, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BENCE: First of all I wanted to ask about the absence of the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis from the court of appeal of Saskatchewan. Is it contemplated that he will return to the court of appeal shortly? In view of the fact that he is absent on diplomatic duties, will his rights with respect to superannuation continue in his absence? If so, would the minister give us an indication of whether Mr. Justice Davis could retire on superannuation at the present time if he wished to do so? That is my first question. The other question I wish to ask is whether we may expect in the near future an appointment to the vacancy on the court of king's bench of Saskatchewan, which vacancy has existed now for just about a year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the first question, an answer would be an expression of opinion on a matter of law. Mr. Justice Davis is absent on leave without pay while serving in the Department of External Affairs, and I should not like to express here an opinion as to whether the time he is on leave with the other department could be reckoned for pension purposes; but I do not see that it has any practical bearing, because the pensions which are awarded under the Judges Act do not, in the case of the high court judges, depend upon the length of service; they are the same whether the service has been one year or five or twenty-five or thirty years. I do not think any practical effect could be attached to any opinion I might give as to whether the number of years in another department would count as years served on the bench.

With respect to the second question, there are several high court vacancies the filling of which is under consideration at the present time. There are two in the Supreme Court of Canada; there is one each in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario and New Brunswick; and I have a list—quite a long one—of gentlemen who have been recommended and some of whom have been communicated with in connection with the supreme court. At least three gentlemen whom we considered would be desirable on the bench of the supreme court have explained to us that for personal reasons it was not possible for them to accept the honour we were disposed to recommend for them. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that I appreciate as keenly as any practising lawyer the desirability of disposing of these matters with as much dispatch as is possible.

Mr. BENCE: Just one more question. I believe I asked it before but I imagine the minister missed it. Is it contemplated that Mr. Justice Davis shall continue to be absent from his post as a member of the court of appeal of Saskatchewan?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am unable to make any positive statement as to that. Mr. Justice Davis undertook this work for the Department of External Affairs as a war job, and at the time it was for not more than the duration of the war. There has been no arrangement made since that time, and I know of no change in the intentions in that regard of Mr. Justice Davis or of the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This item affords an opportunity for the minister to give the committee and the country his ideas with respect to a question which is being widely discussed to-day, namely the matter of judicial reform. The problem arises by reason of the fact that a very considerable number of judges in the superior courts of this country are over the age of seventy-five years. The Canadian Bar association on several occasions has discussed the question of the need of legislation being introduced which would provide for compulsory retirement of superior court judges at that age. Only recently, at the midwinter meeting of the Canadian Bar association for the province of Ontario, a resolution was passed, I believe unanimously, by the members of the council of the association, as follows:

> That each judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario—

And I think it is equally applicable to the other provinces.

> —whether heretofore appointed or hereafter to be appointed, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or immediately if he has already attained that age; provided that the tenure of office of any judge who has attained the age of seventy-five years may be extended beyond that age by the governor in council.

There have been striking examples of members of the judiciary of over this age who have made outstanding contributions, but generally speaking, and I think properly so, the attitude taken by the bar association and also by the public at large is that in the interests of the administration of justice provision should be made for compulsory retirement at that age. I realize the difficulties inherent in the problem, in that it is necessary in order to effectuate compulsory retirement that an amendment to the British North America Act be brought into effect, and in the resolution to which I have made reference it was recommended that an amendment should be asked for to the end that the resolution might be carried into effect. There is no more important matter before parliament than to ensure that the administration of justice shall be maintained at the highest level. It can be so maintained only by assuring that the appointments made shall be of outstanding men, men of great ability, learned in the law, and also that age or other infirmity of any members of the judiciary shall not be permitted to stand in the way of a sound and judicial system.

I would appreciate it, and I know the country at large would, if the minister would place before this committee his attitude with regard to this problem, to the end that the administration of justice may be maintained on the highest possible plane.

Mr. BENCE: I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I discussed this subject at considerable length when the amendments to the Judges Act were before the house, and I do not propose to repeat the arguments I advanced at that time. As the minister put it then, this matter was, I believe, on the agenda for the next dominion-provincial conference. I am a little worried about the fact that the holding of that conference seems to be very indefinite, in any event as to date, and I suggest that this type of matter might easily be handled direct with the provinces without the necessity of waiting until they all come to Ottawa or some central point to discuss problems which are of interest to them all.

It is an insidious position in which the judiciary finds itself, as well as the bar of this country, when members of the county and district courts are retired compulsorily at the age of seventy-five years, when members of the supreme court and of the exchequer court are retired compulsorily at the same age; yet in the intermediate courts, the king's bench and the courts of appeal of the various provinces, the judges hold their positions during their lifetime.

Mr. REID: How did it arise that they are different from the others?

Mr. BENCE: It all arose because of the British North America Act, which provided that in those courts the judges should hold their positions for life, whereas it gave the power to the dominion government to set up other courts and did not restrict them in any way in their setting up. That is why it is necessary to amend the British North America Act, because the dominion government and the administration say that by virtue of the language of that act, they have not the right to compulsorily retire such judges at seventy-five. On the other hand, with respect to these other courts, power was merely given to set them up and the dominion government had all the necessary jurisdiction to handle them in connection with matters of salary, retirement, and that kind of thing. The suggestion has, I believe, the unanimous support of the bar; I feel sure that it has the sympathetic attention of the minister; and I suggest to him that action might be expedited and that we need not necessarily wait until the holding of the dominion-provincial conference to deal with it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I agree heartily with what has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Saskatoon City as to the desirability of there being provision for the superior courts, that is to say the high trial courts and the courts of appeal, to retire judges therefrom at a stated age. As the hon. member for Saskatoon City has pointed out, the reason why that cannot be done without an amendment of the British North America Act is that, under section 99 of that act, the judges of these courts hold office during good behaviour, and it has been held that the legal effect of the grant of an office during good behaviour is the creation of an estate for life in the office. Such an estate is terminable only by the grantee's incapacity on account of mental or bodily infirmity or by his breach of good behaviour.

As I stated on a former occasion, that is an item which is on the agenda for consideration at the dominion-provincial conference. The hon. gentleman expresses regret, which I share, that it has not been possible to have that conference prior to this time. He will realize that it would not be possible now, while the governments of three of the provinces are seeking a renewal of their mandate, to bring them here to discuss important matters which will have a long-time effect on their respective provinces. As the hon. member recognizes, the matter is something which is of concern both to the dominion and to the provincial governments because, though we appoint the judges, the administration of justice is a matter of provincial concern. At present there are in Ontario two high court judges who have passed the age of seventy-five; in Quebec, three; in Nova Scotia, one; in New Brunswick, two; in Manitoba, one; in Alberta, one; in Saskatchewan, none; in British Columbia, none; in Prince Edward Island, none. There are several gentlemen who have passed the age of seventy-five and who are still, as hon. members know, quite alert and competent and who are doing valuable work. I do not want to give any further indications, and I have said that because I would not like all these ten gentlemen who are on the bench at the present time and over the age of seventy-five to feel that everyone looked upon them as being incompetent to perform the work they are still doing. With respect to several of them I know that is not the case; but I think there should be a rule, which would be substantially in the form of the resolution read a few moments ago, that upon attainment of a certain age there should be retirement unless in certain cases and in a special manner the gentleman who had passed the age was invited to continue in office.

Possibly the suggestion of the hon. member for Saskatoon City, that this could be dealt with by correspondence with the attorneys general of the nine provinces, instead of waiting until we could have a provincial conference, which we have been so hopeful of getting, might seem to be almost a defeatist attitude. To say that there were some things we dealt with otherwise would, I think, be looked upon in some quarters as a confession that we were not going to have, in any reasonable time, a bringing together of those who should sit in such conference. I do not think there is anything more I can say at the moment. I do not believe that there should be an application to have the British North America Act amended in that respect without the concurrence of the provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has consideration been given to the passing of legislation by parliament that, upon a judge attaining the age of seventy-five, if he chooses to continue to hold and exercise the prerogatives of his office, his salary thereafter shall not exceed the amount he would be entitled to should he retire on pension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Consideration has been given that, and I understand that at one time this house passed in those terms a bill which did not become law. I looked over the files that had been used at that time and, after examining them and the debates which took place, both where the bill was adopted and in another place where it did not meet with approval, I did not pursue the idea of reintroducing it. I thought the situation had reached the point where it would not be difficult to get the concurrence of the provinces to do the thing in the direct way, and I think that is the way in which it would be best to have it done.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have any representations been received by the minister from any of the attorneys general suggesting their willingness to cooperate, or have the various provinces been consulted by correspondence or otherwise as to their willingness to consent to that being carried into effect?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think I could assert that anything of an official nature that could be acted upon has taken place, but I have reason to believe, not from correspondence, but from contacts with attorneys general, that it is generally felt it would be a wise provision.

Item agreed to.

98. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies, equipment and live stock; maintenance, discharge and transfer of convicts; compensation to discharged convicts permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $2,997,385.

Mr. HAZEN: How many penitentiaries are there in the dominion, and what is the approximate number of inmates in each?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are seven penitentiaries, and at the end of June the total number of inmates was 3,015.

Mr. HAZEN: Is that the total in the seven penitentiaries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the total in the seven penitentiaries including the penitentiary for women at Kingston.

Mr. HAZEN: Are the numbers in the different penitentiaries about the same, or is there any wide difference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are wide differences. In Kingston there are 619 male prisoners and fifty-one female; St. Vincent de Paul, Quebec, 891 prisoners, all male; Dorchester, the penitentiary for the maritimes, 356 prisoners, all male; Manitoba, 266 male prisoners; British Columbia, 324 male prisoners; Saskatchewan, 317 male prisoners; Collins Bay, which is alongside Kingston penitentiary, 194. I gave the total as 3,015; that was the previous month. At the end of June it was 3,018.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the heading, "operation and maintenance of penitentiaries," on pages 90 and 91 of the estimates, looking through the different items I notice that there are employed two dentists, three physical training instructors, four physicians and so on. If you have six or seven penitentiaries do you maintain different staffs in the different penitentiaries? Why should there be a physical instructor engaged in one or two penitentiaries and not in all the penitentiaries? Why should dentists be employed in one or two of the penitentiaries and not in the others? The same thing applies to physicians; why should there not be one in each penitentiary, rather than only four physicians employed altogether? There are some other items which show that the same classes of people are not employed in all the penitentiaries.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The establishment for each penitentiary of course is different. That establishment has been determined according to what was felt to be the needs of each penitentiary individually. There are physical instructors in all the penitentiaries. In some they are guards who are acting as physical instructors but who are classified as guards. In two of the penitentiaries the special position of physical instructor was established and the persons performing those duties are described as such on the payrolls With respect to the dentists, there are only two penitentiaries having full-time dentists; in the others there are part-time dentists. The same situation exists with respect to medical attendants; there are full-time physicians in, I believe, only four penitentiaries. In the others satisfactory medical service is attained from practitioners who do not devote their full time to the prisoners.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister say how many men sentenced to imprisonment for life on commutation of sentence of death for murder have been released in each of the last three years after serving for various periods of time? In asking that question I do not desire to criticize the policy in any way. I have seen in the press some condemnation of the policy adopted by the department of permitting men who have had their sentences commuted from death to life imprisonment to be released after serving twelve, fourteen, fifteen or more years. While no doubt there have been isolated cases in which this has been a dangerous course to follow, as has been proven by experience, in a recent case, I trust that the department will continue to follow the practice of allowing these men to look forward to the day when they will be released from incarceration.

Recently a man was released from one of our penitentiaries after serving some fourteen years following his conviction for murder. When that man entered the penitentiary upon his sentence being commuted he was illiterate and purposeless, and would have never amounted to anything but for the opportunities in the way of education that were afforded him in the penitentiary, which I am not going to identify in order to not bring home the identity of this man. After fourteen years of imprisonment in which he displayed exemplary conduct, during which time he passed through all grades from grade 3 to the equivalent of grade 11, or matriculation standing, he was given ticket of leave. That man is now serving or will shortly be serving overseas with the Canadian army. He has made good, and intends to keep on making good—the result of the opportunities he was given and the helpful consideration he received from the warden and guards in the penitentiary.

I trust that the minister will continue the policy of granting ticket of leave in worthy cases, circumscribed as it must be by the peculiarities of each individual case; for if the penitentiaries of this country can show even a few cases such as the one to which I have referred, the system now in effect of holding out the hope of eventual parole will have been successful and worth while. I repeat that in asking the question I did ask I had no thought of criticizing what is being done, for in my opinion the system of parole has worked out well. While a few men, after having been given the opportunity of reestablishing themselves in civil life, have been returned to the penitentiary, many men have been rehabilitated under the care and kindly attention they received while incarcerated for the crimes they have committed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I cannot give the figures for the last three years. To the best of my recollection, from December 10, 1941, to date four tickets-of-leave have been granted to persons who have had capital punishment commuted to life imprisonment. One case is that to which the hon. member has referred to and about which I also have received very encouraging reports. In the second the result has been most unfortunate. The third is the case of a man who had reached the age of seventy-eight or seventy-nine, who obtained a ticket-of-leave and was restored to his family. He is not able to get about; he is being cared for by his family and will remain with them. The fourth case was that of a man who was suffering from cancer to a degree which was looked upon by the medical attendants of the penitentiary as hopeless. He wanted to be given radium treatment; his family was able to provide it for him, and he was told that there was some prospect that it would be beneficial. He also had become an old man, and in view of the fact that the attendants at the penitentiary would not recommend the treatment he wanted to have, and that his family could obtain it for him, it was felt that it would be only humane to allow him to obtain that treatment. In all these cases we had strong recommendations from the respective wardens and chaplains, and it was felt that they were cases which could be sympathetically considered. In addition to everything else, the fact that there is some hope even for those serving life sentences is most beneficial for the discipline it is possible to maintain in penitentiaries.

In the administration of the ticket-of-leave or clemency provisions the principle in respect of those who have time sentences and who are not looked upon as hardened criminals is that even if they receive only a very small degree of clemency they leave the penitentiary in a grateful mood rather than feeling resentful against society. Even in cases where the balance is pretty fine, in view of all the reports we get, my own desire is, when it seems possible, to recommend some degree of clemency so that a man leaves an institution feeling that something was done for him for which he should be thankful. The degree to which this system has worked properly is, I suggest, shown by the fact that there are only between two per cent and three per cent of those who have obtained tickets-of-leave who have fallen by the wayside again during the periods covered by those tickets-of-leave. I think the fact that well over ninety-five per cent of those who have obtained tickets-of-leave do not again fall by the wayside during the period of their release is a full justification of the wisdom of that system. I think it is worth something to society to have them leave the institutions in a grateful, rather than in a resentful mood.

Mr. BENCE: When these men are let out on ticket-of-leave, are they examined by a psychiatrist to determine the type of men they are, and their possible tendencies, in order that no man may be allowed at large who, we will say, would be of a type who might commit a similar crime?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; there is no special psychiatric examination. The reports we get are written reports from the wardens of the penitentiaries who, in order to make those reports, get information from the medical attendants of the institutions. Then we usually have a pretty accurate life history of the persons concerned. Whenever there is any doubt, or whenever a file seems to raise a doubt in that regard, the practice has been adopted of consulting a reliable psychiatrist in the Department of Pensions and National Health, and to get an opinion from him. But for the purposes of tickets-of-leave, I have not had any case in which I found it necessary to have a personal examination made by a psychiatrist. If there seemed to be so much doubt that one would have to employ a psychiatrist to make a personal examination, that would not look like a very good case to recommend to His Excellency for the exercise of clemency.

Mr. BENCE: What I had in mind was this, that there are certain tendencies which are not apparent to laymen. I had in mind particularly a man who was allowed out on ticket-of-leave in Manitoba recently, and who committed the same crime upon getting out. I was going to suggest to the minister that more attention possibly should be paid to examinations by psychiatrists when it comes to releasing men who have demonstrated tendencies of that kind.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the case to which the hon. member refers there was not the slightest suggestion of any mental derangement, even at the second trial. No question arose as to responsibility. I repeat, no suggestion of mental derangement was raised and, as the hon. member knows, that unfortunate man was ably defended.

Mr. BENCE: Yes.

Mr. McIVOR: I am glad to have heard the attitude of the minister toward those who are committed for crime. I think it is right that a man who receives a ticket-of-leave comes out in a better frame of mind than if he had had to serve his full time.

I know something about this, from experience. When the minister was not in the house I said, when speaking on the budget, that in thirty or thirty-five years I had known of over one hundred cases out on tickets-of-leave or parole, and that there had not been one repeater. In fact, there are two men now in Stony Mountain penitentiary, who, in my view, should be out. I shall not give their names, but I know that one man has only seven more months to serve of a four-year sentence for bigamy. Had he not gone through the rite of marriage he would not have been there at all. That man has learned a trade. He is fit to ply his trade and wants to do so in war work, in an effort to make good, and to show his friends that he can make good.

The other man is in the penitentiary because of an accident. The accident was possibly a crude affair, but he is not a criminal. I pay my tribute to the citizens in the churches at Winnipeg who banded themselves together to take care of men when they came out—because we know that when a man comes out of the penitentiary and is branded as a gaolbird nobody wants him. Perhaps someone would give him a meal at the back door, but who wants to employ him? It is only a Christian service to treat these men properly who have broken the law and are caught, especially when there are hundreds out through the country who have broken laws, but who are never caught.

I again ask the minister to apply his best judgment in having these two men released as soon as possible. I am sure the Christian attitude and the common sense of the Minister of Justice will back me up, to the hilt.

Mr. KNOWLES: I fear there are a number of matters which unfortunately we are laying over, because of the pressure of war. One of those matters is the whole question of penal reform, both with respect to adults and in connection with juvenile delinquency.

I believe that just prior to the last general election there was an intention on the part of the government, as a result of earlier study, to set up a special commission to go into this whole question. While I may not have all the facts in my possession, I believe that plan has been left in abeyance, because of the pressure of war, and I can well understand that situation. Yet it seems to me that the problems being created in this field by the strenuous conditions under which people are living in war time make it important to grapple with this whole question now.

I should like to hear from the Minister of Justice as to whether any plans are under way either for a commission or for any other form of study of the whole set-up of our penal institutions, with particular reference to the question of juvenile delinquency. It is only natural under war-time conditions that many young chaps will do things they might not have done, had the war not broken out. It is unfortunate that in many cases they are treated as criminals. Apparently there is no other course to follow under our penal system as it now stands. But these same young chaps who, through misfortune may become regarded as criminals, at the present time are heroes who are offering their lives in defence of democracy. I feel that in deference to them, despite the pressure under which all government departments are working in war time, consideration should be given to the whole question of penal reform.

The minister knows there are many people in Canada interested in this subject. Newspapers and magazines editorialize on it from time to time. There are many social workers who are interested in this problem. The previous speaker has referred to the interest of the church. Despite the pressure under which the government and all of us are now labouring, I urge that there should be no delay in attempting to study our whole penal set-up in order that we may develop the means by which we can best grapple with this kind of problem in the post-war period, so that we may be in a position to rehabilitate those young people who have made mistakes which in bygone days would be regarded as criminal. I urge the government to reconsider this matter, which I believe they were considering at the outbreak of the present war.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister can answer at the same time the question I am going to ask. I was in the house six years ago when the minister's predecessor, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, told us that it would be difficult for him to carry on his programme of penal reform unless he were granted the vote for which he was asking. Between the two sessions in which the matter was brought up in the house I made a trip to the old country to study the system of penal reform the minister had referred to, namely the Borstal system. I visited many prisons in Great Britain, particularly the one at Leeds where the system was first put in operation and where splendid results had been achieved. I agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said and, if the programme contemplated by the former minister has not been put into operation, I hope it will be as rapidly as possible.

I should like the committee to know of the splendid assistance rendered in connection with the reform of criminals by such a man as Brigadier General D. C. Draper, chief of police of Toronto, and there are many others like him. I believe Chief Draper has associated with him a committee of outstanding men. When a prisoner is released the chief and his committee meet together and endeavour to obtain a position for the man. Such people should be complimented, and I believe they are by the minister when the opportunity presents itself, because they are doing a fine work. This is only one of the many organizations doing this work.

Can the minister tell the committee just how far the programme of penal reform brought before the house some five or six years ago by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe has been instituted in connection with our penitentiaries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, it would take me some time to recite all the recommendations of the Archambault commission which have been implemented up to the present time. A return was made to the order moved by the hon. member for Broadview on April 18, 1944, and this listed 101 reforms or improvements which had been made in the penitentiaries in conformity with the recommendations of the Archambault commission. In a general way all the recommendations that could be implemented without the provision of new structures or new buildings have been implemented.

The system recommended by the Archambault commission has not been established, because it would have entailed large capital expenditures in the construction of new premises for the detention, training or rehabilitation of prisoners. It was not felt proper to make these capital expenditures during the war. There was such a dearth of materials and man-power that it was felt that such matters should be postponed until after the war requirements had been met. So much for the recommendations of the royal commission which investigated the penal system.

Many years have passed since that royal commission made its report, and it may be, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that a review of the findings of that commission should be made in order to bring them up to date. I think that would be desirable before proceeding with the report which was made in 1938, six years ago. I believe it might be desirable to consider the recommendations before going ahead with these recommendations as a blueprint that will be entirely satisfactory. It may be found that there are further improvements that might be made. All these things certainly will be given consideration.

I have been thinking along lines that would not require considerable capital expenditures. We have all been concerned with the fact that there has been some increase in juvenile criminality during the war years. It has seemed to me that the high regard in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is held by the whole of Canada might be used in some manner to keep young boys in cities and towns out of criminal ways. During the war, units of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Voluntary Reserves, made up of prominent men, have been established in many cities in Canada.

The commissioner has been conferring with them, asking them if they would continue and set up some sort of big brother organization that would be helpful. We have also given some thought to the possibility of creating cadet corps of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The youth of Canada together with our adult population hold that force in high regard, and it may be that if we could have Royal Canadian Mounted Police cadets, who would have to be well behaved to remain members of the corps, we would give to the boys of the cities and towns an interest that would keep them out of mischief and would develop in them a desire not only not to break good order, but to contribute to the maintenance of good order in their respective communities. These are matters that are being given consideration, and probably something along these lines can be devised and set up with the cooperation of the Canadian people without involving large capital expenditures. I am hoping that it will be possible to make us older persons realize that we are to a certain extent the keepers of our younger brothers, and that we should provide them with things that would interest them sufficiently to keep them out of mischief.

With respect to the treatment of those who have fallen by the wayside, we are doing the best we can with the physical institutions that we have. We cannot undertake to modify and develop those institutions during the war period. But everyone, I think, not only in my department and in this house but all the social workers throughout the country, recognize the problem and are desirous of cooperating with the authorities to find a hopeful solution.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister able to give a detailed statement of the benefits obtained from the scheme followed by General Draper and his committee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot give details because that would involve specific cases. But General Draper's committee and like committees throughout Canada are giving very great assistance in the rehabilitation of those who are released from penal institutions. It is frequently a condition of ticket-of-leave that the man obtaining leave shall place himself under the supervision of so-and-so for the period of his ticket-of-leave in addition to reporting to the police. There are throughout Canada everywhere public-spirited citizens who accept the opportunity of exercising some superintendence over the men thus released on ticket-of-leave. It frequently happens that we are not content with the provisions of the Ticket-Of-Leave Act, which makes it necessary for the man to report periodically to the police, so that we make it a condition that he will be under the special supervision of a responsible man who agrees with us to keep us informed and to bring to our attention any tendency which might be displayed by the holder of the ticket-of-leave to resort to his former ways.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I should like to express appreciation of the interest shown by the minister in the subject of revamping our methods of taking care of criminality and especially of his interest in juvenile delinquency. I particularly appreciate his suggestion that it might be desirable now to review the findings of the Archambault commission, in view of the fact that they were made about six years ago. The significance of what the minister said on that point should be underlined, namely, that we have lived through far more than six years since 1938, if I may put it in that way. A great deal has happened to our civilization in those years, and it is highly important that we grapple with the problems that have arisen in the light of what we have gone through.

The minister referred to the fact that some recommendations of the Archambault commission, either in their original form or revised, would call for large capital outlay, and he indicated that because of that it had not been possible to consider them during the war years. I grant that in a sense the minister and the government have a case on that point; yet it seems to me that it might well be pointed out that any expenses involved in grappling with a problem like this which has been accentuated by the war might be regarded as war expenditure. When I think of the tremendous sums of money that we have been prepared to spend out of necessity to take young fellows who had no jobs and to train and equip them for their war tasks, frankly I do not feel that we should baulk at any huge expenditure that may be necessary to grapple with the problem of keeping our youth straight and rehabilitating them, if necessary, in the post-war period.

We are impressed in these days with the tasks of the war. I feel that we must warm up to the tasks of peace that lie ahead of us with some of the same vigour and determination. I urge the importance of our doing the equal of what we are doing now in making the lives of the people of this country the very best that they can be in the post-war period and in re-making them where necessary. I hope that we can think of these people who may go wrong, to use the old terminology, not as a group apart from our citizenry as a whole, whom we segregate and punish, but rather as an essential part of our own citizenry, and we are not really tackling the problem of crime seriously until we devise ways and means of properly rehabilitating these young people. I urge that we keep this thought before us, that many of those who may find themselves in the clutches of the law in the post-war period are to-day our heroes. They are our young men who are to-day offering life itself for the defence of a better Canada, and I urge that we owe it to them to do the best we can for them in every sphere. I am not in any way suggesting that any very large percentage of our young men are going to be problems for the administration of justice in the post-war period. What I am suggesting is that even a very small percentage, if it is only a very few, are, after all, human beings, Canadians, and we owe it to them to do the best we can for them If the government cannot see its way clear to make any capital outlay at the present time, I hope that the question of money will not stand in the way of the wisest possible reforms just as soon as the war ends, but preferably now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like it to go out that it was only a question of capital outlay which has prevented us from going ahead, because the Archambault commission recommended a penal system that would require constitutional amendments. As hon. members know, we receive in the penitentiaries those who have been condemned to serve not less than two years of detention. All the others—and they are a large number, and from the viewpoint of the sociologist, probably the most interesting group—receive sentences for much shorter periods than two years and go into the county gaols or into the common gaols. The system for Canada would have to be a general system applicable to all those condemned to detention either as punishment or for purposes of rehabilitation. That is one serious matter which will have to be considered and dealt with before real penal reform is possible in this country. The second is not only the expenditure of capital sums, but the work that had to be done with the capital sums which would be thus expended, and which would have required large quantities of material and large amounts of labour to perform. Then perhaps an even more important feature was that during the war period it was not possible to obtain the services of specially qualified personnel that would be necessary to make a system of that kind work. We had a war on our hands, and we could not go out and recruit the kind of personnel which it would be necessary to have to make a proper, enlightened system of penal repression operate. So that I should not like the impression to go forward that it was merely because we would not spend the money that it has not yet been done.

There are the three main features. First, there is the requirement of some arrangement with the provinces whereby the reforms will extend not only to those who commit such serious crimes as deserve not less than two years in prison, but to all those who fall foul of the law. Then, there is the establishment of a staff of qualified personnel; and the hon. member will agree with me that that is perhaps the most important feature of the whole scheme. In addition, there is the provision of the buildings which would be suitable to the operation of a scheme designed not only to take the man who has been called a criminal and condemned as such out of circulation, but to reform him when it is possible that he be reformed.

Mr. KNOWLES: One other short question. Is this subject, at least as far as the minister can place it there, on the agenda for the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is.

Mr. GILLIS: There are two questions I wish to ask the minister. If it requires very much digging to answer them I can let them go. First, can the minister give any indication of the number of inmates of penal institutions who were released or paroled for the purpose of entering the armed services? Second, can he indicate the number of service personnel who were incarcerated in penal institutions since the outbreak of war?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot give the hon. member precise figures as to that. With respect to the first question I can make this statement. It was not the policy of the army to recruit its personnel from penal institutions. It was only when the person was recommended as qualified to form part of the armed services in spite of the fact that he had had one lapse, and when he was found otherwise suitable, that he was accepted in the army. There are quite a large number of such exceptions, but I could not give any precise figures. There has been no general policy of saying to men, "Look here, you can get out of gaol if you will go into the army." That is not the attitude at all.

Mr. GILLIS: No. I understand that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it so happened that a man physically and mentally fit had fallen by the wayside but was looked upon by those who had been in contact with him as having sufficient stability to make a good soldier, he was interviewed by a personnel officer and in a great many cases was inducted in the armed forces.

The number of persons in the armed forces who have been condemned and admitted to the penitentiaries for the year ended March 31, 1941, was 101; for the year ended March 31, 1942, 166; for the year ended March 31, 1943, 190. I have not the figures for the year ended March 31, 1944, nor have I the number admitted to the common gaols.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the policy of the Department of Justice as regards enlistment in the armed services of guards and warders in the penitentiaries? The reason I ask is that in one case of which I know definitely, and the details of which I have before me, a guard in the Saskatchewan penitentiary joined the navy and received after a period of time his call to report. He had been in the penitentiary service for several years and bore a good reputation. At the expiry of one month's notice given by him that he intended to join the navy he received a notice from the warden advising him that he was suspended from the service.

I realize the need of the penitentiary services having a trained and available personnel, but I feel, too, that where a man desirous of serving in the armed forces has gone ahead as did this man, he should not be penalized as regards either his superannuation rights or his reinstatement when he returns after service. I do not wish to refer to the person by name, but I will send the minister the file. The facts in detail are that on October 20, 1943, he gave notice to the warden advising that he had made application and had been accepted for active service with the Royal Canadian Navy on November 23, 1943, and that it would be necessary that he be relieved of his duty at the close of prison on November 20, 1943. On that date he ceased to serve. Thereafter he received the notice that he was suspended from duty.

I believe, regardless of the considerations which impel the department to retain these men, that when in fact they patriotically join up they ought not to be penalized, either in so far as the fund is concerned and their right to the return of their contributions, or as to their right to reinstatement when the war is over.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are 135 officers from the custodial staff of the penitentiaries who obtained leave of absence without pay to join the armed forces up to the 1st of February, 1944, and we had reduced the operating staffs to the fullest possible extent. The man to whom the hon. member refers was an engineer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Efforts were made to find someone competent to take his place, and he had been told that up to that time we had been unable to find anyone fitted for the position and that much as we regretted it we could not give him leave to join the forces without pay. He went ahead and did so notwithstanding, and since then has been released from the navy and has returned to our service. He was taken back into the service because we had not in the meantime been able to find anyone to do his work for him. But it was necessary to have a rule of that kind, and I hope we are near enough to the end of the war for me to be able to say so now. I had said that these cases would be all reviewed after the necessity for maintaining a rule of that kind should have ceased; but that we had to have the rule, because we have a responsibility to the Canadian people to maintain these penitentiaries in a satisfactory condition, and there had to be that rule, which existed throughout the civil service. Anyone in the civil service who wanted leave without pay to join the forces had to get permission from the head of his department. Wherever it was possible to replace a man leave was granted, and I believe that in the administration of the penitentiaries we went the extreme limit. As a matter of fact, there were 135 who did get leave. As the hon. member realizes, we are in a particularly difficult position when leave is granted, because we have to hold the job for the man whenever he is discharged. We cannot offer anyone else a permanent position. We have therefore to get someone to take the position temporarily, because an officer who obtains leave of absence to join the forces has by virtue of the law the right to get his job back the very moment he gets out of the army. That created a situation which we tried to deal with in the spirit in which the hon. member would have dealt with it. There are some cases where there has been disobedience, abandonment of our service, and they will all be reviewed; but the personnel of the penitentiaries, we felt, had to be under the impression that they could not leave us without permission.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the method now of recruiting men for service as guards in the penitentiaries? They have to be physically fit. What is the system followed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The system is to invoke the assistance of the Minister of Labour and have him direct to us those persons who are willing to come to us and who seem to have the qualifications required. But it is really difficult because we are not able to offer them permanent positions. We have these 135 vacancies which we cannot fill, because we intend to take back these persons just as soon as they are discharged from the armed services.

Mr. MacNICOL: The recruiting is done through the national selective service?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is done by ourselves with the assistance of selective service. We notify our requirements to them and we do our best, but we cannot take anyone on without a licence from the selective service offices. If we find a proper candidate we arrange with selective service that he gets a permit to come to us.

Mr. GRAYDON: According to my recollection, that would be directly contrary to the law.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We cannot and do not take men who are physically fit and of the age group for service in the armed forces, but when we have a position to fill and know of someone who would be apt to fill it we ask him to go to the selective service office and we have a relatively high priority for the relatively small number of men we require.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
318. General administration, $234,751.

Mr. BENCE: I have an inquiry to make of the minister with respect to the method by which men within the force are advanced in rank, the method adopted by the administration with respect to recognition of men, the question as to whether senority is taken into consideration, the question as to whether or not any special courses are made available for men in order that they may qualify as officers, and whether or not that opportunity is given all men in the force who are non-commissioned officers, or whether the commissioner or officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pick out those whom they believe to be best adapted for advancement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On that I shall have to get information from the deputy commissioner, because I have made it a rule not to interfere in any way whatsoever with the promotion of men in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force. I have considered that to be the responsibility of the commissioner and that there should be no interference by me in any way with promotions in the force. I know there is a college in Ottawa where courses are given regularly, and candidates are trained in addition to the initial training which they receive in the first years of their service. I have no doubt that all the elements mentioned by the hon. member are taken into account. The rule of seniority is not applied in an absolute way. The purpose of the commissioner is to maintain the high standard of the force and it is not always by seniority that such a result can be achieved. This college is open to constables from all over Canada, not only those of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police but also those of provincial and municipal forces throughout the country. The selection of those who are to attend is finally passed upon by the commissioner, on the reports obtained from the inspectors of the various divisions, who are given quotas and make recommendations. The commissioner or deputy commissioner here in Ottawa passes upon those recommendations and determines who shall form each class.

With respect to promotions in the service, since I have been minister the commissioner has pointed out to me on several occasions that he regretted promotions were not being made with the regularity that prevailed heretofore, because it had some effect upon the morale of the whole force. The man-power situation was such that he was releasing only those who were no longer fit to serve, and he admitted that this slowed up promotions and was affecting the morale of the men, although he had pointed out to them that they were only waiting because as soon as the situation improved there would be a period during which promotions would be much more rapid, until the force attained the status it would have reached had there not been this period of war.

Mr. BENCE: I appreciate the necessity of obtaining the brightest and best trained men possible for promotion to the rank of officers, but at the same time I am a little concerned about the possibility that in looking for the right men to bring into the force those in charge might overlook many well qualified, well trained men who have been with the force for many years. I was wondering whether or not the matter of experience and seniority in the force was given first consideration in regard to this matter of promotions. I understood that in a number of instances men were brought in from outside, given special courses and trained as officers, while many well trained and experienced non-commissioned officers were overlooked. I should like to point out to the administration that in a great force like this it is essential to ensure that there be general satisfaction throughout the organization, and that nothing should be done and no course of conduct followed which would cause any feeling of discontent among the men and non-commissioned officers who might be led to believe that their years of training and experience were not being given consideration when promotions were made.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is under a misapprehension if he thinks men are brought in from the outside as officers. Everyone comes in at the bottom and moves up, but there is not and cannot be a rigid rule of seniority having regard to the efficiency of the force. However, we do not bring in men over the heads of those already in the force. When promotions are made, they are from the inside, and they are made by raising a man from one rank to a higher rank.

Mr. BENCE: I want to make myself clear on that point. I had understood that the administration looked around for men who might possibly be of the calibre of officers; that they went outside the force to bring in these men, gave them special training, allowed them to go to law school and that sort of thing, and then appointed them as officers over the heads of men who had been in the force for quite a number of years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is quite possible; men may have come in and leap-frogged over others who had been in previously, but I think that is inevitable if we are to have an efficient force. The commissioner and his principal aides should not be interfered with in their selections for promotions, unless they depart from the traditions that have been maintained in the force.

Mr. BENCE: I quite realize that; I merely wanted to point out to the administration that this factor does exist and that it should be considered very carefully in connection with bringing in too many men from outside in the manner I have indicated, so that men who have given years of service, if they have the ability, will have the work they have rendered fully recognized.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From my experience with the commissioner and his principal aides I am quite satisfied that he does not overlook seniority when it is coupled with ability.

319. Land services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $6,170,200.90.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister explain the procedure with respect to the laying of informations and proceedings under the defence of Canada regulations? Does the Department of Justice expect that proceedings under the defence of Canada regulations shall be initiated by the departments of the attorney general in the various provinces, or are such prosecutions commenced on the instructions of the Department of Justice?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In some instances informations have been laid at the instigation of the attorney general of the province. Other cases have been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice, and instructions have been given to the local office of the mounted police to get in touch with the crown prosecutor and ascertain if the provincial attorney general would authorize them to proceed. In some cases where that authorization has not been given, they were directed to proceed on the responsibility of the Department of Justice. Whenever the Department of Justice feels that there should be a prosecution it tries to have it taken up by the provincial authorities, and only when the provincial authorities are unwilling to proceed are instructions given to proceed on the responsibility of the department. It frequently happens that these matters are handled without reference to the Department of Justice. They are not handled without reference to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; but when what appears to be a proper case comes to the notice of the local members of the mounted police and it is reported to their superior officers, who authorize them to proceed, they get in touch with the representatives of the attorney general of the province. If the attorney general is agreeable to proceedings being instituted on his behalf the matter does not come to the Minister of Justice at all.

Sometimes matters are brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice, and the initiative comes from that source. One such case was referred to in the house quite recently. I saw a newspaper report of what seemed to me to be a very disturbing speech. I at once got in touch with the deputy commissioner, the commissioner being absent, and asked to have investigations made to find out if proper evidence of that kind of a speech could be adduced. If proper evidence is found, then the procedure will be for the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that locality to get in touch with the representative of the attorney general of the province, put the result of the investigation before him, and find out if he will proceed. If he will not proceed other methods will be adopted, if it is felt that there should be proceedings.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister referring to the Dumoulin case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I saw no report of what the leader of the opposition refers to as the Dumoulin case, that I asked to have investigated. I was referring to the case to which the hon. member for Parkdale referred, that of Jacques Sauriol, whose speech was reported as having been made on July 9.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason why I asked is that Mr. Dumoulin is a member of the government of Quebec—at least, a supporter of the government of that province. To put the attorney general, who is also of the same political faith and belongs to the same party, on that case, I should think would add complications which would be very serious. I am hopeful that the attorney general's advice will not be accepted too readily by the Minister of Justice, and I am also hopeful that the investigation will not take too long.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NOBEL MUNITIONS PLANT

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Was the munitions plant at Nobel closed during this war?
2. If so, what was the cost of closing this plant?
3. Is the plant going into production again?
4. If so, how much will it cost to get it into production?
5. How many men are employed in this plant?
6. How many women are employed in this plant?
7. How many, (a) men; (b) women have been brought to work in this plant from each of the other provinces?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes.

2. The cost of closing down and maintaining the Nobel plant during the shutdown, from the last week in February to approximately June 30, 1944, amounted to $269,636.10.

3. Yes.

4. The cost of reopening the plant is estimated at between $240,000 and $250,000, all of which will be charged into the production costs of the production programme now being carried out.

5. 644 (as of July 20, 1944).

6. 50 (as of July 20, 1944).

7. (a) Men—Quebec, 16; Manitoba, 2; New Brunswick, 1. (b) Women—Quebec, 5.

RADIO DEVICE "WALKIE TALKIE"

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Have any contracts been let or purchases made by the Department of Munitions and Supply of the radio device known as the "Walkie Talkie"?
2. If so, with what firm or firms, and where were each of such contracts let or purchases made, and at what unit price in each case?
3. Were any requests to tender made to other firms? If so, to what firms?
4. Were each of the contracts awarded after tender? If not, why?
5. What price is being paid for said "Walkie Talkie" in each of said contracts?
6. Have there been any reductions in the initial prices? If so, give particulars.

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes.

2. Six contracts for a total of 21,926 units have been placed with Addison Industries Limited at cost plus 5 per cent with provision for firm prices after costs were determined. The price agreed upon for the first contract for 776 sets was $521.97 per unit after audit.

3. A formal tender was called from Rogers-Majestic Corp. but at the time this store was required all radio manufacturing companies, including the aforementioned company, were working to capacity on other sets. It was considered by the engineers in charge of the development of this equipment that to place orders with these companies would disturb the production of other types of radio equipment which were urgently needed. Addison Industries Limited, who were not under contract for other radio material, were thus available and were chosen to make the "Walkie Talkie". Departmental engineers worked with the company and assisted in the development of the set. After development had been completed the first contract for 776 sets was placed on the basis mentioned in answer to question 2.

4. No. For reasons given in answer to question 3, and in view of a request from the Acting Deputy Minister of National Defence (Army) that because of the development work done jointly by the department and Addison Industries Limited the contracts should be placed with this company, it was not considered feasible or wise to call for tenders. Many changes in design have since occurred, a circumstance more easily met by having the contracts with one firm rather than several.

5. Ultimate prices are not known. Present contracts are being paid at a billing price of $505 per unit. Audits are being conducted with a view to arriving at an ultimate price and placing remaining contracts on a firm price basis if possible.

6. Yes. See answers to questions 2, 3, 4 and 5.

He secured approximately 100 skilled mechanics and fitters from the schools that are closing.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many persons, by provinces, have been prosecuted for breaches of the National Selective Service Act for failure to take jobs to which they have been assigned?
2. How many have been fined and imprisoned, by provinces?
3. On what principle are persons of the ages of 16, 17, 18 and 19 convicted, and is there uniformity of fines in each province of Canada?
4. Is any test made of the fitness of those assigned to heavy manual labour as to whether they are physically fit for such heavy work and able to perform the task assigned?
5. Do the courts look into the fitness of convicted persons?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The following number of persons by provinces have as of July 1, 1944, been prosecuted for failure to comply with directions to accept suitable employment: Nova Scotia, 6; New Brunswick, 8; Quebec, 11; Ontario, 45; Manitoba, 4; Saskatchewan, 6; Alberta, 5; British Columbia, 5. Total, 90.

2. The following number of persons by provinces have been fined or imprisoned, or both:—Nova Scotia, 5; New Brunswick, 7; Quebec, 9; Ontario, 38; Manitoba, 2; Saskatchewan, 6; Alberta, 5; British Columbia, 5. Total, 77.

3. In regard to the question of the uniformity of fines in each province there is no distinction between the age group mentioned and employees of any other age group.

The length of the sentence imposed or the amount of the fine levied are matters which, within the limits of his jurisdiction, must be decided upon by the presiding magistrate in whatever province the trial may take place. As a matter of policy, however, there have been only a very few cases in which proceedings have been instituted against youths of 16 or 17 years of age, and where action was deemed necessary the agents of the minister have been instructed in the majority of cases to ask that suspended sentence be granted conditional upon the employee's compliance with the direction to employment.

4. In all cases where the employee raises the question of health or physical fitness for the job to which he has been directed he is referred to a panel doctor for examination at the expense of the department. The local employment and selective service office governs itself in accordance with the doctor's report.

5. The accused is permitted, of course, to produce at the trial all evidence pertinent to his case. The weight to be given that evidence is a matter for the magistrate to decide.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 29th July, 1944, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister how many Saturdays he has in mind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope there will not be more than one.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group are not satisfied to let the motion pass without some explanation from the Prime Minister as to how many Saturdays it is anticipated we may be here. If this motion means that we are to sit Saturdays only for the purpose of handling routine business, that we are to sit one or two Saturdays in order to get the business of the house over with, we would be quite satisfied to agree to it. However, there is a lot of important new legislation coming in at the tail end of the session. The house is now sitting morning, noon and night throughout the week, and in order to familiarize ourselves with the new legislation, in order to try to understand what is going through the house, we require at least our Saturdays to catch up with our work. Those of us who have to remain here all the time while the house is sitting find it rather hard. The business that still has to go through the house is of extreme importance, particularly the new legislation which must be scrutinized carefully if we are to understand what it is all about and protect the Canadian people in the process of its going through.

Mr. HOMUTH: You are not the only one who is protecting them.

Mr. GILLIS: You speak for yourself. I am asking the Prime Minister if it is possible for him to indicate what the length of the session will be. Otherwise we are not in favour of this motion to sit on Saturdays, morning, noon and night, in addition to working the rest of the week on the same basis. We figure that we cannot handle the work of the house as it should be handled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to be able to give my hon. friend a precise answer, but when he asks me how much time will be occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite, I have to say to him that I cannot possibly tell. The length of the session, once the sessional programme is announced, depends more on the opposition than it does on the government. Unfortunately I cannot say how much time hon. gentlemen may wish to take in discussing the measures that are before the house. What I would point out to the hon. member is that there will be no legislation coming down that I am aware of at the moment to which reference was not made in the speech from the throne and the introduction of which hon. members have had knowledge of since the beginning of the session, or one or two measures since announced, the purport of which they are already aware. It is quite true that some of the bills have not been before the house, but I think hon. members have a pretty good idea of what will be contained in the bills. I point that out to make clear that the government is not trying to do anything exceptional at the present time.

There are still estimates to pass. These have been before members of parliament since the beginning of the session. There will be nothing new under that heading except the supplementary estimates that may be brought down.

It has always been necessary in the winding up of the business of a session to have morning and Saturday sittings, and I have tried as far as I could to judge what the wish of the house might be and have the wish of hon. members carried out. I think it was July 24, just a year ago to-day, that the previous session of parliament concluded. It looks as though this session, which opened almost the same time in January of this year, is going to run on some little time longer. But I do believe hon. members hope we may wind up the business without very much in the way of delay.

My hon. friend says, "we are here all the time," but I have not seen either his leader or the leader of the Social Credit group in this house for a week or more past. After all, leaders do count for something, or ought to count for something whenever reference is made to a party as a whole. I would say to my hon. friend that the disposition of the government will be to try to arrange Saturday business in a way that will be generally acceptable. We will not seek to bring on contentious measures on Saturdays, but I think we could get through a good deal of business in the way of estimates.

I hope there will not be any exception taken to this motion because I really believe it does meet with the general wish of those who desire to wind up the business of this session as soon as possible.

Mr. ADAMSON: This shows clearly the folly of the Prime Minister's motion which washed out all sittings on Wednesdays during the body of the session, thus losing much irreplaceable time.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to make a brief observation with respect to what has passed between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. There is something in what the hon. member for Cape Breton South says with respect to the burden which those of us in opposition have to carry as well as the members of the government. This burden falls particularly upon those of us who have to be in our seats practically all the time in order to watch the legislation. It does not give us very much time to study the legislation.

Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to consider this question a week from Friday. If at that time the house is not within a reasonable distance of concluding its work, perhaps we may have that Saturday off, having in mind the circumstances as they then are. I would have no objection to the motion going through on the understanding that the Prime Minister keep in mind the possibility of thus reviewing the position.

When the Prime Minister says that the length of the session is governed solely by the opposition—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not solely.

Mr. GRAYDON: I took it from his remark that he had the opposition largely in mind so far as the extending of the length of the session was concerned. I must say to the Prime Minister that the opposition needs a certain amount of time to give proper attention to the measures that come before the house. Having that definitely in mind may I point out to the Prime Minister that this is an unusual session from the government's point of view. I do not think since I came into the house there has been a session in which there were so many bills to be dealt with in the last few moments which had not been seen at all by the members of the house. The government will have to take some responsibility in that regard, because the opposition cannot be expected at the last minute to go through all the estimates and study important bills that have not yet come before the house and conclude the session within a few days. We have to consider that our job first of all is to criticize properly these bills as they come before us, no matter how long we may have to stay here to do it; but that does not mean of course that we should waste time in useless debate and repetition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take no exception to my hon. friend doing everything possible to protect the full rights of the opposition, and I agree that criticism is helpful. But I do take exception to the attitude that the government is always trying to put something over. The measures which the government is bringing down are obviously in the interests of the people, and I would hope that the opposition would join with the government in seeking to place these measures on the statutes as soon as possible.

As to a week from Friday, may I say to my hon. friend that in reviewing the situation I have been asking myself very seriously whether, if this session is going to run on very much longer, it would not be better to adjourn over August and September and meet again in October and November. I do not want to do that, because I do not think hon. members wish to do it, but that is an aspect of the situation which will have to be considered in any review that may be made. May I say to my hon. friend, with regard to what may be done a week from Saturday, that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Motion agreed to.

FARM PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient for the purpose of supporting farm prices during the transition from war to peace to introduce a measure to establish a board with authority to purchase through agents or otherwise, staple agricultural products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council, or to make such payments in respect of staple agricultural products as may be necessary to bring average returns to producers up to the prices so approved, and to give the board such powers as may be necessary for the handling and disposition of products purchased; and further to provide for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary;

To provide further that the governor in council may authorize from time to time payments out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, up to an aggregate of two hundred million dollars, for expenditures under the said measure, exclusive of administrative expenditures; that there shall be a special account to which all expenditures under the said measure, other than administrative expenditures, are charged, and to which all receipts from the sale or disposition of agricultural products shall be credited, which receipts shall be available in the account for subsequent expenditures provided that the net realized profits in the account in any fiscal year shall be credited to the consolidated revenue fund and any net realized loss in the account in any fiscal year shall be recouped to the said account from an appropriation by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient for the purpose of supporting fisheries prices during the transition from war to peace to introduce a measure to establish a board with authority to purchase through agents or otherwise staple fisheries products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council, or to make such payments in respect of staple fisheries products as may be necessary to bring average returns to producers up to the prices so approved, and to give the board such powers as may be necessary for the handling and disposition of products purchased; and further, to provide for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary;

To provide further that the governor in council may authorize from time to time payments out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, up to an aggregate of twenty-five million dollars, for the expenditures under the said measure, exclusive of administrative expenditures; that there shall be a special account to which all expenditures under the said measure, other than administrative expenditures, are charged, and to which all receipts from the sale or disposition of fisheries products shall be credited; which receipts shall be available in the account for subsequent expenditures provided that the net realized profits in the account in any fiscal year shall be credited to the consolidated revenue fund and any net realized loss in the account in any fiscal year shall be recouped to the said account from an appropriation by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor-General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPORTS OF KILLING OF ALLIED AIRMEN IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the leader of the opposition asked about a statement in the United Kingdom house, by Sir James Grigg, secretary of war, regarding the shooting of allied prisoners of war. Sir James Grigg's statement and the question of the leader of the opposition referred to the shooting of allied airmen who had been held as prisoners of war in Germany. The cases mentioned in Sir James Grigg's statement did not include any Canadians. The cases referred to by Sir James Grigg were in addition to the list of fifty allied airmen shot while prisoners of war, which Mr. Eden gave last month and which included six Canadians. I have ascertained that there were no Canadian airmen included in the supplementary list of allied airmen shot while prisoners of war which Sir James Grigg mentioned last week.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBLE STOPPAGE OF WORK AT HALIFAX SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On Friday last the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked a question with reference to the dispute in the Halifax shipyards, I replied that as I had just returned to the city I would be glad to give him a reply on Monday.

The answer is that we are doing everything possible to avert a stoppage of work in this vital industry. The senior industrial relations officer of the department in the maritime provinces is at present in Halifax conferring with union and company officials with reference to their differences of opinion with a view to bringing about agreement between them.

I have received a number of telegrams from trade unions in the Halifax district suggesting that the company be compelled to implement the report of the conciliation board. Without saying anything that might prejudice the negotiations about to commence, I would merely state that neither the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act nor the wartime labour relations regulations which superseded that act requires the acceptance of recommendations in reports of conciliation boards by the parties concerned. Trade unions and employer's organizations generally are opposed to any such step. I would say this, however, that the labour relations regulations compel employers and employees to bargain collectively, but do not obligate an employer to agree to the closed shop or check-off of union dues, which is the issue in this dispute.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

REFERENCE TO QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE (MR. GRAYDON) ON JULY 21

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition on Friday referred to a matter which had arisen in the other house and which he stated had to do with the privileges of parliament. May I give my hon. friend an answer as to my position in this matter by referring to an old and well-known rule:

> Whatever matter arises concerning either house of parliament ought to be discussed and adjudged in that house to which it relates and not elsewhere.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I say to the Prime Minister that it was not with respect to a debate in the other house that I was referring. It was a case of a member of parliament having made a statement in parliament and then being dismissed because he had made the statement. That, in my opinion, constitutes an interference with the freedom of speech of members of parliament, and for that reason I felt that the Prime Minister and the leader of the government in the other house should have a conference with respect to the matter because I very definitely feel that in this incident there is involved an issue of considerable magnitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that if he wishes to raise an issue of much larger magnitude he would ask this federal government or any member of it to begin to criticize the action of a provincial government. My hon. friend possibly forgets that the remarks to which he refers were made by an official of a provincial government which has responsibility for its officials. It has taken that responsibility and is exercising it in its full rights, and this house of parliament should be the last to seek to invade the jurisdiction of a province by criticizing the action of a government in relation to its own officials.

Mr. GRAYDON: The provincial government then is interfering with the right of freedom of speech, surely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend laying down the doctrine that a member of parliament can exercise freedom of speech to the extent of making any statement he pleases in regard to any situation of any relationship and thereby be exempt from consequences which may arise from sources other than in relation to his own parliament?

Mr. GRAYDON: He ought to be free to speak his mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did.

Mr. GRAYDON: He should be able to do it without penalties; that is the point.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO PUBLICATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a letter which I have received from the attorney general for Manitoba respecting order in council P.C. 3376, of May 29, 1944. This was the order in council that, amongst other things, raised the ceiling on the total income of old age pensioners. In the letter that I have from the attorney general he says that Manitoba has indicated its readiness to agree to the higher ceiling but that they are advised that it will not come into effect until the order in council has been published by this government in the Canada Gazette. I am told that they are, therefore, awaiting its publication. Could the minister tell me whether it has yet been published in the Gazette, or if not, whether it will be shortly?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the order in council has been published or not. I cannot think of any reason why it should not be published. We have been negotiating agreements with all the provinces, and the effective date, according to my recollection, is to be April 1, or such later date as any province may desire. I will look into the question of publication in the Canada Gazette and advise my hon. friend. Perhaps I do not need to do so in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall send the minister the letter I have from the attorney general for Manitoba. It includes a quotation from a letter written by the minister in which he said that the amendments to the regulations would come into effect on the date of publication in the Gazette. He said also that he would advise Manitoba when this had been done.

QUEBEC ELECTION

REPORTED STATEMENT OF JACQUES DUMOULIN IN MONTREAL, ON JULY 9

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Minister of Justice any report to make on the progress that has been made in the investigation of statements alleged to have been uttered by Jacques Dumoulin in the Quebec election?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am not having any investigation made as to the statement alleged to have been made by Jacques Dumoulin in the Quebec election, nor have I ever stated that I was going to.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that that is not quite a proper answer for the Minister of Justice to give me, because if he will look back in Hansard, he will see that he undertook to make an investigation with respect to this matter. In any event, I suggest that if he did not he should, and I ask him now to make such an investigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why don't you fight the Quebec election down there?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the official interrupter that I have no objection—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Get some Tories down there.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize that the hon. gentleman is attempting to move closer to the Clerk's seat all the time, but that will not help him very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Get a few Tories down there.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is a matter that should be investigated and I ask the government to investigate it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe there has been some misunderstanding because there are two Jacques, Jacques Sauriol and Jacques Dumoulin. I have stated on two occasions that the statements attributed to Jacques Sauriol were being investigated and they are being investigated, but I never made a statement with respect to words which were attributed to Jacques Dumoulin—

Mr. GRAYDON: Why not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —because I did not see anything myself in the newspapers which appeared to call for investigation. If the leader of the opposition says that something was reported in the newspaper which in his opinion would call for an investigation, I shall be glad to have the newspapers looked up and see if I agree with him.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say emphatically that I ask the minister now to have that done because I am definitely of the opinion that there is something that calls for investigation there.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will have it done.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, the sum of $23,425,286.45 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister will make a brief statement as to exactly what this covers. There are exceptional circumstances which the minister will probably want to explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. This bill is to provide: (a) one-twelfth of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1944-45; (b) an additional one-sixth of the five services detailed in the schedule to the bill.

The proportion of one-twelfth for all services is intended to provide for ordinary requirements to the end of August.

The additional one-sixth for certain special votes is necessary owing to the seasonal nature of the services provided. The first three items provide for the expenses of the Senate and House of Commons which are heavier in the early part of the fiscal year. The other two items are to cover geological and topographical surveys where expenses of sending out field parties must be undertaken early in the season in order that projects may be completed within the few months suitable for this work.

Two bills each providing for one-sixth of all items to be voted in the estimates for 1944-45 have already been granted. These were to provide for requirements to July 31. There were no schedules in these previous bills as provision was made for a uniform proportion for all services.

The present bill provides for one-twelfth generally and an additional one-sixth for the special services referred to and is in exactly the same form as bills of previous years providing for similar services.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the resolution carries, and this is largely by way of notice rather than for the purpose of starting a debate, I see that the House of Commons general administration estimates and Sergeant at Arms are included in the resolution. I will not repeat what I said on Friday in that respect. I do not wish to criticize the department, but I think something should have been done with regard to those men who are on the protective staff in the matter of uniforms for the summer. That however was not particularly the reason why I rose. I desire also to give notice that before the estimates proper come down I should like to have some statement from His Honour, when he brings in his estimates, in connection with the House of Commons staff, as to why there is a difference between the rates of pay of those who seem to do similar work in the House of Commons and in the Senate. Perhaps that observation will cover for the moment what I have in mind.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 164, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps I may reply at once to what the leader of the opposition has said with reference to uniforms for the protective staff. There has been considerable trouble in obtaining material and in getting tailors to make the uniforms, but I can inform the hon. gentleman that the cloth has now been obtained and the officers are being measured and will have their uniforms, I hope, shortly.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION OR ANNUITY

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide that a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior court, county court or the circuit court of the district of Montreal, may elect, in lieu of a pension or annuity as presently authorized under the said act, to divide his annuity so that his wife will receive an annuity equal to one-third thereof, and that if he should die in office that his widow will receive an annuity equal to two-ninths or one-ninth, in certain cases, of his salary.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the general principle of the resolution I think most hon. members are in agreement. Up to the present the situation in this country has been such that no opportunity under the law has been given to judges, many of whom have sacrificed large incomes in order to serve on the bench, to make due provision for their wives by the voluntary assignment of the allowances they would receive at the conclusion of a period of service. This whole matter brings into review the question of judicial reform and the necessity of facing this important problem at the very earliest possible day. Too often appointments to the judiciary in the past have been based on political services, and too often the qualification for appointment to the bench has been the fact that the applicant has been defeated for public office. I remember one occasion particularly when a member of the Canadian bar, referring to the system in the United States under which, with the exception of the supreme court and the federal courts the members of the judiciary are elected, said that there was very little difference between the system in Canada and that in the United States. That difference, he said, was that in the United States one had to be elected to be a judge, whereas in Canada the qualification too often was that one had been defeated two or three times.

I believe this resolution is evidence of the recognition by the Minister of Justice of the necessity of doing everything possible to ensure that the best possible men, eminent leaders of the bar, shall accept appointment to the bench. I do not believe there is one of us who was not distressed the other evening by the statement made by the minister that three outstanding members of the bar in Canada who had been offered appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada had refused because it would have meant too great a sacrifice. It is interesting to know that in the intervening seventy-five years since confederation, the salaries of the judiciary have more or less continued to fall lower and lower. The cost of living since confederation has gone up some 500 per cent, and during the same time the income of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and those of judges of courts of appeal, after deducting present-day taxes, are lower by $1,524 a year than at confederation.

To-day, having regard to the ramifications of business and the expansion of commerce, it is even more necessary than it was at that time to have outstanding members of the bar accept appointment to our courts. The judges of the superior courts in the provinces receive to-day, after deduction of taxes, $934 a year less than they did seventy-five years ago. May I add that it was recommended as far back as 1929 that consideration be given to increases of judges' salaries. There is no provision to-day for the survivors of judges after they pass on, and this resolution is to cover that.

Some may argue that our judges are exceptionally well paid but a comparison with the amounts paid in other countries will show that we in this country are endeavouring to enlist the best possible brains to the bench while giving the least returns. In asking men to go on the bench with the low return that is available to them we are in fact encouraging the appointment of members of the bar who are not outstanding, and in not having compulsory retirement of judges at seventy-five years we are continuing to penalize litigants in that they are required to have their cases tried before superior court judges a number of whom are unfit because of age and physical disability to perform properly the duties of their office.

I mentioned a moment ago the salaries in other countries. Let me compare the salary of the chief justices of Canada with judges holding similar or comparable positions in other countries. A judge holding a comparable position in England receives a salary of $30,000 a year, with $18,750 pension after fifteen years; in Scotland, $18,000; Irish Free State, $15,000; Northern Ireland, $20,000; Australia, from $13,000 to $15,000; New Zealand, $11,500; South Africa, $13,750 to $16,250. A comparable position in the various states of the United States pays $22,500.

I think it will be agreed that the resolution which has been introduced is a step in the right direction. It recognizes the problem of assuring the best judicial appointments in every province. It recognizes the need of giving men who accept appointment to the bench the opportunity to make provision for their dependents, and the minister is to be congratulated on this forward step. I believe that a committee should be set up—it is too late to do it this session—at the next session to look into the matter of an age limit for the judiciary. Seventy-five has been suggested in many provinces. If the best men are to be mobilized for the bench of this country; if we are not only to assure litigants but to convince them that they will receive justice when they go to our courts, early consideration must be given to reducing the age at which judges shall be retired from the bench. Personally I believe consideration should be given in many cases to retirement, or at least the opportunity given to judges to retire, at the age of seventy.

Parliament often seems to fall behind the demands of public opinion outside of the house. This resolution represents the point of view that is held outside this house by laymen on every hand. It recognizes the need for judicial reform. It recognizes that everything must be done toward maintaining the highest possible standard of justice. These things can be secured only if the law makes such provision as is necessary to secure the best possible men on the bench.

Mr. BENCE: In my judgment this is a very worth-while and commendable piece of legislation. I am in entire accord with the principle of the resolution. The details we shall necessarily have to leave until the bill has been introduced, but in so far as it is a step in the direction of making the position of the judiciary more secure I am heartily in accord with it.

I have always believed that having regard to the importance of the administration of justice, affecting as it does not only property but in many cases the life of the individual, the judiciary should be entirely free from financial worries. This is a step which has been recommended by the bar and by the judges of this country for many years. I am glad indeed to see that the Minister of Justice has taken cognizance of the stand which has been taken by these bodies. Generally speaking, I believe that the income of the judges is too low in comparison with comparable positions. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre when he says that in order to attract to the bench the very best type of man we shall have to put the judiciary in a better financial position than it is at the present time. There are certain provinces in which the emoluments of office are attractive, and in which there is no difficulty in obtaining appointments, but in other provinces where the practice of law is more lucrative, I believe I am right in saying that the administration has much more difficulty in obtaining the services of the very best legal men.

The Minister of Justice mentioned the other day that he had a certain amount of difficulty in obtaining appointments to the supreme court; that he had approached three men who he believed would be admirable appointments, but in each case they felt that for personal reasons they could not accept. I take it that at least one of the reasons had to do with the financial position. If we are to attract the best type of men to the bench we shall have to review this whole matter of judicial salaries in the very near future. There is no doubt that for many years the judges have been concerned about the position in which their widows and dependents would be placed if they passed on. It must be apparent to everyone that any occasion for such concern on the part of judges should be avoided if at all possible.

May I suggest to the minister that in addition to the measure which he has introduced to-day he consider doing something for the widows of judges who have passed on? In some cases they have been left penniless. Such a state of affairs should not have been allowed to exist. The minister has now introduced legislation which will help to avoid that in the future; but I suggest that he review the situation with the object of endeavouring to deal with the matter. I know of the widow of one judge who passed on a few years ago. In all fairness she should be placed in the same position as the wife who will benefit from this legislation.

I should like to commend this piece of legislation as a worth-while and forward step in so far as the judiciary and the bar of this country are concerned, and one which I believe will receive the support of the general public.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to say a few words, so as to put clearly before the committee, and so that it may be reported to the country, the purport and effect of this legislation. Hon. members who have spoken know how fully I agree with everything they have said, with the possible exception of the suggestion that it is still a requisite for recommendation to the bench, to have been defeated in some political campaign. With that I do not agree, because as a lawyer I really do take some pride in the appointments it has been my privilege to recommend since assuming office, especially appointments to the high courts. I should like to say as much about the appointments to the county courts—and possibly I would be able to do so if I knew the appointees before their appointment as well as it has been my privilege to know those I have recommended to the higher courts.

However the situation at the present time is that we are still in a war. We have ceilings—we hope—on the purchasing power of a dollar and also ceilings on wages and salaries. I fully appreciate the position in which those who are administering justice in this country find themselves, squeezed as they are between a salary that cannot be increased and a rate of taxation that takes from them a very substantial portion of what was looked upon before as being only what they required to maintain the positions to which they have been appointed. But we are all feeling the pinch. Under present conditions, although I considered and discussed all the factors mentioned by hon. members, it was felt that nothing which would put a further burden on the exchequer in a time of war could be contemplated for the judges—because if it were done for the judges, a line could not be drawn. Only a few days ago we had a long debate over the situation as it applies to members of parliament, in which we discussed the amount fixed as indemnity to members, and the rate of taxation which prevails. We know however that pressure is upon prectically everybody, with the exception of those whose remuneration for ordinary labour has been improved; above that level the pressure is on everybody.

It is well known to hon. members that there is now pending before the national war labour board an application respecting a class of very worthy participants in the industrial and economic life of our country. I refer to the brotherhood of railway employees. That application is for an increase, because of the position in which they find themselves, as a result of increased taxation. Now, if that brotherhood, and the members thereof, were to receive an increase, I think it would be necessary that it spread, because the whole of the workers of Canada might well say the railway employees are no worse off than other classes of Canadian workers or Canadian persons receiving wages or salaries. And if that did happen it would be the end of such control as it has been possible to maintain against inflation. I offer that as my excuse for not bringing in this bill at an earlier stage in the session. I wanted to wait until the budget was brought down, and to see if there was anything that could be done by way of relief, even though it did impose something upon the exchequer. When the budget was brought down, and when it was determined what the budget would be, it became apparent that nothing involving any substantial expense for the country could be done for the judges at the present time. I then suggested that what was already on the statute book, in the form of pensions, be left there, for those who would wish to take the benefit of it as it exists, and that there be an option given to judges who are now on the bench, or to those who may be appointed, to say that instead of taking the whole pension for themselves they would prefer a pension of two-thirds and they would have an allocation of one-third of it to their wives. The result will be that the exchequer will not in the long run bear any more—or should not bear any more than it is at the present time.

Just as an illustration: for the ordinary high court judge the salary is $9,000. The pension to which he is entitled on retirement is two-thirds of that, or $6,000. He will have the privilege of saying, "Instead of providing me with a pension for life of $6,000, provide me with a pension for life of $4,000, and provide my wife with a pension for life of $2,000. While we both live we will get $6,000, and when one of us dies the other will continue to receive his or her portion of the pension." In the long run it will work out in a way which will not, or should not cost the treasury anything more than the present system. For those who take the option, or those who say, or who will say between now and November 1, that they are bound by an irrevocable option that they wish to reduce their rights to two-thirds of what they are, leaving the other third for the benefit of their consorts, there will be a further provision that if the judge dies in office the consort will get one-third of what the judge's pension would have been at retirement—that is to say, two-ninths of what his salary was. That applies to all cases of the supreme court, the exchequer court, the high courts—that is, superior courts—or the courts of appeal in the provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If a judge died at the end of four years' service, would a pension be payable to his widow?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. If a judge is appointed and becomes incompetent to carry on his judicial duties, even after only two years of service on the bench, he gets a pension of two-thirds of his salary. That has happened within recent years, to the knowledge of the hon. member and myself. A chief justice of Ontario, the predecessor of the present chief justice, was in office only a very short time. But when because of his health it became necessary that he retire, he got a pension of two-thirds of his emolument. That is the rule which has been on the statute book since 1920 with respect to high court judges.

There is a difference in connection with county courts or district court judges or judges of the circuit courts of Montreal. If they have not been on the bench five years, they get only one-third instead of two-thirds. It is for that reason the resolution provides that there will be some cases in which the widow would receive only one-ninth instead of two-ninths.

In every case we say to the judge, "We are not going to take from you anything the statute now gives you. If you wish to take an irrevocable option, however, to be satisfied with only two-thirds of what the statute gives you, we will give the other third to your wife." That is all But, in fact, it will create a sense of some security for a great many of those who occupy judicial positions. Formerly it may have been possible for them to protect their families by taking out insurance. But I know from my own experience that since the present rates of taxation have been in force it is not possible to pay insurance premiums. Many cannot continue to pay them.

Mr. GRAYDON: And there is the other situation, too, that a judge may not be in sufficiently good health to get insurance.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly; but that is something for which at the present time I do not think we can take responsibility. But we did appoint gentlemen to the bench who felt that they were going to be able to carry insurance for the protection of their families; and we did find ourselves forced into a situation where taxation which impairs that possibility for them had to be imposed. That being so, we say to them, "You are entitled to a pension; if you will be satisfied with two-thirds of it for yourself we will allow you to contribute the other one-third to your wife; if she outlives you, she will continue to receive it; if she predeceases you, you will have only the two-thirds; it is left to you to say." That is something about which each individual will be entitled to exercise his option. If he does not like it, he can continue with the terms of the statute as it is. On the whole I do not anticipate that there will be any real extra burden placed upon the exchequer.

The other matters are such that I hope they will receive from the Department of Justice, whoever may be there, and from this house whatever the majority may be, the most sympathetic consideration. I think it is in the interests of this country that the best possible lawyers be attracted to the bench. That was so in the past. It is only in the last quarter of a century that the economy of the nation has got into such a condition that a position on the bench ceases to be comparable with the position a successful lawyer is able to make for himself, even in the big cities.

I think the British system of recruiting judges from the practising profession is a good system. Whenever general conditions make it possible I think we will have to get back to the situation that existed at confederation. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, at that time the purchasing power of the dollar was five times what it is at the present time and the emoluments provided were such as to attract the most successful practitioners. I think it will be in the interests of the Canadian people to maintain the high standards of our courts of justice.

In conclusion I want to pay a tribute, which I think will be shared by all members of this house, to our judiciary. I want to comment upon the high regard in which it has been held by the Canadian people since confederation.

Mr. BENCE: Has any consideration been given to the suggestion I made with respect to existing widows of judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was considered but it was not felt that anything could be done at this time, especially under our system of not interfering with the freeezing orders and so forth. It would be doing something new. I think the widows of judges who have passed on will find themselves with an almost irresistible case just as soon as conditions are such that some readjustments can be made. But I would not undertake to do this at the present time because if it were done it would be said that we were doing something for one class of people. We are just allowing the judges to make provision out of what they are entitled to under the present law. It would not be the same principle if we extended it. The judge who has passed on would not have had an opportunity of exercising this option, and no one can say how he would have exercised it. That is something that I think will have to be considered on the basis of its being a new grant. I cannot take the responsibility of asking parliament to make a new grant this year, but I do take the responsibility of asking parliament to say to the judges, "You have a grant and we will allow you to rearrange it."

Mr. BENCE: I agree that these widows have an almost irresistible case, and I think it is almost irresistible at the present time. The latter part of the resolution contains something new.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I do not look upon it as something new. This is something only for the widows of judges who exercise their option between now and November 1 or within ninety days after their appointment. They will make an option in writing reducing their own rights to two-thirds off what they would otherwise have the right to receive and applying the other third to their consorts. I do not think that is anything entirely new.

Mr. BENCE: I agree with that, but the new part is that should a judge die in office an annuity of two-ninths or one-ninth will be paid to his widow. That is not the case at the present time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is only with respect to the widows of judges who will have exercised their options. If a judge upon appointment prefers to keep the situation as it is, and he dies in office, his widow would not be entitled to any pension. This pension of one-third will go only to the widows of judges who will have exercised their option at the outset, saying that their pension rights are to be divided between themselves and their wives.

Mr. BENCE: I quite understand that as a consideration that is required, but he is getting two benefits. First, he has the benefit of being allowed to continue one-third of his pension to his wife after he dies, provided that the pension is payable. Under this part a man may be in office only for a year. Should he die, his widow will be entitled to a pension for the rest of her life. I agree with that, but I would like to see the widows of judges who have died within the last year—I would not confine it to a year but I take that as an example—placed in the position where they would receive a pension. After November 1 when a judge dies his widow will be in that position, provided of course that he accepts this proposition; she will receive an annuity for the rest of her life. I merely point out to the minister that I think it desirable that something be done for these widows. I understand that this one-ninth provision applies to county court and district court judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It applies to county court and district court judges who have not been in office five years. Under the act as it is, if a county court judge retires, having been in office for less than five years and being under seventy-five years of age, he cannot get a pension of more than one-third of his salary. If he has been in office more than five years, he gets a pension of two-thirds of his salary. One-third of two-thirds is two-ninths, and one-third of one-third is one-ninth.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. BENCE: After November 1 a judge appointed to the bench would have to exercise that option?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Those who are on the bench at the present time will have until November 1 of this year to exercise this irrevocable option; those who are appointed will have ninety days to do so from the date of their appointment.

Mr. BENCE: Suppose a man is married after he becomes a judge; will he have the same opportunity?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under the bill as will be submitted to the house he will have no opportunity to make any new option. Some cases may occur where it is desirable that something should be done, but I do not think there will be many. When a man is appointed he should realize his position and be able to make a decision as to how he wants his pension rights treated. If he thinks he is going to be married he can say, "I will be content with two-thirds of my pension and I will leave the other third available for the woman I am going to marry."

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that you do not insist upon any declaration on that point.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many judges will be affected by this? Is it 250 or thereabouts?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are 96 judges in Ontario, 53 in Quebec, 30 in Saskatchewan, 23 in Alberta, 25 in British Columbia, 40 in Nova Scotia, 13 in New Brunswick, and 6 in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I feel that the terms of this resolution as outlined by the minister are sound and that it is a good piece of legislation he is bringing down. I agree too with the desire expressed with those who have spoken thus far in this debate that everything possible should be done to strengthen the position of our judiciary. It is of extreme importance that all care be taken in this matter. I support, as hon. members know, the suggestion that has been made a number of times that one of the means of strengthening the judiciary is that a compulsory retirement age be set throughout. On the question of salaries and pensions, however, I feel that there is one comment that should be made before we pass this resolution. In line with what I have just said, I am not opposed at all to improving the salary position or the pension position of our judges, but it seems to me that we should maintain a proper perspective in this matter. I observe from the estimates that there is set aside this year the sum of $311,466.64 to provide pensions for fifty-six judges now on the retired list. That is an average pension of over $5,560 for each of those judges. Considering the honour that has been theirs because of the positions which they have held, such pensions are not too bad: considering also the terribly small amount of the old age pension that we pay to others of our honoured citizens reaching the age of seventy, I feel that we should be giving prior concern to that other group of people. I support this resolution and the suggestions that have been made by hon. members, but I urge that in the matter of the old age pension, before we worry too much about those who are receiving over $5,560 a year on an average, we should be giving some real concern to those to whom we are paying only $300 a year or less.

Mr. BENCE: How many widows of judges are now living in Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I have not that figure. I got it some two years ago and as I remember it, it was quite a large number. I would not venture, however, to mention a figure at this moment because my memory is not sufficiently clear. I went into it at that time and even had an actuarial calculation made as to what would be the cost of pensions on various scales for the widows of deceased judges, and it was a substantial sum.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has any estimate been made of how much it is expected will come out of the treasury under this arrangement? Based on ordinary mortality rates there may be a considerable additional sum payable out of the treasury by reason of the introduction of this measure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not possible to make any calculation with respect to the first portion. It is not expected to mean any burden over a period of years because the expectancy of life of the judges and of their consorts is about the same, so that that should just about even things up. As to the other provision, how many of the judges will exercise the option, we do not know. It is only those who will have made the option who will have created a situation whereby if they die in office their widows will receive the pension. It is not possible to make any estimate, but it was not looked upon by the treasury officials as being serious.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister seems to be under the impression that I was referring to superior court appointments made by himself when I spoke of defeated candidates. That was farthest from my mind. But there have been quite a number of district court and county court judgeship appointments which singularly enough have gone to men who, at least having other qualifications, have been mixed up in politics and been defeated in an election. I was not referring in any way to superior court appointments, for I know that in our own province, and I have mentioned this on a previous occasion, the appointments have been most satisfactory.

I would like to place two matters very shortly before the minister in regard to judicial appointments in county court and district court jurisdictions. The first is this, that no appointment should be made of barristers practising in the locality in which they will serve as judges. That is a very important matter. I find that wherever a judge is appointed to preside in a district court or county court in the town or area in which he practised law it takes a very considerable period of time before litigants appearing before him, who at any time had litigation on the other side against that judge while he was practising, are convinced that his judgment has not been influenced thereby. I am not saying that I know of any such case; far be it from me, but as I said, it is very important that people when they seek access to the courts should not only get justice but believe that they get justice.

Mr. GRAYDON: And that the judgments are handed down in reasonable time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In that respect there has been much improvement since the Minister of Justice became interested and let it be known that where there has been a delay of over two or three months in handing down a judgment the judge should endeavour at an early day to bring down his judgment. I have no doubt that the minister has in the past suffered from delayed judgments, and bringing about that reform he has certainly done something that has met with the approval of the bar society. Men are appointed who appear to have qualifications requisite for the bench; they are believed to have the judicial temperament; but when they get on the bench there are some who occasionally display a temperament far removed from what can be properly designated as judicial. I suggest that the minister have his law officers give consideration, in so far as the lower judgeships are concerned in any event, to the adoption of a system similar to that followed in Great Britain, where in most cases before a man is appointed to the bench he has had the opportunity of serving in a junior judicial position.

In Britain they have the recorder system: the Lord Chancellor assigns or appoints an outstanding member of the bar to preside over a series of assizes and courts, and it can then be ascertained whether or not he possesses the judicial temperament. I do not know to what extent that course could be followed in this country, but I believe that if something in the nature of promotions could be provided for it would greatly improve the judiciary; by which I mean, it would give the opportunity to outstanding men in the county and district courts to look forward to the day when they might expect to be given the opportunity to accept appointment to the superior court, and, if accepted, to be appointed. The minister has followed that course in two instances that I know of, one in Alberta, the other in British Columbia, and has elevated to the superior court, district or county court judges. I think it merits expansion, and certainly consideration to that end, for by both the appointments to which I have made reference the superior courts have certainly been enriched.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I would add just a word in support of the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance is not present at this discussion; were he here he might receive some useful suggestions regarding the payments of pensions to the citizens of Canada who must look to him for their payments.

I find that in the civil estimates the federal government appropriates this year a matter of $31 million to look after the 190,000 old people in this country who, after passing the age of seventy, must go through a means test and demonstrate that they have not been able to acquire enough to keep them in the evening of life, and that their dependents are not prepared to care for them, and under those circumstances the federal government votes around two hundred dollars per person to tide them through the evening of life. The Minister of Justice is much more generous than the Minister of Finance. His top ceiling in pensions for judges is a matter of $15,000 per year. It has always been difficult for me to understand why, when one honoured Canadian must have $15,000 a year as a pension, it can be expected that 190,000 must get by on an average of around three hundred dollars. I hope that when the Minister of Justice is in conference with his other colleagues in the government, particularly the Minister of Finance, something will be done to carry out the principles which are now being discussed by some legal members of the house in dealing with old age pensioners who must get their help from the Minister of Finance and from the provinces. The total from the civil estimates is around thirty-one millions, from the war appropriation, around seven millions, and from the provinces twelve millions, to care for 190,000 of our honoured citizens—which is a very small amount compared with the terms in which we are speaking in dealing with the retiring judges and their ladies.

Mr. BENCE: I do not want to be put in the position of being misunderstood in this matter. We were discussing judges and judges' salaries and the position of the judiciary, and so far as the old age pensions of the country are concerned, I do not think the matter is relevant under this item. But I have never for one single minute indicated any belief that the old age pensions now paid are adequate. I have always felt that they were totally inadequate, and if the opportunity is given me I shall support as strongly as I can any move to raise the pensions to the old people of this country.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 165, to amend the Judges Act (annuities).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

319. Land services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $6,170,200.90.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is a matter I want to bring to the attention of the minister, and I presume it can be brought under this item. It has to do with a complaint which came to me to-day with regard to the arrest of a clergyman at Balsam Creek, Ontario, on July 9 last. According to the information which various hon. members have received, one D. Morrison, a member of Jehovah's Witnesses, was presiding at the funeral of a Mrs. Gauvreau, and upon the arrival of the funeral cortege at the cemetery twelve officials, representative of selective service and of the police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the military police, without permitting the funeral to go on, questioned all those who were present as mourners and arrested the man who was acting as clergyman. This incident requires explanation.

Regardless of one's view as to the meritoriousness of the beliefs of Jehovah's Witnesses,

I am sure that none of us would countenance conduct such as this. I realize that in many cases which are brought to the attention of members of parliament there are elements of exaggeration, but this case has received a great deal of publicity and the facts have not been denied. I should therefore like to ask the minister whether or not the statements which appear in letters of complaint that have been received by hon. members are correct, and if so why it was deemed necessary to interfere with a funeral service in order to ascertain whether either the presiding clergyman or any of the mourners had complied with selective service regulations or were in fact subject to prosecution for failure to comply therewith.

