THE SMUGGLER. (Concluded.)

The storm did rage fearinity, and its increa-ing violence watned one to retreet my home-ward way actors the disappearance of a yet gimmering moon about leave me to purate it in total darkness. Flapping my bat over my eyes, and wapping myadel saudy around in the thick fields, of a large boat-clock, I issued Large masses of clouds were burried in subtime disorder across the dim strugglary assem, whose pale gleamed at intervals with ghastly indistinctness along the white sands, and on

I pursued my way, buffetting the conflicting elements, other sounds, methought, appared to shill intonation of human voices seemed obenied with the waiting and sobbing of the storm; the creaking and tabsouring of planks, the splish of outs, was distinguishable, it

I was not descived. A momentary gleam of mosnight glanced on the white sails of a vessel at some distance from the land, and one of her boats (a black speck on the builtows) was discernable making her way towards the shore. At that moment another toat, close in shore, shot by with the velocity of lightening, and at the same instant a man unshed quickly by me, whose tall remarkable ligure I recognized for Campbell's in that din rapidity of an arrow, and immediately I word a long shrill whistle re-echoed by another and from the cliffs, from the sheer, and from the schiffs, and I could no longer another from the cliffs, from the shore, and from the sea. The moon had almost with from the sea. The moon had almost with drawn her feeble light, and I could no longer discern any object but the white sands under them. More than two miles of my homeward path was yet before me; and in their progress I should have to cross two guilles furrowed through the sand by land-springs from the adjacent cliffs. Intermingled and bedded in these were several rocky crags and, and portions of the foundered cliff, amongst which it was easy to pick one's day-light way; but the impenetrable gloom that now enveloped every object, made me pause for a moment to consider how far it might be safe to concorded now far it might be safe to concorded now far it might be safe to concorded now far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the consider how far it might be safe to contract the contract that the consider how far it might be safe to contract the contract that the contract that the contract that the contract the contract that the contract the contract that the

Campbell's cettage, a few turiongs up the beach, decided the result of my deliberation, and I turned towards the little dwelling purposing to apply there for a lanthorn and a guide, should the younger Campbell chance to be at home. I had no need to tap for all mittage at the bandle door. It was open, and ear the threshold should the mether of the countenance, and her naturally dark and cofamily. The light from within gleamed across her face an triggue, and I could perceive that she was listening with intense breathlessthat she was listening with intense breathless-ness, and with her eyes rivetted, as if they could piece the durkness, towards the quarter from whence I was approximage. My steps on the loss shingle at length teached the cargand she darted forward, exclaming, "Oh, Any? thank God! here's your tather." The young man sprang to the door with a light, and its beam revealed by then unvelcome features, instead of those of the bushond and father. "Oh, sir! I hought—" was poor Margaret's eloquently uninished ejacuta-tion, when she discovered her mistake; "but you are kindly welcome," she quickly added, for this is no night for any Christian soul to be out in, though my lussiand and so ——Oh, for this is no night for any Christian soul to be out in, though my husband and son——Oh, sir! they are with, with tossing in one little best on that dreadful's a; and that is not all-the Ranger's boats are on the look-out for the the thick foits, of a brige tout-clock, I issued broth from the cheerful proglames of the cell-circle from the cheerful programs of the consequences of their filled traditions which mountainous waves came reling is of these poor people, by the agentic programs of the consequences of their filled traditions and the consequences of their filled traditions to the mountainous waves came reling is of these poor people, by the agentic programs of the consequences of their filled traditions and the consequences of their filled traditions of the consequ ble grounds of apprehension. I suggested the probability of Campbell not being in the boat, as he had passed me on the beach so recently; but, at all events, he was abroad in a tremer dons night, and with a desperate gang, ex-pecting and armed against resistance. For pecting and armed against resistance. For-getting my own purpose of bornowing a lanthorn to continue my howeward path, I entered the cabin with the distressed females, whose looks thanked me for abiding with them in this their hour of need. A cheerful fire brightened the interior of the little dwellfire brightened the interior of the little dwelling, where neatness and order still hore testiment that the habits of its immates had at least been those of peaceful industry. The fire-light gleaned ruddy red on the clean brick floor; a carved oak table, and a few clumas old chairs of the same fashion, were bright with the poish of age and housewifery; and one, distinguished by capacious arms, a tigh stuffed back, and red cushion, was placed clore beside the ingle nook, the accustomed seat of the father of the family. His tighe lay close at hand, on the high mantel-shelf, where a pair of brass candlesticks, a few china cups, some long-shanked drinking glasses, and sundry tobacco stoppers, of fanistical figure, were ranged in symmetrical order.

neculiarly interesting in this young woman; and beauty of feature, for, excepting a pair of one dark eyes, shaded by bashes of unusual length, there was nothing uncentmon in her continenance, and her naturally dark and colourless complexion; was tinged with the saliew has of sickness; her fips were whiter than her cheek and her ouconsmonly tall figure, slender and fragile as a reed, bowed down with the langour of sickness and sorrow. But when she littled up those dark eyes, their melancholy light was touchingly expressive, and in unison with the general character of the slight shadowy frame that seemed almost transparent to the workings of the wounded spirit within. Any's young heart had never in this on with the general standards of under stight shadowy frame that seemed almost transparent to the workings of the wounded spirit within. Amy's young heart had never recovered the shock of her William's untime-ity death, and her timid, tender nature, was weighed down under a perpetual load of con-scious self-reproach, that for her sake, and that of her intants, her father and her brother had engaged in the perilous unlawfunness of their present courses. As she sat looking on her mother's face, I coule parceive what theughts were passing in her mind. At last a large tear, that had been some time collect-ings, swelled over the quivering lid, and trick-led slowly down her cheek, and thising sud-chenly, and letting fall the netting and shuttle-she came and edged herself on the corner of her mother's choir, and clasping one arm round her nearly, and hiding her face on her shoulder, sobbed out, "Mother!"—My Aong! my dear child!" whispered the fond parent, tenderly caressing her, "why should you always reproact yourself set? You, sho have been a good dutini child, and a comfort to treet reimpations, did we not contrive to maintain ourselves, and you and your dear tatherless babies, by honest industry! and where should you have taken refuge, my pre-cious Amy, but under your parent's root?" A look of eloquent gratitude, and a tender kiss, were Amy's reply to these fond assurances. For a few moments this touching intercourse of hearts beguiled them from the intense anx-iousness with which they had been listening were Amy's reply to three found assumances for a few moments this touching intercourse of hearts beguied them from the intense anytousness with which they had been listening to every sound from without; but the redoubled violence of the storm fearfully roused them from that momentary abstraction, and they started and looked in each other's faces, them from that momentary abstraction, and they started and looked in each other's faces, and then so mine, as if beseeching comfort, when, alas I had only sympathy to bestow. The conflict of winds and waves was indeed tremendous; and I felt too forcibly convinced that if the poor Campbells were indeed exposed to it, in their little fishing boat, nothing short of a miracle could save them from a watery grave. There was a chance however that the landing of the contraband goods might have been effected by the crew of the lugger without help from shore, and in that case, the prolonged absence of the father and son might arise from their having proceeded with them to some inhand place of concealment. The probability of this suggestion was eggerly cargit at by the conscious pair, but the ray of hope gleamed with transient brightness. A gust of wind, more awful than any which had preceded it, rushed past with deafening uprocess, and as it died away, low sobs, and shrill monaing tamentations, seemed mingled with its deep bass. We were all silent; now straintalin open at the leaf, where, twenty-two years back from that very day, the venerable parent had recorded, with pious gratitude, the birth of her son's first horn. "Ah, my dear son! my good Maurice !" ejaculated the heart-struck mother; "I was not used to forget the day God gave thee to me. Thou went the first to leave me, and now". She was interrupted by the low inarticulate naumer of a human voice that so inded near us. We all started, but Amy's ear was familiarized to the tone; it was that of one of her little ones talking and moaning in its sleep. The small chamber where they lay, opened from that they were in, and the young mother crept softly towards the bed of her sleeping

The small chamber where they lay, opened from that they were in, and the young mother rept softly towards the bed of her sleeping infants. She was still bending over them, when the outer door was suddenly dashed open, and Campbell—Campbell himself, burst into the cottage. Oh! with what a knick of extacy was he welcomed! With what a rapture of inarticulate words, clinging embraces, and tearful smiles! But the joy was transient and succeeded by a sudden chili of nameless apprehensions; for, disengaging himself almost roughly from the arms of his wife and daughter, he staggered towards his own old chair, and tinging himself back into it, covered his face with his clasped hands. One only cause for this fearful agitation suggested life! In his trembling wife. "My son!" she shricked out, grasping her hused itself to his trembing wire. "Myson" she shricked out, grasping her husband's arms, "what have you dore with him? He is dead! he is murdered! Oh!! knew it would come to this." "Peace, woman "shouted Campbell, in a voice of thunder, uncovering his face as he started up wild-thus the sheet of correlling to the started of the sheet of the sh