I would appreciate it if the minister would advise the committee whether the facts as stated are correct, and if so, would give an assurance that there shall be no repetition of an incident of this kind.

Hon. L. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I have not received the letter to which the hon. member refers, nor have I seen any of the publicity to which he has alluded. Perhaps I do not read all the papers as attentively as I should. The deputy commissioner tells me he has never heard of the incident, and I can assure the hon. member that neither the Minister of Justice nor the officer in charge of Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters here in Ottawa instructed that such things should be done or would countenance them if they were done. I know that throughout Canada the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at the request of selective service and the Department of National Defence, are checking on compliance with national registration.

Mr. MITCHELL: And draft evasions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And draft evasions, also. But I would consider it quite improper to break up a funeral to conduct any such examination; and now that the matter has been brought to our attention I will ask that the officer in charge of the region in which Balsam Creek is situate make us a report.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have sent over an original letter containing the complete story and the complaint.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will see that headquarters here get in touch with the officer who is in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that locality. Certainly we will not have the public of Canada believe that we would countenance interference with a ceremony of that kind.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

320. Grant to the Chief Constables' Association of Canada, $500.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the grant to the chief constables' association, and I wish at this time to make a plea for consideration being given to the city, municipal and village policemen who are represented generally by this association. This matter has been brought to my attention by an official of the association, and I am very glad to bring it before the committee and the country and to speak on behalf of that great body of self-effacing men, the municipal policemen represented not only by this association but those in the villages and towns, whose fine record of public service we so often lose sight of.

The situation to-day is that many of these men serve long periods without being able to look forward to any pension at the end of their term of service. In the United Kingdom, to promote efficiency and assure security, provision is made for a pension for policemen at the end of a period of time; and under the amending Police Act of 1906, a man who serves in the police force in England for more than three years is entitled to transfer from one police force to another, the total period to be counted for purposes of pension.

In this country the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have a very fine pension system, the various provincial police forces have the same, and the larger cities and towns have similar provisions; but in the country as a whole, out of 6,444 policemen there are over 1,900 for whom no pension scheme is available. By provinces the record is as follows:

	With pension scheme	Without pension scheme
Nova Scotia	63	107
New Brunswick	70	43
Prince Edward Island	...	20
Ontario	1,569	888
Manitoba	256	93
British Columbia	474	13
Alberta	193	57
Saskatchewan	106	115
Quebec	1,786	591

The Chief Constables' Association of Canada have on more than one occasion passed a resolution requesting that such a scheme as is in effect in the United Kingdom should be made applicable to Canada. It might be argued that this matter comes under provincial jurisdiction, and with that I do not disagree. But I believe that in order to assure the efficiency and the security and the integrity of these public servants, who have done so much for this country, consideration should be given to grants in aid on the part of the dominion to the provinces to enable the carrying into effect of a pension system on behalf of all municipal, town and village policemen for whom there is no pension provision now in effect. Efficiency would be promoted if the system followed in the United Kingdom were carried out in this country. These municipal police forces cooperate with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and with the provincial police force in the provinces in which they are established. That cooperation could be carried to the point where there would be increased efficiency if provision were made similar to that in effect in the United Kingdom, where an inspector of the home office each year conducts an inspection of all the municipal forces within the country, whether under his jurisdiction or not.

If any of the municipal forces are below the standard of efficiency demanded by the home office as reported on by the inspecting officer then that particular municipal police force is denied the pension provisions. I do not expect any final answer from the minister in regard to this matter. In view, however, of the definite increase in juvenile delinquency—true, there was a decrease last year—and the tremendous increase since 1930 of serious crimes, indictable offences and the like in proportion to population, few would object if by a small expenditure a greater control over the efficiency of these forces could be ensured. We could take one of the senior officers in the criminal investigation branch in Ottawa and put him in charge of this work. The result would be that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would have charge of the prosecution of federal offences, the provincial police would have charge of provincial offences and the municipal police would deal with both subjects and with municipal by-laws; and all would have a common standard of efficiency. Efficiency would be maintained; security would be given to those forces, and it would be of great benefit in raising the standard of criminal investigation and prosecution in this country; in short it would go a long way towards securing a degree of equality in the efficient and effective administration of the criminal law by police officers that is not always secured.

I pass this suggestion on to the minister. It has been recommended on more than one occasion by the chief constables association. It is a matter that might very well be brought before the next dominion-provincial conference for report and consideration; for there is nothing more important than the maintaining of the highest possible efficiency in the police forces of this country.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member himself stated that he realized the constitutional difficulties. The most that we can do is to express our feeling that no doubt it would be desirable that all those who are performing constabulary duties throughout Canada feel some security in that regard, but the initiative would have to come from the provinces. The best promise I can make to my hon. friend is that I shall secure copies of Hansard relating to this debate and forward them to the several attorneys general of the provinces, calling their attention especially to the suggestions he made here to-day. We could not ask for the right to inspect the provincial or municipal forces. We have provided a college here where we receive those who wish to come, and we endeavour to give them some assistance in learning about the profession in which they are engaged; but we could not suggest to the provinces or to the municipalities that we should like the right to inspect their forces and to pass upon the sufficiency of the measures they are taking within their jurisdiction. If as a result of a provincial conference the suggestion came from them that for the purpose of achieving some greater degree of uniformity in the administration of law it would be desirable, I think there would be no objection raised from our point of view, in view of the relatively small amount of money that might be involved; because everyone realizes that though there are ten governments there is only one Canadian people, and that it does not matter very much from what purse public funds are taken if they are devoted to a good purse. It is in the interest of the Canadian people that the thing be done.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Pensions and Other Benefits

321. To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received in the performance of duty, $11,749.16.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the present position with regard to pensions for the men of the force? I understand that the men who were retired some years ago get a smaller pension than men who have been retired more recently; also that all these pensions are subject to income tax. I believe that some hardship is being suffered particularly by the men who retired some years ago.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It may be that some contracts that were made years ago were made on a different basis from those that are being made at the present time. When I started to practise law I got very much smaller fees for certain cases than I got just before I was promoted to this office. I have not heard of any hardship. There are some files that are never closed. There is not a month that I do not get communications in connection with someone from a new source, concerning a person who rendered medical services to the force years ago. I do not think that file is ever going to be closed, but there is nothing that can be done about it.

Mr. GREEN: I am not referring to special cases like that. I refer to the general constabulary. Is it not a fact that the men who were retired prior to a certain date get a smaller pension than the men who are being retired at the present time? The suggestion was made to me that these amounts should be increased so that all of the men would get the same rate being paid at the present time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid that each one has to take the situation as it existed during his time and age. I have no doubt that there have been improvements in the Pension Act, and there is now a portion of the Pension Act which provides that men may, by agreeing to deductions from their pay, have a pension provided for their widows and dependents. There was a time when that did not exist, but the application of these pension acts is really of a contractual nature. The man makes his contract and he gets what the contract calls for. I have not had any representation on cases of hardship. From time to time there are cases which do occur where special grants are made out of trust funds to members who formerly belonged to the force. These are made for very special cases. Special emergency cases arise. There are no longer any prizes or special payments to members of the force. All that goes into the fund. The fund also receives certain legacies, and there are sometimes grants made out of that for emergency cases. I have not had any representation about the insufficiency of the pensions which were accorded to those who retired from the service in earlier years.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister have the whole question of the pensions investigated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will secure information as to the difference between pensions paid under the former act and those paid under the present act, but I should not like to reopen the present Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, because there are some provisions in it which I might not be able to retain if the whole act were to be reconsidered.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister explain the basis upon which these awards are determined?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The first item is an award made to one R. Arcand, in consequence of a disability resulting from a fracture of the left fibula. The amount is $73 per annum. The next is an award of $365 per annum to F. L. Armstrong, in respect of burns to his left hand and leg, in which permanent disability was involved. I have a long list of these. If necessary I could put them on Hansard, but I do not believe they would be of general interest. These are pensions to persons who suffered injuries which resulted in permanent physical disability, and the amount of disability in each case was estimated and on the recommendation of the commission, the award was made as some compensation for disability incurred in line of service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are these awards by statute?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, they are voted each year. The system is that a recommendation goes to the treasury board, and if it receives approval, that approval is accepted as authority to include it in the estimates. It is so included each year, because there is no other fund out of which the amount could be paid.

Item agreed to.

322. Pensions to families of members of the mounted police who have lost their lives while on duty:

Mrs. Mary Emma Bossange, $456.25.
Mrs. Margaret Johnson Brooke, $821.25.
Mrs. Margaret Cox, $410.63.
Mrs. Georgina Harrison, $676.50.
Mrs. Letitia Kennedy, $423.50.
Mrs. Nora Jean Massan, $300.
Mrs. Mary Miller, $667.38.
Mrs. Margaret Nicholson, $547.50.
Mrs. Catherine Mildred Ralls, $675.25.
Mrs. Doris Freda Sampson, $816.
Mrs. Amy Lillian Searle, $406.98.
Mrs. Madelaine Mary Shoebotham, $810.
Mrs. Eunice Wainwright, $602.50.

Mr. KNOWLES: I note that the highest pension in any of the fourteen cases mentioned amounts to $68 a month, and four of them amount to only $38, or even less. These pensions are considerably lower than the ones we were discussing this morning. Then I am concerned with the fact that five of these pensions to widows of men who were members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are being reduced this year. What is the explanation for these reductions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reduction would be made through children dependents passing the age of eighteen years. Each year a change comes about through that circumstance, the pension being computed on a basis of so much for the widow and so much for each dependent child under eighteen years. Pensions were based upon the period of service, and the amount of pay and allowances received by the men in question. These were pensions which were not payable under the general terms of the act, but were paid as compassionate allowances because of special conditions in which the families of these faithful members of the force found themselves as a consequence of the death of the breadwinners.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is such a compassionate allowance awarded in every case where one is left a widow because of her husband's having lost his life while on duty, but without any pension otherwise provided?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

100. Departmental administration, $387,318.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister give us some indication as to the reason for the increase? I understand the civil branch of the department is growing rapidly. Perhaps the minister could explain the extension in the service.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In the civil administration we have the Annuities Act, fair wages and conciliation, the Vocational Training Coordination Act, 1942, and the Technical Education Act. Payments are being made to all provinces with the exception of one, namely Manitoba. Then, we have the administration of unemployment insurance. I believe that covers the whole ground of the civil end of the department.

Obviously under war conditions there must be an expansion in those branches of the department which in some respects deal with the war situation. Then, I suppose there would be some restriction in other branches where the war has not had the same effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a substantial increase for temporary assistants. How are they appointed?

Mr. MITCHELL: All the appointments pass through the civil service commission. Then of course appointments are made by order in council, the same as in other departments.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a matter under the heading of labour administration which I took up previously with the minister and about which I should like to say something further at this time. I first raised this matter in the house on May 1 during the discussion of the minister's section of the war appropriation estimates. This has to do with the pension rights of employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway who were out on strike in 1918 or 1919. Following the discussion we had on this matter on May 1, I wrote to the minister on two occasions, on May 15 and June 16, and on June 20 I received a reply from the minister with which he enclosed a copy of a letter which had been sent to his deputy, Mr. MacNamara, by Mr. C. E. Stockdill, assistant to the vice-president of the Canadian Pacific. In other words, the minister did something following my representations both in the house and by letter; he referred the matter to the vice-president of the C.P.R. and received this one letter from Mr. Stockdill. I am grateful for the fact that the minister recognized that this was a matter in which he should interest himself, but I am not at all satisfied with the reply Mr. Stockdill made to Mr. MacNamara, nor am I satisfied to let the Minister of Labour allow the matter to rest there.

In order to discuss the matter properly I think I should quote to the committee the text of Mr. Stockdill's letter. It was written from Montreal on June 8 and addressed to the deputy minister of labour. Hon. members will note that in this letter Mr. Stockdill endeavours to slap me down for some of the things I said on May 1. I read the letter for two reasons: first, in order that I may point out wherein he has grossly distorted my statements of May 1, and, second, in order that I may reply to his arguments and endeavour to persuade the minister to work further on this matter. The letter follows:

Dear Mr. MacNamara,

In the absence of the vice president, I am replying to your letter of May 19.

It is unfortunate, to say the least, that Mr. Knowles, who does not lack sources of accurate information, should have put forward, unwittingly perhaps, a version which is not borne out by the facts of the case.

At page 2502 of Hansard he repeats four times in varying form the statement that when the new pension plan was set up in 1937, a change was made which had the effect of creating a new problem for the men who left our service during the strike of 1919.

In point of fact no change was made by the 1937 revision of the pension rules, which affected in any way the position of the men concerned.

The provision of the pension rules that any one entering the service of the company after having reached the age of forty is ineligible to receive a pension has been in effect since July 5, 1904, and the provision that persons voluntarily leaving the employment of the company when their services are required become ineligible, was incorporated in the original regulations when the pension system was inaugurated on January 1, 1903.

The effect of clause 8 (a) of the existing pension rules, which was quoted in part by Mr. Knowles, was merely to give effect to these two previously existing rules.

Since July 5, 1904, many men have left the company's service for reasons which seemed good to them, and have later re-entered the service, but only those who were under forty at the time of their last entry became eligible for pension.

Mr. Knowles statement at page 2505 of Hansard, with regard to the effect of section 122 of the railway act, also lacks candour. While the pension system was a voluntary one the company acted under this provision of the statute, a provision essential to the establishment of a pension system of any kind; but when it became necessary to put the system upon a contributory basis the cooperation of the employees was invited and the pension rules were framed by a joint committee composed of four representatives named by the company and four chosen by the general chairmen of the organized employees, and the employees have enjoyed adequate representation on the pension committee ever since.

None of the men concerned had any grievance against the company at the time they left their employment, nor, if the statements of their responsible leaders are to be accepted, were they ignorant of the results of their action, since it has been repeatedly asserted by these leaders that the men were warned of the consequences, and of the fact that the strike contemplated was in defiance of existing law.

Yours very truly,

C. E. Stockdill,
Assistant to the Vice President.

I happen to know Mr. Stockdill personally. I have every regard for him in his private capacity as a very fine gentleman, but I am amazed at the tone and substance of the letter which he saw fit in his capacity as an official of the Canadian Pacific to write to the government on this matter, a letter consisting of distortion along with evasion of the real issue. First of all he makes the statement that on page 2502 of Hansard I said four times in varying forms that the provision of clause 8 was a new provision inserted in 1937. Anyone who refers to that page of Hansard will find that while it is true I referred four times on that page—and rightly so—to the new pension rules which were established in 1937, at no time did I refer to the clause requiring every employee to be under forty at the time of his last entry into the service as a new provision. What Mr. Stockdill and the other officials of the company know is that in 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939 that clause, an old one to be sure which was hatched out in 1903 and carried over into the new rules, was the principal bone of contention between the employees and the company so far as the new pension plan was concerned. It was at that time that the men were most conscious of what that clause would do to many hundreds of them by way of cutting down their pension rights in many cases and denying any pension at all to many others.

Mr. Stockdill points out that the pension plan as instituted on January 1, 1937, was the result of the work of the company with a committee appointed by the general chairmen representing the men. That too is true, but it is not the whole story. The men tell me that the committee that represeented the general chairmen agreed to the pension plan before it was referred to the general membership of the various unions. As a matter of fact a booklet setting out the new plan and bearing the date September 15, 1936, was distributed among the employees of the company several months before the plan came into effect, but its terms had been made final. When the general membership discovered what was the effect upon them of this new plan, which carried over into its provisions the rule contained in clause 8, they really went to work on it. The matter was discussed in all the unions of the Canadian Pacific System whose members were affected by it, particularly in western Canada, and in due course they sent a strong delegation from the west to Montreal to wait upon their general chairmen. That was in 1937, just after the plan came into effect. They discussed a number of matters, but the major point that they discussed was clause 8, because the decision which the company had handed down to the men at that time was that their absence from work in 1918 or 1919 was to be considered as a break in their service. As a result of the representations made by the membership to their general chairmen in 1937, the general chairmen waited upon the company several times in the years 1937, 1938 and 1939, and I repeat that Mr. Stockdill and the other officials know that this question was the burning issue at that time, and it still remains a burning issue with many hundreds of the employees of the company.

I would refer the minister, in the hope that he will reconsider this matter, to some of the quotations that I placed on the record when I last discussed this matter on May 1, quotations which I do not need to repeat at this time except to point out that they made it clear that Mr. Coleman, who was then vice-president of the company, said to the men that the real stickler so far as the company was concerned was that they could not afford to pay these pensions. The men who waited upon the officials of the company at that time came away convinced, and so reported to their general membership, that if the fortunes of the company were a little better there might be some hope of their getting these pension rights restored.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On what date is Mr. Coleman said to have said that?

Mr. KNOWLES: That was in 1939. I put the exact date on the record when I spoke on this matter on May 1. I also pointed out at that time, and I think I should repeat it, that in the years prior to 1937 the pension scheme that was in effect in the Canadian Pacific railway system was what was known as a non-contributory system. The company therefore used the argument that the men had no equity in the funds of the company, while on the other hand the men recall that every time there was any discussion or negotiations with respect to wages down across the years from the early part of the century to 1937 the company always pointed out that there was this non-contributory pension plan. In other words, the men were told to remember that what they were receiving was not just the wages that they received in their pay envelopes, but certain pension rights that they would obtain on retirement. And so the men felt that they had an equity which they had built up by their work with the company over a period of years.

When Mr. Coleman says that it would cost the company $1,250,000 to restore those pension rights which the men had in 1919, I suggest he is admitting that the men had that much of an equity in the funds of the company at that time, and that what the company did was, by means of a technicality, to appropriate the funds which really belonged to the men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is going a long way.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend says that that is going a long way, but in my view that is exactly what the situation is.

Related to this whole question is the position which other employers took at the same time. I fear that I must repeat briefly at this point. In addition to the employees of the Canadian Pacific, I would remind the committee that employees of the Canadian National and a certain number of dominion government, provincial government and Winnipeg municipal employees were involved in the strike which took place in 1919. But these other employers, the Canadian National, the dominion government, the provincial government and the municipal government, have all completely disregarded the strike of 1919 as affecting the pension rights of their employees, leaving the Canadian Pacific the only large employer which still holds participation in the strike as against its employees in the matter of pension rights.

When one recalls as well the land grants and subsidies and tax exemptions which the Canadian Pacific have enjoyed down across the years, and that is true in the city of Winnipeg as well, it seems to me that they are not playing fair with the country, and certainly not playing fair with the men, in continuing to deny to them their pension rights.

Mr. Stockdill in his letter suggests that in one portion of my remarks I lacked candour because of my references to the fact that the government should concern itself in this matter with a view to protecting the interests of the men. The reply that Mr. Stockdill makes to that is that the plan was set up by this joint committee and that the men now have adequate representation on the pension scheme. In other words, the presumption is that the men's interests are fully protected, and there is no need for government intervention. I have already pointed out that the first time the plan was ever brought to the attention of the men they were not satisfied with it because of this clause that was included in it, and immediately they voiced their protest against it. I would also point out so far as adequate representation on the committee is concerned, as suggested by Mr. Stockdill, that the committee consists of seven members, four of them being officials of the company and only three of them representatives of the general chairmen of the unions to which the men belong. Despite the fact that four constitutes a quorum there is never any danger of the general chairmen of the unions constituting a majority of a committee meeting, because when any of the officials of the company are absent from a meeting they have a right to appoint proxies to take their place. Thus the proportion of four officials of the company to three representatives of the men is maintained at all times.

I think it might be well for me to give an indication to the minister of the interest taken in this matter and of the support that I have received because of the representations that I have made to him. Since May 1, entirely apart from the representations that I had from my own constituency before I raised this matter, I have received many letters about this subject. Many of them have come from individuals who have been affected by the decision of the company, and many have come from unions, official letters expressing support of the view that I took in the house, and expressing the earnest hope that even yet the government might interest itself in this matter in such a way as to bring justice to these men. I would like to give the minister a list of some of the unions from whom I have heard officially in this matter, without bothering to indicate the number of personal letters I have received. Here is a list of the unions: Lodge 28, International Association of Machinists, Kenora, Ontario; Brotherhood of Express Employees, Local 28, Winnipeg, Manitoba; International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers and Railway Shop Labourers, Local No. 929, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Jubilee Lodge No. 6, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Northern Alberta Lodge No. 648, Edmonton, Alberta. I also received a letter from the general chairman of that brotherhood. To continue: Ladysmith Lodge No. 42, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, Calgary, Alberta; Local No. 155, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Commercial Telegraphers' Union, Canadian Pacific System, Division No. 1, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Plumbers and Steam Fitters' Local Union No. 479, Winnipeg, Manitoba; J. M. Egan Lodge No. 223, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Winnipeg Railroad Pipe Fitters and Helpers, Local No. 479, Winnipeg, Manitoba; and also from the Canadian Merchant Service Guild (Incorporated), Vancouver, British Columbia. I might say in connection with this last organization that not only are railway employees affected by this rule of the company but employees of the Canadian Pacific steamships on the west coast are also affected.

While I am referring to that perhaps I should tell the rather odd situation of a master of one of the Canadian Pacific ships out on the west coast who—I will quote from the letter directly—"had a three-day break in service in 1918 and was retired without a C.P.R. pension in the fall of 1943". This man was the captain of a Canadian Pacific vessel, and sailed for over fifty years under the red ensign and for approximately twenty-five years with the Canadian Pacific. "But here is something for Mr. Ripley." I am quoting further from the letter from the union:

> Captain . . . now receives $20 per month pension from the United States government, under their social security laws, as he sailed on Canadian Pacific ships which run in American waters, but from his own company and country he receives absolutely nothing.

Because of a three-day break in service in 1918! In connection with these breaks in service in 1918, because a number of them at some of these other points around the west—Kenora, Edmonton and some other places—were breaks in service in that year rather than in 1919, I will quote in part from a letter from a union in Kenora, Ontario:

> There was another strike in 1918 of only a few hours' duration (about sixteen hours), and in this case no one was fired or rehired, so really no legal break in service, and when the grievance was straightened (in our favour) we were just told to carry on and there was to be no discrimination. To our surprise, in 1937—

I am calling this to the attention of Mr. Stockdill, because it was in 1936 and 1937 that this issue came to a head. In his letter he is only evading the issue.

> —when the contributory scheme was introduced, four of our union members had application papers returned as we were forty or over in 1918. No member of the International Association of Machinists here in Kenora went out in 1919.

I could go on with a great many letters from unions and from individuals showing the hardships which have resulted because of this decision. I could also read a letter from one official of a union, as a matter of fact a general chairman, who says that he is very much afraid that one of the reasons for retaining this clause 8 in the pension rules is that it enables the company to continue to hold a club over the men. Perhaps I should read part of this letter because it relates to something which is a burning issue right now:

> It so happens that I was personally involved so quite naturally I had more than a passing interest in the question. I was one of a subcommittee set up to handle the matter with officials at Winnipeg, but we got absolutely nowhere. Although the reason given of continuing this injustice is one of inability to pay—

Mark you, this is a statement of one of the general chairmen.

> —I am convinced that the board of directors are insistent of retaining the restrictive clause, so that the company will always hold a club over the head of the employees over forty who might be considering going on strike. Certainly they would think twice before leaving their jobs, and if we are turned down by the national war labour board on applications for wage increases some such action might be considered.

So that in addition to the injustice of the whole situation and the suffering which many of these men are enduring because of the inclusion of that rule in the pension by-laws as they now stand, it is the feeling on the part of a good many that it is still there as a club to keep these men from exercising their right to strike if a situation becomes intolerable.

Apart from that, however, I plead the case of these older men. I am not able to get the exact figure as to how many there are now, but in 1937 there were 400 or perhaps 450 older employees of the company who were over forty when they returned to work in 1918 or 1919, and as a result of that these 400 or 450 are denied a pension of any kind. Some of them had worked 20 and 25 years before 1919. I have case after case here of men with 35 and 40 years of service but no pension because they were forty years or over when they returned in 1919.

In addition to the 400 who lost their pensions outright in 1937, there were 2,100 employees of the company who had some service prior to 1919 varying all the way from one year up to fifteen or twenty years or longer who were still under forty and would therefore qualify for a pension, but at a reduced rate, because they would get no credit for the time served with the company prior to 1918 or 1919.

I emphasize, as I said when I spoke on this matter before, that a great deal has happened to the thinking of our people in the years since 1919. I do not feel that the company was justified at that time in deciding that that was a break in service with respect to pension rights; certainly I do not feel they were justified in taking that position in 1937 when the new rules were brought in; but now I say they are even less justified in continuing this piece of injustice. The concept of social security has grown tremendously in the minds of our people. The realization that industry owes some responsibility to its employees is becoming more widely accepted. This company is doing particularly well so far as profits are concerned. I gave the figures on May 1. I feel that as a matter of playing fair with the people of this country and playing fair with these employees the whole subject should be brought forcibly to their attention and they should be urged—if something stronger than that cannot be done by the present government—to reconsider this whole position.

I call attention again to the case I read from Kenora. I could cite others, if I were to take the time to read them, where the men claim that they were given verbal assurances that the break in 1918 or 1919 would not be counted against them. I have a letter from one union secretary who says that their union was very young at that time and they accepted the verbal assurances which were given to them as something which could be counted on. After the experience they had then, they would know better and would insist on getting it in writing; but they have not got it in writing as far as 1919 is concerned, and therefore they realize that they are stuck. Nevertheless in a number of the unions they are of one accord, in their statement that assurances were given quite definitely at that time.

I am taking this matter up now with the Minister of Labour because I see it as a matter of labour relations. I might have taken it up under the Department of Transport, but that would imply that the government could use the whip hand in some way through its control over transportation. I prefer that it should be done through the Minister of Labour as a matter of labour relations. This company prides itself on its relations with its employees and wants to be on the best terms possible with them, but this situation rankles with hundreds of these men and is the cause of a great deal of suffering in many homes. Men are laid off at sixty-five and are denied their pension rights. The last time I spoke on the matter I pointed out that some of the men who go to the company after being laid off and appeal for a pension are denied it, and when they ask for something else the company says, "If your health were better we would give you an extension and allow you to work past sixty-five, but although we are sorry to learn that your health is such that you cannot continue working, we regret that we can do nothing for you." As I have indicated by reference to a long list of unions who have written to me on the subject, this is something that rankles in the minds of these men, and I submit that a strenuous effort should be made by the government to persuade the Canadian Pacific to reconsider the whole position.

As to the question of money, the profits are there, and the amount involved is really small compared to what the company is making out of the war at the present time. As regards the actuarial question, I submit that these men had an equity in the funds of the company in 1919 and that can easily be taken care of. I appeal now to the Minister of Labour to continue to use his good offices in this matter. I appreciate the fact that he did something but it was not enough, at least so far as he has reported to me. The indications I have are that he wrote this one letter, or had Mr. MacNamara write it, to the vice-president of the company, and he received a reply which was forwarded to me. That reply is not satisfactory, and the situation, to some of us at any rate, is such that we are not prepared to let the matter rest.

I raise the matter in this way not to hear myself talk about it. As regards the men in my constituency, many of whom work in these shops, I can say that they know where some of us stand in looking after their interests without our having to do a lot of talking about it. Rather, I raise the matter in the earnest hope that something will yet be done. It is action I am looking for. Despite all the failures in the past, and the adamant refusal of the company to reconsider the matter, I believe that if the Minister of Labour were to tackle it with the same concern and the same earnest feeling I have about it, and really go after it, he could persuade the company to reconsider the whole position.

Mr. BENCE: I have not that personal knowledge of the situation that some people who reside in Winnipeg have, people who are able to make personal contacts with the general chairmen of unions, but representations have been made to me by groups of employees from Saskatoon, and from what I am informed I suggest to the minister that the case be given the utmost and the most sympathetic consideration both by the company and by the government. I realize that this is a matter of labour relations, but I believe that in the interests of good labour relations the administration should intervene and do whatever is possible in the way of a solution, or see whether some solution can be arrived at.

The particular case referred to me is that of employees in the company who in 1918 went out on a sympathetic strike for a few hours. I do not know how long it was, but it was not more than a few hours; certainly it was not as long as a day; and that one act, whether advisable or not, has prejudiced their whole lives. Furthermore, I suggest that in these enlightened days, so far as labour relations are concerned, that single act if committed to-day would not have meted out to it the punishment that has been visited upon these men in being deprived of years of seniority. The punishment would not be nearly so extensive. The fact that this break in continuity was only of very brief duration would suggest, I submit, that the whole matter might be reconsidered, and the administration might point out to the company that there are other cases right across the whole north American continent in which men have gone on sympathetic strikes and afterwards, if I may use the expression, been forgiven for the fact that they made that break in their continuity.

I suggest also that the company itself would be very wise to give the matter the most sympathetic and earnest consideration. I believe that if it took the broadest and the most kindly and humanitarian view in an effort to reach a solution of the problem the company itself in the long run would profit and it would show that it had the interests of the men at heart and was desirous of obtaining the good will of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to speak for forty minutes, as did my eloquent and hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He could have covered the ground in five minutes.

Mr. KNOWLES: You could do the job itself in five minutes if you made up your mind to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will cover in five minutes more than he covered in forty, and more satisfactorily. He said he liked to hear himself talk, and I thought so myself. Now, the situation is clear. There was a strike in 1919—

An hon. MEMBER: In 1918.

Mr. KNOWLES: Both.

Mr. MITCHELL: At that time the Canadian Pacific had a pension fund, all the moneys of which were paid over by the company. There was a clause in the agreement or constitution of that pension fund which stipulated that the pension would be lost under certain conditions. These facts are clear. Since then, in 1937, they established a contributory pension fund. What my hon. friend is trying to do cannot be done, namely, to discuss and settle on the floor of the House of Commons grievances between employers and employees. The hon. gentleman read a certain number of letters from local organizations. We do not need to direct the local organizations in this country; they are quite conscious of their own powers and of their ability to negotiate for their own men. I did what my hon. friend wanted me to do. I wrote to the company. After all, the Labour department, at least under the present system of society, does not make agreements with employees, nor does it negotiate agreements between employers and employees. If it can be of assistance it always lends that assistance. My hon. friend spoke about the composition of the present board of trustees of the pension fund of the Canadian Pacific. I think that is best left to the labour organizations and to the employers themselves. There is no law against an expression of opinion on the floor of the house. But if I were to get a request from the parent organization—and as my hon. friend from Cape Breton South knows probably as well as I do, they always deal with their national organization in matters of this kind—I should be glad to endeavour to arrange a conference if possible between the company and the organizations concerned.

I wish to say this in conclusion, that my hon. friend does not hold the first mortgage on concern for the rights of the men in question as against any member of this House of Commons, irrespective of political party. Let that be clearly understood.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a word on this question; I agree that you cannot settle labour relations between a company and its employees by discussion in this House of Commons. What you can do, and what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is trying to do, is to build up a case for himself in the minds of certain people. Nevertheless I happen to know of one of those men, just one, who has been affected by the condition which has been detailed here. Because involuntarily he took part for a few hours in a strike in 1918 or 1919 he cannot look forward to participation in the old pension fund of the Canadian Pacific Railway when, as is now imminent, he reaches retirement age.

I suggest that the heads of the unions, who have more or less intimate relationships with the personnel direction of the Canadian Pacific Railway company—their relations with their employees are exceptionally good—be left to deal with it. The matter can well be left to them, and I have no doubt something may be done. I do not think it can be done here. I do not think it is part of our function to urge the Canadian Pacific Railway company, with the inadequate information which we must of necessity have here to-day, to do something which they have not heretofore done. I suggest that this is a type of case that should not reach the floors of parliament, much as I personally sympathize with one person and others who I know are very much aggrieved. What I have done in such a case is to make personal representation—I am afraid I have not been very successful; and I have to be content with that, as I think all of us should be. I do not think the estimates should be held up by matters of this kind.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not going to bother to reply to the insinuations that I had selfish motives in raising this question. If hon. members wish to say insulting things of that kind they may go ahead and do so. That is their business. I know, and the men in the Weston shops in Winnipeg know, why I am raising this question. Neither do I feel it necessary to argue with the hon. member for York-Sunbury as to the propriety of raising questions of this kind on the floor of the house. I point out first of all that every other avenue has been tried by the men down through the years. Lest any hon. members think that because this matter arose in 1918 and 1919 it is a dead issue, I can assure them that it is still the subject of a great deal of discussion and working out of plans in the unions whose members are affected.

I suspect that the suggestion the minister made a moment ago, which I welcome, namely, that if he received a request from the heads of the unions he would look into the matter, will bear fruit in suggestions along that line coming to him. In the remarks that have just been made there was a suggestion that there is nothing that can be done here in this House of Commons or nothing that can be done by the government. If I feel that I can make a case for these men—let it be remembered that I am only a private member of the house, and a member of a minority party—and that case is sound and valid, as I firmly believe it is, I suggest that if the minister with the authority of the government behind would present that same case in his own words to the company, using his persuasive powers, it would have some effect. That is my reason for raising it here, in the hope that the minister will present the case as strongly as he can in taking the matter up with the company.

The last speaker suggested that we had inadequate information on the floor of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not say that. I said that of necessity we could not have the full story.

Mr. KNOWLES: Whatever the situation may be so far as certain members of this committee are concerned, certainly the full story is available to the Minister of Labour and to the government. I urge that he reconsider it in his own mind. I am not asking for a first mortgage on concern for these men. I do not care who gets the credit for it. The Minister of Labour can bring this about and get the credit for himself. That does not bother me at all. My concern is to see these men get a better deal. I have a vivid personal recollection of what this kind of thing means. My own father was a machinist for a street railway company. He suffered an experience similar to this which resulted in his having to take on a kind of work in his later years for which he was not physically fitted. It cost him his life. As a matter of fact that incident was the final cause in my deciding to throw my life into the work in which I am now engaged, and I am keenly anxious that this matter of the Canadian Pacific and the pension rights of these men be pursued as far as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say a few words to keep the record straight? I know my hon. friend does not want to mislead the people in this organization. Outside of the power of getting the two parties together the government has no power whatever except by passing a special act of parliament, and I know my hon. friend would not want us to do that because it cuts both ways. Let that be clearly understood. I do not want Hansard to go out to the organizations with the implication that the Labour department is not prepared to go as far as it possibly can under its present legislative powers. I hope I shall never live to see the day when the kind of powers that my hon. friend has in the back of his mind, probably subconsciously or instinctively, are brought into being. I hope I shall live to see the day when labour organizations and employees deal freely with one another without any pressure from the government concerned. When I say "pressure" I mean legal pressure that we see in effect in countries against which we are fighting at the present time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister endeavour to bring the two parties together?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to take my direction from any member of this House of Commons—not yet—irrespective of the party to which he may belong. After all is said and done the Department of Labour is merely the umpire. If there is any request made by the company or by the parent organization involved I shall be quite prepared to set the conciliation machinery of the Department of Labour in motion, but not on the direction of anybody in this House of Commons—not yet.

Mr. KNOWLES: But if you will do it, that is fine.

Mr. GILLIS: It seems to me that both the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for York-Sunbury have been anything but fair to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not intend to be other than fair.

Mr. GILLIS: Maybe not. I realize the weather is warm, pressure is great, nerves are strained.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not yet.

Mr. GILLIS: But we sat here this morning for two hours and listened to a long debate respecting the necessity for pensions for judges. The hon. member for York-Sunbury has accused the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of having selfish motives, and has suggested that the last named hon. member is looking for something for himself. Well, all during the discussion this morning it never entered our heads to say that the legal profession, who are so greatly interested in pensions for judges, were thinking of themselves. It never entered our heads, when the hon. member gets up to present his case, to take that stand. We take it for granted that he is honestly interested in the subject matter of his discussion.

I shall not prolong the discussion in which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre took part. It has been hanging fire since 1919. There is no doubt that the hon. member for York-Sunbury, who was at one time a cabinet minister, had that matter presented to him both in council and out of council, and on all occasions on which it could be presented.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I deny that, and I deny the implication. If it had come to my attention it would have been given every consideration. But as a private member of parliament I have had occasion to take this matter up—and I am not thanking the hon. member for Cape Breton South for the lecture he is giving me. I am quite prepared to take what is coming to me, but I want nothing from him.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of lecturing the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does he call it, then?

Mr. GILLIS: I do say, however, that he who throws lefthanded swipes around the house should be prepared to take them back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will take what comes to me.

Mr. GILLIS: I had risen to speak about labour relations, and I shall be as explicit as possible. My chief quarrel at the moment is with the national war labour board, which has to do with the administration of order in council P.C. 9384. I am disappointed with the machinery therein set up.

Mr. MITCHELL: What my hon. friend is saying does not come under this item.

Mr. GILLIS: I am speaking about labour administration.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; the administration of labour relations comes under the war appropriation estimates.

Mr. GILLIS: My conception of the Department of Labour is that it administers everything in the field of labour relations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can discuss anything under it.

Mr. GILLIS: That board has to do particularly with administration in connection with wage orders. For example, if a dispute occurs between a union and the board, that matter then comes back to the Department of Labour, to the minister and his conciliation officers, so that it may be ironed out. As I started out to say, I am disappointed with the machinery set up. As I see it, in the field of wage control, and the enforcement of decisions by conciliation boards, under the present administration we are practically back where we started in 1940. I think no progress has been made. There are so many of these boards to-day that one is almost boarded in. I am safe in saying that the average member of the House of Commons, who does not make it his business to keep track of all these boards, has very little realization as to just what the machinery is.

Under order in council P.C. 1003 a court of industrial relations is set up—or at least it is supposed to be a court. They have delegated much of their authority, by agreement, of course, to the different provinces. I believe Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario have agreements whereby the provisions of P.C. 1003 are within the control of the provincial boards, and the provincial departments of labour are given authority to administer that particular order. This has to do only with union certification.

That is not so bad, but the board that administers order in council P.C. 9384, which is the wage order, is the one with which I am quarrelling at the present time. I said a moment ago that we are just about where we were in 1941, and I make that statement because of a specific case in my own province at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the board presided over by Mr. Justice Archibald?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. I refer to the situation at the Halifax shipyards. In those shipyards we are reaching exactly the same situation we had in Kirkland Lake in 1941. For the past two years the union in those shipyards has endeavoured in every possible way to negotiate a contract carrying with it a maintenance of the membership clause. About two years ago I had the privilege of sitting in and talking the matter over with some of the representatives of the Canadian Congress of Labour who were in Hailfax at that time. I thought the matter was settled, and that it was just a matter of negotiation for a week or two. I was under the impression that the contract would have been signed, the union recognized, and any difficulty in the future wiped out of the way. Within the last week however it has been brought to the attention of the house, both by telegram and through the medium of the press, that the Halifax shipyards are still fighting for that maintenance of membership, and the right to check off for union dues. Three yards are affected, and they are in exactly the same position that they were in two years ago.

Serious repercussions can develop from this situation. The yards at Halifax are important yards, for many reasons. There was a threatened strike there this morning—or a strike vote was to be taken. As was mentioned by the Minister of Labour at noon to-day, one of his conciliation officers is in there. But what concerns me is that I do not think this conciliation officer is going to be able to do much. If it could have been cured by conciliation, the matter would not be in the position it is in to-day. A conciliation board sat in this matter. That board, appointed by the government, recommended union recognition and the maintenance of the membership clause in the agreement. That matter is in the hands of the Department of Labour, and the department has the recommendation of its own board. The company takes the position that it is not going to grant that concession. Worse than that, only last week Mr. Nelson, the manager of the company, called a public meeting and addressed his employees for the purpose of telling them he had no intention of granting the concession which had already been granted by the conciliation board appointed under the terms of the order in council.

What now concerns me is that we are heading for the post-war period. If we are correctly informed, it looks as if at any time we might expect a cessation of hostilities so far as the European war is concerned. This will mean that a large percentage of our boys and girls will be returned to Canada. They will have to have jobs. If the employers of Canada are concerned only about themselves after three or four years of war; if they are allowed to flaunt the department's instructions and throw them to one side, then I do not look forward with any optimism to the post-war period. There must be more cooperation shown by those who operate industry.

The shipyards are an important part of the economic set-up of Nova Scotia. There has been trouble in the shipyards right across Canada, from Vancouver to Nova Scotia. Unless we are prepared to enforce the laws we lay down, there is not much use in putting them on the statute book. I do not care who likes that or who does not like it. We have gone along for twenty years in this country pleading on our knees with the employers. I think since the outbreak of the war the federal government have been extremely fair to the employers; they have been patient and long-suffering. A great deal of injury has been done the present government because of the failure on the part of industrialists generally to appreciate what the government has been doing for them.

I hear some of my hon. friends across the way muttering. They ask, "Would the C.C.F. enforce those laws?" Yes, the C.C.F. would pass laws in the interests of the Canadian people and they would enforce them. If the situation were reversed, if the employees in Halifax were taking the position now being taken by the employer, what would happen? We know what would happen. We know what happened in Kirkland Lake when they exercised their rights. Mitchell Hepburn organized his gestapo and sent his hussars in there and used force against the workers of Ontario. The greatest weapon the employer can hold over the head of the employees is the economic weapon.

An hon. MEMBER: What happened?

Mr. GILLIS: What would you call a man on horseback, with a gun in his hip pocket and a club in his hand? If that is not using force, then I do not know what force is. I have been through a lot of it. I have seen the cavalry, the infantry, the artillery, the horse-guards and everything else they could put in under similar circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When?

Mr. GILLIS: In Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON: When?

Mr. GILLIS: On four occasions, in 1922, 1923 and 1925. They barbed-wired that province. It is not a new thing to me. I know it is pressure. It is economic pressure; it is intimidation. That is the club they hold over the worker at all times. We have been told there must be a new heaven and a new earth, that we must win the peace, that our boys and girls must be guaranteed employment. If this is to be the attitude of private enterprise after four years of government, if the authority of the government is not recognized, then I am a little sceptical about the kind of set-up we are going to have in the aftermath of the war.

The Halifax shipyards should not be in the position in which they are to-day. Three thousand workers are threatening to walk out from essential jobs because the employer refuses them the right that is granted to others, the maintenance of their organization and the right to the check-off. That is the only issue in dispute. It is not a question of wages, it is a question of maintaining their organization.

I am in hopes that the conciliation officer will be able to come to some understanding with the shipyards in Halifax. A board sat on this question, weighed all the evidence and made a recommendation. If there is not sufficient weight in that recommendation to cause this company to be reasonable and fair with their employees, then I do not see how Mr. Pettigrove is going to fare any differently in a general discussion.

There is general dissatisfaction in Ontario with the functioning of the board. I am not going to go into this at any great length. I have a memorandum in my hand and I have no doubt the minister has received a copy from the United Automobile Workers of America setting out three or four experiences that they had with the board. One point of dissatisfaction is that they consider they are not being fairly treated by the man who is supposed to represent labour on that war labour board. This particular letter gives specific grievances and I have no hesitation in giving it to the minister. It is dated July 12, and one paragraph reads:

> As far as the U.A.W. is concerned we are prepared to launch a public campaign in the newspapers on the policy of the government under P.C. 9384 and also the unbearable and the dictatorial attitude of the personnel of the board. When the General Motors boys were turned down they requested an interview with Mr. Bell and were told by Mr. Bell that he had no responsibility to the organized workers of Canada to inform them as to why the board had turned down the request of the union. While these board members may be required to take an oath, nevertheless this oath should not restrain them from giving workers, whom they represent, information as to the reasons for being turned down when such representatives must inform their respective memberships of such reasons. If they are not allowed to do it unofficially, then it should come as an official pronouncement by the board as to reasons why refusal to grant certain concessions are made.

I am in accord with that, and I think the minister will be also. A union official is placed at great disadvantage when this occurs. I think it can be said that since the outbreak of the war the organized workers of Canada have done a great job under great difficulties in keeping plants operating when grievances have arisen. The workers prepare their case and state their reasons why they think there should be adjustments. Their officials appear before the board, which considers the case and passes on the evidence. All they get back is a short note to the effect that the case has been dismissed. They are obliged to go back and discuss the matter with their membership and they are placed at a great disadvantage. I think one thing the minister could do is to see to it that when the board makes a decision in the matter of wages on a presentation by any labour organization, the reasons for the decision should be set out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the decision given after a full hearing at which both parties are present?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are briefs filed?

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. Briefs are filed by the union, and they have another complaint in this connection. When they prepare a brief for presentation to the war labour board, either provincial or national, they are notified that they must submit a copy to the employer concerned. On the other hand, the employees never see a copy of the employer's brief until they come before the board, national or regional.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not?

Mr. GILLIS: That is the question. The employees have to submit a copy of their brief to the employers, and the employers should be obliged to do the same thing in order that the union may have an opportunity of studying the position that is taken by the employer, if and when they meet the board.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is that a provision of the regulations, that the union has to submit a copy of its brief to the employer, but the employer has not to submit a copy of his brief to the employees?

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think there is a regulation, but it is a matter of practice.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may interject, it cuts both ways. If the employees make an application, a copy of their application is sent to the employer. If the application is made by the employer, he of course sends a copy of his brief to the representatives of the employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure that I quite understand it yet.

Mr. GILLIS: The U.A.W. and the United Steelworkers have made a lot of presentations, and they claim that while they must file a copy of their brief with the employer—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When they make the application?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but that they never see a copy of the employer's brief until they come before the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has suggested that if the employer makes the application, the unions get a copy of the employer's brief which they can answer.

Mr. GILLIS: That is probably right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am just trying to find out what the procedure is.

Mr. GILLIS: Most of the cases coming before the board to-day are joint applications on behalf of the employer and the employee. But in the case of the Halifax shipyards dispute, and in the case of a few tough employers who hold that no one has the right to talk to them about wages, the employers do not do anything that they are not compelled to do, and both the U.A.W. and the United Steelworkers—and they are both large organizations—make the complaint that they are not granted the same right as the employer to see a copy of his brief.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister suggests that they have. I just want to understand the procedure.

Mr. GILLIS: My information is that the employees are not granted that same right. At least that is one of the complaints contained in this memorandum.

I do not want to labour this matter. I merely bring to the minister's attention the fact that I think there could be considerable improvement in the administration of order in council P.C. 9384, and secondly I believe there is a lot of overlapping and a lot of duplication of work between the provincial boards and the national boards. I think there should be a general overhauling of the machinery to find out exactly where we fit in the matter of jurisdiction.

That is another matter on which I could cite case after case that causes friction between the regional and national boards in Ontario. I do not suppose it is so bad in British Columbia; in Nova Scotia our problem in the field of labour relations is pretty well solved, as we have well-defined machinery; we strike a snag once in a while like this Halifax shipyards dispute. But in Ontario labour is still organizing and it has a terrific job to do. They are at one and the same time carrying on this organizational work and administering the affairs of the unions that are set up. There is a lot of duplication with respect to the boards functioning in Ontario. That is the complaint that I have. I am going to give the minister a copy of this memorandum because it contains specific suggestions to cure some of the disabilities in the administration of order in council P.C. 9384.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will try to answer some of my hon. friend's questions, although perhaps not consecutively because he has covered a lot of territory in a short time.

There are two national organizations, the war labour board and the national labour relations board. The complaint of my hon. friend was not against the war labour board, presided over by Mr. Justice Archibald, but against the wartime labour relations board, which deals with such questions as union recognition and conditions of employment, which have no bearing on the cost of the article which comes out of the factory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the O'Connor board?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. It is the same system that they have in the United States, where they have one board to deal with one thing and another board to deal with another.

My hon. friend spoke of the provincial boards. We have in the provinces what we call regional boards. We think that the people of the locality concerned know their own problems better than we can possibly know them in Ottawa. I am a great believer in decentralization. I do not think we can carry on in any other way. Last year, for instance, the national war labour board and regional boards on wage cases, dealt with 43,000 applications, and eighty per cent of the applications were made by the employers. I hold no brief for the employers, of course.

The labour relations legislation is a comparatively new thing. It was brought into being after hearings by the national war labour board. First we drew up a rough draft and invited the provinces to discuss it with us because, under the British North America Act, they have jurisdiction in these matters in peace time, which we all hope to see again, and when that day comes I assume that the provinces will wish again to exercise that jurisdiction. We met with the nine provinces, discussed this rough draft, decided on certain fundamentals, and then drafted another document as a result of our deliberations. That document we sent to all the provinces, to employers' organizations, and to employee organizations. We thought we had done a pretty good job on this document. Later we received suggestions of 170 amendments which were proposed to be made to the document. I think some credit is due to us that eventually we fashioned an instrument that received the endorsation of both employee and employer organizations in this country and the endorsation of all the provinces. I only wish that we could have as much agreement on other questions concerning this dominion as we had on this question concerning labour relations. But as I have said before in this house, when you draft a document, even though it may be agreed upon by all the parties concerned, it is something like composing a symphony. It looks all right on paper, but you do not know what it will sound like when it comes out of the instruments.

By law, employers are compelled to recognize bona fide trade unions. The question raised in the Halifax shipyards dispute does not come under the national war labour board, but under the wartime labour relations board, because it deals with conditions of work and the certification of trade unions. They have had an agreement in the Halifax shipyards since 1941. They had one in 1942, and again in 1943, and they would have had an agreement now except that the employer will not agree to the check-off and to what you might call the closed or union shop.

In the drafting of this legislation respecting labour relations, suggestions were made—the U. A. W. was one party that suggested it—that the reports of boards of conciliation should be binding on both parties, but that was one of the few organizations that agreed to that principle. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the employers' organizations were opposed to that principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principle of compulsion?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. The opinion has been expressed by the President of the United States that the closed shop should not be permitted in time of war. That is a matter of opinion. My hon. friend might have one view, the hon. member for York-Sunbury another and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a still different opinion.

Mr. GILLIS: The issue at Halifax shipyards is not the closed shop.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a check-off and a form of closed shop. I am using that language because it is the language generally understood by trade unionists and other people in this country. That is the only issue in dispute. It it not a question of wages nor of seniority or working conditions. The only question in dispute is the closed shop and the check-off. That is streets apart from the Kirkland Lake situation. I sat as chairman of the commission on the dispute there, and I felt that if we could have used a little more patience we could eventually have got an agreement in Kirkland Lake. There is absolutely no comparison between the conditions arising out of the Kirkland Lake dispute and this particular dispute in the Halifax shipyards.

I think I have covered just about all the points raised.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. MITCHELL: Any question.

Mr. HOMUTH: In regard to the brief presented by the workers in the Halifax shipyards, were there only two points in dispute, or were there other points upon which they had agreed?

Mr. MITCHELL: They reached agreement on all points except those two, according to my information; there remain just the closed shop and the check-off. As long as men are men and women are women there will always be industrial disputes.

Mr. HOMUTH: And home disputes too.

Mr. MITCHELL: But I think this might be truthfully said, that we have advanced the span of a generation in the last three years in the matter of labour relations in this dominion. We have at least established basic national principles as regards the conduct of employers and employees, as regards the right to join a union, for instance. We have probably gone farther than any other country in the united nations. There is only one country in which this principle is in vogue, and that is New Zealand, where by law you have to join a trade union. That is not done in Great Britain or the United States or Canada. Many people would have grave fears for our national life if such a step were taken. However, that is a matter of opinion. I am hopeful that the leadership given by this government will be maintained in this regard when the war is over. Whether we like it or not, the impact of the conclusion of the war is going to make it necessary that employers and employees sit down together and in a rational way work out their difficulties, their industrial disputes, so that this country may be able to maintain its position industrially in competition with other countries—that competition will come, whether we like it or not—and so that the tremendous industrial structure we have erected can be maintained after the conclusion of hostilities.

I think I have covered all the points my hon. friend has raised. If not I am sorry.

Mr. GILLIS: There is just one thing I want to say. When the minister insists that a check-off for union dues—or "maintenance of membership" is how they have it written in their contracts—can be interpreted as a closed shop, it is misleading.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said, a form of closed shop.

Mr. GILLIS: The general public get the impression that if the workers in the Halifax shipyards are granted that maintenance of membership clause in their agreement it means that every man who seeks employment in the shipyards will be compelled to join the union. That is not true.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the minister went that far.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what a closed shop implies. The system they are looking for in the Halifax shipyards has been in vogue for at least the last thirty years among the mine workers of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the check-off?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, and it is at present operating in the steel workers union right across Nova Scotia. In years gone by the mine workers and steel workers foolishly fought it; to-day they would not change back. In the United States, I believe in practically every trades union organization which functions, they have exactly the arrangement which the Halifax ship workers are looking for at the present time. It does not constitute a closed shop. I believe the only closed shop in Canada —and I do not think those concerned would want to get away from it—is Tip Top Tailors' set-up, where before you become an employee of the company you go to the union officials. Their arrangements in that organization are very harmonious. I do not suppose there is a set-up in Canada which works more closely together and where the employees think as much of the employers. But certainly that is not what the workers in the Halifax shipyards are looking for. Under the closed shop, for which the miners of the United States fought for years, though I do not believe they ever reached that objective, I understand it is compulsory to join the union before you are employed. As it exists to-day in the arrangement the Halifax shipyards are looking for, after you are in employment—

Mr. MITCHELL: After you have been working for thirty days you join.

Mr. GILLIS: If you want to. There is no compulsion about it. I know that in Nova Scotia as late as 1937 there were men employed in the mines who were not paying dues to the United Mine Workers. Your union officials will discuss the matter with you from time to time, but there is no compulsion; it is entirely up to yourself. I know from personal experience that is one of the greatest assets that an employer can have in establishing harmonious relations with his employees. There is not any compulsion attached to this particular arrangement which the Halifax shipyards are looking for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there any miners working in the larger mines of Nova Scotia who are not members of the United Mine Workers?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes Within the last few months I saw an article in one of the Nova Scotia newspapers indicating that one of the union locals in the Sydney mines area were endeavouring to make their membership in that area one hundred per cent. That would indicate that there are some men who were not paying dues to the union. There would not be many, but there would be some. In most of the collieries they are organized one hundred per cent.

Mr. McIVOR: I was going to ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South a question just before he ended his speech. We can judge things only by what we see and what we know. It may be that they are different in Cape Breton from what they are in Fort William, but I have had some surprises as I study labour and try to find out the calibre of the labour boards which are helping the minister to administer his department. The first surprise I had was that the majority of the men with whom I talked had a union card in their pocket. I remember a time in this house when we wanted the best brains of Canada to run this government, and I think we got them, and some of the best brains of Canada have come from the labour unions, and these men have been helping the minister to manage the department; and while I am biased in favour of labour I think everyone will agree that they have done a mighty fine job. I can remember the Kirkland Lake situation very well, and I did not like it. I had some criticism. Somebody told me that there were six hundred men at Kirkland Lake who had not taken out their citizenship papers. I said, "That may be true although those people have their rights too. If a man in this great country has not enough 'sand' in him to spend his five dollars to go and take his examination and become a citizen of this country, I think he has got to take some bumps." The minister has had to stand a good deal of criticism because of what happened at Kirkland Lake, but he has weathered the storms splendidly.

I am not concerned about Cape Breton or Kirkland Lake, but I am concerned about Fort William. It appeared as though when a man dismissed at Fort William for union activities was out he would remain out, but that was not so. Why? Because his union members stood behind him and because the member for Fort William stood for fair play. I went to the Minister of Labour and told him, "Unless this is settled there will be a strike, and I shall help to lead it." Then what happened? There was a change in the management of that live concern, the Canada Car and Foundry, better known as the "car works." We saw that the man was placed back in the car works and there was no strike, thanks to the Minister of Labour and his advisers, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

One thing has come out of this great big boiling pot of labour criticism and labour legislation which is a credit to all Canada, and that is the labour code. I do not think the hon. member for Cape Breton South will find much fault with that labour code. Collective bargaining is in force, and with it all you have holidays with pay. This code is accepted by members in all parts of the house, or I believe so at any rate. I know I accept it willingly, and an effort is made to enforce it in many of the provinces, not only in connection with war industry but in every other kind of industry as well.

Some people have wanted to replace the minister with someone else. Whom would they suggest? He is a man who has come up from the ranks of labour. He has stemmed the storm in many labour unions and has come through and he stands now as the champion of labour. I say we ought to say to the Minister of Labour in his present capacity, "Well done, my boy; stick to your job. You are winning out."

Mr. LITTLE: May I ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South a question? When he said that policemen had walked up and down intimidating people, I did not quite catch what he said. What did he mean by the remark he made in that connection?

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad the hon. member has brought that up because I forgot to mention it before the minister made his reply. The minister claimed that there was no similarity between the Kirkland Lake dispute and this one. The similarity is that in both cases the employers refused to recognize a mandate from the conciliation board. The board, having sat, made a recommendation and the employers refused to recognize its award.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Kirkland Lake affair was more fundamental than the recognition of a union.

Mr. GILLIS: In answer to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little), what I meant was this. At the time the miners of Kirkland Lake went on strike, they were complying with the laws of Canada as laid down by the Department of Labour. They went through all the machinery, took a strike vote, and legally they were permitted to strike. No strike is effective without a picket. That is recognized as part of the game, and while they were peacefully picketing the plants and the mines, the mounted police, the provincial police, and special police that were organized by Hepburn were sent in.

Mr. LITTLE: What does the hon. member mean by the special police organized by Hepburn?

Mr. GILLIS: There was an organized special police force sent up from Ontario.

Mr. LITTLE: I thought the hon. member was referring to what he described some time ago as the gestapo.

Mr. GILLIS: It was an organized special police. Now, any time a government in Canada starts organizing a special police force for the purpose of taking away the rights of workers granted them by law, you have something similar to a gestapo.

Mr. LITTLE: They were not there to take away the rights of workers but to protect the workers as well as everybody else. They were there to protect the workers and other people as well. That is what they went there for.

Mr. GILLIS: The men were peacefully picketing.

Mr. LITTLE: And no one ever stopped them.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is not referring to the dominion government?

Mr. GILLIS: No, the government of Ontario. They interfered with the picketing. Their presence was not necessary and they were a source of intimidation, and I say that action of that kind on the part of any government, in this day and age, constitutes in my opinion all the rudiments of totalitarianism.

Mr. LITTLE: I saw picketers and policemen walking together up and down the street. Do you call that intimidation?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarreling with the policemen as individuals. Policemen must earn their living. I am quarreling however with the purpose for which they were sent there by the government of Ontario.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have a question arising out of a letter I received the other day from a soldier who was overseas. This man was working in a factory in connection with which there was no union at the time he joined up for overseas service. What he wants to know is this. If during his absence the closed-shop principle has been adopted in this factory, will he be entitled to reinstatement in his position under the mandatory provisions of the statute in that regard respecting the rights of soldiers on their discharge? He was a non-union man at the time he joined up. This is a matter that is of very considerable interest, and that interest is more than academic. I would ask the minister to elucidate it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That can be done in a couple of words. No trade union agreement can take precedence over a statute. Whether that man belonged to a union or not he would be entitled to all the rights and privileges which are his under the law, and he can come back to his old job regardless of whether there is a union there or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Though there might be a good deal of difficulty in enforcing his rights, that is the law.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not had any difficulty up to now.

Item agreed to.

101. Annuities Act, $273,186.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do the agents who sell annuities work on a commission basis?

Mr. MITCHELL: The sales are made on a commission basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nearly all of them.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have had a number of complaints regarding agents who go out to sell annuities, particularly to women. I do not say that they deliberately misrepresent the facts, but they do misrepresent the annuities to the people to whom they sell them, because these people are given to understand that this money is always available. The result is that on several occasions we have written to the department asking whether some payment cannot be made, whether this money cannot be got back, and the reply is no, that when they reach a certain age the money is available. I think that the agents who sell annuities throughout the country should be told very distinctly that they must explain the whole situation more clearly than they do, because if sales are made on a commission basis it is only too clear that the more annuities they sell the more money they will make.

There are other cases that arise. I know of two or three. I took up one in particular with the department but nothing could be done. I know of cases that other members have taken up with the department. I know of a woman who paid in for many years, or she might have paid in a lump sum, but she had not yet reached the year at which she would start to collect her annuity. She developed cancer. Other cases may develop some other disease which would perhaps in the course of a short time carry them away. They need the money. So long as they were healthy they could work and make a living, but here they were with a disease which in the course of two or three years is going to end their lives and they have no means of livelihood. There is no cash surrender value of the annuity. They cannot get it until such time as they start to collect on it or death intervenes. The result is that these people suffer severely. I do feel that our annuities act should be so changed that in special circumstances money is made available to those annuitants who may need it because of illness or something unusual arises.

Mr. MARSHALL: The whole question of annuities was under review by a committee of this House of Commons not very long ago. I do not know whether that precludes me from making any remarks with respect to it, but it is not my intention to go into the matter as fully as I should like to. However, I ask the minister if the officials of his department have read the discussion which took place with the auditor general, and is it the intention of the minister to review this discussion and bring about a better operation of the act The amount asked for in item 101 is $273,186. This amount is made up substantially of commissions to agents. According to the last auditor general's report, $157,500 were paid to those agents. One agent received $6,358, another $6,032 and another one $5,047. Those were the agents receiving over $5,000. Let me say that I do not object to the government engaging in this type of work. I think they should. But the point that I wish to emphasize is that in my opinion these costs should be included in the cost of the annuity instead of the people of Canada being asked to underwrite them. In addition to that, I submit that the scheme is actuarially unsound, in that from year to year we are called upon to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund a sum which has never fallen below a quarter of a million dollars in the last ten or fifteen years. On one occasion, in 1937-38, it was necessary to transfer from the consolidated revenue fund to the Government Annuities Act a sum totalling almost $9,000,000.

I am not going to discuss the matter any farther, because I felt that the public accounts committee would bring in some sort of recommendation to the minister with respect to the operations of the annuities act in the future. But it is evident to me that we shall not be able to complete our work this session, and in consequence we shall not have an opportunity of bringing in any recommendations. Is this question under review by the department at the present time? What amount of money will have to be transferred from the consolidated revenue fund in the year which has just closed in order to keep the fund solvent?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to dispose of the questions asked by the hon. member for Waterloo South while they are fresh in my mind. With reference to the attitude of the agents in the annuities branch, we have had, in the last two years to my knowledge, no letters of any description of the tenor indicated by my hon. friend. With reference to the surrender value of the policy, they can take up at any time the annuity that they have paid in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The amount of the annuity.

Mr. MITCHELL: They can take up the annuity, the actual annuity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They cannot get their capital.

Mr. MITCHELL: They cannot get their capital back; that is quite true.

The hon. member for Camrose raised the question of commissions. The commissions that are possible to agents selling annuities are one-third of those of the average straight line insurance company. The commission is one per cent of the amount with a maximum of $50 on any policy. In the past there have been arguments back and forth on the actuarial basis of this branch of the Department of Labour. It has carried on on a four per cent basis. My hon. friend has argued that it should be lower than that. That is a matter of opinion between my hon. friend and those who have probably made a deeper study of this than I. When those annuities were instituted years ago their purpose was to encourage thrift. In those days we had no Old Age Pensions Act and none of the social legislation we have to-day. It is estimated that the approximate amount necessary this year will be $50,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am not objecting to paying the agents their commissions, but I submit that the amount which is paid and the expenses in connection with the operation should be charged into the cost of the annuity instead of the people of the dominion being asked to shoulder them. It is past the stage now when it may be looked upon as a substitute for old age pensions. These annuities are being purchased by individuals who can well afford to pay for the cost of them; therefore I submit that the cost should be included in the cost of the annuity from year to year.

Mr. KNOWLES: The last time I was on my feet the minister and I were crossing swords. This time I wish to speak in support of this phase of the work of his department. With respect to some of the comments that have just been made I wish to say that I feel that this type of legislation is particularly desirable and that it has an important part to play even in the future when we may have other more extensive forms of social security legislation. It is a good idea to encourage people to provide for their old age, and even to encourage them to provide a little more than the social security laws of the land may make available to them. To that extent it seems to me it is a socially sound principle—whether it is actuarially sound or not—to include an element of subsidy in the making of these annuities.

I would emphasize the fact, in reference to the last statement made by the hon. member who preceded me in this debate, that there is a maximum amount of annuity that any person can purchase under this provision. That maximum is $1,200 a year. In other words, it is not a scheme which makes it possible for the well-to-do people to provide themselves with large annuities in their advanced years, on the basis of a government subsidy.

I consider the scheme a most desirable one, and I have only two comments to make. The first is this: I wish the government would advertise it a little more. The advertising it is putting out is very good, but—

Mr. MITCHELL: Is the hon. member referring to advertising in a restricted sense?

Mr. KNOWLES: My point is that the government is not advertising annuities properly.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Of course it does the other kind of advertising, all the time. I have no doubt the minister has seen the little booklet I now hold in my hand, one which is circulated by the annuities branch of his department. The booklet is a most attractive one and, by the way, answers many of the arguments in connection with social ownership of financial institutions. Even so, the number of people in Canada who have heard of Canadian government annuities is very limited. I am wondering why so little publicity is given this desirable scheme. I should hope the government would consider it appropriate to let the people of Canada know a little more about Canadian government annuities, which, as this booklet says, are backed by the whole resources of the dominion.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The other matter to which I would direct the minister's attention has to do with the salaries paid in the annuities branch. As other hon. members have pointed out, it is true that some of those who are selling annuities on commission do not do badly. But employees working in the branch fare quite differently.

We are now discussing vote No. 101, and we find the break-down at page 94 of the estimates. I might point out that earlier this year, because of my interest in this whole subject, I did some browsing around in the estimates, and when doing so I was amazed at the small salaries paid some people who are doing very responsible work. Accordingly, I placed some questions on the order paper, and in reply some interesting information was brought down.

I would remind the committee of just one of those answers, as it appears at pages 1048 and 1049 of Hansard. In that answer I was told that the duties of a certain employee in the branch were as follows:

> The making of actuarial calculations, involving the costs of both past and future service and interviewing employers relative to proposed retirement annuity plans for employees; the annual vacations of retirement plans in force; actuarial calculations concerning withdrawals, deaths and retirements under group contracts and the issuing of individual contracts in connection therewith; correspondence on all matters affecting retirement annuity plans, office work and routine in connection with the foregoing.

Those were the duties of one employee in the branch. At the same time I was given his qualifications. They were these:

> (1) Graduation from Dalhousie university (B.A.) in mathematics and economics, (2) Passed three examinations of Actuarial Society of America, (3) Passed civil service grade 4 examination for university graduates, (4) First on eligible list, civil service competition for actuarial assistants 1943, (5) Five years' experience in annuities branch.

Mr. HOMUTH: He ought to be Prime Minister.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the salary of this individual, who has these heavy responsibilities, and who has such high qualifications? He received $1,440 per year, plus a war duty supplement of $120 a year, plus a cost of living bonus of $221.94 a year. I was amazed that a man of his qualifications and having his responsibility would receive such a low income for the kind of work he is doing.

I took the matter up with the minister, not only as it applied to this individual, but with respect to other employees and as a matter of general policy in the department. In correspondence he explained to me the difficulty he has with the civil service commission and the treasury board—these are friends of ours we run into all the time. However, despite the difficulty indicated in the correspondence, in due course he was able to do something. Order in council P.C. 31/2595 was passed under date of April 12, 1944, increasing the war duties supplement of this employee, so that his salary plus his war duties supplement now give him a total of $1,800 a year. We are always grateful for small mercies, and I am glad that the minister recognized the justice of my claim to the effect that this man should have been receiving higher pay. I submit, however, that his salary is still not in keeping with the responsibilities of the work carried on in the annuities branch.

On another occasion, in reply to some questions I placed on the order paper, an interesting return was tabled. This is dated March 21, 1944, and is identified as sessional paper 233. It sets out statistics as to the number of plans issued by the annuities branch in the last number of years. While it does not give the figures in respect of individual contracts taken out with the branch, it does give the number of plans set up by the branch, either for governmental bodies or for private corporations. I think members of the committee and the country generally should know about this service rendered by the annuities branch. Not only will it sell very desirable contracts to individuals, but it sets up these retirement plans, into which employees and employers may contribute, along with the assistance provided by the government, so as to make possible pensions for employees when they reach retirement age.

I was interested in the increase in this phase of the work carried on by the branch. In the fiscal year ending in 1938 the total number of new plans issued was six. In each of the succeeding years the number increased, until the year ending in 1943 we find that forty-seven new plans were issued. I emphasize this increase—from six in 1938 to forty-seven in 1943. The figure I have given is for the year ending March 31, 1943, and I find that for the remaining nine months of that year fifty-six plans were issued.

This return to which I have called the attention of the committee also gives the dollar value of these plans, and shows that a real service is being rendered by the branch not only directly to individuals, but to private corporations and employers throughout the country. It is partly because this kind of service is being rendered to corporations that it seems to me most unfair that the work done in connection with these plans should be paid for at the low rates I have indicated. I hope that the minister will give some consideration to the two constructive suggestions I have offered. I am in full support of this work, but I feel that the activities of the annuities branch should be publicized much more than they are. I feel also that the employees of that branch should be paid in accordance with the work they are doing.

Item agreed to.

102. Combines Investigation Act, $28,380.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Could the minister give some information as to the work the commissioner is doing under the Combines Investigation Act; what work was done during the past year, and what work is being proceeded with now?

Mr. MITCHELL: There have been no prosecutions because the wartime prices and trade board regulations provide for any activities in this connection. The commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act is now with the wartime prices and trade board and he is keeping a close watch over the development of combinations in this country, if that is possible under the strict regulations in effect. He is also keeping a close eye upon the possible development of cartels and combines in the post-war period.

As my hon. friend knows, an investigation is being carried on at the present time by the United States government into the whole question of combines and cartels. I am given to understand that there is some difference of opinion among the governments of the united nations with respect to the question of international cartels. The situation is being closely watched by my department at the present time. We have a committee at work and investigation is being carried on in the light of possible conditions in the post-war period.

I think this can be said in connection with international cartels. It is my own view that the attitude of the larger powers will be of greater effect with respect to the maintenance of cartels after this war. I say again that the combines investigation branch of the Department of Labour is keeping the question under continuous survey at the present time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the minister could give us some information with respect to the post-war policy that the commissioner or the department is carrying on. I know of what is being done in the United States, and I know something of what is being brought forth by the committee investigating the matter of international cartels and monopolies. I think we are entitled to more information than the minister has given us. He has simply made the general statement that every consideration is being given the matter by his department, cooperating with bodies in other united nations with regard to this very important matter.

I should like to know the nature of the investigations being carried on with regard to the post-war period by the Department of Labour. Further, I think we should be informed as to the nature of the disagreement among the united nations on the question of international cartels. While I am sure the minister will not be able to go into full detail in that regard, perhaps he would be prepared to inform us what Canada's attitude is, what the attitude of the Department of Labour is with regard to this problem.

The minister has stated that the commissioner is assigned to the wartime prices and trade board and that there is not very much for him to look after because of the wartime controls that are in existence. I am going to ask him a question to which I think he should give a very careful answer. Throughout the country from time to time statements are made on platforms with respect to the large percentages of profit being allowed to various monopolies in the production of war-time goods and in the filling of war-time needs. We frequently hear it said that tremendous profits are being made. I am not one who makes those assertions, but I think information should be forthcoming with regard to this matter. If these allegations are true, the country should know; if they are not, then that fact should be made plain. Possibly the minister could answer this question by stating to what extent control or limitation has been placed upon the rate of profit that is available to or can be made by companies supplying war needs.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Department of Labour covers a lot of territory but it does not cover finance and national revenue. My opinion is that the government and the people of Canada—I am speaking of them jointly and collectively—deserve a great deal of credit for the conduct of this war on the industrial and commercial fronts. While I was not in Canada during the last war—I was at the war—I have a vivid recollection of the talk about profiteers.

I think it can be said truthfully that if anyone gets under the barrier of the income tax laws of this country, he is doing pretty good. I can speak personally about this matter. Not that I have attempted to get under that barrier, but I know what the Minister of Finance takes off me, to my own sorrow sometimes. I do not object, but that is what happens. I know it is sometimes felt that if you hammer the daylights out of the big fellow you are not taking any chances politically. It is sometimes thought that the easiest thing to do is to hammer the banks. I do not hold any brief for the banks or for any other large organization. I am opposed to combines and I think they should be regulated; I am opposed to international cartels and always have been, but at the same time I think there is a great deal of loose talk going on with respect to the profits being made by those engaged in the production of necessary war materials for the successful prosecution of the war. That is my own opinion.

My hon. friend will have to ask the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue about the profits being made, because it is their departments that administer the income tax laws of this country. If he wants information about depreciation being allowed, I believe that would come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

In order to give my own viewpoint as to the direction in which we are moving in connection with the investigation of combines in this country, I think I had better quote a letter which I wrote to Mr. McGregor, commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act, on May 22 of this year. It reads:

> Problems relating to international trade combinations such as international cartels and international patent arrangements have assumed great significance because of the possible effect of such arrangements on employment and domestic and foreign trade. Already international discussions on the expert level have brought forward proposals on which we are not as yet in a position to give an informed judgment.
> No comprehensive study has been made in Canada of the various aspects of the problems involved and no steps have been taken to assemble information which will be necessary before sound conclusions can be reached. Questions in regard to international trade combinations are continually being raised and no time should be lost in gathering adequate information as to the character and activities of international trade combinations and in considering possible measures of control.
> As there is no legislation in Canada which applies to international cartels as such it is highly desirable that study be given in advance to existing Canadian legislation in regard to trade combinations in their general aspects and to what further measures might be adopted to deal specifically with international trade combinations.
> Preliminary discussions on the relationship of cartel problems to other post-war economic problems have already taken place with officers of the Department of External Affairs, members of the advisory committee on economic policy and others. Dr. W. C. Clark and Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, chairman and vice-chairman of the advisory committee, have recommended that the necessary inquiries should be made without delay. I think they should be made under the general direction of yourself as commissioner of the combines investigation in consultation with Dr. Mackintosh and Mr. J. J. Deutsch of the Department of External Affairs with such assistance as may be found necessary. In this connection I approve the suggestion that Mr. J. C. McRuer, K.C., of Toronto and Professor V. W. Bladen of the university of Toronto should be retained. I am writing to Mr. St. Laurent to-day to ask if he will make Mr. McRuer's services available. With these arrangements I hope it will be possible to proceed with the work with as little delay as possible.

What is here suggested is a study rather than a public inquiry. Its objective should be to secure basic information on which suitable government policy might later be based and in this respect would be in contrast to specific investigations to secure evidence of alleged offences. At various stages in the course of the inquiry it would be desirable to discuss with members of the economic advisory committee the information obtained and recommendations suggested. In general I suggest that the study might proceed along the following lines.

Study the nature and operations of international trade combinations in relation to Canadian interests and the measures which exist for their control. Such a study would include international patent arrangements. The committee should endeavour to find out to what extent policies followed by such trade combinations have affected employment or the operations of business enterprises in Canada or may affect them in the future. Attention should also be given to the effects of such arrangements on Canadian import and export trade and possible effects in the post-war period.

Study the extent to which activities of such international trade combinations are affected by existing Canadian legislation and what further measures may be necessary to safeguard the public interest. In this phase of the study consideration should be given to the possibilities of international collaboration in the control of cartels.

Study the relationships that may exist between international and domestic trade combinations, and make recommendations of necessary changes in existing legislation affecting combinations of either type.

The letter is signed by myself.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Since this comprehensive power or responsiblity was conferred, have Mr. McRuer and the other gentlemen named done anything since the month of May last when this most scholarly letter was produced?

Mr. MITCHELL: I spent a lot of time on it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I can well believe that. It is a most comprehensive letter and contains a great deal of hope as to what can be done. But actually what is being done following the expenditure of time and energy in the production of that letter and the giving of instructions? What are these men doing? Are any of them meeting with the committee in the United States? Has Canada a representative in Washington while the investigation is going on there?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend must appreciate the ramifications of a matter of this sort. With reference to the investigation that is going on in Washington, I know that our people are going backwards and forwards all the time, and of course we have an embassy in Washington which is charged with the responsibility of keeping us informed of day-to-day developments. It is an immense problem, and all I hope is this, that they use more expedition than we have used in this house since last January.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a slap at the House of Commons.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: International cartels and the like have been investigated for the past three years, but this government did nothing about it until it gave these instructions in May of 1944. I am trying to get a picture of what is actually being done and I seem to be having some difficulty. Is Mr. McRuer or any other counsel working on this thing? Are they to-day investigating the matters with respect to which they received these comprehensive instructions? What are they doing? Is an investigation going ahead?

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I had answered my hon. friend's question. The investigation as directed is being carried on at the present time. I have no knowledge of any findings at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No report has yet been made to the minister?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. BOUCHER: Under the details for Combines Investigation Act I find that there are employed in this branch one commissioner, an assistant commissioner, one investigator, one clerk, one stenographer and one typist. If the commissioner, instead of acting as commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, is working in the Department of Munitions and Supply, may I ask if these other officials are doing work connected with the Combines Investigation Act? The salaries of the commissioner and his assistant amount to $11,140, and the salaries of the rest of the staff amount to roughly $7,000. I would say that now in time of war, when there is great industrial activity of every kind, war expenditures, changes in management and control, changes even in the location of industries, there would seem to be a great work to be done in administering the Combines Investigation Act, having in mind the aims of parliament with regard to post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation. But the estimates would seem to indicate that the act has been almost discarded. Can the minister state anything whatsoever that is being done to justify the expenditure of even $19,000 for salaries? What work is being done in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, and are these other officials still there?

Mr. MITCHELL: The whole staff is in the enforcement division of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the situation?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. It was made the nucleus of the enforcement division of the wartime prices and trade board. I think my hon. friend will agree that controls are to-day much more rigid than they were in peace time. Of course we assume that the enforcement branch of the wartime prices and trade board is far greater than it was under the Department of Labour, under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister has just said is that the branch for the moment is dormant.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the officials are on loan to the wartime prices and trade board. I understand that is the situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing is being done by way of promoting investigations against combinations in restraint of trade. As a matter of fact, government policy, which, we shall be told, is based on war-time necessity, is to encourage control by a combination at the moment. The government is not going to investigate even in cases of combination; if I understand the situation aright, the government rather encouraged that there be a combination in connection with prices and that sort of thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether I should say "encouraged", but I think this might be said, that at the moment we have more or less a planned economy, under which people cannot do what they want to, they act under direction of the government. That applies to employers as well as employees. Those people who talk about a planned economy might reflect that we have almost one now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we have, too—too much so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: It has happened under pressure of war, and I believe it is inescapable under present day conditions where you have shortages of labour or materials or necessities of life, because it is necessary that they be rationed and apportioned, or prices set. At least that is the policy at the moment of most of the governments of the united nations. As I said before, the control is much more rigid than it was under a peace-time condition.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I notice that under this particular item there is a decrease of $1,870 as compared with last year. In view of the fact that no report is given I think we are right in coming to the conclusion that nothing is being done about combines investigations. I should like the minister to enlarge on the procedure which is followed. How does this commission carry on its work? Does it wait for some person to draw to the attention of the commission that the lumber men across Canada, we will say, are getting together, and that these big interests are putting their funds together and forming large combinations, or that the steel boys seem to be combining their organizations? I do not know that there is anything in the machinery of the wartime prices and trade board to regulate the amalgamation of various interests across Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; but they govern all the prices.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to, say, the various companies in Canada which are producing and selling oil to the public there seems to be some kind of agreement on prices. In the clothing industry there is apparently very little in the way of competition. I think we are moving on from the age of competition into the age of control. A number of cement companies which operate in Canada control through patents the manufacture and sale of cement. One thing in which the agricultural community is particularly interested is farm machinery. Here is a field wherein I am quite sure the farmers would welcome a commission investigating the cost of production and the arrangements which apparently exist in regard to prices. Would the minister explain exactly what the procedure is? First of all, who is it that should make the request for an investigation? If such an investigation is requested, what is the machinery for investigation? If the facts are brought out through the investigation of the commission, what is the machinery for action to be taken against any offending company? Are there any laws in Canada which prohibit such combinations? What is required in the way of proof that there is an agreement between companies if one company merely says, "Oh, well, we do not agree with this company that we are going to charge the same price, but we follow them"? Is there any machinery whereby the Canadian people or any interested body can take action against the people who actually form a combine? This is an investigating commission; its duty, apparently, is only to investigate. Is there any machinery for prosecution? Indeed, the commission does not even investigate. But if there were an investigation and anything were proved, what is the machinery for action which would do something about remedying the situation against combines? For us to say that in Canada there is no restraint of trade with regard to various commodities and natural resources is to shut our eyes to what has happened, for example, in the aluminum industry of recent years. The evidence which is produced to commissions in the United States and other countries is pretty strong proof of what is going on. In the light of what is happening, for us to say that the wartime prices and trade board is operating and carrying on rigid control is arguable, perhaps, as regards prices, but I do not believe there is any regulation which prevents companies from getting together and forming combines and controlling prices.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know how long this act has been on the statute books, but it has been there for quite a while. May I remind my hon. friend who talks so much about combines that all he has to do is to join with five other people and submit a complaint to the commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Based on facts.

Mr. MITCHELL: Based on facts, you understand.

Mr. KNOWLES: That only produces an investigation.

Mr. MITCHELL: That only produces an investigation, but then the parties involved are subject to prosecution if the investigation proves the complaint to be sound.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who must institute that prosecution?

Mr. MITCHELL: The commissioner.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The commissioner is responsible?

Mr. MITCHELL: Through the attorney general. I do not want to read my hon. friend a lecture on price control, but may I say this. He speaks glibly about export boards and import boards—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I never mentioned them.

Mr. MITCHELL: —or prices, and that sort of thing. That is what we have now The wartime prices and trade board puts a ceiling on prices, and if the manufacturers do not comply with the law they are prosecuted. My hon. friend criticizes the aluminum interests, but I do not know what we would have done if there had not been a private organization to produce aluminum. I hold no brief for the Aluminum Company of Canada; the facts in their case have been dealt with by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. But I know it is much easier to be brave when the battle is nearly won than it is before, and I think it took a lot of courage and technical knowledge to do what was done by the people who planned that development in northern Quebec. My personal opinion is that it does not gain us as a nation anything to be always accusing everybody who is capable of building an organization or constructing a railroad or doing anything of that description and suggesting almost that they are not honest. I have not taken that point of view. I have done a lot of business with big employers in this country, and as a trades unionist I have found good ones and bad ones, but I have found more good than bad. Some of the bad have been pretty bad, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South well knows, but I do not think it advances the cause of the working people of this country to be continually accusing everyone who is capable of building an industry or other undertaking of not being honest. If my hon. friend has any knowledge, as an individual, indicating the need of investigation, and his facts are supported by five other people, there will be an investigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to say a word in defence of the lumber men of this country The insinuation has just been thrown out by the hon. member for Yorkton that the lumber men have got together and made a combine in respect of prices and everything else. The fact of the matter is that government regimentation and control absolutely govern selling prices; and in peace time there is no more competitive business in Canada than the lumber business.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There never has been a cartel or any combination, as far as I am aware. There is the keenest competition for business, morning and night, day in and day out, 365 days in a year. The lumbermen as a class have developed as much industry in relation to the capital invested as any business in Canada. They are a class of people who have given as much industry in relation to capital invested as any other in Canada, and it does not sit very well on my shoulders to see anybody throwing mud at them.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said that he did not care to take advice, or direction at least, from members of the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will correct that in Hansard.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no; let it stand the way you said it. Let me say to him that if he feels that he has to get on the defensive when in this house we urge activity under the Combines Investigation Act, when he gets back to his office he should get hold of the Winnipeg Free Press. He knows where that paper stands politically, that it supports this government like nothing on earth; and yet the Free Press is engaged in a very strong campaign to try to persuade the government really to put teeth into its implementation of the Combines Investigation Act. I would urge the minister to consider the representations that have been made to him on the floor of the house to-day in the light of similar representations he receives from his own party organ in Winnipeg.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have made it clear that I am opposed to cartels and combines. If we are to have free enterprise, let us have it; if we are to have socialist capitalism, which is a contradiction in terms, let us have it. The two will not work together. I have read in the Free Press the articles to which my hon. friend has referred, but that was not the only newspaper which carried such articles. You cannot move until you know the facts. The labour department has moved in the direction where we can get the facts and, if necessary, legislation based on the facts when they are made known can be set in motion. My hon. friend and I are together on the question of cartels.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In reply to the sermon I had from the minister—

Mr. MITCHELL: I was not giving you a sermon.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I recognize the business ability of people to organize industry in Canada. We have in Canada one of the greatest lumber kings in the world.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understand that the Minister of Finance wishes to introduce some bills. Shall I report progress?

PRIVATE BILLS

JAMES RUSSELL POPHAM

The house in committee on bill No. 140, for the relief of James Russell Popham—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with respect to these divorce bills. Without committing myself on this matter, because I am and always will be opposed to any form of divorce, I went to the trouble to read a considerable number of the reports containing the evidence produced in support of these bills. I take this opportunity to protest strongly against the granting of so many divorces on such meagre evidence.

All the evidence is of the same kind. The evidence in most of these cases is prepared by private detective agencies, without the support of any other evidence. I might add that I have personal knowledge of at least one case in which the evidence was altogether fabricated, and the respondent was paid a considerable sum of money to prevent his contesting the case. I say further that not ten per cent of these petitions would be granted before an ordinary court of justice.

In these days of stress and suffering I am asking myself if a nation can entertain the hope of seeing better days when its fundamental foundation, its institution of matrimony, is being so lightly dealt with. Can a nation build for a better future when its parliament consents to the ratification of such a state of affairs? The Prime Minister told us some time ago that even when the war is over we shall have to meet the forces of evil spread throughout the world. I agree with what he said, and I believe the best support which we can give those forces of evil is, without any doubt, the ease with which divorces are obtained in this country.

We as members of parliament have duties to fulfil. One of those duties, even if it may not please everybody, is to put a stop to what I would call the most dangerous means of harming society at large. At the present time our armed forces are fighting one of the greatest struggles the world has ever seen, so that our country may be freed from the menace of tryanny, and so that we may be assured of better living conditions and lasting peace. My submission is that the best support we can give our fighting men, from inside the country, is to take all the means in our power to prevent the forces of evil from taking a lead in our midst, and also to prepare for our men a clean country in which they can enjoy a decent living, based on Christian principles.

I say, therefore, that we should reject these divorce bills, and send them back to those from whom they came. Let us show the public, in so doing, that it is useless to ask parliament to deal with this kind of legislation.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

102. Combines Investigation Act, $28,380.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When we left this item before the dinner recess we were discussing the operation of the Combines Investigation Act. We were discussing with the minister the various merits of a system of so-called free enterprise in which men may organize industry, and carry on their amalgamation and organization to the utmost of their ability and, apparently, to any conclusion they might consider proper under that system.

I am not questioning the ability of men to form amalgamated organizations of business, but I protest against the continuance of the maintenance of a monopoly and the concentration of power for profits in the hands of a few people, as permitted in this and other countries throughout the world. This country is doing far too little in the way of investigating combines. The reports of the Truman committee and other commissions in the United States and other countries show the extent to which so-called free enterprise is allowed to expand and control the lives of people in world-wide combines. The small amount we have under this item, which is even smaller this year, indicates that the government is failing to curtail the forces which in our opinion constitute the basic causes of depression and which go even further than that, constitute one of the causes of war.

When people in a certain type of organization decide to expand, they become powerful. They use cutthroat competition and wipe out the smaller man. Competition gradually disappears and then they enter into agreements with other large firms with regard to prices. The smaller man is cut out; his opportunity to stay in business is taken away, or he is given no chance to get started. These agreements apparently are allowed to exist in this country. As the minister explained before the dinner recess, the way in which this act operates is for five persons to lay evidence before the combines investigation commissioner. The case is heard and then, if the minister sees fit, he may institute an action against the combine.

I do not know the extent to which that has been carried out. In our opinion too many combines have been permitted in this country. Rich and powerful companies have got control of our natural resources. They control most of our oil resources, our steel, our water power, our nickel and our lumber.

In other industries we find that these people have control of food, clothing and the things required to build shelter. They gradually build up monopolies in the national field. Then when they have overcome competition in that field, they go into the international field. There are concerns which are recognized throughout the world as being international combines with tremendous power.

When the control of food, clothing, shelter and the necessities of life within the nation are in the hands of a few people, it inevitably leads to want and insecurity, a lowered standard of living and a lowered standard of health.

Mr. REID: We have the highest standard of living in the world.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Look at the health standard records of this country, fifty per cent of our young men unable to pass the physical and mental examination to get into the armed forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The record is as good as in any other country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I doubt it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I know it.

Mr. REID: As the Scots say, "facts are chiels that winna ding."

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Look at the records in Quebec with regard to tuberculosis and infant mortality.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are just taking one province. What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What about the birth rate of this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about the record of your own province in regard to tuberculosis?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Take the whole nation.

Mr. REID: It still has the highest standard.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am talking about the development of the natural resources of this country so that they may provide a means of decent living for the people. We had a million people on relief between 1930 and 1939.

An hon. MEMBER: 1935.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Young men were roaming up and down the country looking for work. When that happens something is wrong with a country like Canada, one of the richest in the world in natural resources.

Mr. REID: It is still better than most countries.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These people who operate international cartels control not only our natural resources but many patents. The people are denied free access to these. The benefits of science are not available to the people, and they cannot possibly get hold of the things they want unless they pay the price to those who hold the monopoly. There are world combines which are recognized in oil, in electrical goods, and in Canada we have our great natural resources of nickel under the control of International Nickel company. These are the forces which in war time build the armaments for the world. When there is competition in world markets, they form cartels. They are the people who inevitably look upon war time as a harvest of profits.

We in this group have a different philosophy of life. We do not believe that profits should be the main objective in life. We believe that the natural resources of the country should be used to improve the welfare of the people, that the profit motive should be supplanted by the service motive. The people of Canada consider that this government has failed in investigating combines within the country and taking action against them. I should like to repeat what the hon. member for Melfort put on the record the other night with regard to farm implement prices. This was the report of a special committee adopted by the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan as recently as 1939. One recommendation reads:

(2) That, as the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act of the dominion appear to have been violated by the major companies in the industry, consideration should be given to instituting proceedings under the said act.

I do not think it should be left to individuals to start these investigations, to lay the complaint. That is the duty of the government. The government should have the welfare of the people at heart. This branch should be busy investigating these things. There is plenty of evidence of what is going on. We should be investigating these combines, both national and international, just as is being done in the United States. If that were done the people would have more confidence in the operations of this department and of the government.

Item agreed to.

105. Payments to provinces under agreements respecting youth training, including undischarged commitments of previous years, $500,000.

Mr. BENCE: At the present time a great deal of vocational training is being carried on in the armed forces by the Department of National Defence in what are known as army trade schools. As I understand it, the directors and other personnel were supplied by the Department of Labour. I want to request the Minister of Labour to consider cooperating with the Department of National Defence with a view to taking over the vocational training work of the army in order that the transition from war to peace may not cause too great a change in the set-up.

I mentioned this before in the house and I believe the minister took cognizance of it. I am worried about the possibility of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Labour becoming separated in connection with this vocational work, with the result that, when the war is over, the facilities which have been supplied by the Department of National Defence, and the experience which that department has gained, may not be used to coordinate the work of the Department of Labour under this particular item.

In the city of Saskatoon there is an army trades school which is carried on at the exhibition grounds, and I am very glad to say that recently they took over the extensive buildings formerly occupied by No. 7 I.T.S. of the Royal Canadian Air Force. In view of the fact that the whole set-up is there, the buildings, equipment and instructors, what is the Department of Labour going to do with respect to taking it over and carrying it on in the peace-time period, and similarly what is it going to do with other set-ups of that kind?

I am convinced that we can raise the standard of living of the people of this country provided that we raise our educational standards and that our people are given an opportunity to acquire the necessary training and qualifications. If we continue to keep the great majority of our people in the status of labourers we can expect little more out of them than purely manual labour. But if we help them to train themselves as artisans we can raise the standard of living throughout this country. When the men come back from overseas and are discharged I feel sure that most of them will be and should be interested in improving their educational qualifications, whether they go into vocational training or acquire higher educational training. In the transition from war to peace I suggest that set-ups such as we have now in the city of Saskatoon would be very helpful, so that when peace comes, and it may come sooner than we expect, as I hope it will, we should be all set to train these men for the essential jobs which I believe will be available to them when the war is over. I am convinced that with the desire of the Canadian people to obtain more and more of the ordinary goods which they will wish to consume in times of peace we shall be able to find employment for the men who are discharged from the armed services, provided that they are properly trained, and I suggest to the minister and to the administration that the closest possible liaison should be established between the Department of National Defence and the vocational training branch of the Department of Labour so that the training and education of these men will run along smoothly on the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. MITCHELL: All the things my hon. friend suggests are already being done. Through the agency of the war emergency training programme we have trained 250,000 persons for industry alone; in addition we have trained 41,000 for the army, 65,000 for the air force and 8,000 for the navy. We have carried out the basic training for aircrew and ground forces. At this moment there is an interdepartmental committee of the Department of Pensions and National Health, the Department of Labour and representatives of the armed forces who are continually working on this problem which my hon. friend has mentioned. I think it is correct to say that no other nation is as well prepared as Canada in its training programme for the rehabilitation of the armed forces. I say that with the knowledge of one who has passed through the period of the establishment of the war emergency training programme and the erection of the largest industrial structure we have had in the history of this country. I have no fears whatsoever as to the ability of the dominion in cooperation with the provinces and the municipalities to provide training for every service man who desires to take it. But my hon. friend has perhaps already heard that out of 150,000 already discharged from the armed forces only 3,000 have so far availed themselves of the training facilities provided by the federal government, which reminds one of what happened after the last war, that many men and women will go back to their former vocations without utilizing the facilities provided by the government of this country. I am glad that my hon. friend has raised this question, because I can assure him and the people of this dominion that we have established a firm foundation for a training policy necessary for the rehabilitation of the men and women discharged from the armed forces.

Mr. BENCE: May I ask the minister what plans he and his department have for taking over the vocational training now being carried on by the army in Saskatoon, for example. You have there a very fine set-up. If peace is declared within six months, what steps will the department take to utilize that set-up which is a going concern in the city of Saskatoon?

Mr. MITCHELL: As a matter of fact, we are already utilizing it. We have taken it over from the army and are going to continue to use it, I understand, for the training of ex-servicemen discharged from the forces.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am glad to hear the minister say that he is interested in training the men of the armed forces for the various trades and arts. May I point out to him a matter that has come to my attention recently? I refer to the necessity of getting training centres such as have been mentioned established in the rural areas. As we all know, the war has drained off our rural population to the cities and towns, with the result that nearly all our country villages and towns and rural areas have been deprived of their manpower to an alarming degree—plumbers, tinsmiths, blacksmiths, electricians, cement workers and many other tradesmen. A survey has been made of my county. Unfortunately I have not the figures here, but the survey showed how many men in the various trades could be employed within an area of ten square miles. The particulars given to me were alarming.

I believe that one of our biggest problems in the post-war period will be to rebuild the country villages and small towns in the rural areas. The life-blood of every nation is furnished by these rural centres and if the rural centres are successful, agriculture, which is our greatest industry, will be successful. But we all realize how our country villages and towns have been dwindling in population during the war and how greatly their economy has been disturbed, as well as the privileges, conveniences and enjoyments of the people who live in our rural centres. The war has taken our young people away from the rural centres into the armed forces and into munitions plants in the larger centres where lines of work are now open to them which will be closed when peace comes. I think we all realize the problem that we must face in getting our young people back into the rural centres in order to take up their life there once more. The success of social life in rural centres depends upon the church, the school, the small community enterprises. I trust that this government will prepare for repopulating our rural areas in the post-war period. There is a much greater requirement for that than probably any other phase of our national life. You cannot get people to live in the rural centres unless you get them interested and keep them busy at work which they enjoy. You must bring to-day, much more than we have for the past twenty-five years, to people in the rural centres the services to which they have been accustomed in the last few years in the larger centres.

We look at some rural area to-day, depleted as it is of young people, where the father or the aged person who carries on agricultural pursuits, the blacksmith and the tradesmen having left his community, finds difficulty in making repairs. If you took a survey of a rural district and found what the farmer particularly needs by way of improvements, it would impress you with the necessity of the tradesman and the artisan. I believe the best way is not to train in the larger centres but to take the trade schools and educational facilities right out to the smaller areas. If, for instance, we went to Kemptville agricultural college, looked at the record of their graduates and found out how large a percentage of them have returned to rural life and become specialists in their own business as compared with the graduates of any of the larger colleges, we would see how alarming the comparison is and how much to the benefit of the rural district their training is. With this country as extensive as it is, with agriculture playing so prominent a part, we should take more to the rural areas by way of trades and businesses, so that we may rebuild the little country centres, so that we may improve the lot of agriculture, because we must depend upon agriculture to provide a fundamental place for our man-power policy in the future life of Canada, and we should specialize in this work. I would draw the attention of the minister therefore, to the importance not only of building trade schools in the large centres but of locating them in the smaller centres, so that while smaller in size they will be greater in number.

Mr. GILLIS: I think the hon. member for Saskatoon City raised a very important point, and we should not too complacently assume that we have solved the problem to which he referred. I understand that with a view to the rehabilitation of the veteran the new Department of Veterans' Affairs has been set up. That department will attend exclusively to the retraining of service personnel. The item under discussion has to do with something which should be carried forward into the post-war period. I fear that our vocational plans are based on the emergency of war and that, as happened after the last war, immediately the service personnel have been taken care of or as their welcome by the public wears out on the basis of being service personnel, the machinery set up will gradually disappear.

The minister in his answer stated that we are to-day in a better position from the point of view of vocational training than ever before in the history of the country. That is true, and in order to improve what we had we did not have to do very much, because when this war broke out, in 1939, there were very few vocational training facilities in any section of Canada, and a good job was done in setting up emergency machinery to train both our service personnel and those who went into war industry. It was, I repeat, a good job done in a hurry. When the war ceases, practically all the 250,000 persons who have been trained for war industry and other pursuits connected therewith will have to be retrained. The jobs they are doing to-day are war-time jobs, and when the war machine stops, when they will no longer be making shells and Bren guns and the other things they specialize in to-day, they will have to be routed back to our peace-time economy to produce some other article, and it is going to require special training. It is not a job which will come within the purview of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. In my opinion the retraining of those in war industry will fall to the lot of the Department of Labour. The danger as I see it is that, when you have two or three departments, whose jurisdiction and duties are not clearly defined, handling the one problem, the tendency will be to pass it from one to the other and as a result no one is going to do very much about it. I believe that the pressure of public opinion will force us to take care of the service personnel, but I am still somewhat sceptical about the retraining of those in war industries, who will be coming back to us in much greater numbers than service personnel. There is a big retraining job to be done there, and I am not too confident of the capacity of the machinery and the equipment which the Department of Labour will have available to do that job.

I have in mind one emergency programme which is set up under the Department of Labour and which I hope will be carried on after the war. I refer to the emergency training programme established in the coal mines of Nova Scotia. That is a war emergency programme. It is done through the duress of war. My assumption and that of most of the people affected is that when the emergency in fuel disappears that training scheme likewise will go by the board. I am in hopes that under this vote, which should be much larger, not only will the Department of Labour carry on that programme of apprenticeship which was started in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, but that it will be extended and the business of coal mining will be a profession. That is going to come within the purview of this particular department. While you may have exceptionally good training facilities in the central provinces of Canada, and as the hon. member for Saskatoon City pointed out, the facilities in that particular city are fairly good, I know that those in Nova Scotia and, I believe, generally in the maritimes leave much to be desired. There was one school located, I believe, at New Glasgow and financed to some extent by the Clark Ruse aircraft people. When the plant at Dartmouth closed the school closed. There is machinery there which should be utilized after the war and developed into a permanent vocational training centre.

Right now, as the Minister of Pensions and National Health is very well aware, most of the returning service personnel coming back to Nova Scotia, many of whom had a job in the mines previous to enlistment, and were discharged from the service because of disability, cannot resume the job which they did previously, and to-day they are making the rounds of selective service offices. While we have a regulation which permits them to take advantage of the present vocational training facilities, in that province there is nowhere to send them to train. The minister pointed out that a very small percentage of returning service personnel are taking advantage of the vocational training facilities. That is all too true, and the reason is that the remuneration they receive in order to take that course, in the maritime provinces, where they are obliged to leave their homes, most of them having families, is not sufficient to enable them to maintain their home in one section of the country and live in another section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that correct since the rates were raised recently?

Mr. GILLIS: It is correct. While the rates have been substantially increased, I submit that leaving home and virtually maintaining two families has a tendency to make these men try to seek employment which will enable them to live at home. There is a remedy for that situation, and that is the establishment of training centres in the areas in which these people live in order to encourage them. In my opinion sufficient emphasis has not been placed on the importance of vocational training. Anyone who came through the last war and was demobilized knows the great mistake which the men made at that time in not taking advantage of the vocational training facilities that were provided.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): But the basis is very much wider now than it was after the last war.

Mr. GILLIS: That is absolutely true; but even then, bad as it was, anyone coming back would have been much better off had he made the necessary sacrifice for a year in order to retrain himself for some calling so that he might have fitted himself into some occupation in keeping with his physical abilities, instead of doing what most of them did, going into jobs where physically they could not stand up to the work, with the result that in a year or two they broke down and were unfit for anything. They had then no chance of taking the vocational training which was available in the first place. A selling job to the service personnel, to those coming out of war industry, is necessary now, in order to make them thoroughly acquainted with the advantages to be gained as a result of that particular programme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is being done.

Mr. GILLIS: It certainly is not effective. It is not being done to the extent that it should be. I merely rose to support what the hon. member for Saskatoon City says, that we do not want to place the main emphasis all the time, so far as vocational training is concerned, entirely on the emergency machinery that is being set up to take care of service personnel.

There is another group to which attention must be given. I refer to the women's services. Very little mention has been made of them. They are coming back also and many of them have taken training in specialized jobs. What is the programme for the women's services? I suggest that when their duties are over in the organizations in which they are now engaged they have an important contribution to make to Canada. In my opinion Canada requires a good many social service workers in the interests of national health, for instance. National health machinery is now being set up, and the women have an important place to fill, as well, in the cultural development of the country, for example, in the staffing of libraries, which I hope will be established, and in many kindred vocations, for which perhaps many of these girls have trained themselves. An inventory of the women forces should be taken and some vocational training facilities should be provided exclusively for them in order that they may take their proper place in the scheme of things.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is being done too.

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad to hear that. You are not advertising yourselves well enough. You should get someone over there to do a good advertising job for you.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not the time; we are too busy administering things.

Mr. GILLIS: You are like most of us; you have not the time. However, with regard to this question of vocational training, the point I wish to make is this. There is no use in building up a paper organization and telling the public at large what is going to be done, because we are only kidding ourselves. Those of us who will have the responsibility of representing the various communities in the next parliament must not lead the people to believe that we have solved the problem, that all the machinery necessary in the field of vocational training is there, because if we do that it is going to react on ourselves. You must have schools in the different provinces, and so far as the maritimes are concerned, we do not have them. They are not there and they must be established. I pointed out one particular school in New Glasgow that should be reorganized for the peace-time set-up. All we have there is a technical college in Halifax with its peace-time facilities, and it is certainly not in any condition to do the kind of job that should be done in the post-war period in the field of vocational training.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to put the record straight. My hon. friend said that we did not advertise enough, and he added that there was no vocational training prior to the outbreak of the war.

Mr. GILLIS: Not much.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, there was the youth training programme. In the years 1937-39 we trained 150,000 young people.

Mr. GILLIS: What were they trained for?

Mr. MITCHELL: Different vocations. I could give the hon. member a list of them or send them over to him.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to see them.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. gentleman suggested that this vocational training should be carried into the peace-time period. That is already taken care of. We changed the name "war emergency training programme" to "Canadian vocational training programme," and we have already negotiated apprenticeship agreements with seven provinces for ten years. He spoke of machinery and equipment. I do not think there should be any difficulty as far as buildings, machinery and equipment are concerned when the war is over. We have ample supplies that will be available at the conclusion of hostilities. In fact, the department has already put in its preliminary requirements to the crown assets allocation committee for use in vocational and other training purposes we have in mind.

My hon. friend spoke of the women. Of persons being trained who are discharged from the armed forces I mentioned 150,000, and 3,000 have been availing themselves of training facilities. One-fifth of these are women and they are being treated exactly the same as the men. We have a special committee that is advising the vocational advisory committee in connection with the retraining of women.

My hon. friend raised the question about rates paid for training. This is probably the fairest opinion on the situation as it exists at the moment. There are many jobs available at good wages in my hon. friend's own province, for example, both for women and for men at the present time, but what the situation in the future will be I do not know. I do not think any of us knows what it will be. We do not know what the position in Europe will be if Hitler collapses two months from now. The situation is one which, all opinions to the contrary notwithstanding, will baffle the imagination as well as the intelligence of any kind of government there may be in this country. I would say in passing, however, that in my opinion the government that is capable of setting up the organization and giving the direction that can best take advantage of the contribution which this nation has made toward the destruction of the greatest menace that has ever threatened mankind is the present administration.

Mr. GILLIS: The government passes so many orders in council that we never see, that it is a good thing occasionally to inquire in the House of Commons and get necessary information. I do not think it is a good policy to wait until we see what is going to happen in Europe. We know we are going to win and hope we shall establish the social objectives for which we are winning the war, and that will require certain machinery. I have in mind approximately 6,000 miners, from district 26, in the armed services—that is the latest figure—most of whom are in France and Italy, and they will be coming back.

They have been serving in front-line battalions. When they come back they will be coming to a part of Nova Scotia at least where there is no employment for them. They are going to require retraining. In order to be retrained they will have to leave that province. In a section like that, a heavy industry section, where you are going to have to reallocate to new employment most of the personnel, there should be retraining centres convenient to their homes so that they will not have to do like members of parliament, work in Ottawa and maintain a family in another part of the country. That causes dual expense. The rates for vocational training are fair if the men are living at home. There is no doubt about that, but I should like to see something in the way of vocational training schools set up in my part of the country to train these men for some other employment. I do not think it is good enough to ask men in every generation to go to war and offer their lives for their country and then, when they come back to that part of the country which they left, the part which they fought for, they are obliged to migrate to some part of the world in order to get a job after the main job has been done. I think we should be realistic enough to say: "When you come back we shall train you for something close to your home and we may try to find you a job in that part of the country for which you fought." After all, that is the part of the country for which these men are fighting. There are no facilities in that part of the country to retrain anyone. I just leave that thought with the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask my hon. friend this question? Does he know of any part of the world to-day that pays for vocational training $60 for a single man and $80 for a married man, with corresponding family allowance so that a man with six children has $126 while training? Neither in Australia, New Zealand nor any other part of the world are the rates as high as they are in Canada to-day.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarreling with the rates. I said that the rates were fair. The minister also realizes that in most of the industries when a man is obliged to live away from his family, if he is moved by selective service there is a subsistence allowance to make up for the additional expense. That is the point I have in mind. I think it is a point that is militating against the retraining programme to-day.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister done anything toward having vocational training out in the rural areas in the schools, technical schools or vocational training schools? Great improvements along that line could be done in those areas. If that were done a great deal of help would be had in the settling of our war-torn country. Our young people would be encouraged to come back to the rural areas and settle there. I think we made a mistake before the war started in that we did not look after the small rural areas by improving rural life in those communities. Instead of that we encouraged the settlement of those people in congested areas. Could the minister give us any information along that line?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is being done, but speaking from memory I do not think it is being done in Ontario. I know in Alberta we have carried on experimental classes in that regard. We have also done quite a lot in connection with the repairing of farm machinery in Saskatchewan. Let me say this to my hon. friend. Our first duty is to see that these people get proper education and training. By the very nature of things that can be best done in the larger centres, because, after all is said and done, you have to get a staff. May I give an analogy? One of the reasons why the universities of this country are to a large degree centred in some of the urban communities is that it would be impossible to decentralize the work of the universities in the smaller communities in the various provinces. But the thought expressed by my hon. friend will be given all the consideration that we can possibly give it. However, I leave that practical question with him. The buildings, the equipment and, above everything else, the training facilities, the teachers, are best obtained in the larger urban centres of the country. That is the reason why our technical facilities for the training of teachers even in the rural communities are situated in Toronto and Hamilton in the province of Ontario.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the minister will realize that within the last twenty-five years even the larger universities in the larger centres have done a lot in the way of university extension, and have become aware of the very thing of which I speak. Perhaps he has not fully appreciated the point I had intended to make here, namely, the training of people in rural areas by taking the schools of training out there. I think that has a decided advantage in keeping them there. If he will look through the record of the little continuation school and the high school in the smaller centres he will be amazed at the large percentage of the people who remain in the community compared with the people taught in the high schools or continuation schools or collegiate institutes of the big centres. I think we in Canada missed an opportunity before the war, and we are still doing so by not looking upon the rural community as the place to educate our people instead of bringing our rural people into the larger centres and expecting them to come back. I gave an illustration of Kemptville agricultural college and compared it with Guelph to show the high percentage of the graduates of the smaller college who remained in the rural areas and compared that with the comparatively low percentage of graduates of the collegiates in the cities and larger towns who returned to the rural areas. I think we made a great mistake. I should like to impress upon the minister the necessity of taking the services for training out to the smaller centres. Even though it does cost more, the return on the investment will be much greater, and it would do a much better job in rehabilitation if that were done.

So far as grounds and buildings are concerned, this war has caused such an extension of grounds for military needs in our rural areas that they could be used for this purpose. They are scattered pretty well over our rural areas. I spoke of our airfields, training schools and military camps. In my country we have the Connaught rifle ranges, 2,700 acres of land. They were used before the war and for the first two years of this war for two or three months in the year. The grounds, buildings and community life were idle the rest of the time. When these facilities are in a rural area they could be used for this very thing. I think the government should not make the mistake of allowing those properties to become idle for so many months of the year when they are there to be used and rural life could benefit by their use.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend spoke of the extension classes of universities. We have been doing that for the last seven years in the prairie provinces, Quebec and the maritimes. What we have had in most of the provinces have been travelling teachers who have gone from community to community teaching the various classes that have been established in connection with training in the rural parts of the dominion.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister will agree that there has not been nearly enough of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps not in your province, but in all the others.

Mr. QUELCH: I think the technical schools established in Alberta for the purpose of training farm boys in the use of farm machinery served a very useful purpose. I hope they will be reopened after the war. I hope their facilities will be accorded to soldiers of the first war. Is it a fact it is the intention of the government to start up these classes again as soon as possible?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say that in Alberta they have done a remarkably good job in the last seven years, particularly since I have been connected with this department, in connection with vocational training.

Mr. GILLIS: With respect to the apprenticeship system now operating in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, is it the intention to carry it forward into the post-war period? Where are all those people who were trained prior to the war, and what were they trained for? I know that many efforts were made through the country and at that time in Nova Scotia to lay down some kind of apprenticeship plan either in the steel plants or in the coal mines. They never could get anywhere with it, for the simple reason that those trained at that time, so far as these two industries were concerned, were merely for the purpose of providing cheap labour. On that basis, where industries were unionized, no progress was made with that kind of programme.

The apprenticeship plan now operating in the Nova Scotia mines is a good one. It is an excellent plan, and well worked out. To the best of my knowledge it is working with the approval of the men themselves and they are slowly extending it. Is it the intention to carry on with that plan, because the department is not going to get anywhere in the programme it had prior to the war in the two industries I mentioned?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say that the answer would be: If necessary, yes. But as my hon. friend knows, the coal industry has caused the government grave concern. Production has gone down and the cost of production has gone up. As my hon. friend knows, we expect to set up a royal commission in the not very distant future, and I should think one of the terms of reference might be the whole field of training in the coal industry.

I see the weight of my hon. friend's argument. I was a tradesman myself, and I suppose largely because I was apprenticed at one time I have been greatly interested in furthering the apprenticeship aspect of post-war planning. It is a step the dominion has never taken before, and it is my desire that there may be established in this country a great love of trade and calling. I have always maintained the position that if you can teach a youngster to work with his hands first, you need not worry about his future. It has been my feeling that our education has gone too far in the other direction, toward the white-collar worker.

I was trained in a school in which the first thing a parent thought about was to teach boys and girls to work with their hands. I hope the leadership given by the dominion will bring about the establishment in every province—or possibly I should say the reestablishment—of a pride in crafts and workmanship which existed in the early part of this generation. I sympathize with my hon. friend's point of view.

Item agreed to.

107. Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940; administration, $5,375,150.

Mr. BENCE: In this connection I think we might first of all invite some comment from the minister as to the reason why the cost of administration is over twenty-five per cent of the total cost of unemployment insurance in the dominion.

While I am on my feet I would point out something which no doubt has been drawn to his attention before, namely, that there are many employees in Canada who are considerably irked by the fact that there is no possibility of their ever being able to take advantage of the unemployment insurance measures. In fact, unemployment insurance to them is not unemployment insurance, but is merely an additional tax levied for the purpose of ensuring that other people will be supplied with unemployment insurance, in the event of their occupations failing them.

This matter was rather forcibly brought to my attention within recent months, owing to the fact that in Saskatoon we have a large body of municipal employees, most of whom occupy the same building. It so happens that in that city we retail our light and power. We do not produce it; rather we purchase it from the provincial government, and then our municipal employees after purchasing it from the government retail it to the citizens of Saskatoon.

For a long time all the employees in the city were in the same position. That is, they did not come under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Recently, however, an amendment was introduced in the regulations. I hold in my hand what I believe would be described as a news item, from the unemployment insurance commission, under date of September 1, 1943. It points out, in effect, that whereas employees of public utilities formerly did not come under the provisions of the act, from that day forward they would.

I took this matter up with the chief commissioner, pointing out to him that here were a set of municipal employees, all ostensibly doing the same work in the city of Saskatoon. In other words, they were all working for that city. Some of them happened to be employed, not in the manufacture or distribution, but rather in the retailing of power and light. They have been brought under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Deductions were made from their salaries every month in the year; but their fellows, who were also working for the same city and being paid by the same organization, were allowed to keep the whole of their salaries, so far as unemployment insurance deductions were concerned.

The fact is that all these employees are in the same position. They are permanent employees; there is no possibility of their being discharged, unless for cause. There is a provision in the city regulations under which they receive superannuation after reaching a certain age. If they become sick or disabled before that time provision is made for them by the city whereby they shall not be left in want. Therefore there is no possibility under any circumstances of these particular individuals ever being able to take advantage of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. There must be many other cases in which a similar state of affairs exist. It is not a case of unemployment insurance, so far as these people are concerned; rather it is purely a matter of another tax.

The suggestion I make to the minister and the administration is that the whole matter should be reviewed, in order that persons who obviously are not those who should come within the purview of the Unemployment Insurance Act be eliminated from the operation of its provisions.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member spoke about the cost of the administration of unemployment insurance. I do not need to tell him that the work of the unemployment insurance administration has been greatly enlarged since bringing into being the selective service organization. It has for its purpose the direction and placement of people in civilian employment. At this time seven-twelfths of the work of the unemployment insurance machinery are connected with what one could call purely war duty. The remaining five-twelfths are engaged in the normal daily work of the unemployment insurance commission.

The machinery of that commission must operate very much like a fire brigade. The mere fact that we have a very high level of employment at the present time is one of the reasons why the administrative costs appear to be somewhat larger than they might otherwise be, under what some people might call normal conditions. It was estimated when the bill was before the house, and before the special committee, that the per capita cost per year for insurable persons would be about $2.50. That figure compares very favourably, on an average, with costs in the United States. In some states the costs are higher. For instance, in Nevada, I believe they run to something like $5 a year, while in New York where the mass is much greater, and the population more highly concentrated, I believe it is about $3, although when I give that figure I speak from memory.

We have good coverage. My hon. friend says that some people feel they should not pay into the unemployment insurance fund, because they will never be out of work. I do not think any person should take that position. We have seen fluctuations in the activities of banks, railroads and what are sometimes called sheltered employments, where employees have been thrown out of work. The whole basis of insurance is predicated on staggering the risks. My hon. friend probably has some life insurance and he must die to win. I am sure my hon. friend does not want to die; he would rather lose.

Mr. KNOWLES: He should take out a Canadian government annuity.

Mr. MITCHELL: But if he should die, his estate would get the money the same as with ordinary insurance. My hon. friend can see quite clearly that you cannot have insurance dealing with anything unless the risks are staggered. In the face of life insurance some people die sooner than others; in the case of unemployment insurance, unfortunately some people are out of work more than others.

It is an old story. People take the position that because at the moment they are fully employed they should not contribute to the fund. We know what happened from 1930 to 1939, and that is no argument why a person should not be covered by unemployment insurance. If I had my way, and I am speaking personally, every person in this country who was gainfully employed would come within the four corners of this legislation. I hope to see the day when that will come around. At the moment there are about 2,500,000 people covered by unemployment insurance benefits.

Investigations are being carried on by the advisory committee which was established by law with the intent of increasing the coverage of unemployment insurance so that many callings and avocations which many people think should be covered by this necessary protection will be brought within the orbit of this legislation, I hope in the not too distant future.

Mr. BENCE: Are permanent civil servants of the dominion government covered by unemployment insurance?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. BENCE: Why are they not covered?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows they are covered by many other things which the average citizen has not available to him. Their holidays I would say are generous in comparison with those given in industrial undertakings. The allowance made for sickness is generous. It is not as generous as some people think it should be, but it is generous when compared with that granted to people employed in industrial undertakings. Then they have a superannuation scheme which takes care of them in their old age. Then, to go a step farther, we find that civil servants, national, provincial and municipal, do not come under the regulations of the war labour board which regulates wages and other matters.

Mr. BENCE: That is the very point I was making. As a matter of fact the minister is really answering his own statement by the explanation he has given in connection with dominion government employees. I was discussing the case of employees who would not be out of employment.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend cannot say that.

Mr. BENCE: The minister cannot say that dominion government employees will not be out of employment. If it is right for one, surely it is right for the other. I pointed out to him the case of certain municipal employees. The minister has referred to sickness insurance, superannuation and all that kind of thing. These employees have all those benefits, and yet they were ordered to pay part of their wages or salaries into the unemployment insurance fund. There is no possibility of their ever being able to take advantage of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: At one time I worked for the hydro commission in Hamilton. That was a large organization and I never heard the question raised there that is being raised by my hon. friend. Personally I would willingly pay into a fund of this description in order to stagger the risks.

Mr. BENCE: Then everybody should pay.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. BENCE: But they do not.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are speaking about civil servants. My hon. friend is a lawyer and he understands as well as I the position of persons in the employ of the crown. That applies to those in the employ of the dominion, in the employ of the United States government and the government of Great Britain or of any country where there is a civil service and a democratic form of government. I am not going to labour the point because he knows it as well as I do.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: The minister referred to extending the benefits of unemployment insurance and I should like to say a word about the possible extension to women. Subcommittee No. 6 of the reconstruction committee under Doctor James reported in 1943 that there were about 1,200,000 women employed. Of that number only about 700,000 came under unemployment insurance, leaving about 500,000 not covered. A good many of those were household workers which I understand is a hard group to organize. Some study has been given to this in certain women's organizations, and if the act is to be extended it would be of great benefit to these household workers if they were brought under the legislation.

Out of the 700,000 who are covered, which is the number reported for 1941-42, something like one-quarter are receiving minimum wages. If they ever have to draw unemployment insurance they would get a bare subsistence. Of that same number, some one-third are women under nineteen years of age. There is a definite problem in relation to the employment of women.

When changes are made in the unemployment insurance legislation I ask that special consideration be given to extending the benefits to women. I think this is one of the best social security measures ever brought in, and I hope it will be extended to women, especially those in the lower brackets, and within a short time.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon City I should like to remind the minister that the reason why some employees who feel they are in fairly secure employment complain about paying unemployment insurance is that they observe that certain other classes of people—I am not referring to civil servants—in the higher income brackets—

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is not objecting to the insurance principle?

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all; I am simply trying to remind the minister of something he knows quite well because I have heard him say it.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are treading on dangerous ground.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no, I know what I am talking about. The reason why people in the positions referred to by the hon. member complain about paying unemployment insurance is that they observe that other people in higher income brackets who are in financial jobs of one kind and another do not have to pay. As a matter of fact, people in the kind of employment referred to by the hon. member for Saskatoon City feel that there is less danger of their becoming unemployed than there is of some of those who are at present earning good money in speculative types of employment. They feel that when some of those people become unemployed the community as a whole will have to provide for them even though they are making no payments into the unemployment insurance fund.

I am simply suggesting to the minister what he said last year when the act was amended to extend the coverage, namely, that to make it really satisfactory it should be all-inclusive. The minister has indicated that to-night as well. I am suggesting that until the government is prepared to put it on an all-inclusive basis there are bound to be certain groups of employees feeling that they are discriminated against as compared with other groups.

I rose partly to make that observation, partly to call another point to the minister's attention and to ask him whether anything is being done by way of studying it. One of the situations into which many employees run is this. They have been employed for some time and have contributed steadily to the unemployment insurance fund. Then they have to lay off work because of illness. I am not referring to cases of illness that are covered by workmen's compensation but illness that throws a man out of work through no fault of his own. Despite the fact that they have made contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, they find that they cannot draw benefits because their unemployment is due to sickness rather than to there being no jobs for them. A good many cases of this kind have been brought to my attention and I have taken them up a number of times with the departmental officials in Winnipeg, but it is not necessary to continue doing so because the story is the same every time. But even though we try to explain to these employees that they have been paying premiums to cover unemployment due only to there being no jobs for them and not premiums to cover unemployment through sickness, still it is hard for them to understand. That simply underlines the fact that this is no time to stop and pat ourselves on the back concerning the social legislation that has been enacted thus far. This is a time to be moving still further forward. What we need is a social security programme that will cover all the things that assail our people. For the average worker it is just as tough a blow when his income stops because he cannot work through sickness as when it stops because there is no job. I hope that as a result of the experience which the unemployment insurance commission has had thus far they may have been giving some study to the question of extending the benefits under this act to cover some protection of the income of persons who have to lay off work because of illness. I should like to know whether any study has been given to that phase of the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL: First things first. My hon. friend was sympathetic with those people who do not want to pay unemployment insurance.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was stating their case.

Mr. MITCHELL: You were playing both ends against the middle. I know something of the attitude of industrial organizations in this country toward unemployment insurance, and it is not the attitude that was taken by my hon. friend, who was trying to sympathize in a quiet sort of way with the fellow who does not want to pay into the fund. Perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton South does not know or share the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The other question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a legitimate one in connection with the rule that when you are ill you do not get paid the benefits. That principle was clearly understood and fully discussed when the unemployment insurance resolution was introduced in the House of Commons. There was no objection taken to that principle when the bill was passed. Health insurance is one thing; unemployment insurance is another. In Great Britain they have a health insurance plan and an unemployment insurance plan. I am not arguing the sentimental point of view at the moment; I am discussing the insurance point of view.

The hon. member for Edmonton East spoke of increasing the coverage under the act. I am all for that. In Great Britain, and I think it is true of Australia and New Zealand but I am not sure of that, domestic servants and farm workers are included, and I see no reason why, after a proper study of their possible inclusion, they might not be brought within the ambit of the unemployment insurance regulations of this country. But sometimes you can move too quickly and rock the edifice you have built up. I think the British way is the best way. There they started off unemployment insurance in 1906 by covering just seven trades, and they were very fortunate, shortly after passing the act, in moving into a most prosperous period for the building trades, which was one of the first group of workers to be brought under the act. Gradually a great fund was built up, and the coverage of their act has been widely extended until to-day about thirteen million people come under their act.

I think our method of approach is the sound one and we should study carefully before we include other groups of employees within the four corners of our legislation. I am all for that method of approach. Some people—I do not think my hon. friend is one of them—would rather go ahead in a hurry and make mistakes. There is always a class of people who say: Go ahead and cut the red tape and let us have action immediately. If you did that you would find that actuarial difficulties would arise and you might end up in the ashcan. We are taking steps by order in council to investigate and make recommendations with respect to increased coverage, and before twelve months are passed we may have brought many more groups of employees within the scope of this essential legislation. I want to say this, and you can use it politically if you wish to, that I have no sympathy whatever with the individual who does not want to assume his proper responsibility in upholding this very necessary legislation that we have on the statute books to-day.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall not argue with the minister's attempt at humour in the first part of his remarks just now except to say that I agree with him in his concluding comments. But the point is that if you are going to say that to some groups in this country you should say it to all, and if the minister really agrees with that, we are not very far apart.

With respect to unemployment due to sickness, I was appealing to the minister on the very basis on which he has indicated he wishes to proceed, namely, one step at a time. The minister knows that I feel, and we of this group feel, that what we must arrive at is social security legislation that provides complete coverage, and what I was suggesting to the minister at this stage of the game was simply one further step, namely, that employed persons who become unemployed and lose their income because of illness might be covered by the terms of the act. What I am thinking about is protection of the income of the worker so that he will have some income even though he is unemployed through sickness, as well as when he is unemployed because there is no work for him. I suggest to the minister that what I was asking for was right up his own alley. I was asking for the one next step that might be pursued by the unemployment insurance commission, and it was my hope that study might be in progress at the present time on that very point.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Sickness benefits are entirely different from unemployment insurance benefits. One of the underlying conditions of unemployment insurance is that the person must be available for work. In New Zealand and Australia, I believe, sickness benefit is separate also from health insurance. It is a different kind of benefit. And as will be seen, unemployment insurance requires a different form of machinery from that for sickness benefits, which brings in the medical man and so on.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that unemployment insurance is merely one part of the social security programme. I believe that ultimately—and I hope it will not take as long as it did in Britain to arrive at that point—we shall have to have an over-all social security plan. This is merely one phase of it. I am reasonably sure that that is coming. If this government does not implement it some other government will. That is the trend of thought in Canada to-day. I understand the department is investigating the whole problem.

Last session I raised with the minister the question of the returning service man who goes into an insurable industry. Under the terms of the act at that time—it may have been changed since—he must have had ninety days employment and have made fifteen weekly contributions to the fund before he is entitled to benefit. We were led to believe when this act was passed that all contributions for those in the armed services were being made by the government, and most of the boys who came out assumed that they had full protection in so far as the Unemployment Insurance Act was concerned. We ran into the first problem, I think, in Nova Scotia, where many of the men released from the services took employment in a mine which closed before they had made the necessary number of contributions, and when they applied for their unemployment insurance they were faced with that clause in the act which precluded them from benefits. It was quite a shock to them, and I believe that at that time the Minister of Pensions and National Health said it was news to him. When I brought the matter up he said he did not think the act worked in that way. The Minister of Labour said much the same thing; and it was a surprise to me until I went over it again. Both ministers, since both are concerned, promised at that time consideration with a view to having that condition corrected, holding that if we were making a contribution for those in the service we should make it and give them complete coverage when they came out. Has anything been done with respect to changing the act?

[Mrs. Casselman.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend mean the clause which requires that a man shall have worked for fifteen weeks before he is entitled to the benefit?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has not been changed.

Mr. GILLIS: Then I think it should be corrected. It is a piece of gross injustice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a provision in order in council P.C. 7633 for those who are out of work temporarily and do not qualify, in case they go out of employment within the fifteen weeks.

Mr. GILLIS: That is a duplication of machinery. It would be much better to deal with the matter by way of unemployment insurance.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

109. Advances to workers under section 91 of the act, $50,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that this is money provided so as to be able to advance travelling expenses to employees who are directed to take employment elsewhere than in their home communities. Is it not true that there is an order in council under which an actual grant is made in some cases for travelling expenses, rather than a loan as is provided under this item; and if that is the case, on what basis is the decision made as to whether an employee directed to report away from home receives a loan or a grant toward his travelling expenses?

Mr. MITCHELL: We are not using this grant at all. My hon. friend will see that we did not use any of this money last year. We are making advances to people going to different parts of the country, under the War Measures Act and the war appropriation in that regard, and that is the method of procedure. The amount of money we advance is, if I may use that term, only chicken-feed in comparison with the amount of money we have advanced to permit people to travel from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: What I was inquiring was with respect to these advances. Are they, under these war-time conditions, loans, or are they grants that do not have to be paid back?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are grants which do not have to be paid back.

Mr. GILLIS: I am wondering about that because I have had a lot of correspondence.

You recruit a lot of people in one part of the country to go to the central provinces. An advance is made by national selective service or by the company for transportation purposes. That fare or that advance is recoverable under certain circumstances, is it not?

Mr. MITCHELL: Wherever we make a grant it is done by the government itself. Sometimes the employer pays it, and as a rule when the employer pays it the advance is made under certain conditions. If a person comes from Vancouver to Toronto and has the money advanced by the employer he wants some guarantee that the employee is going to stay some time with him, and the arrangement generally arrived at is, "If you stay for six months, or nine months, or twelve months, the amount of the advance will not be recoverable." In some instances it is repaid week by week. The longer you stay, the less the advance until it is wiped out completely.

Mr. GILLIS: Could the minister give us any figures as to what, if anything, was recovered under this vote? I should like to know the amount advanced and the amount recovered.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not the figures in my possession. It is not under this vote; it is under the war emergency programme vote. If my hon. friend wants it and raises the matter on the orders of the day or otherwise I shall be glad to give him the information.

Mr. GILLIS: I have had letters about girls who came to Kitchener or Brantford to take employment, and who, because of ill health or for some other reason, could not stay. They wanted to go home, but were without sufficient funds, and their parents were put to considerable expense to pay the return transportation. Also there are cases where hospital bills have accumulated.

Mr. MITCHELL: No one is more sympathetic than myself to young people, particularly young women who come a long distance, say from Nova Scotia to Kitchener. Under a big organization like selective service or the labour department occasional incidents of this kind are inevitable. I have not all the wise people in the Department of Labour, although I have some of them. I think my hon. friend will find that when complaints are made and when they are justified the settlement or the arrangement which is finally adopted is always in favour of the worker. I know the case at Kitchener of which the hon. member speaks. That was some time ago, about eighteen months, was it not?

Mr. GILLIS: No; there is at least one within the last month.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know of that case.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

343. Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad other than in the United Kingdom, $88,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to "publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad other than in the United Kingdom", this is an item with regard to which the minister might very properly make a detailed statement, because the other night we heard some criticism and some suggestions with respect to advertising which Canada has had in the United Kingdom. I take it, from the increase of $55,000, that the government is making some move in the direction of enlarging its advertising programme for the post-war period. Is the minister prepared to give a statement with regard to the details?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This item is for publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad other than in the United Kingdom.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what I said. Perhaps the minister was not listening. I said that there had been some criticism of the advertising in the United Kingdom, but that I believe was in connection with the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture. This, however, as I understand, is elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, and it is in that field that I should like to have the minister's statement covering the details.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The purpose of the vote is twofold. In the first place, one of its objects is to acquaint the Canadian public generally, and businessmen and executives particularly, with the services rendered by the Department of Trade and Commerce and to acquaint Canadian manufacturers and exporters with information in connection with shipping restrictions and quotas, both import and export. The second purpose, in coordination with the commercial intelligence service, is to create good will and to induce importers to study Canada as a potential market when peace has been declared. The regular weekly Canadian newsletter, which contains information respecting various Canadian activities, is distributed among trade commissioners wherever they are located, and in some cases it is translated by them into the language of the area in which they reside. In addition, a digest of reports from trade commissioners, entitled Commercial Intelligence News, is distributed weekly throughout the dominion. Certain advertising is also placed in various publications throughout the year, both in Canada and abroad, exclusive of Great Britain. The appeal in this advertising is addressed almost exclusively to executives.

Mr. GRAYDON: Executives?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. As regards advertising in Canadian newspapers, trade, industrial and financial papers and magazines, there is ample evidence throughout the world that exporting countries are giving serious thought to post-war markets. It is deemed advisable, therefore, that Canadian exporters should be informed during the coming year of opportunities which await them in the post-war period. Hence the need for an additional $15,000 to advertise in Canadian newspapers, trade, industrial and financial papers and magazines. In the pre-war period, 1939-40, this vote amounted to $70,000. As regards advertising abroad, exclusive of Great Britain, the increase in the vote is to provide for advertising in Latin-American countries should it be deemed opportune during the coming year. This fund will also provide for reprinting the Handbook of Canada in the Spanish and Portuguese languages. I may say that this last item was bound to be of great use in the other countries of this hemisphere and is being taken advantage of extensively.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the purpose of advertising so extensively here? Would it not be better to advertise more in other countries if we expect to deal with those countries and to expand our trade to them? The minister might give some answer to that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Of the $88,000, $50,000 is for use abroad.

Item agreed to.

344. Weights and measures inspection service, $428,950.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many prosecutions have there been under this service in the last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not the actual number, but there have been a substantial number of prosecutions in connection with light-weight sales.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I take it that prosecutions have been on the increase?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They are being watched very carefully. Prosecution does not always follow. The particulars are gone into carefully to determine whether there is evidence of a deliberate attempt at short weight. In many cases carelessness results in underweight and sometimes overweight. But I do not think I can say there has been a tendency to an increase in the prosecutions, nor has the necessity for them increased recently.

Mr. PERLEY: How often do they inspect the scales in the elevators in western Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): An effort is made to inspect all those scales once a year.

Mr. PERLEY: How many inspectors are there west of Fort William?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This service is spread right across Canada with headquarters and substantial staffs in at least every capital city and in most of the major cities. I am informed there are 114 on this staff. I would have thought there were more than that.

Mr. PERLEY: That covers what year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The staff is 114.

Item agreed to.

EXHIBITIONS AND PUBLICITY

345. Exhibitions, $91,622.

Mr. WRIGHT: At what exhibitions is the Department of Trade and Commerce providing displays at the present time? I notice in the details on page 187, of the estimates, under "London" there appears the following: "Exhibition decorators, grade 2: two at $2,040." I presume that is at London, England? I am wondering if there are any exhibitions carried on in London, England, at the present time and what this item covers.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In answer to the latter part of the hon. member's question with reference to London, at one time we had the head office of our exhibition commission in the city of London. That has been closed out since the war started and moved to Ottawa. We have a warehouse there which it is necessary to maintain, and for that reason there is a staff of three provided. According to London regulations there has to be some person in continuous charge of these establishments.

Mr. GREEN: In the particulars on page 187 there is an item which reads as follows: "Participation in exhibitions in Canada, United States and abroad, $50,000." Why is that necessary in war time?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The exhibition department has been fairly active in various ways, although we did not spend anything like the amount asked for last year. During the past year we had the Canadian naval war exhibition which I think all hon. members saw in various parts of Canada. It was shown at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa.

Mr. GREEN: Why is that not a war vote?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That was prepared by the exhibition department of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the Department of National Defence for Naval Services and in conjunction with that department. It was shown all across Canada. Then there was the Canadian war display at the Museau of Science and Industry at Rockefeller centre in New York city. There was a salvage exhibit prepared by the exhibition branch at the Royal York Hotel, Toronto, from June 8 to June 11. Similar exhibits were shown at Riverside park in Toronto and at Hamilton. There was a window installation in connection with the navy exhibit at the Canadian National terminal in Montreal.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that for recruiting?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This was a naval exhibit. I suppose it would be for that purpose. Then there was a "Women-in-the-War" show at Hearns auditorium, New York city, the Victory Loan Indicator at Ottawa, the Rhode Island School of Design exhibit at Providence, Rhode Island, a Joint Armed Forces exhibit at Montreal.

Mr. GREEN: Are we exhibiting in Rhode island.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What for?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): A very small item, just a matter of photographs.

Mr. GREEN: Would not most of that work be covered by the salaries paid to the men in the branch? I am asking about this item of $50,000 for participation in exhibitions in Canada, United States and abroad. I should like to know how much was spent last year and how it is proposed to spend $50,000 this year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Between $16,000 and $17,000 was spent. The balance was left. We are asking for this larger amount this year on the possibility that if the war is over we may start in on an aggressive campaign as was done before the war.

Mr. GREEN: The year is nearly half over now.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; a year in advance.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the only reason why this $50,000 vote is asked for, in the hope that the war will be over?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): So that we shall have the money to proceed with this programme if and when the war is over.

Mr. GRAYDON: How much money was spent on the New York exhibit that the minister speaks of?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Museum of Science and Industry display? The hon. gentleman just picked out the one item on which there was no expenditure during the past year. The work had been provided for before and had been carried on. There was no actual disbursement for that item last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any provision for this year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Just the amount to be voted, if it is necessary. I am told that over half a million people saw this exhibit last year. If it is necessary to bring it up to date the money will be available.

Mr. GRAYDON: What kind of exhibit was it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not seen it myself, but I am told it tells the story of the army, the navy and the air force; it tells the story of Canada's participation in the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is exactly what I suspected it would be. Why would that not be part of the programme of the wartime information board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We have been pleased to be asked by various other branches of the government for the services of our exhibition branch which consists of experienced men whose work is somewhat reduced for the time being. We are glad to have them do work for those other branches on exhibits during the slack period. I think the work is being done for other branches of the government.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government no set plans for spending any of this $50,000?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that there is a possibility of exhibits being shown in United States and in Latin-America, but our participation in them will depend on how soon the war is over. At the present time there are just actual plans for exhibits at the Medical and Surgical Exhibit of the Army, Navy and Royal Canadian Air Force, the Merchant Marine Exhibits and various other exhibits which are in course of construction.

Mr. GREEN: How much are those going to cost?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not the figures on that, but it is only a small part of the amount being asked for. The amount we are asking for this year is to take care of the possible exhibits that we shall be able to put on.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister not think this would be a good place to save $50,000?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No, I do not. We are not going to spend it unless we need it. We held over $33,000 of it last year, and I can assure the committee that each item will be very carefully considered.

Mr. GREEN: It seems to me that might have been cut to $15,000 this year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Not very well.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister says that $17,000 was spent last year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And that it was for advertising the armed services.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): And other items I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course, a lot of that advertising in connection with the armed services would be connected with the costly recruiting scheme we have in Canada, would it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told it has nothing to do with Canadian recruiting.

Mr. GREEN: The estimates for the Department of Trade and Commerce have been increased by several hundred thousand dollars in the present fiscal year. Why is that? Surely that should not be so.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To a large extent the Department of Trade and Commerce is a peace-time department. But to an extent not realized by many people this department has been actively engaged in various branches of war work. We are asking for a great deal more money this year on account of the expansion we have planned, and are putting into effect, in connection with various branches of the department. In one item there is an increased expenditure for next year of over $300,000. That is for the enlargement and extension of trade commissioner services. I mention only that one item, in passing.

Mr. GREEN: Why is there that increase?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To provide for the appointment of additional trade commissioners in various parts of the world, to strengthen trade commissioner offices in centres where they are now established, and to provide in the department for specialists. In the commercial intelligence branch we have at the present time four commodity men who deal with exports in connection with certain commodities. We are setting up a staff of seven or eight additional experts in these commodity lines, decentralizing the work, and increasing the staff so as more properly to take care of the expanding trade we hope to have.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not again dependent upon the war ending? Many of our trade commissioners have had to be called in, because of countries being occupied. Is not that extension dependent entirely upon the war's being over?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No, it is not. We would be subjected to keen criticism if we waited until the war was over before laying our plans. Our competitors, including the mother country and the United States, have enlarged their similar services in all parts of the world, and particularly in this hemisphere. In countries of Latin-America that is particularly so. For instance, in Chile we have a staff of eight, while the United Kingdom has 250 and the United States, 400 or 500. If there is any criticism which could be leveled at the Department of Trade and Commerce it is that we have not at an earlier stage sought more money for the extension of this service.

Item agreed to.

346. Publicity and advertising in the United Kingdom, $17,320.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would a subject such as the possibility of exporting Canadian bacon and other products to Great Britain after the war come under the Department of Trade and Commerce, or is that a responsibility shared jointly with the Department of Agriculture? Then, what is the Department of Trade and Commerce doing to make an analysis of the British bacon market before the post-war period?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think my colleague the Minister of Agriculture answered that question when the estimates of his department were before the committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: Whose responsibility is it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): At the present time British bacon requirements are being taken care of by an arrangement or an agreement between this government, through the Department of Agriculture, and the British government. That covers total bacon requirements from Canada. The Department of Trade and Commerce is not at the present time arranging for any special publicity or advertising in connection with the use of Canadian bacon.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would it be the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce or of the Department of Agriculture to endeavour to find a market for our bacon in the post-war period?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Department of Trade and Commerce would ordinarily find a market; but in this case the market has been arranged for with the United Kingdom.

Mr. JACKMAN: It has been arranged for the period of the war, when we have a ready market for all possible bacon we can send. But if we are to keep our agricultural economy up to any reasonable standard, and particularly in the western provinces—including Alberta, which has become the greatest hog-raising province in Canada—we must ensure to the farmers of this country a fairly substantial proportion of the British bacon market after the war. I do not think we are too early in seeking to lay a foundation for that market, and I think the least that could be done by the Department of Trade and Commerce would be to make an analysis of the best means of retaining, let us say a proportion to the extent of 500,000,000 pounds of the 1,300,000,000 pounds that Great Britain normally uses. If we find that Danish competition comes in and ousts the Canadian farmer from the market there will be considerable hardship in Canada among those farmers who at the present time are receiving substantial incomes from hog-raising.

I suggest, therefore, that the minister should see to it that everything possible is being done to secure that market, and that he should make an appropriation sufficient to see that the idea is carried out. May I suggest, too, that inasmuch as some of the money for such analysis would be spent in Great Britain, the expenditure of that money, which would be in sterling, would not cost Canada anything, because of the large amount of sterling we must write off from year to year. Surely in view of the service we are now rendering toward feeding the people of Great Britain we are entitled to make a survey and to find out what we can do to retain a fair proportion of that British bacon market.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not sure whether the hon. member realizes that as much bacon as can be shipped from Canada is being shipped—

Mr. JACKMAN: At the present time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, at the present time, and for two years hence. That arrangement has been made. The Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat at the moment, and I am not just sure whether it is to apply for two years after the termination of the war, or two years hence.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is two years from now.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Before the war an extensive programme along this line had been conducted by the Department of Trade and Commerce, but that ceased when the war commenced. The necessity for or the usefulness of it ceased at that time. It is possible, of course, that it may be resumed, at which time the hon. member's remarks will receive due consideration.

Mr. PERLEY: The department has no representative in the United Kingdom, so far as I can learn from the details as set out at page 187 of the estimates. It is pointed out there that there are three clerks only, and the remainder of the sum is for publicity. I find that $15,700 is for publicity, and that there is no representative in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): On publicity, no.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the form of publicity?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The $15,700 is detailed as follows: First, an item of $1,700 for the maintenance of the Canadian court at the Imperial institute. That is the donation we make to that society. Then we make a donation of $1,000 to the Scottish Building Centre. We spent about $7,500 in advertising in Canada's Weekly, and $5,000 in general publicity. Office expenses amounted to $500, making a total of $15,700.

Mr. PERLEY: It is principally ads in newspapers; there are no pamphlets for distribution or anything like that?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Our trade commissioner's staff in the old country look after this. There is no special item of salaries chargeable to this vote except for one stenographer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Following the minister's statement with regard to bacon, I wonder if he can say anything about shipments of beef. I understand that recently a contract was negotiated with the United Kingdom for the shipment of beef. I had some doubts about this and I notice from the press that the fly in the ointment is the matter of cold storage space for shipment. I have never been able to see how we could ever maintain a market in Great Britain for our beef unless we had sufficient cold storage space. Can the minister give us any information he has in connection with the shipment of frozen beef to Great Britain in the near future?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is a matter I shall have to discuss with the officials of the department. The remarks I made regarding bacon will apply pretty well to beef. My understanding is the Department of Agriculture has effected a similar agreement in connection with beef, but I am not in position to comment at the moment upon the point raised by the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is the Canadian government responsible for the arrangements of shipping space on these products, or does the British government make the arrangements?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The British government. It is taken as from Canada.

Item agreed to.

347. Dominion bureau of statistics—administration, $92,525.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister give some explanation for the increase in this vote for administration? Since we are dealing with administration, perhaps I may ask a question with respect to the next item. There is an increase of $119,755 in that item, and I think other hon. members as well as myself will be interested in knowing what is involved in the connection with the Inter-American Statistical Institute.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This increase in administration is largely due to the demands made upon the bureau by various departments.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the war?

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In connection with the war. It is largely the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. KNOWLES: In a sense it should have been a war vote.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Inter-American Statistical Institute was started some four years ago, and the bureau of statistics thought it would be of great benefit to belong to it, both from the practical point of view and from the point of view of international relations on this hemisphere. There are branches in Latin-America and they were anxious for Canada to be represented. About fourteen American countries are members.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the bureau a statistician collecting figures on the national income as opposed to the figures collected by the Bank of Canada or the Department of Finance?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We have a capable man now, but we are getting a man more experienced in financial statistics.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is no change as compared with last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that the appointment is pending and may be made within a week or so.

Mr. MARSHALL: Throughout the auditor general's report mention is made of considerable amounts of money that are paid to the International Business Machine company of Toronto for the rental of machines. According to the auditor general's report for 1943 the Department of Trade and Commerce paid the International Business Machine company of Toronto $45,562 in one instance and $23,250 in another. If different branches of the government find it necessary to spend such large sums of money I would think it would be more profitable for the government to purchase these machines outright and service them themselves. Has the minister considered any such scheme? I notice on page Y-19 of the auditor general's report for 1943 the following under "comments":

Includes payments to F. Belisle and J. T. Richard for royalties on tabulating machines, $2,400.

I think an item of this sort requires an explanation from the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am informed that it is not possible to buy these machines outright from the holders of the patents. They can only be rented.

Mr. MARSHALL: What type of machines are they?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They are known as the Hollerith machines, which are used extensively in census work and work of that kind. Just recently, through the treasury board, a survey was made in all branches of the government using these machines to see if there was a uniform price for all contracts, and that survey is, I believe, still in progress.

Mr. MARSHALL: What about my other question as to paying royalties?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If a man makes an improvement to the machine he receives in royalties a certain percentage of the cost of the machine. That is to repay him for his diligence and his expertness in developing labour saving devices. The remuneration in all these cases is fixed by the commissioner of patents.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is this the only instance where royalties are paid for this kind of work?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is the only case in this department, but the system is followed to quite an extent in the national research council.

348. Statistics, including contribution to the inter-American Statistical Institute, $1,225,800.

Mr. PERLEY: I hold in my hand the "Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation", issued by the department. What does it cost the department to get this out, and how wide is its distribution?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is not printed but mimeographed; technically it is known as roto printing. I shall be glad to get the information for the hon. member as to the cost and give it to him either in the house or personally.

Mr. PERLEY: I was just wondering how widely it was distributed and what it costs to produce.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Approximately 3,000 copies are printed, and there is a fairly wide distribution, taking into consideration that it goes only to those interested in wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: It is only distributed in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): And to a certain extent outside Canada, to international organizations interested in wheat.

Item agreed to.

349. Census of population, $592,705.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know whether my question properly comes under this item, but I notice on page 189 of the estimates details in connection with the cost of taking the census in 1941. Would the minister tell us what steps would have to be taken to recognize Canadian citizenship in the taking of the census? During the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National War Services we had a lengthy debate on an item for the development of cooperation in Canadian citizenship. Under another department, the department of immigration, those entering this country and desiring to be naturalized are dealt with. Then the census is taken under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and in the census only racial origin, not Canadian citizenship, is recognized. I have thought for many years that something should be done by the government to recognize Canadian citizenship. Had we done that in past years we would not have many of the difficulties which we have to-day, and the difficulties leading to disunity in this country might have been avoided if we had recognized Canadian citizenship. I have pointed out in past discussions in this house that United States citizenship has been recognized in that new and cosmopolitan country to the south of us. Would the minister tell us what steps would have to be taken to recognize Canadian citizenship in Canada, and whether so far any steps have been taken to coordinate the work of the various departments dealing with naturalization, racial origin and citizenship?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Possibly the hon. member is mixing Canadian nationals and racial origin. Through the census we secure the number of Canadian nationals.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What do you mean by Canadian nationals?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The number of people who are legally Canadians by birth or naturalization. In the census, figures are taken as to their racial origin.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Perhaps the minister will explain what constitutes a Canadian citizen in the taking of the census.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is a special act of parliament which defines what a Canadian national is.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What act is it? I find all across Canada people who do not appreciate our not recognizing Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am sure that the Secretary of State would give my hon. friend a copy of the act.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps he could answer the question.

Mr. McLARTY: I am not sure that I caught the question. I think it referred to taking the census. Citizenship was described not as qua Canadian but qua country of origin. Of course, when we conferred Canadian citizenship in 1914 we conferred nationality not only in Canada, but throughout the commonwealths of the empire. The old from of naturalization papers had application only to Canada. Since 1914, however, they are recognized and have a nationality which extends to all the commonwealths within the British commonwealth of nations. I am afraid that does not give the clear explanation which has been referred to, why a person is described as, perhaps, a Ruthenian in the census, but I am afraid I cannot give any clearer explanation than that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What I want to know, first of all, is whether a citizen can be recognized as a Canadian, and, if so, what constitutes, not a British subject, but a Canadian citizen.

Mr. McLARTY: If I am correct in my recollection, there was a statute known as the Canadian Nationals Act, passed approximately in 1922. I should not like to give a definite answer about it. I did not expect to participate in this discussion. I think, however, the Canadian Nationals Act gives a clear definition.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Can the Minister of Justice clear it up? It is a question which is raised all across Canada to-day. I do not want to hold up the estimates, but I should like to have this point cleared up, because a good many people do not appreciate that Canadian citizenship is recognized as such in this country to-day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I recently looked at the act which is called the Canadian Nationals Act. I think it is unsatisfactory, and it will be desirable to have something more specific in that connection to determine just what is a Canadian national, how that qualification is acquired, and what it means.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The point is that the question should be determined before we have another census, and provision made whereby such Canadian citizenship can be recognized.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe you will find that a Canadian national is a British subject who happens to be residing in Canada.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I am surprised that there has been so much confusion about this matter since the last census The difficulty may be the failure of the authorities to give sufficient publicity to what was the case so far as that census was concerned. I was not a member of parliament at the time the census was taken; I submitted myself for employment in connection with that work as an enumerator, and I have a vivid recollection of this point. Among the many columns on that broad sheet we enumerators went around with were the two specific columns which are under discussion now: the one was headed, "Racial origin," the other was headed "Nationality." Apparently more attention has been attracted to that column, "Racial origin" in which I, for example, who have thirteen generations of forebears on this side of the water, put down "English"; but in the column, "Nationality," Canadian was definitely the term that was not only accepted and recognized but demanded by the regulations which were supplied to the enumerators who went out on that job. The question as to who qualifies as a Canadian has already been referred to by the Minister of Justice when he said that a Canadian is a British subject who is five years domiciled in Canada. I recall cases of people whose domicile formerly had been England, who had not been in this country for five years, and were put down as English so far as nationality is concerned. A person born in England who had been here more than five years was put down as a Canadian There was no reference on the census sheet to "British subject"; in the matter of nationality it was English, Canadian, American, or what have you. My contention is that the regulations for the taking of the census on this point are satisfactory. I only hope that the confusion which has existed can be cleared up by more publicity being given to the fact that what the hon. member for Souris is rightly asking for is already the case. There is such a thing as Canadian citizenship, Canadian nationality, but even after that has been established one can hardly get away from the fact that if he goes back far enough he has a racial origin which is something other than Canadian, unless he happens to have the honour of being a full-blooded Indian.

Mr. REID: I think there is a great deal in what the hon. member for Souris has said. The question is not clear at all, and those of us who were born in the old country find that out when we cross to the United States; no matter how long you have lived in this country, if you were not born here, when you enter the United States you are looked upon as a citizen of the country in which you were born; and I have always been a little incensed in crossing the line, because personally I have been residing in Canada longer than I lived in Scotland. I remember crossing the line three years ago, and when the United States immigration officer said, "What nationality are you?", I straightened out a little and said, "I am a Canadian." He said, "Oh, no; not with a tongue like that." Be that as it may, the fact remains that the Canadian national is not recognized by other countries; the matter has not been made clear, and I am very glad to hear the Minister of Justice say that he will take note of the act and have it brought up to date. I want to associate myself with the views of the hon. member for Souris.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—
Atlantic ocean.
351. Canada and South Africa, service between, $100,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the minister state whether any sum was paid out of this vote last year? I note that in the report for the year ended March 31, 1943, it is shown that not a penny of this vote was used. Was any sum expended last year, and, if so, what was the amount?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We did not need it last year, because there was not any of that shipping on account of the war. The vote is there in the event that we shall need it in this coming year.

Mr. GREEN: Are there any ships out?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Canadian government ships are operating on that service at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: There will be no subsidy this year either?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—

Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia, service between, $15,000.
Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway, service between, $10,000.
Victoria and west coast Vancouver island, service between, $10,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: Was there an actual expenditure last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: On all these items?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are any services receiving subventions from the dominion which also receive subventions from any of the provinces?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Some of the Nova Scotia services receive small subventions from the province.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—
353. Eastern local services, $740,540.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the department taken any steps to restore the ferry service between Parrsboro, Kingsport and Wolfville, which has been in operation for forty years. It was contributed to by the provincial and the federal governments in equal amounts. A special boat was built and named after these three towns, ports of call. That boat was known as the Kipawo—representing a combination of the names Kingsport, Parrsboro and Wolfville—and I understand it was the only service for which subsidy was discontinued in all Canada. There has always been urgent necessity for that service, but that necessity has been greater in the last few years because of the difficulties in operating motor vehicles—rationing of gasoline and the difficulty of getting tires. The distance by motor is about 150 miles and by the water fifteen miles. Military camps, naval stations and air fields are stationed in this territory, and the service is required by them in addition to the usual traffic. When it was discontinued strong representations were made to the minister from the towns affected as well as the government of Nova Scotia, that the subsidy be revoted and the service continued. There was considerable criticism on the part of the people who are interested in Cumberland and the county of Kings and in the Annapolis valley, and there was criticism of the Minister of Finance, whose constituency was served. Many people in Nova Scotia felt that the minister did not show that interest which the conditions warranted in seeing that this service was continued. I should like to hear from the minister as to whether the department has plans for the restoration of the service and whether he considers that it was a proper decision to make in refusing to renew the vote a few years ago, in view of the protests made by the people of the towns concerned as well as by the government of Nova Scotia, which contributed fifty per cent of the subsidy and made a request of the government that the service be continued. I should like to have a statement from the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I remember very well the circumstances in connection with the cessation of the service. I am told that the vessel was used largely for the carrying of automobiles and tourist traffic, but in any event it was taken over by the government for war purposes. I do not think I have had a complaint, or a request from any source for the resumption of the service, but if there were I doubt whether a boat could be secured at the present time. We have had very great trouble in getting boats for similar services.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But that boat was built especially for that service and it was named after the three towns.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It was taken over for the war purposes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where is it operated now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It was taken over by the Canadian navy.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Can the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services inform me what service it is engaged in now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not know where it is at the moment. For some years it has been performing some function in the Canadian navy somewhere on the Canadian coast; I do not know exactly where.

Canada Grain Act—

354. Administration, $100,950.

Mr. BURTON: I presume the operation of the wheat board is not under this vote?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. BURTON: How does the operation of the wheat board work in with the minister's department? Does it make the work of the department easier, or is there more work by reason of it? I am sorry that the opportunity is not available at present to discuss the operations of the wheat board, but I realize that it is not involved in this vote. However, I should like to know how the two work together, whether the operations of the wheat board have facilitated the work of the department, or whether it involves more work?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am advised that the operations of the wheat board do not in any way necessarily add to the work of the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. PERLEY: Are we to have an opportunity at all of asking questions about the operations of the wheat board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Recently we had a meeting of the agriculture committee at which we had officials of the wheat board and they were closely questioned. I do not think that can be pursued under this item.

Mr. PERLEY: But since the meeting of that committee order in council P.C. 7942 has been passed. I was going to ask whether, after the conclusion of this estimate for the Canada Grain Act, the minister would make a statement or allow one or two questions with regard to the other matter.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not know whether I shall make a statement, but I shall be glad to see that the hon. member has an opportunity to ask any questions.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister knows about the order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I understand that the grain commission is responsible for the setting of handling charges—elevator charges for storage and general handling charges—and I would ask the minister whether under the act it is necessary that the commissioners receive an application before they can alter the charges or whether they do it on their own, without having received an application to that effect.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They can do it on their own initiative.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

355. Operation and maintenance, including inspecting, weighing, registration, etc., $1,596,736.

Mr. PERLEY: On page 191 of the estimates giving the details it is seen that there has been a considerable increase in the number of samplers, some thirty-three, and the figure is $45,000. Will the minister explain that increase in the number of samplers? They have almost doubled.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is due to the greater movement of grain and many of these samplers are temporary, handling the increased movement.

Mr. PERLEY: Why do you say: "greater movement of grain?" From time to time the same number of bushels of grain are being marketed, or comparatively the same number. There may be a difference in some years. Why do you need almost double the staff this year as compared with last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am advised there was a considerably larger movement last year than there was the year before.

Mr. WRIGHT: I believe that the two railway companies have asked that cars loaded with grain be loaded to capacity. As a result there is a large number of cars going through the Winnipeg yards out of which the grain samplers are not able to obtain a true sample, and the inspection is made at the head of the lakes. Has the minister the number of cars in which this has taken place, where they were not able to make the inspection at Winnipeg and it had to be made at the head of the lakes; also the number of cars in which a reinspection was called because of the unsatisfactory inspection at Winnipeg and the number of cars in which the grade was changed at the head of the lakes because of the calling for this reinspection?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am informed that in all cases a sample is taken at Winnipeg; but in many cases the car is of necessity loaded so full that a proper sample cannot always be taken. Each car is again sampled at the head of the lakes and the two samples compared. I am informed that rarely is there very much difference in the samples.

Mr. WRIGHT: If there are a number of cases where a reinspection has been called for and a change in the grade has been made at the head of the lakes, that information should be available.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In the crop year 1941-42 there was a reinspection made of 585 cars; in the crop year 1942-43 there was a reinspection of 577 cars. In the crop year 1941-42 the grade was raised on ninety-one cars; in the crop year 1942-43 the grade was raised on seventy-seven cars. In the crop year 1941-42 the grade was lowered on two cars, and in the crop year 1942-43 the grade was lowered on one car.

Mr. BURTON: To-day are not all terminals equipped with automatic samplers?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. BURTON: Has it not been proven that that is a more satisfactory way of getting a correct grade than the probing system? I have been given to understand that the automatic sampler installed in the terminals has proven satisfactory. If that is the case why continue the two systems of taking the samples?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The question the hon. member has just asked has been anticipated, and I may say that the shipper wishes to have information with respect to grade as soon as possible. That is why a sample is taken at Winnipeg. This enables him better to dispose of his grain and also to protect himself with regard to grade. Many cars are too full to sample at Winnipeg and must be sampled at the unloading point.

Canada Grain Act—

356. Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $364,557.

Mr. PERLEY: How many government-owned elevators are the government operating, and how many have they under lease? Are there any changes in the terms of leases for the following year? Before the minister answers those questions may I say that I notice on page 192 of the estimates under the heading, "Lands, buildings and works," that there is a considerable decrease. Why is there a decrease of some $80,000? While we were on the previous item I made a computation of the employees. I find there are 610 employees in these three branches. That is quite a large number of employees to carry on the business of the Grain Act. They do not operate many grain elevators. Would the minister give us a statement with respect to the number of elevators, the number under lease and the changes, if any, in the leases and why there are so many employees?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is a little difficult to follow all the questions, but I shall start out and answer the first two questions, in any event. The management and operation of the Canadian government public terminal elevators at Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Lethbridge, Edmonton, Calgary and Prince Rupert are under the Canadian government. The elevator at Port Arthur, Ontario, has been leased to a private firm, and the renewal of that lease is being considered at the present time.

Mr. PERLEY: On the same terms?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. I can give the hon. member some information along that line. The principal variation as between the two leases is in the matter of responsibility for maintenance costs. I am speaking of the lease that is in existence now and the lease that is in process of negotiation and pretty nearly concluded. The current lease provides in clause 1 (b) that the lessee will:

> Keep the demised premises, including the said buildings, terminal separators, machinery, erections, fixtures, tools and other equipment and appurtenances in good and substantial repair, working order and condition, and from time to time replace, renew and reinstate any parts thereof which may become broken, lost, or unfit for use, reasonable wear and tear, and damage by fire, lightning, tempest, flood, explosion or unforeseen events occurring through the act of God only excepted.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the gross rent paid annually?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I had better continue with this. Further, by paragraph 2 (b) the lessor covenants to:

Make and pay for all major repairs and replacements not necessitated through the negligence of the lessee or its employees.

These two clauses are somewhat at variance and left some doubt as to the responsibility of the lessor and lessee to make various repairs and replacements which became necessary from time to time. The proposed lease, paragraph 5 (2), obligates the lessee to:

Maintain and repair in a proper and workmanlike manner machinery and/or equipment of the lessor installed or which may hereafter be installed.

Paragraph 8 requires the lessee to spend on repairs during the five-year term of the lease $25,000 in the aggregate and not less than $2,000 in each year of the said term.

The lease further provides, paragraph 7 (b) that the lessor will:

Keep the said elevator and other property referred to in schedule "A" hereto attached, in a good state of repair.

Schedule A includes all buildings, except temporary annex and feed warehouse, all railway tracks, except the spur track running from No. 1 track past the feed warehouse to the bag conveyor, dust collectors—not including motors—except those listed under schedule B which are the property of the lessee.

I may say that a very great deal of work has been put on this lease, and we have been considering it for a considerable time. We advertised the warehouse for lease, and received one tender. We have been negotiating with the tenderer for some weeks.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 25, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

FURTHER REPORT AS TO DESTRUCTION OR ABANDONMENT OF STORES.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), under whose department I think this matter would come, to a Canadian Press dispatch from Vancouver which appeared in the morning papers. This relates to a matter which was referred to in the house on a previous occasion, namely, the report that certain stores and commodities used in the construction of the Alaska highway by the United States government have been destroyed.

On July 10, as reported on page 4648 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). His answer was as follows:

Since notice of the question was given, inquiries have been made through the special commissioner for defence projects in northwest Canada. The special commissioner has informed the government that investigations do not reveal that usable stores and equipment are being destroyed or abandoned as reported.