"Campbell," I circle, "unhappy man what have you done? to what have you more to what have you more to what have you more than the same to the darkness favours you." He trembled, and tooked irresolute for a moment, but immediately resuming the voice and aspect of desperate steruness, replied, "It is too late; they are at my beels—they tracked me home," and while he yet spoke, the trampling of feet, and the shout of loud voices was heard; the door burst open, and several rough looking men, in the garb of sailors, rushed into the cottage. "Ah! we have you, man," they vociferated, "we have you, at last, though the young villain hy? But checking himself instantaneously, he added, in a subdares call my son a villain?" But checking himself instantaneously, he added, in a subdare sail my son a villain? "But checking himself instantaneously, he added, in a subdare call my son a villain?" But checking himself instantaneously, he added, in a subdare call my for all his rough way, he is as tenderhearte as a child, Richard! Richard! speak to them; tell them it is a mistake." He neither spoke nor moved, nor lifted up his eyes probability of this suggestion was eggerly caught at by the conscious pair, but the ray of hope gleamed with transient brightness. At last a shriek (such a one as my cars never before heard, the recol-lection of which still curdles the blood in my veins) burst from her lips, and brought her veins) burst from her lips, and brought her daughter and husband, even the unfortunate man himself, to the spot where she stood ab-sorbed in that fatal contemplation. At six o'clock, nearly one hundred gentlemen sat down to a repust as samptuous and substantial as any perhaps ever prepared in Quebec. After the removal of the cloth, numerous loyal and national toasts were proposed, and res-nonded to in spreches of unusual interest. The whole evening was spent in a most de-lightful manuer; and the company did not separate till an early hour this morning.

Complainant said he would consider it as a mistake, to which defendant replied, "You may go to the d——1! and take it as you like;" and on being told that he acted like a blackguard, defendant committed the assault which had led to the institution of the present action. He (Mr. F.) had subsequently offered to sop further proceedings, on an apology being made; this, however, had been refused.

Mr. Donset corroborated Mr. F.'s evidence. Mr. Aylwin addressed the jury for the defence. The whole affair, he said, originated in Mr. Fortier having been mistaken for Mr. Vanfelson, with whom the defendant was on intimate terms. MISCELLANDOUS SELECTIONS.

JERUSALEM.

The melanticly will interesting fate of Jerusalem has a character of its own. Ouce the price of Western Asia, it has often say, as it were, when, south, as and devalue, and the raiss of her whis and timples. Indeh, being led into capitalty and rendered tradumly, Jerusalem, as the propher Isalah most affectingly expresses it, as at as a valow; the teats were on her choices and her dan draw were. mgly expresses it, "sat as a videw; the tears were on her choose; and her duriders were inhitteness." The act often mined, and once furrowed with the pleasa, betwee has never entirely forsaken her? See has rise from her ashes, and suit fives: "show of her beams," it is trac, but during complaint mean her former greatness. The destination of Journal du. Previous to the direct, the city was a prey to the most landstonally correby; robbers having broken into it, and fittled almost every house with this ver, accesses, and hoisers having broken into it, and fittled almost bers having broken into it, and blied almost every house with this ves, assessins, and his-lers of every description. The best citizens were through into prisons, and atterwards murdered, without even so much as a toral of trial. At this one Titus appeared before the gates is a vest multitude having previously arrived in the city to colorist the feast of the Pastover. During this orderated sleep there were no less than three carthquakers; and as autora borgalis terrified the inhabitants and an autora horgalis terrified the inhabitants and as aurora potential terrified the inhabitants with forms, which their fears and astonis -ment converted into producies of armies, light-ing in the air and flaming swords hanging over their Temple. They were visited with a their Temple. They were visited with a place, so dreadul, that more than one numbered and fifty thousand were carried out hundred and fifty thousand were carried out of the city, at the public charge, to be buried, and six hundred thousand were cast out of the gates and over the walls! A famine ensued; and so horrible was the want, that a bushel of corn sold for six hundred crowns: the populace were reduced to the necessity of raking oil excrement of horses, mules, and oven, to satisfy their hunger; and a lady of suffix case helded the corn child and a and oven, to satisfy their number? And a large of quality even holied her own child, and attit !—a cirime so exquisite, that Titus vowed to the eternal gods, that he would bury its infamy in the rules of the city. He took it soon after by storn: :—the plough was drawn over it; and with the exception of the west over it; and with the exception of the west wall and three towers, not one stone remained above another. Nincty-seven thousand persons were made captives; and one million one hundred thousand persished, during the siege. Those, made captives, being sold to several nations, were dispersed over a great portion of the ancient world; and from them are descended the present race of dews, scattered singly, and in detached portions, in every province of Europe, and in many distincts of Africa and Asia. Thus terminated this memorable siege!—a siege, the results of which meet the eye in every Jew we see.