I think the house took that as a final answer in connection with the matter. But to-day the matter breaks out afresh. I want to ask the government if they will provide an answer—I do not suggest that it can be done to-day—to this question. First of all, it appears in the press dispatch that the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the United States is now threatening to prosecute some Canadian nationals or citizens in the Alaska highway area. I would like to know whether or not that is possible, or whether it is by arrangement between this government and the United States government.

Mr. CRERAR: What is that based on?

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if you would allow me to transgress the rules sufficiently to read a paragraph or so of this news dispatch, I could do so. It is very important.

An hon. MEMBER: We have all read it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some hon. members may have read it, but there are two hundred or so members, and perhaps my hon. friend would not mind my reading it for their benefit. He does not need to listen. The article reads:

The Vancouver News-Herald said to-day in a newspaper story date-lined Dawson Creek, British Columbia, that residents of the Peace River district who have been combing United States army dumps to recover stores allegedly discarded, "face the threat of prosecution by the United States federal bureau of investigation."

"Prosecution of settlers for having American made goods in their possession was launched in two instances," the New-Herald said, "but it failed for lack of evidence the goods were stolen."

Then it goes on to say:

"The amount of usable stores here is tremendous. The American authorities want to get rid of them, but Ottawa says no," the paper said, quoting a sworn statement.

And again:

American authorities are bound by an agreement under which the goods were brought in duty free for the highway construction, it added. Lack of transportation and high costs prohibited removal of most of the goods back to the United States.

I bring this matter to the attention of the government in order that they may be able to provide a satisfactory answer to the points I have raised.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say this one word? This matter should be investigated. I have just come back from that area, and some ugly stories are being told of the destruction not only of equipment of this type but of tractors, bulldozers and all kinds of things. As this dispatch states, the onus has been placed on Canada because of our refusal to allow these goods to remain here because no duty was paid, and the cost of shipping them out of the country being too great. That is the story that is told, and I think it should be investigated.

Mr. CRERAR: Who is placing the onus on Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has, as he himself has said, transgressed the rules in asking his questions regarding a newspaper statement. If any member asking a question on the orders of the day based on a newspaper statement wished to identify himself with the truth or accuracy of the report, then of course he would be in order, but simply to read reports from newspapers and make statements about them is clearly outside what is permissible on the orders of the day. I would suggest that hon. members paraphrase what is contained in a newspaper statement or give whatever information they may have regarding it or whatever authority they have for its accuracy. But the minister may reply if he wishes to.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I asked for the consent of the house to transgress the rules, and I did not transgress without that consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house has recognized, and I have always recognized, that the leader of the opposition should be allowed more latitude than is accorded probably to any other member because of the very fact of his position. But when the leader of the opposition takes upon himself the responsibility of transgressing the rules, even with the consent of the house, I would draw to the attention of all hon. members the fact that no member is allowed to transgress the rules, and I state that rule now for future guidance.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted a word, I have just now been handed a document relating to this matter, which I have not yet had a chance to look through, but if I understand the situation aright, the stores mentioned were owned by the United States authorities and were under their control, and I am at a loss to know in what way the Canadian government could have interfered with their disposition. I have just glanced over this document sufficiently to learn that the United States authorities apparently indicate that these stores were either infected goods, blankets and the like, or food that was unusable. Whether that is correct or not I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Bulldozers would not be infected.

Mr. CRERAR: Just a moment. I did not interrupt my hon. friend. He is pretty good at interrupting; I sometimes think he is the official interrupter.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, I would not like to take that honour from my hon. friend over there.

Mr. CRERAR: It is well to keep in mind this fact, that these goods were not Canadian goods and were not under the control of the Canadian authorities. It is a question of how far the Canadian authorities would be justified in interfering. I shall bring the facts to the attention of the Prime Minister and perhaps on Thursday he will be able to make a statement.

FARM PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture, moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient for the purpose of supporting farm prices during the transition from war to peace to introduce a measure to establish a board with authority to purchase through agents or otherwise, staple agricultural products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council, or to make such payments in respect of staple agricultural products as may be necessary to bring average returns to producers up to the prices so approved, and to give the board such powers as may be necessary for the handling and disposition of products purchased; and further to provide for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary;

To provide further that the governor in council may authorize from time to time payments out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, up to an aggregate of two hundred million dollars, for expenditures under the said measure, exclusive of administrative expenditures; that there shall be a special account to which all expenditures under the said measure, other than administrative expenditures, are charged, and to which all receipts from the sale or disposition of agricultural products shall be credited, which receipts shall be available in the account for subsequent expenditures provided that the net realized profits in the account in any fiscal year shall be credited to the consolidated revenue fund and any net realized loss in the account in any fiscal year shall be recouped to the said account from an appropriation by parliament for the purpose.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was it announced last night that we would go on with this?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is a very important resolution. I ask, was it announced last night that we would go on with this this morning?—because we should come prepared to say something on it.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no desire to press the resolution, but the general practice in connection with resolutions of this kind is to get along to the point where we can have the bill before us. I think it would be much better to have the resolution dealt with and the bill printed and distributed before a discussion takes place on it, and I should like to advance the resolution so that we can get that done.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not objecting to that, but I do suggest that an outline of the business of the house should be given overnight so we may know what is coming. While it is true that this is on the order paper, yet other matters were to be discussed to-day. I have no objection; I think the minister is right, that the resolution should be advanced; but I protest against something being brought in this morning which was not mentioned last night as included in the business of to-day.

Mr. CRERAR: It was intended last evening to proceed with the bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, but objection has been taken on the ground that they were not distributed. We are now sitting from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night; and a very heavy additional burden is thus imposed on the printing office. In the general effort to expedite the business of the house I am sure that hon. members will take that into account. While this resolution was not specifically mentioned, I understand, last night, we hope that the house will agree to go ahead with it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no objection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of Agriculture should make a detailed statement on the purpose of this resolution before the motion carries, and then we will be in a position, perhaps, to cross-examine him in committee.

Mr. GARDINER: The resolution states fully the contents of the bill which it is proposed to present to the house. The intention of the bill is to make it possible for a board to be appointed to consist of three persons, one of whom will be the chairman and one the vice-chairman. The responsibility of that board will be to make a study of the conditions existing during the period that we have had ceiling prices established on farm products and to relate that to conditions existing in Canada affecting other industries as well as people engaged in other activities; to study as well, when the time arrives, conditions in the post-war period, and from time to time to submit to the Minister of Agriculture, and through him to the government, recommendations as to which farm products should have floor prices placed under them, the method by which that should be done, and the level at which those prices should be established. The final decision with regard to the matter will rest with the governor general in council. Once the floor prices are established, the board will have authority to purchase and sell farm products on the basis of that floor price level, or to set up commodity boards to purchase and sell, or to establish other agencies to purchase and sell on its behalf any farm product which is declared by order in council to be one on which it is necessary to have floor prices, and as to what that floor price is.

That is the general principle of the bill. The part of it which has to do with the setting up of the board and with examining into conditions now existing comes into effect at once; but the part which provides for the buying and selling of goods, if that becomes necessary during the transition period from war to peace, will come into effect by proclamation at the time it becomes necessary to do that kind of thing; that is, at some time towards the end or following the end of the war.

That in principle, Mr. Speaker, is the content of the bill which will be introduced as a result of passing this resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 168, for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient for the purpose of supporting fisheries prices during the transition from war to peace to introduce a measure to establish a board with authority to purchase through agents or otherwise staple fisheries products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council, or to make such payments in respect of staple fisheries products as may be necessary to bring average returns to producers up to the prices so approved, and to give the board such powers as may be necessary for the handling and disposition of products purchased; and further, to provide for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary;

To provide further that the governor in council may authorize from time to time payments out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, up to an aggregate of twenty-five million dollars for the expenditures under the said measure, exclusive of administrative expenditures; that there shall be a special account to which all expenditures under the said measure, other than administrative expenditures, are charged, and to which all receipts from the sale or disposition of fisheries products shall be credited; which receipts shall be available in the account for subsequent expenditures provided that the net realized profits in the account in any fiscal year shall be credited to the consolidated revenue fund and any net realized loss in the account in any fiscal year shall be recouped to the said account from an appropriation by parliament for the purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have an explanation from the minister. Will he state whether the programme has been thought through, or whether this is in the same stage as the agricultural war prices matter—not to come into effect until the period of transition is over?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This resolution is to the same effect as the previous one relating to agricultural products, but there are a few changes in it. The amount to be provided is $25 million, and there is a board of three, which has the same power as the board to be etsablished in respect of agricultural products. The changes are just those which are necessary on account of the fisheries in so far as the fisheries differ from agricultural products.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. SENN: Are these bills ready for distribution, or will they be ready as soon as this passes?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who will compose the board? Will they be permanent officials of the department, or is it intended to go outside to set up the board?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The bill does not say whether the members are to be officials of the department or not. When the time comes we shall look for the best men we can find. It is customary to have at least one of the members from among our officials, but I cannot say who it will be. There will be one from the department and the two others will be chosen among the fishermen and the trade.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will consideration be given to having one member of this board from the group of fishermen themselves and not from the processors?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would not like to commit myself definitely on it, but my intention is, as I explained, to have one member chosen among the fishermen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not so understand. Is that a definite pledge, that one member of this board will be from the primary producer class, one from the department itself and the third to be appointed? Is that what the minister states?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is what I have in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is nothing binding, then.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I think the minister ought to give some undertaking with regard to these men, who for the most part are in the class of forgotten men, so that they shall be adequately represented and not represented by anyone from among the purely processing group. That is what has happened too often, and it is what has happened under certain conditions that exist to-day in connection with the fisheries. Controls are in no sense representative of the producing class. So far as my observation goes, they are representative entirely of those who are interested in the business as non-producers, and I submit that the point of view of the producers—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): What board has the hon. gentleman in mind?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You can imagine. I could name it, but I do not want to do so because I do not want to get personal. I will not name any individual, but I do insist that on any board set up to establish floor prices suitable to the fisheries the producers should be represented; otherwise I do not think they will get a fair show. It is important that this class of men should be represented. Certainly someone can be found among them who is intelligent enough and who has the confidence of his fellow men sufficiently to permit the government to appoint him to the board. I feel very strongly about this, because in days gone by, in many boards set up by this government, yes, and I might say by other governments, the producing class has not had very much say about matters which are vital to their well-being. Therefore I am pressing the minister to give an undertaking that when this board is set up the producing class shall be represented. The same principle should apply to the agriculture board. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will see that the producers of agricultural commodities are represented on the board. I should be astonished if he did not do that. It is a sound principle. In respect of the fishermen, however, I am afraid that unless the point is pressed, that will not be done.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is my intention to recommend among the members of the board a member from the fishermen, the primary producers, but of course council will appoint him. My recommendation will be there. This resolution, and the bill that is to follow, are intended to help the fishermen themselves.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not objecting to the purpose of the resolution and the bill. I think that something has to be done in the period indicated in the resolution to protect the fishermen, because my observation over a considerable period of time is this, that after a period of inflation, such as we are bound to have in war time and such as we have now, when the price of fish is probably as high as at any time in the history of the industry, the prices to primary producers are the first to fall and the last to rise. Of course that is a difficult situation, difficult for the fishermen and for the government. There is no doubt about that. I do not know whether this is a good remedy. I am not sufficiently well versed as a student of economics to know whether the establishment of floor prices is a proper thing or not from the economic standpoint; yet I am anxious to see that some remedy shall be applied. If we were living in a different situation I would hesitate to press in connection with either agriculture or fisheries for a floor or a ceiling, because there is a law of supply and demand and it is pretty hard to beat it.

I was interrupted, in the confusion that prevailed at the moment in the chamber, so that I did not understand what the minister said in reply to my request for representation by a producer. I did not catch what he said. Would he be good enough to repeat what he said in that regard?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I said that it was my intention to recommend that on this board there should be a primary producer, a man from the department and one from the trade.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then may we take it as a pledge that this board will consist of a competent official from the department, a member from the producing class and a member from the trade? Is that to be the position?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, that is what I am going to recommend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As far as the minister is concerned, that is the policy he himself will propose to the governor in council. I think that is as far as I can ask him to go, but I should like to be as definite as possible on this point. My point is that the primary producer should be represented on the board.

Mr. NEILL: I entirely endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). My quarrel is that he does not go far enough. He goes only half way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You go the rest of the way.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know where he got it, but he appeared to get from somewhere the idea that this board was to consist of three persons. Does the minister endorse that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The board will have for its duty the management, the buying of fish, if we buy any, and so forth, but when the bill is introduced the hon. member will find that there is in addition an advisory committee.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know whether this is the latest form of communism or socialism, or what it is, but it might be called midsummer night's madness. I wonder if the house and the government appreciate the extent to which this resolution goes—a resolution brought in to-day casually without notice. If we put it through the first thing we know we shall be dealing with a bill that is not printed, or we shall be asked to do so, or it will be submitted to us an hour or two before we discuss it. I wonder if the committee really appreciates the magnitude of what I might call the violence of the change that is suggested. They are going to appoint a board of three people to do what has never been done before in the whole world, namely, to fix a price for all fish products in Canada. On the suggestion of my hon. friend to the left, one of those three men is to be a member of the producing class, and one from the processing or manufacturing class, and apparently one a government official. Good heavens! I cannot find words to express my astonishment—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I intervene for a moment? This board is not going to fix the price, as my hon. friend suggests. It is to fix a minimum price when necessary. That is very lifferent.

Mr. NEILL: And the government will have to take over the stuff at that minimum price. That is the idea. I wonder what they are going to do with it. As my hon. friend to the left says, the law of supply and demand will fix the price and the government will have to take the stuff over when it falls below a certain price. They will have to take a thousand tons of herrings to-day and a few thousand tons of pilchards to-morrow. What are they going to do with it? The same principle applies to the marketing boards who look after agricultural products. Certain people can grow potatoes at a profit at $20 a ton. Other people cannot grow potatoes at a profit at less than $40 a ton. Is the man who grows the expensively produced crop to be taken care of? Is that to be the standard? What is to be done with the stuff that is left on the government's hands?

There is to be a board of three. There are two large divisions of the fishing industry, one on the Pacific coast and the other on the Atlantic coast. Surely there ought to be a man from the Pacific and one from the Atlantic on this board to look after their special problems. Suppose that point is yielded and we get a man from the Pacific and a man from the Atlantic. The man on the Pacific has to deal with the capture and manufacture of whales. Do you think the man who fixes the minimum price on whales or whale products will be qualified to fix the minimum price on pilchards or herrings? Then there are halibut and salmon, six different kinds of salmon each with a different value, varying as much as $8 a case between the highest and lowest grades. Then there are herring and pilchard reduction plants, and so on. Then there is the liver oil industry. Three men are to be appointed. They are to have the handling of this huge subject, and they are going to fix the minimum price. The minimum price will be so much. The minister says it will be a fair price. Who is to fix the fairness of the price?

As I have said, in one place the price of salmon may be so much, but it could not be begun to be produced at the same price somewhere else. All the complex implications of these things are to be handled by one solitary man on this board who represents the producer. Why, it would take a board of a hundred men to give justice to all these people. The resolution does not explain how it is to be done. I hope it will be explained in the bill. There is no law that I know of that has as yet been devised to beat the law of supply and demand. When there is more stuff produced than there is demand for, the price will go down. You can cover it up all you like, but the price will go down until the lower price induces a greater demand so that the market balances. That is the only way it can be done. If the government propose to do that, they will have an awful proposition on their hands, because when a certain price is guaranteed for herrings or potatoes and I know I can produce at that price I will exert my utmost efforts to produce, knowing that the government has to take care of it. Ordinarily I would be afraid to put in too many potatoes one year because it looked as though there was going to be a small demand, but when I have the government behind me I am reckless in that regard and I will put everything I can into the growing of those potatoes, knowing the government has to take care of me.

We are nearing the close of the session. This bill is being introduced now and will go through in a few days. I admit I do not understand how the government can in such a casual way deal with a subject of such huge complications and implications. I hope when we get the bill it will make clearer what is to be done. But I view this measure with considerable apprehension. I do not see how the thing is going to work. It is going to make for a lot of trouble and confusion. I do hope the bill will be more explanatory than the resolution, but as the Scots say, I have my doubts.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not my intention to debate the resolution at this time. I do not think we can intelligently discuss the matter until the bill is before us. We intend to forego any detailed discussion until the bill is presented.

I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I am glad that I can find a spot to agree with him, because as a rule we disagree. I emphasize the necessity for having on this board representatives of the producers. Unless that is done I do not think you are going to make any changes. The manipulation of the fishing industry has been largely in the hands of the private buyers. If the composition of the board is to be such that you are merely going to give super-authority for the regulating, marketing and fixing of prices to those who have exploited the industry in the past, then you are not going to make any changes in the interest of the fishermen.

I do not share the fears of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I know that within the industry itself, and within the past ten years, the cooperative movement has developed men who are capable of solving the problems of the fishermen through the medium of the machinery now being set up by the government, if they are given the opportunity. I could name a dozen men from the ranks of the fishermen, on the east coast at least, who are qualified in the field of marketing and price fixing and every phase of the industry. If these men are taken in and given a chance they will make a success of it. I wish to emphasize that because I think the Minister of Justice sounded the keynote yesterday when he referred to how the department endeavoured to select the judges. He said that they tried at all times to pick the judges from the practising profession. I think that is a good principle. It is a principle that should be applied to all the machinery that is being set up in a particular field. If it is good for the judiciary to select those who are to administer the law from those who are practising law and understand it, then that same principle should be applied to those boards that are being set up. Those who produce and understand the industry from the practical point of view should be given posts in the administration of the industry.

I shall reserve any further remarks I may have to make until the bill is before the house, because I have considerable to say on this question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am delighted to find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South on one point. I think we are both right. I was glad to hear him say that there are qualified men among the producers who could assist in this proposed programme; but you cannot ignore what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said. How are you going to make this board work? Let us get right down to brass tacks and if the minister and his department have any ideas on the subject, let us have them. How are you going to make it work, having regard to the principle of the law of supply and demand? There is an old saying that you can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink.

If Canada were a self-contained nation and people were fish-minded I do not think there would be very much difficulty in establishing floor prices, if they were reasonable prices; but two-thirds of our total production goes into the export trade. I think that is an approximately correct statement. Therefore you are dealing in what is a world commodity. Unless it is intended merely to establish a subsidized or bonused position I do not see how this can be worked out; but if this thing is going to develop into a subsidy, let us call it by that name. That is what I think it will develop into, a subsidized position for the fishermen in the transition period. I have no great objection to that, provided it does not last too long and does not cost too much. Everybody else in this country is being subsidized; we are now going to subsidize judges' widows by giving them a pension; we are going to subsidize babies pretty soon, and before we get through with this thing everybody is going to be subsidized and we will be in the position of taking in each other's washing. That is what will happen; that is the ultimate end of this sort of legislation. Bonuses and subsidies are a last resort. They may be justified in an emergency, and I believe that in the transition period there will be a real emergency as far as the fishermen are concerned. Take our codfish industry on the east coast. How many people in Saskatchewan or Ontario have ever tasted the luscious dried cod of eastern Canada? Very few; yet that is the principal product of the Atlantic fishing industry.

Mr. GARDINER: We distributed it but our friends of the C.C.F. did not like it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, they do not know what is good for them. If they would eat some of the Atlantic fish they might have a few more brains; at least that is the theory down there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not always apparent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know whether that is intended to have any personal application, but if so I resent the implication as far as I am concerned. However, that is merely in passing. I want the minister to understand that I am really interested in this matter, in trying to work out some solution for what I believe will be a critical period in the history of the fisher folk among whom

I was born, whom I knew intimately as a lad, and whom I have seen rise at three and four o'clock in the morning to go down to the sea and fish under extreme difficulties. They attract my sympathy, and if I can help I want to do so. But I do not see that the minister has told us anything practical that this proposed board can do except, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, to buy all the fish that may be offered. And then what? I thought my agricultural friends would go into the matter more deeply than they did, and perhaps they will when the bill is brought down—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They will when the bill comes down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a time and place for everything, and my hon. friend might contain himself for a few moments. I want the minister to tell us what the government propose to do. They are going to set up a board and, according to this resolution, place $25,000,000 at its disposal.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are going to appropriate $25,000,000 if, as and when necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a sort of revolving fund, if I read this resolution correctly; and this board is going to have authority to purchase, through agents or otherwise, staple fisheries products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council, or to make such payments in respect of staple fisheries products as may be necessary to bring average returns to producers up to the prices so approved. That, of course, is a fair hope, but I want the minister to tell us how he proposes to accomplish that end. Or is this just a gesture before an election?

Mr. RALSTON: Wait for the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence says to wait for the bill. Probably the bill will be brought down next week, in the dying days of the session; I presume it is not prepared yet. The principles underlying this resolution and the bill which will be founded upon it should be given proper consideration. Has the minister a plan? If so, I challenge him to lay it on the table.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend for floor prices for fish, or is he not? It seems to me that is the principle dealt with in the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence has no right to cross-examine me. That is an old trick; when you are addressing one minister someone else asks a question to divert attention. You cannot do that with me. The net is set for me in vain in that respect. I am going to say this. Already I have made it clear that I am in favour of something being done to alleviate the condition of the fishermen in the transition period, and it may be that in default of any better plan we will have to give bonuses and subsidies.

Mr. RALSTON: That is pretty general.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you cannot provide any other plan for the alleviation of the condition of the fishermen than subsidies, then I am going to vote for the plan, but for a limited period of time. That is very explicit, in reply to the Minister of National Defence. But I want to know if the government has a plan; I want the minister to tell us on this resolution. Then, in the light of the statements of the minister, we will consider the provisions of the bill and see if they measure up to that plan.

Mr. RALSTON: The bill is the plan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the government must have a plan in mind in order to formulate the bill, so let us have it. I suspect that the bill is not drafted.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the plan must be in mind and we should have it here.

Mr. RALSTON: The only point is that that means discussing it twice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have seen it given twice; the rules provide for that. The minister cannot rush us at this stage. I want to know what the plan is, what is proposed in the bill, how the government propose to solve the difficulties of the fishermen, which is most devoutly to be wished for, and I do not think we get it here. We do not get even the kernel of it. What are we going to do with the huge surplus of fish that will be dumped on our doorstep if the prices set by this board are such as to encourage wholesale production? That is what I want to know. Are we to burn them up, as they are said to be burning up valuable stuff on the Alaska highway? Are we to dump this fish back into the ocean, as they dumped coffee in Brazil to keep up the price? I do not know, and I think the minister must tell us.

Mr. ISNOR: I approach this resolution from a different angle than that from which other hon. members have spoken on it. I welcome this measure. I come from the Atlantic coast, where I have been closely associated with fishing villages in Halifax county, and in touch with other Nova Scotia fishing districts. I believe I express the thought of the fishermen when I say they welcome such a measure. Other hon. members may be more conversant with fishing on a large scale, and I rather agree with one hon. gentleman who thought that this suggested board should be larger. I do not think a board with three members will be able to meet the requirements of Canada. This is a big country and the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast has different interests from those of the industry on the Pacific coast.

The fishing industry represents approximately $75,000,000 of new wealth to Canada. Of this, $38,059,559 is produced on the Pacific coast, in British Columbia, while we on the Atlantic, in Nova Scotia produce something like $15,299,446. Of the total of $75,000,000, approximately $51,907,000 is export business. I am interested in maintaining that export business, because it means additional money and wealth for our people. It is for these reasons that I am particularly concerned about this measure. We have not the bill before us, so that I do not know just what its provisions will be. I do not know how we are going to overcome the price-fixing policy. The fishing industry is different from the agricultural industry. A fresh fish lasts only eight, nine or ten days before it begins to deteriorate. I want to see it made possible for our fishermen to obtain greater returns so that they may receive what we have been trying to get for them for so many years—an adequate living.

The resolution will be followed by a bill which is to provide for the support of prices during the transition period from war to peace. There is to be established a board with authority to purchase fisheries products at prices recommended by the board and approved by the governor in council. But there are a few words in the resolution which are important to the producers or the fishermen. The board is to be given such powers as may be necessary for the handling and disposition of products purchased. I feel that every hon. member who is interested in the lot of the fisherman, who wants to see him provided with a better livelihood, should be in favour of a measure such as this.

As I said before, I do not know just what will be contained in the bill. No doubt I shall have further remarks to make on the different clauses of the bill. In Nova Scotia we have 6,115 fishermen and in Halifax county there are 802 active fishermen. So that we are interested in a measure such as this. I hope that when the board is set up it will not mean that just an election gesture is being made, as has been suggested, but that something worth-while is being done for the fishermen, not only on the Atlantic coast but throughout all parts of the dominion.

Mr. REID: To my mind this resolution will provide something for which the fishermen have been looking for the past twenty years at least. I cannot understand why the proceedings should be stopped at this stage in order to get the bill. The principle is sound and it will be welcomed by fishermen on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I say, let us have the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all very well, but I want the plan and I am entitled to get it at this stage. It may or may not be in the bill. The minister has not had an opportunity to answer my request.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I must say that I am not a pessimist; I do not see the after-war period in as black a light as some hon. gentlemen. I think we have done a lot of work during the war and we have improved our machinery in many ways. I hope the fishermen are going to have improved conditions; I hope they are going to be more successful than ever. The purpose of the bill to be introduced is to foresee conditions that may arise after this war. The plan is to see that the prices of primary products do not fall to the low levels to which they fell between 1930 and 1936 and 1937. That is all. I cannot go into the details because the bill will give most of the particulars, but that is the general plan. I am quite sure that this is but one more instrument given to the Minister of Fisheries and his officials to improve the lot of the fishermen after this war, if it is necessary to do that.

Mr. NEILL: I hope the hon. member for New Westminster is right when he says that the fishermen are asking for this and will benefit by it. I have not heard any requests from them along those lines. I still think that it will be unworkable. It will not meet the conditions of a country which is spread out like this one, with so many diverse conditions. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) says that he hopes the prices will be raised to such an extent that the fishermen will find conditions more livable. So do we all. In times gone by I think I have heard him speak of a price of a cent and a half for a cod. I suppose if that price were multiplied by five the local fishermen down there would consider it satisfactory, but we in the west would not be satisfied with such a price because that is what we consider to be a very low price.

Only one man representing the fishermen is to be on this board. I cannot foresee how it will work. We have had a lot of trouble during the war, we have cheerfully but reluctantly put up with a lot of these boards that come along and say, "You must do this or do that." In some cases it has worked out fairly enough, but in other cases it has proved unworkable to a large extent. If this thing is to be spread all over the country it will have to be done on the average. The government will have to adopt something like that. They will have to fix an average price, but what may be a bonanza in one place will be ruination somewhere else. The fact that this is to be run by the government makes it impossible to take cognizance of local conditions.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The bill foresees that.

Mr. NEILL: Then you will have an awful job on your hands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite apparent that the minister is only asking for enabling legislation to do something which he in his optimistic way does not anticipate will be necessary. I hope he is right.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I hope it will not be necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope there will be no necessity for action on the part of the government to buy all the fish produced in Canada in order to save the situation. It is quite apparent that they have no plan. All the minister has is an objective, and with that we agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is going to work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have no plan at all.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I deny it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then trot it out and let us look at the old horse.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is not necessary to make a long speech and repeat the same thing three or four times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has not told us anything. He certainly has not replied to an intelligent interrogatory. What he has done is to state the objective which he and his department hope to attain in a certain contingency, namely, if prices drop to what they consider to be too low a level. That is all the minister has said. I suppose I am anticipating what is in his mind, but I suppose there will be set up an advisory committee. I have heard of these advisory committees. Do they ever function?

Mr. GARDINER: Certainly they function. The agricultural food advisory committee is meeting to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of Agriculture knows his onions, I am sure, and he would grab a good suggestion as quickly as anybody I know. There will be an advisory board in this connection. Who will be on it? The intention is to set up an advisory board, I assume?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There will be an advisory board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The resolution does not say so. It will do no harm, although I do not think it will do very much good unless the minister gets the right type of men on the board and listens to them. These men should be selected with great care. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that three will not be enough because of the diverse interests involved by reason of geographical position. The problems on the west coast are certainly different from our problems on the east coast and I suggest that there should at least be representatives from each coast. I do not want to see the board top-heavy with representation from the trade. Their representatives of course are intelligent men and they know their business, but primarily the objective of this legislation should be to help the fishermen, not the trade. If we cannot get anything more from the minister I shall have to sit down.

Mr. NEILL: The government appointed an official about two years ago in British Columbia primarily to give advice in connection with prices to fishermen, and the gentleman appointed just happened—just happened—to be a large shareholder in one of the big fish processing companies. It is his advice that is put forward—I hope it is not always accepted—on matters affecting the producers. There is an illustration.

The best argument I have heard in favour of this proposal was that put forward a few minutes ago by the minister when he said that he hoped and believed that the legislation would never be used. That is a poor argument for legislation, the hope and belief that it will never be used.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a minute; I am not going to be rushed off my feet. I am not going to rush ill-digested legislation through this house without proper consideration and examination. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has referred to the fact that the government appointed an officer from the west coast who was very deeply interested in one aspect of the fisheries business. I know that this government has appointed as fisheries controller a gentleman right out of the trade.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Has that anything to do with this resolution?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am telling you something.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): You have said it already on the estimates.

The CHAIRMAN: Standing order 40 mentions repetition. I think we have reached the stage where repetition must be declared out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did say something on the fisheries estimates but I have not repeated anything here. I was just using that illustration as an analogy. I am just saying that the man who was appointed as fisheries controller did not in any sense represent the producers of this country. On the other hand he represents a very special interest.

Mr. ISNOR: He has done a lot for the fishing industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has done very well out of the fishing industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Quite honourably.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not saying anything against his character. What I am suggesting is that he does not represent the point of view of the producers, and the producers are at the mercy of these arbitrary controllers. I am not going to say anything more about this; you can do as you like.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 169, for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

PROVISION OF LIFE INSURANCE FOR VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide life insurance on the life of veterans of the present war, payable to beneficiaries, as defined in the said measure, and upon the conditions thereby provided, or by regulations prescribed.

Moneys received by way of premium to form part of the consolidated revenue fund and payments under the contracts of insurance to be paid out of the said fund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister should make a statement on this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad to make a brief statement at the present stage, because this bill is of a very complicated nature and I think it must be studied by hon. gentlemen before its details are thoroughly understood.

In a word, requests have been received from returned soldier organizations such as the Canadian Legion and the Canadian corps and other organizations throughout Canada for the renewal on behalf of those engaged in the present war of the provisions, either in the same form or a modified form, of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act which we had for the veterans of the last war. Hon. gentlemen will recall that the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act was passed in 1920, extended in 1922, reopened in 1928, and in 1929 the act was extended for another year. In 1930 the act was again extended for three more years.

I intend to give a detailed explanation of the bill upon the second reading. At the present stage I will give to the committee a very brief comparison as between the old Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act and this Veterans' Insurance Act.

The name of the old act was the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. This act will be known as the Veterans Insurance Act. The maximum contract under the old act was $5,000; under the new act it will be $10,000. These proposals have been studied for a considerable period of time by a committee representing the services, the Department of Pensions and National Health, Finance and Justice, and they have made these recommendations after the most careful study of actuarial and insurance principles and of the considerations advanced by returned soldier bodies.

The interest rate under the old act was 4 per cent. Under the new act it will be 3½ per cent. The plan of insurance under the old act was payable for 10, 15 or 20 years, to the age of 65, for life or by a single premium. Under the new act it is payable for 10, 15 or 20 years, to the age of 65 or 85 under certain conditions. That is a technical provision which I would rather explain when the bill is before the committee. Life payments have been changed to "paid up at age 85" in accordance with modern insurance tendencies. The single payment plan, which was not taken up to any great extent, has been omitted from the present legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was not very practical.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right. Then as to disability benefits, the old act provided for the payment of a disability annuity, subject to certain conditions, and the waiver of premiums. The new act provides for the waiver of premiums as before, but disability annuities are not payable and the age for waiver of premiums is limited to sixty years. This change is also in accord with modern insurance practice. The disability annuity payable under the old act reduced the value of the policy and the protection for the dependents.

Then, as to the term for applications, under the old act it was open for two years, but as I said before, it was subsequently extended. The new act is for three years from the coming of it into force or three years from the date of discharge. This makes equal protection for those discharged and those still serving; it means that the 135,000 who have been discharged can get the benefit of these provisions as well as those now serving.

The premium rates under the old act were based on an interest rate of four per cent, whereas in the new act the rate is three and one-half per cent. The slight increase in premiums results from the reduction in interest. The same mortality table has been used.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because of the reduction in interest received, the premium must be larger?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is exactly right. The rates on the whole are lower than those charged by the majority of insurance companies in Canada for non-participating insurance. The benefits under this proposed bill, which will be introduced as soon as possible—the bill is ready; I have it here—are more extensive in the case of widows of pensioners than they were under the old one. The rates are slightly lower than the standard rates. The ceiling is raised to $10,000, to be more or less comparable to the standard they have set in the republic to the south of us. On the whole we believe that this measure will be more popular than that which preceded it.

I shall go into details of the amount taken out, the number of insurance policies paid, and all the other figures when we go into committee of the whole on the bill itself. I think that for the present I have given the house a reasonable explanation, a comparative explanation as between the proposed measure and the measure we had in effect from 1920 to 1933.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is it retroactive to the point where men were discharged at the early stages of the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the records as to the number of policies taken out, the premiums paid and the amounts paid out be available before the second reading of the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. I should be glad to give them in committee in a few minutes.

Mr. NEILL: Does this call for a medical examination?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. That is the outstanding benefit of the returned soldier or veteran insurance as compared to ordinary insurance. The real benefit is that it does not call for medical examination except in very special cases. It would apply to the veterans of the old war who have enlisted in this war, but the aggregate amount must not exceed $10,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does it apply to the veterans' guard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not proposing to delay this resolution, because this is a matter which requires a good deal of study, and I hope hon. members who are returned soldiers will take a special interest in this measure. We on this side of the house have been pressing for soldier insurance for a long time. I think—indeed I am sure—that the bill is not too late, although I had hoped that it would have been introduced long ago. Similar legislation has been in effect in the United States for some considerable length of time: I do not know what the position is in Britain.

Will this apply to men who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will have the benefit of this too?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even though they did not serve outside Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

In reply to a question asked a minute ago by the hon. member for Yorkton, the number of policies issued under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act is 48,320. Total amount of insurance under the act is $109,299,500. The number of death claims received up to March 31, 1944, was 6,366. The face value of the policies in respect of these death claims was $10,088,920.81. Of the foregoing claims, 1,818, having a face value of $4,050,869.38, were settled under section 10 of the act. Section 10 applies where the dependent is awarded a pension. In addition to pensions the amount paid in settlement of the 1,818 claims was $1,794,698.95. Up to date the number of policies surrendered for cash was 14,647 and the face value of the policies was $34,591,-453.33.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What percentages of the total value were surrendered?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not worked that out, although I should be glad to do so. The cash surrender value was $5,544,603.08. Payment of premiums has been discontinued with respect to 12,982 policies of the face value of $29,785,787.07, and of these policies 958, having a face value of $2,136,-881.62, continue in effect under the standard extended term provision typical of Canadian insurance policies.

There are now in force under the various provisions of the old act the following: original contracts 17,652, the amount being $37,413,-744.82. Reduced paid up insurance, 579 policies, amount being $628,751.73; the extended term provision, 958 policies, $2,136,-881.62; disability provision, the special provision in the old act, 180 policies, value $274,574.82.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister say there are no disability provisions in this scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are disability provisions, but there is no medical examination required except in special cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the cost of administration to be paid by the taxpayers, or is it loaded in the premium?

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it is borne by the taxpayers, but I will look into that question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a point which, I think, is of some importance.

Mr. QUELCH: Am I correct in saying that all veterans after they are discharged or demobilized will be eligible to take out this insurance, no matter what their physical condition may be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Even though they may be suffering from a complaint which has been termed of preenlistment origin?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think that question would apply at all. I believe that if one has served in the present war, and is a veteran under the definition of "veteran" in this bill namely, that "veteran" means any male or female who was engaged in service during the war and who has been discharged from such service, there is no medical examination applicable. Perhaps I should not be reading the bill, but "service" means service in the naval, military or air forces of Canada by any person while in receipt of either active service rates of pay or of permanent force rates of pay.

Mr. WHITE: Does this bill apply just to veterans after they are discharged, or is there any provision to insure soldiers while they are actually in the army?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This has nothing whatever to do with in-service insurance. This is after-service insurance, post-discharge insurance, both for these 140,000 discharged up to now and those who will be discharged from now on.

Mr. WHITE: It does not in any way cover or protect anybody who is in the army?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not until he is discharged.

Mr. QUELCH: How long must a man have served before he is eligible?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think eligibility is based at all upon length of service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was consideration given to what the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has alluded to, that is insuring the lives of the men now on service while they are still in the service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a separate principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it is; but has consideration been given to that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If this was being considered it would not be under our department. Our department deals with soldiers after discharge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The bill is limited to those who have been discharged?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is quite correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has any consideration been given to the other aspect, namely of those who are still in the service? I understand that the United States do that—under the Sparkman Act; is that it?

Mr. RALSTON: No; a national insurance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under a national life scheme applicable to soldiers on service. That of course would be a very important position for this country to take, unless it was found that the burden was so heavy that it was impossible, and I would not think that would be the case. I hope consideration is being given that aspect. Of course the minister will answer, I imagine, that those who die in the service are taken care of by pension and perhaps that is the answer. I am not sufficiently well versed in the matter to know whether that is the right answer. The pensions, I imagine, are reasonably adequate; at least I hold that view myself. That may be a very good reason why this legislation, or no legislation, is applicable to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no feature of insurance of any kind whatever that has not received the most careful and sustained consideration both by the defence services and by the department of pensions. Consultations have been had with those who are expert in life insurance work and various suggestions and proposed solutions have been considered. I believe my hon. friend knows that our Canadian pension rates are higher than those in any other country. They average higher than those in the United States on a capitalization basis of from $5,000 to $6,000.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 170, to provide for the insurance of veterans by the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 162, to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have not had a chance to read this bill.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to have it suggested that I am pressing the matter. The bill is not very long, and I assumed that hon. members simply wanted to have it before them and to be sure that the French copy was ready. It has been distributed for half an hour now.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was available when the house opened.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It had not reached members at eleven o'clock. However, I will not hold it up. Before the motion is carried I see that section 1 refers to the repeal of certain sections of certain statutes. I have not had an opportunity to see what the legal effect is, and perhaps it will help to expedite matters if the parliamentary assistant will give an explanation of the bill. I was not here on the resolution stage and therefore I do not understand it. Perhaps he can give the explanation when we go into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Sections and schedule one repealed.

Mr. ABBOTT: The explanation is quite simple. The committee will recall that in his budget speech the Minister of Finance announced that schedule 1 of the War Exchange Conservation Act would be repealed, and the relevant sections relating to that schedule. Schedule 1 set out various articles, commodities and goods the import of which from other than sterling area countries was prohibited. In other words, that schedule of the War Exchange Conservation Act specifically prohibited the importation into Canada of a long list of goods from countries other than sterling area countries, and the effect of section 1 is to repeal that schedule and sections relating thereto and to remove that prohibition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there still any prohibitions on importation from other than sterling areas? Is there any limit?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not under this act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, these prohibitions under the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, and the other statutes which I assume were amending statutes, are now all lifted and there is free right of importation of these formerly prohibited goods?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The explanatory note says that the proposed amendments are in conformity with the resolution passed by the house. I have no doubt that is the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: Section 1 is the key section, and it provides for the repeal of certain sections and schedule 1, which together constitute the prohibition of imports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that we are safe in understanding that the prohibition of imports of every kind is now repealed?

Mr. ABBOTT: Under this act, yes. That is correct. There may be some prohibition of imports under other acts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Put it this way: that the prohibition contained in the act of 1940 and the act of 1940-41, which I assume is an amendment, and the schedule to the act as amended in the statutes of 1940-41, are all lifted.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Schedule two amended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of this?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a technical amendment. It is really an amended definition of what are colloquially known as artificial silk products. This provides for minor and purely technical amendments to the wording of the artificial silk items in schedule two of the war exchange conservation act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words it is a better description?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The committee will see that it is now described as synthetic textile fibres or filaments rather than by the term artificial silk, that being considered a more accurate description of this type of product. Some classes might not come within the strict definition of artificial silk.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is true of all items.

Mr. ABBOTT: That wording is substituted in all items of the customs tariff to which schedule two relates.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the general objective of section 2.

Mr. ABBOTT: To substitute the words "synthetic textile fibres or filaments" for the phrases "artificial silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres", and "artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes" wherever these appear in the tariff items listed. That is the whole purpose of the section.

Mr. LOCKHART: There has been full collaboration between the producer parties vitally interested in this change?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that we have had any representation from the producers. I am advised that this is primarily a clarifying amendment made at the suggestion of the officials of the Department of National Revenue and the tariff board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Administrative?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is administrative, yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have the producers or manufacturers who are vitally interested in this matter been made acquainted with the terms of this bill? This bill has been sprung on us very quickly. It may be of a purely technical nature, but there may be something in this bill which will vitally affect manufactured articles. I am just wondering whether or not the department has had any contact with the manufacturers or producers. I would suggest that third reading of this bill be held over for at least twenty-four hours to give interested parties an opportunity to indicate their stand in the matter. I had one representation made to me, to the effect that they had heard of something of this kind being advanced. I said that we had no bill. We had a resolution but I did not know anything about it. I do not wish to hold up the bill, but on the other hand I am not so sure that those whom it may affect have full knowledge of what it provides. The parliamentary assistant says that it is purely of a technical nature, but something may arise when it is applied to the business of those who produce these articles. Could the bill not be held over for twenty-four hours?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not believe there can be any confusion in the mind of the public, Mr. Chairman. The purposes of this bill were clearly indicated in the resolution. The main purpose is to repeal the prohibition on certain imports, and the country and the trade generally know that is to take place. So far as the technical amendment to one of the sections is concerned, there is very little in that. The items referred to are now on the free list and they will continue to be. This is merely to clarify the description of a certain type of commodity. If the hon. member would prefer to have third reading held over for twenty-four hours I am sure there is no objection. But I cannot imagine that there could be any confusion in the minds of manufacturers or of the public as to the purpose of this bill.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am not going to press for third reading being held over, but I had one inquiry as to the nature of the resolution. There seemed to be some ambiguity in the terms of the resolution; that is why one man spoke to me.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no objection to letting it stand over until to-morrow. The idea was to get it on that much farther. If my hon. friend has any objection at all and he would like to communicate with anybody—

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to see it stand over for one day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Third reading, next sitting of the house.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 163, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton): Before this bill is read the second time I think we should have a copy—

Mr. RALSTON: They have all been distributed. I went to the Clerk's table and was assured that copies of this bill had been distributed at ten minutes after eleven o'clock this morning.

Mr. BOUCHER: It is now ten minutes to one. We have had three or four bills merely thrown at us without time to concentrate on them. I have no particular objection to the second reading now, but I think we should wait until this afternoon at least, until we have had time to look at the bill and see what is in it. I know we are in a hurry to close the debates in the house and get through with our work, but we have a responsibility to analyse what is put before us. I would urge the minister to withhold second reading of this bill until hon. members have had an opportunity to go through it and discuss it.

Mr. RALSTON: We have no desire to press the matter, but I do want to make this point. I am assured by the officers of the house that this bill has been distributed. We have followed the rules. We have given notice that these bills were to be considered to-day. The bills are founded on the budget resolutions. I would hope that hon. members would cooperate as far as they can. Any point upon which clarification is required can be dealt with by the parliamentary assistant. Opportunity will be given for full discussion if we can proceed with the second reading. I ask my hon. friend if he will not assent to that method of procedure as a means of getting on rather than just simply saying: Please do not proceed with second reading at all.

Mr. BOUCHER: Far be it from me not to assent; but I must say that because a bill was actually handed to me is no reason why I should give it a cursory glance and consent to it. I know that nobody has any objection to this bill getting second reading. I shall not raise any objection myself, but we have a responsibility to check over thoroughly all measures that come before us.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to let that pass, because I submit to my hon. friend that in the discussion of the budget resolutions there was full opportunity of considering not only the principle but the details. I quite agree with my hon. friend that in regard to most legislation which is covered by very general resolutions there might be necessity for more opportunity to examine the bill, but I do not think that reason applies to bills of this kind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Canada Grain Act—

356. Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $364,557.

Mr. WRIGHT: When this matter was last under discussion, we were inquiring with respect to the new agreement concerning the government elevator at Fort William. I should like to know how long this agreement is to run. Is it for three years or five years, or what is the term?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The proposed lease is for a period of five years from August 1, 1944, and there is provision for renewing the lease for a further period of five years at the same rental and subject to the same conditions.

Mr. WRIGHT: For what period was the elevator leased previously; was it for five years?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Last time the term was six years.

Item agreed to.

National research council—

357. Salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $920,529.

Mr. KNOWLES: I support wholeheartedly, as I believe all hon. members do, the vote of this amount of money for this work. The feeling of some of us, however, is that not enough money has been provided in past years for the work of the national research council. It does extremely important work, and a number of incidents have occurred during the course of the war which emphasize the value of that work. During the war period it has been brought out also that it would have been much better, not just in relation to the war but to further progress in all lines, if the research council had been given more funds and wider latitude to carry on work in what is sometimes referred to as pure or abstract research. I feel that the tendency has been to restrict the work of the research council on the basis that it ought to be dealing with things that would immediately produce returns in terms of dollars and cents. Those of us who have any knowledge at all of how people work in the scientific world realize that some of the most outstanding developments come about when men of science are given free rein to carry on such research as their investigations may lead them to. I understand, for example, that in the matter of synthetic rubber and other synthetics, concerning which there is a great deal of pressure at the present time, these things might have been developed much sooner if in the past it had been possible to carry on this type of research. So that in the years that lie ahead I hope we will realize that we are not squandering money if we make available all the necessary equipment and funds to permit this work to be carried on by the research council.

Things have been moving along pretty quickly this morning, and we did not bring down with us all the material we might have used in these discussions, but a short time ago I secured a return setting out salaries and other particulars in connection with the research council. I have not that return before me, but my recollection is that it shows we are not paying our scientists at the research council sufficient to attract to that work the very best men it is possible to get. I should qualify that remark by saying that we have some of the best men in the country in that organization, but they are there because they are prepared to make sacrifices to engage in this work in behalf of the country. I have some further comments to make. Mr. Chairman, so that perhaps you will call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before the house for second reading is to provide for family allowances. The government's intention to introduce this measure was made known in the speech from the throne on January 27 of this year. The announcement in the speech from the throne was as follows:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

The resolution introducing the bill appeared in the Votes and Proceedings of June 20. The resolution was debated and the bill was introduced and given its first reading on July 17. The main provision of the bill is as follows:

> 3. Subject as provided in this act and in regulations, there may be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund from and after the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and forty-five, in respect of each child resident in Canada maintained by a parent, the following monthly allowance:
> (a) in the case of a child less than six years of age, five dollars per month;
> (b) in the case of a child six or more years of age but less than ten years of age, six dollars per month;
> (c) in the case of a child ten or more years of age but less than thirteen years of age, seven dollars per month;
> (d) in the case of a child thirteen or more years of age but less than sixteen years of age, eight dollars per month:

Provided that the allowance payable shall, in respect of a fifth child maintained by the parent, be reduced by one dollar and in respect of a sixth child and a seventh child respectively so maintained, by two dollars and in respect of an eighth child and each additional child respectively so maintained, by three dollars.

The house will observe that the allowances for which provision is being made are payable according to sliding scales which vary according to the ages and numbers of the children. It is obvious that as respects age, the cost of maintaining a child increases as the child grows; the amount required for food, for clothing, for accommodation in the home and later for schooling increases as the infant grows into childhood and through childhood toward maturity. On the other hand, it is also apparent that as a family increases in numbers there are many overhead costs which are not recurring. Many initial outlays in a home will serve, as time goes on, to meet the needs of younger members of the family, costs with respect to clothing, furnishings, and the like. There is much that accumulates that may be used again for younger children. To mention a single item, school books that have served for certain members of the family will continue to serve for others. I cannot say too much about these things from personal experience of recent years, but I still have a recollection of my own childhood days and some of these things were apparent at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are a young man yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite right. My hon. friend may feel I am making provision in ample time.

May I say that the principle of this bill is not new; it has been recognized in our income tax legislation and also with respect to dependents' allowances and veterans' and veterans' widows' pensions. I should like to cite exact references to the adoption of the principle of family allowances for dependent children.

The principle was recognized by the federal government in the Income War Tax Act in 1918. No allowance was made for children in the original act of 1917, but provision was made in the following year. In providing for pensions for veterans and veterans' widows, provision was made for allowances for children by order in council of September 1, 1918, and by act of parliament of September 1, 1919. In granting dependents' allowances to members of the armed forces provision for children has been made since the beginning of the present war.

Hon. members will recollect that during the last war provision for dependent children was not made by the state, dependent children being taken care of, for the most part, by the patriotic fund. That fund was established under an act of parliament. The public made subscriptions to the fund, which were supplemented from the federal treasury. However, as the years have gone by the public have come to see clearly that obligations of that kind should not be taken care of by private contributions, but should be considered to be obligations of the state. When this war broke out, the government recognized that obligation immediately and provision for dependents' allowances was made by act of parliament through the war appropriation.

The principle was also recognized in the pre-war unemployment relief, in the grants that were made by municipalities and by provinces, as supplemented by grants from the federal treasury. The government is now proposing to take a further step. The present family allowances measure extends this accepted principle to families whose income is below the income tax paying level.

At the present time a man earning $3,000, $5,000 or $10,000 a year receives what is in effect an allowance for each child through a reduction of his income tax. He is allowed to keep $108 a year for each child more than the taxpayer without children is allowed to keep. Family allowances will extend a similar benefit to those whose incomes are so low that they receive less than the full income tax allowance, and to those whose incomes are below $1,200 a year. The adoption of family allowances means the recognition as the right of children of poor parents of what is already recognized as the right of children whose parents are in more fortunate circumstances.

The principle and its wider application cannot be made too clear. Already this parliament has recognized that, with respect to families, there is an obligation upon the state to assist in the upbringing of children. This has been done in the interests of the parents and the family itself, but more particularly in the interests of the children. But, up to the present time, that obligation has been recognized only with respect to the more fortunate in our country, those who already have an income large enough to be taxable and to entitle them to exemptions according to the number of children in the family. In other words, where the need has been least it has already been recognized. The purpose of this bill is to recognize a similar obligation where the need is obviously greater than it is in the other cases.

I should perhaps say at once it is intended that both those who already benefit by the armed forces dependents' allowance, and war pensions, are to benefit by this measure. It will be appreciated by the house that where provision has already been made for dependents of the armed forces and war pensioners, that has been done because of the sacrifice which the family has had to undergo, and which nothing can, in any adequate way, compensate for. It is a special service that has been rendered, and it would be, I think, unfair that the state should not continue to recognize, as something quite apart, the service rendered by those who have given their utmost or their all to fight the battles in the defence of their country and for the defence of freedom.

May I speak at once of the provisions of the bill with respect to dependents' allowances. Family allowances are already being received by income taxpayers in the form of the $108 allowance for children. Income taxpayers who receive the full allowance of $108 per child will not benefit from the family allowance. Those who will benefit are, first, married persons with children having a total income of less than $1,200. Persons with such incomes have considerably less than the "real income" of families of men in the armed forces; secondly, married persons with children having an income above $1,200 but not high enough above that figure to make their tax equal to $108 per child. In most cases, therefore, they would still have less "real income" than the families of service men. In other words the family allowances will give to families with low incomes smaller allowances than are now received by the families of service men or by the families of income taxpayers. Since the benefits of family allowances will go almost exclusively to families with lower incomes than the familes of service men, they cannot be said to discriminate in favour of those at home, particularly as family allowances will be paid in addition to dependents' allowances. Family allowances will also give an additional sense of security to service men. On discharge, they will continue to receive allowances for their children, although the allowances will be on a smaller scale than the dependents' allowances paid while they are on active service.

A word now as to the relationship of family allowances under the act to allowances for children of pensioners. The income, including income in kind, of married service men would place them in the income tax paying category if they were subject to tax. Pensioners, on the other hand, do not, in most cases, receive pensions large enough to bring them up to the civilian income tax paying level. In other words, pensioners without outside income generally fall into the income group that family allowances are designed to benefit. This is true even if the pension allowance for children is added, except perhaps in the case of large families. Consequently there is every reason for paying such pensioners family allowances in addition to the allowance made for children in the pension. In a sense pensioners with enough outside income to pay income tax already receive two allowances for their children, one in the pension, and the other the income tax allowance for children. They, like all income taxpayers, would have to offset the family allowance against the income tax allowance for children. In other words, the payment of the family allowance to pensioners would benefit only pensioners whose incomes were too low to be taxable or who, if their incomes are taxable, do not now receive the full $108 tax allowance.

In order to bring home to hon. members the national significance of this measure I should like to give to the house a brief statistical picture of the problem of family maintenance, by showing the proportion of families who benefit from income tax allowances and the distribution of children in the total population.

The number of children in Canada under sixteen years of age is estimated at approximately 3,500,000. The number of families of such children is estimated at approximately 1,500,000. Over half of these families benefit in whole or in part from income tax allowances for children. The families with the lowest incomes do not benefit from income tax allowance.

Of families it is estimated that one-third, or about 500,000, receive the full income tax allowance; one-third receive a partial benefit; and one-third receive nothing. Well over half the children get little or no benefit from the income tax allowance, and they belong to the families where the need is greatest. It is probable that there are considerably more children in the low income third of Canadian families than in the middle group, which receives partial benefit under the income tax, and that this group of families contains more children in turn than the high income third which draws full benefit.

I draw attention particularly to the following statement. According to the 1941 census, of the gainfully employed, 48 per cent are single; 39 per cent of the married or widowed have no children under sixteen; and 40 per cent of those with children under sixteen have only one child. What this means is that 84 per cent of the children in Canada under sixteen are dependent upon only 19 per cent of the gainfully employed. In other words, the major burden of raising the next generation and perpetuating the Canadian nation falls on less than one-fifth of our working population.

Next to defending our country from external foes, this one-fifth of our working population are performing the greatest of all national services by ensuring the survival of the nation. It is only fair that the financial burden of this national service should be shared by all.

It has always been a part of the policy of the party to which I belong to do as much as possible to further equality of opportunity. We all realize that, while it may be said that men are born free and equal, nevertheless they are far from being equal in their capacities; and in many ways they are not really free. But what reformers of all ages have sought to effect has been greater equality of opportunity so that, generally speaking, whatever may be the handicaps of those who are born into life's struggles, they may have as much in the way of opportunity as possible.

The figures that I have just given to the house will surely make it apparent that, among the working population of our country having large families, there is not, so far as the parents are concerned or so far as the children are concerned, anything approaching equality of opportunity in the battle of life. We have grown so accustomed to these differences in class and in opportunity, grown so accustomed to differences in many directions, that we have come to take too many of these things for granted, as if they were something that should be perpetuated instead of changed. But the new order of things is going to take very little for granted; it is going to look into the heart of existing situations and discover where the fault lies. I submit that, when we realize that, of those who are gainfully occupied, 48 per cent are single, 39 per cent of the married or widowed have no children under sixteen, and 40 per cent of those with children under sixteen have only one child, if there is to be anything approaching equality of opportunity in the battle of life, certainly, for those who have families, who are carrying on the work of the world and trying to raise their families at the same time, there is something needed in the way of recognition of an obligation on the part of the state. As I have pointed out, 84 per cent of the children in Canada under sixteen are dependent upon only 19 per cent of the gainfully employed!

What opportunity have the children of families in humble circumstances with the whole of the battle of life ahead of them where you have differences of this kind existing? It is part of the business of the state to seek to help remove those differences and to bring about as close an approach as possible to equality of opportunity.

I know it will be said, at once, that if it had not been for the struggle of life which so many men have gone through, they would never have amounted to anything; that those of us who have been successful and prosperous have something in ourselves which is perhaps more worth while than the qualities found in others, that we have succeeded because of some inherent quality, that our success is due to our own efforts. Far be it from me to decry any achievement by way of struggle. I believe as strongly as any man that strength is developed by struggle. There is no doubt in the world that many of the ablest men we have to-day would never have come to the fore, but for their own struggles and those of their parents before them. But I wish also to draw attention to this fact, that that statement takes no account of the thousands upon thousands who have perished in the course of or because of the early struggle of life, of the many that, from malnutrition, from poor housing, from insufficient clothing, from other causes which have resulted from circumstances that they themselves or their parents before them in no way were responsible for, have had to go through life with health more or less impaired, without having had opportunities for the development of their physical, their mental, or—for that matter—their spiritual beings, but have had to struggle on as best they could from year to year in the battle of life.

The purpose of this measure is to try to help to remove existing injustices of the kind in so far as the state is justified in taking the necessary steps to that end. The measure has this further to be said on its behalf, that it is in the general interest rather than in the interest of any particular class. What most of us forget is that, more and more, we are all coming to be dependent on each other, that no man liveth to himself, that no community liveth to itself, that no nation liveth to itself, that we are members one of another, and that, if any part of the community suffers because of subnormal conditions, sooner or later other parts of the same community will suffer likewise. You cannot have one section of the nation undernourished, ill-clothed and unequal to its daily tasks, and not have the rest of the nation sooner or later suffer as a consequence.

This measure proceeds on the assumption that children are an asset to the state and that, in considering the resources of the state, human resources are of much more importance than material resources. We talk a good deal about the conservation of natural resources. We have in the past devoted most of our time to a consideration of how the natural resources of the country may be conserved and developed. We have our scientific departments for industrial research in order that we may develop industry in ways which will enable us to compete successfully with other nations, and it matters not whether the purpose is the production of munitions of war or is related to other kinds of production. We recognize that it is desirable to conserve material resources and to develop them as largely as possible.

Come to other resources of the country. We have research departments to study the diseases of animals; we have departments of the government concerned largely with the conservation of our agricultural resources and their development, and we rightly regard this as an essential activity of government. Take the plant life of the country. Much thought goes into research on matters which relate to diseases of plants and means of combatting them. We seek to preserve the health of plants; we study the means of nourishing them and adapting them to varying conditions. It is only recently, however, that the world seems to have wakened up to the realization that, of all resources, human resources are the most important, and that, if scientific research, conservation and development are justified in these other branches of the national economy, so, too, they are in relation to human life.

This measure is intended to emphasize this truth, that what the nation needs above everything else if it is to maintain itself and strengthen itself is to have a healthy, strong and vigorous population, not a population any percentage of which may be bearing the permanent marks of malnutrition, or of the lack of other forms of necessary care. We need a strong, healthy and intelligent citizenry. If the war has shown one thing more than another, it has borne out the importance of a revitalized citizenry. I do not wish to emphasize too strongly some of the things the war has revealed, but there is one which it is important to bring to the attention of the house. It has already been mentioned. I refer to the number of rejections in the army.

I have in my hand a statement which I requested from the Department of National Defence of the percentages of rejections among those presenting themselves for enlistment for general service and those reporting under the N.R.M.A. for military training. These percentages are based on the figures of intake and rejections as reported by the military districts in daily and weekly telegrams. They do not agree exactly with final tabulations but are sufficiently accurate for the present purpose. I am sorry they are only for two periods, but they are sufficient in that connection to give an adequate illustration. In the six months from April to September, 1942, in all the military districts in Canada, 31·8 per cent were rejected of those who had enlisted for general service, and 21·1 per cent of those who had been called up under the N.R.M.A. In other words, 27·6 per cent of the numbers were rejected as being unequal to the tasks which participation in war would have involved. For the six months from January to June, 1944, of those who had been enlisted for general service 39·3 per cent were rejected, and of those called up under the N.R.M.A. 65·6 per cent. The combined rejections amounted to 52·4 per cent.

I have been asking myself, what is the explanation of this? I believe we find the explanation will be found in the figures I have already given the house in regard to the large proportion of the population of this country, belonging to larger families where they have not had, in many cases, the same opportunities for nourishment, care and development that have been afforded those in smaller families. The more the subject is studied, the more, I believe, that truth will be brought out.

The government, at different times, has set out its post-war policy. I should like to give this measure its true place by pointing out that it is a part of the government's post-war policy of reconstruction in the large sense of the word. In making provision for the post-war period, the government gave its first attention to the all-important question of demobilization and reestablishment of those in the armed forces. There has been created at this session of parliament a Department of Veterans' Affairs which will give special care to all that pertains to the work of demobilization and reestablishment. Another department was created a little later on, the Department of Reconstruction. That department will have to do more particularly with those aspects of our national economy which relate to the transition back from a state of war to a state of peace, in which the industries of the country will be transformed to meet peacetime needs for consumption and employment. Then there are as a part of government post-war policy additional measures of social security to meet the hazards that rise in social life and in industry. The purpose is to give special attention to human welfare and health. Within the last twenty-four hours, a bill was assented to in this parliament related to national health and welfare. Under this new department of government, special attention will be given to all those questions that relate to social and economic hazards. The measure before the house at the moment will come for administration under the Department of National Health and Welfare. In other words, we have as a part of the government's reconstruction policy three broad divisions: one related to demobilization and reestablishment; another to reconstruction, dealing with the economic aspects thereof, particularly employment; and a third dealing with human well-being and health.

This measure to provide family allowances relates immediately to all three. With respect to demobilization and reestablishment I venture to say that one of the acts of this parliament which will be most welcome to the veterans of the war will be the one which this house is considering to-day, a measure which makes provision for the children of all families in a manner that helps to safeguard their economic and social needs. In regard to reconstruction, dealing with the matter in its physical aspects as it relates to production and employment, the expenditure of the money paid out for family allowances will create a demand for goods and, thereby, a demand for labour for the production of those things that are in daily use in all parts of the country. The importance of the stimulus to employment cannot, I think, be too greatly emphasized. The one supreme object of all our work of reconstruction is to prevent the possibility of lack of employment by seeing that we have maximum production and, as a consequence, a large national income in this country. The money that will be voted for the purposes of the bill will find its way into a demand for commodities or services that are part of the essentials of life, and as such will create employment on a vast scale and help to maintain employment at times when there might otherwise be difficulty in having it maintained. In other words, this measure should prove an instrument that will help to prevent anything like the depressions that have followed in previous periods in the wake of war. In addition, it will of course play an all-important part in furthering the well-being and welfare of the citizens of the country.

It might as well be recognized that, among other things, the war has brought to the fore very strongly the injustices that exist in human society and has compelled men and women to think deeply on the social problems of life and the causes of those injustices, and has made them feel that we must have a new order. That there is a changing order emerging in the world as a consequence of the war, is more or less obvious; but when we talk about demanding a new order of things either we mean what we say or we do not. If we mean what we say we will see that the new order places its emphasis on life rather than upon wealth. The new order will place its emphasis on human well-being rather than on material possessions, and we cannot, I think, too soon appreciate the shift in emphasis that is taking place and will continue to take place to a greater extent as the years go by. This will be particularly true when the men who have been serving their country overseas at the risk of their lives return to look for new and better conditions.

The new order seeks to shift the emphasis from the sacredness of possession to the sacredness of life; to weigh against each other the relative values of personality and its rights, and property and its rights; to compare standards of living with standards of trade; and to contrast human resources with material resources. It seeks to recognize industry as a public service and to divert attention from individual self-interest to community well-being. It seeks to make clear the interdependence of health and efficiency on the industrial economy and social welfare, and the inevitable bearing of existing conditions upon posterity and progress. This is where the emphasis from now on is going to be given more and more in all matters that are discussed in democratic assemblies.

Some are asking, why is it that this measure comes forward at this time? Why were not all these measures of social security thought of years ago? One might as well ask why, when the British North America Act was being considered, some provision was not made in the act at that time for old age pensions, unemployment insurance and these many other social measures? The answer is very simple. Conditions were very different in Canada in 1867 from what they are in 1944. Conditions were very different in all parts of the world a hundred years ago, fifty years ago, twenty-five years ago, from what they are to-day. The world has been shrinking. Not merely nations but continents have been drawn into competition with each other in a manner that was never even dreamt of a few decades ago. The regime of hand tools where competition took place as between individuals in their own particular homes and crafts has given place to the regime of machines where competition is not as between human beings and their skills but as between what huge investments of capital internationally combined are able to effect in the competition between different countries. All this has brought about an entirely different social and industrial order, and a social order which is now crying out for remedy of the injustices that have been created as a part of it.

Let me say this at once: I do not wish to be understood in what I am saying as inveighing for a moment or in any way against one class or another. I am not speaking in the interests of labour as against the interests of capital. I am speaking in the interests of both. The conditions which confront the world to-day make it impossible for employers any more than for employees in any one country to avoid periods of depression, to avoid financial crises, to avoid the consequences of drought in one part of the world or famine in another part and the many causes which contribute to the closing down of industries. These things are as much a peril to the employing class as they are to their employees—not as much, no, I should not say that, but they are a peril to both. Capital, however, can wait; labour cannot wait. Capital can find other means of investment; labour cannot. Labour to-day cannot change quickly from one occupation to another; capital is mobile; labour is not mobile to-day. And when I speak of labour I speak of it in the broad sense of the word as including all classes of labour, whether it belongs to industries in the cities or is employed in the country. In other words, our most difficult problems are human problems; they have become world problems, and they have to be dealt with in a different way to-day from the way they have been in any prior period of the history of the world.

If we are going to save degradation of the standard of life we have to fortify the position of the industrial classes through the agency of the state by measures such as the one that is being brought before the house to-day. May I point out that, in the speech from the throne of last year, the government drew attention to the fact that it was essential to-day to have what is known as a minimum standard of life, a minimum standard of human welfare and of social security, not for one class only but for all classes. To-day with the world economy what it has become we can no longer afford to talk in terms of classes; we have to think in terms of our common humanity and our common obligations to each other, and the necessity of caring for the well-being of all if the well-being of each is to be preserved. Hence I say that a minimum standard of life, something that will secure to all, at least enough to live on and for heads of families enough to bring up a family on, under decent conditions, is essential if there is not to be developed much that is bad in social conditions.

This house has been discussing the clearance of slums. What is it that creates slums? Slums are created by members of families crowding into certain areas, areas that are the least desirable in which people should live. Why do families crowd there? They crowd there because those are the districts where the rents are lowest. It is only in such parts that a good many of those who have large families can hope to be able to find the rent small enough that they can pay it, in order to have a roof over their heads. Well, if we are going to clear the slums we shall have to make some provision whereby the condition will not continue to exist, in which men, heads of families, who are willing to work, ready to work and do work, do not have enough income to bring up a family. And that is the position to-day with respect to large numbers of the people in this country as well as in other countries, perhaps less in this country, but certainly existing here as well as in others. If, in some way, means can be found to see that the worker who has a family, if he is willing to work, will be able to get sufficient to bring up his family in a decent way, then we can help to solve the slum problem and we will help at the same time to solve one aspect of the housing problem. To-day you find, from all quarters, appeals to the federal government to supplement private investment by government grants and government subsidies for the purpose of providing housing. We cannot escape it. We are making provision for that very thing in this parliament at this time. Why are we doing so? We are doing it because we have a large number of families, whose heads at the rate of remuneration they are paid, cannot make enough money to secure the adequate housing they need for their families.

Money paid out in family allowances will go toward helping to secure better homes for the people. The persons who receive this money will be the first to think of how they can use it to the best advantage of their families.

And just here may I say a word at once about what I know is in the minds of a great many people. It will be said, Oh, yes, it is all right to help those who are willing to help themselves, but this money in large part is going to people who will not know how to use it, who will waste it, who will spend the money on pleasure, possibly spend it on drink. Well, may I point out in the first place, that any test that is a test should be applied to all classes in society. And I would ask where, any more, are the statistics which prove that money possessed by those in humble circumstances is more largely spent on drink and pleasure and on illicit ways of living than is the case among those who already have so much money that they do not know what to do with it? I resent very strongly in the name of the humble poor any kind of a challenge—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh at the mention of the words "humble poor" if they desire to do so.

Mr. McGREGOR: Why don't you bring it in now and not wait for another year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a very bright interruption. I have already answered that question but my hon. friend was asleep. He has only just wakened up. It was only when I began to say a word about the humble poor and their circumstances that hon. gentlemen opposite began to hoot and to laugh. That roused him. I tell them, and I tell them quite frankly—I understand this measure is going to be challenged—that if the basis of challenge is going to be on the question of how money is used by people in humble circumstances, as against how money is used by those who are fortunate enough to have exemptions on their income tax as allowances for children we shall have it out to a finish on that very subject.

There is no instinct of man or beast stronger than the parental instinct. All nature tells us that animal life seeks to cherish and protect its own. Nothing is truer of human beings than that mothers and fathers think first of their children and how they can give their children opportunities in life better than they themselves have had. In support of what I have just said may I point to the motive that has brought to this country a large proportion of those who have come from other lands. They have nearly all come not so much because they wished merely to better their own conditions but in order that their children might have a better chance in life than they have had. They have been, most of them, in very humble circumstances, but they have been pleased to come to a land where there was opportunity to give their children chances they themselves never had. Many of them came from the countries of Europe to get away from the perpetual fear of war. Many of them have come from the British isles to get away from class distinctions, and the bar to improved conditions that so often goes with them. A great many have had in their breasts something of the sentiment cherished so strongly by Robert Burns when he wrote "a man's a man for a' that." It ill becomes anyone in this day to question how people, simply because they are in humble circumstances, are likely to discharge the greatest responsibility of their lives, namely that of looking after their own children. We are told, "Oh, we want to look after the children, but we would like to do it some other way." In other words, they would like to continue the old-fashioned method of seeing that something is done for others rather than permitting others to do things for themselves. That is a paternalistic attitude which is also contrary to the spirit of the present time. It savours of charity, and charity has become a nauseating thing to many who have had to submit to it in order to eke out an existence. The new order is not going to have things done as charity. What is to be done will be done as a matter of right. There will always be a place for charity; there will always be an opportunity and the necessity to help one's neighbour, but when it comes to these great social questions under a condition of society which dooms large numbers of people to a lifetime of penury, at the same time enabling others vastly to increase their incomes, then a searching analysis of the causes of differences becomes necessary.

Everyone knows that conditions of society to-day are such as to permit those who already have great possessions to become possessors of much more, while they serve to take away from those who have very little even that which they have. I have heard men boast about the positions they have achieved in industry and affairs. They may be justified in so doing in so far as what they have obtained has been the result of their own exceptional abilities, but I would ask all such how any man to-day could achieve anything in the way of great increase of wealth were it not for what the state itself does to make that possible. The state, by maintaining law and order, by its assistance to invention, by the facilities it provides in the way of transportation, communication, markets; by the community values it creates, the unearned increments it makes possible, all these and much more tend to help those who already possess much to acquire more, and at the same time take away something of what is possessed in very small measure by other members of society. More and more it is being recognized that present conditions enable some persons to make great fortunes and prevent others from gaining even a fair livelihood. I have in mind some of the large industries, not only of this country but of all countries. One sees the head of one of our great industries, and the world looks up to him as one who has accomplished a great deal. But what could any individual accomplish in any industry if it were not for the men and women working in that industry? In employing men and women to work in industry to-day, where is the choice oftenest made in the first instance? As the figures I have mentioned show, in large part the choice is made from those who are single and without obligations. Next it is made very largely from those who have small family obligations. Thus men who have large families find it harder than others to obtain employment, and that being so their position becomes still more difficult. That condition requires to be remedied along the lines that research makes clear as desirable.

A good deal is being said at the present time about the Atlantic charter. We hear gentlemen blithely stating that from now on we must have freedom from fear and freedom from want. Are we in earnest about that? Has this House of Commons made up its mind that it is going to subscribe to the provisions of the Atlantic charter, and that we will do what we can to bring about freedom from want and freedom from fear? If so, I ask, where is the greatest fear to be found in this country to-day, apart from the fear of war? It is to be found in those families where there are several children and not enough in the home to provide for them. It is to be found in the minds of parents, who are worried as to how they are to provide for these little people, and it is to be found in the minds of the children themselves, as to how they are to fare in the battle of life. If we are in earnest about getting rid of fear and want we will begin by searching out first where want exists, and ascertaining its cause. If it is want that has been brought about through no fault of the individual himself, but because of an existing industrial system which the state permits to exist, then that want should be met in some way by the agency of the state itself.

I might take a moment to say a further word about the advantages of this measure. I have mentioned already what it may do in the way of improving nutrition. That is where the need is greatest; that is the first purpose for which the money that will go into the different homes will be used. And if it is used in a proper way, as I believe it will be, the effect upon the nation itself will be increasingly great as the years go by. Properly nourished families do not add to the drain upon the treasury which comes through unemployment, sickness and disease. Properly nourished children become active, productive members of society, and there is no doubt that this is the only way in which a strong and healthy citizenry can be built up. It is in the early years of life that the seeds of later decay are sown or avoided; and whatever is done in the way of encouraging the proper development of children will save a very great deal of trouble later on, and will indeed add to the strength of the nation.

I have already touched upon the question of full employment. If some such provision as family allowances affords is not made, and there should be periods when men are out of employment, the state will have to furnish employment in some way. We have gone through the experience of having the state furnish employment in times of unemployment; we have gone through the experience of trying to provide public works on an extensive scale to furnish employment; we have gone through the experience of the dole, of having to hand out money from the treasury to keep people alive and to avoid serious unrest. We know what that kind of policy provokes in the way of resentment in the breasts of the people who have to endure that sort of thing. Under a system of provision for families to meet legitimate existing need we are moving in the direction in which that kind of situation should be hereafter avoided. The fundamental basis for children's allowances is that the wage system takes no account of the family status of the wage-earner, and that over a considerable sector of Canadian industry the wages being paid are not sufficient to give a worker with a family an income which will keep that family in health and decency according to any reasonable current standard. The family income must somehow be supplemented, or alternatively a substantial portion of the population must be condemned to extreme poverty and its inevitable consequences in disease and crime, illiteracy, inefficiency and other forms of social degeneration. Allowances paid for all children, it is believed, afford the simplest, wisest and cheapest way of providing the supplementary family income. I have heard it said that some labour leaders are opposed to this measure, that they do not wish any substitute for higher wages, that they fear that that may be the effect of family allowances. Family allowances have never been intended as a substitute for higher wages nor will they serve as such. Family allowances will create a demand for commodities of all kinds that are being produced or manufactured at home. Through creating a demand for commodities, they will create a demand for labour which, if it has any effect at all, will tend to send up wages rather than send them down. That has been the experience in countries where family allowances have been part of the economy.

Mr. HOMUTH: What countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Australia, New Zealand; I could name a dozen in Europe.

Mr. HOMUTH: Most of them have abandoned it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong, they have not. I can give fuller particulars a little later on. At any rate I challenge my hon. friend to deny what I have just said as to the effect of the expenditure of money by families, as to whether that of itself will not create a demand for commodities.

Mr. HOMUTH: I certainly will deny that it will give higher wages.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We in this country depend very largely on foreign markets. We are doing all we possibly can to help to secure foreign markets when the war is over. But we cannot tell how successful we may be. There are many in this country who put strong emphasis on the domestic market. For my part, I put emphasis on both. I think we should have as large a foreign market and as large a domestic market as it is possible to have. To the advocates of a domestic market I would point out that practically all the money that will be spent on family allowances will be spent to purchase commodities that are produced or manufactured in our country.

We must also consider the effect of this measure upon life in the rural communities. Family allowances will provide equal benefit to farm families and help to make possible a closer approach to equal opportunities for farm children. For the most part our social services have come to be centred in the urban communities, in our towns and cities. So far as social services generally are concerned the rural parts have been left very much to shift for themselves. We know that the position in many rural homes is very difficult. Children used to be considered an asset by their parents through being able to help with work in different ways, but to-day a large number of children may come to be more or less of a financial liability because of changed conditions. This is particularly so in cities. But certain it is that the balance has been against the rural communities with respect to social services, welfare, education and the like. Expenditures under family allowances will be used by the people in the rural areas to help to improve the health and the education of their children, help to gain for them more comfortable and sanitary homes and many opportunities that they otherwise would not have. Especially will this be so in poorer agricultural districts, and in years of poor crop and crop failure. Combined with the floor under farm prices, family allowances will give real social security to rural Canada for the first time in our history.

Mutual aid is a principle that this parliament has accepted, and accepted in a large and splendid way. We have voted something like two billion dollars for purposes of mutual aid as between nations. As soon as the war is over I think we should apply more and more the principle of mutual aid to meeting the needs that arise within our own country. The doctrine of mutual aid is the antithesis of the doctrine of force. Mutual aid is a way of bringing about results by considering other persons perhaps a little more than one considers one's self. This measure is based on the mutual aid principle. Family allowances are a form of mutual aid. We are recognizing that the weak may be weaker unless they are assisted by the strong, that instead of having our social and industrial organization such that the weak are serving the interests of the strong to the exclusion very often of their own interests, we will have the strong assisting to bear the burdens of the weak. I should perhaps point out that the moneys used for purposes of mutual aid to help win the war, have enabled Canada to maintain total employment, fulfil her obligations of a total war effort, and thereby give employment to large numbers of persons who in turn on receipt of wages have created still further demands.

This brings me to the question of the cost. Some hon. members will say that this measure is going to cost a lot of money. I might ask the house how much this war is costing, how much we are actually spending each day for the war. I doubt very much if the cost of this measure will bear comparison with expenditure on the war as it is being incurred, and so largely met, by this country to-day. It is about two week's expenditure, in fact. If it is going to help to carry the country safely through the period of readjustment and for years to come serve to avoid a large measure of unrest that otherwise will be inevitable, if in its place it is going to bring contentment and at the same time help to develop a strong and vigorous nation, I think we will be able to count the cost as not being in any way excessive.

As I mentioned the other day, the estimate that has been given by the Department of Finance through the bureau of statistics is that the total outlay will be $250,000,000 per year. Of that amount, it is estimated that there will be recovered out of the corresponding reduction of present income tax allowances between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 based on the present rates. That would bring the cost down to approximately $200,000,000. But I venture to say that a large proportion of that cost will be redeemed and recovered in the more buoyant revenues resulting from increased employment. That will be one of the immediate effects, and the results will be more marked over a period of years if our citizenry is improved as a result.

I shall not say more at the moment. Possibly hon. gentlemen opposite will raise some points and I shall have the opportunity, along with others, to deal with them at the close.

In conclusion I wish to say a word about one charge that has been brought against the government arising out of the introduction of this measure. It has been described as being "legal bribery". I do not know what legal bribery means. It seems to me to be a contradiction in terms. Bribery is illegal, it is a crime. This measure however has been described as being in the nature of bribery. I wish the leader who made that statement in the name of his party were on the floor of this house at the moment.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are others who will answer for him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says that he will answer for him?

Mr. HOMUTH: I said that there are others who will answer for him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If any one who answers for him repeats the statement he has made, that this is a measure of bribery, I shall immediately ask Mr. Speaker to ask him to withdraw the statement and he will be obliged to withdraw it. As my hon. friend well knows, a statement of the kind cannot be made on the floor of this house or if made would have to be withdrawn. Anyone who purports to be taking a responsible part in the political affairs of this country should not make a statement outside the house that he would not dare to make in the house.

Anyone who claims that the motive behind this measure is bribery in any form whatever, especially after mention of the measure in the speech from the throne, first of all reflects upon every hon. member of this house—that I wish to have clearly understood. Such an accusation is an insult to the intelligence of the electorate. It reflects more upon the integrity of Canadian citizens. When it is suggested that the people of Canada will be governed in their appreciation of the laws of this country by bribes offered to them, a pretty serious charge is being made and one I believe that will be deeply resented by the people of Canada.

I resent that charge very strongly, and in a personal way. I have given my life, the greater part of it, to seeking to improve the conditions of the people of this country. When I left the university of Toronto, fifty years ago, instead of following the profession of law, which my father was anxious I should, I took up post-graduate studies of social problems because I was especially interested in the conditions of the people and hoped to be able to serve them in my day by an understanding of their problems. I shall not detail the steps I took to further my studies, but I would point out that they were all in the direction of seeing what could be done to improve conditions that were injurious to the well-being of the great masses of the people.

When I gave up the idea of an academic career and came to Ottawa in 1900 to start a Department of Labour in Canada, I was not seeking to bribe the Canadian people. I was seeking to establish an agency of government which through the years would tell more and more for the betterment of the conditions of the people of Canada. When after eight years spent in building up a Department of Labour and seeking to further social legislation through that department, I resigned as its permanent head to contest a Conservative riding and to enter into parliament, I was not taking up social questions with a view to finding a way into parliament. I was seeking to get into parliament in order that my voice might be heard in parliament in regard to social problems and conditions which I wished to see improved. My voice in this parliament, as hon. members know who were here from 1908 to 1911, was raised as opportunity presented itself on behalf of improving the conditions of the people. I need only mention anti-sweating legislation to indicate the very first step I had taken to better conditions of the working people and prevent men from having to work for wages inadequate to enable them to bring up and care for their families.

When I was defeated in 1911 and out of parliament for a time, did I give up my interest in social questions and in the well-being of the people? I have in my hand a book of which I am proud, Industry and Humanity. The book is a study in the principles underlying industrial reconstruction. The book was written at intervals in that period when I was not in parliament but was engaged on industrial research and in furthering maximum production in war industries. It was written in the hope that there might be found within its pages a statement of principles which, if applied after the war, might help to remove the causes of wars and be a means of improving the conditions of the people. The principles which parliament has been applying in this very session, and in preceding sessions in the social legislation that has been brought down are all in accord with what is set out in that volume. If hon. members would read a chapter entitled "Principles Underlying Health" they will find the advocacy of a national minimum standard of life, the advocacy of social security, the advocacy of the very measure we are introducing in parliament at this time.

I have been in parliament now for twenty-eight years. Shortly after I came back into parliament nearly twenty-five years ago, almost the first measure, if I recollect aright, in which I interested myself was one to see that the pension rights of which men working on the railways of this country had been deprived were restored to them, though it took a period of from ten to twelve years to bring that about. From that time I have sought whereever opportunity offered to further one social measure after another. I call to witness the measures of the old age pension, unemployment insurance, and a great number of other social measures now upon our statutes.

I mention these things in order to make clear that my interest in these matters has not been in the way of seeking to bribe the people of this country. The same statements however I heard made in regard to the very measures I have just mentioned, the measures related to old age pensions and unemployment insurance. I think the sooner that that term bribery as applied to social legislation is dropped, the better it will be for all concerned.

Having given the greater part of my life to an honest endeavour to improve the lot of my fellow men in Canada, I do not propose now that I am in my seventieth year to begin a career of bribery to further this end. I have gained the confidence I have from the people of this country, not from any thought in their minds that I was seeking to bribe them in measures for which I have always stood. I have gained the support of the people of this country in larger measure than any other man in the public life of Canada in this past quarter of a century. I have remained in public life and gained the confidence of the people of Canada because they knew that I was standing for principles and polices in which I believed, and that I would stand and fight for them at every opportunity that presented itself. I have fought for measures of social security and national well-being in season and out of season, in parliament and out of parliament, in this country and in other countries. I have fought for them wherever the opportunity presented itself, and win or lose in the future, I intend to fight for them to the end of my days. When that moment comes there will not be any thought of bribery associated with my name in this country, if I can leave nothing else to my fellow men, I will at least leave to my party and to my country an honourable name.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the second reading of this measure I desire to make an observation or two based upon some of the remarks which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made in the latter part of his speech this afternoon. I would like to say to him and to the house that neither he nor any other man in this house can properly lay claim to a monopoly of the finer feelings which the Prime Minister expressed, or the social philosophy which I fancy is developed very highly in the minds of the membership of this house about which he generalized so freely this afternoon. These are not held by the Prime Minister alone; neither is honesty of purpose a monopoly of the Prime Minister. There is not one hon. member but who desires to leave this house with a name as honored and honourable as that of the Prime Minister.

I purposely let the Prime Minister conclude his remarks without a single interruption; in this connection he has always shown great courtesy to me, and I ask his party to follow his example in this, as I know that in other things they slavishly follow it.

The Prime Minister made some remarks with reference to the national leader of our party, though he did not mention him by name. This is not the first occasion upon which he has attempted to pick a quarrel with the leader of the Progressive Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: It is hard to get at him.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: If hon. members across the way want a rough-and-tumble fight, I have no objection, but I thought we were trying this afternoon to discuss a matter of grave national importance, and it is my desire to deal with the subject in the appropriate way. But every time the Prime Minister hears or thinks of John Bracken his blood pressure immediately rises. Perhaps it is good for his health that John Bracken is not in this house, because I am afraid that if our leader were closer to him the Prime Minister would suffer a collapse. Time after time he has talked about John Bracken taking a seat in the House of Commons; but from the information I get, which comes direct from the Province of Saskatchewan and from no less a person than the premier of that province, yesterday, the problem is not now how John Bracken is to get a seat in this chamber, but how the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada who sits right here is to retain the seat he has.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He has a seat here now; Bracken has not.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not agree with the premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has done a great deal of very favourable advertising for the leader of our party, and for that we are extremely grateful. I hope that he will not desist from these tactics in the days that lie ahead. It is only another evidence, of course, of the growing strength of the leader of our party that the Prime Minister of Canada is paying so much attention to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is afraid—

Mr. GRAYDON: Now I know I have struck a tender spot, but I think the Prime Minister may as well sit down. Of course if he is making a point of order I am prepared to give place to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is just this—

Mr. GRAYDON: But if it is an interruption, I will ask the Prime Minister to take his seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a point of order. I would ask his honour the Speaker in what connection my hon. friend has the right to bring in a question of Saskatchewan elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he is trying to bring Saskatchewan to the fore in this discussion, I would ask him to look at what happened in Saskatchewan to his party in the recent election.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I knew that that reference would bring the Prime Minister to his feet. There is, I suppose, no touchier point I could have raised this afternoon.

Turning to subjects which may not be quite so controversial, I notice that when he made reference to the return of the armed forces he talked about this bill as one which would give them a great lift and a better deal. I hope he did not mean that what we intend to do for the armed forces for their rehabilitation in this country is to give them jobs which are below the income tax level in Canada. That is what this bill actually calls for.

More than that, when the Prime Minister talks about the little man and the small income earner in Canada, we must not forget that what he has provided in this bill is help for children who are under the age of sixteen, while in the higher income brackets of this country allowance is made for children under the age of eighteen, and in some instances, twenty-one. So when my hon. friend and colleague here interrupted the Prime Minister to ask him why he did not bring this bill into operation earlier than July 1, 1945, the Prime Minister at that stage set himself up as the political pugilist for the poor, as I understood from his language. Naturally my hon. friend, who has perhaps had a closer contact with the poor of Canada than almost any other man in the House of Commons, for he came up from that class himself, smiled at the Prime Minister, not because of the reference to the humble poor, but because of the man who is setting himself up as the monopolistic champion of that class of Canadian citizens.

I wish now to say one other word with respect to the position of the humble poor of whom the Prime Minister spoke. The right hon. gentleman said in his remarks that of course the poor people, those in the lower income groups, ought to know how to spend their money just as well as those in the upper groups. In fact he said, I believe, that they might be a little more capable of spending their money than those who were financially better off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have to be more careful.

Mr. GRAYDON: With that I am in perfect agreement. Nobody will hear me make any statement or raise any argument such as was anticipated by the Prime Minister. As a matter of fact the difficulty I see with the Prime Minister's argument is this, that although he speaks very appealingly on the subject of the people being able to look after themselves, he has included in this very bill a section which states as follows:

5. The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving the same exclusively towards the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child—

Then comes the joker—and it is particularly a joker in view of the words used by the Prime Minister when he was championing the humble poor a few minutes ago:

—and, if the minister or such officer as is authorized by regulations in that behalf is satisfied that the allowance is not being so applied, payment thereof shall be discontinued or made to some other person or agency.

I ask the Prime Minister, if this is to be done with people who are receiving less than $1,200 a year, why is it not applied to those he talked of who are above the $1,200 level and are getting allowances on income tax? That of course is completely destructive of the argument which the Prime Minister now proposes.

Now I want to make a few observations with respect to the measure itself. Let me make this clear at the very outset of my remarks. It will summarize our position as a party with respect to this measure.

I wonder if I may have some order in the house. I have continually had to speak to the Minister of Pensions and National Health; I have done it always in a very friendly manner, but may I say to him that I do not want to have to call him any more "the official interrupter". I should like to see that term banished from the records of the house, and he can help me in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, we support wholeheartedly and without reservation the purpose and object of this bill, namely, the raising of the standard of family life in the lower income groups and the strengthening of all family life in this country, but we are convinced that this bill in its present form cannot achieve that purpose and object. We shall give our reasons for such belief. We propose to offer another and better way of achieving that purpose and object. In simple language, there is where our party stands.

That there are breadwinners in Canada whose wages and income total less than $1,200 a year reveals a condition of which this nation can scarcely be proud. Yet there are said to be no less than 750,000 families whose total yearly returns fail to reach that figure. Such a condition existing at a stage of our national development where work is easy to get and the man-power situation is tight calls for a new deal for the "little man" in Canada. There should be in this nation no breadwinner who makes less than $1,200 a year, which, calculated on a weekly basis, amounts to around $23 a week. I ask the house how a little family can be properly raised on anything less than that. It is evident that in the new and expanding economy which must come in the future such conditions must form no part, and I fancy in this House of Commons, regardless of political considerations, I shall have very complete and thorough agreement on that point.

The Progressive Conservative party strongly supports the principle of more equitable adjustment of the extra burdens, borne by parents of families, over the resources of the state, and over all members of the community as a whole. There has long been a compelling and urgent need of action to meet this problem, not only in our low income groups but in fact all through the great sturdy middle class of this country as well. Surely on this we can all agree, and also that we should move, and should have moved long ago, to deal adequately and effectively with such problems.

The measure and methods which the government now submits to us to achieve these ends we do not think are adequate. Left to regulation is the whole tremendous administrative set-up, all the procedures to be followed, as to whether the dominion is going to set up treasury and dominion welfare offices in all the provinces and in the major cities and towns of the country. All this haziness and this demand on parliament for an open warrant to set up committees, board and tribunals and staff is not to meet the problem head on, but rather is it a request for authority to do as little or as much as cabinet desires and to defer any actual, practical help to July 1, 1945. This measure is only an isolated link in what should be a chain of comprehensive welfare and security plans for the home and family and child life of this country. The government must know that this is an illusory, hastily prepared and untenable measure. It must surely be aware of its unconstitutionality. It must know that it is not good enough or sound enough to be put into effect. The public must be made aware that the effect of its illegality will be to delay benefits sought. This measure, which concerns the basic relations in our social life, and which will affect our whole present provincial system of child welfare, mothers' allowances, children's aid, standards of wages, educational authority and child welfare jurisdiction, is presented to parliament not in the form of a complete statute but in the form of authority for regulations to be passed. The very character of the measure perpetuates bureaucratic control through delegated authority into our post-war economy, on a measure not connected with the prosecution of the war itself, as is evidenced by the fact that the government postpones its operation for nearly a year.

We support the purpose and principle of elevating the standard of family life among the masses of our people, but we do not believe that this bill will adequately and effectively carry that out. Some of the reasons for such a stand I shall now enumerate:

1. It is unconstitutional and invades the jurisdiction of the provinces. In other words, it proposes to do things which this parliament has no power to do, and this without even consulting the provinces first. It is a direct thrust at the rights and responsibilities of the provinces, who doubtless will oppose such an illegal encroachment upon their recognized field of welfare services. A measure that will not stand up in court is worse than no measure at all; for it only delays the relief and reform it purports to give. This bill in my opinion, if passed, will be as powerless as a day-old kitten to further the objects and purposes it sets out to accomplish. It might be profitable to recall the words of caution and warnings of disaster on the constitutional point employed by the Prime Minister when he inveighed against the social legislation introduced in the session of 1935. As late as July 14 last we heard an echo of that debate when he spoke of the social legislation introduced at that time, and this is what he said:

> That legislation was introduced and placed upon the statute books, but what happened? The matter was appealed to the supreme court which held the whole body of legislation ultra vires. I ask my hon. friends whether that was helping the social order in the country or whether it was the sort of thing that was calculated to provoke social unrest.

I toss those words back to him now and ask him, after the experience he related with respect to that legislation, whether he can consistently introduce a measure now which is in a similar position. I say it is a dangerous and retrograde step to promise the underprivileged people of this nation something in a measure which is limp, which is crippled and which is powerless in law. Others in our party will deal further with the constitutional aspect of this measure, and I do no more than mention it at this juncture.

2. It seriously endangers the setting up of minimum wage standards in Canada, and may be accepted in many instances as a substitute for better wage levels. It is a thrust at the power of collective bargaining and of minimum wage principles. Labour has always looked with a doubtful eye on such legislation as this bill envisages, and not without good reason.

3 It adds a further strain on our national unity. There is but one province which has maintained the high birth rate and large family which was so characteristic of Canada's pioneer strains. That province's contributions to the general revenue will be out of proportion to the heavier deflection of payments that will have to come from other provinces to pay that province's heavier share of these subsidies. A proportionately lower revenue provider receiving a proportionately higher subsidy can scarcely make for greater unity at this stage in our national life.

4. It disregards the whole question of need in family life and child welfare. It is a direct threat to a more comprehensive social programme where cash grants to those in need and adequate health, educational, housing and general welfare provisions would have their place. It thus ignores the needy families of our nation's taxpayers and the heavy expenses incurred by parents with children over sixteen. The loosing of this lone wolf to range in a constitutional no-man's land can seriously threaten the developing dominion-provincial network of assistance and health provisions and even hold back other programmes. This is in the present set-up only "bull in the china shop" legislation and rides rough-shod over social welfare undertakings of the provincial and municipal authorities. This "intruder" legislation runs the risk of disturbing and delaying the progress being so rapidly made by other jurisdictions.

5. It foreshadows the building of a giant peace-time bureaucracy with its inevitable controls, offices, inspectors and machinery. This nation wants to get rid of this kind of thing when the war is over, and here we have this unpopular war-time policy being perpetuated in the period of peace. The bill itself is little more than the barest authority upon which orders in council can be based. The real legislating with respect to this measure will be done behind the closed doors of cabinet council.

6. It is blank cheque legislation without the emergency of war time to justify it. When the flesh is put on the skeleton of this legislation by cabinet-made regulations the people and parliament will be spectators in the grandstand rather than participants in its framing. It will result in a costly overlapping of services and will reach its finger into the lives of the people directly from the centre of bureaucracy itself. That to agriculture and labour as well as citizens at large will not be a welcome provision in the bill. They are fed up with bureaucracy and controls.

7. It attacks the very basis of our system of justice, for it asks for power to constitute solely at the discretion of the minister and his appointees a system of committees, boards, tribunals and agents with undefined powers and and with denial of appeal under specified heads and with prosecution for infringement of the act, solely with the minister's consent. It constitutes a threat to the liberty of the subject which to say the least may be extremely dangerous.

8. It is a costly duplication of existing services. It gives power to the federal government to set up expensive overlapping agencies where provincial, municipal and voluntary services are now doing a good job. This superimposition of federal machinery on top of existing provincial machinery cannot help but be wasteful and inefficient.

9. It denies the basic principles of social justice. Such justice calls not for the mass treatment of all people as the same, such as marked unemployment relief, but for treating life as it is, individually and the needs of families differently as they are different. The needs of a family in the winter in my part of Ontario are different from those in the far north. Families in a teeming slum and families in the Okanagan; families in the eastern townships and families in Cape Breton's mining or fishing villages, have very different needs. This scheme lumps them all together and gives the same grant to all. Could the injustice be more patently apparent?

Having stated some of the reasons why we feel that this measure is not in the interest of a better method of raising the family standard in Canada, I now move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson):

That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house it is desirable that the standard of family life among the masses of the people in Canada be raised,

"but in view of the fact that bill 161 is not within the constitutional competence of the dominion parliament, that it be not now read a second time, but that it be referred to the special committee on social security with instructions that the bill be studied and redrafted after consultation, collaboration and in co-operation with the provinces as a joint undertaking and introduced before this house prorogues. Such redrafted bill shall contain specific details as to the administrative machinery, forms and procedure under which the bill will be administered and shall provide that any contributions to be made under the terms of the said bill by the dominion to a province shall be conditional on the federal Minister of Labour certifying that the standard of wages in that province is not lower than the average standards of wages for similar work in the other provinces.

May I propose to the government that as dependents' alowances come properly under federal jurisdiction, the allowances now paid with respect to children of members of our armed forces be augmented at once by the amounts mentioned in the bill now before the house instead of delaying such payment till July 1, 1945. The same should apply to those coming within the provisions of the Pension Act. The government possesses the power to do this quite apart from this bill, and it may also be properly pointed out that such records are available. There is no legitimate excuse for delay. It is merely a matter of increasing the amount of the cheque.

Before I conclude I should like to express the hope that the government will be diverted from their charted course and accept our amendment which is designed to meet more effectively and quickly the problem we are all trying to solve. Its acceptance would prevent such an unconstitutional and unworkable piece of legislation from being tossed into an election campaign where there might be a temptation to make three and a half million political footballs out of Canada's children. At all costs they must not be made pawns in a political game. The public are bound to regard a bill so patently unconstitutional and unworkable, brought in at the dying days of a dying parliament by a dying government, as a last straw to which this drowning administration clutches to save itself in the churning sea of political unpopularity.

On behalf of the children and their parents across Canada who are badly in need of real and immediate help, I repeat my demand and plea that we must have legislation which will work, and which has teeth, and which will provide the essential assistance to the hard-pressed parents of families across the dominion who are struggling hard and doing their level best to keep up in the uncertain race for economic survival to-day. Let us help these people. Let us not just say we will help them a year from now by undisclosed ways and means. Actions speak louder than words, and this party stands for action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend has proposed that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be referred to a committee. I do not wish to say that my hon. friend is not as well aware of the rules as he should be, but he certainly ought to have known that his motion is out of order according to standing order 75, which reads as follows:

Every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment.

As the amendment proposes that the bill be not now read a second time but be referred to a committee it is, I submit, out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that if that interpretation of the rules were to be accepted, then of course one of the major banking bills of this session was not dealt with in the proper way. It was referred to the banking and commerce committee before it was given second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; which one?

Mr. GRAYDON: The Alberta Bank bill. I distinctly remember that that was done at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The subject matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury). The Alberta Bank bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not the bill itself, but the subject matter of the bill, which is very different from the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The subject matter of the bill is the bill. The Alberta Bank bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee on every occasion on which it was brought forward before second reading was given to it. I vividly recall requesting the administration at that time not to pursue that course. If the government take the responsibility of trying to eliminate this amendment, that is their responsibility, but the public will desire to see a test made on this amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The amendment is out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have read the amendment and standing order 75, which is as follows:

Every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment.

The amendment states that the bill be not now read a second time, but that it be referred to the special committee on social security. My recollection is not that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). It was the subject matter of the Alberta Bank bill which was referred to the banking and commerce committee. In my judgment the amendment now before the house falls under and is contrary to the provisions of standing order 75; consequently the bill cannot be referred to a committee before second reading, and I shall have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, we desire to appeal from it.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

On the motion made by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King that bill No. 161, an act to provide for family allowances, be now read a second time, Mr. Graydon, seconded by Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) moved an amendment. I ruled the amendment out of order on the basis of standing order 75, which states that every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment. The leader of the opposition has appealed against the decision

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this important measure this afternoon I have no set or prepared speech or remarks to make. I want to say immediately that we of this party welcome heartily the introduction of this measure. However, I wish it were a part of a wide social security programme much more comprehensive than any of the measures that have been placed before this house up to the present time, or perhaps I should say, up to this stage of the session.

This afternoon as I discuss this measure I am thinking of the years that have gone by. I think of 1921 when the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth appeared as the member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think of the many years he spent endeavouring to popularize social security measures in this house as he succeeded to a large degree in popularizing them across the country. I have no doubt whatever that it is not only because of the new order, of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speaks, but because of the long process of education carried on in this country by pioneers for social security that this important bill has reached its second reading to-day. As one of the party which has consistently urged the adoption in this country of comprehensive social security measures, I welcome this proposal.

I regret that the constitutional argument has been introduced at this time by the official opposition. I think that was a move to shelve this important matter, and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling has been sustained. I regret that any constitutional doubts which may exist have not been resolved ere this. When we met in 1940 the Sirois commission had been inquiring into the needs of the country. It made a comprehensive report regarding some of the constitutional difficulties arising in connection with various provinces and the dominion. I think it is indeed a tragedy that right up to the end of this parliament we have not had an opportunity of endeavouring to resolve those difficulties to which such striking attention was drawn a few years ago.

The government has promised throughout the whole of this session, and before he went to Britain to attend the prime ministers' conference the Prime Minister said that a meeting of the premiers of the provinces would be called at an early date in order that these matters might be discussed and considered. I am sorry that at this stage, when the life of this parliament is running out, when the sands of the government are running low, that we have not yet seen convened by the Prime Minister the conference which could consider the very important matters which some people evidently are inclined to raise. When I say, "some people" I take it that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) had in mind that the constitutional issue would be raised by one of the provinces where his friends are in control.

I said a few moments ago that in my opinion we should have this measure as part of a national social security programme. When this movement came into being as a result of the federation of many groups throughout this country with similar ends in view, we adopted a programme. That programme contained a statement regarding comprehensive social security measures for Canada. Throughout our entire existence our party has endeavoured to get these matters considered by the people and parliament. I have in my hand the very last statement that was made at our national convention two years ago when we said that we would work for and promote improved nutrition standards, family and mother's allowances. Hon. gentlemen will note that in that statement we included not only family allowances but some other items that are of interest and importance in the realm of social security.

I quite agree with the Prime Minister when he said this afternoon that the new world, the new order as he put it, which we all hope is in the making will put the emphasis on human welfare rather than on wealth. Most of our laws in the past have been written for the protection of property. Parliaments have been more or less merely umpires in the economic realm. But to-day parliaments and legislatures everywhere in the world are forced to think more and more in terms of human welfare. Ten years ago, twelve years ago, and in the years before that, in this house the slogan that we adopted in 1932 was ridiculed from all sides. We said that there must be production for use rather than for the amassing of wealth and the making of great profits. But to-day we have had the satisfaction of hearing the Prime Minister on the floor of this chamber echo in other words the slogan of the party for which I speak. We ask, however, why is it that such measures were not introduced years ago?

The Prime Minister said that conditions were different seventy-five, fifty, twenty-five years ago, but I notice that he stopped at twenty-five. May I remind him that conditions that called for social security measures, for a nutritional programme, for family allowances, for widows' pensions, for better conditions for the aged and for those who were unable to secure employment existed ten years ago, nine years ago, eight years ago, five years ago, when we had nearly one million people in this country on relief, and when in the city where I lived, where we gave relief on the most generous scale of any city in Canada, people were forced to exist on something like an average of three cents a meal. Consequently, no matter what conditions may have been fifty or one hundred years ago, the conditions that existed between 1930 and 1939, in the years when this government was in power, or when hon. gentlemen to my immediate right were in power, called loudly for measures of this description. Let me remind the house that we are now but reaping the vengeance of those days. Those of us who have examined the figures that were given in the house showing the results of the physical examinations of the men who volunteered for active service in this war know that nearly one-half of those who volunteered in the early part of this war were rejected on physical grounds. To-day many men are suffering form physical disability because of the conditions they had to endure between 1930 and 1939 when this government or its predecessor was in power. One of the most common ailments to-day in our armed forces, I am told by medical men, is stomach diseases that were caused by inadequate feeding, malnutrition or no feeding at all in the days before the war. But to-day we have this measure, and in spite of the fact that it is belated, in spite of the fact that we regard it as only one short step, we welcome it because it is a recognition that human rights must come before property rights in our land.

Mr. HOWDEN: Stomach diseases usually come from too much feeding.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of them do; but the hon. gentleman, who is a medical man himself, knows perfectly well that some stomach diseases which men are suffering from to-day came from starvation.

Mr. HOWDEN: I doubt it.

Mr. COLDWELL: One had only to cross this country in those days and see the boys feeding out of tin cans in the jungles to know that that kind of living would inevitably bring upon them the stomach diseases which some of them are suffering from to-day.

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not want to disturb the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but to the best of my honest belief I do not think you can develop any stomach disease from under-feeding.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you could not develop stomach diseases from under-feeding you could develop many other kinds of diseases from under-feeding.

Mr. HOWDEN: Well and good, but not stomach disease.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some medical men will tell you that irregular feeding, which these boys endured during those days, is one source of stomach disease. While over-feeding may be a source also, undoubtedly irregular feeding or no feeding at all is bound to bring about a considerable amount of stomach trouble. But I am not going to argue about the medical opinion.

I am pointing out that for years after this government came into power, in place of the hon. gentlemen who now comprise the official opposition, nothing was done to meet the dire necessities of the Canadian people. As I have said in this house once before, I recollect that a group of young men came right under this roof in February, 1939, and when they pleaded for an opportunity to get food, clothing and shelter they were told by the government that there was no way whereby this government could do anything for them because the province was supposed to do it. When these young men went to the province they were told that they had not lived in the province long enough and that they should go to the municipality, and the municipality told them that they had not lived in the municipality long enough, but charity provided them with two meals a day and a bed at a mission in this city. Six months later the war broke out, and some of those very boys who were described right in this chamber by an hon. gentleman who sits not very far from here and supports the government as yaps and ne'er-do-wells were among those who enlisted. It is all very well to come along now in July, 1944, and make fine speeches about family allowances and nutrition and all the rest of it. But let us not forget the years that have gone by and the neglect of this government to do the thing that it ought to have done when it had the power to do it before this war broke out.

I said a few moments ago that this bill should be a part of a comprehensive social security plan and that we should see to it that it is not used either for the depression of wages or for the depression of farm prices. Properly carried out, I believe that it will prove a good measure so far as an increased consumption of farm products is concerned. Properly administered and properly viewed, and with adequate protection given to the wage-earner and the encouragement of organization among labour, I believe that it will be a good thing for the families of our working people. But let us remember that this must never be regarded as a substitute for either a floor under low wages or a floor under low farm prices. If it were ever so regarded, then I say to this house that its enactment would indeed be a tragedy. But I do not believe that it will ever be permitted to be used for either of those purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL: That was never suggested by anybody.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was suggested this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not by us.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not suggesting that it will be so used. I am simply pointing out that I hope and believe that it will never be used as a substitute for either. We believe, as a matter of fact, that family allowances find their proper place in any general programme of social security and family welfare.

There is one thing about this bill that I want to criticize constructively. Nothing I say will be said in destructive criticism of the bill. But it does seem to me that there is something wrong with the manner in which this bill is to be worked out, because the problem of maintaining a large family is surely greater than the problem of maintaining a small family. Yet we find under this bill that as the family increases in size the amount of the family allowance per child is reduced.

Mr. GRANT: The difficulty is not twice as great though.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is wrong. As a family increases the problem of caring for the family tends rather to increase than to decrease.

Mr. GRANT: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, if that were not so, I believe there would be larger families.

It is to be remarked that this does not pretend to be a bill which will enable the state to pay for the maintenance of a child. If the cost as given this afternoon is between $14 and $15 a month on a low wage level—and it must be at least that—to maintain a child, and the average family allowance to be paid is $7 a month, then approximately the total payment, putting it on a rather low level, is about half what it takes to maintain a child in a family. It seems to me that if we are to have family allowances based on per capita grants to children we should see to it that the amount is not decreased if a family exceeds what we might term the average number.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I interrupt? That is directly against the findings of Sir William Beveridge.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I knew that, but I cannot see the validity of the argument, and I am giving this constructive criticism of it.

The Prime Minister this afternoon made some excellent points in support of this measure. He said that to-day we are recognizing the fact that we are all dependent one upon another. I am glad that this recognition is being made not only in our country but throughout the world. We have had too much emphasis upon and propaganda about rugged individualism, rugged individualism which brought millions of people down to being ragged individuals; and I am glad the Prime Minister emphasized the fact that we are members one of another and that each one of us is responsible for the conditions which we find around us. As he said, the importance of our human resources is far greater than the importance of our material resources. I noted the figures which the Prime Minister used this afternoon. He spoke of one million and a half families. I do not know how these figures were arrived at. While he was speaking I sent for Hansard of March 15, 1943, which at page 1230 gives the total number of children at home in Canada, twenty-four years of age and under, as 4,628,000, and a break-down by provinces. It struck me that, on the basis of a million and a half families, the estimate of three and a half million children might be a little low. I am not sure how the estimate was arrived at.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My figures were worked out from the census of 1941.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of course these are census figures for a different age-group. I just wanted to be sure that that was so. There are then in round figures a million and a half families and three and a half million children, and of those only a percentage will benefit from this legislation. Not all will benefit, because of the reduction in the exemption for children under the income tax law. It has seemed to me that it would have been better if the family allowance had been paid alike to all children; it would have been less complicated, and the matter could then have been dealt with above the exemption for income tax on the basis of income tax returns and exemptions. That would perhaps have simplified the government's plan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know if I understood my hon. friend rightly; but the intention is that throughout the dominion all will be paid, and the matter of adjustments will come afterwards.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I was not particularly clear about. But what I was going to say is that it strikes me although I have not been able to give the bill quite the study I might have given it under other circumstances, that the bill is very complicated. The matter of reductions on account of the size of the family and the variation which may occur in families by births and deaths and so on will involve a terrific administrative job, and I personally think it could have been made much simpler had another method been devised.

The proposed legislation for children's allowances calls, as I understand it, for a rising scale of payments—$5 a month for children less than six years of age to $8 a month to children of thirteen to fifteen years, together with deductions ranging from $1 a month for the fifth children to $3 a month for the eighth child and over. That is where, I think, the administrative difficulties of the measure are going to be very great, and I think a simpler plan should have been adopted.

Here I wish to interject my opinion that the financial commitment which the government is making—and this bill definitely commits the government to certain payments—ought to have been part of the budget. I agree that, instead of coming into effect on July 1, 1945, it should have come into effect, if brought in earlier this session, on July 1, 1944, or now at the latest, January 1, 1945, and the government ought to have carried out its constitutional obligation—I think there is one—when it provides for an expenditure, to make at least some provision therefor in the budget. If we were passing merely a resolution calling upon the government or parliament to consider the appropriation of a certain sum of money, as a target for an expenditure for social security measures, the position would be somewhat different, but we are definitely committing another to these expenditures. May I say that in one respect we are very glad that we are, but I just want to point that out.

I said a few moments ago that the plan to provide for a scale of deductions for each child above four, which I assume is considered to be the average, although from the figures given by the Prime Minister it is not the average, is bound to discriminate against the larger families. That is the first constructive criticism I would make against this measure, that there is no doubt a discrimination against the larger families. In my opinion this will not save the government a very large amount of money. I had an economist look into that phase of it for me; I happen to have a few notes which he made while I was away, and he estimates that the saving because of these deductions will amount to not more than $15 million a year; that we could have paid the family allowances without taking into account these deductions and that the cost would not have been more than $15 million greater than the $200 million net estimated by the Prime Minister this afternoon. If that is so, the administrative difficulties are so great that for the saving of $15 million, or even $50 million it is not worth while. My figures may not be wholly correct, but I place that before the government because I see the difficulties of administration and the complications that are likely to arise. I would like to see the measure as successful as it can possibly be because upon it hangs other social security legislation which I hope will be introduced at least by a subsequent government.

The rising scale of payments goes up to the age of sixteen. I believe that we should endeavour, as was suggested by the leader of the opposition—and that is the only thing in which I agree with him—to raise it to the age of eighteen in order to encourage parents to keep their children at school or to have them take some technical training or other education. I believe it will be quite important when this war is over to keep as many of our younger people off the labour market as we can. We have a very heavy task ahead of us to provide jobs for the hundreds of thousands of people now engaged in war industry and in the armed forces of the country, and anything that will tend to reduce the pressure on the labour market, particularly of lower paid labour, which is often youthful labour, should be done. I would like to have seen the government extend this up to the age of eighteen.

These are the principal criticisms I want to make at this time. Some of my colleagues, speaking from different points of view, will deal with other details of the measure, but I do not like the idea of there being too much supervision. I notice that the bill empowers the minister, in section 9 (a) to:

> establish committees or boards and arrange with departments of government and other public and private agencies and organizations to assist him in carrying out the purposes of this act.

I think our people rather dislike the setting up of such committees. While many good people are associated with social welfare committees, there are often people who are overofficious, and it seems to me we should be very careful lest, under a clause of this description, the minister gives too many powers and appoints too many committees of investigation. That in itself will tend to defeat the success of this measure. We are also told in the bill that the allowances shall be applied by the person receiving them exclusively to the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the children. To whom is this going to be paid? In most countries where there are family allowances it is paid to the mother because she is the one who buys the food and clothing. She may not provide the shelter but she is the proper person to whom the payment should be made. Under the civil law of one of our provinces the woman is placed in a different position in relation to the husband from that which prevails in some of the other provinces, but I think even if that difficulty arises in that province the act should be sufficiently wide that in the various provinces where we have not the same type of civil law the allowance should be paid to the mother, if, of course, she is a fit and proper person. It is difficult for a wife, if the husband is not just doing the right thing by the children, to make any complaint, and undue interference in the home and in the family life would be in my opinion, resented and would be indeed dangerous in effect. I would, therefore, like to see the mother given the money.

I do not intend to have it inferred in any way that I think these people who receive this money, the humble poor, as has been said this afternoon by the Prime Minister, are not capable of spending these family allowances. I think they are. I think it is an insult to the poor to say continually, "Oh, well, they will spend it in riotous living or in the beer parlour or in the picture show or somewhere else." I remember that argument very well in my young days, when I often heard it said that if hours of labour were reduced and wages increased the working class of Great Britain, where I was born, would spend their time idly or dissipate their wages. We know perfectly well that has not happened. As a matter of fact, the general level of culture and education has increased with the improved standards of living and reduction in hours of labour. The time when the working class, if I may use that term, were at their lowest ebb, most depressed, when perhaps liquor was most misused, at least in the country where I was born, was the time when it provided—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And no social insurance.

Mr. COLDWELL: No social insurance. That was the time when, to a person after a hard day of grinding work, going back to slum conditions, liquor provided some relief.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Before 1906, when the Liberal party came into power.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will give the Liberal party in 1906 all the credit I can give it for social security legislation, but let us not forget that it was very largely because of the activities of the people who subsequently formed the Labour party; and if the Liberal party had been truly progressive, no Labour party would have arisen in Great Britain. Nor should I forget that after all, prior to 1906, if I may be perfectly fair about it, there were British Tories too who thought much of the evil conditions around the mines. Do not forget the Earl of Shaftesbury and some of those people—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Were you one?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I was not even born when the Earl of Shaftesbury lived, so that I cannot be counted among those who supported the splendid measures they introduced.

Mr. MARTIN: But surely the hon. member was never a Tory?

Mr. COLDWELL: I could not help where I was born. I did not choose the home into which I was born; but when I grew up my eyes were opened, and may I say to the hon. gentlemen that they were so widely opened that I am not a member of the Liberal party. We may as well be clear about it. These are my main thoughts regarding the measure, but as I sit down I should like to summarize.

Mr. GARDINER: You would be farther away from the Tory party if you were a Liberal than you are as a socialist.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that the hon. gentleman's opinion? Well, I have just come from the province of Alberta where Liberals and Tories alike are combining with their natural enemies—they were natural enemies a few years ago—the Social Credit party, in order to fight the movement which I have the honour to represent in this house. May I say also to the hon. gentleman that there are no Liberals and no Tories in the province of Alberta and have not been for a long time. They call themselves Independents, whatever that may mean. They were able to get together because there was no fundamental difference between them, at least in Alberta.

I wish to close my remarks by saying that we welcome this measure and we trust that it will not be used either to depress the prices of agricultural products, the floor under commodities, or to depress wages. I should like to see comprehensive social security measures brought into this house placing a floor under wages high enough to provide an adequate living; a floor under farm prices that would give a proper return to the producer, and then measures of this description would be much more worth while than they are likely to be.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I trust that on reconsideration the country at large will take the view of this measure that this house has taken of your decision, Mr. Speaker. It is an epochal proposal. It is not one which I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, can be met with gibes of its being introduced in the dying hours of a dying parliament and so forth, and that it comes from a dying government. Nor can it be met elsewhere by treating it as a type of diaper dole or baby bonus. It is really an epochal proposal for the betterment of conditions in this country. I do not think it can be disposed of either on the ground that there is no power in this Canadian parliament to enact the legislation the bill provides for. The matter of the constitutional jurisdiction of parliament and the provinces has fortunately for some, fortunately for a great many of my profession, given rise to many references before the courts and many interesting trips to Ottawa and to other places; but there has been some degree of finality reached in the extent to which courts have declared restrictions resulting from the terms of the British North America Act on the powers of the Canadian parliament. The decision which deals with matters of this kind is that which was rendered by the supreme court and confirmed by His Majesty on the advice of his privy council on the Employment and Social Insurance Act in 1936-37. It is quite true that the enactment in question in that case was declared to be beyond the powers of parliament, but the principles which were discussed and which were affirmed both by the supreme court and by the privy council are express recognition of the power in parliament to do the kind of thing that is proposed in this bill.

Hon. members will recollect that there was a division of opinion in the supreme court. The Chief Justice of Canada and the late lamented Mr. Justice Davis held that the legislation was within the powers of parliament and that it was in its true character taxation and disposal of property acquired by His Majesty in the right of the dominion through taxation. The majority in the supreme court held that that was not the true character of the legislation; that in pith and substance the legislation did not have to do with the raising of a fund by means of taxation and the disposal of that fund but that it did have to do with contractual rights between employers and employees. Mr. Justice Rinfret, as he was then, one of the puisne judges of the supreme court who wrote the leading judgment said:

> One of the effects of the act under submission is, in the language of Lord Haldane, in workmen's compensation board v. C.P.R. (1) "to attach statutory terms to contracts of employment," and to impose contractual duties as between employers and employees. In its immediate result, the act creates civil rights as between the former and the latter.

Because it was an act to affect civil rights as between employers and employees in its true effect and purport it was declared to be beyond the rights of parliament and an infringement of the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces under subsection 13 of section 92 of the act to deal with property and civil rights. But as would naturally be supposed in discussing the question their lordships, both in the supreme court and in the privy council, had to consider what parliament could do and could validly do in legislation having not the same direct purpose but somewhat the same large social objective, and both in the supreme court and in the privy council there was unanimity of opinion that parliament could dispose of the property under its control by way of gifts, and even attach conditions to such gifts, provided that it was not a device for indirectly entering upon a field exclusively reserved to the provinces.

The judgment of the Chief Justice of Canada and of Mr. Justice Davis, of course, went very far in that direction; and the language used by the Chief Justice of Canada, and with that part, that provided it had been legislation of that character, no complaint could have been found by anyone, seems very appropriate. It is found in the reports of the supreme court of 1936 at page 431 and is as follows:

> The exclusive legislative authority of parliament extends inter alia to the subject "The public . . . property." It cannot be doubted, we think, that "property" here is used in its broadest sense, and includes every kind of asset. This legislative authority is exercisable "notwithstanding anything in this act."

Because the words "notwithstanding anything in this act" govern the whole enumeration of the federal powers.

> There is always, of course, the qualification, and everything hereinafter said is subject to that qualification, that parliament is incapable of acquiring jurisdiction over matters within the exclusive competence of the provinces by legislating upon those matters under the pretence of exercising a power which does not embrace within its ambit the real subject matter of the legislation. Subject to that qualification, we know of no authority by which His Majesty's courts have jurisdiction to examine, with a view to pronouncing upon its validity, legislation by parliament in relation to the disposition of the assets committed to its control by section 91, British North America Act.
> Parliament has authority to make grants out of the public moneys to individual inhabitants of any of the provinces, for example, for relief of distress, for reward of merit, or for any other object which parliament in its wisdom may deem to be a desirable one. The propriety of such grants, the wisdom of such grants, the convenience or inconvenience of the practice of making such grants, are considerations for parliament alone, and have no relevancy in any discussion before any court concerning the competence of parliament to authorize them.

With that Mr. Justice Rinfret, writing the leading judgment, of course concurred. He accepted that principle, but in distinguishing between the statute before him and what he would have considered a proper application of the same, he said:

> Be that as it may under all circumstances, the benefits conferred on the employees by the act are not gifts with conditions attached, which the employers are free to accept or not.

And for that reason, because they were not gifts made under the authority of parliament with conditions attached but were something else, he held that the Employment and Social Insurance Act was invalid, concluding his judgment with these words:

> For these reasons, and also for the reasons given by my brother Kerwin, with whom I entirely concur, I have come to the conclusion that the Employment and Social Insurance Act . . . is wholly ultra vires of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Justice Kerwin, with whom Mr. Justice Rinfret and the other members of the court conferred, had this to say at page 457:

> As to the latter point, it is evident that the dominion may grant sums of money to individuals or organizations and that the gift may be accompanied by such restrictions and conditions as parliament may see fit to enact. It would then be open to the proposed recipient to decline the gift or to accept it subject to such conditions.

This case was appealed to His Majesty in his privy council and came before a very learned committee composed of Lord Atkin, Lord Thankerton, Lord Macmillan, Lord Wright and Sir Sidney Rowlatt. The conclusion of the judgment rendered by the privy council was:

> It follows that the whole act must be pronounced ultra vires, and in accordance with the view of the majority of the supreme court their lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal be dismissed.

Speaking expressly of the right to impose taxes and to dispose of the fund so raised, Lord Atkin said:

> That the dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities could not as a general proposition be denied.

But he went on to say:

> But assuming that the dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within dominion competence.

If the legislation which disposes of the fund is in reality legislation regulating matters which are within provincial control, then the object of the legislation is not to raise a fund and dispose of it but to impinge upon the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the province. That is the last word we have had from the courts as to the proper construction of this distribution of powers as between the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

I am not for the moment discussing all the details of this bill, but in principle it is a bill to allocate to every child maintained by a parent, up to the age of sixteen years, a certain monthly benefit, the only condition attached being that the person to whom the money is paid shall apply it for the maintenance and better upbringing of that child. There is nothing else whatever; no obligation of any kind is imposed. The bill is not drawn in such a way that if it were shown that a person had received the allocation and misapplied it, he would commit an offence. Offences are set out in the act, but that is not one of them. No obligation is imposed upon anyone; no contractual right is interfered with; no family right is affected. This is merely a declaration by the Canadian government, authorized by the Canadian parliament, that the Canadian people wish to contribute so much a month for the upkeep of each child, provided that the money be used for that purpose. That is all there is in the legislation, and nothing can be found in any of the decisions to support the charge so lightly or so vigorously, according to the individual point of view, made this afternoon that this legislation is unconstitutional.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I was endeavouring to construe certain passages from the decisions of the courts with respect to social legislation and had, I believe, shown that under those decisions there was nothing to prevent the dominion parliament from authorizing gifts, and even attaching conditions to them, unless they were a device to invade provincial jurisdiction, and that this did not invade provincial jurisdiction in respect of property and civil rights. There are, of course, other subsections of section 92. One is subsection 16, which reads:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

The granting by federal authority of an allowance in respect of children under sixteen years of age is certainly not something which is within provincial jurisdiction as being a matter of local or private nature within the province. Subsection 7 of section 92 reads:

> The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

Those are institutions within provincial jurisdiction. Is there anythng within this bill which can be classed as the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province? I respectfully submit that there is not and that there can be no doubt about that.

It is well known to all lawyers who have had anything to do with the interpretation of the constitutional act that one of the cardinal rules for the interpretation of that act is to attach to the words used in it the meaning which those words had at the time it was enacted. That rule was first asserted in connection with the distinction between direct and indirect taxes. It is well known to all lawyers that for the purpose of determining what was meant by the legislators as direct or indirect taxation one should not refer to the theories of present-day economists; one should take the meaning that was attached to that language in what was then the classical book on political economy, the one by Adam Smith. It is his definition of what was regarded as the distinction between direct and indirect taxation at the time the confederation act was enacted that has prevailed and has been declared to be the governing rule for that distinction in all cases that have come before the courts.

Therefore, for the purpose of construing subsection 7 of section 92 we have to refer to what were known then as hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions. Will any one contend that in 1867 there was anywhere in the world a provision known as a charity which involved the payment by the state of an allowance for the maintenance of children or for the better maintenance of the children of the nation? It is a new concept that because the state controls the general economy of the nation it may have some moral obligation to relieve particular hardships which the system it maintains may impose upon some individuals. That was something that was not and could not be contemplated at the time the British North America Act was enacted.

I submit that not only is there a constitutional right to do the thing proposed by this legislation, there is some moral obligation to do so on the authority that maintains the system of the national economy. The economic system which this parliament maintains for the Canadian nation depends upon the exercise by it of many controls which are within its jurisdiction. It is this parliament that determines what shall be the monetary policy of the country. It is this parliament that determines what shall be the tariff policy of the country. It is this parliament that institutes and fosters and maintains a system of economy which to a very large measure depends upon wide participation in foreign trade. Those are the major factors which have to do with the productivity and the distribution of the wealth of the Canadian people. This parliament in doing so constantly endeavours to foster and maintain that which will be in the interests of the majority of the Canadian people.

It so happens that under that system, because of the manner in which it has developed, because of the manner in which it exists, the ordinary labourer cannot receive wages sufficient to provide himself and a family of several children with what is required for their well-being. There has been a suggestion that this will have some effect on the scale of wages. I submit that it cannot have any effect on the scale of wages. Our system, which is one of competition with the world at large, puts some limits upon the scale of wages that can be paid in the production of the things we want to sell on the markets of the world. There are greater burdens and greater responsibilities placed upon the workman who has a family of several children to provide for than upon a single man, or upon a man who has only himself and a wife to provide for, or perhaps even upon a man who has only himself, a wife and one child to provide for.

It is not practicable to have a scale of wages measured by the needs or responsibilities of those who receive the wages. The wage received by those who perform the same amount of labour and who contribute the same amount of production must necessarily be the same. In order to have a wage which would be sufficient for the man with a family of eight or ten children to provide for, that wage would have to be uniform throughout the nation. The figures given this afternoon by the Prime Minister show that a very large majority of the workers have not the family obligations of the persons with large families.

In order to take care of the exceptional cases it would mean that there would have to be a general rise in the wage level for all those for whom the need may not really exist. That would very soon put the employer in a situation where he could not continue to be an employer. It would not be possible to market in the world at large our Canadian products if the wages that had to be paid to every Canadian worker were sufficient to enable a man with a family of eight or nine children to provide for all of them.

If this is an economic necessity which is conducive to the well-being of the nation at large we must recognize the situation of those upon whom it bears so harshly as to put them in a position where they are unable to secure the share of the recurrent wealth that is necessary for their proper maintenance and upbringing. I submit, therefore, that there is a moral obligation, when a measure is devised in the interests of the majority, not to allow it to bear too harshly on individuals without giving some consideration to alleviating the harshness with which it bears upon those individuals. I submit that that constitutes an answer to those whom we have heard say that they do not mind in a general way to have to pay taxes but that they do object to being taxed to help raise the children of their neighbours. That is not the correct view to take of the situation, because their ability to pay taxation is dependent upon the system which creates the necessity for some alleviation to those who are most harshly hit by it.

Leaving aside for the moment the constitutional aspect, may I refer to one or two other suggestions that have been made. One was that the amounts provided by parliament might be turned over to the province for distribution by the province. I submit that that is absolutely contrary to the principle of ministerial resonsibility.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are doing it now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We are doing it now, and I do not think it is a good policy to follow. I think every hon. member representing a constituency in this parliament is entitled to ask me when I come before the committee of the whole, asking for an appropriation: What did you do with the amount that was placed at your disposal last year? And I do not think it is a sufficient answer for me to say: I turned it over to Mr. Drew or to Mr. Godbout or to whoever may succeed Mr. Godbout, if he does not succeed himself, and you will have to ask him. That, I submit, is not a proper fulfilling of the obligation of responsibility to the representatives of the people who authorize the taxation and who in turn have the responsibility of seeing how the proceeds of that taxation are expended.

There has also been the suggestion: Why in establishing allowances for childern do you not follow the proposal contained in the Beveridge report, for instance, and ignore the first child, perhaps ignore the first and the second child in giving the allowance? But if hon. members will look at the report from the dominion bureau of statistics on the eighth Canadian census, that of 1941, document No. 5 entitled, "Households, Occupations and Earnings," they will find there that the total number of Canadian families at the date of the census was 2,486,920, of which 782,000 were without children, leaving 1,704,920 families with children, and of those, 1,015,990 were families of one or two children. That is to say, almost sixty per cent of all the families were families of one or two children. The purpose of this bill is to bring about some nearer approach to equality of opportunity for the children of the nation. The children of those families comprised in the 1,015,990 families where the income is sufficient to be subject to taxation do get and have always had a concession in the matter of taxation although there be only one or two in each family. Would it be fair in enacting this legislation to say: Oh, that is a very good rule for those whose income is sufficient to subject them to taxation, but for those whose income is not sufficient to bring them into the taxable class one or two children must be ignored. I suggest that the answer to that is self-evident.

In my own province of Quebec, of 443,000 families with children, 215,050 were families of one or two children. That does not mean that there are 215,050 families in Quebec who are going to be content with one or two children; but this measure will operate from year to year, and every family starts out, unless it is in Callander, Ontario, with one or two children. That fact, and the permanent feature of this legislation constitute an answer, perhaps not a complete answer, to the unfairness of the scale whereby the allowance for more than the fourth child is reduced for the fifth, or sixth or seventh or eighth child, or any number after eight. That would be a very serious objection if this measure were providing for a one-time bonus to be paid once only and not to be repeated. But this measure will deal with the situation as it exists from year to year, even from month to month; every family will, during a certain period, no matter how many there are ultimately in the family, be for a certain period a family of not more than four children, and it will end by being a family of not more than four children under sixteen years of age. The difference between that kind of family and the family of eight or ten children or even more is that the period during which the allowance will be paid will be a very much longer period in the case of the latter. For all those families there will be a certain period during which the full allowances will be paid, at the beginning of the family's growth, and at the end of the family's growth. In the meantime, while there are more than eight or more than four under sixteen years of age, is it or is it not a fact that we must recognize, at least those of us who come from modest homes, that there is not an increase in expenditure mathematically proportionate to the number of children? For instance, a man who has four children does not get a new house because a fifth child comes along, or because a sixth child comes along.

There does come a time when there has to be more room in the house; but in our economy housing is one of the most important elements in the cost of living, and one of the best economic reasons for the enactment of this measure is the fact that it will make it possible for persons to have, even if they are in the same earning class, a total revenue proportionate to the number of persons they have to house. The man with a family of five or six children will have an increase in the total monthly amount he receives and can devote to the upkeep of his family which will be larger than the total amount that the man with no children will get.

I do not believe that it is possible under the prevailing scales of wages in this country for a man in a city like the one I know best, the city of Quebec, to provide himself with a home and pay a rent which will cover the taxes on that home, interest and amortization on its cost, insurance and whatever maintenance there has to be. All that added together would run up to, at the very least, eleven or twelve per cent, and the cost of a fit housing unit in the city of Quebec fit for a family of man and wife and five or six children would not be less than $5,000. Now you cannot have a scale of wages which will enable a man getting the so-called labourer's wage to pay an economic rent on a property of $5,000. Plans have been suggested for federal housing schemes which would provide homes for those unable to pay an economic rent for them. That would involve the choosing of those who are going to occupy them, and under our system I would deplore the setting up of any bureau that could pick and choose and say to you, "You will get this kind of house for $15 or $18," and to you, "You will not get it for less than $22 or $24." If there is to be any general scheme whereby the condition of those in the low income brackets is alleviated, it must be a scheme whereby the rule cannot be disputed or made subject to anybody's favouritism; it must be a rule which anyone can recognize, which is not subject to any variation according to the more or less sympathetic appeal that this or that person may have to the administration or to those in charge of dispensing benefits from the public treasury.

It has been suggested that provision should have been made in the budget for this scheme. I am under the impression that everything which will not have been expended by March 31, 1945, although included in this budget will lapse, that the sums voted by this parliament and unexpended by that time will lapse. This bill provides that it shall come into force on July 1, 1945, so that there was no occasion for anything to appear in the budget to defray the cost of carrying out the provisions of the measure.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave at the resolution stage the reasons why the date of July 1, 1945, had been selected instead of an earlier date. One of them was the time required to set up a system which will be workable and will provide for a fair and complete distribution of the allowances covered by the bill; the other was that between now and July 1, 1945, there will be a general election and it might not be considered proper to be distributing cheques on the eve of a general election.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, you are distributing promises now. I do not see much difference in the ethics of the matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is not a promise. As my colleague suggests, it is sought by this side of the house to make it a permanent law in the statutes of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are just on the eve of an election.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is another reason. At the present time the whole Canadian people are operating under a system of ceilings which requires it to be said to each and everyone of us that during the war period, although it may be tough going, we have to put up with it and there cannot be any relief. That is another reason and, I think, a valid one. We have justification for the hope that this situation will not continue indefinitely, and that by July 1, 1945, it will be possible to alleviate to a certain degree the hardships under which we all have been suffering, and which we have gladly accepted because of the purpose for which we have had to endure them. But when we begin to alleviate, that alleviation should be in the low income brackets; they are the ones which should get the first relief, and I am confident that that relief will prove substantial.

Have hon. members stopped to think what difference it will make in a household with seven or eight children to receive a monthly additional cheque of $40 or $50? Everything must be viewed in its proper proportion. For the man with an income of a thousand or twelve hundred dollars, an addition of four or five hundred dollars, or of five or six hundred dollars is substantial and enables that family to provide itself with many things which would be unavailable otherwise.

The last point to which I wish to refer is the suggestion that this should not be limited by the maximum age of sixteeen. These are matters of detail. What we are considering at the present time is the broad principle of whether or not the Canadian nation through the Canadian parliament should recognize a moral responsibility to come to the aid of those who are in a situation which is not of their own making—a provision which is necessary for the continuance of the Canadian economy as it exists and as this parliament wishes to maintain and foster it. On that principle, Mr. Speaker, I submit we should all be agreed.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave us this afternoon a comprehensive statement of the principles underlying this bill to provide for family allowances. I am thoroughly in favour of these principles as he has stated them and absolutely in favour of this measure as it has come before the house. I hope that the house will see fit to give it their favourable reception and make it one of the pillars of income security in this country.

Speakers this afternoon stated that there had not been much discussion of this matter. I want to put before you this evening an indication of some of the discussion which there has been during the last number of years. True it was not until the depression that a great deal of thought was given to the matter. Those depression years shocked us by showing how large a proportion of our population was under a good level of subsistence for the individual. That was true not only in Canada but in Great Britain and the United States.

Following that depression, various surveys were made—by Beveridge, by Marsh, by the national planning board. Practically every democratic country has been turning its mind still more to the question of income security of right for individuals, and that is one reason why this measure is coming in now, and not twenty-five years ago.

It must be remembered that our income level of 1926 to 1929 was about the highest we ever had. It was not until later that we saw how much need there was for some such measure as this. But the thought goes back a good many years. The Prime Minister has referred to his book, "Industry and Humanity." I will refer later to a book by Miss Eleanor Rathbone, published years ago. The thought among many people who have been considering this matter is not of recent date; it goes back twenty-five years. But if there is opposition now, what would the opposition have been twenty-five years ago to the introduction of a measure like this? We have found out that, no matter how industrious and hardworking a man may be, there are occasions when his income does not cover all his expenses. He needs assistance by right. One of those occasions is the time when his family is large and when he receives a wage that is measured by his skill in producing goods and not by the number of his family. It was not Cooperative Commonwealth Federation pressure that brought about that change in thinking. It is thinking that has been going on throughout different countries with regard to social security everywhere, through all parties.

The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) mentioned the boys who came to our doors for meals in the days of the depression. He might have mentioned us who prepared those meals and brought the boys into our houses, gave them meals and were glad to do so, even though sometimes we were afraid for our lives of the men we brought in to feed. But we brought them in and fed them, and many of us went into our savings, life insurance built up through the years for our children's education, to give help to them in those depression years. When we think of the men fighting now and remember the boys who came to our doors, we can think of sons who were deprived perhaps of some advantage because people saw the need of helping those boys and gave that help. I believe that we all participated in the help that was given them, and I do not think there is any party or class that is justified in saying that it alone suffered during the depression years. But that has turned our minds to social measures such as this. I differ from those who always find fault with the Canadian standard of living. It has increased in the last number of years, and in this connection I would quote the authority of people who have thought through these matters. I wish to quote a sentence or two from page 166 of Sir William Beveridge's report:

> The real wages of labour, what the wage-earner could buy with his earnings, just before the present war, were in general about one-third higher than in 1900 for an hour less of work each day. What the wage-earner could buy, when earning had been interrupted by sickness, accident or unemployment or had been ended by old age, had increased in even larger proportion, though still inadequately by development of social insurance and allied services.

He goes on to deal with this question of how, when the wage-earner's income has been lessened, help can be given through state measures—help by right and not by charity, although charity has its place and still stands as one of the greatest virtues. He supports everything that he says with facts and figures and I am giving the references. I will not quote at any length because hon. members can find these passages for themselves, but at page 154 he says:

> Social surveys of Britain between the two wars show that in the first thirty years of this century real wages rose by about one-third without reducing want to insignificance, and that the want which remained was almost wholly due to two causes, interruption or loss of earning power, and large families.

That is the point with which we are now dealing. That is the main disability which we are trying to remove to a certain degree through these family allowances. There is no reason why the measure may not be changed later. There is no reason why the level that is given now may not be increased later on if that is found necessary. There is no reason why any province may not add to this if that province finds its standard of living such that it needs to add more to it. One cannot get away from the fact that the same wages cannot be made to cover the needs of a small family and a large one. Industry has never claimed that. Before such measures as these were introduced, back about 1926, if I remember correctly, Australia made a study of what they called the average family and the wages necessary to support that average family of five; but they found that not very many people came within that category, that assistance would be given where it was not needed, that money would not be spent to good advantage, so that that idea was not put into force.

The need is there, of course, and I could talk for hours on what ought to be done for children. I could discuss the obvious fact that children are our most precious possessions both individually and collectively, taking the nation as a whole. If I wanted to speak along that tenor there would be no end to what I could say, but I think the great majority of hon. members, in fact I am sure that all hon. members in this house, quite agree with all that. We are all in favour of doing the best we can for our children. Let us extend that beyond the children of our own families, beyond, if necessary, the children of our own province, to where the need is greatest and to where those children with their undernourishment, with their needs for education and for help, should have assistance by right from the state. It seems to me that it is fundamental to keep the welfare of the family always before us. It is in our tradition that the family welfare lies at the root of our civilization, and this is a measure for the preservation of that idea. I should like to refer now to a passage from Doctor Marsh's book at page 87:

> Children's allowances are a clear part of a policy of a national minimum of the direct attack on poverty, where it is bound up with the strain imposed by a large family on a small income.

And this is from Beveridge's report at page 120, where he discusses three assumptions:

> No satisfactory scheme of social security can be devised except on the following assumptions: (a) children's allowances for children up to the age of 15 or, if in full-time education, up to the age of 16.

He puts that first. I will not go on with the others because hon. members can find the reference for themselves. Again, I quote from Miss Elizabeth Wallace, executive secretary of the Canadian Association of Social Workers. This was written on July 8 of this year:

> The Canadian Association of Social Workers, a professional organization representing some 800 social workers across Canada, in a recent submission to the dominion advisory committee on social security warmly commended the proposed introduction of family allowances.

You will find a section also in the report made by the women's committee, the subcommittee that sat under Doctor James' committee last year, a committee composed of women who were in business and professional life, comprising married women in their homes, women with and without children. They gave their sanction to a measure of children's allowances. I will not read that reference; later on I shall refer to something they said. This measure does not proclaim a cure-all for all our economic maladies and maladjustments. It is only one more piece in the picture which we are gradually putting together: old age pensions, unemployment insurance, soldier reestablishment, housing, floor under farm prices, floor under fish prices; physical fitness and other health measures we have discussed. There is your picture being built up bit by bit and you cannot do it altogether. It is often a question of which should come first, and the old argument is used about not starting in until you have the whole thing ready. I do not know anyone who progresses in that way in his own individual economy. He does a bit here and a bit there in order to cover his whole way of life.

This measure gives help at exactly the right point to those who are below the present income tax level or just above it. It is supplementary and complementary to wages. It should not raise the price of goods. Time after time the workers have found that, when their wages have gone up, the increase does not cover the goods they wanted to buy because the price of goods has gone up with the increase in the wage-earners' salary. The real wages of labour have not risen as high as the apparent rise. This measure, being divorced from the wage rate, will give the spending power for goods that an increase in the wage rate itself might not give; and I wish to point out right here that minimum wage rates come under provincial administration. They are not under federal administration. We cannot touch that except indirectly. The provinces have that under their control and most of them are dealing with it. I think it will be found in the future that still more attention will be given to the minimum wage rates in the provinces throughout Canada.

We found in the depression years that there were many who needed help, that some who needed help most were too proud, had too much self-respect, were too sensitive to go to the authorities to ask for it. I regret that because among those people were some of our very best citizens, some of the most industrious and hard-working, the very salt of the earth. But they did not go for help because they were not prepared to take what they considered charity. I think their attitude was wrong, but still it was there.

The national resources planning board mentions that in its report, and from that we would draw the conclusion that people should have this as a right. When they are doing all they can to help themselves they should not have to plead for help. I should like to read a portion from the national resources planning board report where it mentions those who needed help and would not come for it. It will be found at page 155. The paragraph preceding the one which I am reading is interesting too, but time is limited:

> These facts can be expressed in another way: In urban communities twenty-one per cent of all persons, and over twenty-five per cent of all children under sixteen years of age were in "non-relief" families (of two or more) that had incomes too low to provide an emergency level of living.

Those non-relief families were families that would not come for help and should have had it.

> This was true even though nineteen per cent of all persons and almost twenty-seven per cent of all children were in families that received some relief in 1935. It should be noted, moreover, that these measures may well overstate the extent to which public aid is available to families whose incomes are insufficient to purchase the emergency budget. For a family was counted as being in receipt of relief if at any time during the year it had received public aid regardless of the duration of the receipt of relief.

I should like the house to note that sometimes these figures have to be explained. A person in receipt of relief even for a short time was put in that category for that year. When you hear talk about the poor conditions remember that sometimes there is an explanation for high figures. The quotation I have just given bears out my contention that there are many who should have had assistance but who did not claim it for fear they might forfeit their own self-respect. Therefore, I like this aspect of the present measure. The allowance is to be given for all children, rich or poor. There is no means test. No school child with the cruelty of the young will have any good reason for sneering at another child whose father is in receipt of this allowance. It is his by right, being the father of a family. He has a status which the state recognizes by the contribution he makes to that state in the raising of his family. That feature deserves widespread commendation because it eliminates the cost of administering any means test. The loss of exemption on income tax will work almost automatically in some cases. I think that is a very good feature of it.

The rates are somewhat more than in Australia and New Zealand. Australia does not give an allowance for the first child and New Zealand has a means test. This is not a full subsistence. That has been pointed out. We have never thought that it should be a full subsistence, rather the contrary. There are privileges of a home, privileges of having children that the individual is quite willing to pay for. He will have extra here, but the basic responsibility will rest on the individual and I think they are privileges that he will be very glad to shoulder. I know the women will.

The allowances are free of income tax. That means that employers do not have to figure out new rates of deduction from wages, and that is good. Will this be an inflationary measure? We are accused of that. We do not want to increase spending during the war period. Both Australia and New Zealand have extended their family allowances. The Irish Free State adopted it only in February of this year, not the measure we have here but a somewhat similar measure. Why should not a low income group family have a chance to lay up some savings for the post-war period, especially when there are children whose future has to be planned? I deplore the suspicion that has been cast on the poor that they will not save it for the proper purpose. Increased income should go into savings now for the duration of the war. Many a mother has said to me, "I would like to buy more victory bonds. My oldest boy is over there, but I cannot afford any more for them now." Mothers know where to put the money that is earmarked for the children. If the war is still in progress and civilian goods are not on the market, many and many a parent will put a good bit of this money into savings accounts against the day when money may be spent without the danger of causing inflation. Perhaps it will build up a fund for education. But when it can be spent the great bulk of it will go into the things that must be bought over and over again in a large family—food, clothing, fuel and things of that kind that disappear rapidly because people need them.

It has been pointed out that it means a market within the country for farmers and for industry, and that means employment. We want to forestall any recurrence of any depression. We want to ward it off before it occurs, and this is a factor toward that. We must never allow the ball to get rolling toward a depression again. I think this is the best means of its kind. Far better than building additional public works, for example, which are non-productive, is to build citizens. To build citizens may even be better than to build rural electrification systems. We need them too, of course. We need them for full employment which is the chief factor; but we are looking for that in other ways, full employment through a floor on farm prices and things that have been brought in and discussed here. But those things of themselves do not solve the problem of the large family.

The bill, as was pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is within the competence and jurisdiction of the federal parliament. It is not necessary when making non-contributory grants, to carry on long discussions with representatives of provincial authorities. I beieve that has been the trouble in connection with our comprehensive health bill, which has been before the social security committee for two years. It requires discussions between federal and provincial authorities. Already we have laid the foundation for a far-reaching measure in that connection, which I hope to see carried further along in the near future.

The provinces have, of course, helped in matters of social security within their sphere of administration, and several of them are making a good job of it. Especially has that been so in recent years, since the realization of the importance of these measures has been brought home to the people through the events that have occurred. This family allowance is to go directly from the federal treasury to the individual. It need not wait until all or substantially all of the provinces have given their assent, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said had to be the case in connection with increases in old age pensions. The health bill will come, but this measure will be of more immediate assistance, even though it is not to come into force until July 1, 1945. I do not think we have the trained personnel to put it into force sooner. Hon. members should have heard Doctor Davidson speak of the woeful lack of trained personnel for the administration of services at the present time. We have seven schools training social service workers; I should like to see the government give larger grants to those schools. I should not be at all surprised if such action should follow the step we are taking here. We need trained personnel to administer these services. We need the men back from the front also, to help carry a measure of this kind. We may have them here by July 1, 1945; I pray to God we do.

Some people say that we should provide these services rather than the cash allowances, but many of them have to do with matters entirely within provincial jurisdiction. Health and education, for instance, and even low cost housing may be dealt with by the provincial or municipal authorities. Some of the provinces are looking after the matter of housing at the present time, and the federal government is ready to extend the operations of the National Housing Act. Hon. members may read the speech of the Minister of Finance on May 11 for details in this connection. We need greatly increased educational facilities. Last year Ontario provided a large number of scholarships, which was all to the good. They will help to provide for children over sixteen who show ability and the desire to go ahead with their education. Alberta also has done excellent work in extending and equipping her schools. That is the present trend. It has not been forced upon us by opposition parties; the need has been brought to our attention by the events of the last few years and by thinking people who have been looking forward, as has our Prime Minister. Voluntary associations are increasing in efficiency, but they need more and more money. Perhaps they will get a little of this money to help carry on their excellent work. They give a real service to the community, and fill a very great need.

Some people say that cash benefits will not meet the needs. They will, to some extent at least, even if we do not have the services organized for people to buy with that money. Take the dietary surveys made by the Canadian council on nutrition. Doctor Pett, who heads the nutrition branch of the Department of Pensions and National Health, in association with Doctor George Hunter made one of these surveys in my own city of Edmonton back in the fall of 1939, and his conclusions will be found at page 34 of "Canadian Studies in Nutrition". They made similar studies in Toronto, Halifax and Quebec, and found that Toronto children needed better nutrition, just as much as the children of Quebec needed it. Here is a summary of his conclusions following the Edmonton survey:

> An analysis of our data by Professor Andrew Stewart, of the department of economics, shows the effect of income in the following way. Two groups were chosen: firstly, a group with incomes per person up to $250 a year, and secondly, a group with incomes of $251-$500 a year. These we shall refer to as the "low" and "high" income groups.
> Calories: The low income group showed 60 per cent deficient; the high income group 48 per cent deficient.
> Protein: The low income group showed 64 per cent deficient; the high income group 48 per cent deficient.
> Fat: The low income group showed 57 per cent deficient; the high income group 30 per cent deficient.
> Calcium: The low income group showed 70 per cent deficient; the high income group 50 per cent deficient.
> Iron: The low income group showed 71 per cent deficient; the high income group 60 per cent deficient.

It has been shown that an increase in income will mean an increase in nutrition and in all those things the children need. In this report it is also stated that forty per cent of the people studied were adequately fed; forty per cent got about three-quarter of what they needed, while nearly twenty per cent got little more than half what they needed. Food is not fairly distributed in the family. The worst fed member is the mother; the best fed is the father, the wage-earner. Of the children, except for vitamin C, the worst fed is the teen age youngster who, few people realize, needs more food than the average adult. The report goes on.

> Our results indicate that diet tends to improve automatically with increase of income.

And it is increase of income that we are talking about here. They also state that the three chief reasons for deficiency are, first, lack of money; second, lack of knowledge of what to buy, third, indifference as to whether or not the diet is sufficient. Running all through the findings of our social security committee was the thread of the disaster, the malnutrition or whatever you like to call it, caused by lack of income. More than once Doctor Heagerty mentioned that fact. He spoke of blindness, for instance, in New Brunswick and Quebec, saying that for a long time blindness was not connected with malnutrition but that surveys indicated that it had a direct ratio to the low income group, a direct ratio to poverty. We were told also that the rate of infant mortality is higher in the low income groups than in the higher income groups. So that it comes back to the lack of money, which we are now trying to remedy.

We should extend these services, of course, but I believe that providing this money will give more immediate relief along this line. I would call this direct evidence that income does make a difference in health and nutrition standards. There should be a tremendous improvement even during the time that would be required to organize the services upon which some people are putting so much emphasis. If we intend to raise the standard of living throughout the country, as we say we do, by the introduction of this measure, we must begin with something that will bring immediate results. I contend that in these quotations from recognized authorities in their fields I have brought proof that the family income does make a difference in connection with general deficiency. It means not only physical improvement, for mental improvement follows physical betterment. I taught school, and I know, as many hon. members know, how difficult it is to teach children who are undernourished. There is also a great difference in morals. An improvement in the physical well-being of children brings an improvement mentally and morally as well, as every mother knows.

In the first formative years of a child's life foundations are laid for a great many things. The size of the child, his health, his instinctive reactions, his enterprise, his ambitions—all have their beginning during the first few years of his life, and those are years that cannot be repeated.

It is in the pre-school life of a child that he frequently needs help of this kind. Free school lunches would not touch the pre-school child; he would not come under those benefits. I think these other services will follow because the public conscience has been awakened. The provincial and municipal authorities have their responsibilities as long as they are taking the taxpayers' money, but they are progressing to meet their responsibilities. They will be ready to organize services more rapidly when the federal government has instituted a measure such as this. Income tax exemptions do not reach down far enough; they do not get to those who would benefit the most because they are below the tax level. If the consolidated revenue fund is to be used to provide these moneys, into that fund will go the tax on luxuries—as it should.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

Opponents of this measure say that the money will not be spent wisely. I believe that a great proportion of it will go for things that are necessary and will be used for child development. This committee of women, under the chairmanship of Mrs. McWilliams, which was a subcommittee of Doctor James' committee on reconstruction, drew up a report, part of which I should like to read. Before I leave Doctor Pett, he had this to say about health:

> Let me be quite clear on one point. Canada is actually healthier now than twenty-five years ago.

Then I should like to quote from page 30 of the report of the committee under the chairmanship of Mrs. McWilliams, as follows:

> (a) The subcommittee strongly supports introduction of a system of children's allowances and hopes that the establishment of this system will follow health insurance as soon as possible. It is the only system yet devised which will remove the poverty arising from the fact that a man's wage must be based on the product of a man's labour and not on the size of his family. The subcommittee believes that these allowances should apply to all families with children.

With regard to what is more closely to the point I was speaking about, that supervision is necessary over the spending of the money, this report states:

> (d) It is suggested that the administration of these allowances will have to include some supervision in cases where it may be necessary because of the incompetence or unwillingness of the mother to use the allowances for the purposes for which they are given. Experience has already shown in relation to cash relief and to dependents' allowances that these cases will be few. This supervision could remain in the provincial departments of welfare where these departments are in widespread operation. The cooperation of the schoolteacher and public health, school or rural nurse should be sought in checking up on this matter.

I think we shall have the cooperation of the provinces. I have no doubt we shall have the cooperation of all these different agencies in the dominion. They will be ready to cooperate in seeing that the people know a little more about spending money. But I believe that the real reason for its being spent wisely will be the love of the parents for their children. Doctor Pett has mentioned that the poorest fed person in the family is the mother. He had splendid cooperation from those people whom he saw in Edmonton. It did not depend upon their income whether they cooperated; they were glad to tell him details in order that he might make this survey.

Some say that the misuse will be limited to about one per cent of those who receive the allowances. That figure is based on surveys made in connection with other allowances that have been paid. We asked Doctor James about it when he was before the social security committee. It has been suggested that this bill should be sent to that committee, and this matter has come up to a very limited extent in our surveys. He said:

If these matters are administered through a local organization composed of local citizens who are familiar with the habits, the aptitudes and the abilities of the people with whom they are dealing, the possibility of diverting funds from the purpose for which they are provided would decrease very sharply from an initially low level.

He also made this remark:

I am perfectly willing to admit that the two are interchangeable to a very large extent—

That is, services and cash income.

—as I suggested a little while ago, but I am not sure that you can entirely replace the cash allowances by such things as low-cost housing, rural electrification, free meals at school and free hostels in thinly populated areas. By means of such provisions as these you can reduce the cash bonus to a very low level; but I am not convinced at the moment that you can completely eliminate it in the case of large families. That would be my tentative judgment, but I am open to conviction when a detailed scheme has been worked out for the provision of such material assistance.

The August, 1943, Monthly Labour Review issued by the department of labor of the United States contains this statement:

In March, 1942, after years of opposition to family allowances, the British trade union congress, through its general council, reversed its attitude and agreed with the labour party on the need for a national scheme of child endowment, which should be a charge on the state.

In 1925 the independent labour party in Great Britain adopted a children's allowance plan. The trades unions opposed it, but in 1942 they reversed their stand and I think that is their position to-day. I should also like to quote Doctor Davidson, executive director of the Canadian welfare council. Speaking about family allowances, he says:

This then is the keystone of our arch, the foundation stone of the edifice of social security which we must start to build to-day for the Canada of to-morrow—full employment, including the development of socially useful programmes such as housing and other projects, supported by an adequate wage structure guaranteed by law, and a system of family allowances to supplement the worker's wages by an amount necessary to fill the gap between his earning power and his family responsibilities.

I should like also to refer to Eleanor F. Rathbone's book, "The Case for Family Allowances". She has served a long apprenticeship in public affairs as a social investigator, as a case worker, as a school manager, as a worker for women's suffrage and other feminist reforms, before becoming a member of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom. Many of the reforms she sponsored eventually became law during the reconstruction period which followed the great war. Back in 1924 she wrote her first book on family allowances which was entitled, "The Disinherited Family", and this was followed in 1940 by "The Case for Family Allowances". I quote from page 63 as follows:

The best schemes—best on its merits and most fitted to meet the special needs of war time—would be a wholly state paid, national scheme covering the entire child population up to at least the age of fifteen at a rate of at least five shillings per child. It is significant that so great an economist with so wide a vision as Mr. Maynard Keynes thinks such a scheme desirable and practicable. Nor does it necessarily follow from his argument that it should be combined with his own scheme of deferred earnings, provided that it is accompanied by other methods of effectively limiting all but really necessary consumption during war time.

She makes an interesting review of the case for family allowances. I could go on to quote many other authorities and experts who have had this matter under consideration to show that it has met with approval in a great many circles. I grant that it has also met with disapproval in some circles, but those who have given it approval have had just as wide experience and knowledge as those on the contrary side.

My chief concern about family allowances is its effect upon our Canadian homes, on the opportunity to preserve and strengthen our family life, on the building of our citizens throughout Canada. There is something beyond that. I do not think we can afford not to pay these allowances because the costs of not paying them are not money costs; they are costs in ill health, costs in the upkeep of hospitals and asylums, costs in juvenile delinquency and costs in many other forms.

Perhaps our hope of peace in the post-war world lies in the crusade against disease, poverty, undernourishment, want and ignorance. This is one column advancing toward our goal of better human relationships within our country, yes and beyond our country; it is a part of the freedom from want and freedom from fear.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to refer to the remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) when he spoke this evening on the cost of housing in the province of Quebec. I would remind the house that I spoke on the subject of housing on the 26th of June last when I described what was taking place in the United States. I do not deny that the cost of housing is beyond the reach of those in the low income group; and it was because of that fact that I suggested a plan of giving them relief, the plan which is in operation in the United States, and also in Great Britain. Under the United States housing act, the local housing authority is lent ninety per cent of the cost of building houses at a low rate of interest. I do not intend to repeat what I said then except to refer to the fact that in the city of Montreal some few months ago a project of low-cost housing was undertaken by Mr. George Spinney, and the government at that time agreed to lend the housing authority a sum of money up to ninety per cent of the cost at a rate of three per cent interest which I think too high. The rate in the United States is two per cent, and I suggest that might very well be the rate established by this government for work done by housing authorities in any part of Canada. I am quite sure that if that were done it would greatly relieve slum conditions, which are a menace to any city or any rural district. I shall not refer further to this because it will be found at page 4146 of Hansard.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke to-day on the question of slums. I did not quite follow his reasoning when he said that this measure would help to relieve slums. If a man received an addition of $40 a month, or $480 a year, it would not provide him with enough money to pay an economic rent. It is recognized everywhere that not more than twenty per cent or one-fifth of a man's income can be devoted to the payment of rent. This amount mentioned by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) would provide only $8 a month. It is impossible to get a house of modern type under $20 a month, and the difference would have to be made up in the form of a subsidy. This subsidy would be greatly assisted if the government would lend the housing authorities money at a low rate of interest, to be amortized over a period of, say thirty years.

The Prime Minister gave statistics this afternoon of the percentage of recruits turned down from a lack of nutrition. I should like to give the statistics that were published a little while ago by Great Britain, comparing the numbers in category A in the last war with the numbers in the same category in this war. In the first world war Britain found that only thirty-six per cent of the men drafted for military service were up to the full normal standard of health. Immediately after the first world war Great Britain started a large programme of housing. The full effect of that was felt when recruiting for the second world war began. In the present war eighty-three per cent of the men called up by Great Britain were classified as possessing the full normal standard of health. In commenting on this improvement the London Times said on July 20, 1939:

> The minister of health was fully justified in declaring that the results of these medical examinations of the militia men are a striking tribute to the housing and other public health services.

Great Britain did not then have nor has it now family allowances.

As I said before, the moral and physical effects due to vile living conditions pass none of us by. We all pay far more for slums and bad housing than we would ever be called upon to pay for the erection of clean decent houses for every member of our community.

The Prime Minister spoke to-day about our taking better care of animals, and of the research that was being undertaken in connection with the health of animals. I do not think that is quite a parallel case with man, because when an animal is suffering from tuberculosis or Bang's disease we kill the animal, whereas we put men or women or children suffering from tuberculosis in a hospital and try to cure them.

May I remind the Prime Minister that when he quoted from Saint Paul's teaching that we should bear one another's burdens, he failed to quote another passage in the same chapter to the Galatians when Saint Paul said that every man should bear his own burden. That is to say, let us give a man the opportunity to work and he will be happier bearing his own burden. In his all-embracing attitude of international sympathy and assistance in a contracting world it would be just as logical for the Prime Minister to make this bill extend its benefits to the large families of India and China's underpaid workers.

The Prime Minister implied that this money would perhaps stop another depression. I would ask him, what about the dole?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is not a dole.

Mr. BRUCE: A great deal of money was handed out during the last depression, but it did not stop it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The dole cost this country over $900,000,000 altogether.

Mr. BRUCE: My hon. friend says that it cost this country over $900,000,000.

The Prime Minister also spoke of children being a liability.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I spoke of their being an asset as well.

Mr. BRUCE: I am afraid that he does not know much about farmers because many of them could not get a living without children to help them. The other day I visited an adjoining farm where I saw a child of seven years of age driving a tractor; another child of ten assisted his father to bale hay on one of these modern machines.

I take second place to nobody in my efforts over the years to assist the underprivileged. During a period of twenty-five years, while acting as surgeon in a large hospital, at least fifty per cent of my work was devoted to operations on the poor without any recompense, and I was very happy indeed to be able to render that service. I am not unique in this particular; every medical man and every surgeon in all parts of the country are doing the same thing.

Mr. DUPUIS: We would like you to continue your "operations" in favour of social security.

Mr. BRUCE: I may refer for a moment to the social security committee of which I was a member and the work we have done during the last two years on the subject of national health insurance, which has a direct bearing on the bill we are now considering. Since February, 1942, when an advisory committee on health insurance was created under the chairmanship of Doctor J. J. Heagerty, an intensive study of public health and medical care has been made by them. In carrying out these studies the committee obtained the views of sixteen national groups who appointed their own committees to study the subject of health insurance. These consisted of the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Dental Association, the Canadian Nursing Association, and hospital and other affiliated associations. The majority favoured a provincial plan of health insurance aided by dominion grants. The question of the health of the people of Canada was also made the subject of the meeting of the Dominion Council of Health in 1941. From all this work a draft bill was presented to the committee on social security at the beginning of the 1943 session, and since then we have heard 117 witnesses, representing all phases of public opinion on the subject. We have just concluded consideration of this draft bill, but were not able to deal with the financial clauses, since these must be the subject of agreement between the dominion and the provinces. This means that it must await a dominion-provincial conference, the date of which has not yet been set, so that this important piece of legislation will have to be left over until next year.

I have given the house a brief account of the work which has been put into the proposed bill of national health insurance. In contrast with this I would ask hon. members to compare the method adopted in regard to another social security measure of equal importance, the proposed family allowances bill. This bill, of a much more controversial nature, is brought down, as my leader said to-day, in the last days of the last session of a dying parliament, without any consideration at all, although it is not to become effective until July, 1945.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend on what authority he says that this is the last session of this parliament?

Mr. BRUCE: I assume it is to be the last session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite different.

Mr. BRUCE: If I am wrong in my assumption, perhaps the Prime Minister will correct me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have made it very plain that the life of this parliament does not expire until the 17th of April next. It is quite possible that there will be another session after this. I am not saying that there will be; I am not saying there will not be; but when my hon. friend says that this is the last session, then I ask him on what authority he makes the statement.

Mr. BRUCE: The Prime Minister has not denied that it may be the last session.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, why this great haste. If so urgently needed, why was it not made immediately effective?

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member knows that, as in the case of unemployment insurance, the setting up of the administration machinery must be given very careful and studied consideration.

Mr. BRUCE: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be improper to suggest that it may have some connection with an election in an adjoining province, when it is hoped that this bill will assist the return of a Liberal government. That province because of its large families will derive the greatest benefit from this measure, at the expense of the other provinces, particularly Ontario, which pays one-half of the taxes of Canada.

I would not like the house to think for a moment that I am against providing for the care of children in families where the wage-earner himself is unable to provide adequately for them. I am entirely in favour of giving help to those low income group families through social services to ensure that the children will benefit by better nutrition, better educational facilities, better playground facilities, medical care, and better housing—

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRUCE: —which are of the greatest importance in preventing juvenile delinquency as well as in promoting health.

Mr. MARTIN: I take it that he will not.

Mr. BRUCE: But can any one guarantee that the five to eight dollars allowed for each child will provide anything like the advantages in health and well-being which the services to which I have just referred will do?

Mr. MARTIN: How long would it take to get these services?

Mr. HOMUTH: You have had years to try and do it. Why did you not do it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is time that some of these services were augmented. I believe some are in existence and would be helped very much by a subsidy.

We all agree that additional assistance is needed for the wage-earner in the low wage group with a large family. Cash grants would seem to be the easiest and perhaps the simplest way—

Mr. CLEAVER: And the most effective.

Mr. BRUCE: —but in a certain number of cases there is fear that the money will not reach the children.

Although I have suggested the alternative of greatly improved social services, no doubt in certain cases these will have to be supplemented by a cash grant, but I am opposed to giving out these grants indiscriminately. I would make exception in the case of those members of our armed forces who have offered their lives overseas in defence of our country. The least we can do for them is to make these bonuses immediately available for their dependents.

The most socially-developed countries of Europe, namely Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands, have not accepted the principle of family allowances.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRUCE: After I am through. I would prefer to finish my remarks now.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member overlooks the fact that the Scandinavian countries—

[Mr. Bruce.]

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you a Scandinavian?

Mr. CLEAVER: —are overpopulated.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: The hon. member who has just interrupted will have his opportunity to speak when I have finished. Neither have these countries to which I have referred been involved in the war, and therefore they will not have the large war debts that we shall experience in this country.

Mr. CLEAVER: But they are overpopulated.

Mr. BRUCE: The British government is not entirely in favour of this proposition but would rather meet the problem through welfare services.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must insist that hon. gentlemen on both sides refrain from interrupting the hon. member and allow him to finish his speech.

Mr. BRUCE: However, owing to the great suffering imposed on them by bombing and the impossibility of developing social services as they would like and expect to do later on, there is great urgency and the government may accept the scheme as a temporary measure, but with several strong reservations. We are by no means in the same position as England which, if it bring it in, will do so because of immediate need. It is not a question of need in this country now when people have more money than ever before, whatever may be the case in the post-war period.

The countries to which I have referred, after thorough investigation, rejected the cash bonus principle. They practise instead aid on the basis of need. This government's plan is basically wrong because it disregards need. The cash subsidy is given automatically without regard to family conditions and with no guarantee that the children will benefit. The moral, physical, cultural and general welfare of the children is left absolutely to chance. Some labour unions have expressed themselves as opposed to family allowances because this may be made an excuse for keeping wages down to the minimum. On the other hand, it is stated that no industry can afford to pay wages which will enable the average working man to raise a large family. But I would ask, why should the average working man be expected to raise a large family? I know this is encouraged, and, indeed, may be necessary where man-power has been seriously depleted because of war or epidemic or where we are engaged in building up an army for national defence. I am afraid that if these cash payments are to be made on this basis they will not fulfil their objective, for the money will not go to the provinces which did most of the fighting and suffered most of the casualties.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRUCE: If we are to encourage large families, I think—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is a point of order before the Chair.

Mr. CLEAVER: I would like to ask Your Honour whether there is a rule in this house against the reading of essays.

Mr. HOMUTH: All right. From now on you will get it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It all depends upon who is doing the reading.

Mr. HOMUTH: You want to be smart. Well, you will get it from now on about reading speeches.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. gentlemen must not interrupt.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not think I am trespassing upon the rules any more than any other member. I am trying to follow consecutively along a certain line of thought and must therefore follow my notes.

Mr. HOMUTH: They have asked for it and they will get it.

Mr. BRUCE: If we are to encourage large families, then I think care should be taken that they are eugenically of the kind that will be most likely to improve our race. This bill will result in many cases in bonusing families who have been unwilling to defend their country. May I venture to suggest that our object should be quality rather than quantity. It is surely time for parents to give some consideration to the question of how many children they can afford to bring up. It is not fair to bring children into the world just to satisfy an uncontrollable impulse without thought of whether sufficient food and other necessities will be available for them. Surely there must be some alternative to baby bonuses which will preserve the sanctity of the family, maintain a normal birthrate, and place the major economic burden of raising children where it belongs, upon the parents. Why should a hard working man who has planned a normal sized family have to curtail his wishes because he is heavily taxed in order to help to support a large family of shiftless people, and perhaps in some cases the lazy man who counts on the state keeping him and whatever he likes to bring into the world? Hitler used this method as part of his campaign to raise the birthrate when the nazis set out to equalize the economic burden of raising big families through the family equalization fund. The nazis paid such big subsidies for children that it was actually possible in Germany for a man to earn more by begetting babies than he did by working for a living. I am not opposed to aid for children, but I am opposed to this particular form of aid, family allowances, because it gives no guarantee that the children will benefit, because it will be costly and cumbersome in operation, full of inequalities, and finally because it is the essence of the dole. Another major objection to cash family allowances is that they place upwards of two million families, more than two-thirds of the families in this country, on the public payroll. Every month they will look to their fairy godmother, Ottawa, for a hand-out.

Another reason why I oppose this bill is that it is unconstitutional and an invasion of provincial rights, as my leader pointed out this afternoon. It should not have been introduced before having a dominion-provincial conference and getting their consent to an amendment to the British North America Act, which amendment would then have to be adopted by the British parliament. Is it not amusing to observe a Liberal government, which laughed at Aberhart's $25 a month to all families, suddenly bringing down a baby bonus proposition which will cost the country $200 million or more? This bonus will be given to children up to fifteen years of age, whereas even in Russia it is proposed to bonus children only up to five years of age. It should be remembered that the government will get the money for their largesse out of the people by taxes. This means that everyone who pays taxes will have less money to educate and bring up his own family. I believe that it is a fact that sixty-three per cent of the families with ten or more children live in the province of Quebec. Contrast this with British Columbia where families are small and where forty per cent have no children living at home. When eight provinces realize that they are being taxed for the benefit of one province, will it not accentuate the disunity which has shaken Canada from coast to coast, because the government chose to listen to the powerful voice of this same province which refused to share equally with others in fighting the common enemy? Will these eight provinces not be justified in concluding that this is a subsidy for votes as well as for babies, and that this undigested bill has been rushed in before a provincial election and a pending federal election with the object of influencing votes in the government's favour?

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): It is with a deep sense of appreciation that I rise on this occasion to support this measure of family allowances. I already had indicated its importance to this house by having inserted on the order paper on January 27, 1942, the following resolution:

Resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of granting family allowances, taking into consideration the respective jurisdiction of both federal and provincial parliaments, and that the matter should be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations, with instructions to inquire and make a report.

This measure was announced in the speech from the throne in January last, and I must compliment the government upon bringing in this bill which I consider of the greatest importance for the social welfare of our people. No other single social measure could be introduced in this or any other parliament or legislative assembly which offers at one and the same time so many ramifications into and corrections of our economic ills, and establishes at the same time a beacon of light in the way of social progress to humanity.

When Sir William Beveridge honoured this august body with his conference in this very building on May 25, 1943, as will be seen in report No. 13 of the special committee on social security I asked him the following questions:

Mr. Blanchette: Would our distinguished guest care to give any comment as to his appreciation of children's allowances in any plan of social security?

Sir William Beveridge: I am very glad you asked that question because children's allowances are the most revolutionary thing in my report, and they have been accepted in Britain. I propose children's allowances for two main reasons. The first is that without children's allowances you cannot abolish want. Poverty in Britain before the war was due to two causes. It was due either to the interruption of earnings or a man having too large a family for his wages We do not believe that Britain can get on unless there are a substantial number of large families. Unless we can get an average of nearly three children born to a family the British race will diminish and finally die out. Therefore there must be large families and we want some large families. In order to abolish want you have got to have children's allowances. The secondary reason is that if you give allowances for children only when people are unemployed or sick you will sometimes have cases where people have as much money when they are sick or unemployed as they can earn or even more. That is a bad situation. There are quite a number of other reasons for children's allowances, such as its effect upon the population and the quality of the population which I will not go into now. Until recently there was considerable opposition to children's allowances on the part of some trade unions, but at the last trade union congress in September last they accepted children's allowances. It has been accepted by the government as to its principle. I think you may take it that it will be adopted. I should be very much interested to see whether or not you adopt it in this country. I hope you will because I believe it is a good thing.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of Sir William Beveridge on the matter after his extensive and exhaustive research and study. It is my firm opinion that Great Britain will be accepting family allowances very shortly if it has not done so already, in view of Sir William Beveridge's conviction in the matter and the progress of thought which he has brought in that direction.

Our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his book "Industry and Humanity", which he published in 1918, gave an impetus toward the betterment of mankind by his enunciation in his treatise, by his contribution of a sound and comprehensive basis for constructive and combined effort which may prove of a very special value to an understanding and effective solution of the social problems of our day. Mr. King believes, as enunciated in his book "that considerations of health, broadly interpreted as denoting physical, mental and moral well-being lie at the basis of all efficiency and at the very foundation of society. In recognition of the health of workers and their social well-being the emphasis will shift from the sacredness of possession to the sacredness of life, from the value of property and its rights to the value of personality and its rights, from material resources to human resources". The elimination of fear, social and industrial, will be found to be at the root of all regulation toward the betterment of mankind. "There is a legitimate fear", says Mr. King, whereas with respect to work done compensation is wholly inadequate and insufficient to sustain life; there is a legitimate fear where despite willingness to work, work is not to be had; there is a legitimate fear where through sickness and invalidity the capacity to earn is gone and the savings of months and years drawn and exhausted; there is a legitimate fear where age is confronted with the alternative of poverty or dependence; there is a legitimate fear where the woman is suddenly left without support for her children. Each and everyone of these fears, Mr. Speaker, is susceptible to be the lot of many of our family heads when forty-six per cent of these received a salary under one thousand dollars in Canada in 1941, and again when in the United States forty-seven per cent of the spending units received less than one thousand dollars in 1935 and 1936. True it is that legislation has been passed to meet, in a certain measure, practically all the fears above enumerated, save the latter, the fear of the heads of large families that they may be unable to bring up their families in keeping with the value of the human personality. In my opinion this measure providing family allowances will make life much more bearable for those who have not, without in any way endangering the way of life of those who have. However, the latter will have the added satisfaction of knowing they are helping their fellow men and humanity in general, and that feeling will be with them forever. That is the only wealth we can keep. In a brief on the Marsh report the Canadian association of social workers take the following stand in regard to family allowances:

> The association approves the principle of family allowances and welcomes their inclusion in the Marsh report. Such grants have been general in Europe, and an essential part of the social security scheme of Australia and New Zealand. In Canada, a considerable proportion of our population is now supported by dependents' allowances. We therefore approve the universal application of this principle by extending these allowances to the whole population. The payments made by dependents' allowance represent our most comprehensive Canadian experience to date; it has been tested and proved in practice. The Canadian association of social workers therefore suggests that a scale of grants be adopted not less adequate than that of the dependents' allowance.

Our own parliament made a study of family allowances, through the standing committee on industrial and international relations, in February, 1929, so that it will be seen that this question, which has been discussed by sociologists and economists for the past fifty or sixty years, is now being given the prominence and importance it merits. What greater merit, what greater importance could any proposed measure have than that of the welfare of mankind ? The question of family allocations made considerable headway after the last war; in the six years from 1918 to 1924 there was definite progression of thought in regard to the principle of this legislation, which was adopted by France in 1918 and by Belgium in 1921. Definite progress was made in some fifteen other European countries, as well as in New South Wales and New Zealand. The International Labour Review for April, 1940, has this to say in regard to the scope of family allowances:

> In Belgium and France practically the whole population now receives family allowances. In New Zealand and New South Wales the schemes also apply to all categories of citizens and activities, with the important reservation that allowances are paid only to families with a limited income. In Italy and Spain the basic regulations provide for the extension of the allowances to all the main branches of economic activity, but only for workers, and in Chile only for salaried employees. In Hungary the payment of allowances is restricted to workers in industry and commerce.

The principle of family allocations is not established on the basis of charity, but rather on the high plane of social justice, for upon the maintenance of the family depends the very maintenance of the state. The family allowance is based on the principle of the natural and inalienable right of each and everyone of us not only to obtain the means of his existence but to a wage which will permit him and the members of his family to live rather than merely exist. As it has been established in the providential order that man must not live alone, that he is destined to establish and bring up a family, so, therefore, must it be admitted that a well organized economic regime must be such that all men of normal capacity may be able to supply their needs and those of their families.

I will not undertake a philosophic discussion of the right of ownership which Christian philosophers, economists and sociologists recognize as established in the very nature of man, taking precedence over the nature of the state. I will say, however, that from this right of ownership emanate many restrictions, among them the right of a lawfully constituted authority to direct and orient the right of property toward the common good and welfare of its subjects. Upon this right is predicated the power of the state to legislate upon contracts, wills and transfers of property; to levy taxes upon property for the administration of the state, and so on. The state has a mission to look after the general welfare of its subjects, and it also has the power and right to modify its economic regime if that regime is opposed to the principles of social and distributive justice, in order that it may further, as much as possible, the general welfare of its members. I need not pursue minutely or in detail the rapid transformation of our economic system which has resulted in ever-increasing production, creating at times, in some parts of the world, the erroneous belief or conviction that a human person was a mere economic chattel, to be treated accordingly.

It may be well for us to stop here for a moment to consider what has been the fate of the Canadian family of ordinary means, which is by far the most numerous in our economic set-up. Upon that consideration we may predicate a conclusion as to whether this proposed measure of family allowances is a tangible expression of the Atlantic charter or of the new order, aimed at the advancement and betterment of humanity in general. Economists agree that the family of five is a normal family; that is, the father, mother and three children. This family of five is considered necessary to at least maintain the population of a country. I believe also this is the numerical basis upon which statistics in regard to family budgets are established for the various countries of the world. The Marsh report establishes that the minimum amount which this family of five must have for its budget should be not less than $1,471.60, apportioned as follows:

Food, $34.66 per month.
Lodging, $25 per month.
Recreation, periodicals, and so forth, $1.39 per month.
Life insurance, medical care and other exigencies, $3.57 per week.
Tramways, 75 cents per week.
General furniture upkeep, 50 cents per week.

A serious examination of these items will show that there is no exaggeration in the figures given, unless it be that they are not high enough. This minimum budget of $1,471 as established by Marsh is corroborated by the welfare council of Toronto as being practically the results of its investigations. In 1941, as has been stated already, forty-six per cent of the heads of families in Canada received a salary of less than $1,000 a year. There are in Canada 225,640 families of two children; 135,240 families with three children, and 223,940 families with four children or more.

May it not therefore be logically deduced from this statement that forty-six per cent of the heads of families in Canada having an annual salary of under $1,000 have to put up with unsanitary home conditions, malnutrition and are just about eking out an existence in this land of plenty and unbounded resources? May it not also be deduced that there is something wrong with an economic system that will tolerate the payment of such revenue to the heads of forty-six per cent of the families of the country? Does not this proposed measure of family allowances offer an immediate and necessary relief to those afflicted families? As I stated at the outset of my remarks, family allocations are not based upon the principle of charity as has been asserted in some quarters. They are based upon the following considerations.

First, the head of the family is rendering a service to the state by maintaining or increasing the population of the country. It is self-evident that a single person or a family without children cannot be said to be either maintaining or increasing the population of the country. Second, the population of the country is considered a great factor in the wealth of the nation. In the sixteenth century the economist Bodin stated that there was no strength or wealth but that found in the human person. The history of modern nations to-day bears out the truth of that axiom.

In 1870 Germany was considered to be a poor nation. None the less it saw its wealth doubled with the increase of its population during the thirty years preceding the war of 1914. On the other hand, during the same period France saw its wealth and population remain practically stagnant. It is all the more important for a young country like Canada that its population should increase in view of the vast expanses of our dominion and our valuable resources. Family allocations will surely make an increased population possible by providing better nutrition and better medical care to our children. These two factors alone will greatly increase our population.

Various insurance companies have endeavoured to place a value upon the person engaged in production. For example, the Metropolitan Life Insurance company carried on a wide and extensive research in this connection some few years back. They came to the conclusion that a person thirty years of age earning $50 a week represented some $31,000 of the economic wealth of the country to which he belonged. At his birth this same person represented an economic value of $9,333. Who is responsible for the proper upkeep, development and orientation of this person whose value to the state is $9,333 if it is not his father and mother? Again the research of the Metropolitan Life mentions that the total cost to a family of a producer such as the one just referred to is $7,200.

The family provides the state with willing workers in agriculture, industry, education and science. The greater the family, the greater its power of consumption of goods produced by the industries of the nation. In view of all these services rendered by the family to the country it would appear that some special consideration should be given by the country to large families. In some cases just the opposite prevails in that the larger the family, the greater the indirect taxes paid, and at times there is even a greater payment of direct taxes.

The economist Fallon has well said that family allocations are not a charitable donation but rather an assistance, an indemnity, a payment for service rendered to the state. It is earned in the most respectable sense of the word. It should be considered just as honourable as payment for other services rendered to the state. For example, the judge and magistrate are not paid because they render justice on the basis of their monetary remuneration. The soldier does not defend his country for the pay he gets. Both of these categories are paid because of the service they render to their country, and family allocations should be considered in like manner.

Saturday Night of July 8 last had this to say on the question of family allowances:

There are no doubt certain weaknesses about the bonus system, but it has not yet been established that they are greater than the weaknesses of having no system of dealing with the needs of the underprivileged families, or the weaknesses of any other practical method of doing so.

The proposal of Miss Charlotte Whitton for greatly extended revision of social services are admirable, but they do not and cannot guarantee that all needy families would be adequately looked after.

And again:

A united nation is one in which the more fortunate citizens of all kinds, simply because they are citizens and are more fortunate, are willing to be taxed for the benefit of the less fortunate citizens of all kinds, simply because they also are citizens, but are less fortunate, due in great part because of their greater economic responsibility due to large families.

The article ends with:

We shall have a Canadian nation only when we can feel, pretty generally, that a Canadian child is a Canadian child and entitled to certain economic advantages, whether he is French or Scottish, or Ukrainian by racial origin, whether he is in Quebec or Alberta, whether he is the son of a Roman Catholic or a Presbyterian or a Lutheran. We can hasten that time, or, we can defer it, by our attitude on this legislation.

The Labour Review of June last had this to say:

In quite a few countries, children's allowances were paid before the war. After the war, still more countries will have them. Canada has to decide whether or not to keep abreast of Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand in social progress and population policy.

In this sparsely populated land, we should ask ourselves, not whether we can afford children's allowances, but whether we can afford any longer to do without them.

To bring up a large family of children constitutes an unbearable burden to workers who live a hand-to-mouth existence. Not only does this deprive that family of many essentials of life, but frequently it means absolute poverty.

Of all the contingencies of modern life, that of the overburdened family has been the last to be recognized. It may perhaps be easy to explain the tardiness of the movement. The burden of a large family, although just as serious and lasting an even longer period, has not the striking appeal of accidents, unemployment, illness, old age dependency, or widowhood and orphanage. Its hardships are more hidden and the social conscience has naturally been slower in awakening. Furthermore, the sufferings of the victims of economic pressure are not so dramatically displayed as are sacrifices of men in war. They are none the less real, although being silently, slowly, and obscurely borne.

The value of a system of family allowances cannot be questioned. No one can deny the injustice now imposed upon parents who have to raise a large family on wages which at times are frequently insufficient for the parents, let alone the children.

Family allowances would relieve much of the anxiety and poverty which now confronts many parents. They would bring about greater efficiency and reduced labour turnover They would supply an additional ready market for consumers goods to the extent of some one hundred million dollars a year at least; they would give an impetus to the better housing movement and greatly contribute to the gradual disappearance of slum housing. They would also be of some assistance in immigration.

From the point of view of society, the family allowance is the safest and surest way of promoting health and raising the standards of the race both physically and morally. It is the easiest way of preventing the stunted growth of children, and is the least expensive method of reducing infant mortality.

The moral law of the universe is progress, and progress always offers shock and dislocation to the institutions of the past. Every generation that passes idly without adding to that progress remains uninscribed upon the register of humanity, and the succeeding generation tramples its ashes as dust.

Every age has its problems, by solving which humanity is helped forward. The solution of any problem cannot be far wrong if it be solved with a desire for the betterment and social advancement of our fellow men.

I should like in conclusion to quote a paragraph taken from Industry and Humanity, which reads:

The sacredness of human personality is more important than all the other considerations. Without infinite regard for individual life, however obscure or deformed, expressions of social values are meaningless. Estimates of national power, pride in industrial growth, forecasts of world expansion . . . any and all of these which reckon material gains apart from the human losses they involve, mistake for life itself the coarse texture of but a part of the garment of life.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I deem it my duty to commend the government for having introduced this measure in the House of Commons. I must say, at the outset, that my commendation implies some qualifications for reasons which I shall indicate in a few moments, I believe that this question of family allowances should be viewed from two different angles. There is first the matter of principle and in the second place the method of applying that principle. When discussing that second point I shall have to be at variance with the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and I shall indicate, I believe, that if the bill is not unconstitutional on the whole, it contains at least some most important clauses which go beyond the powers of this parliament.

On that matter of principle, I believe that at this time, nearly all men of good will recognize that family allowances have become necessary nowadays. As far as I am concerned, I had an opportunity, fairly long ago, of advocating publicly the payment of family allowances and I made it a point last year to speak before service clubs where I expounded the value and the advantages of such social legislation. Last year, on March 18, speaking on the budget, I had this to say:

The second thing that comes to the mind of the man on the street is that this budget disregards too much the situation of the Canadian family. The exemptions provided for families with children are not adequate, especially when we take into consideration the obligations of those who have many children below the age of fourteen.

A few weeks later, that is on April 8, 1943, during the debate on the War Income Tax Act, I had an opportunity of voicing similar ideas, when I said, as reported in Hansard:

In the application of the income tax the position of those who have many children to support should be taken into consideration. Speaking on the budget some weeks ago I expressed the view that the government should take more care of the heads of large families. I recalled that the essential elements that constitute the society which we are now fighting to safeguard are not adequately protected as regards the burden of taxation imposed upon them.

Further on, as reported on the next page, I said:

Therefore my contention is that married people with dependents, and especially those with four or more dependents, are not adequately protected but are penalized because they have too many children. The country needs large families and it needs well brought up families.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this matter of family allowances, like all questions pertaining to social legislation, should be considered on its merits. It is to be regretted that all too often such matters should be discussed, in some quarters, as happened to-night in this house, in a spirit of narrow-mindedness and intolerance.

As an illustration, I should like to quote from an article that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on June 18, 1944, and in which it was said:

(Text): The largest slice of the appropriation for family allowances will go to the province of Quebec by reason of the fact that Quebec has more children under 16 years than any other province in the dominion. . . .

(Translation): We have heard practically the same arguments this evening.

(Text): But Ontario, as usual, will be called upon to shoulder one-half of the annual cost of family allowances, or baby bonuses. Thus, the taxpayers of this province will be called upon to support a neighbouring province where big families are more fashionable.

(Translation): And in another newspaper from farther afield the Brandon Sun (Manitoba) of July 4, 1944, I find the following:

(Text): The rest of Canada could with some justice assert that the baby bonus was taken from them for the main benefit of the province of Quebec.

(Translation): And this evening we heard in this house the following statement: "These allowances will go to families who refuse to defend their country."

Mr. Speaker, while I do not wish to flatter the government—everyone knows my political views—I say that it is a shame to find that some people discuss such an important matter in such a narrow-minded and small way.

National unity is frequently mentioned and I believe that trouble-makers, those who do their utmost to disrupt national unity, are not found, as some claim, in the province of Quebec but they come from elsewhere. I suggest that this matter of family allowances arises from this famous document known as the Atlantic Charter. Indeed, clause 6 of this charter reads as follows:

After the final destruction of the nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurances that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

May I point out that we, in Canada, are not the first to advocate such a policy regarding family allowances and those who to-day oppose this measure should seek information in this respect. Indeed, on June 23, 1942, the British House of Commons unanimously passed the following resolution:

(Text): That this house, having regard to the supreme importance of further safeguarding the health and well-being of the rising generation, commends for the immediate consideration of the government the institution of a national scheme of allowances for dependent children as an important contribution to this vital object.

(Translation): Consequently, in June, 1942, the British House of Commons unanimously accepted the principle of family allowances. It follows that we are not pioneers in this particular field, and as it was said a while ago during this debate, several European countries and others have voted legislation of this kind.

In passing, I should like to quote two or three sentences taken from Dr. Marsh's report on social security.

(Text): Quite irrespective of whether the right parents have the most children, children should have an unequivocal place in social security policy. If we are concerned about the quality of parents and their children the proper approach is not to condemn the children to hardship or inadequate conditions because their parents happen to be poor. The child has no choice. His opportunity in the modern community does not depend only on such advantages as he receives by inheritance from his parents, but on their income level, and on the children with whom he must grow up. The needs, of course, are greatest among the lower income groups, but there are narrow margins for the families of many parents whose earnings by labour market standards would be regarded as reasonable or moderate.

(Translation): I would add to these testimonies, which I claim to be authoritative, that one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) who very appropriately said in his speech on the address:

(Text): As regards family allowances here again we in the services have had actual experience. I have never heard a single unmarried airman complain because a married man of the same rank, doing the same job, actually was getting more money because of his dependents' allowance; they all agree that it is a first-class thing. I understand that there is considerable opposition from some groups because they feel that this is going to give undue advantage to large families of French Canada. I say this is a reproach not to the large families of French Canada but to the small families or the lack of families in the rest of Canada. If family allowances increase the size of the families in the rest of Canada it will be a very fine thing, far better than any system of unrestricted or selected immigration.

(Translation): The hon member for Vancouver North deserves commendation for this fair and honest statement. As I said before, this matter has been studied by sociologists, men of great experience, well versed in the matter and it is now acknowledged everywhere as indispensable. I shall only refer you to the work of Father Léon Lebel, Jesuit, who has investigated the different aspects of this subject and has concluded that such a measure has become necessary. I wish also to mention two well-written articles which appeared in Le Droit, an Ottawa newspaper and in L'Action Catholique, of Quebec city containing comprehensive reviews of the whole situation.

Mr. Speaker, we should not forget that family allowances will apply essentially and primarly to large families; this is very important, especially in view of the remarks I shall make in connection with the methods of applying the principle of the bill.

Before doing this, I would like to quote an excerpt from the report of the McTague commission on labour problems. In reading over this extract, Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised to notice that this Mr. McTague, who is now, as everyone knows, one of the leaders of the Progressive Conservative party, has altered his views, if we may judge by the opinions expressed in the house this afternoon.

Another solution could be a system of family allowances granted by the federal authorities. Doubtless its administration would offer some difficulties and complexities. However, it would be feasible. The family allowance could be paid to the worker who is the head of a family, for children under 16 on a decreasing scale for each additional child.

It would seem that the bill now before the house has been copied on the McTague report, with all the flaws discernible in the above excerpt. It is rather surprising to find that, for reasons I have already enumerated, certain people object to this necessary measure, meant to help the heads of large families, who are now prevented, by our present economic set-up, properly to maintain their children, especially as their number increases. The reason for this is that, previous to the expansion of large industries, there were many small plants and numerous small shop owners who could work more than eight or ten hours a day, as the needs of their families required. Now, with the standardization of work, with the present system to which we must submit, wages are stabilized and the head of a family is not allowed, as before, to work longer hours in order to increase his income. He must comply with the requirements of our economic system. In the past the need for such legislation may not have been felt, but to-day it has become necessary, by reason of our economic set-up and by reason of the important place the machine has taken in industry.

Mr. Speaker, economists are all agreed that in order to maintain society each family must have at least three children, and if society is to expand and progress, it is necessary that there be at least four children in each family. Now, in Canada, according to figures which were given last year in answer to questions I had asked concerning the 1941 census, and which may be found at page 1230 of unrevised Hansard for 1943, it may be seen that according to this census, there were 2,486,920 families in Canada; out of this number, 782,000 had no children. I have already stated that according to the economists families must have at least three children in order to maintain the population at the same level. Now, in Canada 2,059,150 families had three children or less. The number of families with four children or more, the only families who can contribute to the development and progress of our society, amounted to 427,770, or 17·2 per cent of the total number. This means that, according to the 1941 census, 17·2 per cent of family heads of this country have to assure the progress of society, and, as we all know, they are not the ones who receive the largest salaries. Therefore it is obvious that society must come to the assistance of that part of our population which must bear the whole burden of the progress and advancement of society.

Now that I have made clear the necessity of this social legislation, especially through the authorities I have quoted, I come to the second part of my remarks: the methods put forward in the bill before us. Before going into certain details I must admit that I was somewhat astonished when I heard family allowances mentioned in the speech from the throne, because last year, on the 8th of April to be exact, during the debate I mentioned a moment ago on the Income War Tax Act, I had introduced in this house an amendment to the budget resolution before us. Here is the amendment I introduced then:

That section 1 of the present resolution be amended by adding the following words:

"Provided that in the case of a married person with four or more dependents, or any person granted an equivalent status under the act, whose earned income is less than $3,000, there will be no income tax liability in respect of the taxation year 1942.

This amounted, I think, to a sort of recognition of principles whose application is to-day acknowledged by everyone as being imperative. Now, here is what was at that time—that is in April, 1943, and therefore not very long ago—the government policy as regards this particular point as expressed by Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I quote from page 1993 of Hansard:

In our taxation system, should we provide that from his taxes a taxpayer shall have deducted an amount sufficient to enable him to support his wife and children. Well, I say it never has been done, and I do not think it ever should be done. When a person marries he expects and is expected to assume responsibilities. He does not expect the government to assume his responsibilities for him.

And a little further on:

If a single man gets married he must be prepared to support himself and his wife on the income he received before he was married.

[Mr. Dorion.]

This year, when the government announced this scheme of family allowances in the speech from the throne, I found, to my surprise, and I am therefore justified in saying this, that its policy concerning large families had undergone a radical change.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): We have a progressive government.

Mr. DORION (Translation): That's right. Notwithstanding the most appropriate remarks made this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Justice, I submit that the provinces ought to have their say in the administration of this social legislation. Not so much from a constitutional aspect as from a practical aspect, as regards implementing this social legislation, the provincial governments are evidently in a much better position that the dominion government to know the needs of their people. The former come in much closer contact with the individuals who require help and who may benefit by this social legislation.

As regards the application of the family allowances principle the provinces are in a much better position than any department of the federal government to carry out such legislation properly. There is more to this, however. As I said earlier, one finds in the bill now before the house striking and important flaws. For my part I will certainly support the bill because I consider it far more important than any question of procedure. To a certain extent, however, I wish to disclaim responsibility for possible after-affects of the bill, for I submit it cannot be applied in its entirety and that the children whom it is intended to favour might not benefit by this act unless it is amended in certain respects. My statement is based on subsection 2 of section 4 which reads as follows:

The allowance shall cease to be payable with the payment for the month when the child attains his sixteenth birthday or when, being above the age of six years and physically fit to attend school, he fails to attend school or to receive equivalent training as prescribed in the regulations or when he dies or ceases to reside in Canada, etc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is one matter which is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces it is the matter of education. As a matter of fact, I need only refer to section 93 of the British North America Act to find out that the Dominion government can in no way and under no circumstances interfere with education. Now, in this measure, children are compelled to attend school until the age of sixteen. The Dominion government is accordingly enforcing compulsory education. The door being thus open, where can such a system lead us? Who can tell us that the education of our children will not, through some regulation enacted under the powers granted the dominion government by this act, have to be given in one way or another? Who can tell us that, the door now being thus open, children will not be compelled to attend some particular school? It might then be maintained that the section I have just mentioned is only being carried out, and I submit—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier) (Translation): One must have a good deal of imagination to draw such conclusions.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I am only reading the bill and I submit that imagination has no part in that. I challenge any one to say that under subsection 2 of section 4 compulsory education is not imposed. I shall go farther. School attendance is made compulsory until the age of sixteen! What will happen in the province of Quebec, since under the compulsory education act of that province children must attend school only until the age of fourteen? The provincial act and this one will conflict. It is obvious that the provisions of subsection 2, section 4, of the bill is unconstitutional. That is not all. In section 6 of the same bill, provision is made for the establishment of a court of appeal:

> If any person is dissatisfied with a decision as to his right to be paid an allowance or as to the amount of an allowance payable to him or as to any other matter arising under this act, he may appeal against such decision to a tribunal to be established and conducted in accordance with regulations, . . .

Now, in reference to the British North America Act—

Mr. ST. LAURENT (Translation): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will permit me. We are now debating the second reading and the principle involved, not the details. The points brought up by the hon. member are certainly debatable. Details will be examined when each section is submitted to the committee. Does not the hon. member think it would be more profitable to postpone the detailed discussion until the matter is referred to the committee of the house for consideration? I do not want to raise any objection, but the hon. member stated he agreed with the principle of the bill. He will be given all the latitude desired to make representations, which might prove very weighty, when the bill is discussed in detail. The hon. member admitted of his own accord that he did not consider the objections he is discussing at present would justify him in opposing the principle which is submitted to the house for second reading. Would it not be preferable to postpone this discussion until it is possible to arrive at a decision on the objections raised by the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): He is offering suggestions for the improvement of the bill.

Mr. DORION (Translation): The reason why I raised those two points is that the honourable the Minister of Justice, if I am not mistaken, told us this afternoon, when he discussed the constitutionality of the act, that its going into effect was dependent on two conditions: first, that application should be made in accordance with the provisions of the act, and second, that the money should be spent for the welfare of the child. Now, in answer to the Minister of Justice, I have the right to show that this bill contains, as I said at the outset, sections which, in my opinion, are unconstitutional. I am discussing the principle of the bill by referring to the unconstitutional character of a few sections of this bill. From a practical standpoint, I wish to submit to this house the observations I have to make because, and I do say this with the utmost sincerity, the application of the bill in its present form will be impossible or it will entail so many difficulties that the measures which we now are considering for the benefit of children will not be operative. I think it is proper to discuss, on the matter of principle, the constitutionality of some provisions and the practicability of some others. I believe I am quite in order.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, section 6 provides for the setting up of a tribunal. I suggest that under section 92 of the British North America Act, subsection 14, this is a matter which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces:

> The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

And to exemplify, I would say that at one time some legislation had to be passed by this parliament in connection with the Bankruptcy Court, and it was desired to submit the dispute to a special court. Under the Bankruptcy Act that dispute had to be referred to provincial courts.

Section (d) of chapter 213 states:

> "Court" means, in the province of Quebec, the Superior Court.

And section 104 of chapter 213 states:

> Such an appeal shall lie to the highest court of final resort for the province or territory in which the proceeding originated.

Therefore, this parliament has no authority to set up this tribunal and clause 6 should be deleted or be amended, otherwise it might give rise to disputes which would prevent the operation of the Act. And further, as the bill now stands, I suggest that the tribunal in question would merely be a board to ratify the decisions of the minister as provided by section 5. We have at present in Canada courts capable of administering this act and in my opinion no other courts should be set up for this purpose.

There is another anomaly which I would point out and it is found in section 3. I am absolutely opposed to the decreasing scale of allowances because, as I said a moment ago, family allowances are intended primarily for large families. I suggest that under the scale provided in section 3 this principle is disregarded. As the family increases the allowance decreases. Therefore, I contend that this is contrary to the principle under which family allowances should be given to large families.

There is another and more serious anomaly. Here is the last paragraph of section 3:

> Provided that the allowance payable shall, in respect of a fifth child maintained by the parent, be reduced by one dollar and in respect of a sixth child and a seventh child respectively so maintained, by two dollars and in respect of an eighth child and each additional child respectively so maintained, by three dollars.

What is meant by the word "maintain"? Referring back to section 2, I do not think the definition is what we might expect. Here it is:

> "maintains" means maintains wholly or substantially.

Then, the word should be taken in its etymological sense.

A man may have children over 16 whom he maintains and for whom he draws no family allowance, although they contribute to reduce the grant provided for his younger brothers and sisters.

The following illustration is a perfect example of such a situation. Let us take a family with six children aged 20, 18, 16, 14, 12 and 10. The first three, as frequently happens, are still at school and therefore maintained by their parents; however, they do not entitle them to family allowances because they are over sixteen. The fourteen-year-old, the twelve-year-old and the ten-year-old are respectively the fourth, fifth and sixth children.

Under section 3, these last three children, the only members of the family entitled to the allowances, would see their grants reduced because they have older brothers maintained by their parents.

I consider this a flaw in this measure and, to my mind, it is in direct opposition to the principle of the bill.

I felt it important to point out these flaws and I deemed it my duty to call attention to them immediately so they may be remedied. A practical and properly applied family allowance legislation would answer an obvious need throughout the country and would benefit the large families.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote, with your permission, an extract from a poem by Richmond Builder, which, I believe, summarizes this whole situation.

So Long As There Are Homes

So long as there are homes to which men turn
At the close of day,
So long as there are homes where children are—
Where women stay,
If love and loyalty and faith be found
Across these sills,
A stricken nation can recover from
Its gravest ills.

So long as there are homes where fires burn
And there is bread,
So long as there are homes where lamps are lit
And prayers are said:
Although a people falter through the dark
And nations grope,
With God himself back of these little homes
We still can hope.

On motion of Mr. Claxton the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 26, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF TERREBONNE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Lionel Bertrand, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Terrebonne. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of bill No. 162, to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of bill No. 163, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 166, to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, once more I register my protest against this kind of legislation. After the interprovincial conference in 1935 Mr. Dunning, who was then minister of finance, came out with this same suggestion, which was also contained in the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I always felt that I was wrong when I supported Mr. Dunning, and I could not accept the Sirois report, which was the apotheosis of soft brains. For these reasons I register my protest against legislation of this kind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The trouble in regard to succession duties has been that when a person dies the executors make their filing, which goes down to the divisional office of the succession duties branch, and then after months and months and months—and months, as one hon. member beside me suggests—the department send out a notice that they are not satisfied with the return that has been made and they jump the assessment up by perhaps many thousands of dollars; not only that, but they charge interest on the amount from the time of death until the duty is paid. That is not right, because the executors do not know that the department will change the assessment or have different ideas about the amount of the estate. I feel that no interest should be charged on the unpaid balance until after a notice has been sent to the executors. The same thing applies to income tax on estates. I notice it in connection with the deferred tax for 1942. I got my notice the other day that my deferred tax for 1942 was so much, and due at time of death and interest at eight per cent to be charged from date of death. I think that is very unjust.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the hon. member has got two things mixed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, I am just saying that as regards succession duty and deferred income tax for 1942, the same rule applies. They go back to the time of death. I say that interest should be charged only from the time the notice has been sent out from the succession duty office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister should give some explanation as to why in the case of succession duties and income tax, interest is charged from a date anterior to the making of the assessment, rather than from the time of ascertaining what the liability is. This is an obnoxious feature of both laws—the charging of interest on an unascertained amount prior to assessment. I object to it. On principle it is bad. Under no statute I know of other than these two statutes, under no process of law that I know of, does interest begin to run, except by contract as in the case of a promissory note, or of special contract in the case of a special contract, until the liability at least is ascertained. That is a sound principle. This is a violation of that principle; it must be done simply for the purpose of screwing a little more money out of the taxpayers, and I object to it.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to repeat the protest I made when this matter was being discussed on the resolution, against the practice which is followed at the present time with respect to the use of the Dominion Succession Duty Act to force the filing of income tax returns. Have the officials of the department in charge of this particular act the right, once it is determined that an estate is not taxable, to refuse to issue the certificate until the personal representative has filed whatever income tax returns the income tax division feels justified in calling upon him to supply?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no legal justification for that.

Mr. BENCE: I suggested before that if the matter of the income tax form and the administration of that department has to be tightened up it should be done under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act. I object most strenuously to this indirect method of forcing people to do something which they were not forced to do before this act was brought into effect. The question of dominion succession duties has nothing to do with income tax. I suggest that the administration is merely taking this indirect method of doing something which, if it is done, should be done in a direct way. Is the department within its legal rights in refusing to issue the certificate merely because the income tax division wants to have certain income tax forms filed by the personal representative?

Mr. GIBSON: Of course the succession duty department is within its rights, as it only issues the certificate when the estate has been cleared up. The outstanding accounts of the estate are not definitely known until the income tax liability has been settled, and consequently the estate is not closed up until all outstanding accounts are provided for, and until the outstanding income tax liability is determined the estate cannot be finally settled. So that the succession duty branch has no other course than to make sure that all debts owing by the estate are accounted for before the estate is wound up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just—let me say—buncombe. There is no legal sanction for that in the statute, but they use their position, as being the same branch covering the two agencies, to force something which otherwise they could not force. Where is the legal sanction for the position the minister takes? There is none. I want an answer: is there any legal sanction for the position the minister is now taking? Point out the section of the statute which gives him the right. It is not there.

The CHAIRMAN: If I may be allowed, we are dealing with bill No. 166, and I called section 1, which deals with "definitions".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought that was carried. There must be some place where succession duties can be discussed under this measure.

Mr. ABBOTT: It should have been done on the second reading of this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But on second reading you cannot cross-examine ministers. If the rule is going to be applied strictly, let us have it, but I think there should be enough leeway to air a grievance, and you cannot do it on second reading because, as I have said, you cannot cross-examine the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe the point has been stated here; the minister has answered; and I do not think we can allow this section to be used as one upon which the minister or myself can be cross-examined on all matters relating to succession duties. If that were the case, the moment you opened the act on one minor point you would have to traverse the whole subject—that at least is my belief—and I think that is going pretty far.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the parliamentary assistant takes that attitude I do not think I can force his hand. But there is no legal sanction in our laws to-day for the attitude and the practice followed by the succession duty branch.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is no other section on which I can ask this question. I should like to know what rate of interest the succession duty branch charges on unpaid balance of duties.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. GIBSON: Five per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then it is different from the 1942 deferred income tax rate, which is eight per cent.

Mr. GIBSON: No, the income tax rate is five per cent, and it was reduced to four per cent this year. This is a penalty section as well for income tax payments which are in arrears after the assessment has been made.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On the 1942 notice it stated that it was eight per cent from time of death.

Mr. GIBSON: That is after an assessment has been made, if payment is not made within a month an extra three per cent applies, bringing it to eight per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is what I mentioned before. It says eight per cent from date of death.

Mr. McNIVEN: I am glad that the definition of "child" contained in subsection (b) has been widened, and I understand that the definition now corresponds to definitions of "child" which appear in the succession duty acts of the several provinces. Because of that variation between the definitions in provincial succession duty acts and the Dominion Succession Duty Act, duty has been collected on estates where the beneficiaries were children within the meaning of the present definition. I mean that where a deceased had been in the position of loco parentis to a child but had not taken out papers, on his death that child is treated as a stranger and succession duty rates have been very much higher. I have in mind one case where the succession duty absorbed a very large portion of the cash which was in the estate and left the child, then eight years old, dependent upon certain property of doubtful value. What I should like to know is whether, in the interpretation of this clause, there is a possibility of its being regarded as retroactive so as to cover estates which have already been administered or returns filed since the inception of the act; or alternatively, is there any provision in the administration of the department for consideration of cases which have already been dealt with and for the granting of relief? I take it that that could well be done in view of the fact that parliament is now recognizing that the definition of "child" as contained in the original act was much too narrow.

Mr. ABBOTT: That question was considered, but it was decided that the proposed amendment would not be made retroactive. As things stand at the moment, therefore, it will apply only to estates which devolve from now on. It is pointed out that estates have been dealt with and the assets distributed on the basis of the law as it stood at that time, and for that among other reasons it was decided that this statute would not be given retroactive effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would not be of very wide application anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not very wide, no, although I think it would have some considerable application. Representations were made that this extension should be given, that there were cases, as the hon. member for Regina City has pointed out, where the deceased stood in loco parentis but had never formally adopted the child he had been supporting for years, and it was felt that the benefit of the lower rates of exemptions under the succession duty act should be extended to that child.

Mr. TUCKER: In any case where levies are made and have not been paid will they now be cancelled? I have in mind a very bad case, such as the hon. member for Regina City has mentioned, where land of doubtful value was left to a beneficiary and actually a levy was made on that bequest under circumstances now covered by this act, which means that that beneficiary will ultimately have to pay for the land more than it is really worth. He has not yet paid, but the levy has stood against that land for the last five or six years. Will that levy be cancelled?

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to get the facts correctly. I understand that the estate devolved subsequent to the enactment of the act and that duties were assessed in accordance with the law as it now stands but have not yet been paid. My hon. friend wants to know whether those duties will be remitted if this amendment is carried. My answer would be that since the law is not being given retroactive effect, they could not be remitted. It would be putting that particular taxpayer in a better position than one who paid his duty when it became due. I am giving that as my opinion now, rather as a legal opinion, and I do not know what the administrative action of the department will be. I doubt, however, whether it would have legal authority to remit the amount of that tax which had accrued prior to the coming into force of the act.

Mr. McNIVEN: Generally speaking I am opposed to retroactive legislation, but I think the department might well consider that possibility having regard to this particular definition, in view of the fact that it is apparently the desire of the department to bring their definition of "child" into conformity with the definition of child as contained in the various provincial succession duty acts. For example, we have in some provinces "child" treated the same as "natural child," where the rates of succession duty are very low, and under the dominion act treated as a stranger and the rates of duty are seven or eight times as great as they would be if the individual were assessed as a natural child.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether he has checked up with regard to the facts I brought to the attention of the committee on the nineteenth? I pointed out that I had come across cases where dominion succession duty was levied against an interest bequeathed to a certain person by will and subsequently under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act of British Columbia other parties interested had been able to change that succession. The person to whom the bequest had been made, had his bequest cut down a great deal. There is no provision in the dominion act to cover such a case. The duty is levied just as though there had been no change under the provincial law. That is a very unfair situation and I think some provision should be put in the succession duty act to cover it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe this question was raised the other day when we were in the resolution stage. The practice which is followed by the dominion succession duty authorities, and it seems probably the only practice which could be logically followed, is that they are governed by the provisions of the will or by the provisions of the statute in case of intestacy in the jurisdiction in which the estate devolves. The succession devolves as of the date of death and therefore the dominion considers that the liability to succession duty attaches on the assets of the estate as they existed at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Devolution under the law governs.

Mr. ABBOTT: Devolution under the law is what governs. If in certain jurisdictions there is statutory provision for varying the provisions of a will in order to provide maintenance for certain people it is felt that that is a matter of local convenience and the dominion succession duty law cannot properly take cognizance—

Mr. GREEN: Can or cannot?

Mr. ABBOTT: —cannot take into account local arrangements.

Mr. GREEN: That is very unfair, because actually the devolution in the province is covered by the Testator's Family Maintenance Act in that case. In British Columbia we have had an act of that type for perhaps fifteen years; the succession can be changed by the Testator's Family Maintenance Act, provided that application is made, I believe, within six months after death.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where there is a will.

Mr. GREEN: Yes. It gives power to vary the will. It enables the wife or the child to apply to have the will varied and is used in quite a few cases. I do not see what earthly right the dominion government has to refuse to recognize that provincial law. The provinces have the right to pass such laws and the dominion should recognize them. There is just as much reason why the dominion should recognize the Testator's Family Maintenance Acts as that it should recognize the intestacy laws of a province. They are absolutely on the same footing, and I cannot understand why the dominion refuses to recognize these maintenance acts.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course, I find it a little difficult to answer my hon. friend because in my own jurisdiction there is not a statute of that kind, but I understand it is really varying the devolution of the estate as provided by will or as provided by law. It is tantamount to a compromise between the beneficiaries which is confirmed by the court—

Mr. GREEN: No; it is not a compromise at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate that. But the various parties appear before the court and the court decides that the will did not provide for an equitable distribution, or that the law has not provided for it, and it can vary that distribution. It can also, I take it, in the terms of the order vary the apportionment of the death duties. Surely it would be competent for the court to do that. I am almost thinking aloud, but it could make it a condition to the varying of the provision of the will that beneficiary A should receive fifty per cent of what was provided in the will and that the person to whom the remaining fifty per cent of the legacy was transferred should pay a proportionately greater amount of any death duties that were levied, and if party A had been assessed for a greater amount he should be reimbursed that amount by party B to whom the transfer was made. It is indicated to me by the officials that they feel it is not practicable or desirable that any other basis should be taken for the assessment of dominion succession duties than the assets as they devolve on the date of death; and if there is a local statute which provides for varying that, then the local jurisdiction should make provision for the necessary adjustments of death duty liabilities or whatever other charges may attach to the estate.

Mr. GREEN: That is all right, but here is what happens. I know of one case in which the person actually paid the dominion succession duty on the bequest; in other words, the dominion government got the money, and then under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act the terms of the will were varied and the person who had already paid the succession duty has his bequest reduced. In some cases the reduction may be very large; it may even be wiped out by the order under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act of that province. Therefore you have the position of the dominion getting the money and the person not getting the bequest. That is obviously unfair. The provincial succession duty act provides for those orders that are made under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act, and there is no reason why the Dominion Succession Duty Act should not contain a similar provision. The provinces have the sole right to say how property will go. They can change the devolution as they see fit, and they have done it in some provinces. I think Ontario also has a Testator's Family Maintenance Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: That change in the law is made by the courts, of course.

Mr. GREEN: The change in the law is made by the provincial statutes.

Mr. ABBOTT: The provincial statutes authorize the courts to change the provision of the will, the devolution as provided by the will or as provided by the laws of intestacy.

Mr. GREEN: It is a method of distributing the estate just the same as the intestacy laws of the provinces which govern the manner in which an estate shall be distributed where there is no will. The Dominion Succession Duties Act should make provision for those orders made under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This involves a question of conflict of law. I think the parliamentary assistant has correctly stated the fundamental basis of the assessment. At the same time I am impressed by what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said, that it might work great injustice. I would suggest that the succession duty department work out some kind of arrangement with the authorities of British Columbia so as to avoid what would appear to be a manifest injustice. In my province we do not have any such laws as that. We do have a statute, which was passed by the legislature, relating to the devolution of intestate estates. I am not so sure that they were right, but they thought so and it is still the law. In the case of the death of an intestate leaving no issue but leaving a wife, she now gets a much larger share than she did under the old Devolution of Estates Act; and that might alter the incidence, because in that case I suggest the wife is in a preferred class, and the balance goes to, shall I say, the second or the third class, the collateral relatives. It alters the rate of taxation for succession duty purposes in the province. I think this should be the subject of a conference with the provinces. In the meantime the law is as it is and it is not proposed to change it now.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is probably a good suggestion. My own view would be that the judges in those provinces which have legislation of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South should bear in mind that the succession duty law—the dominion at any rate—provides that duties shall be assessed on the basis of the estate as it devolves under the will or by the ordinary law, and that in making any orders such as have been indicated here the courts should impose an appropriate condition as to the adjustment of succession duty liability as between the various benefited parties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The statutes may not give them that right.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am in the dark on this. May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver South what the provincial statute provides with respect to provincial succession duties in a case of that kind?

Mr. GREEN: If I remember correctly, the provincial succession duty act recognizes an order made under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act and levies accordingly. The suggestion made by the parliamentary assistant would not work in all cases, because it might happen that the rate of succession duty would be changed. For example, if by order the money goes to a wife whereas it was bequeathed to a sister, the rate is changed. It would not be fair to ask the judges to take that into account. The Testator's Family Maintenance Act is a beneficial one. It protects the wife and children, and also the husband but no other relatives. These acts prevent a father from unfairly disinheriting his children or his wife and they have been very beneficial. I think the only way the difficulty can be remedied is to have a provision put in the Dominion Succession Duty Act. I know the government does not want to get money to which it is not entitled, yet that is what is happening under the present law.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is a matter that I should bring to the attention of the committee. It is based on an item that appears in the Lucknow Sentinel of June 1. It is a report in connection with a case where action was being taken to set aside the will of a bachelor who died leaving an estate of $110,000. According to the report the will is being attacked on the ground that the deceased did not have sufficient testamentary capacity at the time of making the will to comprehend the nature and quality of the act of making a will or appreciating the nature of his estate. The report also says that those who had assisted the deceased in making his will at his request thought that he had left his estate as he did because of his fear of succession duties that would be levied, and that they advised him if it was left in such an endowment fund the government would not get any of it. There appears to be about $60,000 being disputed. My attention was drawn to this case some time ago, after which I took it up with the income tax department by telephone and suggested that when the case was being heard the dominion government should have been represented at court. My representations were not accepted in very good grace by the department. My view was that the interests of the crown should be protected. I am not in a position to express an opinion regarding the merits of the case. I think that where such a large sum is involved, and the will is being attacked on the ground that the deceased was not in a fit state to make a will, the federal government should interest itself in the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have listened to my hon. friend. I am afraid I have been giving a lot of latitude here this morning. I protested before that we should keep within the section. This question whether a man is capable or incapable of making a will is a matter of property and civil rights which falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The dominion has no jurisdiction to say whether or not he is capable of making a will. Therefore it would be completely improper for the dominion government to be represented at any trial to determine whether a man was capable of making a will or not. I do not want to get into a long legal discussion here on testamentary capacity or anything else, but I do wish the committee would keep within the provisions of section 1, which extends and amplifies the definition of "child" as contained in the succession duty act.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Gifts with reservation of benefit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsection 1 of this section repeals the existing paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 3 of the act. It is in the nature of a benefit because there is an exemption from taxation through the limitation of three years. That applies where a gift is made and there is a bona fide possession and enjoyment and no reassumption by the donee. I think that is a proper provision. I am interested in the second subsection which adds a new subsection 4. This covers the case we were discussing on the resolution stage. It is quite clear now that it is the intention of the government to take authority to tax succession twice in a given set of circumstances.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are doing it now; this is really to confirm it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I doubt if they have the authority to do it. This is to make sure?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I doubt if they have authority to do that now. This is to make sure that where a person has a general power of disposition and does not exercise that power he shall be deemed to take succession in the first instance, and on his death the second succession occurs. That is exactly the situation in at least some of the provinces. Is that rule general in all the provinces, or only in some?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told it is the rule in practically all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not know of any exception?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just one of those cases where the thumbscrews are being turned a little in order to get more money for the crown. I should like to know if I understand the thing thoroughly. Of course, those who will have the liability in the first place will have to protect themselves with a proper instrument of disposition, that is, under their will. If a person in that situation makes a proper disposition and provides for alternative disposition in the event of the failure of the person to whom the power is given to appoint or dispose of the property, this situation will not arise.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. If the power is general, then this section will operate, and section 31 as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there is a general power to appoint and he does appoint, will there still be double taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has that always been the law?

Mr. ABBOTT: I call my hon. friend's attention to section 31 of the act as it now stands, which reads:

> Where a general power to appoint any property either by instrument inter vivos, or by will, or both, is given to any person, the duty levied in respect of the succession thereto shall be payable in the same manner and at the same time as if the property itself had been given, devised or bequeathed, to the person to whom such power is given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means he pays on the devolution in the first instance?

Mr. ABBOTT: He is getting it just as though it was his own property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not unless he takes a beneficial interest.

Mr. ABBOTT: He can do that under the general power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But if he does not get any benefit from it there are two sets of taxation. If he derives pecuniary benefits then I do not think there can be great objection to his being taxed, but if he merely takes it in a fiduciary capacity and derives no personal benefit, there should not be double taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: The will should be drawn to prevent that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that they will have to protect themselves by will.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not clear about this; I was not able to hear all that was said. I should like to state a specific case and find out just what the answer will be. I mentioned this the last time we were discussing this matter. If a man by his will leaves his property to his wife for life with power of appointment and in the event that she fails to exercise that power, to a son or some children or somebody else, and the wife exercises that power, does she have to pay succession duty on the full estate and will the children or the persons to whom she leaves the property have to pay duty on the full estate on her death?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am assuming that the power of appointment referred to is a limited power, that is, that the testator in his will gave the wife a life interest and provided that she might by her will appoint one or more of the children?

Mr. HAZEN: No. The testator by his will leaves it to his wife for life, and gives her a general power so that she may leave the property to whom she sees fit.

Mr. ABBOTT: Even to strangers?

Mr. HAZEN: To whom she sees fit.

Mr. ABBOTT: There would certainly be two duties in that case. She would be assessed on her life interest and then on her death it would be treated as forming part of her estate.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that matter should be given further consideration because it is not fair. It amounts to double taxation. A man may have made that kind of will some time ago. He leaves his estate to his wife for life with a general power of appointment, and to his children if the wife fails to exercise that appointment. He lives for many years after his will is made, and dies, we will say, when he is seventy or seventy-two years of age. His wife is about the same age and survives him only for a year or two, having exercised her power of appointment. The result is that there would be two taxes on the whole estate within two or three years. The wife would have a life interest in the estate for two, three or four years and yet she would be taxed on the full estate. Then after that time her children, or whoever received the property, would be taxed again on the full estate. I think if the parliamentary assistant considers that matter he will come to the conclusion that it is not fair. I suggest that the section should not be passed in this form, that further consideration be given to the point. I protest against the section going through in its present form. Surely there should be some way of working this thing out so that it would be more equitable. The wife has had a life interest for only two or three years and she is taxed on the full value of the estate. Then there is a tax on the full value of the estate upon her death. That is not quite right. There should be some change made in this section to provide for a case of that kind.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not really a change in the law. It is a qualifying provision in the definition section. Section 31 is quite clear with respect to the effect, from a succession duty point of view, of providing for a general power of appointment. Under section 31 that would appear to be clear. The case my hon. friend has cited may appear, on the surface, to be a hard case. But the answer really is that a will should not be drawn in that way. It is all very well to say that the widow is given a life interest. But in fact she is given complete and free distribution of the corpus of the estate, because there is no restriction on her right of disposition. The testator has indicated, it is true, to whom he would like the property to go if she does not see fit to exercise her power of disposition. But she is perfectly free to leave it to a complete stranger. I should not think my hon. friend would suggest that under those circumstances there should not be a tax imposed, if she did exercise that power of appointment. What he is suggesting is that if she fails to exercise it there should not be a tax. The point is as to whether the testator has absolute freedom in exercising the power of appointment. That is the test. It seems to me it is a reasonable test; and if the legal profession or testators are aware of the law they will be governed accordingly in drawing wills.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not suggest that the widow should escape taxation. But I submit she should be taxed only on the life interest. I think that is the stand that the parliamentary assistant took, and that is what he had in mind the other day when this matter was discussed. This is what was said on that occasion:

> Mr. Hazen: That is what I want to understand clearly. Does she pay on her life interest or does she have to pay on the full value of the estate?
> Mr. Abbott: She pays on her life interest in the estate, and in Quebec—I do not know about the dominion—it is based on her life expectancy.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HAZEN: That is what it should be. It should be a life interest, based on the life expectancy.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is what would happen. A testator may provide this: "I leave my wife a life interest in the residue of my estate, and on her death to go to my children in such proportion as she may determine"—or even just "to my children". In that case the widow would be taxed only on her life interest, based on her life expectancy; and the duty would be assessed on the children who received the ownership of the residue on the death of their mother, in accordance with the rules applicable generally. That is exactly what would happen if a testator did not give to his wife a general power of appointment. In effect, it is almost surplusage to say it is giving her life interest, and it is giving her complete freedom to dispose of the property.

Mr. HAZEN: Well, as a matter of fact, is it? I do not think it is the same as giving her the estate outright, by any means. She cannot do as she likes with it. In a sense she is a trustee; she cannot go and spend the money. She only has the use of the income to that extent for her life.

Mr. ABBOTT: What is to prevent her using the proceeds herself? She has general power of appointment, and she can do what she sees fit. Who can attack her, or who can attack her estate?

Mr. HAZEN: There is something in that, but—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a form of giving her free disposition.

Mr. HAZEN: But why should there be a difference between a man who leaves a will saying, "I leave my estate to my wife, and then to my children", and the man who uses this other form, saying, "I leave my estate to my wife for life with power of appointment, and then, failing that, to my children." In the one case if the will says, "to my wife and then to my children" she pays only on the life interest. Then the children have to pay on the corpus of the estate. But in the other case she has to pay on the whole estate, and then the children have to pay on the whole estate. Then she may die only two or three years after the husband. I think that to some extent we are playing with words. If the first proposition is fair, that she should be taxed only on her life expectancy, then this is clearly wrong. I do not think they should go through this procedure.

Mr. ABBOTT: The real effect of the section is to prohibit, for succession duty purposes, a general power of appointment without restriction. The succession duty act says in effect: If you wish to make that kind of power, so far as taxation is concerned it is as though you had not appointed at all. That is the effect of the law at the present time. This amendment is simply to clarify what might be considered as a conflict between two sections. The law now provides that if a man makes a general power of appointment to a beneficiary, that is considered as constituting a disposition of the property, when the power is exercised.

Mr. HAZEN: There should be a qualifying section to protect widows in cases such as I have mentioned. As it stands, I can only say it is not fair or right. The parliamentary assistant says that a will should be drawn in a different way, to get around the difficulty. Well, many people have had their wills drawn for years. They do not know about this provision. When they die their widows will have to pay the full value of the estate, and a year or two later perhaps the children have to pay the full value.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that that is the law in all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: That does not make it one bit better. It has been held by the courts that it is perfectly within the competence of any testator to protect himself against any injustices which it may be considered would flow from the provision respecting a general power of appointment, when permitted for purposes of succession duty.

Mr. BENCE: I wish to say a word on this matter. I note that this paragraph—I believe it is paragraph (d)—has been amended to provide that—

> Property taken under a gift whenever made of which actual and bona fide possession and enjoyment has not been assumed by the donee or by a trustee for the donee at least three years before the death of the deceased.

I have no quarrel with that position. But what I would like to know is this: Is there any exemption with respect to what might be called normal expenditures, or gifts normal in relation to the status of income of the man making the gifts? I have in mind, for example, the matter of a small disbursement, possibly the giving of $100 or $50. Suppose I give my child $10 to-day, and I die within another year; would that have to be revealed in my succession duty return and succession duty paid on it?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a provision in the act which governs the case to which my hon. friend has referred. I will direct his attention to section 7, which says:

> 7. (1) From the dutiable value of any property included in a succession the following exemptions shall be deducted and no duty shall be leviable in respect thereof.

And paragraph (f) states:

> In respect of a gift made by the deceased where the same is proved to have been absolute and to have taken effect in the lifetime of the deceased, to have been part of his ordinary and normal expenditure, and to have been reasonable having regard to the amount of his income and the circumstances under which the gift was made.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I just want to go back to the point I raised when this bill was in committee and I was ruled out of order. I pointed out at the resolution stage that the dominion succession duty office has to issue a certificate before the assets of an estate can be released to the person who represents it. Take the simple example of a life insurance policy. If a testator leaves to his widow a life insurance policy of say three thousand dollars, obviously it is not taxable for succession duty, but before the necessary certificate is issued by the dominion succession duty office to permit the life insurance company to pay the money to the widow or the personal representative of the estate or to some beneficiary who is named direct, the department has to give to the personal representative of the estate a release, which he turns over to the insurance company and then obtains the money. Practically in every instance where the testator has not filed income tax returns during say the last three or four years prior to his death, the department says to the personal representative of the estate: You cannot have that money and that release until you satisfy us that the testator during those years had no taxable income. It may be that every proper method should be used to ensure that testators have complied with all the provisions of the income tax law, but the thing to which I object is that the government is using an indirect method of obtaining the filing of income tax returns. If income tax returns are not being filed as provided for under the law, the dominion government should bring in amendments to the income tax act. I submit that it is absolutely illegal to hold up the granting of the certificate, once it is determined that the estate is not taxable for succession duty, until the personal representative has complied with the provisions of the income tax act. If there is any provision in the Dominion Succession Duty Act or in any other act of this parliament which allows the succession duty office to follow this procedure I should be glad to be informed about it. In my view the administration should not do indirectly something that they can do directly.

I know that the parliamentary assistant said a short while ago when the bill was in committee: The estate has not been wound up yet and until all the debts have been satisfied, including income tax, the department could not issue the certificate. Before the Dominion Succession Duty Act was made the law of this country there was no similar means available to the administration for collecting income tax and there is no reason why now, just because this machinery has been set up, it should be used for the purpose of obtaining something that is owing to another department.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend speaking particularly of an estate where it is clear that no tax is payable, or including estates where the tax is payable?

Mr. BENCE: No, I was using that as an illustration to show how the succession duty act machinery was being used.

Mr. ABBOTT: His argument would have more force if he was speaking particularly of an estate where no tax was payable.

Mr. BENCE: I was taking as an illustration the small estates such as I run into in the province from which I come. In that province there are many thousands of people who have never had enough income in the last ten years to warrant the filing of income tax returns. The income tax branch knows that there are thousands of farmers in Saskatchewan who have not filed income tax returns because they have not sufficient income to be liable to the tax. I am not saying that the returns should not be filed. The fact remains that the widows know nothing about their late husband's affairs. They may have a little bit of insurance coming to them, and that is held up until the widow digs around and tries to obtain a lot of information with respect to her husband's farming operations in the last few years. Payment of the insurance is held up for some considerable time, and in some cases the widow needs that money badly. I suggest that the succession duty branch has not jurisdiction to hold up the granting of the release merely because the income tax branch insists on the filing of certain returns.

The parliamentary assistant a short time ago referred to cleaning up an estate. If his argument holds good, the whole estate should be held up until all the creditors have been taken care of.

Mr. ABBOTT: Until the amounts owing to the creditors are known.

Mr. BENCE: That is immediately known, because a list of the debts is usually filed at the time the succession duty papers are filed.

Mr. ABBOTT: An additional debt may be the income tax liability.

Mr. BENCE: That would only reduce the amount of the estate. It certainly would not otherwise affect the succession duty payable. I submit that if it is obvious that the estate is below the amount that is taxable for succession duty, no matter how much may be owing for income tax, the certificate should be granted.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member's argument would have more force with respect to an estate not liable to succession duties than with regard to estates where duties are payable.

Mr. BENCE: I do not want to prolong the discussion. I merely want to register my protest against using this machinery to do something indirectly which, if the administration believes it should be done, can be done directly by an amendment to the income tax act. I do not believe that this machinery should be used in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. D. F. McCUAIG (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I think the department should be congratulated on their efforts to collect the income tax. The hon. member has referred to a case where the estate consisted of $3,000, but you could easily bring into the discussion a case where the estate was $50,000. If that man had never paid any income tax and the succession duty branch issued the release, the proceeds of the estate would be distributed without seeing that any income tax was paid, and there would be many cases where they would find later on that the testator should have paid income tax. In the meantime the money has been distributed and there would be no one to collect the income tax from. If there is nothing in the statutes at the present time to deal with cases of that kind, I feel that the department are justified in using this method, but I do suggest that if there is nothing in the statutes already to take care of that situation an amendment should be made to the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION OR ANNUITY

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 165, to amend the Judges Act (annuities).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, and reported.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): May I ask the minister if this is all the legislation that will be brought down this session having to do with judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No other legislation is contemplated at this session dealing with the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF ACT—FURTHER PROVISIONS AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act and to provide for the extension of the operation of the said act to certain persons in the public service not presently included therein and to make such further provisions respecting contributions, allowances and benefits as may be deemed necessary for the said purpose and for the better operation or administration of the said act.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES: (Winnipeg North Centre): My reason for speaking on this measure at the resolution stage arises out of my concern that the bill should cover certain classes of employees in the public service. I have not yet, of course, seen the bill, and I do not know how far it goes. In many instances we find it desirable to agree to a resolution without much discussion and to delay comment until the bill comes down, but in this instance I feel it is desirable to make a few comments now, in the hope that if the people I am concerned about are not included in the bill the government will have the opportunity to include them before the bill is introduced. In other words, it is quite satisfactory to me if when the bill comes down these people are covered and the government is in a position to take the credit unto itself. I am not worried about that, but I am concerned about certain classes of employees in the public service.

The first group about which I wish to speak is those who are employed at the printing bureau, especially those of the printing and mechanical trades. Up to the present time they have not been included in the terms of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Nevertheless amongst the employees at the printing bureau are a considerable number who have been there a very long time. I have figures as to the length of service of the employees of the printing bureau as at December 1, 1942; and I find that at that time there were in the printing and mechanical departments of the bureau 384 employees. Of these, 60 had a service of five years or under, 128 had service between five and twenty years, 131 had service between twenty and thirty years, and 65 had service between thirty and fifty years. Yet despite those long records of service these employees, because they are paid on a weekly rate rather than at an annual rate, have been excluded from the benefits of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

On August 21 of last year these employees presented a brief to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), the minister charged with the administration of the department in which they are employed, wherein they set out their case and asked for an interview with the Secretary of State. There are some portions of their brief which I feel should be drawn to the attention of the administration. They indicated that these employees fall into two groups as far as these representations are concerned:

(a) Employees of the printing trades. These employees hold positions on the regular establishment of the department as authorized by the civil service commission and who have been appointed thereto under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and whose rates of pay are determined under section 16 of chapter 152, R.S.C. 1927 (Public Printing and Stationery Act), and afterwards confirmed by order in council;

(b) Employees of the mechanical trades. These employees occupy positions which are exempt from the provisions of the Civil Service Act. The positions are authorized by treasury board following a recommendation of the civil service commission. Appointments thereto are made by the minister, and the continuation of positions and employment are authorized by the treasury board from year to year.

The employees at that point went on in their brief to set out their reasonable desire to provide themselves with a measure of security against the hazards of death and premature displacement, in a manner similar to that provided to other employees in the public service. They dealt with some of the technical difficulties which they had been told stood in the way, and urged as strongly as they could that consideration be given to their case. They concluded their brief with a request for an interview with the Secretary of State. Their brief was signed on behalf of the employees by G. V. Armstrong, president, and J. T. Clancey, secretary; the name of the organization is the Department of Public Printing and Stationery Welfare Association.

A short time after that, on September 8, 1943, a committee of that association was granted an interview with the Secretary of State to discuss this brief to which I have referred. Following that interview the matter was referred to the treasury board by the Secretary of State for its consideration. Later on the association was asked to have representatives appear before Mr. W. C. Ronson for an interview, and on November 2, 1943, and as a result of this meeting with Mr. Ronson, a memorandum was submitted to Mr. Edmond Cloutier, the King's Printer. I should like to give the text of this memorandum. It is dated November 15, 1943, and is addressed to the King's Printer:

Dear Sir:

re Superannuation

In connection with the above subject concerning the employees in the printing and mechanical trades of the government printing bureau, and as a result of the suggestion by Mr. W. C. Ronson, assistant deputy minister of finance, at our joint conference on Tuesday, November 2, 1943, we are submitting the following for your consideration.

1. That a separate scheme of superannuation be established for this class of employee to include employees of both the printing and mechanical trades who are in positions of continuing indeterminate duration and on the basic staff.

2. That all conditions with respect to wages, overtime and hours of work to remain as at present.

3. That for the purposes of contributions an annual salary be established on the basis of the weekly basic rate multiplied by 52.

The employees feel this to be one of the important hurdles to be got over, and their proposal is a quite simple one, namely, that their weekly rate be treated as an annual rate by the simple process of multiplying it by 52.

4. That employees of three years' service who, though not on the basic staff, are considered to be in positions of a continuing indeterminate duration, be considered eligible for superannuation.

5. That the age for retirement be set at 60 for males and 55 for females with the privilege of extensions to the age of 65 years according to the provisions of section 10 of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

6. That contributions, benefits and other terms of retirement to be similar to those of the present Civil Service Superannuation Act (chapter 24, R.S.C., 1927).

Trusting this will receive your favourable consideration,

Respectfully yours,
G. V. Armstrong, President.
J. T. Clancey, Secretary.

The printing and mechanical employees of the bureau do not know yet just how matters stand. I have a particular interest in their case because I happen to be a member of the trade union of which a great many of the employees in the printing bureau are also members. Their hope is that as a result of their interview with the Secretary of State, as a result of their interview with Mr. Ronson, and as a result of the further representations they have made in this matter, the bill which is to be introduced on the basis of this resolution will meet their views.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that no technicality should stand in the way of men and women, with the length of service that these employees have, being treated similarly to other employees in the public service. We in this House of Commons ought to be interested in these people. They play a very important part in the life of parliament. Sometimes, as a popular indoor sport, we blame the printer for things that appear which a member thinks are not exactly as he said them. But speaking as a printer, I say, "We can take it." As a matter of fact, considering the pressure under which the bureau has to work, considering the short space of time in which we expect Hansard and other printed material to appear, I feel that the employees over there do a very good job. I say that despite the fact that once in a while I have been the victim of a typographical error. That is really nothing to worry about, and I want to pay this tribute to the work of my printing colleagues.

While paying that tribute I might take a moment to pay another tribute and that is to our friends the Hansard reporters. It is sometimes another popular indoor sport to blame them for getting down incorrectly some of the things hon. members say. But there too I feel, especially in the light of the cross-fire we have sometimes in this house, that they do an awfully good job in getting it down as well as they do, and I hope that if on occasion we make corrections in what they take down they will know that really we appreciate the high quality of their work.

Now I think I will leave the case of the printers at that. I hope it will be covered in the bill when it comes down. If these employees are not included in the bill as it is now drafted, I hope the government will delay it a day or two to make sure that a piece of injustice that has been perpetrated on these employees will be corrected at this time.

Just one other sentence about the case of the printing employees. I will quote section 6 of their brief of August 21, 1943:

> 6. We are quite willing to accept the terms of the act, including the obligation to contribute six per centum of our wages to the fund.

There are certain other groups that should be included in this bill as well. Perhaps they are already there. If so, that is fine; but if they are not there, one has to speak now in order to have one's representations considered. This time I appeal on behalf of a large number of railway mail clerks. I understand that several hundreds—I believe as a matter of fact they run to four thousand across the country—of the railway mail clerks are still under the retirement act of 1896, and their desire is to be transferred to the superannuation act of 1924. I am told that these employees some years ago were given the opportunity to transfer to this other act but rejected it, and it is has been said to them that, having rejected it, it is their own fault and they should not now complain. But they point out that after they rejected the offer to transfer to the superannuation act of 1924 certain things were done in connection with the funds under the retirement act of 1896, and the most striking thing that was done, I am told, was the reduction of the interest rate from five per cent to four per cent, which was effected about 1932 or 1933. That change has had the effect of reducing the value of the pensions that these employees can draw under that fund, and they tell me that they have not had an opportunity to transfer to the other fund since that very striking change was made in 1932 or 1933. These employees have made strong but very reasonable representations, and I imagine from the wording of one communication I received some time ago that all the Manitoba members of this house received the document I have. They have also made their appeal to the government. On their behalf I wrote on two occasions to the Minister of Finance and on the second occasion I received a fairly hopeful letter dated April 26 of this year:

> Dear Mr. Knowles:
> I wish to acknowledge your letter of April 21 with further reference to the question of superannuation for the Winnipeg railway mail clerks association.
> You will remember that the Prime Minister announced in the house a day or two ago that the Civil Service Superannuation Act would form part of the legislation still to be brought before the House of Commons. When this act is being reviewed, your representations will be given careful consideration.
> Yours very truly,
> J. L. Ilsley.

I earnestly hope that my representations were given consideration. I hope that the bill in the form in which it has been drafted includes the granting of this request. If so, that is fine and my speech at this moment is unnecessary; but if it is not in the bill, my reason for speaking now is to urge the government to give further consideration to this request with a view to meeting it when the bill based upon this resolution is brought down.

Not only are there the classes of public servants to which I have already referred, but in a good many departments of government we have people who have been working for many years and yet technically are so identified that they do not come under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. For example, I hold in my hand a brief written on behalf of employees of the Deer Lodge hospital, which comes under the administration of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). There are some other matters in this brief that I shall bring to his attention when his estimates are before the house, but at this moment I refer only to this fact. This brief refers to other employees as well, but in particular to the so-called temporary permanents. Employees of that class, no matter how many years they may be working for the government, are denied entry into the Civil Service Superannuation Act. It seems to me it is possible under the terms of the resolution we are discussing for the government to put provisions in the bill to take care of some of these people.

Another group of people who feel that they are dealt with unfairly, under present conditions, if I understand them correctly, are the employees who transfer from one classification to another. They find that although both positions are classified as permanent in the Civil Service Act, they are required to resign from their first position and are subsequently reappointed as temporary employees in the new positions. When that happens, the employee who formerly was permanent and had certain benefits, such as pension rights, finds that he loses all the benefits of permanency that he previously enjoyed, even though he may have had many years of continuous satisfactory service. In other words, an employee frequently must choose between remaining in a position of a lower grade at a lower salary with pension rights or taking the better position which he is capable of filling, but in doing so losing all of his rights of permanency, including his pension benefits. I hope that there are provisions in the bill which will meet that situation. As I have said several times already, if they are not there I plead with the government to redraft the bill before it is introduced in the house.

When the estimates of the Department of Public Works were before the committee the other day I had occasion to make representations on behalf of women doing char work in public buildings. I now wish to say a word on behalf of the men doing char work in this building. Many of them have been here for many years, but for some technical reason they are not treated as permanent employees; at least they are not included in the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Some of those men have been here five, eight, nine years, some longer. Some of them who have been here longer than nine years had the interesting experience of being dismissed in 1935 after the election and then being rehired after a fuss was made over their dismissal. But they are still temporary employees. Amongst other benefits that are denied them, they do not come within the terms of any superannuation or pension fund provided by the government. There are other employees of the government in this building who are in the same box, the messenger staff and others employed in the service of the House of Commons.

We are hearing much these days that sounds very good to our ears about the rights of persons over property, about the new concept of social security. We listened to an interesting and fighting speech by the Prime Minister yesterday about the new order which he desires to help fashion. I suggest that one place to start fashioning the new order with its concept of social security is right on our own doorstep. I suggest that we should not have a number of groups of people working for the government itself who are discriminated against, as is the case with some of those people I have mentioned. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that when this bill comes down it will look as though this speech of mine did not need to be made. But I express in the meantime a wish that if any of the groups I have referred to are not covered in the terms of the bill, or indeed if there are other government employees whose situations are similar, the government will redraft the bill and really put into effect some of the ideas that it is now proclaiming about the new order, about social security, about the responsibility of employers to their employees, and about the rights of people to enjoy freedom from want and freedom from fear.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I wish to associate myself with what has been said by the previous speaker (Mr. Knowles). I hope that when the bill is introduced it will contain some provision to take care of large groups of civil servants who were favourably reported on two years ago by a special committee. I refer to those who have been paying into retirement funds over a long period of years. In certain instances some individuals have been picked out and consideration has been given to them.

The previous speaker has fully covered the situation. We could go on and elaborate on other groups, but I wish to mention particularly that group who for a long period of years, because of misunderstanding, failed to elect to be included under superannuation benefits. Some years ago they sought to have a last opportunity to elect. I do feel that that class should be given another opportunity to elect. I hope that the bill will include those groups so that the matter can be fairly and finally settled and we shall not have a recurrence of this discussion from time to time.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I should like to say a word so there will be no misunderstanding about this measure. I can assure hon. members that the representations to which they have seen fit to give publicity in this house to-day have long been before the government for consideration. There would hardly be any occasion for bringing in a bill at all if it were not to deal with the representations that had been made.

The general purposes of this bill are, first of all, to allow any person who previously at any time was given the right to come under the superannuation act during a certain period to have another period of one year from October 1 to exercise his option. That will apply to some thirty-five hundred persons who are still members of the retirement fund, which really was not a pension scheme but a compulsory savings scheme, whereby the members thereof got back with interest the amount of the deductions from their pay during their period of service. There are, as I say, still about thirty-five hundred persons who for some reason or other did not choose to come under the superannuation act at the time it was passed, though they were given the opportunity for first of all a period of two years, and then one additional year, to exercise the option to do so. A further period of one year from October 1, 1944 is to be allowed them to exercise the option now. The bill will also provide for the cases of contributors who had service prior to the time they became contributors and would have had the option of taking credit for such period of service. Each had a period of three months during which upon becoming a contributor he could elect to bring in the period of service he had before that time. Of course, he would have to make the proper contribution. He is to be given a further period of one year from October 1, 1944, to elect as to whether or not he wants to have the benefit of the period prior to the time he became a contributor.

The third major provision is to take care of those who could not become contributors to the superannuation fund because they were not permanent employees with a stated annual salary, those who are generally called prevailing rates employees. There is a fourth group of sections which provide for certain increases in the benefits. First of all, there is the right to the return of the aggregate contributions without interest on retirement at any time. Formerly one had to be ten years in the service to be entitled to a return of the contributions made if he left the service.

When a pension becomes payable to dependents under the terms of the act and runs out before the aggregate of the total contributions have been paid as a pension, the pension will be continued until it has equalled the contributions made by the former public servant. If there are no dependents of a public servant a minimum return will be made to his estate of an amount equal to the contribution he has made to the fund.

Provision is being made for the dropping of what was called the forfeiture clause for dismissal for misconduct or, what was regarded as misconduct, for political partisanship. Other punitive action may have to be taken in regard to the misconduct of a public servant, but it will be in some other form than the confiscation of his contributions to the pension fund.

A large number of recommendations were made by the special committee which sat in 1939. Immediately following the report of that special committee an order in council was passed implementing certain of the recommendations. Chapter 27 of the statutes of 1940 gave statutory effect to the order in council. The present bill consists of a consolidation of the provisions of that order in council, which was not very clearly drawn in the first instance. The other part of the bill will implement the main recommendations of the committee of 1939. I feel confident that when the bill—which is a lengthy one, and may appear rather complicated because it deals with many amendments to the existing act necessary for concordance—is before hon. members they will find that careful and sympathetic consideration has been given to the representations made, not only by the group referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but by the various organizations of civil servants who on more than one occasion conferred with the special committee of the cabinet in respect to their grievances.

Mr. NEILL: The statement of explanation given by the minister will be satisfactory to all in the civil service. As far as I can recall it he has covered the ground in every respect. He made mention that the benefits of the fund will apply to those now under the prevailing rates jurisdiction. That has been a sore point for many years. I presume there will be some restriction in that regard because I can hardly think it will be made applicable to those people who are really temporary in the fullest sense of the word.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The provisions of the bill will be subject to discussion when it is before the house. Power is given to the treasury board to establish by regulation classes of those who were formerly not qualified to be included under the Superannuation Act in order that they may be included.

Mr. NEILL: I am gratified to know that other changes are being made, particularly the one abandoning the requirement of ten years service before the contributions would be returned in case a civil servant left the service. I believe the only exception to this rule was the woman who got married. Perhaps I could direct a question to the minister at the moment, although it may be out of order. I understood him to say that all civil servants who had the option of coming under the fund in 1924 and did not do so, can elect to do so now. Any civil servant who elected to come in had to make the back contributions. He was charged a certain rate of interest at that time, I believe four per cent. Later on the rate was increased to, I think, five per cent. I should like to know if a man who elects to come in now will be charged the original rate of interest set in 1924 or will he have to pay for the whole period at the higher rate which was set later on? I suggest that it would be proper to limit the payment of the higher rate to the later years and that he should be permitted to pay for the period prior to 1924 at the rate which was then fixed. It is quite proper that he should pay the higher rate for the last few years.

Mr. SPEAKER: That question could be asked in committee.

Mr. NEILL: I wanted to have it all together on the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister can take that as a notice.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: May I now ask the question which I was prohibited from asking one and a half minutes ago?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry but I have not given special consideration to the question asked by the hon. member. All I can say is that the bill was drawn in a general way in an attempt to meet all reasonable representations that had been made in that regard. I hope that when it is before the committee it will provide a satisfactory answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was quite interested in the remarks made by the minister while Mr. Speaker was still in the chair. They covered many of the points I raised. However, he did not say anything about the employees of the House of Commons, the char staff and the messenger staff. While I am mentioning employees of the House of Commons, I might also mention the stenographers who work for the members. Many of these have been here for quite some time, yet despite their years of faithful service they have none of the benefits of permanency, such as superannuation. Would the minister make any further comment in respect of these matters?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid the hon. member will have to be content to wait until the bill comes down. There has been no attempt here to make every Canadian citizen a member of the superannuation fund. There has been an attempt to meet all the reasonable representations made by the personnel of the civil service.

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that the crack made by the minister does not come with very good grace after the speeches made yesterday by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Justice, in which they were trying to establish themselves as protagonists of social security and the responsibility of employers to the people who work for them.

Mr. GILLIS: When the bill comes in, will it be confined to the superannuation act, and to the inclusion of those who for pension purposes have been endeavouring to come within its scope? The question I have in mind is one which has been discussed since 1941. One section of the Civil Service Act defines specifically the word "dependent", and excludes some, including stepmothers. I have in mind the stepmother of a deceased contributor entitled to pension, who has been corresponding with the department since 1941 in an endeavour to secure what I think is legally a part of the estate of the deceased. But because she is the stepmother she does not come within the terms of the section. Is there any intention on the part of the government to change that section in the act to include stepmothers or other dependents? There has been considerable correspondence on the point.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When will the bill be distributed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Immediately after first reading. It is now in galley form, and the final printing requires only the date of first reading to make it available for distribution.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 171, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

357. National research council, salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $920,529.

Mr. GREEN: I understand the minister has received a brief from the British Columbia industrial and scientific research council in which they ask for a grant to aid in their work. In their brief they point out that in the course of an address to the Canadian chemical conference on June 7, 1944, the president of the national research council made this statement:

> We must have in Canada sufficient laboratory facilities to deal with every demand, and that is not now the case. The present council is not in favour of a policy of centralization of all such facilities. It is felt that laboratories to serve particular regional needs should be located in the regions concerned.

Apparently provision has been made for the establishment of what is known as the prairie regional committee of the national research council. A sum to help that organization is included in this year's estimates. This brief requests that similar assistance be given to the British Columbia industrial and scientific research council. On this council are representatives of the dominion government. There is one representative from the federal Department of Mines and Resources, one from the Department of Fisheries and one from the national research council. What is the attitude of the government toward this request for assistance in connection with the work of the British Columbia industrial and scientific research council?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, I have not before me the letter or the memorandum attached to the letter received from the Hon. Mr. Carson, the Minister of Trade and Industry of British Columbia. However, I dealt with the matter this morning by saying all I could say at the moment, namely that I had called a meeting of the privy council committee on industrial and scientific research. That meeting will be held next Tuesday, and the matter will be considered.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that the policy of the national research council is against centralization and rather in favour of building up research facilities in different parts of Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think that I would say the policy of the national research council is opposed to centralization. I can say however that it is in favour of broadening the present arrangement. The next item in the estimates is proof of that suggestion, because in that item we ask for funds to establish a branch of research work in one of the three western provinces. I believe it would be correct to say it is important that the national research council keep in close touch with any research work in Canada, wherever it may be done, so as to avoid duplication.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. BENCE: The minister has referred to the next item, the purpose of which, I suggest, is not obvious. May I at this point, however, make some brief observations in connection with item 357, and what I shall now say might be taken as covering both items. It is clear to most hon. members that the vote now before the committee is one of the most important. I believe all can agree that the work done by scientific research in the last number of years has been of inestimable value to Canada.

When we think of the millions of dollars that have been saved by our scientists in the improvement of our crops, for example, through the eradication of many diseases which used to afflict them, it will be agreed that this amount of money and even a great deal more could very well be spent to improve the general welfare of the people of Canada. I suggest, following the lead given by the minister a few minutes ago, that in view of the peculiar conditions existing in western Canada and the great amount of work which has to be done in the prairie provinces in connection with the crops, the recommendations which have been made to the administration should be immediately accepted and an extensive laboratory set up in the prairie provinces. I suggest that the best location would be in the city of Saskatoon, from which I come. It is in the very centre of the prairie provinces, it is a university city, and one from which a great many of our leading scientists have come.

Mr. GRAYDON: And a good member of parliament.

Mr. BENCE: When the government was seeking to replace General McNaughton as head of the research council it was to the city of Saskatoon and the Saskatoon university they went to pick an able administrator and eminent scientist in the person of Mr. C. J. Mackenzie. That indicates the calibre of the men that we have in that part of the country, and men who are well versed in the types of problems with which we are confronted in the prairie provinces. I suggest, therefore, that the government consider setting up an extensive type of laboratory in that part of the country to deal with the problems which face the people of the prairie provinces, who in the last few years have become more and more conscious of the fact that if we are ever to develop a diversified economy it can be done only through the utilization of the various kinds of crops that are produced in the prairie provinces along lines which probably we have not heretofore followed. I therefore strongly recommend the establishment of such a laboratory in Saskatoon.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope the minister will say something in reply to the comments which I made, I believe yesterday, when this item was before the committee. I pointed out at that time that I felt that not sufficient funds had been provided to make it possible for the scientists of the national research council to do all the research and other work which they should be doing, and of which they are eminently capable. I want to take a moment to pay as high a tribute as one possibly can to what some of our scientists have done at that institution, particularly during the course of the war. The minister knows, as do other hon. members, that a number of inventions which have aided materially in the conduct of the war, and particularly in the saving of life, have grown out of research at this institution.

Another matter which has been brought to my attention about the research council is that there has been considerable uncertainty as to the status of the men there with respect to military call-ups. I can appreciate the difficulty in this connection. I think all of us must appreciate the embarrassing position in which the men find themselves, for even when higher-placed officials make it known to them that they are doing an important job and should stay with it, there is the pressure of their own feelings in the matter and their desire to be with their colleagues and college classmates in the front line, which results in many of these men leaving their posts with the council to go on what is known as active service. I suggest that some more definite effort should be made to convince these men that they are on active service in the work they are doing at the research council and should be encouraged to carry on with it.

During the debate on the budget resolutions something was said about the importance of encouraging research work throughout Canada by private corporations. I believe the government should be doing all it can on its own initiative to encourage research work. This is a matter upon which I should like to hear from the minister. I hope he will have some announcement to make as to plans for enlarging the work of the council and for providing better salaries so that we may attract into this work many of the brilliant young men who are coming out of our universities.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks of the difficulties, of which he apparently has some knowledge, with respect to enlistments from the staff of the national research council. He speaks about some persuasion being used to show them that their duty lies in civilian activities. May I observe that this condition can hardly be laid at the doorstep of the minister who is now attempting to get his estimates through; rather it is a product of the man-power plan which this country has been following, as I believe mistakenly, through these years.

Will the minister state whether there is a permanent head of the national research council, or whether the position is now temporary?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Dealing first with the remarks of the leader of the opposition, the president of the national research council is General McNaughton. As we all know he is not acting at the present time; the acting president is Dean Mackenzie.

I have given some consideration to the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; and I would state, briefly, that the national research council has always recognized the need for maintaining a proper balance between fundamental research, or pure research as it is sometimes called, and applied research.

On many occasions attention has been called to the importance of maintaining this balance by members of the national research council, when questions of policy and programmes were under consideration. It has been emphasized that practical, or applied research, is based upon and dependent upon the fundamental knowledge acquired through pure research, and that a national research programme must provide for both fundamental and applied research in proper balance.

In the past some fundamental research has been carried on by the national research council in its own laboratories; but a still larger volume of such work has been sponsored and stimulated by the council through grants in aid of research, awarded to members of staffs of Canadian universities, qualified to conduct scientific research and having laboratory facilities at their disposal. Such grants are not restricted to fundamental research projects, but most of the work carried on under them has been of that type. Such grants not only stimulate the acquiring of fundamental knowledge, but assist in the post-graduate training of young scientists in research methods, and also assist in the development of post-graduate instructions in scientific research.

During the abnormal conditions imposed by war, with need for the solution of practical problems confronting the armed services and other war establishments, it has been necessary for the national research council to direct most of its activities to applied research, but it is the definite policy of the council, as soon as circumstances permit, to restore a reasonable balance in its research programme as between fundamental and applied research.

Some remarks were made yesterday and, I believe, this morning regarding the necessity of increased expenditures on research. In this connection I wish to put on record a brief table showing the estimated expenditures on research in four countries, and comprising the latest figures we have been able to secure, even in an approximate way:

Country	Date	Annual expenditure in millions	Expenditure per capita	Expenditure as per cent of annual income
Russia	1934	300 to 500	$1.82 to $3	·8% to 1%
United States	1935	300	2.40	·5% to ·6%
Great Britain	1934	30	.70	·15%
Canada	1938	2·4 to 3·3	.22 to .29	·06% to ·08%

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Canadian figures cover all research in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is all research.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Private and national?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Our expenditure is pretty low.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Very low—that is why I am putting this table on the record.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I follow up the question I propounded a few minutes ago with respect to the presidency of the national research council? One hears on many sides the question whether or not the government is going to return General McNaughton to "active service" with the national research council. I think the public and the house ought to be made aware as early as possible of the government's policy in that respect. Most people in Canada will want to see a great warrior such as General McNaughton occupy the very important post for which in the past he has shown himself to be eminently qualified and in which he made a great reputation for himself. Can the minister make a statement in that regard?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not in a position to make an announcement on that matter at the present time. I do not believe it has been discussed, certainly not by me, and I am sure the leader of the opposition does not want the suggestion to go abroad that General McNaughton is anxious to be back at the national research council and that the government is not willing to have him back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point at all.

Mr. BENCE: This morning, among other things, I pointed out what I believed to be the advantages in the establishment of a western research laboratory in Saskatoon. Would the minister care to make a comment in that connection?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be glad to do so when my estimates are resumed. In the meantime I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, there is no need to stress the importance of the family allowance bill to members of this house or to the people of Canada. This bill has been put forward by the government as part of the comprehensive scheme of social legislation forecast in the speech from the throne. The bill has already been supported not only by members of the government and by members of this house who support the government, but it has also been generously supported by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in the house (Mr. Coldwell) and also by the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion). Their reservations on points of detail can be dealt with better in committee, but perhaps I may have a word or two later to say about some of them in the course of my remarks.

Only the Progressive Conservative party has so far opposed this measure in this house or throughout the country, and I venture to say that like the Conservative press, some of which has been critical of the measure in some respects or in totality, the opposition of the Progressive Conservative party as voiced yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is based not only on failure to understand the measure but as well on the failure to realize its importance as the greatest single means to meet a fundamental need of our people in these changed and changing times. The speeches of the leader of the opposition and of the hon. member for Parkdale are important, but important only for the reason that they show to all the people of Canada how fundamental is the difference in outlook towards the social and the humanitarian questions with which the people of Canada are concerned as between those hon. gentlemen and the Liberal party and this government.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have no monopoly on that.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have no monopoly on anything. When the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Parkdale voice views such as they voiced yesterday, I am entitled to say that they mark a fundamental cleavage between themselves and this party, and that cleavage will be recognized more and more by the people of Canada as the days go by.

But I believe that the house and the people of Canada are far less interested in the views of members of the opposition, as voiced yesterday, than they are in the merits of this proposal, and they want to consider this measure on its merits. They want to see what it is, they want to see what it will do, and they want to see how it will work; and I shall try in my remarks this afternoon to deal in some measure with these three questions.

It is generally recognized, not only in this country but in other countries as well, that Canada has led the world in the economic and financial conduct of its war effort and in the equitable distribution of the costs of the war. With family allowances as proposed in this bill, Canada again leads the world. Canada leads the world in making adequate provision for her greatest single asset, the three and a half million children of our country.

The proposal itself is that a parent maintaining a child resident in Canada, within the definition of the act, shall each month receive, whether in Nova Scotia or British Columbia, or in any other part of Canada, $5 for each child less than six years of age; $6 for each child between the ages of 6 and 9; $7 for children of 10 to 12; and $8 for children from 13 to 15; less $1 for the fifth child, $2 for the sixth and seventh, and $3 for each additional child. At this moment I wish to correct an impression which the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay left, that in the consideration of the number of children for the purpose of reduction according to the act we would consider children over the age of sixteen. If the hon. member will look at the definition of "child" in section 2 (a) of the bill he will find that a child is defined as a person less than sixteen years of age, so that adequately clears up any misunderstanding he may have on that point.

I ask hon. members, all of whom have as great an experience of the way in which our people in Canada live as any other group in this country, to think of how great a difference this will make in the lives of the individual citizens and children of this country.

This measure should be supported by everyone as a great social and humanitarian measure. The well-being of the individual is the supreme end of society, and the place to start is with the children. Many of us in this house have at one time or another talked about the great future that Canada will have. The place to start in making that future great is with the children of this country, with their nutrition, their health, their welfare and their education. Under this bill there will be paid each month to each parent a sum of money earmarked to meet the urgent needs of the children of our country.

This bill should also be supported as a great democratic measure because it endeavours to create a greater equality of opportunity for all the children of Canada. It is a great Canadian measure because it treats all Canadians from end to end of the country absolutely alike. The leader of the opposition, in his speech as appears at page 5343 of the daily edition of Hansard, said among his objections to the measure, and I quote:

> It denies the basic principles of social justice.

What reason did he give? He said he objected to this measure because it treats all people alike. Well, I say that is one of the most extraordinary statements ever to be made in a democratic house by a democratic leader. He opposes this measure because it treats all people alike. I glory in its treating all people alike. The leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Parkdale and the Conservative press, before they even saw the measure, referred by innuendo or expressly to the fact that one part of Canada might be favoured by this measure more than another part. I deny that expressly. This measure treats all the citizens of Canada alike.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Only one voice in the wilderness.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are a lot of others, and there will be a lot more.

Mr. GRAYDON: You disregard entirely the question of need.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is why you take that position.

Mr. CLAXTON: The need of all Canadians is the same.

Mr. GRAYDON: You do not do that in other things.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Blanchette) quoted a passage from an editorial presumably by B. K. Sandwell, the editor of Saturday Night. The editorial appeared on July 8. I shall not take up the time of the house to quote it again, but I do say that it should command the attention of every Canadian who calls himself a Canadian. It is under the head "All are Canadians", and so they are.

The census returns of 1941 are not yet analysed on the basis of numbers of children and the size of families in the different provinces of Canada; but I should like to give another answer to the hon. members opposite and those throughout the country who raise this question—I do not. From such examination as I have been able to make, it is clear that the difference between what any group of people in Canada will receive from what any other group in Canada will receive under this measure is very much less than they seem to suppose. Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Quebec, because they have slightly larger families, may receive more per family.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why the "slightly"?

Mr. CLAXTON: Because it is true if you look at the figures. But the people of Ontario and British Columbia will receive more per child because of the fact that they do not come in for the reduction which has met a good deal of opposition in Quebec. In other words, this measure has been designed to meet as scientifically as it could be done the problem of giving equal treatment to all the people of Canada, and in that sense I say that it is a great Canadian measure.

But it is also a great economic measure. The primary justification for family allowances may be on humanitarian or social grounds, but the economic implications are also extremely important. From this point of view family allowances can be regarded as a means of increasing and stabilizing employment and form a substantial part of any adequate or well-balanced programme for maintaining adequate employment after the war.

Most people would now consider that government expenditure on public works, resources conservation and so forth, would be justified where necessary to prevent mass unemployment; it is easy to see how government expenditure of this type provides employment directly on the projects themselves, and indirectly among those who supply whatever materials are necessary for carrying out the projects. But family allowances increase the buying power of those groups who not only need that money but who are most certain to use it immediately. Just as with public works, there will be an increased demand for goods and services, but in this case employment will be provided, not in producing directly for the government but in producing things which the people with low incomes and large families want—more and better food and clothing and more adequate housing. In the short run, therefore, family allowances represent a method of creating employment which is just as effective as public investment expenditure. I will go farther; in some respects family allowances are better than public investment expenditure. In the first place, they are continuous and non-seasonal. They go all the year round. In the second place, they spread consuming power over a larger range of occupations, and in the third place, they stimulate private enterprise by providing steady markets for output.

There is also a parallel in their long-run effect. Public investment, if it is wisely planned and efficiently executed, will add to the nation's productive capital equipment. Family allowances will raise the quality of our people. They represent an investment in the working forces of to-morrow that is even more certain to pay dividends than investment in plant, equipment or national resources. In the period of rapid technological change which we now face, the obsolescence factor in respect of any kind of material capital may be rapid; a healthy, intelligent, adaptable working force is the only asset which a country may have which will never be outmoded by technical progress.

I ask hon. members to consider how much the investment of the nation will be in each child under this proposal. If we take a child at birth, beginning with the first of July 1945, for six years his parents will receive $5 a month, $60 a year, a total of $360. For four years his parents will receive $6 a month, $72 a year, a total of $288. For three years his parents will receive $7 a month, $84 a year, a total of $252. For three years his parents will receive $8 a month, $96 a year, a total of $288. That makes a grand total of $1,188. I do not want to make invidious comparisons, and I do not wish to be misunderstood in this analogy. I make it only for the purpose of illustration. But I do ask hon. members to compare the value that the nation, the family and the child, will receive from that expenditure of $1,188 compared with the expenditure on a single motor car. Added to that there is the additional productive capacity of the children and the saving to the nation due to the increased elimination of ill-health due to better nutrition and care. There is the over-all effect of an increased consuming power. I venture to say that this is the greatest single measure ever introduced in any democracy or anywhere else to eliminate the possibilities of another depression. I do not say that it will do that, but I think this is one way by which it can be done to a greater degree than by any other single legislative act. And, if, as I maintain, it adds to the consuming power and the productive power, it will also add to the ability to raise revenues and pay taxes. Quite apart from the social and humanitarian consequences of this bill, which I think are immeasurable, this bill is justified on purely economic and financial grounds as a measure in the interests of all the people of Canada.

We have heard some remarks about what other countries have done. Altogether some thirty-four countries have had systems of family allowances. Not one of them, so fas as I know, except those under enemy occupation, has ever abandoned the scheme once it was tried. On the contrary, schemes have been steadily improved, steadily developed and worked out as the experience of the people has shown that what was begun for a small class of the population should be extended to more and more classes.

Australia, our great sister dominion, began this in one of her states, New South Wales, in 1929. On July 1, 1941, a nation-wide scheme of family allowances was introduced by the government under the Right Honourable Mr. Robert Menzies. This scheme provided for a payment of five shillings per week for all children except the first. Family allowances were first introduced in New Zealand as far back as 1926. In 1943 they were increased to seven shillings six pence per week. This is subject to reduction as the family income increases beyond five pounds five shillings per week. A scheme was introduced in Ireland in 1944 under which two shillings six pence is paid for each child after the second.

Reference has been made to the Beveridge report by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) in her extraordinarily fine speech last night. Since then the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) has said—I think I quote his words correctly —that the British government are not entirely in favour of this measure. He then went on to say that England was doing it because of an immediate need. When he was speaking there happened to be a member of the British House of Commons in the galleries of this house. He was a little surprised to hear this decision of the British government recorded by the hon. member for Parkdale. I refer the hon. member for Parkdale, and all other hon. members of this house who have read some of the misquotations appearing recently in some newspapers of the speech by Sir John Anderson on February 16, 1943, to columns 1666 and 1667 of the British Hansard. They will find there that the British government came out squarely in favour of family allowances of five shillings per week for every child after the first. Rumour has it that the British government will shortly introduce some such plan.

I would refer hon. members who are interested in this from the economic as well as the social point of view to Lord Keynes, perhaps one of the greatest living economists in the world. He published a book entitled, "How to Pay for the War," in 1940 in which he said:

> At first sight it is paradoxical to propose in time of war an expensive social reform which we have not thought ourselves able to afford in time of peace. But in truth the need for this reform is so much greater in such times that it may provide the most appropriate occasion for it.
> I share the view held by many others that this is so. I recommend, therefore, that a family allowance of 5s. per week should be paid in cash for each child up to the age of fifteen. I am estimating the net cost of this at £100,000,000 the basis for which is explained in appendix III.

When Sir William Beveridge was here and people asked whether people in Britain were in favour of family allowances or other similar measures, he replied that it was just a simple question: "Should it come now or a little later."

In Canada the discussion of this matter began a good many years back in 1929 when the predecessor of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Blanchette), who spoke so well last night, Mr. J. E. Letellier de St. Just, introduced a resolution providing for family allowances. This was referred to the select standing committee on international and industrial relations. Last night the hon. member for Edmonton East referred to the Marsh report, the James report, and the report of the subcommittee of the James committee dealing with problems affecting women.

This subject is not new. It has been canvassed thoroughly here and in other parts of the world. When we step forward, as we are doing now, with a broader and more comprehensive and more generous measure than has been introduced in any part of the world as yet, we are showing the way to the rest of the world once again.

Hon. members may be interested in some figures relative to the number of children that may be involved. With the consent of the house I should like to put on Hansard a calculation of the cost of the family allowance resolution prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

First this gives the estimated number of children in Canada on June 1, 1941. That figure is according to the census and particulars are given for children of different ages up to and including fifteen years; the total is 3,409,911. That number has been extended by the procedure the bureau has to July 1, 1945, and for that date a total is shown of 3,535,934. While an increase is shown I may say to the house that the experience of other countries has been that the payment of family allowances does not result in a spectacular increase in the births in the country. It has some effect because conditions are straightened out in various ways, but there is no very spectacular result. The officials of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics inform me that it is not anticipated there will be a substantial change from the figure I give here, which is their estimate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have permission to put this document on Hansard?

Mr. GRAYDON: If the hon. member would give the details as to what are contained in these statements, I would have no objection. However, I would like to know what he is putting on Hansard.

Mr. CLAXTON: The figures I just gave are self-explanatory. I was going to describe the next table. I have a copy in my hand for the leader of the opposition, if he wishes to see it. The second table shows the estimated distribution of families by number of children under sixteen years of age, at 1941. This is based on a two per cent sample taken by the bureau of statistics, and it is substantially accurate in the higher figures. There is likely to be some error, however, in the lower figures. May I point out that if hon. members will total the number of families throughout Canada having five or more children they will find that that total is 163,050. That is out of a total of 3,409,911, according to the census. In other words nearly ninety per cent of the families in Canada have less than five children, and only eleven and a half per cent of the families have more than five children.

The final table on the sheet shows the estimated cost for the month of July, 1945. It shows that for children from birth to the age of 15 years inclusive the total cost would be $21,700,000 per month, with deductions for the fifth and later children of $600,000 per month. This gives a net cost of $21,100,000. That, of course, is without adjustments for income tax. The total gross annual cost is estimated at $253,200,000. The Prime Minister yesterday gave the house an estimate of the effect of the income tax adjustment, placing the figure between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 per year. So that the net cost to the Canadian people is something like $200,000,000 per year.

I should explain to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion)—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member leaves the point he has been making, it is my understanding that there is no objection to his placing these tables on Hansard.

Mr. CLAXTON: The tables follow:

* Without adjustment for income tax.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay referred yesterday to a statement appearing at page 1227 of Hansard for March 15, 1943, showing the distribution of children in families in Canada. I should explain that that statement shows the distribution of dependent children up to the age of twenty-four years, so that it is not relevant to the statements I have just filed.

With the consent of the house I should like to put on Hansard another statement showing the distribution of costs and benefits between rural and urban children and families across Canada. I do this because the measure now before the house will benefit children of rural families just as much as and in some respects more than it will children of urban families because of their larger families. This statement gives the population, the number of children under sixteen years, the reduction for five or more children, the cost before income tax adjustment, the average allowance per child, the number of families, and the average allowance per family, in respect of urban and rural families across Canada. The table shows that the average allowance per child according to this estimate—and it is only an estimate, based on a two per cent sample—will be $5.96 per month in rural communities, while for urban children it will be $6.12. The average allowance per child for the whole of Canada will be $6.04. When we come to the average allowance per family we see that while the rural child is to be credited with only $5.96, the rural family receives $16.01 on the average, whereas the urban child is to receive $6.12 and the urban family $13.33. So that as I said before, in respect of the different provinces in Canada, what any family may lose through the per capita amount received per child it will make up in the amount received per family. And the increasing and decreasing scale of the allowance provided by section 3 of the bill has been designed expressly to do just that, namely to equalize the position, on the assumption and in the knowledge—and this is within the knowledge of everyone—that it costs more to maintain a child as it grows up than it does to maintain an infant. On the other hand it costs less to maintain a child in a large family than to maintain it in a small family. The proposal is just as scientific and just as reasonable as any such proposal dealing with the great mass of children in the population could be.

The table follows:

General Statement of Family Allowance Costs Per Month for Rural and Urban Data of 1941

At $5 for 0-5 years; $6 for 6-9 years; $7 for 10-12 years; $8 for 13-15 years

Prepared by Dominion Bureau of Statistics

		Rural	Urban	Canada
Population	No.	5,239,000	6,251,000	11,490,000
Number of children under 16 years	No.	1,772,000	1,638,000	3,410,000
Reduction for 5 or more children (2% sample)	$	389,000	196,000	585,000
Cost before income tax adjustment	$	10,565,000	10,024,000	20,589,000
Average allowance per child	$	5.96	6.12	6.04
Number of families (2% sample)	No.	660,000	752,000	1,412,000
Average allowance per family	$	16.01	13.33	14.58

The accuracy of the 2 per cent sample figures is as follows:

For a group with 1,000,000 children the maximum likely error is under 2 per cent.
For a group with 100,000 children the maximum likely error is under 5 per cent.
For a group with 10,000 children the maximum likely error is under 10 per cent.

100—339
REVISED EDITION

I had hoped at this time to be able to outline to the house my own—and only my own—views as to how this would actually work out in administration. I see however that the time at my disposal has almost expired, and as hon. members have already been courteous and generous to me I believe I shall leave anything further I have to say until the bill is in committee. May I state briefly however that from government officials I have met I learn that it is their aim: first, to make the administration as simple as it can be made; second, to use all existing agencies of government that can be used; third, to arrive at, maintain and develop the closest possible cooperation with the provinces, and the agencies in the provinces; and fourth, to hope for and expect the development of all child welfare services and agencies which already exist and are doing such splendid work. But they could do even better work, because each of them finds that the fundamental obstacle in the way of continuous social betterment is the need for a greater income per child in each family. I can tell the house after a good deal of association with child welfare workers that it is clear that they believe this bill will change the whole character of their work. Instead of having to deal with conditions of extreme need and poverty, those welfare workers will be in a position to build so that the child, wherever it may be, under whatever conditions of life it may live, in whatever province it may be, and no matter who its father or mother may be, will have a better chance in its future life.

There has been some experience administratively in dealing with such large numbers. I am reminded that the dependents allowance board distributes 609,254 cheques per month. That is a very large number. The provision for family allowances will lead to the distribution of something like 1,500,000 cheques per month. However, already a great deal of experience has been gained by treasury officials in administering arrangements of this kind. They believe that the three divisions into which administration will be divided, namely, registration, investigation and payment, can be adequately handled without any great or excessive cost. I saw in one publication that somebody estimated that the cost would be twenty per cent. The estimate arrived at based on the experience of similar measures in other countries and in other connections here would lead one to suppose that the cost will certainly not exceed two per cent, and will probably be less.

[Mr. Claxton.]

So, Mr. Speaker, we have here a measure which in no way interferes with the autonomy of the provinces, as was pointed out by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and which does not purport to deal with education, as my hon. friend the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) thought. All that this purports to do is to say what child is the kind of child that will receive the benefit, and this bill contemplates that it would not be the wish of anyone that a child who is working, or was a truant from school should receive the benefit. This bill treats the people of Canada from end to end alike. I support it and advocate its adoption and its enthusiastic support by the people of Canada as a great, progressive, constructive step in the building of the future society of our great country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I wanted to ask if with the statements which he has been allowed to place on Hansard he would also give a break-down by provinces and place that on Hansard as well.

Mr. CLAXTON: I thought I had already explained, and if not I am glad to do it now, that I had asked the bureau of statistics for that information. They informed me that from the census results they cannot get that information for family groups except by going over the 1941 census results and working out the figures from place to place. That would be a very lengthy operation. I will make further inquiries and perhaps answer my hon. friend later on that point.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood that that information had been supplied already. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was given for children up to the age of twenty-four by provinces but not by families. That was done in answer to an inquiry by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. I understand that all the census figures are based on ages up to twenty-four. That is their ordinary run of tables. In order to get a break-down for children up to sixteen in families they would have to go through all the census returns, and that would be quite a lengthy operation.

Mr. BOUCHER: Are these figures by provinces not available in the census returns for certain ages up to sixteen years of age? I have been informed that they are available for 1941, but I do not know whether that is correct.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been members of this parliament during these difficult years of the war emergency have had very many controversial issues come before us when it has not always been easy to see clearly the direction we should take, but it would appear to me with respect to this measure which is now before the house that any member who believes in the destiny and in the future of the younger generation of Canada can have no doubt whatever as to the advisability of giving it whole-hearted support. For my own self I feel very glad that I am a member of this House of Commons at this time and that even before the war is brought to its successful conclusion we have had an opportunity of seeing this legislation brought down to be put on the statute books of Canada.

I know that it is the duty of members of this house to look at any measure of national importance as objectively as possible, and yet I find that my own personal feelings do to some degree become mixed up in this. You see, I happen to be one of those unfortunate young women who belong to the generation in Canada who married and started to raise a young family during the most difficult days of the darkest period in the world's history. I know from first-hand experience of the struggles and the difficulties and all the heartaches of mothers who through those years sought to protect and bring up their children and to give them the best they could under such difficult conditions. Possibly there are those among the members of this house who suffered as I did; I do not know. It was a very terrible thing to lose a first son for lack of medical attention. It will always be a source of sorrow to me to know that one of my other children will suffer to the end of his days from physical disabilities which were caused through malnutrition in his early days. It was possibly because of my own sufferings that since I came into this house I have spent a great deal of my time speaking on the need for the introduction of social services to safeguard the life of our younger generation. Of course, the nazi menace reached a point where it overshadowed every other consideration, but to-day, when we find the beginning of the end within sight, it is a good thing that the government should at this time have turned its attention and concentrated upon a measure which will be the beginning of what we all hope to be a better and fuller life for the people of this country. Once on the statute book as a beginning, I sincerely hope that in time it may be broadened out and become part of a wider social security measure.

I think it is agreed by all of us that one of the great ends which this bill will achieve is the raising of the purchasing power of that section of our people who still need purchasing power so badly. It has long been recognized that the problem of production has been solved in the age in which we live. It has always been distribution that has been the snag. Lack of purchasing power, if we allow that to continue, will destroy the marvels that Canada is able to produce. The great productive forces of industry and agriculture which will be unleashed with the ending of this war will be futile to add to the progress of our nation unless we find it possible to increase and extend the abilities of wide sections of our people to consume that which they are able to produce. Certainly these family allowances will make a beginning in that direction.

Certain small sections of labour have registered some protest against this measure, and have even gone further and condemned it on the ground that it may be used as a means of keeping wages from rising after the war. I feel that that is a defeatist argument and that the great trade movement in this country will see to it that it is not so used. I believe that the great trade movement in this country will have the ability to defeat this argument and to prove the incorrectness of such a premise. I know that it will not stop the farm movement from working to secure the basic price guarantees that are needed for an upward adjustment of farm income in Canada.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking in introducing this bill he mentioned that the cost of this measure was estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $250,000,000, and that of that roughly some $50,000,000 would be taken back through the income tax.

I am just wondering whether or not—I am not sure that I am correct—we shall obtain the greatest advantage from the expenditure of this money through grading the allowance to children according to age. Having a little family of my own, I realize that the cost of children does increase, generally speaking, as they grow older. But of course this family allowance is not a measure to cover completely the cost of upkeep of a child. I agree that it is a contribution towards the cost of upkeep. The Marsh report stated, I believe, that according to the rates of 1939, $14.50 monthly would be the minimum for the complete upkeep of a child. If we are to have a system of graded payments, it is going to be extremely difficult to administer. It will need a very large force of officials to check the authenticity of claims made, and so on. I am of the opinion that we could cut down the cost of administration and pay a greater part of that $200 million into the pockets of the people if we were to give a straight sum irrespective of the age of the child. Perhaps the Prime Minister in replying later will give arguments to prove that I am incorrect. I am quite open to persuasion on this matter, but it seems to me, from the little I know about administrative costs, that having the graded system would reduce the amount available for grants under this measure.

Another point of which I am not quite sure is whether it is wise to decrease the allowance to the larger family. I feel that it is unfair to the larger family. Perhaps food bought in larger quantities does not increase in cost in direct relation to the number of children, but certainly with regard to clothing, housing and schooling the expenses increase with the size of the family. If we are to protect the health of the mothers of this nation; if the mother who has a large family is to maintain her health and strength, she needs assistance in her work. It has been said outside this chamber—I have noticed it in the press—that the gradation is for political reasons, that had we allowed family payments in the same amount to be applied in respect of any number of children it would have been said in some circles that this was a political sop to the province of Quebec. I wish to speak about this very frankly. I am an English-speaking Canadian, yet I would not regard any such measure as a sop to Quebec. I am aware that certain inequalities exist in that province, and I cannot believe that the future of Canada will be secure unless we keep the national unity we have and make it stronger, and we have to eradicate as far as possible inequalities among our people. To give a family allowance of equal amount per child to any size of family would have helped in some slight degree to remedy the inequalities which exist in Quebec. I think we should remember that those who sow the wind usually reap the whirlwind. Had the people of Germany not held legitimate grievances it would not have been possible for the nazis to prey upon them and exploit and inflame their grievances with such disastrous consequences. The people of Quebec have certain legitimate grievances. Their wage rates have always been lower than those of the majority of other provinces. Their living standards have been consequently lower, their disease rates have been higher; and but for these legitimate grievances we would not to-day have certain groups trying to capitalize on those grievances with possibly disastrous results not only to Quebec but to the rest of Canada.

As the bill stands it militates against the French-Canadian people of Quebec. According to the census bulletin on households, occupations and earnings, No. 5, issued in 1941, I believe it is a fairly reliable estimate that while the province of Quebec has only about 24·8 per cent of the total number of families in Canada, it has 34·8 per cent of the families with five children, 43·5 per cent of the families with six or seven children, and 56·7 per cent of the families with eight or more children. There is no reason why any mother anywhere in Canada should not have adequate help and assistance, however many children she has.

This question of the size of the family is rather a delicate one to deal with in this house. A woman does not always have the right to decide how many children she shall have, yet the burden of the care and the constant work which attend the keeping of a large family is hers, and I am sorry, speaking personally, that the woman with the larger family will not receive the allowance which I feel she should have.

The Prime Minister, when he was speaking before, said he did not think that any very large section of the people would misuse this allowance. I agree with him. The twenty-fourth annual report of the Canadian Welfare Council supports the Prime Minister's statement. In this report, dated May 15, 1944, I find this statement:

> In any event it seems fair that the success or failure of a children's allowance scheme will depend very largely on the proper development of an adequate administrative plan, and this is now being studied by the federal authorities. It will depend even more on the success of the arrangements which must be worked out to secure proper supervision and control over that small percentage of cases where the allowance would not otherwise be wisely handled.

This is the point I would like to emphasize.

> The experience of the dependents' allowance board during the war years would seem to indicate that this percentage will not exceed more than one to three per cent of all cases.

That is an extremely low estimate. I still feel, as I said before when speaking on the bill setting up the Department of National Health and Welfare, that we should accompany these family allowances with a wide circulation of educational bulletins on all matters concerning the feeding and care and upbringing of children to give parents the knowledge which is necessary. If the allowance is not wisely spent, I believe that in the cases—the small percentage of cases—where it may not be wisely spent it will not be because of wilful misspending; it will be chiefly because of lack of knowledge as to how the money should be spent most advantageously in the interest of the childen.

I would quote again from the same report of the Canadian Welfare Council, where this is stated:

> This points, in other words, to the conclusion that we are not really faced with such a clear-cut alternative of cash allowances versus extended children's services, as the arguments presented on both sides of this much-debated question might appear to suggest. It is probable, almost to the point of certainty, that if we are to have cash allowances for children, we will also be obliged to extend and strengthen our children's services as well, in order to safeguard and control such a substantial national investment.

I feel that an organization such as the division of nutrition, headed by Doctor Pett, and certain other branches of the Department of Health and Welfare, would be only too glad to have the opportunity of presenting in bulletin form to the people of this country all the facts which would help the mothers to understand those factors of nutrition and so on which affect the health of their children.

There is one other thing which is a little surprising to me. I do not know whether I shall have support from any other hon. members on this particular question. I am wondering why, where the bill indicates to whom the allowance shall be paid, it mentions specifically first of all the father. I believe I am correct in understanding that the cheques will be made payable to the father of the family. Of course, legally speaking, a married man is head of his household; I have no quarrel with that. But this allowance is not for general household expenditures. It is a special allowance which we hope will be used for the benefit of the children, and it is the women who are most closely concerned with the welfare of the children. In a home where there is a real partnership the woman does usually have an allowance for housekeeping and for her own uses as well. But that is not always so. I feel of course that where a woman does have certain allowance for her own uses and for housekeeping expenses it is a good thing, and gives a married woman a feeling of independence which is very necessary, but unfortunately that does not exist in all homes. I wish it did. There are many homes where that is not true. Women take an awful chance on this when they get married. So far as I know, there is no law which allows a woman to claim any part of her husband's wages as her share for the work she has to do in taking care of the family and the home. In my own experience among rural people I have found that farm women suffer more than their city sisters do in this respect. It is a degrading thing for a woman to have to ask for every cent she wants for the expenditures in the home and for her own private needs, and yet that is precisely the case particularly in farming areas. I have found among many sections of the country, not only among foreign-born but among a good many English-speaking people also, that it is the man who, with his grain cheques or his hog cheques, pays the bills at the store, and the woman never actually has the handling of money. The independence of women is a very necessary thing if the women of this country are to go forward and attain that stature of full citizenship which they should have. I think that the great majority of the heads of households, the fathers, will pass over the cheques to their wives for the upkeep of the children. Well, if they do, why not pay it directly to the women, and so protect the women whose husbands will not automatically do it? It would be a good thing.

I would remind the Prime Minister of a very old saying. I have repeated it many times, and no man has ever yet dared to dispute it with me. It is this: The rooster crows, but the hen it is that delivers the egg. It is all very well for the father or the husband to show off his beautiful children and their tricks, but it is the woman who has the daily care and responsibility as well as all the trouble that is connected with the upbringing of children. I would like to see the rights of women protected. I believe there is still great need for us to consider this question. After all, the place of the women in a country is a great indication of the advance of that particular society, and there is no real democracy without full equality between the sexes. But we are still a long way from that goal in Canada. I would have been glad to see such a principle embodied in the bill, providing for payment of cheques directly to the mothers. I am not sure, but I believe that in section 6 it is provided that if a person is dissatisfied about this allowance that person will have the right to claim an adjustment. If a woman is going to be free under section 6 to claim the right to the allowance, if her husband does not give it to her, why not give it to her in the first place and so obviate additional administrative costs? I suggest that it would obviate a lot of such costs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will find in the bill that provision is made whereby the governor in council may determine to whom cheques shall be paid, such determination to be based upon what, after conference with the provinces, would appear to be the particular parent to whom the cheque should be made payable. What my hon. friend has in mind will be met, I believe, by that clause.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am very glad indeed to hear the Prime Minister say that; it relieves my mind considerably. But I wonder what will determine the matter in some homes. Is it going to be a question of individually finding out whether the husband or the wife should have the cheque? I fail to see what will be used as a guide in the matter. I still adhere to my belief that it would cost less in the long run in administration to pay the cheque directly to the woman.

However, I am in full agreement with the bill. As we come to the separate sections there may be a few other remarks I would like to make. I am not just sure about section 6, in which it is stated that if any person is dissatisfied with the way the money is being spent, that person can appeal. I do not know whether that will affect neighbours or gossips or people who for some slight reason or other may have some feeling against a woman. We have to be very careful of the rights of people to appeal. At any rate, I shall be able to deal with these points when the sections come up before us. Generally speaking, I am proud to be able to give support to a bill of this kind, and I only hope we shall see other measures which will continue the social security of our people so that we may go forward in the same direction as this proposal.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Following the hon. member who has just spoken, I am sure that I express the feelings of every member of the house—and the same will apply to the observations last evening of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman)—when I say we recognize that no group of members in this house have more right to speak in support of this measure than the hon. member who has just taken her seat and her lady colleague who sits on this side of the house. It may be that in considering this measure the house is not only providing for the future citizens of the country but is also thereby, by implication, paying a long overdue tribute to the mothers of Canada. I am reminded, in taking part in this debate, of the words of Pitt, who, speaking in the House of Commons on an amendment to the Poor Laws, said on February 12, 1796:

> Let us make relief in cases where there are a number of children a matter of right and an honour, instead of a ground for opprobrium and contempt. This will make a large family a blessing and not a curse, and this will draw a proper line of distinction between those who are able to provide for themselves by their labour, and those who, after having enriched their country with a number of children, have a claim upon its assistance for their support.

I wonder if I would be regarded as unfair if I suggested to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), who spoke last night, that he should take to heart these words of Pitt and realize that in referring to the children of our country there is no occasion for irony or for anything approaching what I regard as his contemptuous observations of last evening.

This particular measure now before the house is a part of the government's programme of social security. It is not the first plank in that platform. Perhaps the first real measure came with the introduction of unemployment insurance in 1940, under which scheme now two millions of our citizens will share in a fund contributed to by workers, by employers and by the government and amounting to over $205 million. In that unemployment insurance scheme, based upon the experience that other countries have had, an attempt is being made to improve where others failed, and it is now being followed by this measure, which I think Mr. Beveridge, Mr. Marsh and Alvin Hanson have said is the first necessary condition in any real social security programme.

I must say that I was not a little disturbed when I found the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), speaking for a great historic party in this country, failing to fall in step not only with progressive thought throughout Canada but with progressive thought throughout the world. Recently at the twenty-sixth meeting of the international labour conference forty-two nations of the world, representing employers, workers and governments, met, and among the things that they all recommended for adoption in their own countries was a system of family allowances on the basis of the Australian model, which we are following in large measure in this house. In 1938 I find that at the pan-American conference of twenty-one American republics a recommendation was made that family allowances be set up in every one of those twenty-one republics.

This is not a matter of bribe; this is a matter which in the growing process of history has come to be recognized by all men as part of the very necessary assignment of the state in the duty it owes to its citizens, and particularly to those within the low income brackets. We have given expression in the Atlantic charter to such declarations as freedom from want. What steps are we to take in order to give effect to freedom from want unless we give support to this kind of measure, unless we hurriedly recognize that we cannot wait until we set up a complete system of social services, which in answer to the leader of the opposition I tried to suggest yesterday would take many years to achieve on the basis of the evidence given by Doctor Davidson before the social security committee of this parliament.

No; freedom from want will follow statesmen and governments throughout the ensuing decades in a manner which perhaps many of us at this stage are unwilling to recognize; and while we have taken a great step in this measure I venture to suggest that in ten years from now this measure, commendable as it is now, will be looked upon as something that is only part of many of the things which must be done to justify our commitment to the general expression throughout the world that there must be freedom from want. Mr. Beveridge, Alvin Hanson, Mr. Keynes, all the great sociologists and economists of our day have recognized that a system of social security without a system of family allowances is not a system of social security at all. Mr. Keynes has gone on to say that a high level of employment is not possible in Britain unless they have along with it a kind of scheme of family allowances. This latter plan differs from that of Sir William Beveridge.

Thirty-four countries—in Europe; Australia, Japan, New Zealand, some of them since the end and one before the beginning of the last war—have adopted this measure in principle; yet it was left to the leader of the opposition and to his group to be the only voice in Canada opposing the principle of this measure. This is an attack on poverty, and poverty we have—every country has. Poverty exists throughout the world. We have poverty which we hope to mitigate by covering children's maintenance and subsistence, such things as food, clothing, light and fuel. And as one who has had something to do with the Department of Labour, I say that we will find under a system of family allowance one of the ready means of taking care of the problem of over-insurance about which I shall have more to say in a few moments.

As has been said, we are merely extending the principle which we have recognized in old age pensions, in the income tax exemptions, in mothers' allowances and dependents' allowances. It is the same kind of principle, only we are extending it to groups who for one reason or another cannot qualify within the income tax-paying brackets. The fact is that every addition to a family is an additional economic handicap. No one who comes from a large family, no one who has felt what it is to want, no one who has aspired to positions of greatness in public life or in industry and who has come from a small home with a large family, can fail to recognize that a large family is an economic handicap; and in providing this additional opportunity by way of perhaps better food, perhaps assisting in better housing, certainly I hope in better education, we are taking a step which in the days to come those of us who are members of this parliament shall not regret. For the fact is that the future citizens of our country have a value to society just as much as our forests, just as much as the development of our national resources upon which the richness of our economy depends. Yet we spend less time and less interest on our children. We have been charged with being emotional, with being excitable, because we lay emphasis on the fact that there are some things in life more important than purely economic and material things.

There is no relation between the size of a man's family and the remuneration which he receives, as I hope to show in dealing with the labour aspect of this problem; there is no possible way of bringing that differential into line. No, Mr. Speaker; family allowances cannot help but be regarded as the way of first guaranteeing a continuing assurance of income regardless of what happens to the father. There is no man or woman in this house who has not seen what the spectre of death can bring to homes where there are no means of carrying on in the absence of the father. Family allowances are a subvention, not a provision for family standards, but an aid to family standards. They will assist the worker who is exposed to a variety of hazards beyond his capacity to control. As I said, we spend money on land, forests and factories and the other material assets of this nation. But in the past I think we have not placed sufficient emphasis upon human values. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) said, in the days that lie ahead, when we shall have to dovetail private initiative into a system of public investment to keep men at gainful work rather than in receipt of the dole, we shall find that this fund of $200,000,000 will serve as a very effective part of that public investment programme. It will serve to provide additional purchasing power as well as to guarantee against insecurity and the like.

There are those who suggest, and the leader of the opposition was one, that instead of direct allowances we should have allowances in kind; that instead of giving money to the father or the mother for the children we should provide services in the form of better housing, more milk for the children, hot meals for the children at school and the like. Well,

I ask him to ask the person who advised him in the remarks he made in this house what she would have to say about a report made in Norway in 1938, where after a careful study some Norwegians, assisted by a group of Englishmen and a group of experts from other countries, recommended that in respect of housing and medical attention collective effort was of special value, but when it came to the everyday things of life, there was, upon examination, only one system which would serve those things and that was a system of family allowances, not based upon the practice of France but based upon the practice embodied in this bill, a direct contributory scheme, not from employers and workers directly, but a scheme directly contributed to by the state, allowing for full control by the government with no intervention by industry or other groups.

I was not a little surprised that the leader of the opposition should have made the remarks he did about this bill, especially in the light of the study made with regard to family allowances by a gentleman, a former distinguished law partner of mine and a man for whom I have the highest personal regard and who was chairman of the national war labour board. He recommended a system of family allowances.

Mr. TUSTIN: Under certain conditions.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. In one breath "yes" and in another breath, "no." Mr. Justice McTague, now Mr. McTague, said in his report:

> We are aware that family allowances usually find their place in a general programme of social security rather as a part of a wage control policy, but substandard wages are indefensible at all times and if control of wages below 50 cents is not removed the solution is a system of family allowance.

That is undoubtedly what the hon. gentleman had in mind. For the first time in the history of this country someone recommended the very thing the leader of the opposition opposed. In that statement Mr. Justice McTague was recommending family allowances as a substitute for low wages, the very thing which we in this bill are trying to avoid and the very thing which the leader of the opposition said we must try to avoid. Yet a month later the same gentleman, now the organizer of the Conservative party, now a candidate for office in the next parliament of Canada, said:

> There is no use glibly talking about family allowances being a substitute for wages. No one suggests it is. It represents a measure of social security to people whose status really requires it.

[Mr. Martin.]

I believe that statement of Mr. McTague was correct. But I put that statement alongside the statement made by Mr. Bracken on June 25 and the statement made yesterday in this house by the leader of the opposition. If the Prime Minister or the government of this country is guilty of introducing this measure for one provocation or for one purpose or another, then what is to be said of the chief of the Conservative party organization who gave expression to the very same view? Obviously we are motivated in trying to bring about a system of family allowances because we know that under a capitalistic or socialistic form of society there are defects in the wage system which I do not think can adequately be met. There seem to be three main defects.

First, the amount of money required to maintain a family depends upon the number of people going to make up that family. Existing wage payments are made for the work performed and not according to the size of a man's family. Is there any other way of dealing with that anomaly? Second, the expenses of keeping up a family vary with the ages of the children. A father needs the most help when his income is generally low, at a time when his family is at the top level in so far as numbers are concerned. Generally the father is making less when the needs of his family are greatest. Third, in looking after individuals the state provides for them according to their real rather than their imaginary needs. The effect of this is that often it is more advantageous for a man with a number of children to be unemployed. That was the experience in Great Britain in connection with the administration of unemployment insurance, and about that Sir William Beveridge had this to say:

> The only way to keep the difference between income during employment and during unemployment as large as possible, and at the same time to keep benefits adequate during unemployment and disability, is to give allowances for children in time of earning and non-earning alike.

That great precursor of reform, Mrs. Sidney Webb—I invite those sections of labour in this country who may still have doubts to bear in mind what she said—had this to say in her minority report to the British government in 1919:

> . . . the community must face the necessity of seeing that adequate provision is made for children, not by statistical averages, but case by case. The average family is, of course, merely a convenient figment of the statistician's and does not exist in fact. If provision is made in one way or another for three children, this is very far from securing enough food and adequate conditions of nurture for those households in which there are, for years in succession, four, five, or more children dependent. The nation cannot be satisfied any more than children can with a family or household average of rations for the rising generation. Each individual baby has got to be adequately and satisfactorily provided for.

That was in 1919. That is the observation of a woman who recognized the defects in the wage system under both the capitalistic and socialistic form of society. She was away ahead of her time, but she recommended the sort of thing we are dealing with now.

I do not think anyone has met this problem more accurately than the present Prime Minister of Australia. In 1929, as a member of the royal commission investigating the problem, he was faced with the apathy, and in many quarters with the criticism of his own party because of a dissenting report he had made recommending family allowances as opposed to the majority report. In his statement Mr. Curtin goes on to say that there is no real connection between the system of family allowances we are envisaging in this bill, and what they now have in Australia, and the general level of wages. This is particularly so because in each country there is a great section of the population who are in a non-wage earning group. Forty per cent of the people in this country are in the non-wage earning group. Even assuming the validity of the argument put forward yesterday by the leader of the opposition, even assuming that it has merit, what about the forty per cent of our people, our farm people, who are not wage earners as such and who because of their low income status are undoubtedly wanting in food and other necessities which in this day and age cannot be denied?

There is one aspect of the problem I should like to deal with. I am glad to hear from the lips of the hon. member who has spoken, and from the leader of the C.C.F., that they support this measure. It will be remembered that some sections of labour did oppose this bill. When the matter was first introduced some sections of labour did express apprehension and concern. They said it might be used as a depressive for wages. What are the facts? I think one should speak plainly in this matter because of the tremendous benefits the wage earning class of this country will derive.

In Great Britain there was some apprehension about this matter. The trade union movement in that country was concerned about the proposal to adopt a system of family allowances. It was felt that as in France the employers would take advantage of this kind of assistance and pay lower wages to their workers. One group after another expressed opposition. But in 1927 the British trade unions stopped their opposition. A majority report of the joint committee of the trade union council and the British labour party executives stated that they had arrived at the conclusion that the most valuable step that could be taken to further the welfare of the nation's children was the institution of a scheme of family allowances. Later the trade union congress as well as the Labour party gave expression to the same kind of view. I call the attention of the house to the words of a great British trade union leader, Mr. James Griffiths, M.P., who said:

> I would feel more resolved and more determined facing the employers, if I knew the children of the men for whom I was negotiating were outside of the power of the owners to starve if conflict came.

I use those words, and I ask labour throughout the country to remember them. No one in his good senses to-day will doubt the right of labour to organize. The fact is that to-day in this country we have a trade union membership of 700,000, as compared with about 300,000 at the beginning of the war. In my opinion that is a good thing, not only for the workers but for Canada. As long as we have an informed trade union movement, as we have in this country, one which I repeat is good for Canada and good for the workers themselves, there need be no fear on the part of labour that the system of family allowances will be used as a weapon by irresponsible employers. I think of the words of Mr. Griffiths, when he said he would feel safer if he knew his children and the children of his colleagues in the plant were to be provided with the necessities of life during a stoppage of work, than he would under the old system where the opportunity of dealing with employers was always rendered one-sided because of the fact that workers themselves did not have the wherewithal to provide the necessities for their dependents during the out-of-work period.

This is the attitude of labour. Labour throughout the whole of the united nations at the recent international labour conference clearly showed where labour, generally speaking, stands on the subject. I am sure all ranks of labour in this country, when they really consider this matter in the light in which we are discussing it to-day, will see that it cannot be used as a depressant, and that it is not to be used as a depressant; and as long as they have strong trade union organizations—which this government has encouraged—they need not be afraid.

There is the view also of the British Labour party, and the trade union congress in 1930, signed not only by a majority of the committee but by a majority of the trade unionists on it. They were firm in their views with respect to a system of family allowances, and the joint committee said:

Indeed, we believe that during industrial conflicts the unions will be very considerably helped by the existence of such a scheme since the workers' children will be removed from the firing line and a great factor of weakness will then be removed.

May I say that I was glad to hear the leader of the C.C.F. support the view of the Prime Minister to the effect that this measure was not a means of depressing wages, but rather a means of supplementing something which wages cannot take into account—the number of children a married man may or may not have. But under no circumstances should we encourage in any way, or should this measure in any way be regarded as an encouragement to industry, large or small, to take advantage of the situation unwittingly to reduce wages, or to take into account wage costs in relation to this matter.

We have reached the stage when we have to have a different conception of the place of industry in society, a conception of industry where the partner is not only the man whose interest is that of investments, but as well the man who gives his services as manager and the man who gives his energy as a worker. These two last named partners have their rights in industry just as much as have the investors. Industry will have to come to recognize that. Just as it is entitled to depreciation on its machinery, it should provide through reserve funds and the like for depreciation of the human beings engaged in industry, and who make to industry an immeasurable contribution. That contribution is much greater than the contribution rendered by the tools or the equipment, buildings and the like in modern industry.

This is a forward measure. We are in the throes of transition. We do know that great changes are taking place. As we go along, measures which now are considered by some to be excessive, in the course of time will be regarded as only part and parcel of a world which is gradually developing, and which now is not wholly apparent to us.

John Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia, was charged by individuals in his own country, when he wrote his minority report of 1929, with giving encouragement to a system by which wages would certainly be depressed. He said throughout Australia, as every labour man in this country who has studied the matter now knows, that as long as labour is strong, as long as the government recognizes the privileges as well as the obligations of labour, and as long as labour is able to organize for its own use as well as for the community, these dangers may not be regarded as at all serious. He went further than that, and used in support of Bill 116 in the House of Representatives of Australia in 1941, words which I shall use as my closing remarks to-day. I believe these words represent what is in the mind of each member who gives his support to this measure. They are:

With this bill we are, for the first time in the history of this country—writing into the statute book our realization of the national significance of family life. That is not a mere platitude—that means something. There never has been any doubt of the value of the services, infinite in variety and extent, which the family renders to the nation. Primarily, it is a source of national continuance; it has supplied the human material indispensable for the production of the means of subsistence; it provides for the replacement of the old and the dead, and is a sole guarantee for the redemption, in the future, of those obligations which previous and present generations have found it desirable to incur in order to enjoy the fullest obtainable measures of security, comfort and civilization . . . therefore, every contribution we can make to the improvement of the health and welfare of the children now growing up is a definite contribution to the stability of the national structure in the years to come.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out by the leader of this group, we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation welcome wholeheartedly the introduction of this measure. We feel, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested yesterday, that its introduction is a tribute to the work that a great many social pioneers have done in this and other countries down through the years, in endeavouring to propagate some of the principles now being enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I refer in particular to his statement that we are members one of another, and that as a community we owe a joint responsibility to our entire citizenry.

I am sure the Prime Minister would be the first to agree with the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that, in part at least, this legislation is a tribute to the work carried on for so many years by the statesman I had the honour to succeed as member for the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth. It must be remembered that it is not very long ago that we of the C.C.F. were criticized for advocating policies in the name of social security which, it was charged, would bring about the degeneration of our Canadian people. We were of the opinion then, as we are to-day, that human beings—and we were speaking specially of Canadians—are made of good stuff, and the better the opportunities for life surrounding our people, the more of initiative and character and resourcefulness will be displayed by them. Accordingly, we support wholeheartedly every move that aims at improving the economic security of all our people.

When the Prime Minister says as he did yesterday that if we mean business when we talk about freedom from want and freedom from fear and about implementing the terms of the Atlantic charter we must do something about it, we must take some concrete steps, I say that in this instance he was reflecting the views of the Canadian people. I am satisfied that there is in this country at the present time a determination, expressed by the phrase that is used so often, that this time not only must we win the war but we must win the peace. Accordingly, I hope that this measure is only one step looking in the direction of a wider and all-inclusive programme of social security that we shall have in this country not very long hence.

The leader of this group pointed out that our major comment in connection with this bill is not one of criticism but is one of tribute to it when we say that we wish it were part of a still larger programme of social security. Members of parliament, it seems to me, should be particularly conscious of this necessity because of the many cases of individual need with which we are called upon to deal. We find time and again that after we have passed this or that desirable piece of social legislation, although it may take care of certain cases, yet there are always coming to us other cases that are not taken care of by these piecemeal steps. For example, parliament provided a special allowance last session for widows of veterans of the last war, veterans who at their death were in receipt of a fifty per cent pension or less. That was a token or gesture in the right direction, but the provision covered only widows of such veterans as had served in an actual theatre of war. England was not so regarded in the last war. The consequence is that we as members of parliament run into many cases of widows whose husbands were volunteers and served during the greater part or all of the last war but did not get to France, and their widows by reason of that technicality are not given the allowance. The widow herself stands in just as great need of it as her sister whose husband did get to France, but there is no provision to cover her need. We continually run up against technicalities like that which underline the necessity of our getting out of this stage of piecemeal social legislation as quickly as we can in favour of an all-inclusive plan.

So it is with unemployment insurance, a commendable measure which was brought down by this government. As I pointed out the other night, we run into many cases of employees who have made their payments into the unemployment insurance fund and then have to lay off work because of illness. They find that they are not covered by the premiums which they have paid into the unemployment insurance fund; yet they are unemployed and their income stops. They are assailed by an economic condition which is not covered by the act, and real hardship results. That situation also underlines the necessity of an all-inclusive programme of social legislation.

I wish to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that in making these suggestions I am not talking just to find fault with this measure. Rather I am sincerely and earnestly urging that now that we have gone this far in accepting the principles underlying this measure, we by no means stop there.

I should like to deal with the argument referred to by the last speaker and by some others who have participated in this debate, namely, the fear that family allowances might be used to depress wages. It is perfectly true that certain sections of organized labour have had that fear; some of them still have it. That fear is based on some sad experiences which organized labour has had with certain government departments and boards, and also in its dealings with vested interests. It is also based on the fact that so far as our peace-time arrangements are concerned, the control of labour legislation, working conditions, collective bargaining and minimum wages, is still in the hands of the provinces, whereas this provision for family allowances is being made by the dominion government. It would be far better if both were under the same jurisdiction, and some of this fear would be allayed if we were a little more certain that in the not far distant future control of these matters affecting working conditions, collective bargaining and wages would be in the hands of this same branch of government which is making provision for family allowances. I urge the securing of those necessary powers for the dominion government. In doing so, I want to point out that, as I see it, it is by no means a case of interfering with the rights of the people of our various provinces. It would be an interference, long overdue, with the power of vested interests at the present time to play upon the slogan of provincial rights in order to keep wages and working conditions depressed in some provinces as compared with others, to the detriment of all the people of Canada. I hope that leadership might be given to the people of all our provinces, as Canadians, to the effect that it is in their own interest to have matters of this kind made the concern of the federal government. There is no reason at all why we cannot write a bill of rights that would give an absolute and inviolable guarantee to our provinces over certain matters of a cultural nature which are sacred to them. But so far as matters of this kind are concerned, which bear upon the economic status and the life and well-being of our people as Canadians, it seems to me that we should move, without further delay, in the direction that I have already indicated. I suggest that if we were moving more clearly in that direction it would allay some of the fear about family allowances depressing wage standards. I recognize the steps that have been taken in this direction so far as war-time conditions are concerned. I hope that there may be no retreat from that position.

But even so, Mr. Speaker, I am not worried about the introduction of family allowances depressing wages or the working conditions of our people. For one reason, public opinion is too strong on this point. The people of Canada have done a great deal of thinking about social and economic matters in the last ten years and particularly during the years of the war. It is also true then when people have their standards raised a bit, that is the very time when you cannot turn around and push them down. It is when people are most deeply depressed that they can be most easily taken advantage of. When people are on the way up, when they are feeling their position and having their importance in society recognized, not just by talk but by something real like this measure, they become stronger and less subject to abuse at the hands of vested interests.

I should like to quote a sentence or two from an opinion expressed by the joint committee of the labour party and trades union congress in England in 1930 on this matter, when they said:

> During industrial conflicts the unions will be very considerably helped by the existence of such a scheme—

The reference was to children's allowances.

> —since the workers' children will be removed from the firing line and a great factor of weakness thus removed.

I submit that at the present time the worker's bargaining position is weakened by the fact that his wife and children are dependent upon him to the very limit. But if there were a certain amount of independence for his wife and children—I use the words "certain amount" advisedly, because this is not very much in the way of "independence"—it removes his wife and family from the firing line and strengthens the position of the employee in bargaining with his employer.

I submit, for example, that the introduction of unemployment insurance has not weakened, but rather it has strengthened the position of labour and of the trade union movement. The fact is that labour's position and the strength of the trade union movement are much greater in Canada to-day than they ever were. Therefore I am confident that this move will not result in a depression of wages or working conditions. For one thing, as I said at the outset of this section of my remarks, public opinion in Canada and the trade union movement simply would not stand for it.

Another argument which is sometimes used against family allowances in cash is that instead of these allowances we should have improved welfare services. The argument implies that, rather than run the risk of giving cash to people who might not spend it as wisely as they should—a false and unworthy argument—it would be better for the community to organize social and welfare services which will see to it that the proper care is provided for the children. In my view it is not a case of one or the other; we should have both. By this I mean that there are some things which can best be done on a community basis. There are some things which will serve our children best if we have them organized as welfare services. But even after you have done that, we in this country place a very high premium upon family life, upon the independence of the family, upon the relationship between parents and children. Consequently I think it is most desirable that an effort should be made to put into the hands of parents cash to equalize as far as possible the position with respect to their children, and the control of that extra money should be in the hands of the parents themselves. So that I say it is not a case of one or the other of these two things; we should have both; and I trust that in the years which lie ahead we shall have an increase in the amount of the family allowances, and also that as we go along we shall improve the services by which we minister to the needs and the welfare and the health of our children.

Another argument which is sometimes used is that instead of providing family allowances the government should allow wages to go up. That would be a trap for labour to fall into if it did not have its eyes open. As a matter of fact, in the days before we had a wage-freezing policy, in other words when theoretically it was possible for wages to rise, they did not do so. We had thousands of families in this country living under depressed conditions and children suffering from malnutrition.

It is a case not of one or the other but of both. Our economy should be such that the wage income of our workers can increase, and at the same time we need the implementing of this measure so that there may be an equalization of the physical opportunities for children in various families.

There are a few comments which I should like to make about the bill and which I trust the Prime Minister will accept as constructive even though they may seem to be critical. I am not offering these suggestions out of a desire to find something wrong, but rather in the hope that my suggestions may be given consideration. I suppose that the course which will be followed with respect to this measure is this. This bill will be passed substantially in its present form; there may be some minor amendments, although one cannot be too sure of that. It is not to come into effect until July 1, 1945. In the meantime there will be another session of parliament, either of this parliament or the next one. My notion is that in the meantime further study will have been given to some of these matters such as I am going to speak about, and we shall probably have an amending act next year so as to take care of some of these matters before the measure comes into effect.

The first suggestion I would make is that payment of family allowances should be divorced from our income tax structure. As it now stands, it is too complicated and will create some rather odd, if not bad, psychological situations. On the one hand, you have people being given the family allowances —all families where there are children of the prescribed ages. On the other hand, in many cases the family allowance is to be taken back by an offset against income tax exemptions. I submit that that is going to puzzle a good many people and may even have the effect of making them feel that it is not such a good measure after all, and I for one do not want to see a social security measure of this kind come into disrepute in any way. The bill states in section 7, and the government has given publicity to the fact, that no allowances under this measure are to be subject to taxation; but in section 8 of the bill it is provided that there can be the taking back of family allowances as an offset against exemptions or benefits provided under the Income War Tax Act. What you have there is really just a confusion of terms. The allowance is not subject to taxation, and yet roughly speaking, for those with between $1,200 and $1,800 a year, depending upon the number of children in the family and their ages, a portion of that family allowance will be taken back. The bill says it is not taxed. Technically that is correct, but actually a portion of it is taken back; in other words it is taxed. For those with over $1,800, or in some cases a little higher, depending again upon the number of children they have, they receive it and the whole of it is taken back. Technically it is not taxed, and yet it is definitely taken away from them, which amounts to the same thing. My fear about that is that people may develop a dislike for it, and I am concerned that we should avoid anything of that kind about a piece of social security legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the point the hon. member has raised had better be taken up in committee, because I feel he has not caught the significance of the clauses to which he has referred. For example, to-day there is this exemption under the income tax act for persons with large incomes. He would not feel that the exemption should continue and that those persons should also get the family allowance amount. There would be a duplication in the case of those with large incomes as compared with those who would get the single amount under the family allowance. That is really the point at issue.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree with the Prime Minister as to the aim of a family allowance, but the point I was trying to suggest was that the method set out in the bill, whereby we give it with one hand and take it back with the other, is likely to result in a dislike for the measure. I would suggest that the payment of allowances should be divorced from the Income War Tax Act altogether and should be on the basis of a ceiling. The government could set $1,800, if you will, or preferably $2,100, or whatever figure they might decide upon, plus $50 or some such amount for each child, and then say to the families of Canada, "You will receive the family allowance provided that the allowance, added to your income, does not bring your total income over the established ceiling." Thus, if the government set $1,800 and $50 for each child, a family with two children would have a ceiling of $1,900. If the family had an income of say $1,500 they would draw the full family allowance at the established rates, and there would be no double bookkeeping, no mix-up with the Income War Tax Act, no making of rebates to the government. It would be their allowance in full, without any income tax strings attached to it. For those fairly close to the ceiling, their allowance would be that much less, so that the total would not be over the ceiling. For those with incomes already over the ceiling, there would be no family allowance, and nothing to repay. The Prime Minister has already indicated that allowances are hardly necessary for those in the higher brackets, if, as is the case, the basic aim of this kind of legislation is to make sure that there will be the funds necessary to provide for the food, clothing and health of the children of this country, no matter what families they are born into.

It seems to me that under the legislation as it is now proposed there are likely to be some rather bad psychological situations. For example, suppose an employee at the present time has one child. That means he would be permitted an exemption of $108 against his income tax. But suppose his income is such that he would not pay $108 income tax but for that child, but only $60. In that event, all he saves in income tax at the present time by having the one child is the $60, which amounts to $5 a month, and because of that exemption he is getting that extra $5 a month in his pay envelope. Now the family allowance scheme comes along and for that one child, assuming he is in the proper age bracket, he will receive $8 a month. But he cannot have both. He cannot have the $5 benefit under the Income War Tax Act and the $8 benefit under the family allowance scheme. One of them has to be adjusted. As the bill now stands, it looks to me as though the income tax exemption will be taken away, with the result that the amount in his pay envelope will actually be reduced by $5 a month. He will be getting $8 of an allowance which he was not getting before. In other words, his net increase will be only $3 a month. I emphasize the bad psychological effect of this if you have an employee getting an allowance cheque of $8 a month but receiving in his pay envelope $5 a month less than he got before. That would easily play into the fear that some people have about this measure, and I suggest that it would be overcome if the government would set this measure up on its own feet and not have it involved as it is in the Income War Tax Act. In reply to the Prime Minister, I say again that I agree with him that those in the upper brackets do not need this assistance, because the object is to equalize the opportunities of children so far as physique and health are concerned. But the simplest and most direct way is to provide an allowance up to a certain ceiling. I hope that if not before the bill passes this session, at any rate before another session, consideration will be given to that proposal.

In connection with the whole matter of relating it to the income tax structure, I must call something further to the attention of the Prime Minister. Yesterday in his remarks the Prime Minister said that this was not a new principle. At page 5329 of Hansard he says:

> May I say that the principle of this bill is not new; it has been recognized in our income tax legislation . . .

And also in other ways. Later on he says:

> The principle and its wider application cannot be made too clear. Already this parliament has recognized that, with respect to families, there is an obligation upon the state to assist in the upbringing of children. This has been done in the interests of the parents and the family itself, but more particularly in the interests of the children. But, up to the present time, that obligation has been recognized only with respect to the more fortunate in our country, those who already have an income large enough to be taxable and to entitle them to exemptions according to the number of children in the family. In other words, where the need has been least it has already been recognized.

The Prime Minister said that the principle of government responsibility to families with respect to their children had already been recognized in the Income War Tax Act, but last year, on April 8, when the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay moved an amendment to one of the budget resolutions with respect to this matter, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had this to say in reply, at page 1966:

> I want to say very emphatically that in no income taxation system that ever existed in this or any other country has there been provision for the maintenance of children out of the tax savings.

Further on he said:

> In our taxation system, should we provide that from his taxes a taxpayer shall have deducted an amount sufficient to enable him to support his wife and children? When a person marries he expects and is expected to assume responsibilities. He does not expect the government to assume his responsibilities for him.

And so on. That is the Minister of Finance speaking at page 1966 of Hansard of April 8, 1943. One reason for mentioning this is to suggest that the principle was not previously recognized as the Prime Minister said it was if the Minister of Finance was interpreting the income tax laws correctly as recently as last year. My other reason for mentioning this is that I think the Minister of Finance had a point when he suggested that there would be many difficulties if we tried to connect governmental responsibility for children with the income tax legislation. After all, there is nothing sacrosant about the income tax structure that we have at the present time. It has grown up like Topsy. We have the seven per cent or the nine per cent normal tax, which is the successor to the national defence tax that we had at one time. We have the graduated tax which is the successor to the old annual income tax of former years. We have had those two combined and both of them made deductible at the source. This has all grown out of the increased demands of the war. I suggest that there is nothing sacred or permanent about the income tax structure and that we are heading into administrative difficulties and complications if we try to tie this family allowance system to it. I make a plea for reconsideration of this point and for setting up the allowance scheme on its own feet, with a view to its incorporation later in an all-inclusive social security plan.

A number of hon. members have spoken about the scaling off of the amount of the allowance as the number of children in the family increases. I shall take only a moment on this, but there is one point that I think should be made. The Prime Minister and others on the other side have emphasized the thought that there are some expenses which are not recurrent for the fourth, fifth, sixth or seventh child, and so on, and that when you have six children the average cost for the maintenance of them is not as great as the average cost when you have only two. The point that the Prime Minister and others are forgetting is that when the fifth or sixth child comes into the home there is no extra income there for him. There is no income to be shared. It is already more than absorbed by the number of children who are there; and if it is the desire of the government in this measure to equalize to some extent the advantages and the opportunities of children we should see that the position of a child who is born as the fifth child in a family does not suffer as compared with the child who is born as the second child in a family. I think the whole question of scaling off these allowances as the size of the family increases should be reconsidered, if our interest is not partisan or political or sectional but simply the well-being of all the children of the Dominion of Canada. I emphasize, too, that the administrative bookkeeping difficulties involved will, to a large extent if not wholly, offset the saving to the treasury and I feel that a change should be made on that point and also on the point of varying amounts according to the age of children.

I also support the plea that was made just now by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), and yesterday by the leader of this group for the payment of these allowances to the mother. I heard the statement made by the Prime Minister that it is possible—I believe he was referring to section 10—for arrangements to be made in various sections or provinces of the country for the payment to be made to the father or to the mother, but I feel that that is not good enough. In most, if not in all, countries where family allowances are paid they are paid to the mother and I feel that should be written into the bill itself.

Another point that I hope we will take care of in this bill is our attitude toward illegitimate children. There has been some progress on this point this year in our income tax legislation. We are starting off on something new with this measure. I hope that we shall not carry over into this measure some of the ideas that we have had in bygone years by means of which we have victimized the innocent child. Our concern in this measure all the way through is for the children of Canada. The illegitimate child is illegitimate through no fault of his own and he should be provided with opportunities equal to those of others in so far as that is possible.

In the course of his address yesterday the Prime Minister recited some of the things he had done along the line of social security and concern for the well-being of the people of Canada during his term of office. I am hoping that I may have the Prime Minister's attention for a moment, because this is a point I should like him to note. In reciting his activities in behalf of working people down through the years he made reference at pages 5548-9 of Hansard to the first measure in which he interested himself when he came back into parliament in 1919 or 1920. That measure had to do with securing pension rights which had been denied to a group of railway workers because of their participation in a strike of 1910. I knew something of the background of that incident, but I know a lot more now than I did because his reference yesterday prompted me to go and get Hansard of that bygone year and look it through. I have in my hand volume 2 of Hansard of 1920, and I find that on about fifty or sixty different pages of this volume the Prime Minister put up a heroic fight on behalf of these men. It is good reading. In fact some day I am going to quote some of these passages again. They fit exactly the case that I have taken up in this house twice this year, and since the Prime Minister referred to it I am taking this opportunity to call it to his attention. I suggest that he look up Hansard for May 1 and July 24 of this year, where I pleaded the case of the Canadian Pacific employees, particularly in Winnipeg, but throughout western Canada, who have been denied their pension rights because they were out on strike in 1918 or 1919. The company has a technical argument on the basis of which it has taken an adamant position. That was the situation when the present Prime Minister was putting up his fight in 1920. The Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, said on that occasion that whatever the technical position might be, morally these men had a claim, and he insisted upon his right as a member of parliament to fight this thing through until justice was obtained for them. He put up his fight in parliament—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend, on the matter he has referred to, my recollection is that I claimed that the men had not only a moral right but a legal right. An agreement had been entered into when the strike was called off that the men would be reinstated in their former positions. Their former positions meant that they would be reinstated with all the rights they had at the time they went out. The company after the settlement took the position that the men had lost their pension rights by going out. I claimed that was not reinstating them in their former positions. Their former positions meant that they should get back their pensions. Not only did I succeed in getting that, but their pensions for the intervening period of ten or twelve years were paid. Where some of the men had died in the interval the money to which they had been entitled was paid over to their estates. Where they were living they got what was owing on account of pension with interest, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I have a moment to say that the Prime Minister's recollections are substantially correct, except on this point. I think he will find that he took the position that whether or not there was a legal responsibility in that case, the moral responsibility was so strong that he as a member of parliament intended to fight it through until he won. He did not succeed while he was in the opposition, but when he formed his government in 1921, one of the first things he did was to implement the fight he had put up in 1920. I congratulate him on that. My suggestion is that if now, in 1944, he is going to boast of what he did in 1920, this other case is so strikingly parallel I feel that his government must take a hand in it as well. He cannot rest on past laurels. I have drawn the matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) on the two occasions to which I have referred, and I trust the Prime Minister will associate himself with the fight I have been putting up on behalf of these men.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group believe that the principle of family allowances paid for in their entirety by the national government is entirely sound, and therefore we will support this bill. However, that does not mean that we are entirely satisfied with all the provisions of the bill, but we will deal with them when we are in committee. Personally I am not very much impressed with most of the criticisms that have been levelled against this measure. For example, it is argued that one of the provinces will benefit to a greater extent than the others. The same people charge that this is a form of appeasement to Quebec. I do not think that is a fair criticism. If the principle of the bill is sound, and I believe it is, that these allowances should be paid as a right, then what difference does it make where children may live, whether they live in the east, west or centre. As time goes on, that is a situation which may very well change. After all, it is a situation that is fully under the control of the people residing in the respective provinces. They can change it as they so desire.

Then it is argued that this will mean a lowering of wages. I agree entirely with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he emphasizes the fact that that cannot be the case because it is always understood that an increase in purchasing power will tend to increase production, and that will tend to stimulate employment. Of course when you stimulate employment you strengthen wages. Then again it is argued that it may mean an increase in taxation. So far as that is concerned, I would say, not necessarily so. It will depend entirely on what the financial policy of the government may be after the war. If we are to try to go back to balanced budgets, then in all probability there will be an increase in taxation. Doctor Cyril James, chairman of the advisory committee on reconstruction, emphasized the fact that if we hoped to have full employment after the war we shall probably have to have an increase in the national debt for the next hundred years. Therefore there is no reason why there should be any increase in taxation.

What I do want to emphasize is the fact that if we do have an increase in taxation it will destroy the very thing we are trying to do by this bill, that is, increase the purchasing power of the people. I certainly hope there will be no attempt in this country to increase taxation on the lower income brackets, as has been done in New Zealand. We have a different situation in this country. We can provide a certain measure of social service at a high level without imposing taxation on the lower income brackets.

I wish to deal very generally with two or three principles of this bill. First of all, it is recognized that childrein are a valuable asset of a nation; therefore steps are needed to safeguard their welfare. It may be said that this is a somewhat niggardly step. Some people emphasize the fact, and I agree with them, that the scale of allowances for large families should be the same as for the small. Nevertheless, this is a step in the right direction. I can assure the Prime Minister that whenever legislation is brought into this house to improve the conditions of the people in any degree, those measures will always receive our support even though they do not go as far as we would like to see them go. It is to be hoped that this measure will be supplemented by many other measures that will help to improve the condition of the mothers and children of this nation.

Women are playing a large part to-day in the industrial life of the nation and I think many of these women will wish to continue to play that part after the war. Many young couples cannot afford to marry and have children unless both members of the family continue to work. Therefore I think better facilities will have to be provided in the future so that the children of young people who are working may be cared for. A more generous policy regarding education will have to be adopted. Greater aid will have to be afforded to the provinces by the federal government so that all children, no matter what the financial standing of their parents may be, will be able to go forward and take advantage of higher education.

This measure recognizes the fact that the internal buying power of the people will have to be raised. The Prime Minister referred to that in his speech. We in this group in the past have emphasized the fact that because of certain practices which are inherent in our capitalist system, industry has not been able to maintain an effective demand for its own production except in times of abnormal capital goods production, such as takes place in war-time or when a country is being newly developed. We are faced with one of two alternatives.

Either we must try to maintain large favourable balances of trade or carry out large foreign investments or, on the other hand, we must take steps to increase the purchasing power of the people. I think we realize that foreign investments cannot be looked upon as a long-term solution. When the countries to which you lend money repay that money, then the country that has made the loan not only will have to accept imports in exchange for its exports but will also have to accept imports in payment of the loan. That further aggravates the situation which may exist.

I think it is generally recognized to-day that we must accept imports in payment for our exports. In the past we have looked upon foreign markets as a means of disposing of our production, as a means of exchanging our production for the production of other nations. In order to make it possible for us to exchange our production for the production of other nations we shall have to take the necessary steps to increase the purchasing power of the people to the point where we can at all times maintain an effective demand against the production of the country. Family allowances are just one of those steps that are necessary in order to increase the purchasing power of our people.

Large scale national projects will have to be introduced after the war. While the war is still continuing, the government should bring in as many new measures regarding social service as possible. As the Prime Minister has said on several occasions, unless the new social order is well on its way before the end of the war we may look for it in vain. Unless we can assure the people that we are really sincere when we talk about a new social order we may very well destroy the confidence of the people. That will have a great effect on the minds of the people as to what is going to happen after the war.

If, on the other hand, we can start now to bring down these essential reforms in the economic life of the country, I think we can hope to maintain confidence throughout the country and make the people realize that we really are sincere when we pass such measures as the Atlantic charter. The Atlantic charter refers to all nations, and that, of course, includes Canada.

I could not help being amused when I heard the Prime Minister refer to the allowances being a right and not a charity. I agree wholeheartedly with the Prime Minister, but I recall in the depression years when members of this group suggested again and again that money should be paid outside the industrial system directly to the people we were taunted with the statement that we were advocating giving something for nothing. I am glad the same people are not making that charge to-day. I think we all realize the absolute need for measures of this kind. I can assure the Prime Minister that he will receive the full support of this group in connection with this and similar measures.

This measure may be regarded as the thin end of the wedge, which will have to be steadily expanded. When we recall that to-day 50 per cent of the production of the nation is going for war purposes, then I think we can realize how greatly the purchasing power of the people of Canada will have to be expanded if we are to provide markets for the total production of the nation after the war.

We agree wholeheartedly with the point raised by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) in connection with allowances being paid to wives instead of to husbands. However, the discussion of that and other points I shall leave until we reach the committee stage.

Mr. J. ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in a speech which I made in this house on February 3 last, I reminded the government of the need of helping Canadian families whom economic conditions, more especially in peace time, prevent from giving their children proper care and education.

At the time, I said:

That is why we, the supporters of the Bloc Populaire, have included family allowances in our programme.

And referring to the speech from the throne in which the government announced it would introduce family allowances I added:

But let there be no infringement on the rights of the provinces because we hold autonomy as a sacred right.

We are against centralization. And, according to the spirit and letter of the British North America Act of 1867, these matters, for historical reasons known to all, come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Well, bill 161 (in sections 4, 5, 6 and subsections 2 and 10 of section 8) clearly sets forth the dominion government's absolute control over family allowances. It is granted the sole administration and distribution of these benefits. Under the provisions of this bill, the federal government alone will have the power of settling the terms of payment. People who might consider themselves wronged are prevented from appealing to ordinary courts, whether provincial or federal.

The proposed plan, moreover, empowers this government to interfere in a roundabout way with our provincial educational system, for subsection 2 of section 4 indirectly sets up compulsory education.

We were entitled to expect that the proposal would at least grant equal subsidies to all children; better still, one might have thought that, in order to remedy present inequalities, the government would provide a scale of allowances rising in proportion to the number of children, that the allowance would be smaller for the first few because the head of the family is generally in a position to support them at least partially. Well, the proposed scheme works quite the opposite way. It grants the full amount to the first four children and then progressively reduces the scale of payments for the others. The Rev. Father Lebel, S.J., general chaplain of the Catholic Farmers' Union, who has investigated this question for a number of years, writes as follows in La Terre de Chez Nous, issue of July 19, 1944. I quote from an article entitled "Equality or Inequality":

It follows that all the children of medium-sized Canadian families who, as a rule, could do without the allowances, will receive, in the course of a period of 192 months, during which they will be entitled to the payments, a sum of $1,188. In large families, the fifth child will get $192 less, or $996; the sixth and seventh will have their grants reduced by $384 and will receive only $804. As for the eighth and other children, their allowances will be less than half that of the first four, that is $576.

This is indeed an extraordinary way of understanding the equality of opportunity. One might even wonder whether the excerpt quoted at the beginning of the article is not a typographical error, meaning inequality of opportunity instead of "equality" as printed. Indeed, in view of the above figures, the equality of opportunity referred to in the resolution becomes a lurid joke which will surely not be appreciated by the heads of large families in the various Canadian constituencies and racial groups, especially in the agricultural class where a family of more than five children is just about the average.

The heads of large families will have the more reason to find this joke rather galling, because they realize the weight of the tax burden imposed on them by the dominion government in opposition to the principle of distributive justice. All theologians, philosophers and sociologists contend that distributive justice demand that the legislator distribute taxes for the financial administration of the state according to the paying capacity of every citizen. On the other hand, it is evident that, for similar incomes, the citizen with no dependents enjoys greater resources than the head of a large family, who, however, is bearing the heaviest burden of consumer taxes. . . .

Many of the countries which have established the allowance system, have adopted a uniform rate, but a majority of them have thought it preferable to set a progressive rate which sociologists have no difficulty to justify by adducing sound reasons:

"The family allowance", they say, "is a remuneration whose purpose is to help heads of families to fulfil their duties toward their children when they do not have enough resources to do so properly and to the advantage of society.

"Now, the income of heads of families is generally sufficient to provide for the needs of the first children. That is why, in certain countries, the first and sometimes the second child have been excluded as regards the payment of the allowances.

"In those cases where it has been decided to begin with the first child, a rate was adopted which increases progressively up to the third or fourth child; thereafter, the rate remains uniform, because, in general, the salary is quite insufficient to cover the needs of each of the additional children."

Should Canada adopt a progressive rate rather than the uniform rate proposed by Dr. Marsh?

I, for one, am in favour of the establishment of a progressive or a uniform rate for family allowances, but the idea of establishing a decreasing rate is so foolish that no country has put it into practice so far. Nevertheless, I am in favour of the principle of this bill and I shall certainly not vote against it, because we have for a long time claimed that help should be extended to large families.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the debate this afternoon, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) quoted from my address of yesterday, as found on page 5343 of Hansard as follows:

It denies the basic principle of social justice.

He then paused, and instead of completing the quotation proceeded to place a wholly erroneous interpretation upon the remarks I had made in support of the quoted contention.

I know that no hon. member would do so intentionally, but I cannot allow his words to replace my own, so far as my argument on that occasion is concerned.

Reference to Hansard's report of this afternoon's proceedings reveals that the hon. member stated that one of my objections to the measure was that it treated all people alike, leaving the clear inference that I desired to see favoured treatment accorded to some citizens as opposed to others. He then proceeded to criticize my alleged stand.

No such inference can properly be drawn from any remarks of mine, and I desire now to quote my exact words from yesterday's debate in this house. I said, at page 5343 of Hansard:

It denies the basic principles of social justice. Such justice calls not for the mass treatment of all people as the same, such as marked unemployment relief, but for treating life as it is, individually and the needs of families differently as they are different. The needs of a family in the winter in my part of Ontario are different from those in the far north. Families in a teeming slum and families in the Okanagan; families in the eastern townships and families in Cape Breton's mining or fishing villages, have very different needs. This scheme lumps them all together and gives the same grant to all. Could the injustice be more patently apparent?

Surely nothing could be plainer. The needs of families vary greatly. To pay every family of equal size and age the same amount, as this bill provides, is mass treatment of all people regardless of their widely different needs, some being vastly greater than others, and because of this, in the final result the bill does not treat all people alike. Equal allowances paid to families in unequal circumstances and conditions do not constitute equal treatment at all.

To draw any other inference from my remarks is but a play on words and does not represent the true intention of my remarks.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I feel that a good deal of unnecessary controversy has grown up around this question of family allowances through the introduction of comparatively unessential side issues which themselves are much more debatable than the basic question at issue. I hope, therefore, that I may be forgiven if in the few words I have to offer I try to narrow the question down to the essential points at issue and to show that there is little or no room for argument as to the basic principle of the family allowances. Thereafter I might perhaps be permitted to offer a few personal suggestions, not as to the principle at stake, but as to the best means of attaining the object in view.

Permit me then to stipulate at the outset that this is not primarily a labour question; it is not primarily a capital question; it is not primarily an economic question or problem; it is not even a farmer's problem. It is first and foremost a question of the welfare of our children. Do I have to prove that by lengthy logic? I dare anyone to suggest that the family allowance should be given in order to increase the income of the working man. I will go farther and say that any measure providing for family allowances should be accompanied by protective provisions which would prevent any unscrupulous person or group of persons from exploiting it as a sort of substitute for fair and honest wages.

Nor can anyone claim that giving allowances to heads of large families will solve any of the nation's economic woes; because, if that could be demonstrated, we would have then to admit that the late Hon. William Aberhart had an even better, because more far-reaching solution.

Neither is it a women's question, except to the extent that our mothers are generally far more interested in the welfare of their children than in their own. The family allowance will neither relieve the discomforts of gestation nor greatly lighten the burden of bringing up the children, particularly that part of such burden —and it is by far the greater part—which devolves upon the mother.

It is essentially a children's problem. The basic purpose of the family allowance is to even up differences which should not exist, but which unfortunately do, between one child and another, if not at birth at least within half an hour after birth, and to bring a little nearer to genuine, practical verity that noble principle laid down in the first national document of our great neighbour state to the south—that all men are born free and equal; for, although it may be possible to produce arguments which will prove, in theory, that because prince and peasant alike come into the world naked and in need of a bath they are at that moment equal, yet I think it can be demonstrated that by the time the babies have gone home from hospital—supposing for the moment that they all were in a position to enjoy the privilege of entering the world in a nice bright hygienic hospital which, of course, is really not true—the inequalities already begin to show themselves.

One needs only to compare the meticulous care and the lavish devotion which the whole family gives to the first-born with the relatively summary treatment accorded to the tenth to realize what I mean by that observation. My wife tells me that the second child has a great advantage over the first, because its parents know how to apply that triangular garment which is a baby's first introduction to conventional decency without sticking the pin into its tender flesh. With the exception, however, of the comparatively few who happen to drop down the chimney of a penthouse apartment or a sixteen-room mansion, all the subsequent children suffer a definite disadvantage as compared with the first two, and those who drop down the chimney of the west-end mansion have a distinct advantage over those who are born into a working man's home down east or a colonist's cabin up north in the backwoods. We cannot hope ever to wipe out all these inequalities. Some of us have good mothers and some of us have better mothers. Some have good fathers; others are not so good; and no amount of legislation will convert a bad father into a good one, or cause the good father to have more children than the bad one. The experience of other countries tends to show that even family allowances do not have any noticeable effect on the number of children any group of parents will have. No law has yet been conceived that will change the old jesting adage, "The rich get richer and the poor get children". Whoever is to blame for that, of one thing we may be unanimously and entirely certain, it is not the fault of the children.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, it is definitely incumbent upon us to do what we can and all we can to see that the innocent do not suffer from a circumstance which may or may not result from some form of guilt. The one way in which we can best do that is, in my opinion, by providing the means whereby those children may enjoy the very best training and development of both their bodies and their minds, and that is where the family allowance comes into the picture.

The training and development of the body and the mind imply an abundance of good food, exercise, suitable clothing, sunshine, supervised play, medical, dental, ocular and psychiatric supervision, regular school attendance and adequate facilities for home study. Many of these things are given free throughout Canada, but still they are not equal. For instance, free education costs quite a bit more for a little boy in the city in which I reside, in the division which I have the honour to represent in this house, than it does, for instance, in the city of Toronto, because climatic conditions make it more costly to dress a child so that he can go to school in safety and comfort in Montreal's ruder climate than it does in the Queen City. And still further north, in the neighbourhood of Chicoutimi and the lake St. John cities and towns, or in the northern mining towns of Ontario, it costs still more. Likewise God's glorious sunshine is free to all, but it costs money to buy the little garments which will let the baby get the benefit of the sunshine without shocking the neighbours.

We have free clinics and health centres in many parts of Canada. I hope to live to see the day when every corner of this great dominion will be equipped with the necessary staff and supplies to give medical and dental supplies to every child in the neighbourhood. But the child cannot make proper use of the advice there given unless the money is available to buy whatever is prescribed. When he leaves the hospital aged ten days, for instance, the hospital probably charges him twenty-five cents for his "formula". If his parents are poor, maybe the hospital will not charge anything, but the corner grocer and the drugstore will continue charging for that "formula" until he is a year old or maybe older. What will happen if his parents have not the money to buy the stuff indicated on his "formula"?

When a family allowance is given to every child in the country, and when the family allowance is definitely earmarked to be expended exclusively and solely for the benefit of that child, these basic inequalities disappear. Some children may still enjoy the luxury of a private child specialist, while others have to go to the baby welfare, but they will both be weighed on the same kind of scales and both will be able to get the foods and formulae that the doctor advises, because they will both have a little monthly allowance specially earmarked for that purpose. There may still grow up a generation of men and women—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member reading his speech? I ask because much objection was taken last night to an hon. member of our party reading his speech. It looks as though the hon. member is reading his speech, and, if so, I object strenuously to it.

Mr. FAUTEUX: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that my hon. friend interrupted me. Because I am speaking in English—it is very hard—I am reading my speech. As my hon. friend knows, I am a French-Canadian, and I believe that in spite of the fact that we can speak both French and English in this house, I must talk English to be understood, so that I talk English.

Mr. HOMUTH: I still rise to a point of order. Regardless of whether the hon. member speaks French or English, there is a rule for everybody in this house, and I would ask Your Honour to decide whether or not the hon. member is reading his speech, because last night one of the outstanding members of the Liberal party who is always ready to criticize others rose in his place in this house and criticized one of our members for reading his speech. I told him last night that from now on, when anybody on the other side of the chamber reads his speech, I am going to object to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I will obey the rules of this house and I will not read my speech any more. I will, however, ask the house to be generous enough to let me continue in French, and I may be able to sell a few ideas to my hon. friend which it will be too bad that he will not understand, but which he can see tomorrow in Hansard.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, in order to comply with the rules of this house, I shall put aside the speech which I had carefully prepared for the benefit both of this house and of the constituents whom it is my privilege to represent. However, I shall revert to my mother tongue for I admit frankly that I shall thus express myself with much greater ease and, if I may say so in all modesty, my speech will be more forceful than if I were to speak in a language with which I am not thoroughly conversant. However, I shall be compelled to set aside the arguments which I had started to expound.

Since the present measure has been submitted to the house, we have heard very interesting arguments. The various political groups have approved with some qualification the principle of the bill. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of challenging some of the uncalled for remarks which were made during this debate. A moment ago, I touched upon the subject of national unity. I take the liberty of bringing it up because it is with deep regret and dismay that I have heard certain remarks made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I am sorry those remarks were made for, as I have stated previously in this house, I prize more highly national unity than the seat which I hold or my political career or even the party to which I have the honour of belonging.

Before broaching this subject, I am anxious to take all necessary precautions because I much prefer winning over my opponents with a smile to insulting them. I wish to be cautious, as I am fully aware of the fact that the hon. member for Parkdale is a prominent medical practitioner and that he has played an outstanding part in the civil administration of his province, nevertheless I deem it my duty to challenge at least some of the remarks which he made in this house yesterday in regard to my province. I wish to quote the part of his speech to which I take exception:

> Mr. Bruce: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be improper to suggest that it may have some connection with an election in an adjoining province, when it is hoped that this bill will assist the return of a Liberal government. That province because of its large families will derive the greatest benefit from this measure, at the expense of the other provinces, particularly Ontario, which pays one-half of the taxes of Canada.

And further on he stated:

> I am afraid that if these cash payments are to be made on this basis they will not fulfil their objective, for the money will not go to the provinces which did most of the fighting and suffered most of the casualties.

I could quote further excerpts from the speech of the hon. member for Parkdale, but these are sufficient. Is it possible that such a distinguished member of the house should even think of criticizing this bill whereby the government of this country seeks to help large families, whereby it expects to help young children who did not ask to be brought into the world, whereby it seeks to increase the birth rate? Is it possible that a physician who has undoubtedly received in his office expectant mothers worrying over the birth of their child and wondering if they would have enough money for its care and support, could criticize this bill which may help a province in which there are large families, under the pretence that it has not, as he claims, done its full share in support of the war effort.

Mr. Speaker, could there be anything more humiliating and disheartening for all those members of the province of Quebec who sit in this house and who have supported wholeheartedly the war effort of the government and of this country? Could there be anything more humiliating for all those members of Quebec who have done their utmost in all parts of the province to bring home to our people the importance of getting behind the government and the country in this tremendous war effort so that we may achieve victory. But, Mr. Speaker, can the loyalty of the province of Quebec be judged by the few extremists who give the impression that Quebec is not one hundred per cent behind the war effort? Would we be justified in believing that all Canadians are against the province of Quebec because a few extremists in Ontario or elsewhere criticize our province?

Mr. Speaker, this legislation should afford us much satisfaction. I, for one, am pleased with it; not only for the province of Quebec, but for all Canada. I was pleased to hear last night what the Right Honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had to say in reply to certain charges uttered by people who said that this bill had been introduced in the house as a bribery, to use their own expression, in view of the next dominion election, or, again, to help Mr. Godbout in his Quebec election campaign. I commend the prime minister for having brought down this measure in the interests not only of the province of Quebec but of Canada as a whole. As was so aptly said, nothing could be more necessary, nothing could be more useful to this country than children. Some people would like to see Canada increase its population through immigration, but nothing that the governments might do could be more helpful than family allowances. They will thus increase the birth rate and ensure to newborn children health, clothing, shelter, education and everything they need.

It has also been said that this measure would perhaps help Mr. Godbout to be reelected. Well, Mr. Speaker, since the subject has been broached, I say that, to my mind, every Canadian, irrespective of his party affiliation, every Canadian who is really in favour of harmony and national unity in this country, must wholeheartedly desire the reelection of Mr. Godbout, who is the only one among the three Quebec party leaders who is fully behind Canada's war effort and who truly supports every movement in favour of national unity and harmony in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I have not been too fiery and that it will be understood that I do not want charges to be wrongfully levelled against my province, no more than I would tolerate that people from my province should level accusations against another. I believe that all provinces have heeded the call of duty, that all have done their share by giving their sons, their money and their toil in support of this country's war effort. Instead of criticizing each other let us be tolerant. I shall conclude by quoting these words from a Quebec statesman which I would like to hear more frequently in this house and elsewhere, and which, to my mind, should be adopted as a motto in the interests of unity from one end of the country to the other:

Fellow Canadians, let us put a stop to our internecine strife; let us unite!

(Text):

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I fully support the measure for family allowances; in fact I did so quite a few months ago in my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At that time I said the following about family allowances:

I welcome the promises of far-reaching reforms contained in the speech from the throne. Without such reforms . . . we cannot hope to have national unity. The promise of family allowances is good. . . . But family allowances must not replace measures for increased wages for labour. Family allowances must not become a bonus to employers, but must be a few extra dollars to people whereby they can buy more milk and more nutrition for their families.

I made that speech four days after I had the honour of coming into this house as a member. Even at that time there were certain leaders of trade unions who had made remarks against family allowances. Despite the fact that I felt some of them might attack me for my attitude, I believed that my position was the correct one. I was very much surprised that trade union leaders should have made remarks against family allowances. It was not a problem of my position; it was not a problem of any one labour leader; it was the problem of the Canadian people. I considered from the start that family allowances were in the best interests of the people as a whole. But not long ago, in fact only last month I was again surprised to read certain remarks made by certain leaders of trade unions, remarks which I hope they made after not too much thinking. I hope they have changed their minds with regard to the statements they made on June 22.

J. W. Buckley, secretary of the Toronto trades and labour council, is quoted by the Ottawa Journal of June 22 as saying:

> Aid to families with children is unnecessary if the wage-earners of the families make decent wages. All organized labour has flatly opposed grants which subsidize poverty and low wages and undermine incentive to self-improvement of living conditions.

I do not know what prompted Mr. Buckley to make such a statement. He is a mature, responsible labour leader.

Mr. HOMUTH: He was right.

Mr. ROSE: You would agree with that.

Mr. GRANT: He must be a Tory.

Mr. ROSE: No, he is not. The fact is, I would say, that Mr. Buckley had not thought very seriously about the problem when he made that statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: He has fought labour battles longer than any labour leader in this house.

Mr. ROSE: I would say that any mature labour leader knows that organized labour will look after the problem of wages. A strong trade union movement has always been the best guarantee for good wages and conditions.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have they done that in Quebec?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROSE: Our organized trade unions have done much more for the workers in the province of Quebec than any loud-mouthed group have done. I have said that in the past in this house. On the other hand, what I found most regrettable in Mr. Buckley's remarks is the following:

> This looks like a subsidization of one province by the others, deduction from the pay envelopes of Ontario and the rest of Canada to maintain low standards and wages in Quebec.

I am not surprised when such statements come from some of the hon. members to my right, but I am shocked when such remarks come from a leader of a trade union movement, because I have found in the trade union movement the best instrument in the fight for Canadian unity. I have known of cases where workers from one province would come to the aid of workers in another province when they were involved in a battle for better conditions. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour have taken the stand that wages in Quebec should be the same as wages elsewhere in Canada. I am, therefore, quite shocked to find a labour leader resorting to the argument that this is to subsidize Quebec at the expense of the rest of Canada. Practically a similar statement was made by another leader, C. H. Millard, according to the same issue of the Ottawa Journal. He said:

> That allowances will serve under the present circumstances as an indirect subsidy to employers in the textile and other low paid industries.

Labour will welcome family allowances. Labour will strengthen its ranks in its trade union movement. Labour will welcome all progressive social security measures. Organized labour will win minimum wage scales which will be much higher than they are at the present time. I have much confidence that such changes will come about. I have even more confidence, after the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this house yesterday that labour will be even more reassured. I was very much pleased to hear that fighting speech, a speech that I considered to be in line with the new times. There is no sense in anyone trying to say that this is politics, or that somebody wants to play politics. This is a change that has taken place all over the world. The whole world is marching forward, and, as I said before, those who do not want to go forward will be left behind. It is happening all around us and we in Canada must realize that we have no Chinese wall around us. We, too, are affected by the changes that are taking place in the world and, no matter from what part of the house reform measures come, we must welcome them, no matter what party introduces them. None of us has any monopoly on reform. If others want to introduce them we welcome them because the people will welcome them.

I was not surprised to hear some of the hon. members opposing the measure by threatening the people of Canada with bureaucracy. In fact I said that in my speech on reconstruction. In that speech I said that certain elements will come out and speak against reform measures because they are going to be carried through by a bureaucracy. I foretold that a few weeks ago. Yesterday I was confirmed in my statement. In this war certain measures were necessary to carry on the war effort. I would say that if in the future some measures of control are necessary, if those controls will be in the interests of the people, the people will accept them. That is the only way to look at the problem. What the people want are measures of reform. If those measures of reform mean that the people will have to pay a little more in taxes, they will pay them if the reform brings social security. They will accept, if necessary, a certain amount of rationing if that is in their interest. That is the way we must regard the problem. The period of freebootery, as Vice-President Wallace calls it, is not now; that period is over. Government intervention will be necessary in order to fill the gap, to give jobs and security to the people. I consider family allowances as one of the finest means to create employment.

The people who receive this money will not put it away in the bank. The people who receive this money will not spend it on travel overseas or for luxuries. The money they receive will be paid into the stores. It will be paid into the tailor shops to buy clothing. Then the tailor will pay it to somebody else and the money will circulate. That is the best part of it all, and that is why it will create more employment than would $200,000,000 spent in any other way.

Family allowances will strengthen rather than weaken national unity. It will not weaken it, as the house leader of the Progressive Conservative party has said. Why will it strengthen it? There cannot be national unity when one group does not enjoy the same privileges as a group somewhere else. National unity is not something you can play with. You cannot create national unity by just talking about it. You will not get it in that way. We need new ways that will make our people feel that they are equal to the citizens of Ontario or the citizens of British Columbia. That is the way to get national unity. Give the people an opportunity to feel that here is a government that considers their plight and is taking measures to remedy it. That will give them faith in democracy. That is the way to approach the problem of national unity.

It is unfortunate that we have people who say that family allowances are being used to subsidize Quebec. It is not to subsidize Quebec; it is to subsidize Canadians who need these subsidies. What do the large families of Quebec do? Do they sit back? Do they play around all the time? Do they not produce for Canada. Have not the farmers' sons and daughters of Quebec gone into the factories to produce the weapons of war? Who has filled the most shells in this country? It is the sons and daughters of Quebec. Who has built tanks and guns for our army? The sons and daughters of Quebec. They are doing useful work. Why try to divide the country and say that these family allowances are to subsidize one province? We must think of our people as Canadians and stop thinking of them as people of Ontario and people of Quebec.

I do not want to speak much longer on this point. I came across a very fine editorial in Saturday Night dealing with family allowances and referring to those people who say that family allowances is a sop to or a subsidy for Quebec. I do not know who wrote this editorial, but it sounds like Sandwell's language. He has a very fine approach toward the problem of the unity of Canada. The editorial reads:

> We shall have a Canadian nation only when we can feel, pretty generally, that a Canadian child is a Canadian child and entitled to certain economic advantages, whether he is French or Scottish or Ukrainian by racial origin, whether he is in Quebec or Alberta, whether he is the son of a Roman Catholic or a Lutheran or even a Marxian communist. We can hasten that time, or we can defer it, by our attitude on this legislation.

I agree wholeheartedly with the attitude expressed in that editorial.

There are a few things in the bill I am not too sure about. The hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) referred to the different rates for different ages. I have one child and I know that a young child needs special food. Younger children require entirely different foods from those required by grown-ups. Special canned foods that are put out for small children are quite expensive. Codliver oil is expensive. I was surprised the other day when I had to pay $4 to $5 for a pair of shoes for a small child. And then a small child will kill a pair of shoes in no time at all. Considering it from that point of view, I cannot understand why $5 should be paid for younger children and $8 for the older.

A complicated accounting system will be necessary. Considering it from all angles, I would say it would be worth while to have a flat rate of $8 for all children. In supporting this measure I make an appeal to all. We should put the measure through as soon as possible and let the people of Canada feel that no group in Canada stands in the way of a measure so necessary for the welfare of the country.

If anyone has any doubt as to the effect of family allowances upon health, I should like to give some figures which were furnished me by a prominent French-Canadian doctor in Montreal. They give the rate of infant mortality in the different parts of the city. In the east end, where the poorer people live, the rate was 81·2 per hundred thousand live births. In Notre Dame de Grace, where we have the middle-class, the rate was 49 per hundred thousand live births. Then in Westmount, where the wealthy live, the rate is 30. The difference in these rates is due to the difference in incomes. I hope that family allowances will help to make up part of those differences. Family allowances is just one of the many measures that should be passed to give everyone in Canada a greater opportunity to live and live happily.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, before entering into a discussion with respect to the arguments which have been advanced by two members of the Conservative party in opposition to family allowances, I should like to take a moment to outline the nature of the plan. Under this plan it is proposed that cheques will go monthly to the parents of all children under the age of sixteen years. These payments will be $5 a month with respect to all children under six years of age; $6 a month with respect to children under ten years of age; $7 a month with respect to children under 13 years of age, and $8 a month with respect to all children over 13 years of age. These monthly cheques for family allowances are to be paid to every parent in Canada. Rich or poor—everyone is to receive his cheque.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, no; it is predicated upon their income position.

Mr. CLEAVER: I wonder if the hon. member for Waterloo South will be content to wait a moment. It should be said at once that those who do not need the family allowances will not profit financially from the cheques they receive. This result will, I believe, meet with almost universal approval in Canada, even though it may not meet with the approval of the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago.

Mr. HOMUTH: I just wish to keep the record straight.

Mr. CLEAVER: You just wanted to talk, I fancy. As I view the situation, the government had two options. One option was that everyone would receive a payment, and that no means test would be required. No one would be placed in the embarrassing or uncomfortable position of having to account from time to time with respect to his financial position, or need for the payments. All of that was brushed aside in the forthright scheme and proposal we now have before us. Under it everyone is to receive payment; and so far as the family allowances bill is concerned, there are no restrictions in that regard.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, no, no.

Mr. CLEAVER: But when the taxpayer makes up his income tax return and when he asks for dependents' allowance with respect to his children, then he must deduct from the amount of the dependents' allowance which he claims under the income tax law the amount he has received by way of family allowance cheques. I do not know of any finer manner in which the desired result could be obtained. We are not subjecting anyone to a means test. This money is not, however, being wasted. It will be paid to everyone, but will be kept only by those who need it.

There has been quite a little discussion in the press, some of it very misleading, as to just what the benefits are. I should like to take time for a moment or two to place those benefits on record. Much has been said about large families in Canada. I should like, therefore, to place upon the record the maximum amount of family allowances payable with respect to a family of fifteen children which, I take it, would be the maximum family, unless there were dual or triple births. This is a table showing the amount of payments to the fifteen children at their respective ages:

Child	Years of age	Payment per month
No. 1	15	$8
No. 2	14	8
No. 3	13	8
No. 4	12	7
No. 5	11	6
No. 6	10	5
No. 7	9	4
No. 8	8	3
No. 9	7	3
No. 10	6	3
No. 11	5	2
No. 12	4	2
No. 13	3	2
No. 14	2	2
No. 15	1	2

The total monthly payment with respect to that family of fifteen amounts to $65.

I should like next to put on the record—and I am coming back to this for the benefit of my hon. friend who has interrupted—

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but would he answer a question? I believe it is pertinent to what he is saying.

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Supposing that family is in a province where the compulsory school age is fourteen years of age or under, and the children are earning money; what is the situation then?

Mr. CLEAVER: I will let my hon. friend worry himself with the answer to that question.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not worrying.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am just going to refer him to something that happened 110 years ago.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, listen, we are looking to 1947.

Mr. CLEAVER: In 1833 the first factories act was passed, and the government of the day thought they were making very good progress when they passed that act, which provided that no child under nine years of age should be employed in a factory, and provided further that the hours of labour for children from nine to thirteen years should be limited to forty-eight hours a week, and those of children from thirteen to eighteen should be limited to sixty-nine hours a week. I would suggest that my hon. friend read Hansard as to what took place when that act was passed. I am going to let him answer his own problems.

Mr. HOMUTH: That was before we were born.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should like to place on Hansard a record as to the maximum amounts which different sized families could receive under the family allowances bill. The amounts are as follows:

No. of children in family	Maximum amount received yearly
1	$ 96
3	288
5	444
7	552
9	624
11	684
15	780

At this point I should like to answer one argument advanced in opposition to the measure, an argument which has been suggested by a question asked by the hon. member for Waterloo South. It will be noticed from these figures that the maximum amount the large family of fifteen could obtain, the large family we have heard so much about, is $780 a year. If we go to the province of Ontario and take the normal family of five children found in that province, and divide those fifteen Quebec children I have just been talking about among three families of five in Ontario, what would they receive? The payments in respect of those same fifteen children in Ontario would be, not $780 a year but $1,128, or an increase of $348. I think that has some bearing on the argument.

Mr. HOMUTH: It has no bearing at all; what are you trying to get at?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is also provided in the bill that family allowances are not income for purposes of income tax. The estimated cost of the plan is somewhere between $250,000,000 and $260,000,000 annually, from which it is estimated that there will be a rebate of $50,000,000 in round figures.

Mr. HOMUTH: By taxation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must allow the hon. gentleman who is now speaking to speak without interruption. I must insist that the hon. member do not interrupt again.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but he is so wrong that I felt I ought to correct him.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of making his reply if he so wishes, but the hon. gentleman who is now speaking has the floor and must have it uninterrupted.

Mr. CLEAVER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but if any hon. member at any time wishes to ask a question and has the courtesy to rise in his place I shall be glad to answer it.

I was saying that the total cost will range between $250,000,000 and $260,000,000 annually, and it is estimated that roughly $50,000,000 will come back by way of income tax, so that this amount should be deducted in order to arrive at the net cost of the plan to Canada.

I want to say right here that nothing has taken place since I first came into this house after the 1935 elections which has given me greater pleasure than the opportunity which I now have of supporting this family allowance measure. When I think of the benefits in the form of human happiness that will flow from this bill I feel that the entire nine years would have been well spent if I had done nothing other than simply be here in the ninth year to support this measure. Those of us who are in this house are past the age when anything can be done to benefit us by way of improved nutrition, further education or anything of that sort; but the young children of to-day—and I have in mind particularly the very young—are at an age where, if they do not receive sufficient nutritious food, their lives may be ruined. Any child who is denied the benefits of modern educational facilities starts unfairly handicapped in the struggle of life. When I think of the fact that what we are doing now by this bill will ensure to every Canadian child sufficient proper food, sufficient clothing and decent housing conditions, I repeat again that we cannot estimate the wealth of human happiness that will flow directly from this measure.

Practically all the discussion down to the present has centred on the factory worker. I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that Canada is an agricultural country. One-half of the people in my riding live on farms, and one-half of the children in my riding who would benefit from this family allowance are children who are being brought up on farms. We all know what a small cash income the 100-acre farmer engaged in mixed farming has. We know what this should mean to a farmer with four small children who is struggling along and just getting by in making his payments on his mortgage, paying his taxes and trying to rear his children. Think of what an extra $440 a year coming in in cash, and coming in in such a way that none of it can be taken from him, will mean to that man.

I like this plan. I like this type of legislation because to me it is an honest and sincere facing up to the facts of life in this country. Whether we like it or not, there are people in Canada who, on account of their mental equipment or on account of their preferred standing in life at birth, or who perhaps because they are a little more selfish than the rest of us, yearly take unto themselves considerably more than their just share of the national income. In addition to that, there are corporations which by monopoly control, by patent rights which they own, by unfair practices of big business or otherwise, take to themselves much more of the national income in the way of profits than they should. What is the result? The result is that we have many people in Canada to-day—and it was very noticeable during the depression—who are in the low income groups and have not enough to live on.

Mr. HOMUTH: You belong to the government. Why did you allow it?

Mr. CLEAVER: If my hon. friend had paid me the compliment of paying a little attention to some of the speeches I have made, instead of indulging in this type of interruption—

Mr. HOMUTH: I have listened.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, are the rulings you make rulings that should be followed?

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of Justice does not have to dictate any of the rules of the house to me. I know the rules of the house much better than he does. I have been here much longer than he has.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. gentleman does not make that apparent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already called attention to the fact that the hon. member has continued to interrupt the speech of the hon. gentleman who has the floor. I hope I shall not have to call his attention to that again.

Mr. CLEAVER: Let me give my hon. friend an example. If he will refer back to a speech I made not so long ago in this house he will get some further information out of it. Does my hon. friend know that $1,000 invested in the stock of Imperial Oil in 1914 was, at the date I made that speech, paying $1,600 a year in dividends?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, I know that.

Mr. CLEAVER: That stock had been split seventy-two for one between 1914 and the time I made that speech. I mention that in illustration of the remark I made a moment ago, which my hon. friend questioned, that there are some clever individuals, some corporations, in this country, taking to themselves so much more than their fair share of the annual national wealth that there is not enough left for the little fellow in the lower income brackets to feed and clothe and house his family properly. This measure is facing up to the fact.

This war has taught us many things. One is that the distribution of income among the people is most important, especially in time of war. Mr. Speaker, if you will take the national income of Canada, which was $8·8 billion last year, and deduct from that the $2·7 billion collected in taxes, and deduct the almost $3 billion collected from the people in victory loans, you will have left of national income in the hands of the spending people in this country, a residual amount that is a little more than the national income was at the depth of the depression. Yet in Canada to-day we appear to be reasonably prosperous. The lower income-tax groups are getting along well; they are earning good wages. We appear to be reasonably prosperous; and yet back in the thirties, with very little more net income than the net income of 1943, what do we find? Hundreds of thousands out of work, in distress; families on relief, and the like. The only difference that I can see is the fact that as a result of our financial measures—the excess profits tax, income tax in the high brackets, and all these other things—we have effected a more equitable distribution of the national income in time of war, and that is why we appear to be reasonably prosperous to-day; whereas in the depression, with very little more national income, we were having very difficult times and hundreds of thousands of our people were going through experiences quite as distressing as, or more so than, war.

For these reasons I have a suggestion to make to the government. I should like to see the government go the whole way and collect by way of excess profits tax the money required for family allowances. I am not suggesting that the Excess Profits Tax Act, which is a war measure, should be continued in its present form, but I suggest that it be revised and brought into shape as a permanent peace-time measure, and I would use the money that would be taken from big companies and others under the Excess Profits Tax Act to pay family allowances, so that we would know that we were doing what we planned to do by this measure. It is simply a transfer of wealth to the tune of $200 million from the pockets of those who do not need it to the pockets of those who need it very badly. I would go farther. I would keep that tax in a separate fund, and, as it increased, as it would with the increased prosperity of this country, I would increase family allowances to the full extent which the excess profits tax returns would permit.

May I turn for a moment to some of the arguments which have been advanced by two members of the Progressive Conservative party in opposition to the present measure. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) stated yesterday, as reported in Hansard, at page 5342 as follows, in enumerating the various objections which his party has to this measure:

> 3. It adds a further strain on our national unity. There is but one province which has maintained the high birth rate and large family which was so characteristic of Canada's pioneer strains.

I wish also to read from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment, because I have something to say to him, but I must say it whether he is here or not. He made this statement—

Mr. HOMUTH: What page?

Mr. CLEAVER: Hansard, page 5365:

> This bill will result in many cases in bonusing families who have been unwilling to defend their country.

Further, on the same page:

> Why should a hard working man who has planned a normal sized family have to curtail his wishes because he is heavily taxed in order to help to support a large family of shiftless people . . .?

Then, referring back to page 5363:

> That province—

Referring to Quebec.

> —because of its large families will derive the greatest benefit from this measure, at the expense of the other provinces, particularly Ontario, which pays one-half of the taxes of Canada.

I think the time has arrived when we must face up to this sort of thing. I have never done anything knowingly to light racial fires, to stir up disunity in this country, and from time to time I have taken from the other side of the house quite a bit in that regard that I did not like. Last night I interrupted, because I thought the hon. member making a speech of that kind should at least conform to the rules of the house and make his own speech, instead of reading one which somebody else had written.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now wait a minute. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member whom the member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) is accusing of having read a speech which someone else had written for him is not in his seat at the moment. The hon. member has no right to make that accusation unless he has proof of the fact. Either he must produce proof that the hon. member was reading a speech which someone else wrote, or withdraw the statement.

Mr. GARDINER: You are not in your seat, either.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I ask the hon. member to do one thing or the other.

Mr. CLEAVER: There is no point of order about that.

Mr. HOMUTH: The point of order is that the hon. member has made an accusation against another hon. member. He should either prove his statement that the hon. member was reading a speech written by someone else or withdraw the accusation.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the rules you cannot speak from that seat at all.

Mr. HOMUTH: I speak for a lot of people.

Mr. CLEAVER: On a question of privilege to-morrow the hon. member, if he says he wrote the speech himself, can rise in his place in the house and say so, but there is no point of order other than that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order and I ask your ruling on this. There is at least some semblance of order in this house, even though some of us are out of order once in a while. The hon. member made an accusation against another hon. member, and he must either justify the truth of that accusation or withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has called attention to what he considers is an accusation against another hon. member. I think the fact of his drawing the matter to the attention of the house will bring to the notice of the hon. member who is accused that he may of his own volition take the steps which are usual in such cases.

Mr. CLEAVER: As I was saying when I was interrupted, what annoyed me last night and what caused the interruption was the fact that I thought the hon. member was reading a speech which someone else had written, coupled with the fact that the speech had the contents which I have just read. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to sit idly by and let any member of this house, not even the member for Waterloo North—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Waterloo South.

Mr. CLEAVER: —attempt to raise racial—

Mr. HOMUTH: Waterloo North would be very proud of that.

Mr. CLEAVER: — attempt to sow discord and disunity in this country. There is one party in Canada whose leader, outside the house to-day, is doing a lot of that kind of thing, and the infection has spread and reached the House of Commons. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of the leader of a party, on a social measure such as family allowances, dragging in the racial issue? He called attention to the fact that the birthrate in Quebec was higher than the birthrate elsewhere.

Mr. HOMUTH: What leader outside the house did that?

Mr. CLEAVER: Were those words uttered for any other purpose than to raise racial fire, racial hatred? If they were uttered for any other purpose I will give my hon. friend the opportunity right now to give the other reason. I say that it could not have been for any other reason.

What are the facts in regard to this legislation? The present measure with its reducing scale, after you reach the family of four, obviously takes the family of four as the typical Canadian family. When the family is larger than four in number the monthly payments per child drop sharply, with the result that in the province of Quebec the total cost of this family allowance measure monthly, it is estimated, will be $6,709,000. Then, when you move into Ontario, what is the cost? The same—$6,068,000.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Has he also taken into consideration the amount of income tax returns from those two payments, $6 million in one province and $6 million in the other?

Mr. CLEAVER: No; but thank you for reminding me about the income tax.

Mr. HOMUTH: I thought I would help your speech.

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friends opposite are very much interested in raising these points periodically about the means test and what-not, but I have yet to hear any member of that party advocate that the children's allowance with respect to income tax, to the man earning $25,000 a year, should disappear. Think that one over.

Mr. HOMUTH: Knock that straw man down.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is quite apparent, from the terms of this bill and the resulting cost, that an honest effort has been made to hold the scales level with respect to all the provinces, and it is most unfair that criticism should be made in that regard without a statement of the facts. My hon. friends in the Conservative opposition, I say, raised this racial issue for one reason, and for one reason only. They have nothing to lose in Quebec. Why, bless you, this time they will not even lose their deposits!

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, you certainly will. Don't worry.

Mr. CLEAVER: They have no candidates in Quebec. They have nothing to lose in Quebec, but they think that by raising this racial issue they are going to gain a few votes in Ontario. What do you think of a major party which would have utter disregard for unity in Canada, in a time of war, just in order to make a few votes at a coming election? The family allowance scheme, I submit, has been justly and fairly thought out. Every province will benefit and benefit fairly by it.

I now come to the next point raised by the opposition and that is another objection raised by the hon. member for Peel. Listen to this: "9. It denies the basic principles of social justice", because it treats everybody alike. We are told that we have a new Conservative party, that they have a new name, a new leader and a new platform. They would lead us to believe; they want us to believe, that they have given up all their old Tory ideas of preference for the rich and the like. What do we find? Yesterday their leader came out and denounced the measure as opposed to the basic principles of social justice because it treats everyone alike.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member ought to be fair. If he is going to quote any part of that particular clause he ought to quote it all. Let us be fair about it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I will read the entire sentence.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is a good idea.

Mr. CLEAVER: "This scheme lumps them all together and gives the same grant to all."

Mr. HOMUTH: Go ahead and read the rest.

Mr. CLEAVER: What do you think of that? It does not give preference to the rich; it treats everyone alike; therefore it is opposed to social justice.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member puts an interpretation upon it that is not fair. Let him read the whole clause.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have his opportunity and he may review the arguments which the hon. gentleman is making.

Mr. HOMUTH: I certainly will.

Mr. CLEAVER: Then we come to the next argument, that the parents cannot be trusted with the money. There is nothing new in that argument.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who said that?

Mr. CLEAVER: That argument has been advanced many times.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who said it?

Mr. CLEAVER: I say that it has been advanced many times in opposition, that you should not increase wages because the man would spend the money unwisely.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, nonsense!

Mr. CLEAVER: It certainly is nonsense.

Mr. HOMUTH: Nonsense!

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friends in the opposition have a right to their opinions. If they distrust the parents of children in this country, if they do not believe that the father and mother of children think more of those children than anyone else, I am not to blame. They are to blame for so thinking.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Mr. HOMUTH: You are raising the bogey, not we.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friend says that I am raising the bogey. I say that my hon. friend's party—

Mr. HOMUTH: Where?

Mr. CLEAVER: —have expressed their opposition to this measure because there is no assurance that the money will benefit the children; it may go to the beer parlour.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will you please prove that.

Mr. CLEAVER: I will.

Mr. HOMUTH: All right; prove it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall be glad to give a quotation. Bracken House, you know, has been very busy.

Mr. HOMUTH: You can't find it; I may have it here.

Mr. CLEAVER: Does my hon. friend disown the Ottawa Citizen?

Mr. HOMUTH: The Ottawa Citizen? I never owned it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Let me read from an editorial of July 4, which states in part:

> But the family allowance scheme of the Prime Minister will not benefit them.

Referring to the children.

> It contains no guarantee that a single nickel will go to improve the lot of the children.

Mr. HOMUTH: Where is that quotation from?

Mr. CLEAVER: I am reading from an editorial that appeared on July 4.

Mr. HOMUTH: In what paper?

Mr. CLEAVER: The Ottawa Citizen. All I have to say in reply to that argument is this. If my hon. friends of the Conservative opposition think that this money will be spent unwisely by the parents, that it will go to the beer parlours and that the money should go into social services, they have a right to their opinion. But I have a right to mine. I trust the parents of this country. I know that at least ninety-nine per cent of them will spend the money wisely on additional food, proper clothing and better housing conditions for their families.

Mr. HOMUTH: I believe in a hundred per cent of them.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLEAVER: I wonder if I get any credit for the interruptions?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not a bit.

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall just take up one short matter and leave the rest for another occasion.

Mr. HOMUTH: Give us one more gibe.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is quite obvious that the word has gone out that this measure must be beaten at all costs. Articles have appeared in the press directly contrary to the fact, throwing out the idea that Great Britain is opposed to family allowance, at least, based upon the Beveridge plan. To anyone who wishes to look up the matter I would refer them to the parliamentary debates of the House of Commons of February 16, 1943, which entirely repudiates that statement. That statement has appeared editorially in many papers in Canada. I do not know how they could all be infected at once were it not for the fact that this information emanated from one source. I suggest that it was the Bracken House.

Mr. HOMUTH: Prove that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You might have said it yourself.

Mr. CLEAVER: A long article was written by—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Your time is up.

Mr. CLEAVER: —Miss Charlotte Whitton. In this article there is an analysis of what will happen with respect to two different incomes. The first income taken is that of a married man earning $1,500 a year, and after a long-winded explanation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Your time is up.

Mr. CLEAVER: —the article purports to show that that person will be out $68. I say that is a deliberate untruth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Your time is up.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): It is a difficult task to make a speech on this particular measure at this stage of the debate, because so many good speeches have been made and the subject matter has been pretty well canvassed. The thing that makes it most difficult is the lack of opposition to the measure, particularly vocal opposition. We know there are a lot of hon. members to the right who are ready to oppose the measure as indicated by the statements of their leaders in the house and in the country, but so far as taking part in the general debate is concerned they are conspicuous to-day by their silence. However, I did not rise to quarrel with them, but I should like to have some idea of the particular angle of the measure on which they base their opposition.

In opening the debate on the bill I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) struck a keynote that is long overdue in Canada. It was gratifying, to the members of this group at least, to hear the Prime Minister make the categorical statement that our human resources were more important than our natural resources. That is a trend of thought that is long overdue in this country. It is the basic philosophy of the movement that I represent in this house. In his statement the Prime Minister elaborated that philosophy to some considerable extent. I think the time has come in Canada for us to decide definitely on two matters in allocating the wealth of this country in the future. I think, and the members of this group think, and have so expressed themselves on many occasions, that the first charge against that wealth should be the care of the aged. The people who are responsible for whatever measure of success Canada has had since confederation, the old pioneers of the country, the people who are responsible for giving us the democratic institutions through which we discuss and bring forward legislation of this kind should be our first care. The first charge on the wealth of the country should be adequate provision for those who made the nation possible and gave us what we have to-day. In line with the Prime Minister's thoughts in expressing the sentiments he did when presenting this measure to the house, I think it is a matter on which we must come to some definite conclusions in the near future. There must be more adequate care for the aged people of this country. Second in importance to that is, I think, the measure now before the house, and the basic principle upon which it is framed. The second charge against the wealth of the country should be the care of the young children, those who are going to take this country forward in the future.

If we are to have in the future a nation that we can be proud of, then we shall have to correct the mistakes of the past with respect to the treatment of the young. One of the reasons why we are supporting this measure is that we feel it is a step in the right direction. It is at least a general recognition on the part of the government of Canada that we definitely have a responsibility to the youth, to the future generations, to our future citizens, to those who will be running this country in the future. It is our duty to see to it that they have some measure of security in the years when they are not able to fend for themselves. That is why we are pleased to be able to support this measure at the present time.

As I understand the principle of the measure, it is to be a children's allowance. The moneys appropriated and expended by parliament in connection with this particular measure are to go specifically and exclusively to the children of this country. I have heard many opinions expressed across the floor of the house with respect to the limitations and changes that should be made. I heard references to New Zealand and Australia and the systems that they follow. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) made an excellent speech. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) made, I think, one of the best contributions to the debate from that side of the house. That hon. member, occupying an official position in the Department of Labour, viewed this measure in a realistic way, I was pleased to hear him express the sentiments he did. I want to take this opportunity to say that, if the necessary action to support the sentiments expressed is taken, then I do not think anyone need have any fear with respect to the working of this measure if and when it is put into effect. The hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Edmonton East referred to the fact that there was a means test in New Zealand. I do not think that is correct.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think I said that.

Mr. GILLIS: I thought you did. If you did not, I am prepared to withdraw the statement. But the hon. member for Edmonton East definitely did refer to a means test. That suggests to the average person a social service worker invading his home, examining his cupboards and deciding whether he is sufficiently undernourished to receive a grant of this kind. That is not the situation in New Zealand at all. The situation is that minimum rates of five pounds five shillings are established. There is a ceiling on the total income of those who receive the allowance, but there is definitely a substantial minimum income provided first of all. Anyone not earning in excess of the ceiling, which applies to both urban and rural workers, receives an allowance. On the other hand, a rural or urban worker who may not be earning the minimum set will receive a sufficient allowance to bring him up to that minimum. That is how the thing is worked in New Zealand. It is not a means test, but there definitely is a ceiling and a minimum standard set for the whole country. I merely wanted to make that correction because I think it is unfair to the country which has pioneered so much in social service measures.

As I said a moment ago, I think the measure now before the house was designed definitely to care for the children of Canada. There should not be any quibbling; there should not be any limitations; it should not be assumed that it will not work properly. I think every child within the age limits set out in the bill should receive this grant. It is immaterial to me whether you get some of it back by taxing the higher income groups. I may be earning $4,000 or $5,000 a year and my family is well provided for. If you put a ceiling on this it may happen that within six months I have no income because of sickness or from other causes. The result would be that my family would have no income. As the matter stands now, I think the allowance should be paid to every child in Canada. I think also it would be proper to tax it back from the higher bracket incomes. There should be no discrimination. If this is to be given to the children of Canada in recognition of our responsibility to them, then it should be given without any reservation or restriction. That is what should be done in order to keep within the principles underlying children's allowances.

I have in mind the different mothers' allowance acts of the provinces. There is no such thing as a mother's allowance. The qualifying section in those acts requires that the mother shall have two children under a certain age, or one child in extenuating circumstances. It is a children's allowance rather than a mother's allowance. There are many limiting factors which should not get tangled up in this legislation.

I have heard the opinion expressed that there is no need for these allowances. I have heard it said, particularly this evening by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), that in some respects organized labour are opposing the measure. The hon. member went on to name certain people. I would point out to the house that the Canadian Congress of Labour made a presentation to the government in February of this year. There was no direct opposition on behalf of the Canadian Congress of Labour in that presentation. I do not want to read this into the record because the government has it. They accepted family allowances with certain reservations.

Mr. HOMUTH: But they have some fear.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly, and rightly so. I am going to express that opinion as I go along.

Mr. MARTIN: Did not Mr. Forsey approve it in the reconstruction committee?

Mr. GILLIS: That is correct. The reservation they make with respect to family allowances is that it must not under any circumstances be used by industry as a means of keeping down wages. In considering the broad social plan they accept the principle of family allowances. All we are establishing at this time is the principle and that principle is accepted by the Canadian Congress of Labour and, I think, by any sensible trades union leader in the country who has had an opportunity of studying the matter.

There may be some who expressed premature opinions when the announcement was made a few months ago that this measure was to be brought in. That was done before they had had an opportunity of studying this complicated problem. Consideration had to be given as to how family allowances could be worked in without disturbing other social measures, and what uses and abuses might occur if it were not administered strictly in accordance with the principle that is being established. Many of those people did not have the advantages that we have in the house, and they were not able to clarify their minds as quickly. I did mental handsprings in connection with this measure before I definitely made up my mind as to what I actually wanted. I am trying to express that decision to-night. I do not want the impression left in this house that certain organized groups across the country are disproving this measure. I am reasonably sure that this measure can be taken to any trades union section in Canada and the principles enunciated will be approved.

Is there a need for it? Yes; there is a definite need now for it. Like other hon. members of the house I am receiving many letters. Take the case of a woman whose husband has been incarcerated in the common gaol. There is no income from the breadwinner. If these allowances were available the wife and children of that family would have a measure of protection. Many of us receive letters from women whose husbands have gone A.W.O.L. in the army, navy or some other branch of the service, with a discontinuance of the dependents' allowances. It is a pathetic sight to see a woman, as I have, whose husband overseas is absent without leave—no income, no means of getting the necessities of life, and restrictions in the field of credit. All these make it impossible for the merchant to carry her; so that the family has nowhere to turn, except to charity.

Mr. HOMUTH: But she may not get this.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, she will, according to my reading of the bill.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. GILLIS: This measure will afford relief in a case of that kind.

Then fears are expressed by some that family allowances may be used to depress wages, and that they may militate against workers, in certain circumstances. May I repeat and also support what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East and by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I speak as one who on many occasions has paced the picket lines in labour disputes, and I say that this measure is taking the wife and family out of the firing line in cases where workers are forced to strike because of an unreasonable attitude by employers.

I can remember back in 1925 when we had a strike which lasted five months, and involved 12,000 miners in Nova Scotia. During that five months we lived on relief, practically, at eighty cents a week per family. It was pretty hard to get by, but we did it. Had we had this measure at that time it would have been a great asset to the workers of Nova Scotia who were endeavouring to establish what was a reasonable, just and fair wage.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does the hon. member realize that if those men had been earning wages subject to income tax, so that they would not have come under relief, the wives and children would not have got anything when the strike occurred.

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate that, fully. But when one stops for a moment he must realize that sixty-two per cent of the workers receiving wages and salaries in Canada are getting less than $1,000 a year.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am talking about your particular case.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; in our particular case we would have come under this measure at that time, because we were not in the brackets where we would have been paying income tax.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would you now?

Mr. GILLIS: I am safe in saying that now sixty per cent of the workers in the coal mines would not be affected because of the income tax restriction in this particular measure.

In my view this measure cannot be used to depress wages, if the organized workers of Canada keep their trade unions strong, and police this kind of legislation. They will have to do that. No government body, and no one in Ottawa is, in my opinion, going to stop employers in Canada from taking advantage of this kind of legislation. To keep control of that situation organized workers in Canada must strengthen their trade unions, insist upon agreements, police legislation, and keep those who are administering the measure informed as to where other people may be trying to take advantage of it.

Are there employers in Canada who will use it to their own advantage if they can? Yes; there are many of them. But there are also many of them who will not, because many employers in Canada are fair. The kind of employer who would use this measure to his own advantage would be the kind we have in the shipyards in Halifax at the present time. Down there 3,000 workers are being forced to strike to-morrow morning. And that is a strike in an essential war set-up, and one which may spread to the whole of Halifax harbour.

The employer who so far forgets himself as to take that kind of action and to jeopardize the entire nation's war effort, through that very important port, will take advantage of this kind of legislation, if the workers are not organized and policing it. We do not expect paternalism from the government. We expect only a fair deal. The workers of this country intend to organize democratically, to see that this kind of legislation is not abused. I am not a bit afraid, in my section of the country at least, of employers being able to use this measure for their own benefits. If they do, the government in power will certainly hear about it, and we will insist upon certain things being done.

Unions in Canada are not strongly organized in certain sections, I believe, and I hope that, in the future, legislation, both national and provincial, will be made available, because the trend to-day in the world is toward the democratic set-up, and the extension of the machinery we have had in the past.

I shall reserve my criticisms of the bill itself until a later time. I believe it requires some clarification, but I shall not discuss the sections in detail until we reach the committee stage. For example, section 6 stipulates that a board of referees is to be set up to determine if and when a person has a legitimate grievance because of his not being brought under the operations of the bill. Unless there is equal representation on the boards which are to administer the legislation, I have fear as to whether it will carry out the functions for which it is intended. That section merely states that the board is to be set up, but I think there will have to be equal representation across the country on these boards, both provincially and nationally, and that will have to be given if the measure is to work out satisfactorily.

Section 8 of the bill is, in my opinion, rather tricky, in that it gives to the governor in council unlimited powers to determine respecting whom these moneys shall be paid, and as to whether there is any duplication either nationally or provincially. Then, as I see it, those in receipt of mothers' allowances in a province which, in reality, are a grant to the children, can be removed from the scope of the bill, because it could be considered that there would be a duplication of payment. That, in my view, requires clarification, because certainly this measure should not in any way replace mothers' allowances paid in the provinces. In my opinion it should not be considered as a duplication of compensation for pensions. The bill itself states that pensions paid to army, navy or air force personnel will not be considered as duplications. There is no mention, however, of compensation or mothers' allowances paid in the provinces. Neither is there any mention of the merchant marine, although personnel of that body are to-day in receipt of war pensions because of disabilities received in this war.

Before the bill is finally adopted these matters should be clarified beyond shadow of any doubt. As I see the matter, this is the first measure of social security, in the real sense of the term, that has been set up in Canada. This is the first step toward a general over-all social security plan for Canada. It will have to be organized slowly. I realize that there is a great deal of difficulty from a jurisdictional standpoint, and for that reason I was particularly pleased to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in his speech clarify the limitations in the British North America Act. I believe his opinion was good, and after hearing him I would conclude that we have more latitude than I had at first thought. But before we finally accept the bill it should be clearly drawn, so that there may be no doubt as to who would be entitled to the allowances and who would not.

In closing my remarks, I shall speak briefly with respect to the implementing of the legislation. We do not want to be unmindful of the fact that all the social security measures, or social insurance—because this is the first social security measure—will require the spending of considerable sums of money. We do not want to feel that we shall have to go on in the same old-fashioned ways that we followed prior to the war. I believe that to make this measure function as we wish to see it function we shall require fundamental changes in our economic set-up, and considerable changes in our method of financing. If we are not prepared to make those changes we shall not be able to implement fully this step that we are now taking. There are going to be difficulties which will require the sensible cooperation of everyone in Canada who is trying to push this country forward.

I am quite pleased to be able to stand here and say that for the first time since I have come into this house I can wholeheartedly support the principle of a measure without any reservations whatever, if we all mean the things that we said when this bill was presented to the house. I am going to do my best to see that the provisions of this bill as set out here are implemented, and I shall work to the end that our unemployment insurance, our measures with respect to health and other social services that we have been discussing will be combined eventually in one general social security act applicable right across the country, whereby both the aged and the youth of this country may be guaranteed a full measure of social security. I am not concerned about the people in between. They can rustle for themselves; but I believe, as the Prime Minister rightly said, that we in this parliament have a supreme obligation to those who helped to build up this nation and are no longer able to take care of themselves, and also to those who are going to carry this nation forward into what we all hope will be a brighter future. It is our obligation to see that these young people are fitted for that duty.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I think we can all appreciate the very real satisfaction that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) felt in introducing this particular measure to the house. I think the pride that he exhibited in the provisions of this bill and in the purposes it would achieve springs from the fact that it is the fruition of almost his life's work and is something in which we can all join and which we can all thoroughly appreciate.

I agree with others who have said that this is one of the most important measures ever presented to any parliament in any country. So important do I consider it, that one of the reasons why I rise to speak is to put on the records of this house my own spoken support of the measure, and also to give me an opportunity of congratulating the government on formulating such a policy and bringing it down in the shape of the bill that is now under consideration.

When I noted the proper satisfaction and pride exhibited by the Prime Minister on this occasion, I could not help comparing it with another statement that was placed on the record quite recently by another member of this house, indicating the political successes that this particular party had achieved in the last few years. The period with which he was dealing was from 1940 down to the present. We all recall that that period coincides with the life of this parliament and with the four and a half years of this war in which we are all so much concerned. It struck me that that statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was unfortunate. It was a matter in which I could not have joined with him in taking pride had he been speaking on behalf of my leader or on behalf of the party which I have the honour to support because, as I listened to him recite the political successes that had been achieved by his party during that period of terrible warfare, it seemed to me that he was giving to the house the war record of the party to which he belongs. And so I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is, to me at least, a matter of great pride, as I am sure it is to every member on this side of the house, that we have sat behind the Prime Minister with his record of achievement in the war effort and with his record of achievement in putting through social legislation which has finally reached its culmination in the introduction of this wide and comprehensive measure that we are now considering.

I do not know that there is much that I can add to the many excellent speeches which have already been made in support of this excellent bill, but there are one or two points that I should like to draw to the attention of the house. The underlying principle of the bill, the keynote of the measure, is equality of opportunity. To me that is essentially a principle of true Liberalism. Personally I have almost a horror of paternalism because I believe it destroys the fibre of the people to whom it is applied. But under this measure we in no way disturb the parental authority, the parental control or the parental direction of the lives and well-being of the children. In other words, the basic principle of this bill is to help parents to perform a very important task. It is to help them to help themselves.

These family allowances, as has been pointed out, go to those in the income classes who need it most, to those who are not in receipt of sufficient income to pay any income tax, and to those whose income is on the margin where the income tax payable is very small.

I happen to come from an agricultural constituency, and naturally I considered this bill in the light of its effects upon those engaged in farming. The results will, I believe, be wholly beneficial to those engaged in agriculture. One-half of the children of Canada live upon farms, and it seems to me, therefore, to follow that the farmers will benefit largely as a class from the provisions of this measure for the well-being of the children of the nation. I think it will be of particular advantage in the area from which I come in southwestern Saskatchewan, a district that all too frequently is visited by drought or other natural disasters which bring almost untold hardships to the farmers in that area. My memory easily recalls the period of the great drought centring in 1937. One of the things that I remember vividly were the cases that came to me seeking advice and counsel as to how the wives and mothers on the farm could take care of the needs of the children during that period. They suffered these hardships despite the efforts of the municipalities and of the provincial and dominion governments, because I think that neither any of these governments nor most of us who took an interest in these matters during that period realized the intensity of the problem, nor did we understand the measures of relief that we now know should have been adopted at that time.

I recollect, as I say, the real hardship which faced the fathers and mothers on the farms of southern Saskatchewan when they found themselves incapable of supplying their children with the necessary food and clothing and opportunities of continuing their school education. Nothing excited my sympathy and desire to help so much as that experience during the drought period; and while in these last few years that particular area, with some exceptions, has been visited with good crops, we know that drought will come again, and once more the mothers and fathers will be presented with a like problem where the income from the farm fails for some cause over which they have no control. When I think of the benefits which will flow from this measure into those homes in the shape of a monthly cash income, I say to those hon. members who have not experience of the conditions to which I have referred, that they can hardly credit the new hope, the new courage, the upbuilding of the spirit which will come as a result of those benefits received in times of dire distress.

While someone has pointed out that this bill is aimed at assisting the children of the nation, in my opinion it will assist the parents, because no parent can be a good parent, or create that atmosphere which should surround a home, if dire necessity is knocking at the door. So that I believe this measure will accomplish something for parents as well as for children. I believe, too, that there is a psychological problem which will be met, in part at least, by the provisions of the bill. Any parent would agree with me that a child cannot grow up and develop into the wholesome type of Canadian citizen that we like to have if the home is an unhappy one, owing to economic necessity and the inability of parents to provide those things which are needed for the proper upbringing of children. As I read letters in the press, or hear it stated that there are parents who will not discharge the duty expected of them, I reflect that that type will be a small, almost infinitesimal minority. But even that minority, let me suggest, may be the consequence of no such provision in a bygone generation as is contained in this bill, because in all likelihood those people are the products of homes which were visited with some of the troubles which this measure is attempting to cure. So that in that way, remembering that the children of to-day are the parents of to-morrow, I believe that this legislation will do a great deal for family life, for the father, the mother and the children in the home.

There is one other result which will flow from this measure that, to my mind, has great importance. It is connected with a problem which all hon. members would like to assist in finding a solution for. Roughly speaking, the population of Canada is divided equally between males and females; and when we remember that the establishment of a home and a family is preceded by the institution of marriage, we cannot but feel that Canada in its national policies should encourage in every possible way the marriage of our young women to our young Canadian men. I believe that the overwhelming majority of young women find in the career of a wife and a mother the career which most satisfies the desires of the heart. I know that, if they are denied marriage, a home and a family, they claim the right not to be excluded from any other vocation; but I believe that our national policies will satisfy that great and proper desire, that normal and natural desire on the part of the vast majority of our young women, if those policies are directed to encouraging marriage, the establishment of a home and the raising of a family.

When I hear members of the official opposition state that this particular measure will unfairly assist the large families of certain racial groups, I submit that that is a wholly unwarranted as well as too narrow a viewpoint regarding the results which will flow from this bill. Let us consider it for a minute, and in dealing with this I am not referring merely to the high birth rate which has long been a tradition of the province of Quebec. Many other racial groups in my own and other provinces have the same tradition—and it is a healthy and wholesome one,—that of having large families; and as someone said to-night, we would all be proud of the parents who faced the responsibilities of raising a large family if we were assured that those children would be raised to be happy, healthy and productive Canadians. I suggest that this bill will have exactly the opposite effect to that suggested by the leader of the official opposition. In all likelihood it will not increase the number of children in the groups who now have the traditionally large families, but on the other hand it will encourage other groups among whom the birthrate is low to increase the number of their children, simply because it will assist in removing the fear of accepting the financial responsibility that goes with marriage, the establishment of home and the raising of a family. Therefore I believe that this legislation will have a most wholesome and beneficial effect upon the family life of the whole dominion. Health and education are two great correctives of political and economic ills.

Let me suggest, too, that what we all seek is a common ideal on the part of the younger generation as it grows up; and if we apply the means available through this bill we can broaden the viewpoint, increase the health and the education of those in the large families which this measure is intended to help. If, too, we can encourage those groups who do not go in for large families to accept with this assistance the responsibility of having them, giving them the same assistance in the matter of attainment of health and education, I believe that we shall be doing a great deal to accomplish unity among the Canadians who are growing up to-day. When they reach manhood and womanhood they will have ideals in common, and be able to give to this country greater unity of effort and assure to the nation as a whole greater happiness than it has known in the past. I recommend to the government constant consideration of what I believe to be a very real problem facing this nation, namely, the encouragement of marriage between our young men and young women.

I believe it was the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who pointed out that, roughly speaking, it requires an investment of $5,000 to build a home which would be suitable for the average Canadian family. Most of us can remember when a like home could have been built for a great deal less. One can readily understand therefore that the average young man of to-day would hesitate, in view of the financial responsibility he would assume, to get married, because he feels he might not be able to give the girl of his choice a home, or to shoulder the responsibility of raising a family. I think we will all agree that marriage without children is not as conducive to happiness as marriage with children.

The whole programme of the government, in its national housing plan, in the Unemployment Insurance Act, in its placing of floors under certain farm product prices, in its social security legislation, in its national health legislation, and finally in this family allowance measure, is one that receives my wholehearted support. It is my profound belief that it will result in the establishment of homes and in the raising of young Canadians who will contribute, when they grow up, substantial dividends on the amount that we are investing in the welfare of our young people.

I do not intend to keep the house any longer. I have fulfilled the purpose I had in view in my remarks, in expressing my warm support of the measure and in again congratulating the Prime Minister on the fact that in 1944 he sees the fruition of a thought that had its birth many years ago. I thoroughly agree with him that his life has been largely devoted to the endeavour to have that thought translated into legislation in this house, and I share in the pride he must feel at the comparatively united support which this particular measure is receiving in the house.

In conclusion, I would recall a statement made by the Prime Minister in connection with this bill, with which I heartily agree:

> Human personality, its recognition and development, are of more importance than the protection of property, privilege or position, and the increase of human well-being of infinitely more importance than the increase of material wealth.

I think these are words which every member who supports the bill can quote with approval in recommending it to his constituency.

Mr. J. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Populaire Canadien,—to which I am proud to belong—and I myself have asked the government on several occasions to help, in every way possible, families and especially large ones.

Until the present session, the government turned a deaf ear to our pressing and oft-reiterated appeals in favour of this country's most valuable asset, our manpower.

On February 3, 1944, during the debate on the speech from the throne, I stated the following, which I quote from Hansard:

> The speech from the throne contains the announcement concerning the adoption of family allowances by the government. I hope that this is not simply an election campaign promise but that, on the contrary, a bill will be brought down in this connection, in the course of this session. Allowances should not be granted exclusively to families of five or six children, but should apply to all families irrespective of their size.
> Families of ten or twelve children are not a scarcity in the province of Quebec. Some are even larger. Personally, I am one of fifteen children, twelve boys and three girls, and I am convinced other families just as large can still be found in the constituency of Rimouski. The government, who had always refused to help large families has now a unique occasion to do so through family allowances. This is not the first time I take the opportunity of pleading this cause in the House and I shall continue to do so until the government decides to be fair to large families.
> For us French Canadians, large families are our means of survival, and, as long as, in the province of Quebec, large numbers of children are brought into the world, we shall not need refugees or immigrants from whatever country they might come; that is the way to bring happiness and prosperity to the province of Quebec and to Canada.

Of course, on the eve of elections and for campaign purposes only, our leaders changed their minds and at long last decided to give in to the pressing appeal of those who tirelessly urged that the Canadian family be encouraged and treated fairly.

Indeed, we rejoice in the fact that the government has deemed fit to recognize the principle of helping the family, but we cannot help noticing that the proposal fails in two most important respects. In the first place, it disregards the autonomy of the provinces; in this field, however, their rights cannot be ignored. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it has always claimed them. For that reason, each particular province should be entrusted with the administration of the act.

The proposal provides, moreover, that the allowances be paid on a "decreasing" scale from the fifth child on. This is a most unjust procedure. No other country has put into effect a similar method. Some have chosen a uniform rate, others have preferred an "increasing" scale. If the government really wants to help large families, it should put the latter into effect. French-Canadian families will be particularly hard hit by this "decreasing" rate and if approved, it would cause unforgivable injustice. I hope the government will reconsider the matter and remedy that injustice by adopting the progressive rather than the decreasing rate provided for in the bill now before us.

The true originator of family allowances in Canada was the great patriot Honoré Mercier, former prime minister of the province of Quebec. He was the first to take a sympathetic stand toward large families in the province of which he was unquestionably the greatest prime minister. He granted to families of twelve or more children a certain acreage of land. He was an ardent believer in the "revenge of the cradle". Consequently, his memory is ever cherished by the people of the province of Quebec whose motto will always be "I remember".

I listened the other day to the speeches of some members who are horrified by the fact that the government have decided to spend $200,000,000 in order to help large families. Yet, those members are the same ones who had no hesitation in voting $2,800,000,000 as a tribute to England. They are the ones who demand total war, who do not hesitate to state that Canada should fight to the last man and spend its last penny in this war. But when it comes to protecting this country's most valuable asset, the large families, they are horrified and condemn the government.

As far as I am concerned, I join those who have congratulated the government on having at last brought down this measure of family allowances. It is a step in the right direction.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) said last night, as reported on page 5365 of Hansard:

> Is it not amusing to observe a Liberal government, which laughed at Aberhart's $25 a month to all families, suddenly bringing down a baby bonus proposition which will cost the country $200 million or more? This bonus will be given to children up to fifteen years of age, whereas even in Russia it is proposed to bonus children only up to five years of age. It should be remembered that the government will get the money for their largesse out of the people by taxes. This means that everyone who pays taxes will have less money to educate and bring up his own family. I believe that it is a fact that sixty-three per cent of the families with ten or more children live in the province of Quebec. Contrast this with British Columbia where families are small and where forty per cent have no children living at home. When eight provinces realize that they are being taxed for the benefit of one province, will it not accentuate the disunity which has shaken Canada from coast to coast, because the government chose to listen to the powerful voice of this same province which refused to share equally with others in fighting the common enemy?

If there are people who can sow disunion in the country, they are like the hon. member for Parkdale, who forgets that recently a French Canadian, Major Triquet, won the Victoria Cross.

He also forgets the losses sustained in this war by the French Canadians. If he were to peruse the daily casualty lists, he would notice that the losses among the French Canadians have been especially heavy, in Sicily, in Normandy and elsewhere. He would see that the Royal 22nd has fought nobly and the Régiment de Québec has been practically annihilated. This same gentleman states in this house and before the whole country that the province of Quebec should not benefit from the family allowance proposed by the government, because the French Canadians of Quebec have not discharged their duty. As long as this country harbours such fanatics and imperialists, it will be very hard to attain Canadian unity.

I shall not labour this point any further, but I shall repeat that these very same gentlemen are the ones who do not hesitate to claim that the tribute we pay to England is not large enough; who maintain that we are not sending enough men to the slaughter in foreign lands; who, to-day, oppose a vote of $200,000,000 to safeguard the most precious asset of our country. Family allowances will be a great encouragement to large families and, after the war, we should be in a position to do without immigrants. It is better to take care of our human resources in Canada than to spend fabulous sums to attract immigrants from overseas.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I favour this measure and hope that the administration in power when the bill we are now considering has become the law of the land will administer it with justice and fairness to all.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I rise at this time to join with others in my support of the measure that has been introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), namely, family allowances. In the few minutes at my disposal I wish to say that it seems strange to me that most of the opposition to this bill has emanated from those who, so far as I know, have never felt the hand of poverty. To me it is most remarkable that those whose lot in life lay along the easy path, shall I say, are the ones in this country who are now raising their voices loudly against this measure. I noticed also that in the address given by the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Graydon) against the measure, although he claims to be a farmer, no mention was made by him of the fact that this measure would benefit one class above all others, namely, the farming class. The man who claims to be a farmer made speeches and diatribes against this measure but did not mention that it would benefit the very class to which he claims to belong.

Statements have been made by some that it would benefit certain provinces more than others. I took the time the other night to go into the child population of the various provinces. I obtained a statement from the bureau of statistics, a brief analysis of which is as follows: There are some 3,409,911 children in Canada between the ages of birth and sixteen.

Mr. WRIGHT: The census of 1941?

Mr. REID: Yes. They are spread out throughout Canada in this proportion. In Prince Edward Island the population is 30,484. The percentage of the children under sixteen to the total population within the province is roughly thirty-two per cent. In Nova Scotia the population is 577,962. The percentage of children under sixteen is thirty per cent. The population of New Brunswick is 457,401. The percentage of children under sixteen is thirty per cent. Quebec has a total child population under sixteen of 1,133,137; the percentage of the children in that province under sixteen is thirty-five per cent. Ontario has 988,933 children under sixteen. Their proportion works out to about twenty-eight per cent. Manitoba has 204,684 children. Their percentage is twenty-eight per cent. Saskatchewan has 286,821 children under sixteen. Their percentage is thirty-two per cent. Alberta has 243,547 children under sixteen. Their percentage is thirty-one per cent. British Columbia, I am sorry to say, has the smallest percentage of children of all the nine provinces. That province has a total population of 817,861. The children under sixteen number 187,427, which works out to about twenty-three per cent of the population within the province.

Mr. HAZEN: Would you mind repeating the number of children in New Brunswick under sixteen?

Mr. REID: The population given to me is 457,401.

Mr. HAZEN: In other provinces you are giving the number of children.

Mr. REID: The children under sixteen total 155,319.

Mr. HAZEN: How many children in Nova Scotia?

Mr. REID: 179,559. It works out roughly to thirty per cent. These figures do not reveal a preponderance of children in the province of Quebec as compared with other provinces. In Quebec there is only a total of thirty-five per cent of the population under the age of sixteen years, whereas in New Brunswick there is thirty-four per cent, and in Prince Edward Island, thirty-two per cent. I think these figures are most interesting; at least they were to me.

The figure for British Columbia is only twenty-three per cent, but I noted that there is a greater percentage of older people in that province when compared with her population than in some of the others. As is well known, nearly all the provinces are represented in British Columbia by former residents. People in ill health or up in years are told to go there to enjoy the splendid climate we have, and usually they stay there to end their days at a time when the rearing of a family is not to be thought of.

It has been said also that some labour leaders have opposed this measure, and they have. Speaking to-night as a labour man, I want to say that I was astonished that any man who had fought his way up through the labour ranks would protest against a social measure of this kind. The contention that it would reduce wages is, to my mind, all wrong. Throughout the years when a man is applying for a position the employer does not consider whether he is married or not. He is employed for the work he is able to perform. When a man is hired because of ability, the employer generally does not look around to see whether a man is married or single when it comes to laying men off.

Not all labour has been against this measure, because I noticed an article in the last issue of the Labour Review, where the Canadian Federation of Labour has this to say:

Nobody has yet objected out loud to the payment of cash allowances to the members of the armed forces for the support of their children. That fact is worth nothing now that many persons are inveighing earnestly against Mr. Mackenzie King's proposal to continue the allowances when the troops return to civil life and to extend them to all Canadian families.

Millions of men now wearing the uniforms of many countries rely upon the state to provide for their children's upkeep. When the war ends, a large proportion of them will continue to enjoy the same provision. In quite a few countries, children's allowances were paid before the war. After the war, still more countries will have them. Canada has to decide whether or not to keep abreast of Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand in social progress and population policy.

In so far as social legislation is concerned, Canada is not only keeping abreast of some countries; she is well ahead of a great many with the introduction of this piece of social legislation. The article goes on to refer to the objection by some churches, and states:

The objection of some religious sectarians answers itself. If they took as much interest in the size of the population as they do in its habits they would not need to fear the spread of any church. Their sensible course would be, instead of opposing children's allowances, to urge the members of their communions to let marriage bear fruit and enlarge the congregation.

I say that the churches should take note of that, but so far they have not raised their voices. To my mind it is time they raised their voices about this very thing.

There is one warning I should like to give to those who will be responsible for the administration of this legislation. An effort should be made to see to it that the money paid out goes entirely for the benefit of the children. To-day the members of the special committee inquiring into the problems affecting the dominion government and the city of Ottawa were taken on a tour through the city. One man in the party who knew the different districts pointed out certain houses where the children were not attending school for one reason or another. The thought came to me that when this measure is in effect those children and any others should be made to go to school or the money should be kept back from the parents, and not paid until they do.

I have another suggestion to make. There may be a few fathers who will take advantage of the legislation and, so to speak, become vagrants, and who will not be inclined to work. If that is the case, steps should be taken by the municipalities to institute proceedings against such parents who are ready to lie back and not earn money other than that provided by the state for the upkeep of their children. When in the past it was left to the woman of the family to lay a charge against the husband, in many cases the home was broken up. Some other authority should lay these charges. It should be made known to these men that if they are not ready to carry out their responsibilities, a charge will be laid by the municipalities, and they will be made to contribute to the upkeep of their families rather than simply lie back and allow the state to send a cheque along each month, which cheque is intended entirely for the children.

I think this is about all I have to say at this moment. But I do want to say that it is a proud moment in my life that I am a member of this House of Commons at a time when this measure is being placed on the statute books. I come from a humble home, and I realize, perhaps better than some of those who are opposing this bill, just what it means. Those of us who come from fairly large families know that quite often the children who come first are not as well provided for as those who come later on. The children who come first quite often have to go out to work quite early and contribute toward the support of the other members of the family. The children who come later on receive the benefit of this help, and likewise the parents themselves may be in better circumstances as the children grow older.

Coming from a humble family, I know what this would have meant to our family had we had it. I realize what it will mean to hundreds of families throughout the length and breadth of this country. I ask those who are opposing it to take stock of why they are opposing it. If they oppose it simply from a political point of view they should be ashamed. This is the finest piece of legislation this House of Commons has brought down and I am proud that I am a member of the Liberal party. While in the past few years the Conservative party and the Liberal party have got to the point where it has been at times difficult to distinguish between them, especially since tariffs have been done away with, this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, makes us truly Liberals, and I am giving it my unqualified support.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Peterborough West) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.
